From manners to looke towards our doctrine; the noveltie of our Religion (you ſay) hath diſcouraged you: theirs hath drawne you with reverence of her age. It is a free challenge betwixt us, let the elder have us both: if there be any point of our Religion younger than the Patriarchs, and Prophets, Chriſt and his Apoſtles, the Fathers and Doctors of the Primitive Church, let it be accurſed, and condemned for an upſtart: ſhew us evidence of more credit and age, and carrie it. The Church of Rome hath beene ancient, not the errors; neither doe we in ought differ from it, wherein it is not departed from it ſelfe. I did not more feare your wearineſſe than my owne; forgetting the meaſure of a Preface, I would paſſe through every point of difference betwixt us; and let you ſee in all particulars, which is the old; and make you know, that your Popiſh Religion doth put on a borrowed viſour of gravitie upon this Stage, to out-face true antiquitie. Yet leſt you ſhould complaine of words, let me without your tedioufneſſe have leave but to inſtance in the firſt of all Controverſies betwixt us; offering the ſame proofe in all, which you ſhall ſee performed in one, I compare the judgement of the ancient Church with yours, ſee therefore and be aſhamed of your noveltie.

First, our queſtion is, Whether all thoſe bookes which in our Bibles are ſtiled Apocryphall, and are put after the reſt by themſelves, are to be received as the true Scriptures of God? Heare firſt the voice of the old Church: to let paſſe that cleare and pregnant teſtimonie of Melito Sardenſis in his Epiſtle to Oneſimus cited by Euſebius. Let Cyprian or Ruffinus rather ſpeake in the name of all: Of the old Teſtament (ſaith he) firſt were written the five bookes of Moſes, Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomie; after theſe the booke of Ioſhuah the Son of Nun, and that of the Iudges, together of Ruth; after which were the foure bookes of the Kings, which the Hebrewes reckon but two: of the Chronicles which is called the booke of Dayes; and of Ezra, are two bookes, which of them are accounted but ſingle, and the booke of Eſter. Of the Prophets there is Eſay, Hieremie, Ezekiel, and Daniel, and beſides, one booke which containes the twelve ſmaller Prophets. Alſo Iob, and the Pſalmes of David are ſingle books: of Salomon there are three books delivered to the Church, the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, Song of Songs. In theſe they have ſhut up the numbers of the books of the old Teſtament. Of the new, there are foure Goſpels, of Matthew, Marke, Luke, and Iohn; the Acts of the Apoſtles, written by Luke; of Paul the Apoſtle fourteene Epiſtles; of the Apoſtle Peter two Epiſtles, of Iames the Lords brother and Apoſtle, one; of Iude one; of Iohn three; Laſtly, the Revelation of Iohn. Theſe are they which the Fathers have accounted within the Canon, by which they would have the aſſertions of our faith made good. But we muſt know there are other bookes, which are called of the Ancients not Canonicall but Eccleſiaſticall, as the Wiſdome of Salomon, and another booke of Wiſdome, which is called of Ieſus the ſonne of Sirach; which booke of the Latines is termed by a generall name Eccleſiaſticus: of the ſame ranke is the booke of Toby and Iudeth, and the bookes of the Maccabees: Thus farre that Father; ſo Hierome after that he hath reckoned up the ſame number of bookes with us in their order, hath theſe words: This Prologue of mine (ſaith hee) may ſerve as a well defenced entrance to all the bookes which I have turned out of Hebrew into Latine; that wee may know that whatſoever is beſides theſe, is Apocryphal: therefore that booke which is intituled Salomons wiſdome, and the Booke of Ieſus the ſonne of Sirach, and Iudeth, and Tobias, and Paſtor, are not Canonicall: the firſt booke of the Maccabees I have found in Hebrew, the ſecond in Greeke: which booke (ſaith hee) indeed the Church readeth, but receiveth not as Canonicall. The ſame reckoning is made by Origen in Euſebius, word for word. The ſame by Epiphanius, by Cyril, by Athanaſius, Gregorie Nazianzen, Damaſcen: yea by Lyranus, both Hugoes, Cajetan, Carthuſian, and Montanus himſelfe, &c.

All of them with full conſent rejecting theſe ſame Apocryphal bookes with us. Now heare

A heare the preſent Church of Rome in her owne words, thus: The holy Synode of Trent hath thought good to ſet downe with this Decree a juſt Catalogue of bookes of holy Scripture, leſt any man ſhould make doubt which they bee which are received by the Synode: And they are theſe under-written, Of the old Teſtament, five books of Moſes, then Ioſhuah, the Iudges, Ruth, foure books of the Kings, two of the Chronicles, two of Eſdras, the firſt and the ſecond, which is called Nehemias, Tobias, Iudeth, Eſter, Iob, the Pſalter of David, containing one hundred and fifty Pſalmes, The Proverbs of Salomon, Eccleſiaſtes, the Song of Songs, the book of Wiſdome, Eccleſiaſticus, Eſay, Hieremie, &c. two books of the Maccabees, the firſt and the ſecond.

And if any man ſhall not receive theſe whole books with all the parts of them, as they are wont to be read in the Catholike Church, and as they are had in the old vulgar Latine Edition, for holy and Canonicall, let him be accurſed. Thus ſhe: Judge you now of our age; and ſay, whether the opinion of the ancient Church (that is ours) bee B not a direct enemie to Popery, and flatly accurſed by the Romiſh.

Paſſe on yet a little further. Our queſtion is, whether the Hebrew and Greeke Originals bee corrupted; and whether thoſe firſt Copies of Scriptures be not to be followed above all tranſlations. Heare firſt the ancient Church with us: But (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) howſoever it be taken, whether it be beleeved to bee ſo done, or not beleeved, or laſtly whether it were ſo or not ſo; I hold it a right courſe, that when any thing is found different in either books (the Hebrew and Septuagint) ſince for the certaintie of things done, there can bee but one truth; that tongue ſhould rather bee beleeved from whence the tranſlation was made into another language. Upon which words Ludovicus Vives (yet a Papiſt) ſaith thus: The ſame (ſaith he) doth Hierom proclaime every where, and reaſon it ſelfe teacheth it, & there is none of ſound judgement that will gainſay it; but in vaine doth the conſent of all good wits teach this, for the ſtubborne blockiſhneſſe of men oppoſeth againſt it. Let Hierom himſelfe then, a greater Linguiſt be heard ſpeake: And if C there be any man (ſaith he) that will ſay the Hebrew books were afterwards corrupted by the Jewes; let him heare Origen, what he anſwers in the eight volume of his explanations of Eſay to this queſtion; that the Lord and his Apoſtles which reprove other faults in the Scribes and Phariſes, would never have beene ſilent in this, which were the greateſt crime that could be. But if they ſay that the Hebrewes falſified them after the comming of Chriſt and preaching of the Apoſtles, I cannot hold from laughter, that our Saviour and the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles ſhould ſo cite teſtimonies of Scripture, as the Iewes would afterwards deprave them: Thus Ierome. And the Canon law it ſelfe hath this determination, that the truth and credit of the books of the old Teſtament ſhould bee examined by the Hebrew Volumes; of the new, by the Greeke. And Pope Innocentius as he is cited by Gratian, could ſay, Have recourſe to the divine Scriptures in their Originall Greeke. The ſame laſtly by Bellarmines owne confeſſion, the Fathers teach every where: As Ierome in his booke againſt Helvidius, and in his Epiſtle to Marcella, that the Latine Edition of the Goſpell is to be called backe to the Greeke fountaines; and the Latine Edition of the old Teſtament is to be amended by the Hebrew; in his Comment upon Zachary 8. The very ſame hath Auſten in his ſecond booke of Chriſtian doctrine, Chap. 11. 12. 15. and Epiſt. 19. and elſewhere. This was the old Religion & ours; now heare the new. The preſent Church of Rome hath thus: The holy Synod decreeth that the old vulgar Latine Edition in all Lectures, Diſputations, Sermons, Expoſitions, bee held for Authenticall, ſaith the Councell of Trent: And her Champion Bellarmine hath theſe words; That the fountaine of the Originals in many places run muddy and impure wee have formerly ſhewed, & indeed it can ſcarce be doubted, but that as the Latine Church hath beene more conſtant in keeping the faith than the Greeke, ſo it hath beene more vigilant in defending her bookes from corruption. Yea, ſome of the Popiſh Doctors E maintaine, that the Iewes in hatred of the Chriſtian faith, did on purpoſe corrupt many places of Scripture: ſo holds Gregory de Valencia, Iacobus Chriſtopolitanus in his Preface to the Pſalmes, Canus in the ſecond booke of his common places. But in ſtead of all, Bellarmine ſhall ſhut up all with theſe words: The Hereticks of this time, in hatred of the vulgar Edition, give too much to the Hebrew Edition, as Calvin, Chemnitius, Georgius Major: All which would have every thing examined and amended by the Hebrew text, which they commonly call a moſt pure fountaine. See now whether that which Bellarmine confeſſes to have beene the judgement of Hierome, Auſten, and all the ancient Fathers, be not here condemned by him, as the opinion of the Heretiks: Ours was theirs, and theirs is condemned under our names: Judge whether in this alſo Popery be not an upſtart. A

Yet one ſtep more: Our queſtion is whether the Scripture be eaſie or moſt obſcure; and whether in all eſſentiall points it doe not interpret it ſelfe; ſo as what is hard in one place, is openly laid forth in another: Heare the judgment of the old Church and ours: All things are cleare and plaine, and nothing contrary in the Scriptures, ſaith Epiphanius. Thoſe things which ſeeme doubtfully and obſcurely ſpoken in ſome places of Scripture, are expounded by them, which in other places are open and plaine, ſaith Baſil: What could Calvine and Luther ſay more? B

There is no ſo great hardneſſe in the Scriptures to come to thoſe things which are neceſſary to ſalvation, ſaith Auſten: In thoſe things which are openly laid downe in Scripture, are found all thoſe things which containe our faith and rules of our life, ſaith the ſame Father; who yet againe alſo ſaith thus: The Spirit of God hath royally and wholeſomely tempered the holy Scriptures ſo, as both by the plaine places he might prevent our hunger, and by the obſcure he might avoid our nice ſlothfulneſſe; for there is ſcarce any thing that can be fetcht out of thoſe obſcurities, which is not found moſt plainly ſpoken elſe-where.

And becauſe Bellarmine takes exception at this (Fere, Scarce) compare this place with the former; and with that which he hath in his third Epiſtle, thus: The manner of ſpeech in which the Scripture is contrived, is eaſie to bee come to of all; although it bee throughly attained by few: Thoſe things which it containeth plaine and eaſie, it ſpeakes like a familiar friend, without guile, to the heart of the learned and unlearned, &c. C

But it invites all men with an humble manner of ſpeech, whom it doth not only feed with manifeſt truth, but exerciſe with ſecret, having the ſame in readineſſe which it hath in ſecrecie: Thus Auſten. To omit Ireneus and Origen: Chryſoſteme (whom Bellarmine ſaith we allege alone for us) beſides many other plaine places, writeth thus.

Who is there to whom all is not manifeſt, which is written in the Goſpell? who that ſhall heare, Bleſſed are the meeke, Bleſſed are the mercifull, Bleſſed are the pure in heart, and the reſt, would deſire a teacher to learne any of theſe things which are here ſpoken? As alſo the ſignes, miracles, hiſtories, are not they knowne and manifeſt to every man? This pretence and excuſe is but the cloake of our ſlothfulneſſe: thou underſtandeſt not thoſe things which are written; how ſhouldeſt thou underſtand them, which wilt not ſo much as ſlightly looke into them? Take the booke into thy hand, read all the hiſtory, and what thou knoweſt, remember, and what is obſcure, run often over it. So Chryſoſtome: yea, he makes this difference betwixt the Philoſophers and Apoſtles: the Philoſophers ſpeake obſcurely, but the Apoſtles and Prophets (ſaith he) contrarily make all things delivered by them, cleare and manifeſt; and as the common teachers of the world have ſo expounded all things, that every man may of himſelfe by bare reading, learn thoſe things which are ſpoken: yea, laſtly, ſo farre he goes in this point, as that he asketh, Wherefore needs a Preacher? all things are cleare and plaine in the Divine Scriptures; but becauſe ye are delicate hearers and ſeeke delight in hearing, therefore yee ſeeke for Preachers. You have heard the old Religion, now heare the new: Bellarmine hath theſe words: It muſt needs be confeſſed that the Scriptures are moſt obſcure; Here therefore (ſaith he) Luther hath deviſed two evaſions; One, that the ſcripture, though it bee obſcure in one place, yet that it doth clearely propound the ſame thing in another. The ſecond is, that though the ſcripture bee cleare of it ſelfe, yet to the proud and unbeleevers it is hard by D E

reaſon of their blindneſſe and evill affections: ſo the Lutherans (ſaith Eccbius) contend that the Scriptures are cleare and plaine: ſo Dureus againſt Whitakers: ſo the Rhemiſts in their annotations; and generally all Papiſts. Judge now if all theſe forenamed Fathers, and ſo the ancient Church, were not Lutherans in this point; or rather wee theirs; and yeeld that this their old opinion by the new Church of Rome is condemned for hereticall: and in all theſe ſay upon your ſoule, whether is the elder?

Let me draw you on yet a little further: Our queſtion is, whether it be neceſſary or fit that all men (even of the Laitie) ſhould have libertie to heare and read the Scriptures, in a language which they underſtand? Heare firſt the voice of the old Religion; To omit the direct charges of Gregory Niſſen and Ambroſe; thus hath Ierome upon the Pſalmes, The Lord will declare; and how will he declare? Not by word, but by writing; In whoſe writing? In the writing of his people, &c. Our Lord and Saviour therefore tells us, and ſpeaketh in the Scriptures of his Princes: Our Lord will declare it to us in the Scriptures of his People, in the holy Scriptures: which Scripture is read to all the people; that is, ſo read as that all may underſtand; not that a few may underſtand, but all.

What faithfull man, ſaith Auguſtine (though he be but a Novice, before he be baptized and have received the Holy Ghoſt) doth not with an equall minde read and heare all things, which after the Aſcenſion of our Lord are written in Canonicall truth, and authority, although as yet he underſtands them not as he ought?

But of all other, Saint Chryſoſtome is every where moſt vehement and direct in this point: Amongſt infinite places, heare what he ſaith in one of his Homilies of Lazarus.

I doe alwayes exhort, and will never ceaſe to exhort you (ſaith he) that you will not here only attend to thoſe things which are ſpoken, but when you are at home, you continually buſie your ſelves in reading of the holy Scriptures; which practice alſo I have not ceaſed to drive into them which come privately to me: for let no man ſay, Tuſh, they are but idle words, and many of them ſuch as ſhould bee contemned: Alas I am taken up with law cauſes, I am imployed in publike affaires, I follow my trade, I maintaine a wife & children, and have a great charge to looke to: It is not for me to read the Scriptures, but for them which have caſt off the world: which have taken up the ſolitarie tops of Mountaines for their dwellings, which live this contemplative kinde of life continually.

What ſaieſt thou, O man? Is it not for thee to turne over the Scriptures, becauſe thou art diſtracted with infinite cares? Nay, then it is for thee more than for them; for they doe not ſo much need the helpe of the Scriptures, as you that are toſt in the midſt of the waves of worldly buſineſſe.

And ſoone after: Neither can it bee poſſible that any man ſhould without great fruit be perpetually converſant in this ſpirituall exerciſe of reading: and ſtraight; Let us not neglect to buy our ſelves Books, leſt wee receive a wound in our vitall parts: and after he hath compared the Books of Scripture to Gold, he addeth, But what, ſay they, if we underſtand not thoſe things which are contained in thoſe Books? What gaine we then? Yes ſurely, though thou doſt not underſtand thoſe things which are there laid up, yet by the very reading much holineſſe is got: Although it cannot be, that thou ſhouldeſt bee alike ignorant of all thou readeſt; for therefore hath the Spirit of God ſo diſpenſed this Word, that Publicanes, Fiſhers, Tent-makers, Shepheards and Goatheards, plaine unlettred men may be ſaved by theſe Bookes; leſt any of the ſimpler ſort ſhould pretend this excuſe. That all things which are ſaid ſhould be eaſie to diſcerne; and that the workman, the ſervant, the poore widow, and the moſt unlearned of all other, by hearing of the word read, might get ſome gaine and profit.

And the ſame Father elſewhere, I beſeech you (ſaith hee) that you come ſpeedily hither, and hearken diligently to the reading of the Holy Scriptures; and not only when you come hither, but alſo at home take the Bible into your hands, and by your diligent care reape the profit contained in it. Laſtly, in his Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, he cries out, Heare, I beſeech you, O all you ſecular men, provide you Bibles which are the medicines for the ſoule; At leaſt get the New Teſtament. Now on the contrary, let the new religion of Rome ſpeake; firſt by her Rhemiſh Jeſuits, thus: Wee may not think that the tranſlated Bibles into vulgar tongues were in the hands of every husbandman, artificer, prentice, boyes, girles, Miſtreſſe, Maid, Man; that they were ſung, played, alleaged of every Tinker, Taverner, Rimer, Minſtrell. The like words of ſcorne and diſgrace are uſed by Hoſius, and by Eckius, and by Bellar. de verb. l. 2. c. 15.

The wiſe will not here regard (ſay our Rhemiſts) what ſome wilfull people doe mutter, that the Scriptures are made for all men, &c. And ſoone after, they compare the Scriptures to Fire, Water, Candles, Knives, Swords, which are indeed needfull, &c. but would marre all, if they were at the guiding of other than wiſe men. All the Heretikes of this time, ſaith Bellarmine, agree that the Scriptures ſhould be permitted to al, and delivered in their owne Mother tongue; but the Catholike Church forbids the reading of the Scriptures by all, without choice: or the publike reading or ſinging of them in vulgar tongues, as it is decreed in the Councell of Trent, Seſſ. 22. c. 8. & Can. 9. If you thinke (ſaith Duræus) that Chriſt bade all Chriſtians to ſearch the Scriptures, you are in a groſſe error; For how ſhall rude and ignorant men ſearch the Scriptures? &c. And ſo he concludes, that the Scriptures were not given to the common multitude of Beleevers.

Judge now what either we ſay, or theſe Papiſts condemne, beſides the ancient judgement of the Fathers: and if ever either Calvin or Luther have beene more peremptory in this matter, than S. Chryſoſt. I vow to be a Papiſt. If ours be not in this the old religion, be not you ours.

Yet this one paſſage further, and then no more, leſt I weary you: Our queſtion is; whether the Scriptures depend upon the authority of the Church; or rather upon the authoritie of Scriptures?

Heare firſt the ancient Church, with and for us: The queſtion is (ſaith S. Auſten) betwixt us and the Donatiſts, where the Church is. What ſhall we do then? ſhall we ſeeke her in her owne words, or in the words of her Head the Lord Jeſus Chriſt? I ſuppoſe we ought to ſeeke her rather in his words, which is the Truth, and knowes beſt his own body, for the Lord knowes who are his; wee will not have the Church ſought in our words. And in the ſame Booke, Whether the Donatiſts hold the Church (ſaith the ſame Father) let them not ſhew, but by the Canonicall Bookes of Divine Scriptures; for neither do we therefore ſay they ſhould beleeve us, that we are in the Church of Chriſt, becauſe Optatus or Ambroſe hath commended this Church unto us which wee now hold, or becauſe it is acknowledged by the Councels of our fellow Teachers, or becauſe ſo great miracles are done in it: it is not therefore manifeſted to be true and Catholike; But the Lord Jeſus himſelfe judged, that his Diſciples ſhould rather bee confirmed by the teſtimonies of the Law and the Prophets: Theſe are the rules of our cauſe, theſe are the foundations, theſe are the confirmations.

And upon the Pſalmes; Leſt thou ſhouldeſt erre (ſaith the ſame Auguſtine) in thy judgement of the Church: leſt any man ſhould ſay to thee, This is Chriſt, which is not Chriſt, or this is the Church, which is not the Church; for many, &c. Heare the voyce of the Shepheard himſelfe which is cloathed in fleſh, &c. He ſhewes himſelfe to thee; handle him, and ſee. Hee ſhewes his Church, leſt any man ſhould deceive thee under the name of the Church, &c. yet Chryſoſtome more directly thus: Hee that would know which is the true Church of Chriſt, whence may he know it in the ſimilitude of ſo great confuſion, but onely by the Scriptures? Now the working of miracles is altogether ceaſed; yea, they are rather found to be fainedly wrought of them, which are but falſe Chriſtians; Whence then ſhall he know it, but onely by the Scriptures? The Lord Jeſus therefore knowing what great confuſion of things would be in the laſt daies, therefore commands that thoſe which are Chriſtians, and would receive confirmation of their true faith, ſhould flye to nothing but to the Scriptures; Otherwiſe if they fly to any other helpe, they ſhall be offended and periſh; not underſtanding which is the true Church: This is the old faith; Now heare the new, contradicting it and us. The Scripture (ſaith Eckius a Popiſh Doctor) is not authenticall without the authority of the Church; for the Canonicall Writers are members of the Church; Whereupon let it bee objected to an Heretike, that will ſtrive againſt the decrees of the Church, by what

A what weapons he will fight againſt the Church, hee will ſay by the Canonicall Scriptures of the foure Goſpels, and Pauls Epiſtles. Let it be ſtraight objected to him, how he knowes theſe to be Canonicall, but by the Church. And a while after, the Scripture (ſaith hee) defined in a Councell, it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt and to us, that you abſtaine from things offered to Idols, and bloud, and ſtrangled: the Church by her authority altered a thing ſo clearely defined and expreſſed: for it uſeth both ſtrangled and bloud; Behold, the power of the Church is above the Scripture: thus Eckius. And beſides Cuſanus, Bellarmine ſaith thus: If wee take away the authority of the preſent Church, and of the preſent Councell (of Trent) all the Decrees of all other Councels and the whole Chriſtian faith may bee called into doubt. And in the ſame place a little after; The ſtrength of all ancient Councels, and the certaintie of all opinions, depends on the authority of the preſent Church. You have heard both ſpeake: ſay now,
B whith whom is true antiquity; and on Gods name deteſt the newer of both. It were as eaſie to bring the ſame, if not greater evidence for the perfection, and all-ſufficiencie of Scripture; and ſo to deliver all the body of our religion, by the tongues and pens of the Fathers, that either you muſt be forced to hold them Noveliſts with us, or your ſelves ſuch againſt them. How honeſt and ingenuous is that confeſſion of your Eraſmus? who in his Epiſtle to the Biſhop and Cardinall of Mentz, could ſay, It is plainly found, that many things in Luthers Books are condemned for Hereticall, which in the Books of Bernard and Auſten, are read for Holy and Orthodox.

This is too much for a taſte: If your appetite ſtand to it, I dare promiſe you full diſhes: Let mee therefore appeale to you, if light and darkneſſe bee more contrary than theſe points of your Religion, to true Antiquitie: No, no; Let your Authors gloſe as they liſt; Popery is but a young faction, corruptly rayſed out of ancient grounds. And if it have
C (as we grant) ſome ancient errours, falſhood cannot bee bettered with Age; there is no preſcription againſt God and Truth: What we can prove to be erroneous, we need not prove new: ſome hundreths of yeeres is an idle Plea againſt the Ancient of dayes.

What can you plead yet more for your change? Their numbers perhaps, and our handfuls? You heard all the World was theirs, ſcarce any corner ours: How could you but ſuſpect a few? Theſe are but idle brags; we dare and can ſhare equally with them in Chriſtendome: And if we could not; this rule will teach you to advance Turciſme above Chriſtianity, and Paganiſme above that: the world above the Church, Hell above Heaven: If any proofe can be drawne from numbers, He that knows all, ſayes the beſt are feweſt.

What then could ſtirre you? Our diviſions and their unity. If this my following labour doe not make it good to all the World, that their peace is leſſe than ours, their diſſenſion more, by the confeſſion of their owne mouthes, be you theirs ſtill, and let mee
D follow you. I ſtand not upon the ſcoldings of Prieſts and Ieſuits, nor the late Venetian jarres, nor the pragmaticall differences now on foot, in the view of all Chriſtendome, betwixt their owne Cardinalls in their Sacred conclave, and all their Clergie, concerning the Popes temporall power: Neither doe I call any friend to bee our Advocate, none but Bellarmine and Navarrus ſhall bee my Orators; and if theſe plead not this cauſe enough, let it fall: See here dangerous rifts & flawes, not in the outward barke only, but in the very heart and pith of your Religion; and if ſo many be confeſſed by one or two, what might be gathered out of all? and if ſo many be acknowledged; thinke how many there are that lurke in ſecret, and will not be confeſſed? How loth would we be (after all exclamations) that your buſie Ieſuites could take out ſo many confeſſed quarrels out of all our Authors, as I have here found in two of yours? We want only their cunning ſecrecy in the carriage of our quarrels: Our few (and ſlight) differences are blazoned
E abroad with infamy and offence, their hundreds are craftily ſmothered in ſilence.

Let your owne eyes ſatisfie you in this, not my pen: ſee now what you would never beleeve.

What is it then that could thus bewitch you to forſake the comely & heavenly Truth of God, and to dote upon this beaſtly Strumpet? to change your Religion, for a ridiculous, ſenſuall, cruell, irreligious faction? A Religion (if wee muſt call it ſo) that made ſport to our plaine forefathers, with the remembrance of her graveſt devotions: How oft have you ſeene them laugh at themſelves, whiles they have told of their creeping-crouch, kiſſing the Pax, offering their Candels, ſigning with Aſhes, partiall Shrifts, merry Pilgrimages, ridiculous Miracles, and a thouſand ſuch May-games, which now you begin (after this long hiſſing at) to looke upon ſoberly, and with admiration!

A Religion, whoſe fooleries very Boyes may ſhout and laugh at, if for no more but this, that it teaches men to put confidence in Beads, Medals, Roſes, hallowed Swords, Spels of the Goſpell, Agnus Dei, and ſuch like idle bables, aſcribing unto them Divine vertue: yea, ſo much as is due to the Sonne of God himſelfe, and his precious bloud. I ſpeake not of ſome rude ignorants; your very Booke of holy-ceremonies ſhall teach you what your holy-fathers doe, and have done. That tels you firſt with great allowance and applauſe, that Pope Vrban the fift ſent three Agnus Dei, to the Greeke Emperor, with theſe verſes:

Balſam, pure wax, and Chriſmes-liquor cleere,
Make up this precious Lambe, I ſend thee heere;
All lightning it diſpels, and each ill ſpright,
Remedies ſinne, and makes the heart contrite,
Even as the bloud that Chriſt for us did ſhed.
It helps the child-beds paine; and gives good ſpeed
Vnto the birth; Great gifts it ſtill doth win
To all that weare it, and that worthy bin:
It quels the rage of fire; and cleanly bore
It brings from ſhipwracke ſafely to the ſhore.

And leſt you ſhoud plead this to be the conceit of ſome one Phantaſticall Pope, heare (and be aſhamed) out of the ſame Book, what by preſcription, every Pope uſeth to pray in the bleſſing of the water, which ſerves for that Agnus Dei: If you know not, thus hee prayeth: That it would pleaſe thee, O God, to bleſſe thoſe things which wee purpoſe to power into this Veſſell of water prepared to the glory of thy Name, ſo as by the worſhip and honour of them, wee thy ſervants may have our heynous offences done away, the blemiſhes of our ſinnes wip't off, and thereby we may obtaine pardon, and receive grace from thee; ſo that at the laſt with thy Saints & Elect Children we may merit to obtaine everlaſting life, Amen. How could you chooſe, but be in love with this Superſtition, Magicke, Blaſphemie practiſed, and maintained by the heads of your Church?

A Religion, that allowes jugling Equivocations, and reſerved ſenſes even in very oathes. Beſides all that hath beene ſhameleſly written by our Jeſuites to this purpoſe; Heare what Franciſcus Victoria, an ingenuous Papiſt, and a learned Reader of Divinitie in Salmantica, writes in the name of all.

But what ſhall a Confeſſor doe (ſaith he) if he be askt of a ſinne that he hath heard in Confeſſion? May hee ſay that he knowes not of it? I anſwer, according to all our Doctors, that hee may. But what if hee bee compelled to ſweare? I ſay, that hee may and ought to ſweare that hee knowes it not; for that it is underſtood that he knowes it not beſides confeſſion, and ſo hee ſweares true. But ſay, that the Judge or Prelate ſhall maliciouſly require of him upon his oath, whether he know it in confeſſion or no; I anſwer that a man thus urged may ſweare that hee knowes it not in confeſſion; for that it is underſtood, he knows it not to reveale it, or ſo as he may tell: Who teach and doe thus in anothers caſe, judge what they would doe in their owne. O wiſe, cunning, and holy perjuries, unknowne to our fore-fathers!

A Religion, that allowes the buying and ſelling of ſins, of Pardons, of ſoules: ſo as now Purgatory can have no rich men in it, but fooles and friendleſſe: Devils are Tormentors there (as themſelves hold from many Revelations of Bede, Bernard, Carthuſian) yet Men can command Devils, and mony can command men.

A Religion, that relies wholly upon the infallibilitie of thoſe, whom yet they grant have beene, and may bee monſtrous in their lives and diſpoſitions. How many of thoſe heires of Peter (by confeſſion of their owne Records) by Bribes, by Whores, by Devils, have climed up into that chaire! Yet, to ſay that thoſe men which are confeſſed to have given their ſoules to the Devill, that they might be Popes, can erre, while they are Popes, is Hereſie worthy of a ſtake, and of Hell.

A Religion, that hood-winkes the poore Laitie in forced ignorance, leſt they ſhould know Gods will, or any way to Heaven but theirs; ſo as millions of ſoules live no leſſe without Scripture, than as if there were none: that forbids ſpirituall food as poyſon; and fetches Gods Book into the Inquiſition.

A Religion, that teaches men to worſhip ſtocks and ſtones, with the ſame honour that is due to their Creator; which practice leſt it ſhould appeare to her ſimple Clyents, how palpably oppoſite it is to the ſecond Commandement; they have diſcreetly left out thoſe words of Gods Law, as a needleſſe illuſtration, in their Catechiſmes and Prayer Books of the vulgar.

A Religion, that utterly overthrowes the true humanitie of Chriſt, while they give unto it ten thouſand places at once, and yet no place: fleſh and no fleſh, ſeverall members without diſtinction: a ſubſtance without quantity, and other accidents; or ſubſtance and accidents that cannot be ſeene, felt, perceived. So they make either a monſter of their Saviour, or nothing.

A Religion, that utterly overthrowes the perfection of Chriſts ſatisfaction: If all be not paid, how hath he ſatisfied? If temporall puniſhments in Purgatory be yet due, how is all paid? and if theſe muſt be paid by us, how are they ſatisfied by him?

A Religion, that makes more Scriptures than ever God and his ancient Church; and thoſe which it doth make, ſo imperiouſly obtrudes upon the world, as if God himſelfe ſhould ſpeake from heaven: and while it thunders out curſes againſt all that will not adde theſe Books to Gods, regards not Gods Curſe, If any man ſhall adde unto theſe things, God ſhall adde unto him the plagues that are written in this Book.

A Religion, whoſe Patrons diſgrace the true Scriptures of God with reproachfull termes, odious compariſons, imputations of corruption and imperfection; and in fine pin their whole authority upon the ſleeves of men.

A Religion, that erects a throne in the Conſcience to a meere man, and gives him abſolute power to make a ſinne, to diſpenſe with it, to create new Articles of Faith, and to impoſe them upon neceſſitie of Salvation.

A Religion, that baffoules all Temporall Princes, making them ſtand bare-foot at their great Biſhops gate, lye at his foot, hold his ſtirrup, yea, their owne Crownes at his Courteſie, exempting all their Eccleſiaſticall Subjects from their juriſdiction, and (when they liſt) all the reſt from their Allegiance.

A Religion, that hath made wicked men Saints, and Saints Gods. Even by the confeſſion of Papiſts, lewd and undeſerving men have leapt into their Calendar. Whence it is, that the Pope before his Canonizati on of any Saint, makes ſolemne proteſtation, that he intends not in that buſineſſe to doe ought prejudiciall to the glory of God or to the Catholike Faith and Church: And once Sainted, they have the honour of Altars, Temples, Invocations; and ſome of them in a ſtile fit only for their Maker. I know not whether that bleſſed Virgin receive more indignitie from her enemies that denie her, or theſe her flatterers that deifie her.

A Religion, that robs the Chriſtian heart of all ſound comfort, whiles it teacheth us, that wee neither can nor ought to be aſſured of the remiſſion of our ſinnes, and of preſent grace, and future ſalvation; That wee can never know whether we have received the true Sacraments of God, becauſe wee cannot know the intention of the miniſter, without which they are no Sacraments.

A Religion, that rackes the conſcience with the needleſſe torture of a neceſſary ſhrift; wherein the vertue of abſolution depends on the fulneſſe of confeſſion: and that, upon examination, and the ſufficiencie of examination is ſo full of ſcruples (beſides thoſe infinite caſes of unreſolved doubts in this fained penance) that the poore ſoule never knowes when it is cleare.

A Religion, that profeſſes to be a Bawd of ſinne; whiles both (in practice) it tolerates open ſtewes, and prefers fornication in ſome caſes to honourable Matrimonie, and gently blanches over the breaches of Gods Law, with the name of Venialls and favourable titles of Diminution; daring to affirme that Veniall ſinnes are no hinderance to a mans cleanneſſe and perfection.

A Cruell Religion, that ſends poore infants remedileſly unto the eternall paines of Hell, Papa facit proteſtationem ante Canonizationem, ſe nihil intendere facere, quod ſit contra fidem aut Eccleſiam Catholicam. Aliqui tamen clariſſimi viri dicunt, &c. Quia Papa quodammodo cogebatur ad Canonizandum quendam contra ſuã voluntatem, lib. Sacr. Ceremon.

Hell, for want of that which they could not live to deſire: and frights ſimple ſoules with expectation of fained torments in Purgatory; not inferiour (for the time) to the flames of the damned. How wretchedly and fearefully muſt their poore Layicks needs die: for firſt, they are not ſure they ſhall not goe to Hell; and ſecondly, they are ſure to be ſcorched, if they ſhall goe to Heaven. A

A Religion, that makes nature vainly proud in being joyned by her, as copartner with God, in our Juſtification, in our Salvation; and idlely puffed up in a conceit of her perfection, and abilitie to keepe more Lawes than God hath made.

A Religion, that requires no other faith to juſtification in Chriſtians, than may bee found in the Devils themſelves: who beſides a confuſed apprehenſion, can aſſent unto the Truth of Gods revealed will: Poperie requires no more.

A Religion, that in ſtead of the pure milke of the Goſpell hath long fed her ſtarved ſoules with ſuch idle Legends, as the Reporter can hardly deliver without laughter, and their Abettors not heare without ſhame and diſclamation: the wiſer ſort of the World read thoſe Stories on winter Evenings for ſport, which the poore credulous multitude heares in their Churches, with a devout aſtoniſhment. B

A Religion which (leſt ought ſhould bee here wanting to the Doctrine of Devils) makes Religious Prohibitions of meat, and difference of dyet; ſuperſtitiouſly preferring Gods workmanſhip to it ſelfe, and willingly polluting what hee hath ſanctified.

A Religion, that requires nothing but meere formalitie in our devotions; the worke wrought ſuffices alone in Sacraments, in Prayers: So the number be found in the Chappelet, there is no care of the affection; as if God regarded not the heart, but the tongue and hands, and while he underſtands us, cared little whether we underſtand our ſelves.

A Religion, that preſumptuouſly dares to alter and mangle Chriſts laſt Inſtitution; and ſacrilegiouſly rob Gods people of one halfe of that heavenly proviſion, which our Saviour left for his laſt and deareſt Legacie to his Church for ever; as if Chriſts Ordinance were ſuperfluous, or any Shaveling could be wiſer than his Redeemer. C

A Religion, that depends wholly upon nice and poore uncertainties, and unproveable ſuppoſals: that Peter was Biſhop of Rome; that hee left any heires of his graces and ſpirit; or if any, but one in a perpetuall and unfaileable ſucceſſion at Rome; That hee ſo bequeathed his infallibilitie to his chaire, as that whoſoever ſits in it, cannot but ſpeake true: that all which ſit where hee ſate, muſt by ſome ſecret inſtinct ſay as hee taught; That what Chriſt ſaid to him abſolutely, ere ever Rome was thought of, muſt be referred, yea tyed to that place alone, and fulfilled in it: That Linus, or Clemens, or Cletus, the Schollers and ſuppoſed Succeſſors of Peter, muſt bee preferred (in the Headſhip of the Church) to John the beloved Apoſtle then living: That hee whoſe life, whoſe pen, whoſe judgement, whoſe keyes may erre; yet in his Pontificall chaire cannot erre: That the Golden Line of this Apoſtolicall Succeſſion, in the confuſion of ſo many, long, deſperate Schiſmes, ſhamefully corrupt Uſurpations, and Intruſions, yeelded Hereſies, neither was, nor can be broken. Denie any of theſe, and Poperie is no Religion. Oh the lamentable hazard of ſo many Millions of poore ſoules that ſtand upon theſe ſlipperie termes, whereof if any bee probable, ſome are impoſſible! Oh miſerable grounds of Popiſh faith, whereof the beſt can have but this praiſe, that perhaps it may be true! D

A Religion, that hath bin oft dyed in the bloud of Princes: that in ſome caſes, teaches and allowes Rebellion againſt Gods Anointed; and both ſuborneth Treaſons, and excuſes, pities, honors, rewards the actors.

A Religion, that over-loads mens conſciences with heavy burdens of infinite unneceſſary Traditions; far more than ever Moſes commented upon by all the Jewiſh Maſters; impoſing them with no leſſe authoritie, and exacting them with more rigor, than any of the royall lawes of their Maker. E

A Religion that coozens the vulgar with nothing but ſhadowes of Holineſſe, in Pilgrimages, Proceſſions, offerings, Holy-water, Latine Services, Images, Tapers, rich Veſtures, gariſh Altars, Croſſes, Cenſings, and a thouſand ſuch like (fit for Children and Fooles) robbing them in the meane time of the ſound and plaine helps of true pietie and ſalvation.

A Religion, that cares not by what wilfull falſhoods it maintaines a part: as Wickliffes blaſphemie, Luthers advice from the Devill, Tindals communitie, Calvins fained Miracle, and blaſphemous death, Bucers necke broken, Bezaes revolt, the blaſting of Huguenots, Englands want of Churches and Chriſtendome; Queene Elizabeths unwomanlineſſe, her Epiſcopall Juriſdiction, her ſecret fruitfulneſſe; Engliſh Catholikes caſt in Beares skins to Doggs, Pleſſes ſhamefull overthrow, Garnets Straw, the Lutherans obſcene night-revels, Scories drunken ordination in a Taverne; the Edict of our Gratious King Iames (Anno 87.) for the eſtabliſhment of Poperie, our caſting the Cruſts of our Sacrament to Doggs, and ten thouſand of this nature, maliciouſly raiſed and defended againſt knowledge and conſcience, for the diſgrace of thoſe whom they would have hated, ere knowne.

A Religion, that in the conſcience of her owne untruth, goes about to falſifie and deprave all Authors that might give evidence againſt her, to out-face all ancient truths, to foiſt in Gibeonitiſh witneſſes of their owne forging: and leaves nothing unattempted againſt Heaven or Earth, that might advantage her faction, and diſable her innocent Adverſarie: Loe, this is your choice. If the zeale of your loſſe have made mee ſharpe, yet not malicious, not falſe; God is my Record, I have not (to knowledge) charged you with the leaſt untruth: and if I have wronged, accuſe me: and if I cleare not my ſelfe, and my challenge, let me be branded for a Slanderer. In the meane time, what ſpirituall phrenſie hath overtaken you, that you can finde no beautie, but in this Monſter of Errors? It is to you, and your fellowes, that God ſpeakes by his Prophet: O yee Heavens bee aſtonied at this, bee afraid and utterly confounded, ſaith the Lord; for my people hath committed two evils, they have forſaken me, the Fountaine of living Waters, to digge them pits, even broken pits, that can hold no water: what ſhall be the iſſue? Et tu Domine, deduces eos in puteum interitus: Thou, O God, ſhalt bring them downe into the pit of deſtruction. If you will thus wilfully leave God, there I muſt leave you: But (if you had not rather dye) returne, and ſave one; returne to God, returne to his Truth, returne to his Church: your bloud be upon my head, if you periſh.

THe Reader may pleaſe to take notice, that in the former Edition there was added unto this Diſcourſe, a iuſt Volume of above three hundred Contradictions and diſſentions of the Romiſh Doctors, under the name of The Peace of Rome; which becauſe it was but a collection out of Bellarmine and Navar, and no otherwiſe mine, but as a Gatherer and tranſlator, I have here thought good to omit.

NO PEACE WITH ROME.

VVHEREIN IS PROVED, THAT (AS TERMES NOW Stand) there can bee no Reconciliation of the REFORMED RELIGION, with the ROMISH: And that the Romanists are in all the fault.

TO THE TRVE, SOVND, AND HOLY CHVRCH OF GOD, whereſoever warfaring upon Earth.

I Preſent unto thee (deare, and holy Mother) this poore unworthy token of my love and loyaltie; the not ſo pleaſing, as true report of thy future broiles. How much gladder ſhould I have beene (if thy Spouſe had ſo thought good) to have beene the meſſenger of thy Peace and ſecuritie! But ſince he great, and wiſe Moderator of al things, hath thought a Palme fitter for thee, than an Olive; it is for thee to thinke of victory, not of reſt: Thou ſhalt once triumph in heaven, and reſt for all; but in the meane time, here is nothing to be lookt for, but ambuſhes, skirmiſhes, tumults: And how cheerefully muſt thou needs both beare and overcome all oppoſitions, that are not more ſure of the neceſsitie of thy warfare, than of the happineſſe of thy ſucceſſe whileſt thou ſeeſt tht glorious Husband, not only the leader of this field, but a moſt juſt, and mercifull Crowner of thy Conqueſt. Certainly, it is as unpoſsible for thee to miſcarry, as to ſit ſtill, and not fight: Behold, all the forces of heaven and earth conſpire, and rejoyce to come voluntaries unto this holy warre of thine, and promiſe thee a moſt happie iſſue: addreſſe thy ſelfe therefore (as thou art wont) couragiouſly to this worke of God: But remember, firſt, to inquire (as thou doſt) of Abel: Spare no teares to thy deſperate Siſter, (now thine enemie) and calling heaven and earth to witneſſe, upon thy knees beſeech and intreat her, by her owne ſoule, and by the deare bowels of Chriſt, by thoſe precious drops of his bloudy ſweat, by that common price of our eternall redemption, that ſhe would at the laſt returne to her ſelfe, and that good diſpoſition, which ſhee hath now too long abandoned that ſhee would forbeare, any more, (as I feare ſhee hath hitherto wilfully done) to fight againſt God: but if ſhee ſhall ſtill perſiſt to ſtop her eares againſt thee, and to harden herſelfe in rebellion againſt her God; forget (if thou canſt) who ſhee once was; and flie mercileſly upon this daughter of Belial, that vaunts her ſelfe proudly in the glory of her munition; Goe, ſmite, deſtroy, conquer, and reigne, as the worthy partner of thine husbands Throne: For mee, I ſhall in the meane time bee as one of thy rude Trumpets, whoſe noiſe ſhall both awaken thy courage unto this ſpirituall battell, and whoſe joyfull gratulations ſhall after thy rich ſpoiles, applaud thine happie returne in the day of thy victory.

THE OPINION OF George Cassander, A LEARNED PAPIST, AND GRAVE DIVINE;

That by two severall Emperors, FERDINAND, and MAXIMILIAN, was set on worke to compose these quarrels of the CHURCH.

In his consultation, pag. 56. & 57.

YEt I cannot denie, but that in the beginning, many out of a godly zeale and care, were driven to a sharpe and seuere reproofe of certaine manifest abuses; and that the principall cause of this calamity, & distraction of the Church, is to be laid upon those, which being puffed up with a vaine insolent conceit of their Ecclesiasticall power, proudly and scornfully contemned and rejected them, which did rightly and modestly admonish their reformation: wherefore my opinion is, that the Church can neuer hope for any firme Peace, unlesse they make the beginning, which haue giuen the cause of the distraction: that is, unlesse those which are in place of Ecclesiasticall Gouernment, will bee content to remit something of their too much rigor, and yeeld somewhat to the Peace of the Church; and hearkening unto the earnest Prayers and Admonitions of many godly men, will set themselves to correct manifest abuses according to the rule of Divine Scriptures, and of the ancient Church from which they have swerued.

NO PEACE WITH ROME.

Sect. I.

The state of the now Roman Church.

HERE is no one question doth so racke the minds of men at this day, as this of the Church: The infancie of the Church was sore and long vexed with heresies of an higher nature concerning GOD, concerning Christ, which still strooke at the head; but her vigorous and hoary age is exercised with a slighter quarell, concerning our selves; which yet raiseth up the greater broiles every where, by how much every man naturally loves himselfe, more than God. Not to meddle with any forren questions of this nature: Too many seeme unto mee to mis-conceive the state of our Church, and the Romish, as if they had beene alwayes two; as if from their first foundations they had beene sensibly severed in time, and place, like to Babylon and Hierusalem, or those two famous Cities, opposed in S. Austins learned discourse. Hence are those idle demands of some smattering Questionists; Where our Church hath thus long hid it selfe? What yeere and day it came to light? In which age that other Church lost it selfe? Why we have withdrawne our selves no further from them? What is become of our forefathers? Which was the religion of the former world? From hence have those sharpe and rigorous censures passed on both sides; whether of noveltie, or of the desperate condition of those soules which have departed out of our owne way. Alas! what monsters both of opinions and questions have risen hence; and have vexed not their owne Authors only (for the Delphik Oracle said well, It is fit a man should have, as he doth:) but together with them, the whole Church of God? How many silly soules have splitted upon this rocke, which had never needed any votive monument of their wracke, if they had but learned to hold no other difference betwixt us and Rome, than must needs bee granted betwixt a Church miserably corrupted, and happily purged; betwixt a sickly, languished, and dying Church, and one that is healthfull, strong, and flourishing. Neither therefore did that Valdus of France, nor Wickliffe of England, nor Hierom of Prague, nor Luther of Germany, ever goe about to frame a new Church to themselves, which was not; but only endevoured (not without happy successe) to cleanse, scoure, restore, reforme that Church which was, from that filthy soile, both of disorder, and errours, wherewith it was shamefully blemished. All these rather desired to bee accounted Physitians to heale, than parents to beget a Church: And the same have we carefully done, ever since, and doe seriously, and ingenuously professe of our selves this day; Rome is alike to us (as it was of old to Hierome) with Eugubium, Rhegium, Alexandria; save that this Citie is both more famous, and more neere us: Places do not vary either faith or title.

Hierom. Epist. ad Evagr.

tle: What Church ſoever God ſhall call daughter, we will call ſiſter; & ſo we ſafely may. How many honeſt, & chaſte matrons have we known, that have bin aſhamed of a lewd ſiſter, and have abhorred filthineſſe in one of their owne bloud? So it fareth now with us: Rome is overgone with Hereſie, with Idolatry; Let her practiſe her whoredome at home by her ſelfe; It was not for us with the ſafegard of our honeſty, to dwell with ſuch a partner. Not onely her wickedneſſe, hath thruſt us out, but her violence: Wee yeeld therefore, and ſorrowfully complaine with the Prophet, How is the faithfull Citie become an Harlot! It was full of Judgement; and Juſtice lodged therein; but now it is full of murderers: Thy ſilver is become droſſe, and thy wine is brewed with water. Away with the imperious name of a mother: Wee are all the ſame Church (by the vertue of our outward vocation) whoſoever all the world over worſhip Jeſus Chriſt, the onely Sonne of God, and Saviour of the world, and profeſſe the ſame common Creed: ſome of us doe this more purely, others more corruptly; In the meane time wee are all Chriſtians, but ſound Chriſtians wee are not: But how harſhly doth this ſound to a weake Reader, and more than ſeemes to need reconciliation with it ſelfe; that the Church ſhould bee one, and yet cannot bee reconciled? certainly yet ſo it is: The dignitie of the outward forme (which comprehends this unity in it ſelfe) availes nothing to grace, nothing to ſalvation, nothing to the ſoundneſſe of doctrine: The net doth not ſtraight make all to be fiſh, that it hath dragged together; yee ſhall finde in it vile weeds, and whatſoever elſe that devouring Element hath diſgorged.

Iren. l. 1. c. 2. 3.

The Church is at once one in reſpect of the common principles of faith; and yet in reſpect of conſequences, and that rabble of Opinions which they have raked together, ſo oppoſed, that it cannot by any glew of concord (as Cyprian ſpeaketh) nor bond of unity, be conjoyned: That which Rome holds with us, makes it a Church; That which it obtrudes upon us, makes it hereticall; The truth of principles makes it one, the errour and impiety of additions makes it irreconciliable. Neither doth this late and ſpurious brood of traditions more oppoſe us, than it doth thoſe very Principles of Religion which the Authors themſelves deſire to eſtabliſh: Looke on the face therefore of the Roman Church, ſhee is ours, and Gods; Looke on her backe, ſhee is quite contrary, Antichriſtian: More plainly; for it is no diſputing in Metaphors, as Clemens ſaid well: Rome doth both hold the foundation, and deſtroy it; ſhe holds it directly, deſtroyes it by conſequent: In that ſhe holds it, ſhee is a true Church, howſoever imputed; In that ſhee deſtroyes it (what-ever ſemblance ſhee makes of pietie, and holineſſe) ſhee is a Church of malignants: If ſhe did altogether hold it, ſhee ſhould be ſound and Orthodox; If altogether ſhe deſtroyed it, ſhe ſhould bo either no Church, or devilliſh, but now that ſhe profeſſes to hold thoſe things directly, which by inference of her conſequences, ſhee cloſely overthrowes, ſhee is a truly viſible Church, but an unſound. In what ſhe holds the principles, we embrace her; in what ſhee deſtroyes them, we pitie her errour, and hate her obſtinacie.

Pſal. 26. 5. ἐκκλησίαν πονηρευομένων.

The common bond of Chriſtianitie never ties us to favour groſſe errors, ſo much as with ſilence; there is no ſuch ſlavery in the deare name of a ſiſter, that it ſhould binde us to give either aid, or countenance to lewdneſſe: Have no ſuch fellowſhip (ſaith Saint Paul) but rather reprove: So we have done, both modeſtly, and earneſtly; The ſame is befalne us, which befell the bleſſed Apoſtle; wee are become their enemies, for telling the truth.

Gal. 4 16.

Behold now we are thruſt out of doore, ſpet upon, railed at, and when opportunity ſerves, perſecuted with moſt curious torments; And (leſt any miſchiefe ſhould be wanting) obſtinacie is now at laſt added unto error: and a cruell rage ariſing from impatience; and now their wickedneſſe began to pleaſe them the more, becauſe it diſpleaſed us. And what ſhould we now doe, in ſuch a caſe; we the deſpiſed, and rejected Patrons of this ſpirituall chaſtity? To let fall ſo juſt a cauſe, wee might not; unleſſe we would caſt off that God, who challenges this plea for onely his. To yeeld, and give in, were no other, than to betray the truth of God, and damne our owne ſoules; No [illegible]rſe remaines but this one, (and here is our onely ſafety) with all our courage, and skill, to oppoſe the wicked Paradoxes, and Idolatrous practices of the Romiſh Church, till either ſhe be aſhamed of her ſelfe, or repent that ever ſhe was.

Sect. II.

The Commodities and Conditions of peace.

BEAUTIFULL is the name of Peace (as Hilary ſpeaketh) and truly ſacred; and ſuch as ſcarce ſavoureth of the earth: Neither did the Hebrewes by any other terme chooſe rather to expreſſe all happineſſe, and perfection of living: Neither is there any thing, which the Angels did more gladly congratulate unto men, or which Chriſt did more carefully bequeath, or the Apoſtles more earneſtly enjoyne; How oft, and how vehemently doth the Spirit intreat and command us to have peace? But this (thou ſaieſt) is every mans wiſh, to have peace; but, what if peace will not be had? Loe then, Saint Iames charges us to make peace, by our endevours, by our patience. Once made, and had, what if it will not ſtay with us? Then Saint Paul bids to follow thoſe things which concerne peace: What if it will needs away and hide it ſelfe? yet then Saint Peter commands to follow, and inquire after it. What if once found, it refuſe to come, as Abrahams ſervant preſuppoſed of Rebecca? Even then ſtudy to be quiet, ſaith Saint Paul; or as the word implies, be ambitious of Peace: So let the Author of Peace love us, as we love Peace. Who is there that would not rather wiſh with Conſtantine quiet daies, and nights free from care and vexation? It was a ſpeech worthy of an Emperour, and a Chriſtian, that fell from Iovianus about that quarelous libell of the Macedonians, I hate contention; and thoſe that are inclined to concord, I love, and reverence.

Our adverſaries would make us beleeve they profeſſe and deſire no leſſe, with an equall zeale of charitie, and agreement. God bee Judge betwixt us both; and whether-ſoever perſiſts to hate peace, let him periſh from the face of God, and his holy Angels: Yea (that this imprecation may be needleſſe) he is already periſhed; For (as Cyprian according to his wont, gravely) they cannot come to the reward of peace, which have broken the Peace of God, with the fury of diſcord. And ſurely what but the flames of hell can determine the ambition of theſe fiery and boyling ſpirits? Baſil obſerves well that Gods fire gave light and burned not; contrarily, the fire of hell burneth without light; and therefore is well worthy of thoſe, who deſpiſing the light of truth, delight themſelves in the flames of contentions. Thoſe are the true haters of Peace, which do wilfully patronize errors contrary to the Chriſtian faith. So long as we muſt dwell by theſe Tents of Kedar, wee ſhall too juſtly complaine with the Pſalmiſt, I love peace, but in the meane while they are bent to warre. And as for us, which profeſſe our ſelves the ingenious clients of Peace, ſince wee muſt needs fight, it is not for us to doe nothing; For that bleſſed Quire of Angels, before their Peace upon earth, well ſung, Glory to God in the higheſt heavens; and Saint Iames deſcribes the wiſedome of God to bee firſt pure, then peaceable. And that choſen veſſell implies no leſſe, when to his charge of Peace, hee addes, If it bee poſſible. That is as impoſſible to every good man, which ought not to be done, as that which cannot bee done, neither indeed (as the rule of Lawyers runnes) can we be ſaid to be able to do that, which we cannot honeſtly do. God (ſaith S. Paul) is not the Author of confuſion, but of Peace. It is a wicked peace, it is no peace, that neceſſarily breeds confuſion. That Peace is worthy of a defiance, which proclaimes war with God; And I would to God, that peace which Rome either can performe or dare promiſe, were of any better, of any other nature.

Sect. III.

The obſtinate and adverſe diſpoſition of the Romaniſts.

Esa.11.6. AND as for the firſt, I ſuppoſe wee need not labour much. Indeed, God can eaſily make the Wolfe to dwell with the Lambe, and the Leopard to lodge with the Kid. How eaſie is it for him, ſo to ſoften the adamantine hearts of men, by bathing them in the bloud of that immaculate Lambe, that they ſhould melt into pure love! but, as the times now are, it would bee no leſſe miraculous, to finde a Popiſh heart truly charitable to us, than to ſee the Lyons fawning upon Daniel. Even where there is ſtrife about indifferent things, there is neceſſarily required a conſpiring of the minds of them which would bee reconciled: neither is it enough, that one ſide is content, together with armes, to lay downe hatred; and how will our Romaniſts endure this? Surely that hatred of Eteocles to his brother, or that of Vatinius, is but meere love to this of Papiſts. Alas! when, and where, are wee not ſpet upon, as the moſt deſperately hereticall enemies of the Church? Rome admits Jewes into her boſome, from whoſe hands their Popes holineſſe diſdains not to receive the booke of the Law of God; but Proteſtants ſhe may not endure: That which Socrates complaines as injuriouſly done by Theodoſius a Grecian Biſhop againſt the very Macedonian Heretickes, is daily done by them againſt us; No Arrians, no Circumcellion hereticks were ever more cruell: and theſe idle Fablers in the meane time ſlander us to the world, as guiltie of the ſame outragious proceedings againſt them. What hereſie is there in all times, which that Romulean Wolfe, and her bawling Clients are not wont to caſt upon us? One while wee are the Schollers of Simon Magus, becauſe wee doe but once mention Grace and Salvation; for what have wee elſe to doe with that wicked Sorcerer? Another while we are fetcht from the curſed ſchoole of Eunomius, for that wee attribute too much to Faith; and yet no more than that holy Hereticke Saint Paul. One while wee are Pepuzians that aſcribe too much to women; then wee are Origeniſts for holding the Image of God to be defaced in man: then contrarily Proclians for holding the ſinne of concupiſcence not enough defaced: One while we are the followers of Sabellius, becauſe I thinke we lived in the ſame age with Servetus; another while of Enticches, becauſe wee lived in the time of Swinckfeldius; for what buſineſſe have wee ever had elſe with thoſe branded Hereticks? Wee are Pelagians one while, for holding the wages of ſinne to bee death; then wee are Donatiſts for admitting none but the juſt into the Church of the elect: ſomtimes wee are Manichees for denying Free-will; ſtraight, wee are Arrians for refuſing traditions; then Novatians for taking away penance; another while we are Ærians for rejecting oblations for the dead, and faſtings: then Iovinianiſts, for not allowing a ſlippery and vaniſhing Faith; the followers of Vigilantius, for diſclaiming the adoration of reliques; of Neſtorius, for diſliking the aſſeveration of the Sacramentall bread: now we are Xenaites, for demoliſhing of Images; then we are Lampetians, for diſallowing the ſervitude of idle vowes. It matters not whether the foule mouth of that hired ſtrumpet accuſe Timotheus the Presbyter, or Athanaſius the Biſhop, ſo that ſome body be ſmitten; It matters not what be ſpoken, ſo it be malicious: That is fully reſolved of, which Nazianzen hath; No man ſhall hold in the reines of a riotous and lawleſſe tongue: for (as Hierom ſaith well) it is the paſtime of the wicked to ſlander the good: That therefore, which was the ſolemne faſhion of the Lindians, never to do ſervice to their Hercules, without railing, the ſame is too ordinary with theſe publike Heralds of our patience: Our daily fornace (as Auſten ſpeakes wittily) is our adverſaries tongue: How eaſily might I here unlode whole carts of reproches, that have bin heaped together by the ſcurrilous paraſites of Rome? What rivers of bloud, what bonfires of worthy Saints might I here ſhew my Reader? All theſe the world knowes, and feeles too much: And as for thoſe honeſt and good-natured men, which would needs undertake to bee the ſticklers of theſe ſtrifes, as Caſſander, Fricius, the Interimiſts, and that nameleſſe Apologiſt of the French, how ill have they ſped on both parts? With whom it hath no otherwiſe fared, me thinkes, than with ſome ſound ſhepheard, that thruſts himſelfe betwixt two furious Rammes running together in their full ſtrength, and

Section IV

That the Confeſſion of the ſame Creed is not with them ſufficient for Peace.

B IT is not Caſſandrs ſpeech onely, but every wiſe and honeſt mans, that the Creed is the commone cognizance of our faith; and we all doe with one voyce willingly profeſſe it. Surely Theodoret, when hee would by a favourable report allay the bitter contentions of thoſe ancient Chriſtians of Antioch, writes thus: Both parts (ſaith he) made one and the ſame confeſſion of their faith; for both maintained the Creed of the Nicen Councell; And yet this poſition is ſpightfully handled by Cardinall Bellarmine, and can ſcarce draw breath ſince his laſt ſtripes: What care wee (ſaith hee) for the ſame Creed? Faith is not in words, but in the ſenſe: And indeed, I remember, what Ruffinus reports done by Arrius. That worthy Conſtantine had charged him to write what faith hee held; he delivered him a Creed, in words, ours; in ſenſe, his owne; and how right his wicked brood tooke after their father, in the inſuing times of the Church, let Hiſtories witneſſe: ſure I am, whoſoever ſhall read the Creeds of their ſeverall C Sects, ſhall hardly fetch out any thing, which an Orthodox Cenſurer would thinke worthy of reproofe: How oft doe they yeeld Chriſt to bee God, yea, God of God; and yet perfidiouſly reſerve to themſelves, in the meane time, that abſurd conceit; That he was created, ex non entibus! As therefore Severianus the Syrian in Theodoret, ſpake Greeke as a Grecian, but pronounced it like a Syrian: ſo there may be many, which may ſpeake truths, but pronounce them heretically: For all Hereſies (ſaith Irenæus) talke of one God, but marre him with their miſconceits; yea, for the moſt part all Hereſies (ſaith Chryſologus) ſet a face of the Trinitie; To little purpoſe; It was not ill ſayd of Gratian, that no man is to care for words, ſince that not the meaning ſhould ſerve the words, but the words rather the meaning; Let us grant all this, and more; Let it be ſaid of the Creed, as Ieromie ſaid of the Booke of Iob, that every word abounds with ſenſes: There is no Divine Word (as Tertullian ſpeaketh wiſely) ſo diſſolute and defuſed, that onely the words may be defended, and not the true meaning of the words ſet D downe. To put the Cardinall out of this needleſſe feare; The proper and native ſenſe of the Creed may be fetcht out; & I adde yet more (except but that one Article of Chriſts Deſcenſion into Hell, which Ruffinus confeſſes he could not find, either in the Roman, or Eaſterne Creeds) is openly confeſſed on both parts: And yet for all this, wee are never the neerer to peace: For from theſe common Principles of Faith, the ſubtle device of Hereticall pravity hath fetcht ſtrange and erroneous conſequences, which by their ſophiſticall and obſtinate handling, are now improved into Hereſies, and dare now threaten not onely oppoſition, but death unto thoſe very principles, from which they are rayſed: Of this kind are the moſt of thoſe Romiſh opinions, which we undertake to cenſure in this Diſcourſe.

But, if by the univerſall conſent of all, it ſhould appeare that both word and ſenſe are intire; that both the principles, and neceſſarie concluſions thence deduced, are undeni- E ably ſound: yet (ſaith Bellarmine) there can bee no peace with Lutherans. Let all the World know this, and wonder, Our King (be it ſpoken to the envie of thoſe which cannot emulate him, an incomparable Divine for a Prince, yea, a Prince of Divines, a King of men, and a wonder of Kings, mighty both with his Scepter, and his pen) going about in that learned and ponderous Diſcourſe to cleere himſelfe from the aſperſion of Hereſie, which that foule hand had unworthily caſt upon him, profeſſes ſolemnly and holily, that whatſoever is contained eyther in the Sacred Scriptures, or the three famous Creeds, Creeds, or the four first generall Councels, that hee imbraces with both armes, that Hee proclaimes for His Faith, that He will defend with his Tongue, with his Pen, with His Sword, in that hee will both live and die.

Yea, but this is not enough, saith that Great Antagonist of Princes; For there are other points of faith wherewith religion is now of late times inlarged, as Transubstantiation, Purgatory, the Popes Primacie (a whole doozen of these goodly Articles hath the Tridentine Councell created, in this decayed age of the World, lest the Fathers of Italy should seeme to come short of the Apostles, and the Pope of Christ) any parcell whereof, whosoever shall presume to call into question, is an Heretike presently, and smels of the Faggot: and how ordinarily is that layd in every dish? that hee cannot bee a member of the Church, which withdrawes his obedience from their Pope, the Head of the Church. Neyther is that any whit milder, which Gratian cites from Pope Nicholas the Second; Whosoever goes about to infringe the privilege of the Roman Church, or derogates from her Authoritie, is an Heretike.

But that is yet well worse, which the allowed Table of the Decree hath peremptorily broched, Whosoever obeies not the Popes Commandement, incurrs the sin of Idolatry; or (as Gregory the Seventh, from whom Gratian would seeme to borrow this, which yet is not to be found in his Epistles) of Paganisme. Whatsoever therefore Christ Jesus, whatsoever the Apostles, whatsoever the counsels, and Fathers of the Primitive Church have commended to us, to bee beleeved, shall availe us little, neither can ever make us friends, unlesse wee will bee content to beslave our faith unto their Popeling: And can they thinke wee will looke at peace upon such a condition? That hope were bold and foolish that could expect this. Neither doe they more scornfully cast us out of the bosome of their Church, for spetting at these Articles of Straw, which their vanitie hath devised, than wee can confidently condemne, and execrate their presumption, which have so imperiously obtruded such trash as this upon the Church of God.

Section V.

The impuration or corruption of the Roman Church; and their impossibilitie of Reconciliation, arising from that wilfull Fable of the Popes infallibilitie.

BVt, to leave this first head of our Adversaries indisposition to peace: Say that the Papists could bee content to harken to an agreement (which I can never hope to see, whiles Rome is it selfe) say they should seeke it, yet (as things now stand) whiles they will not, and we may not stirre one inch from our station of judgement, God forbids, the Truth debarrs our Reconciliation: wee dare not (whatsoever some kind-hearted Mediators may perswade us) either divide Christ, or betray him with a kisse. The truth is on high: they may well ascend to us, as Leo said of old; but for us, to descend to them, is neither safe, nor honest: First of all, how too plaine is it, that the Romane Church is palpably declined from that ancient puritie of Religion, which she once professed? It is not more certaine, and sensible, that the Citie of Rome is descended from her seven Hils, to the Martian Plaines, that lye below them; or, that the spightfull Heathens of old (as Eusebius reports) turned the Sacred Monument of the Tombe of Christ, into the Temple of their Venus: What a cloud of witnesses have wee of this noted decay of that Church? yea, witnesses of their owne. To beginne with the other Sex. Hildegardis a Nunne, and a famous Propheteese of her time, accuses the Apostolicall Order, of the utter extinguishing of Religion, amongst them. Matilda, or Maud, who lived in the same Age, censures them for common Apostasie from the Christian faith; and both of them, by some extraordinary Revelation, cleerely and directly propheseid of this Religious and Holy restauration of the Church, which our dayes see accomplished.

Saint Brigit, the Foundresse of the Order of Saint Saviour, which was * canonized by Pope Vrban, stickes not to teach openly in her writings, that the Pope doth torment, yea, crucifie the soules of the Elect; and boldly foretels, that all his Followers, and Abettors, and whole Clergie shall bee cut off, and that his Sea shall sinke downe into the bottome of Hell; and this she doth so tartly and vehemently, that the Romanists of those times

A times threatned, and indevoured to burne her alive: Robert (our Bishop of Lincolne, to whom the greatnesse of his Head gave an homely, but famous name, whom Illyricus mis-nameth Rupertus) a worthy and peereles man in his age, durst, before the Popes owne face, openly accuse the Pastors of his time to bee the Spoylers of the Earth, the Dispersers and Devourers of Gods flocke, the utter wasters of the Holy Vineyard of God. That Carthusian of Coleyne, which is said to have gathered that Booke of the Bundle of times, complaines that truth was then perished from the sonnes of men. Petrus de Aliaco, a Cardinall, confesses that the ancient Divines built up the Church, but the then present Seducers destroyed it; And unto these agree Iohn de Rupescissa, a Monke; Picus Earle of Mirandula, Trithemius the Abbot, Laurence Valla; And those worthy Lights of the Councell of Basil, the Cardinall of Arles, and Thomas de Corsellis: But Nicholas Clemangis the Archdeacon of Bayeux speakes nothing but stones and bullets; who B in a whole Volumne, hath freely painted out the corrupt estate of the Church, neither did Dominicus Bistop of Brixia speake any whit more sparingly, who even in those times durst set before his Booke, this Title, The Reformation of Rome; To say nothing of Ioachim, of Peter of Ferrara the Lawyer, of the three Theodericks, of Lyra, Petrarch, Gerson, Everard, the Bishop of Salisburg, Erasmus, Cassander, Espencæus, the Jury of Cardinals selected by Paul the Third, (amongst which, Gaspar Cotarenus, Iames Sadolet, and our Cardinall Poole were (as they might) of eminent note, Alvarus Pelagius, * Savanarola of Florence, and whomsoever those times yeelded at once both learned and good. Even Pope Adrian himselfe, the Sixt of that Name, whiles he instructs his Legate in his message, censures the Church, and ingeniously complaines, that all was gone to wrack, and ruine: What shall we then say to this? Can any man bee so partiall, as to thinke, that so many Saints of both Sexes, Prophets, Propheteses, Monkes, Doctors, Cardinals, Popes, should (as Ierome speakes of the Luciferian Heretikes) meerely devise these slanders, to the disgrace of their holy mother? If any man be so mad, hee is well worthy to C be ever deceived.

Indeed, Rome was once an holy Citie: but now (as no lesse famous the other way) she is become a Citie of bloud; This Grape is growne a dry Raisin; Neither did that good Heremite, Antony, so justly say of his Alexandria, as we may now of Rome. Woe to thee thou Strumpetly Citie, into which the Devils out of all the rest of the World have assembled themselves.

Certainely, therefore, so shamefull and generall a deformitie could not but bee discerned, by our latter Papists; and (to avoid all shifts) wee have gently and lovingly laid our finger upon these spots: But, in the meane time, how haynously have they taken it? and (as Ruffinus speakes of Apollinaris the Heretike) whiles they are transported with the vicious humour of contention, and will be crossing every D thing that is spoken, out of the vaine ostentation of a strong wit, they have improoved their idle brabbles to Heresies. Hierome said wittily, They use to winke, and deny, which beleeve not that to bee done, which they would not have done.

It is therefore a most lamentable and fearefull case; that a Church which of her owne favourites is justly accused of many and dangerous errors, should blocke up against her selfe, the way whereby shee should returne into the truth; and (as Francis a Victoria honestly complaines) should neyther indure her owne evils, nor their remedies. For whiles shee stands upon it, that shee cannot erre, and stubbornely challenges unto her Chaire a certaine Impeccancie of Judgement (that wee may borrow a word from Tertullian) what hope can now remaine of recovering the Truth? How are wee now, too sawcie, that dare mutter ought against her? The first hope of health must needs bee fetcht from the sense, and acknowledgement of the disease: That of the Epi- E cure is common and true, The beginning of recovery, is the knowledge of the fault; Thou must finde thy selfe amisse, saith Seneca, ere thou canst amend thy selfe. Rome brags that shew cannot bee sicke: What doe wee now talke of medicines for her? These Doctrinall Principles (as our Stapleton cals them) are they, from which a certaine fatall necessity of erring must needs follow.

For to what purpose is all this wee doe? If upon the sentence of this Romish Oracle (for

(for in the closet, or the prisonr ather, of his brest (as Ierome objected to Iohn of Jerusalem) the Church is included) all things doe so depend, that whatsoever he shall determine, must be received without all contradiction, & his decree can by no inferiour means be repealed, in vaine doe we wrangle for truth; in vaine have all those former Synods both met, and defined; in vaine doe we either teach, or learne ought of any other Master: Is it possible, she should ever be drawne to remorse for her error, which eagerly defends that she cannot erre? Either therefore let our Papists suffer this vaine opinion of Infallibilitie, to be puld up by the very rootes, out of their brests; or else there can bee no hope, so much as of a consultation of Peace; And doe wee thinke that our Masters beyond the Alpes will ever abide themselves stripped of this darling, which they have made so dainty of all this while? Why doe wee not aswell demand Saint Peters Throne, and his Revenues, and together with his Patrimony, all the bodie of Religion? For, what one Title is there of the now Roman faith, that hangs not on this string? Let them give us this, and Rome falls alone, and lyes shamefully in the dust; Let them denie it us, and shee shall be still that great Harlot, still an enemie to Peace, still hatefull to Heaven: But so farre are their moderne Doctors from an ingenious rejection of Infallibility, that no Age ever knew so well how to flatter a Pope: For not onely have some yeelded this unto him, without a Councell, as Alber, Pighius, Gretser, Bellarmine, and all Jesuites whereseever; but some others, (as Gregory of Valentia) have fastned this upon him, without any care or study required on his part. Oh happy Chaire of Peter, firme, eternall, full of prodigious vertue! which if we might imagine a woodden one, I should sure thinke were made of Irish Oake; there is no Spider of errour can touch it, but presently dyes: Behold, the Tables written with Gods owne Hand, were soone broken and gone: but the barres of thy frame can feele no Age, cannot incurre the danger of any miscarriage.

Sure (I thinke) Vitius Rufus is alive againe, which because hee sate in the same seat wherein Iulius Cæsar had sate, and married Ciceroes wife, had wont to vaunt of both, as if he should sure be Cæsar, for his seat; or for his wife, Cicero. Belike all the vertue of it is from Peter: it is well that his other Successors conferred nothing towards it, lest perhaps Alexander the Sixt should have turned the succeeding Popes into Letchors, Clement in to sacrilegious Church-robbers, Iulius into Swaggerers, Benedict, Gregory, Silvester, into Symonists; Pascalis into Perjurers; Pope Ioane of Mentz into women, Martin and that other Silvester into Magicians, the two Iohns into Devils incarnate.

Now on the o her part, can any man bee so foolish to hope that our Church will ever be so mad, as thus basely to bolster up the great Bridge-maker of Tybur? As though we could be ignorant how Christ never either performed, or promised them any such priviledge? For, where is it written (as Luther jested well) unlesse perhaps at Rome, in Saint Peters upon some Chimnie with a Cole? Christ said indeed, Thou art Peter: but, Thou art Paul the Fift, he never said: He said, I have prayed for thee, that thy faith faile not: so he said too, Goe behinde me, Satan, thou savourest not the things of God. Now let this Oracle of the Chaire, teach us how he can at once make himselfe full heyre of the promise, and yet shift of the censure at pleasure: Yet (to tread in the steps of the Times) as though we could not know that the following Ages knew not of this; not Policrates and Irenæus, which resisted Victor the Pope; not Cyprian which opposed Stephen, not the Fathers of Calcedon, which would not yeeld to Leo, nor the Easterne Bishops, which would not yeeld to Iulius nor the fathers of Constantinople, which refused to yeeld to Vigilius and Honorius: yea, of the latter dayes, those which have had either sense or shame, as John Gerson, Chancellor of Paris, Turrecremata, Almaine, Alphonsus de Castro, Pope Adriane the Sixt, Archbishop Catharinus, Cardinall Cajetane, Franciscus a victoria, and who not of the best ranke of their Doctors have not feared openly to deny, and disclaime this fancie; and Alphonsus shall give a reason thereof for all. There are many unlearned Popes (saith hee) that know not so much as the rules of Grammar, how then should they bee able to interpret the holy Scriptures? As though wee knew not which of their Popes favoured Arrius, which Montanus, which Nestorius, which Acacius, which the Monothelites, which the Sadduces, and which were in league with Devils; which of them have defined contrary to their fellowes, and which contrary to God; and (that I may uſe Ierome's words) how ſilly a Pilot hath ofttimes ſteered the leaking Veſſell of the Church! As though every Tapſter and Tinker, now a dayes, could not point their finger to the long Beadroule of Popes, and ſay, Such and ſuch were the Monſters of men, ſuch (as Platina, Lyra, Genebrard confeſſe) were Apotacticall, and Apoſtaticall miſcreants; ywis, their life hath beene long the Table-talke of the World, as Bernard ſpeakes: There can therefore bee no peace poſſibly, unleſſe they will bee content to bee head-leſſe, or wee can be content to bee the ſlaves of Rome: Imagine, they could be ſo ingenuous, as to confeſſe that the ſame ſerpent which inſinuated himſelfe of old into Paradiſe, might perhaps creepe cloſely into Peters Chaire; yet there would be no leſſe Controverſie, de facto, than of the poſſibility of error.

Beſides, there are other Popiſh opinions of the ſame ſtampe, but more pragmaticall, which are not more pernicious to the Church, than to common-weales: as thoſe of the power of both Swords, of the depoſition of Princes, diſpoſing of Kingdomes, abſolving of Subjects, fruſtration of Oathes (ſufficiently canvaſed of late, both by the Venetian Divines, and French, and ours,) which are ſo palpably oppoſite to the libertie of Chriſtian Government, that thoſe Princes, & People, which can ſtoope to ſuch a yoke, are well worthy of their ſervitude: and can they hope that the great Commanders of the World will come to this bent? (we all, as the Comick Poet ſaid truly, had rather be free, than ſerve; but much more Princes) or, on the contrary, can wee hope, that the Tyrants of the Church will bee content to leave this hold? What a fopperie were this? For, both thoſe Princes are growne more wiſe, and theſe Tyrants more arrogant; and (as Ruffinus ſpeakes of George, the Arrian Gallant) they inſolently governe an uſurped Biſhopricke, as if they thought they had the managing of a proud Empire, and not of a Religious Prieſthood.

That the other Opinions of the Romiſh Church will not admit Reconciliation.

But let us bee ſo liberall, as to grant this to our ſelves, which certainly they will never grant us; for, this old Grandame of Cities thinkes her ſelfe borne to command, and will either fall, or rule: Neither doth that Mitred Moderator of the World affect any other Embleme than that, which Iulian jeſtingly aſcribes to Iulius Cæſar (τὸ κρατεῖν) To rule all; or to Alexander the Great (πάντα νικᾶν) to conquer all; It was a degenerating ſpirit of Adrian the Sixt, which cauſed to bee written upon his Tombe, in the Church of Saint Peter; That nothing in all his life fell out ſo unhappily to him, as that hee governed: Let this, I ſay, be granted us; There want not (I know) ſome milder ſpirits (Theodoſians, that can play with both hands) which thinke, if theſe buſie points were by the moderation of both parts quietly compoſed, it might be ſafe for any man (ſo it bee without noyſe) to thinke what hee liſt, concerning the other differences of Religion: Theſe are the Ghoſts of that Heretike Appelles, whoſe ſpeech it was, That it is ſufficient to beleeve in Chriſt crucified, and that there ſhould bee no diſcuſſing of the particular warrants and reaſon of our faith: Or the brood of Leonas, one of the courtiers of Conſtantius, and his Deputie in the Seleucian Councell, which when the Fathers hotly contended, as there was good cauſe, for the Conſubſtantialitie of the Sonne: Get you home, ſaid he, and trouble not the Church ſtill with theſe trifles. Saint Baſil was of another minde, from theſe men; who (as Theodoret reports) when the Lievtenant of Valens the Emperor perſwaded him to remit but one letter, for peace ſake, anſwered, Thoſe that are nurſed with the ſincere Milke of Gods Word, may not abide one ſyllable of his ſacred truth to be corrupted; but rather than they will endure it, are ready to receive any kinde of torment; or death. Eleuſius and Sylvanus, which were Orthodox Biſhops, and thoſe other worthy Guardians, and (as Athanaſius his title was) Champions of the truth, were of another minde from theſe coole and indifferent Mediators. So farre as the ſacred truth will allow us, wee will accompany them gladly: but if they urge us further, wee ſtand ſtill, or ſtart backe; and thoſe two courſes which Epiphanius adviſed, as the remedies of Hereſie (Heed and Avoydance) both

The Romiſh Hereſie concerning Juſtification.

THat point of Juſtification (of all other) is exceeding important; inſomuch as Calvin was faine to perſwade, that if this one head might bee yeelded ſafe and intire, it would not quite the coſt, to make any great quarrell for the reſt. Would to GOD that word of Caſſander might bee made good, which doubted not to ſay, That which is affirmed, that men cannot bee juſtified before God by their owne ſtrength, merits, or workes, but that they are freely juſtified by faith, was alwaies allowed and received in the Church of God, and is at this day approved by all Eccleſiaſticall Writers: Yea, I would they would bee ruled by their Thomas Aquinas in this, who attributes Juſtification to workes, not as Juſtification is taken for an infuſion of grace, but as it is taken for an exerciſe, or manifeſtation, or conſummation of Juſtice: If this were all, in this point all would bee peace: But whilſt the Tridentine Fathers take upon them to forge the formall cauſe of our Juſtification, to be our owne inherent Juſtice, and thruſt Faith out of Office, what good man can chooſe but preſently addreſſe himſelfe to an oppoſition? Who would not rather dye than ſuffer the ancient Faith of the Church to be depraved with theſe Idle Dreames? Go now ye great Trent Divines, and bragge of your ſelves (as Ætius did of old by Theodorets report) that GOD hath now at laſt revealed to you thoſe things, which hee would have hitherto concealed from all the world: In the meane time wee cannot but ſcorne to ſee the ſoules of men ſo ſhamefully deluded; whiles we here the Spirit of God ſo oft redoubling, Without workes, Not by workes, but by faith: By their workes no fleſh ſhall be juſtified; Being juſtified freely by his grace: By the power whereof, Arrius Montanus, an ingenuous Author (and as Hierome ſaid of Appollinarius, a man of approved labour, though in many things (as the times then were) faultie in opinion) being utterly convinced: It followes (ſaith hee) that faith is reputed for righteouſneſſe to him that workes not in the Law; and that according to the purpoſe of the grace of God. A fraud; To whom I must sing the same note, that Ambrose did of old, to the Arrians: Yee may blot out the Letters, but the Faith you can never abolish: Those blurres bewray you more: those blots condemne you more than the Writing.

But some perhaps may thinke this a meere strife of words, and not hard to bee reconciled: For, that which to the Papists is inherent justice, is no other to the Protestants, than Sanctification; both sides hold this equally necessary, both call for it equally: True; but doe both require it in the same manner? doe both to the same end? I thinke not; yea, what can bee more contrary than these opinions, to each other? The Papists make this inherent righteousnesse the cause of our justification; the Protestants, the effect thereof: The Protestants require it as the companion or Page; the Papists as the Usher, yea, rather as the Parent of Justification. But what matters it (say they) so both ascribe this whole worke to God? As though it comes not all to one, to pay a B summe for mee, and to give it mee to pay for my selfe. I know not how these things seeme so little dissonant to these mens eares, which the Spirit of God hath made utterly incompatible: To him that worketh, the wages is not imputed of grace, but of debt; If by grace, now not of workes, or else grace should bee no more grace; for neither is it grace any way, if it be not free every way, saith Augustine: But these men say, Therefore of grace, because of workes. Not of workes, lest any man should boast, (saith the Spirit:) But of workes, and yet a man shall boast in the Lord, saith Bellarmine. And wherefore shall hee boast? because hee is just, because voyd of sinne; perhaps some Isidore may say thus of himselfe, which voluntarily protested that for forty yeeres space hee found not in himselfe any sinne, not so much as in his thought, not so much as any consent to anger or inordinate desire: Or perhaps some Baronius or Bellarmine may report this of their late Saint, Gonzaga; or the offall of the Schooles may say so of Bonaventure; in whom, (if wee beleeve them) Adam sinned not, or Manicheus may say it of his elect Masters; or perhaps Priscilian, Evagrius, Iovinian, the Messalians, may bragge thus of themselves: But farre otherwise is that speech of Ambrose, I will not boast because I am just, but because I am redeemed: I will boast, not because I am voyd of sinne, but because my sinnes are forgiven mee: Otherwise, we shall come to that point which Innocentius condemned in the Pelagians, What need have wee now of God? But thou sayest GOD hath given mee this whereby I am just: Indeed this seemes at the first a great and glorious praise of the grace of God: and at the first hearing sounds well to an ignorant eare; and yet, (when it is better considered) under a pretence of piety spoyles Christ of his glory: Why doest thou not as well say, Hee hath given mee wherewith I may redeeme my selfe? for by the same wherewith wee are justified, wee are redeemed, (Being justified by his blood:) Behold the blood of him that is God and man, justifies us, and the same redeemes us: But goe on a little: GOD D hath given thee this: But hath he given it thee without thy selfe? Is this done without the intervention, without the operation of our Free-will? Let the Monkes of Burdeaux speake, in their Abjurations: let Andradius, let Bellarmine (the flower of the Popish Schoole) let any Papist deny this if hee dare: It is onely Christs therefore which is imputed: that which is inherent is ours; for all (saith Austen) which are justified by Christ, are just not in themselves, but in him: That which is Christs because it is his, is most perfect: that which is ours, because ours is weake and imperfect. GOD hath made us men, not GODS: Our perfection is seasonable in Heaven: Justly doth Hierome deride Ctesiphon; wee the Papists: O blessed, O happy men, if that Justice which is not thought to bee any where but in Heaven, may bee found with you onely upon earth: In the meane time, it is sufficient for us to mourne for our wants, to hate injustice: It is the very speech of Donatists, I have nothing for thee to pardon. Let Bernard now (to conclude) shut up this Stage: Not to sinne, (saith he) is E Gods justice, but the justice of man is the pardon of God. To be imputed therefore, and to bee inherent, differ no lesse than God and man, Trent and Heaven: Wherefore let our Romanists confesse that, which both Scriptures, and Fathers, and all their modester Doctors have both thought and reported to bee the common voyce of the former Church in all times; and wee are agreed: Otherwise, what fellowship hath God with Belial, light with darknesse?

Sect. VIII.

Concerning Free-will.

BOrdering upon this is the point of Free-will. To let passe all lighter quarrels of the nature of our will; let us enquire of the power of it; and that not in naturall, humane, or morall things, (Here is all peace, and silence, save that the words jangle with themselves: and when the matter is agreed upon, who would not contemne words, as Augustine saith well?) but in spirituall and divine matters, wee doe will indeed; wee will freely, neither can wee otherwise will any thing: who denies it? Here is no Physicall determination, no violence; but to will that which is good, or to will well, wee cannot. Wee doe freely beleeve; (for faith is an act of the will) yea, and we doe co-operate with grace; neither are wee herein like to senseless stones, as Austen truly speakes: But whence is all this? Is it of our selves, or of God? Is it of grace, or (which the Councell of Arausica condemned) by the power of nature? This must bee our question. Both sides like well that speech of Saint Augustine: To will freely, is the worke of nature; to will well, of grace; to will ill of corruption: but when wee come to the poynt, the Doctors of Trent are not more subtile, than the Jesuites inconstant: It is yet good and safe which Bellarmine cites from his Ruardus; A good worke, as it is a worke, is from Free-will: as it is good, from grace; as both a worke and good, both from Free-will and grace: But that is exceeding ingenuous and truly Evangelicall, which the same Bellarmine affirmes against some Semipelagian Catholikes. In those things which pertain to piety and salvation, that mans will can doe nothing, without the help of Gods grace: It is the voyce of Iacob, if the Cardinall would hold him there, cursed be he that should oppose him. I goe on to hope and read; and see what stuffe I meet with, soone after in the same Booke: That our conversion is in the power of Free-will, because it may be alwayes converted, when it will, and yet further: That before all grace we have Free-will even in the workes of pietie, and supernaturall things. Before all grace? what before the grace of prevention? It were well the Cardinall would set forth some better recognitions. Now, then God doth not prevent us, (as Austen said of old) that wee might will, but wee prevent God, because we will: But lest this should seeme too grosse, this liberty is tyed up; and is altogether in the same state as the faculty of seeing, when a sensible specics is absent; we can freely see, while the object is absent: wee can freely will, in the absence of grace. Let Bellarmine now tell me: are wee any whit more free to evill than hee faines us to good? Did ever Pelagius dote thus much? Wee can will evill: but yet unlesse it is determined (under some false semblance) by the verdict of our practicall judgement, wee will it not: But if wee should yeeld him thus much: What helpe is this that God gives us? To prevent, inspire, excite, and helpe, is of God: to incline the will, is of our selves: How are wee not now more beholden to our selves, than to God? What is this but that Pelagian conceit, so oft condemned by Augustine, so to separate Free-will from grace, as if without it we could doe, or thinke any thing answerable to the will of God? That wee are able by the power of our will to avoid sins; that we can overcome the sleighter motions of temptation, as Bellarm. speaks; that wee can keepe Gods Commandements, as Scotus and Durandus; that wee can reject or receive the inspiration of the Spirit, as the Tridentine Fathers; that wee can dispose our selves to the receiving of grace, as Thomas and Suarez; that wee doe naturally co-operate with grace, and make our conversion effectuall, as Tapperus; what is it else, but to steale glory from God, that wee may pranke up this carion nature of ours? Yet it was modestly done of Tyberius, who of those many buildings which hee repayred and perfected, challenged not one to himselfe, but gave them still the names of those men, by whom they were begun to be built: But these men challenge the whole house, when as they have not laid so much as one Tyle upon the roofe. Farre bee this shamefull sacrilege from us, when that truly jealous God challenges to himselfe, to worke in us both the will and the deed; yea, that wee can will to beleeve is his worke, as Austen rightly speaks: See then, he doth not excite but worke in us; (ἐνεργεῖ,) Hee workes in us, both that which is first, to will; and that which is last, to worke. Hierome sayes worthily worthily, To will and to runne is mine: but without Gods continuall helpe, it will not bee mine: Without mee you can doe nothing, saith Christ; no, not thinke any thing, saith Paul: Alas, what can wee doe, who are not lame, but dead in sinnes? By the influence of Gods Spirit therefore a new life must be created in us, that was not; and not the former life excited which was according to that of the Psalmist, Create in me a cleane heart, and not stirre up that cleane one I have: Neither indeed is there as yet any place for this: The first heart must bee taken out, another must bee put in. I will take away their stony heart, and give them a heart of flesh, saith God by the mouth of Ezekiel: Hee will give it, but (thou sayest perhaps) into their brests, which have prediſposed and prepared themselves for the gift. Yea contrarily, to those that doe not a little resist him; The wisedome of the flesh is enmity. But there are some enmities more secret; and which doe not outwardly bewray themselves: but behold, here is publike resistance (ἡ ἀντίστασις τοῦ) It is not subject: But perhaps it will once yeeld of it selfe (ὑποτάσσεται) It cannot, saith the Spirit of God. See in how rebellious an estate we are to God: What proneneſſe is here to will good, what ability to performe it? Let the Papists, (if they will) sacrifice to themselves, as Sejanus had wont of old; or to their nets, as the Prophet speaketh: As for us, come what can come upon our opposition, wee neither can nor dare arrogate unto our selves those things, which by an holy reservation and incommunicableneſſe, are proper onely unto the Higheſt. It is safe indeed for the Papists when they will to come up to us: but we cannot goe downe to them without a feareſull precipitation of our soules: Let Cassander witneſſe this for us: Let Bonaventure himselfe witneſſe it for him; This is the propertie of holy minds, to attribute nothing to themselves, but all to the grace of God: So that how much soever a man ascribe to the grace of God, hee swarveth not from true pietie, though by giving much to grace, hee withdraw something from the power of nature, or Free will: but when any thing is withdrawne from the grace of God, and ought attributed to nature, which is due to grace, there may be great danger to the soule: Thus farre those two ingenuous Papists: But (to inferre) wee give all to grace, the Papists something to nature; and what they give to nature, wee give to God: Therefore wee doe and say that which is fit for holy minds; they (if Bonaventure may be witneſſe) that which swerves from piety, and is joyned with much danger of their soule.

Concerning Merits.

THE foundation of Popish Justification is the freedome of our will; and upon the walls of Justification is merit raised; wee will have no quarrell about the word. The holy Fathers of old (as wee all grant) tooke the word in a good sense, which the latter Divines have miserably corrupted: About the thing it selfe, we must strive eternally; wee promise a reward to good workes, yea an everlasting one: It is a true word of the Jewes, Hee that labours in the Even, shall eat on the Sabbath: for God hath promised it, and will performe; who yet crowneth us in mercy and compassion, as the Psalmist speaks, not (as the Papists) in the rigour of justice, not (as Andradius) according to the due desert of our worke: By the free gift of God, and not our merits, as Cajetan wisely and worthily: Or (if any man like that word better) God doth it in justice, but in respect of his own promise; not the very dignity of our works. That a just mans worke in the truth of the thing it selfe, is of a value worthy of the reward of heaven (which industrious and learned Morton cites out of the English Professor of Doway) and hath a meet proportion both of equality, and dignity, to the recompence of eternall life, as Pererius, and that in it selfe without any respect of the merits, and death of Christ, which Suarez, and Bayus, shamed not to write, seemes justly to us little lesse than blasphemy.

But (say our moderate Papists) Christ hath merited this merit of ours; neither can any other workes challenge this to themselves, but those which are done in God, as Andradius speakes, but those which are dipped and dyed in the blood of Christ, as our latter Papists elegantly and emphatically speake. But what is this but to coozen the world, and to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the unskilfull? Our ſinnes are dyed in the Blood of CHRIST, not our merits: Or, if they alſo; Hath Chriſt then deſerved that our workes ſhould bee perfect? How comes it about that the workes of the beſt men are ſo lame, and defective? Hath hee deſerved that though they be imperfect, yet they might merit? What injury is this to God, what contradiction of termes? Behold now, ſo many Saviours, as good men: what I doe, is mine, what I merit, is mine, whoſoever gives me either to do or to merit: Whoſoever rides on a lame horſe, cannot but move un-evenly, uneaſily, uncertainly: What inſolent over-weeners of their owne workes are theſe Papiſts, which proclaime the actions which proceed from themſelves, worthy of no leſſe than heaven? To whom wee may juſtly ſay, as Conſtantine ſaid to Aceſius, the Novatian, Set up ladders, O yee Papiſts, and clime up to heaven alone. Who can abide that noted ſpeech of Bellarmine, A juſt man hath by a double title, right to the ſame glory; one, by the merits of CHRIST imparted to him by grace, another by his owne merits: contrary to that of the Spirit of God; The wages of ſinne is death, but, The gift of God is eternall life: upon which words another Cardinall, Cajetan, ſpeakes in a holier faſhion, thus; He doth not ſay that the wages of our righteouſneſſe is eternall life: but, The gift of God is eternall life, that wee may underſtand, and learne, that wee attaine eternall life, not by our owne merits, but by the free gift of God: for which cauſe alſo hee addes, By Ieſus Chriſt our Lord: Behold the merit, behold the righteouſneſſe, whoſe wages is eternall life; but to us in reſpect of Ieſus Chriſt, it is a free gift: Thus Cajetan: What could either Luther, or Calvin, or any Proteſtant ſay more plainly? How imperfect doth the Scripture every-where proclaime both Gods graces in us, and our workes to him? and though the graces of God were abſolutely perfect, yet they are not ours; if our workes were ſo, yet they are formerly due: And if they bee due to God, what recompence of tranſcendent glory is due to us? Behold, we are both ſervants and unprofitable: Not worthy, ſaith God; worthy and more, ſay the Papiſts: By grace yee are ſaved through faith; and not of your ſelves, ſaith God: By grace indeed, but yet of our ſelves, ſay the Papiſts: What inſolencie is this? Let our Monkes now goe, and profeſſe wilfull poverty, whiles Ezekiah did never ſo boaſt of his heaps of treaſure, as theſe of their ſpirituall wealth.

Hierome ſaid truly; It was more hard to bee ſtripped of our pride, than of our Gold and Jewels; for even when thoſe outward ornaments are gone, many times theſe inward rags ſwell up the ſoule. Gregorie Ariminenſis, their old Schoole-man was aſhamed of this wicked arrogance, and ſo was Durandus and Pighius, and other their Divines of a more modeſt temper. I would the Jeſuites could have had the grace to have beene no leſſe aſhamed, and the Tridentine Doctors, together with their executioners, the Inquiſitors: But what other men have holily, and truly ſpoken, that they have perfidiouſly wip't out: witneſſe their Index of Madrill, in theſe words: Out of the booke which is intituled, The Order of Baptizing, together with the manner of viſiting the ſicke, Printed at Venice, in the yeere 1575. Let theſe words bee blotted out; Doeſt thou beleeve that not by thine owne merits, but by the vertue and merit of the paſſion of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, thou ſhalt come to glory? And ſoone after, Doeſt thou beleeve that our Lord Ieſus Chriſt died for our ſalvation, and that no man can bee ſaved by his owne merits, or any other meanes, but onely by the merit of his paſſion? Ywis, theſe are the Scorpions and Snakes of the ancient Divines (as Hierome termed the errors of Origen) amongſt which the Reader muſt needs have walked, had not the grave Senate of the Inquiſition wiſely provided for our ſafety. What hope is there now of peace? unleſſe they could bee content (which Bellarmine grants, to be the ſafeſt way) renouncing the merits of their works, not ſo much for their uncertaintie, as the imperfection of their Juſtice, and danger of vaine-glory, both to reſolve and teach men to repoſe their whole confidence in the mercy and bounty of God: which wee can at once both wiſh, and not hope for.

Sect. X.

Concerning Satisfaction.

SAtisfaction hath neere affinitie with merit; and indeed, is but as another twig arising from the same root: Than which, no opinion could bee devised more injurious, and reproachfull to the merits of Christ. The word was not displeasing to the ancient Fathers, nor in their sense, to us: Onely this let mee touch in passing by; that the heedlesse abuses of words, to the great wrong of the Church, hath bred confusion of things; as contrarily that of Tertullian is approved, The assured sense of words is the safety of proprieties: Wee have nothing to doe here with civill Satisfaction, nothing with Ecclesiasticall: whereof Luther not unfitly said, (even in Cassanders owne judgement) Our mother the Church out of her good affection B desiring to prevent the hand of God, chastises her children with certaine Satisfactions, lest they should fall under the scourges of GOD. This Canonicall Satisfaction, as many call it, hath beene too long out of use, on both sides: Yea, more than this, in all our Sermons to our people, wee beat importunatly upon the necessitie of penitence, and all the wholesome exercises therof, as fruits worthy of repentance. Not (as Cassander well interprets it) as if we desir'd they should offer unto God a ransom worthy, and sufficient for the clearing of the score of their sins; but that wee teach them, those offices must bee performed by them, which God requires of those sinners, on whom he will bestow the satisfaction of his Sonne: Let them call these satisfactions, if they will, wee give them leave: But that after the most absolute passion of Christ, there should bee yet behind, certaine remainders of punishment to be discharged by us, either here, or in Purgatory, with a purpose thereby to satisfie the divine Justice, whether they bee imposed by God C or by the Priest, or by our selves (as the Tridentine distinction runnes) wee neither may, nor can endure.

Satisfactio pœnitentialis nihil aliud est quam conatus insectis reddendi quod factum est. Alphons. Virues. aduers. Luth.

For (how nicely soever these men distinguish) it cannot be, but this sacrilegious opinion must needs accuse the truly propitiatory sacrifice of Christ, of some imperfection. I know, they say, that both satisfactions may well stand together; that, of the Mediator; and this, of man: whereof Bonaventure calls the one Perfect, the other Semiperfect. But these are words. Let the Sophisters tell mee; Doth not the full vessell containe in it selfe the halfe? or what need the one halfe apart, when we have the whole? And lastly, can any thing bee added to that which is perfect? But some of their heed-fuller Divines will neither have these two opposite, nor subordinate to each other. For it is a shame to speake, what Suarez, what Durand, & other grosser Papists have D discoursed of this point: Let them rather if they will, hold (which opinion yet hath been controlled, not by the Cardinall onely, but by three Popes before him) that mens satisfactions serve onely to apply unto us, that which the satisfactions of Christ have promerited for us. Yet, even this shift will not serve: For Christs satisfaction (as they teach) respects eternall punishment, and not temporall: How then can it once be imagined, that we by our satisfaction should procure that his suffering, which was destinated to the expiation of an eternall punishment, should serve to the discharge of a temporall? And why should wee doe this, rather than Christ himselfe? Besides, how absurdly doth this sound, That hee whose bounty hath paid our pounds for us, hath yet left us, out of our poore stocke, to pay some few farthings for our selves? Let mee demand then; whether could not Christ undertake these temporall punishments for us, or would he not? That hee could not, is impious; that he would not, is bold to say, and illiberall to doe: For where is there any restraint? or what are the limits of his mercy? The fault is remitted (saith the conventicle of Trent) the punishment is not pardoned: The Easterne Church would never have said so, which alwayes stoutly opposed E her selfe to this error: And indeed, what a shamefull reproach is this to the infinite mercy of the forgiver? what a wrong to his justice? whereto is the punishment due but to the fault? Did ever God inflict punishments that were not due? Many a time hath he forgiven to sinners those plagues which both they had deserved, and he threatned; but never did hee call backe for those arerages which hee had forgiven: God

punishes us indeed, (or chastens us rather) and that sometimes well and sharply after the remission of our offence. Not that hee may give himselfe satisfaction of us (for how can it bee so pleasing to him that it should bee ill with us?) but that hee may confirme us to himselfe, that hee may amend us: He layes no stroke upon us with a revenging hand, but with a fatherly. Wee suffer therefore now, but wee satisfie not; This is proper onely to that eternall Priest, and to his eternall Priesthood, and is no more communicable to Saints and Angels, than his owne person: And certainly that which was his part, hee hath performed; hee hath redeemed us from the curse of the Law; and part of the Legall punishment, is this temporall revenge: For us therefore, to give hands to them in this, it were no better than perfidious and shamefully traiterous. And if it bee more than manifest, that this cannot be done; either by our owne torments inflicted, or good workes performed (how penall soever) how much lesse shall it bee effected by others? There is none of the Saints which will not justly take up that answer of the wiser Virgins, There will not bee enough for you and for us. But as Hierome said well; There is no need of any great conviction, where the opinion carries blasphemy in the face.

Concerning Purgatory.

UPon this conceit of satisfactions, depend those other fables of Purgatory, and Indulgences; pleasant ones both, and not unworthy of a Satyre: whereof, so oft as I thinke, I cannot but remember the scornfull frumpe of Luther, alluding to that of the Prophet, Domine non possum vesci stercore humano: yet if they had onely doubtfully and problematically commended their Purgatory to the Church, we might easily have favoured them with a connivence, although you cannot say, whether it would have beene more worthy to set the spleene on worke for laughter, or the bowels for commiseration: But now when Bellarmine teaches us, that it pertaines to the Catholike faith, and our Fisher of Rochester will have it altogether necessary to bee knowne and beleeved; wee cannot entertaine his presumptuous folly, without indignation. How miserably the Scriptures are wrested to this purpose if any Schoole-boy could not easily see, hee were worthy of whipping. As Hierome said of the Heretikes of his time, They frame some unfitting testimonies to their owne sense; as if it were a worthy, and not rather an abominable kinde of teaching, to deprave sentences, and to dragge the Scriptures perforce, to their owne bent: Neither are the ancient Fathers better used in their citation; of which, Origen, Ambrose, Hilary, Lactantius, Nissen, Ierome, gave intimation of a quite other Purgatory, from the Romish. Augustine speakes of it, at peradventure, waveringly, uncertainly; The rest never dreamed of any at all: But yet, I mistake it; Now I remember S. Plato is cited by Austen and Eusebius, for the Patron of this opinion: and who knowes not, that S. Homer and S. Virgil are flat for it: yet this fire never began to burne out, but in Gregories time; and since that, the authority of the Alcoran hath not a little mended it: this is it that their Rochester ingenuously confessed of old, that this Purgatory flame came but lately to the knowledge of the Church: but for us, that of S. Paul shall never bee wrung from our hands: (ἐὰν ἡ ἐπίγειος,) If, or when this earthly house shall be dissolved, wee have a building, not made with hands, eternall, in the heavens: And when is this Saint Pauls (ἐὰν)? Saint John shall interpret it; (ἀπ' ἄρτι ἀποθνήσκοντες) Those that dye Amodo, from henceforth: and when is this Amodo? To day thou shalt bee with mee, saith Christ; even instantly upon the egresse of the soule. Let them commend their soules to God, saith S. Peter: But what of that? that which doth utterly quench out this fabulous fire, the counterfeit Salomon, (though true to the Papists) addes, The soules of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment shall touch them: Behold then, either the soules without a Purgatory; or, a Purgatory without paine: But what stick we at this? Let the Popish Doctors together agree among themselves, of the fire of their Purgatory, of the torments of the Subject, or the duration, of the executioners, of the condition of the soules there detained; and then afterwards let them looke for our assent: In the meane time, why is it not as free for

Concerning Indulgences or Pardons.

Purgatory is guilty of Indulgences, as their Rochester confesses: Both of them were bred by superstition, and nursed by covetousnesse; I touch these with a light hand onely; It is long since all ingenious Clients of Rome were athamed of this holy fraud; I cannot but commend Cassander, which writes thus modestly and truly: The abatement or relaxation of Canonicall punishments, was of old called Indulgence; Cap. de Indulg.
B which at this day is drawne to all private satisfactions, and the full right of bestowing them withdrawne from all other Bishops, to the Bishop of Rome alone. About the use and practice whereof, all good men have desired a correction and moderation; as of things, which being hitherto ill handled, have given the chiefe occasion of this breach in the Church: Here therefore it were to bee wished, that the Popes would yeeld something to the Publike peace. Thus farre Cassander: With whom agrees Polydore Virgil; De Indulg. l. 4. c. 4. both of them more worthy of a blacke cole, than their honest Rochester whom Gregory of Valence hath so foulely branded. Neither hath there wanted some of
C their own (as Bellarmine witnesseth) which have called both the treasure of the Church, and Pardons into question; neither have there wanted those which have boldly and flatly denied them either to bee of use, or to bee at all: And indeed who, that is not too much intoxicate with the potions of that Harlot, can endure, that whilst the imputation of Christs merits to the justifying of a sinner, applyed by God to us, is every where a common scoffing-stocke to these men, yet that the merits and sufferings of holy men, out of a certaine common treasure, should by a man bee imputed to men, for the deliverance of their soules from torment? Who can abide that any mortall man should over-satisfie God for his sinnes? Who can abide the prodigall grants, and shamefull Marts of their Pardons? Who can endure to heare, that to the careless mumbling over of some short prayers (for if wee beleeve their Casuists, there is no great need of any intention of minde, of any speciall devotion) there should bee granted by Horæ B. virg. stations of Rome. Rubrnic. Horæ B. Mar. virg ad usum sacrum.
Iohn 22. a Pardon for no lesse than a million of yeares? Who can endure (since by their owne confession, this fire must last but till the conflagration of the World) that yet in one little Booke there should be tendred unto credulous poore soules, Pardons of but eleven thousand thousands of yeeres? What should wee make many words of this?
D There is now lying by me a worme-eaten Manu-script, with faire Rubrickes, in which, besides other absurd and blasphemous promises, there is power given to one little prayer to change the paines of hell (due perhaps to him that sayes it) into Purgatory; and after that againe, the paines of Purgatory into the joyes of Heaven: Bellarmine had Lib. de Indulg.
wisely respected his owne reputation, if hee had given his voice according to that which he confesseth to have beene the judgement of some others; That these like Buls were not given by the Popes, but lewdly devised by some of his base Questuaries for an advantage: But that which hee should excuse, hee defends. What ingenuity or shame is to bee expected of Jesuites? and how cleane hath an old Parrot (as hee said of old) forgotten the wand? Who may abide this unjust and inhumane acceptation of persons? that the wealthier sort may by their purses redeeme this holy treasure of the Church, and by money deliver the soules of themselves and their friends from this horrible Prison, while the needy Soule must bee still frying in that flame, without all hope of pardon, or mature relaxation, untill the very last Judgement day? Lastly, who can
E endure; that whils it is in the power of Christs Vicar to call miserable soules out of this tormenting fire (which hell it selfe is said to exceed onely in the continuance) yet that hee should suffer them to lie howling there, and most cruelly broyling still, and not mercifully bestow on them all the heapes of his treasure, as the spirituall ransome of so many distressed spirits? A wretched man is hee (as Ambrose said of the rich man) which Ambr. de Naboth.
hath the power to deliver so many soules from death, and wants the will: Why hath

God

God given him this faculty of Indulgences, if hee would not have it beneficiall to Mankinde? and where the Owner of the houſe will bee bountifull, it is not for the Steward to bee niggardly; Let that Circe of Rome keepe theſe huskes for her hogges.

Sect. XIII.

Concerning the diſtinction of Veniall and Mortall ſinnes.

PArdons doe both imply and preſuppoſe that knowne diſtinction of Mortall and Veniall ſinne, which neither hath God ever allowed, neither (whiles hee gainſayes it) will ever the Proteſtants: That there are certaine degrees of evill wee both acknowledge and teach; ſo as wee may here juſtly tax the diſhoneſty and ſhameleſneſſe of Campion, Dureus, Coccius, and the Monkes of Burdeaux, who have upbraided us with the opinion of a certaine Stoicall and Jovinianiſh parity of ſinnes: yea Bellarmine himſelfe hath already done this kinde office for us. Some offences are more hainous than other; yet all in the malignitie of their nature, deadly: As of poyſons, ſome kill more gently, and lingringly, others more violently and ſpeedily, yet both kill. Moreover, if wee have reſpect unto the infinite mercy of God, and to the object of this mercy, the penitent and faithfull heart, there is no ſinne, which (to borrow the word of Prudentius) is not veniall; but in reſpect of the Anomy or diſorder, there is no ſinne which is not worthy of eternall death. Every ſinne is a Viper; there is no Viper (if wee regard the nature of the beſt) but kils whom ſhee bites; but if one of them ſhall haply light upon the hand of Paul, ſhee is ſhaked into the fire, without harme done: Let no man feare that harmefull creature ever the leſſe, becauſe he ſees the Apoſtle ſafe from that poyſon. So is ſinne to a faithfull man; Saint Johns word is, All ſinne is (ἀνομία) Tranſgreſſion of the Law; Saint Pauls word is, The wages of ſinne is death; Put theſe two together, and this conceit of the naturall pardonableneſſe of ſin, vaniſhes alone.

1 Joh 3.4. Rom.6.

Our Rhemiſts (ſubtill men) can no more abide this propoſition converted, than themſelves: All ſinne indeed (ſay they) is anomia, a tranſgreſſion of the Law; but every tranſgreſſion of the Law is not ſinne: The Apoſtle therefore himſelfe turnes it for us: All unrighteouſneſſe (ſaith he) is ſinne: But every (ἀνομία) is unrighteouſneſſe, ſaith Auſten upon the place, for the Law is the rule of righteouſneſſe, therefore the prevarication of the Law is unrighteouſneſſe: Yea, their very owne word ſhall ſtop their owne mouth; for how is ſinne univocally diſtinguiſhed into Veniall and Mortall, if the Veniall bee no ſinne? and the wages of every ſinne is death. That therefore which the Papiſts preſume to ſay, that this kinde of ſinne deſerves pardon, in it ſelfe (unleſſe they will take the word merit, catachreſtically, with Stapleton:) And that which Bellarmine and Navarus adde, that Veniall ſinnes are not againſt, but beſide the Law: and laſtly, That which Franciſcus a Victoria writes, that a Biſhops bleſſing, or a Lords Prayer, or a knocke on the breſt, or a little holy water, or any ſuch like ſlight receipt, without any other good motion of the heart, is ſufficient to remit Veniall ſinne, is ſo ſhamefully abhorring from all piety, and juſtice, that theſe open bands, both of nature and ſinne, muſt be eternally defied of us. It is an old, and as true a rule, eaſineſſe of pardon gives incouragement to ſinne: And beſide, what manner of ſinnes doe they put in the ranke of Venials? Drunkenneſſe, adultery, angry curſes, or blaſphemies; covetouſneſſe: yea, ſtealing, lying, curſing of parents, (horrible offences) ſhroud themſelves (with them) under this plauſible title of veniall; He muſt needs be ſhameleſly wicked that abhorres not this licentiouſneſſe. Surely Socrates the Hiſtorian propheſied (I thinke) of theſe men: There are ſome (ſaith he) that let goe whoredome as an indifferent matter, which yet ſtrive for an holy-day, as for their life. The ordinarie, and not ſlight Controverſie (as Caſſander thinketh) of the name, nature, condition, puniſhment of the firſt ſin, as Chryſoſtome calls it, I willingly omit; Neither doe I meddle with their Evangelicall perfection of vowes, nor the dangerous ſervitude of their raſh and impotent Votaries, nor the inconveniences of their Monkerie: which yet are ſo great and many, that the elect Cardinals of Paul the third, doubted not with joynt conſent to affirme, All the Orders

Sect. XIIII.

Concerning the Canon of the Scripture.

NOw, (leſt I be too tedious) it is time for mee, from theſe points, which doe directly concerne our ſelves, to haſten unto thoſe which do more cloſely touch the Majeſtie of God, and doe, as it were, ſend plaine challenges into heaven. And thoſe do, either reſpect the Scripture which is his expreſſed word, or Chriſt which is his narurall and ſubſtantiall word, or laſtly, the worſhip due unto his Name.

And firſt, the Scripture complaines juſtly of three maine wrongs offered to it: The firſt, of addition to the Canon; The ſecond, of detraction from the ſufficiencie of it; The third, of hanging all the authoritie thereof upon the ſleeve of the Church; For of that corrupt Tranſlation of Scripture, which the Trent Divines have made onely and fully authenticall, I forbeare purpoſely to ſpeake; although it were eaſie to ſhew (that which Reuchline, following the ſteps of Hierome, hath averred) That the Hebrewes drinke of the Well-head; the Greekes of the ſtreame, and the Latines of the puddle: neither will I ſo much as touch the injurious inhibition of thoſe holy bookes, to the Laity. Who can endure a peece of new cloth to bee patched unto an old garment? Or what can follow hence, but that the rent ſhould bee worſe? Who can abide, that againſt the faithfull information of the Hebrewes, againſt the cleere Teſtimonies of Melito, Cyril, Athanaſius, Origen, Hilary, Hierom, Ruffinus, Nazianzen, againſt their owne Doctors both of the middle, and lateſt age, ſix whole bookes ſhould, by their fatherhoods of Trent, be under pain of a curſe, imperiouſly obtruded upon God & his Church? Wherof yet, ſome propoſe to their Readers, no better than magicall jugglings, others bloudy ſelfe-murders, other lying fables, and others heatheniſh rites, not without a publike applauſe in the relation: Theſe indeed, Cajetan, ingenuouſly, as his faſhion is, (according to that hee had learned of Hierome) would perſwade us to have beene admitted onely by the Ancients, into the Canon of Manners, not of Faith. And ſurely there be many precepts in Syracides, the counterfeit Salomon, and Eſdras, which ſavour of excellent wiſedome; but I wonder what kinde of good manners can bee learned from ſuch like hiſtories, even by thoſe Novices, to whom Athanaſius bequeaths theſe bookes! Well may I ſay of theſe, as that Chian ſervant of his Maſter, (which ſold his wine, and drank his lees) while they have good, they ſeeke for naught: But let theſe bookes (how queſtionable ſoever to Epiphanius) bee all ſacred, let them bee (according to the meaning of the councell of Carthage, and of Auſten ſo oft cited, to this purpoſe) after Canonicall; yet what man or Angel dare preſume to undertake to make them divine? Wee know full well, how great impietie it is to father upon the God of heaven the weake conceptions of an humane wit; neither can we be any whit moved with the idle cracke of the Tridentine curſe, whiles wee here God thundring in our eares, If any man adde unto theſe words, God ſhall adde unto him the plagues written in this booke.

Of the Insufficiencie of Scripture.

NEither know I, whether it be more wickedly audacious, to faſten on God thoſe things which he never wrote, or to weaken the authority, and denie the ſufficiencie of what he hath written: The Papiſts doe both. We affirme (ſaith Bellarmine) that there is not expreſſely contained in Scriptures, all neceſſary doctrine, either concerning faith, or manners: And the Tridentine Fathers gave charge, that Traditions be received with no leſſe Pietie and Veneration, than the Bookes of Scripture.

Lib. 4. de verbo non ſcripto, c. 30. ſect. 1. Pari veneratione, pari pietatis affectu.

Unwritten Truths (ſaith our wittie Chancellour, More) are equivalent to the Word of God: What place is there for peace? There are we confeſſe, certaine things of a middle nature, indifferent rites, wherein much muſt bee yeelded to the Church, much to Traditions: but that thoſe things which are ſimply neceſſary to ſalvation (whether to bee knowne, or to be done) ſhould not be found in the holy Scriptures, either in their words or in their ſenſe, as Aquinas diſtinguiſhes, wee juſtly hold abſurd, and with Eraſmus, contrary to all true divinitie: Some conſtitutions for publike order, are from the Church; but all neceſſary determinations of faith, are to bee fetcht from the voyce of God; This is as Niſſen truly commends it, the right and even rule of life: The law of God is perfect, ſaith David; yea, and makes perfect, ſaith Paul: And what can be added to that which is already perfect? or what perfection can there bee, where ſome neceſſary points are wanting; yea, (if wee may beleeve Hoſius) the greateſt part?

Διανοητικῶς. Incan. Nic. Græc. cod. Piſan. Binnius Conc. Tom. 1.

How much is the Spirit of God miſ-taken? Hee wrote theſe things that wee might beleeve, and in beleeving bee ſaved; But now (if Trent may be judge) although we beleeve what he hath written, yet we cannot be ſaved, unleſſe we doe alſo receive, and beleeve what hee hath not written: How ill was Conſtantine taught of old? how ill adviſed, in that publike ſpeech? for which yet we doe not find that any of thoſe Worthies of Nice, did ſo much as jogge him on the elbow, in a milde reproofe, whiles hee ſayd, The bookes of the Evangeliſts & Apoſtles, as alſo the Oracles of the Ancient Prophets doe plainly inſtruct us in the meſſage and meaning of God? How miſerably were every one of the learned Fathers of the Church blinded, that they could never, either ſee or acknowledge any other rule of faith? And what ſhall we ſay? Did God envie unto mankinde the full revelation of his will in the perpetuall monuments of his written word? Or did hee not thinke it expedient to lay up all neceſſary doctrines in the common ſtore-houſe of Truths (as Rocheſter cals it?) Or, is that perhaps more uncertaine, which is faithfully committed to writting, than that which is carried about by the flying rumors of men, and by this ayrie conveiance derived unto Poſteritie? What a thing is it (as Irenæus wiſely ſaid) that we ſhould leave the voyce of the Lord, and his Apoſtles, and attend to theſe tatlers, that talke never a true word? Or if this be fitting, how vainly have you ſpent your labors, O all yee Regiſters of God, Prophets, Apoſtles, Evangeliſts? and as he ſaid of the ointment, To what purpoſe was all this waſte? Theſe Paradoxes are pernicious to the Church, and ſhamefully derogatory from the glory, both of the wiſdome, and goodneſſe of God: Hold theſe who dare. Surely, we can never abide that thoſe two markes of Heretikes which Irenæus long ſince ſet downe (namely, not to reſt in the bare authority of Scripture, and to vaunt of other Traditions) ſhould both of them be juſtly branded on our ſides.

Of the authority of Scripture.

BUt this is yet moſt ſhamefully injurious, to denie unto the Word of God, credit of it ſelfe; and ſo to hang the Scriptures upon the Church, that they muſt needs begge all their authority from the voices of men. Honeſt Eckius in his reviſed, and corrected Enchiridion: The Scripture (ſaith he) is not authenticall without the authoritie of the Church: To which as ſome golden and oracular ſentence, there is added in the margin, a glorious and inſulting applauſe, An Achilles for the Catholiks. A passe the blasphemies of Hermannus, and Hosius, perhaps (as Iunius construes it) in the name of Swinkfeldius: I passe over the horrible impiety of that shameless glosse, which teaches, that Salomons Text borrows his credit from the Popes canonization: Bellarmine alone shall speak for all; who going about to support the number of seven Sacraments, by the authority of the Tridentine Councell (for this is ever their last hold:) The strength (saith he) of all the Ancient Councels, and of all opinions, depends upon the authority of the present Church; And a little before, If we take away the authority of the present Church, and of the present Councell (of Trent) the decrees of all other Conucels, and the whole Christian faith may be called into doubt, and question. O miserable, and miserably staggaring soules of the Papists! How many, not persons only, but whole kingdomes, and those (as the Romanists themselves confesse, and bewaile) mighty and flourishing, amongst themselves, do yet still resolutely reject all the authority of that Tridentine Councell? The whole Christian faith? All doctrines and opinions? What, even those which are written by the finger of God? those that are indited by the holy Ghost? What is this else, but to make God a slave to men; and to arraigne the Maker of heaven and earth, at the bar of humane judgement? God will be God; the Scripture of God will be it selfe, in spight of Rome, Trent, Hell: And unlesse we hold this, we can have no peace with God; unlesse we deny it, no peace with the Romanists.

SECTION XVII.

Concerning Transubstantiation.

C THese errors concerne the Scriptures; those which follow, concerne either Christs person, or his offices: I let passe that idle brabble, (as Bellarmine himselfe judges it) which the Popish Censors have unjustly raised about the Sons Godhead of himselfe; and insist upon waightier quarrels; I would that exploded opinion of Transubstantiation, and (which is the root of it) the Multi-presence of Christs body, did not utterly overthrow the truth of his Humanity. Good God! Is it possible (as Averroes jested of old) that Christians should make themselves a God of bread? That any reasonable man can beleeve, that Christ carried his owne body in one of his hands, that he raught it forth to be eaten by those holy ghests of his, which saw him present with them, and heard him speaking to them, both whiles they were eating him and when they had eaten the sacred morsell? That the selfe same Son of man should at once both devour his whole selfe, and yet should sit whole and entire at the Table with them? That the glorious body of Christ should be carried through the unclean passages of our maws; and either be there turned into the substance of our body; or (contrary to that the Spirit said of old, Thou shalt not suffer thine holy one to see corruption) should be subject D to putrifaction, or vanish to nothing, or returne into that heaven wherin it was, ere it returned, while it returned: or lastly, should be eaten with Mice (devout and holy Vermine) or perhaps mixed with poison, to the Receiver? What Monsters of follies are these? How mad, yea, how impious is this obstinacy of fooolish men, that they will over-turne the very principles of nature, the order of things, the Humanity of their Saviour, the truth of the Sacrament, the constant judgement of Scripture, and lastly, the very foundations of all Divinity; and confusedly jumble Heaven & Earth together, rather than they will (where necessity requires it) admit but of a tropicall kind of speech, in our Saviours consecration; whiles in the mean time, the whole Reverend Senate of the Fathers cries out, and redoubles the names of Symboles, Types, Signes, Representation, Similitude, Figures, and what-ever word may import a borrowed sense; notwithstanding all the indignation of Heaven, all the scorne of Pagans, all the Reluctation of the Church? This letter killeth, as Origen truly speakes: Now what likelyhood is E there, here, of agreement? That the true body of Christ is truly offered, and truly received in the Sacrament, which of us hath not ever constantly taught, and defended? But how is this? not by any bodily touch, as Cyril & Ambrose say well, but by our faith. That it should be Corporally, Carnally, Orally present, & torn in pieces with our teeth (as good Pope Nicholas caused Berengarius to say, & our Allen hath followed him unbidden) hath ever seemed impious to us, and (as Austen judges it) no lesse than flagitious.

We like well yet the ingenuitie of Arius Montanus, in this point; who upon Luk. 22. This is my body (saith hee) that is, My Bodie is Sacramentally contained in this Sacrament of Bread; and straight he ads (like another Nicodemus, Christs nightly Disciples) The secret and most misticall manner wherof, God will once vouchsafe, more cleerly to unfold to his Christian Church: Thus he: In the meane time, for us; this prodigious conceit of Transubstantiation, which alone containes in it as many absurd errors, as there have bin minutes of time, from the first forming of it (that is, from the Councell of Lateran) untill this houre, can look to be entertained no otherwise at our hand, than as such a Devillish fancie deserveth, with hatred, and execration.

SECTION XVIII.

Concerning the Multi-presence of Christs body.

BUt this sleeveless tale of Transubstantiation, was surely brought both into the world, and upon the stage, by that other Fable of the Multi-presence of Christs body: neither know I, whether I should prefer for madnes, and sophisticall coozenage. That the same body of Christ should be in a thousand places at once of this sublunary World, whiles yet it is in the mean time intire in Heaven; That the whole body of Christ should lie hid in a little thin Wafer, yet so, that the parts and members thereof should not one run into another, but continue distinct, and severally disposed among themselves, and have a shape and order agreeable to a mans body (which are Bellarmines owne words) it doth not only exceed reason, but faith: Neither do they say now (as of old) Behold, here is Christ, or there; but (which is much worse) Behold, Christ is both here, and there; That received Axiom of the Schools is of an eternall Truth; The numericall unity of a finite thing cannot stand without continuity. Who can choose but be ashamed of the Jesuits here? The very places in which Christs body is, (saith Bellarmine) are discontinued; yea, and the body of Christ it selfe is divided from it selfe, in respect of place, but not in respect of his proper substance, or quantity; As if there could be any division of a materiall substance, but by bounds of place? As if quantity were not both bounded, and measured by place alone? As if there were not an undoubted relation of the place to the thing placed: But now, this doth not belong to Christ only. S. Xavier, in our Age (one of Loyalaes brood) was seen at once, both in the Ship, and in the Boat: Turselian reports it; unto this fabulous Saint, and his Fellow-fabuler, the Reporter, I cannot devise to set a better match, than that Plautine Amphitryo: Darest thou say, thou fond Slave, that which never man yet saw (nor indeed can be done) that one man should at the same time, be in two places at once?

How far wide is Aquinas (the honour of the Schools) which saith, By the same ground or reason that an Angell might be in two places, he might be in as many as you will? See now either Xavier is every where, or else the carcasse of a Frier is more subtill than the nature of an Angell. To conclude, either Aquinas is false, or the Papists Ubiquitaries. How over-bold are the Jesuits, the Patrons of this Multi-presence? Bellarmine, scorning the modesty of Thomas, Egidius, Carthusian, Capreolus; Because (saith hee) we think that the body of Christ may be in many places at once, locally, and visibly, therfore we say, and hold, that the some body may be circumscriptively and definitively in more places at once: For, that a body may be circumscriptively in any place, nothing is required, but that it be fitly measured unto that place: So as the bounds of the place and the thing placed, be both together; but, it is not required; that it should not bee else-where, as in an another place: Thus he: What an absurd opposition is this? To bee circumscribed in one place, and yet to bee other-where; That the bounds of the place, and the thing placed should be but one, and the places a thousand; that a thing should bee fitly commeasured by one place, and yet bee in almost infinite; That another remote place should lesse hinder circumscription, than a part of the next place; What is to be mad, if this be to bee wise? Who cannot but laugh at the wise folly of these men, as Iræneus said of the Valentinians?

Sapientem stultitiam, Iræn. li. 1. cap. 9.

But I willingly heare that of Chrysostome; To conceive of divine things by Philosophy, is no other, than to take out a red-hot Iron with our fingers, and not with tongs.

And,

A And, that of Auguſtine, Yeeld God able to doe ſomething, which thou art not able to underſtand; It is reported that Ariſtotle miſ-led Ætius the heretik, into that filthy error of Arrius; and Tertullian hath taught us, that all Hereſies are ſuborned by Philoſophy. What hath Athens to do with Hieruſalem: the Academy with the Church? Away with Arguments where faith is in queſtion, as Thomas ingenuouſly ſaies out of Ambroſe; But what is all this to us? It is well yet, and I doe heartily congratulate it to our men, that the idle tale of Surius concerning Melanthon, and Carloſtadius & other Proteſtants, abandoning of all Philoſophy (wherwith yet Binius pleaſed himſelfe of late) is thus hiſſed out of countenance, and vaniſhed; Belike now, the reformed Doctors are Philoſophers, but too much: For us, we do eaſily grant that many things are done, which we cannot underſtand; but theſe things we grant not, becauſe we underſtand they cannot be done: God hath abſolute power (as Thomas ſpeaks truly) over the whole nature of B the creature; but not ſo, as that he ſhould cauſe it to be, and not to be, at once; This (as Sadeel ſaies wittily) Deus potenter non poteſt: The object of Gods power (as the Ieſuites Schoole willingly confeſſes) is whatſoever implies not a contradiction in it ſelfe; Now, that the ſelfe ſame body ſhould ſit downe, and not ſit downe; ſhould be viſible and inviſible; diviſible and continued, and yet diſcontinued and indiviſible; To be all here, to be all elſewhere; to be here greater, there leſſe: To be one, and many; the ſame, and divers; to depart, and not to depart; to be contained in Heaven, and not to be contained; to be a quantily without ſpace, to be meaſured by, and fitted to a place, and not to take up any place; To be accidents, and yet not to be inherent; To be formerly, yet to be made; To be made, and not to be made; To be otherwiſe in places, than in a place, To be a true body, and yet to be ſpirtually; That Boy were well worthy of whipping, that cannot diſcerne and confeſſe manifeſt contradictions. But what doe I ſpend time C in this thorny Diſcourſe? This one word ſhall ſhut, and ſumme up all; That this wicked paire of opinions offers plaine violence to the true humanity of Chriſt; neither can ever, Salvâ fide, be reconciled with the Evangelicall Truth.

Section XIX.

Concerning the Sacriſice of the Maſſe.

THe Prieſtly Office of Chriſt is not a little impeached by the dayly Oblation of the Miſſall Sacrifice, and the number of Mediators. For the firſt: That in this Sacred Supper there is a Sacrifice (in that ſenſe wherein the Fathers ſpoke) none of us ever doubted: but that is then, either Latreuticall (as B. Harmine diſtinguiſhes it not ill) or Euchariſticall: That is here (as Chryſoſtome ſpeakes) a remembrance D of a Sacrifice, that is, as Auguſtine interprets it, a Memoriall of Chriſts Paſſion, celebrated in the Church; and from this ſweet commemoration of our Redemption, there ariſes another Sacrifice, the Sacrifice of praiſe; and from thence a true Peace-offering of the Chriſtian ſoule; Theſe three Sacrifices offer themſelves to us here; but for any propitiatory Sacrifice, unleſſe it bee (as the Gloſſe interprets it) repreſentively, I find none, none Eſſentiall; none (as the Tridentines labour to perſwade) true and proper; neither indeed can there be. For, what? Doth the Prieſt offer the ſame that Chriſt hath offered, or another? If another; then not propitiatory; for onely Chriſt is our Propitiation: If the ſame; then not an unbloudy Sacrifice; for Chriſts Sacrifice was a bloudy one; Then, the naturall Being of Chriſt ſhould againe bee deſtroyed; Then, the bloud of the Mediator (which I abhorre to imagine) muſt bee of a finite value and power: yea, Chriſt himſelfe did not ſacrifice on the Table, but on the Croſſe; For if E the Sacrifice, which he offered in his Supper, were perfect, and fully propitiatory, what needed he to die afterward? wherefore was his bloud ſhed upon the Croſſe, which by his Tranſubſtantiated bloud (not yet ſhed) had formerly redeemed the World? But if it be unbloudy, then it is not propitiatory: for without ſhedding of blood (ſaith the Apoſtle) is no remiſſion. Or what oppoſition is there betwixt the order of Melchiſedec and Aaron, betwixt Chriſt and the Prieſts of the old Law; if this Office doe equally paſſe, and deſcend in a long Pedigree of mortall Succeſſors? Or why were the legall Sacrifies of the Jewiſh Synagogue ſo oft repeated, but becauſe they were not perfect?

Trid. Con. Seſſ. 22.

Heb. 9. 22.

and how can, or why ſhould that which is moſt abſolutely perfect, be reiterated?

To conclude, what can either be ſpoken or conceived more plaine, than thoſe words of God, Once Offered, One Sacrifice, One Oblation? And yet theſe Popiſh Shavelings (Devout men) take upon them to crucifie, and ſacrifice Chriſt againe; and whiles they ſolemnly offer the Sonne of God up unto his Father, they humbly beſeech him, (in a religious blaſphemy) that he would be pleaſed to bleſſe, and accept that Oblation. It is not for us, I confeſſe, to be ſo devout: We will remember this holy Sacrifice of Chriſt (as Caſſander well advices) and celebrate it with a thankfull heart, wee will not repeat it; we will gladly receive our Saviour, offered by himſelfe, to his Father, and offered to us by his Father, we will not offer him to his Father: which one point whiles wee ſtick at (as we needs muſt) we are ſtraight ſtricken with the Thunderbolt of the Anathema of Trent: Here can be therefore no poſſibilitie of peace.

SECTION XX.

Of the Number of Mediators, and the Invocation of Saints.

IT doth not more belong to the Prieſthood of Chriſt, that he offered himſelfe once for us (a ſpotleſſe Sacrifice) upon the Altar of his Croſſe, than that he daily offers to his Father, the incenſe of our Praiers, on the Altar of Heaven. As therfore many Sacrifices, ſo many Mediators, plainly ſeem to put Chriſt out of office. Neither indeed hath the number of Interceſſors more increaſed in this old Age of the World, than the impietie of imploring them: For the modeſter judgement of the former Schools, ſo framed to it ſelfe a diſtinction of Mediation, that it challenged one kinde thereof as proper onely to Chriſt, thinking the other might be imparted unto Saints: but our late Doctors (wilfully breaking the bars both of Logicke and Divinity) have raſhly inchroched upon all the Offices of a Mediator; and whatſoever might by any right belong to an Agent for peace, all that (if not more) have they attributed to the Saints. Hereupon one ſaies to the bleſſed Virgin, O Savioreſſe, ſave me: Another, Obtaine thou pardon, apply grace, prepare glorie for me. Others (if we may beleeve Caſſander) famous Divines have ſaid, That God hath tranſlated one halfe of his Kingdome, which conſiſts of Mercy to the bleſſed Virgin Mary; reſerving the other halfe of Juſtice, to himſelfe: Others, that we may appeale from the Bar of Gods Juſtice, to Maries Court of Mercy; Others have ſo compared their Francis with Chriſt, that (I tremble to ſpeake it) whether of theſe was the typicall Ieſus, might ſeem queſtionable to the Reader: Heare the holy Muſe of Turſelline;

FRANCIS that was, ſhall now be CHRIST to thee,
And ſoone after,
And CHRIST that was, Saint FRANCIS now ſhall be.

Qui Franciſcus erat, jam tibi Chriſtus erit. Iam Franciſcus erit, qui modo Chriſtus erat.

Hen. Steph. Apol. Herod. Fox. in Martyr.

O Tongue worthy to bee cut out of that blaſphemous mouth (as Hierome ſaid of his Vigilantius) and made into gobbets! Neither hath this impious Paraſite, or his Sedulius done more for their Stigmaticall Francis, than the holy Archbiſhop Antonius hath done for his Dominick; in an emulation of blaſphemie: There wants nothing (that I can ſee) but that everlaſting Goſpell of the Friers: and it wanted not much (if Hiſtories ſay true) of prevailing;

Martial.

Oh, what mad gownes have ſwaid the Romane State!
as their Poets ſaid of old:

Others have ſacrilegiouſly turned Letanies, Creeds, Pſalters, and what ever God meant to honour himſelfe by, unto the name of the holy Virgin: And I would to God this were onely the private miſ-devotion of ſome ſuperſtitious old wife, or ſome idle and ſilly Cloyſterer: Faine would our charitie conceive ſo; which is ſtill credulous, and (as the Apoſtle commands) thinks not evill; if Caſſander did not directly tell us, that they publikely ſing in their very Churches this devout Antheme, O fœlix puerpera Noſtra plans ſcelera. Iure matris impera Redemptori.

O happy Mother of that Sonne
Which haſt all our ſins fordone;
Out of a Mothers right, we pray thee
Bid our Redeemer to obey thee.

If all theſe were not openly approved by the holy Cenſors of the Romane Church

A Church (ſevere Controulers of manners) yea, by the voices of their owne Popes: If at this day (witneſſe the Muſes of Bencius, and Bonarcius) the Jeſuites did not both ſpeake and write thus: But let us leave theſe bold impieties (if you will) to their Bernardines, Antonines, Bartlemewes of Piſa, Turcellines; bring us foorth their more ſober Divines, Polydores, Caſſanders, Vives: Even their opinions will not downe with us, which teach that the Saints are in any wiſe to bee prayed unto. Indeed the Proteſtants ſay (as Bellarmine grants) that the Saints pray for us; but, onely in a generality: Bucer ſaid truly, that the Saints have great love to their militant brethren; great deſire of their ſalvation; and ſo doubtleſſe have the Angels: But muſt we therefore ſingle out any one of thoſe bleſſed Spirits to ayd us, to ſue for us in the Court of Heaven? GOD forbid: for upon what faith muſt theſe prayers of ours bee grounded? unleſſe perhaps (as Hoſius ſaith) wee muſt beleeve in the B Saints alſo? yea, how ſure are we, that none of the Saints can either ſearch the heart, the fountaine of our Prayers, or at once heare ten thouſand of their Suppliants, diſtant in place from each other; yea further, if (as there ſhould bee no limits ſet to Religion) all the world over, devout Clients ſhould at once jointly commend, and proſtrate themſelves humbly to ſome one Saint; it is not a ſwiftneſſe of nature (as Hierom contends) that would ſerve the turne; a true ubiquity (as Bellarmine confeſſes) muſt bee required to the hearing of all thoſe prayers: What hinders now but that they, which of ſinfull men have made Saints, ſhould of their Saints make Gods alſo? Beſides, which of the Prophets, which of the Apoſtles ever commanded this? which of the Saints of the former world hath ever done it? Or what other (if credit may bee given to Theodoret) did Saint Paul forbid, under the worſhip of Angels to his Coloſsians? Or what was the Hereſie of the Collyridians, if this muſt goe for piety? That rule of Epiphanius ſhall bee ever a ſafe courſe for us: Let Mary bee honoured; but the Father, Son, and C Holy Ghoſt worſhipped: Here is no feare of danger, but that wee may goe ſafely to that GOD, which cals us to him; and proſtrate our ſelves to his Chriſt, our Gracious Sauiour: None of the Saints can enuy God this Honour: none of them ever did either arrogate it to himſelfe, or ſuffer it to bee given him: Neither is there any of them whom God ever allowed either to take it to himſelfe, or to impart it to others, or to accept it quietly, being imparted to him by others: The Papiſts therefore may come to us, when they will, with ſafety and advantage; wee may not yeeld to them, without manifeſt danger of Idolatrous dotage.

Of the Superſtitious, Heatheniſh, and ridiculous worſhip of the Papiſts.

D But if any good natured Reconciler ſhall bee ſo indifferent, as to thinke theſe weightie points of difference not to bee ſo hainous, but that every one might ſecretly maintaine what opinion hee liſt, yet ſo, that (as Conſtantine ſaid to Alexander and Arrius) whiles the minds differ, the outward peace may be preſerved; Let him further underſtand, that the continuall practice of the religious worſhip, and ſervice of God, will ever both raiſe and proclaime no leſſe hoſtilitie, than matter of judgement: In our devotions and publike exerciſes of Pietie, and places conſecrated to this uſe, there is nothing that can offend either the eye, or the mind of a Papiſt; except the bareneſſe of our walls, and the Apoſtolicall ſimplicity of Ceremonies: An eaſie fault; and ſuch, as it is no praiſe of their ingenuitie to winke at; For, long ſince have thoſe clauſes of our publike Liturgie beene purpoſely blotted out, which in our Grand-fathers dayes did but lightly touch this galled ſore of Poperie.

Socrat. l. 2. cap. 40

E But contrariwiſe, in the Popiſh Churches, there is ſcarce any thing either ſaid, or done, whereof wee can with a cleere and unwounded conſcience, bee either partakers or witneſſes: Their very walls kill us dead; but their ridiculous or demonicall ſervice, who can endure? Wee honour (as wee ought) the deare and happy memory of the Saints: and chiefly, the Leader of that heavenly Quire, the bleſſed Virgin, the Mother of GOD; and whatſoever ſhee can thinke, not to diſhonourable to her ſelfe, and her Lord, and Saviour, we will moſt gladly give it her to the full: Neither will we only glorifie GOD in his Saints (as Auguſtine hath taught Durand to ſpeake) but wee will magnifie the Saints (as opportunity ſerves) for their excellent graces, and worthy acts both in GOD and in themſelves; wee will admire, extoll, and (what wee may) imitate their ſingular conſtancie, faith, ſanctitie; as Sidonius ſaid of his Claudian,

No Tombe can either Soule or glory ſhroud.

Sidon. in Epit. Claud. Mamert.

But, to digge up their holy bones (that I may borrow Luthers word) out of their quiet graves, and to fall downe before theſe wormeaten Monuments of the Saints; to expect from them a divine power, whether of cure, or of ſanctification; equally to reſpect Francis his Coule, Annaes Combe, Ioſephs Breeches, Thomaſes Shooe (as Eraſmus complaines) with the Sonne of God himſelfe, can ſeeme no better to us, than an horrible impiety: Neither can wee abide, either to deifie men, or to canonize beaſts; It ſeemes, that Cardinall could abide it well, in whoſe Garden is yet to bee ſeene this Epitaph, which hee wrote upon his too-dearly-beloved Bitch:

Pome. Illuſtr. Poet. Italorum.

This Tombe for thee (deare Bitch) I builded have,
That worthier wert of Heaven, than a Grave.

Mores in Scot. Orig. Pap.

Wee (prophane Huguenots) cannot skill of worſhipping Martins Boots, or Georges Scabbard, or Crispins Paring-knife; or (which they ſay is kept in a certaine Towne of Liguria) the Tayle of that aſſe, which Chriſt rode upon: or Roches Dogge, or Antonies Swine; and ſurely, hee had neede of a very thicke Hide, that can doe this.

But, in earneſt, ſay wee ſhould yeeld theſe adorations to bee lawfull, and godly: What Marcarius (amongſt ſo many woods of counterfeit trees) can ſhew us the true Croſſe? or what Helena amongſt ſuch heaps, yea, Hils of Iron, can ſhew us the true nayles? Aſſuredly both theſe Iugglers ſmile one upon another, while they ſhew theſe Relikes to their people; and now, even the ſilly vulgar begins (not without indignation) to diſcrie this coozenage. To omit therefore theſe ridiculous tricks, and knauiſh conveyances of their ſhavelings; let us in this caſe, appeale even to Caſſanders owne moderation; who (having firſt honeſtly acknowledged the ancient complaints of Baſil, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, about the buſineſſe of theſe abuſes) goes on thus: It appeares (ſaith he) that in the latter times there hath beene too much given to the Relikes and Monuments of the Saints. So as even good men, and thoſe which were zealouſly deuout, were growne to that paſſe, that they placed the ſumme of all Religion, in gathering together the Relikes of the Saints, and in garniſhing them richly with Gold and Pearles, and building ſumptuous Chappels and Temples to them: And againe, thoſe that were lewd and godleſſe, put all their confidence (though vaine and falſe) in the fooliſh and ſuperfluous worſhip of Relikes: wherefore in the Councell of Cabilon, thoſe are reproved, who in a pretence of devotion, goe on Pilgrimage to Rome, or Turon, or any other like places, as if they thought, that the frequenting of theſe holy Shrines, could both purge them from ſinne, and licence them to ſinne with impunitie. And unto this, yet another miſchiefe hath beene added, that for covetouſneſſe ſake to intice the ſimple people, falſe-Relikes have beene deviſed, and fained Miracles reported; and by thoſe Miracles, the Superſtition of the multitude was ſo fed, that they were rather taken up with an admiration of the wonders, then drawne to an holy imitation of the Saints: and many times by the ſubtletie, and illuſion of the Devill, (abuſing the ſuperſtition of men) new Relikes were, by Dreames and Viſions, revealed to the World, and by the operation of the ſame Devill, Miracles ſeemed to be wrought, for the confirmation thereof: Thus ſaith Caſſander, like a true German, ſhall I ſay? or like a true Iſraelite? But wee that have beene better taught, dare freely, and confidently ſay of our-ſelves, as Hierom profeſſed of old, in the name of all Chriſtians: So farre are wee from adoring the Relikes of Martyrs, that wee worſhip neither Sunne, nor Moone, nor Angels, nor Archangels, Cherubin, nor Seraphin, nor any name that is named either in the preſent World, or the future; leſt wee ſhould ſerve the creature, rather than the Creator which is bleſſed for ever.

Caſſ. Conſult. de Reliq. Sanct.

Hier. ad Riparin aduerſ. Vigil.

The

A Then, that from Relikes wee may deſcend to Images: Is it poſſi ble that wee ſhould not bee ever diſpleaſed with that franticke ſuperſtition of the Romiſh Church? That againſt the Tables of Gods Law, againſt the Inſtitutions of the Apoſtles, againſt the practiſe of the ancient Church, againſt the manifeſt Decrees of Councels, againſt the cleere Teſtimonies of Fathers, in defiance of God, and men, the Churches of Chriſtians ſhould bee no leſſe peſtered with Idols, than the Temples of the Heathen? That (as Ierome complained of old) the native beavtie of the Church ſhould bee polluted with the filth of Paganiſme? That (which Euſebius juſtly taxeth of madneſſe) there ſhould be a viſible and bodily Image or repreſentation made of the Inviſible and Spirituall God? That wee ſhould put our confidence in Agnis Dei, Graines, Tapers, Roſes, Swords, Enſignes, Bels, ridiculouſly (after their manner) inchanted? That by certaine Magicall Exorciſmes, the Devill ſhould be driven out of thoſe Creatures, wherein hee never was? Nay: let us even enter into league with Satan himſelfe, if B wee ſhall give either allowance, or connivence to ſuch Diabolicall practiſes of will-worſhip.

Hier. Magno Oratori Rom.

Lib. Sacr. Cerem.

I doe purpoſely forbeare to ſpeake of that prophane paradox of the ſufficiencie of the outward worke done, without good inward diſpoſitions; the idle mumbling up of Prayers, in a forraine tongue: the number and vertue of Sacraments, the Sacrilegious mutilation of the Euchariſt, and a thouſand other Monſters, both Opinions, and ceremonies: Theſe that I have reckoned, are errors more than enow: And I would to God, thoſe which wee have here particularized, were not ſuch, that there is no remedy, but that wee muſt needs eternally fall out either with God, or with Rome. Sinee therefore neither Truth can ever yeeld, nor Obſtinacy will yeeld; let us ſerve cheerfully under the colours of our Heavenly Leader, and both proclaime and maintaine an unreconcilable warre with theſe Romiſh Hereſies.

Section XXII.

Of the Impoſſibility of the Meanes of Reconciliation.

And now, ſince no wiſe man can ſuſpect of us, that wee will ever grow to that height of madneſſe, as to runne perfidiouſly from the Standard of God, to the Tents of that Roman Antichriſt; Is there any hope, that the Papiſts will ever be drawne backe to the ſound and pure judgement of the Primitive Antiquity? Oh, that God would vouchſafe this grace to the Chriſtan World, that wee could but comfort our ſelves with the hope of ſo great happineſſe!

What a ſight were this how pleaſant, how worthy of God and his Angels, that (as it is ſaid of the Novatian Faction, and the Orthodoxe of old) men, women, children of D both parts, without all guile, and cloſe harbours of diſcontentment, ſhould mutually bring ſtones and matter to the building up of this Temple of another (yet true) Reſurrection! We will gladly ſpeake unto them, and (if need bee) upon our knees in Cyprians words; Sithence we may not come forth of the ſound and true Church of God, and come unto you; Let us beſeech and intreat you, by whatſoever ſhould bee moſt deare unto you, that you would returne to our fraternity, and into the boſome of that Mother-Church, whence yee are revolted: and as hee ſaid in Theocritus, yet at laſt bee perſwaded: we are both brothers of one blood; why will you needs fight more againſt your ſelves, than your bretheren?

But alas, ſooner may God create a new Rome, than reforme the old: Yea needes muſt that Church put off it ſelfe, and ceaſe to be what it is, ere it can begin to be once againe what it was: for (as the Comicke Poet ſaid in the like) both ſubſtance, credit, fame, vertue, honour, have at once forſaken her; and by long diſ-uſe have left her worſe than naught: neither doe I ſee how theſe houſes can be repaired, but they muſt be pulled downe to the very foundations, and then built from the ground. E

Plaut. Moſtellar. Simul enim res, fides, fama, virtus, decuſq; deſeruerunt; atque ipſa in vſu. Facta eſt nimio nequior, nec videor mihi, &c.

But if there be any likelihood of remedie, yet to bee hoped for; ſurely, it muſt needs come either from her ſelfe, or from others. Can it bee firſt from her ſelfe, which obſtinately defends her errors, not onely with tongue and pen, but with fire and ſword too? which will not yeeld ſo much as that ſhee can erre? which refuſed to amend thoſe notorious torious abuſes, which by the moderate verdict of her elect Cardinals, were condemned? and laſtly, which by the palpable flatteries of her laſt and worſt Paraſites the Jeſuites, is growne not ſecure onely, but prouder than ever ſhee was? Can it be then from others? How oft hath this beene indevoured in vaine? Rome may bee ſacked and battered (as it hath often beene) by militarie forces; but purged by admonitions, conjunctions, cenſures, it will neuer bee. I remember on this occaſion what Siſinnius the Lector adviſed Biſhop Nectarius in the like caſe: That hee had ever found diſputations ſo farre from reconciling of Schiſmes, that they are ſtill wont to inflame the minds of heretiks to ſuffer contention. What then? Can it bee from her ſelfe and others? Alas, how ſhould it? unleſſe either others had power, or her ſelfe had will to bee redreſſed. For certainly if there be any one ſparke of good hope yet alive, it muſt be in the ayd and determination of a generall Councell; and ſuch a Synod is no leſſe impoſſible, than reconciliation it ſelfe. For who ſhall call it? who ſhall ſit Preſident in it? who ſhall bee preſent, and give their voices? What ſhall bee the rule of the deciſions? what the order of execution? Let them bring forth (if they will) the ſiſter, or the daughter of that their Tridentine aſſembly, who can hold from ſmiles and ſcorne? Forſooth they would deale with us (as Luther wittily jeſted of the ſummoning of this Councell by Paul the third) much like unto them that mocke an hungry dogge with a cruſt and a knife; who inſtead of giving him the bread, let him feele the haft: well may we reſolve with Nazianzen, to avoid all ſuch meetings of Biſhops, for that no ſuch Synod ever did good, but tended rather to the decay than advantage of the Church: I remember Iſidore derives the Latine word Concilium, a ciliis oculorum: for that all direct the ſight of their mindes into one center. There can therefore bee no Councell held by thoſe which profeſſe a generall and publike diſagreement of judgement: In vaine ſhould wee indevour any ſuch courſe, unleſſe every one of them would reſolve to thinke of peace at home, and would perſwade his heart, laying aſide all prejudice, and wilfull reſpects of faction, ingenuouſly to ſubmit himſelfe to the truth when it once appeares, and more to regard their ſoules, than their eſtates: For can wee thinke it equall (as things now ſtand) that the ſame parties ſhould be allowed, witneſſes, plaintiffes, defendants, Judges in their owne cauſe? Or ſhall wee perhaps hope, that thoſe privileges whch have hitherto been trecherouſly and tyrannically uſurped by Papiſts, will now, upon better adviſement, be ingenuouſly given up by them, and renounced? or, that they will, now at laſt, thunder and lighten Anathemaes againſt their owne heads? Some fooles may hope for this, which are unacquainted with that old verſe ſo common in the mouth and pen of Lipſius, Moribus antiquis Reſtat Romana, viriſq;.

But for us (unleſſe Hee doth wonders alone, by his ſtretched-out arme from heaven, ſhould mightily beyond all hope, effect this) we know too well that it cannot bee done: Onely this one thing (which God hath promiſed) wee doe verily expect, to ſee the day when the Lord Jeſus ſhall with the breath of his mouth deſtroy this lawleſſe man, long ſince revealed to his Church, and by the brightneſſe of his glorious comming, fully diſcover, and diſpatch him. Not onely in the meanes, and way, but in the end alſo, is Rome oppoſite to heaven: The heaven ſhall paſſe away, by a change of quality, not an utter deſtruction, of ſubſtance: Rome, by deſtruction, not by change: Of us therefore and them ſhall that old Bucolick Verſe bee verified:

Out of each others breſt their ſwords they drew:
Nor would they reſt, till one the other ſlew.

Glory to God, Victory to the Truth, Warre with Hereſie, Peace to the Church.

AMEN.

A IVST CENSVRE OF TRAVELL,

AS IT IS COMMONLY VNdertaken by the Gentlemen of our NATION.

By Ios. HALL.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, EDVVARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham.

RIght Honourable:

IF ever any man had reaſon to be in love with the face of a forraine entertainement, thoſe are they, which were admitted to the attendance of the truly Generous and Honourable, Lord HAY, your moſt noble Sonne, in his late Embaſſage to France; in which number my vnworthineſſe was allowed to make one; who can therefore well witneſſe, that no man could either receive more honour from a ſtrange country, or doe more honour to his owne. What wanted there that might make men confeſſe themſelves more welcome than ſtrangers? Neither doubt I, but that after many ages, France it ſelfe will wonder at the bountifull expreſſions of her owne favours. But whiles others were injoying the noble courteſies of the time, my thoughts entertained themſelves with ſearching into the proofe of that ordinarie Travell, wherewith I ſaw men commonly affected; which I muſt needs confeſſe, the more I ſaw, the leſſe I liked. Neither is it in the power of any forraine munificence, to make me thinke ours any where ſo well as at home. Earthly commodities are no part of my thought: I looked (as I ought) at the ſoule; which I well ſaw, uſes not onely to gather no moſſe in this rolling, but ſuffers the beſt graces it hath to moulder away inſenſibly in ſuch unneceſſary agitation. I have now beene twiſe abroad: both times (as thinking my ſelfe worthy of nothing but neglect) I bent my eyes upon others, to ſee what they did, what they got, my inquirie found our ſpirituall loſſe ſo palpable, that now at laſt my heart could not chuse but breake forth at my hand, and tell my Countrymen of the dangerous issue of their curiositie. I meddle not with the common journeys to the minerall waters of the Spa; to which many sicke soules are beholden for a good excuse: who whiles they pretend the medicinall use of that spring, can freely quaffe of the puddle of popish superstition; poysoning the better part, in stead of helping the worse. These I leave to the best Physitian, Authoritie; which, if it may please to undertake the cure, may perhaps save as many English soules from infection, as that water cures bodies of diseases. I deale onely with those, that professe to seeke the glory of a perfect breeding, and the perfection of that, which wee call Civilitie, in Travell: of which sort I have (not without indignation) seene too many lose their hopes, and themselves in the way; returning as empty of grace, and other vertues, as full of words, vanitie, mis-dispositions. I dedicate this poore discourse to your Lo: as (besides my daily renued obligations) congratulating to you the sweet libertie & happy use of your home, who like a fixed starre may well over-looke these planets, and by your constant setledness, give that aime to inferiour eyes, which shall bee in vaine expected from a wandring light. The God of heaven, to whose glory I have intended this weake labour, give it favour in the sight of his Church, and returne it backe, but with this good newes, that any one of the sonnes of Iaphet is hereby perswaded to dwell ever in the tents of Sem. Unto that divine protection, I humbly betake your Lo: justly vowing my selfe and Christian obedience,

Your Lo: humbly devoted in all faithfull

Ios: Hall.

QVO

SECT. I.

IT is an over-rigorous conſtruction of the workes of God, that in moting our Iland with the Ocean hee meant to ſhut us up from other Regions; For God himſelfe that made the Sea, was the Author of Navigation, and hath therein taught us to ſet up a wooden bridge, that may reach to the very Antipodes themſelves: This were to ſeeke diſcontentment in the bounty of God, who hath placed us apart, for the ſingularity of our happineſſe, not for reſtraint.

There are two occaſions wherein Travell may paſſe, Matter of traffique, and Matter of State. Some commodities God hath confined to ſome Countries, upon others he hath with a full hand powred thoſe benefits, which heehath but ſprinkled upon ſome. His wiſe providence hath made one Country the Granary, another the Celler, another the Orchard, another the Arſenall of their neighbours, yea of the remoteſt parts. The earth is the Lords, which he meant not to keep in his hands, but to give; and he which hath given no man his faculties, and graces for himſelfe, nor put light into the Sunne, Moone, Stars, for their owne uſe, hath ſtored no parcell of earth with a purpoſe of private reſervation. Salomon would never have ſent his navie for Apes and Peacocks, but yet held gold and timber for the building of Gods houſe, and his owne, worthy of a whole three yeares voyage: The Sea and Earth are the Great Cofers of God; the diſcoveries of Navigation are the keies, which whoſoever hath received, may know that he is freely allowed to unlock theſe cheſts of Nature without any need to picke the wards. Wiſe Salomons compariſon is reciprocall: A ſhip of Merchants that fetches her wares from farre is the good Huſwife of the Common-wealth; and if ſhee were ſo in thoſe blind Voyages of antiquity, which never ſaw Needle nor Card, how much more thrifty muſt ſhe needs be in ſo many helpes both of Nature and Art? Either Indies may be ſearched for thoſe treaſures, which God hath laid up in them for their farre-diſtant owners; Onely let our Merchants take heed, leſt they goe ſo far, that they leave God behind them; that whiles they buy all other things good cheape, they make not an ill match for their ſoules, leſt they end their proſperous adventures in the ſhipwracke of a good conſcience.

SECT. II.

AND for matter of policy, nothing can bee more plaine than that our correſpondence with others Nations cannot poſſibly bee held up, without intelligence of their eſtate, of their proceedings; The neglect whereof were no other than to proſtrate our ſelves to the mercy of an hollow friendſhip, and to ſtand ſtill, and willingly lye open whiles we are plaid upon by the wit of untruſty neighbourhood. Theſe eyes and eares of State are neceſſary to the well-being of the head; In which number I doe not include thoſe private Inter-lopers intelligence, that lye abroad only to feed ſome vaine Cameleons at home with the ayre of Newes, for no other purpoſe ſave idle diſcourſe; but onely thoſe profitable Agents, whoſe induſtry either fitteth them abroad for publike imployment, or imployeth them after due maturity, in the fit ſervices of the Common-wealth: neither my cenſure nor my direction reaches to either of theſe occaſions. It is the travell of curioſity wherewith my quarrell ſhall be maintained: the inconveniencies whereof my owne Senſes have ſo ſufficiently witneſſed, that if the wiſe Parents of our Gentry could have borrowed mines eyes for the time, they would ever learne to keepe their ſonnes at home, and not wilfully beat themſelves with the ſtaffe of their age: upon them let my pen turne a little, as thoſe that are more than acceſſaries to this both private and publike miſchiefe.

Sect. III.

IT is the affectation of too early ripenes that makes them prodigall of their childrens ſafety and hopes: for, that they may bee wiſe betimes, they ſend them forth to the world in the minority both of age and judgement: like as fond mothers uſe to ſend forth their daughters on froſting, early in cold mornings (though into the midſt of a vaporous and foggy ayre) and whiles they ſtrive for a colour, loſe their health. If they were not blinded with over-weening and deſire, they could not but ſee that their unſetlednes carries in it a manifeſt perill of miſcarriage: grant that no danger were threatned by the place, experience gives us, that a weake limbd childe, if he be ſuffered to uſe his legges too ſoone, too much, lames himſelf for ever: but if he walke in uneven ground, he is no leſſe ſubject to maimes than crookedneſſe. Doe they not ſee how eaſily a young twigg is bowed any way? Doe they not ſee that the Midwife and Nurſe are wont to frame the griſtly head of the Infant to any faſhion? May not any thing bee written upon a blanke? And if they make choice of this age, becauſe it is moſt docible, and for that they would take the day before them, why do they not conſider, that it is therfore more docible of evill, ſince wickedneſſe is both more inſinuative & more plauſible than vertue, eſpecially when it meets with an untutored Judge; and ſeeing there is ſo much inequality of the number of both, that it is not more hard to find vertue, than to miſſe vice: Heare this then, ye careleſs Oſtriches, that leave your egges in the open ſand for the Sun to hatch, without the feare of any hoofe that may cruſh them in peeces; have your ſtomacks reſolved to digeſt the hard newes of the ruine of your children? Do yee profeſſe enmity to your owne loynes? then turne them (as you doe) looſe to theſe dangers, ere they can reſiſt, ere they can diſcerne; but if yee had rather they ſhould live and grow, beſtow upon them the kindly heat of your beſt plumes, and ſhelter them with your own breſt and wings, till nature have opened a ſeaſonable way to their owne abilities.

Sect. IV.

YEa, let it bee my juſt complaint in this place, that in the very tranſplantation of our ſonnes to the ſafer ſoyle of our owne Univerſities, and Innes of Court, nothing is more prejudiciall than ſpeed. Perfection is the childe of Time; neither was there ever any thing excellent, that required not meet leiſure: but beſides, how commonly is it ſeene, that thoſe which had wont to ſwimme onely with bladders, ſinke when they come firſt to truſt to their own armes? Theſe Lap-wings that go from under the wing of their damme with the ſhell on their heads, runne wilde. If Tutors bee never ſo carefull of their early charge, much muſt bee left to their owne diſpoſition; which if it leade them not to good, not onely the hopes of

A of their youth, but the proofe of their age lies bleeding. It is true, that as the French Lawyers ſay merrily of the Normans, which by a ſpeciall priviledge are reputed of full age at 21. yeares, whereas the other French ſtay for their five and twentieth, that Malitia ſupplet ætatem; ſo may I ſay of the yonglings of our time, that Precocity of underſtanding ſupplieth age and ſtature: but as it is commonly ſeene, that thoſe bloſſomes which over-runne the Spring, and will be looking forth upon a February-Sun, are nipped ſoone after with an Aprill froſt when they ſhould come to the knitting: ſo is it no leſſe ordinary that theſe rathe-ripe wits prevent their owne perfection, and after a vaine wonder of their haſte, end either in ſhame, or obſcuritie. And as it thus fals out even in our Univerſities (the moſt abſolute & famous Seminaries of the world) where the Tutors eye ſupplies the Parents; ſo
B muſt it needs much more, in thoſe free and honourable Innes (as they are called, for their libertie, Colledges for their uſe) of our Engliſh Gentry, wherein each one is his owne maſter in reſpect of his private ſtudy and government. Where there are many pots boyling, there cannot but be much ſcumme, the concourſe of a populous city affords many brokers of villanie, which live upon the ſpoiles of young hopes, whoſe very acquaintance is deſtruction. How can theſe novices that are turned looſe into the maine, ere they know either coaſt, or compaſſe, avoid theſe rockes and ſhelves, upon which both their eſtates and ſoules are miſerably wracked? How commonly doe they learne to roare in ſtead of pleading; and in ſtead of knowing the lawes, learne how to contemne them? Wee ſee and rue this miſchiefe, and yet I know not how careleſſe wee are in preventing it. How much more deſperate muſt it
C then needs be to ſend forth our children into thoſe places which are profeſſedly infectious, whoſe very goodneſſe is either impiety, or ſuperſtition? If we deſired to have ſons poyſoned with miſbeleefe, what could we doe otherwiſe? Or what elſe doe thoſe Parents, which have bequeathed their children to Antichriſtianiſme? Our late journey into France informed me of ſome ordinary factors of Rome, whoſe trade is the tranſporting and placing of our Popiſh novices beyond the ſeas; one whereof (whoſe name I noted) hath bin obſerved to carry over ſix ſeverall charges in one yeare. Are we ſo fooliſh to go their way, whiles we intend a contrary period? Doe we ſend our ſons to learne to be chaſte in the midſt of Sodome? The world is wide and open; but our ordinary travell is ſouthward, into the jawes of danger: for ſo far hath Satans policy prevailed, that thoſe parts which are onely thought
D worth our viewing, are moſt contagious; and will not part with either pleaſure, or information, without ſome tang of wickednes. What can we plead for our confidence, but that there is an houſhold of righteous Lot in the midſt of that impure City, that there are houſes in this Iericho, which have ſcarlet threds ſhining in their windowes, that in the moſt corrupted ayre of Popery, ſome well reformed Chriſtians draw their breath, and ſweeten it with their reſpiration? Bleſſed be God, that hath reared up the towers of his Sion in the midſt of Babylon. We muſt acknowledge, not without much gratulation to the Goſpell of Chriſt, that in the very hotteſt climates of oppoſition, it findes many clients, but more friends; and in thoſe places, where authority hath pleaſed to give more ayre to the truth, would have had many more, if the Reformed part had happily continued that correſpondence in ſome
E circumſtances with the Roman Church, which the Church of England hath hitherto maintained. God is my record how free my heart is both from partiality and prejudice. Mine eies and eares can witneſſe with what approoſe and applauſe divers of the Catholiques Royall (as they are tearmed) entertained the new tranſlated Liturgy of our Church, as marvelling to ſee ſuch order and regular devotion, in them, whom they were taught to condemne for hereticall. Whoſe allowances I well ſaw, might with a little helpe have been raiſed higher, from the practiſe of our Church to ſome points of our judgement. But if true religion were in thoſe parts yet better attended, and our young Traveller could find more abetters, and examples, of pietie, on whom we might relie, yet how ſafe can it bee to truſt young eies with the view and cenſure of truth or falſhood in religion? eſpecially when truth brings nothing to this barre, but extreame ſimplicity; and contrarily, falſhood, a gawdy magnificence, and proud majeſty of pompous ceremonies, wherewith the hearts of children and fooles are eaſily taken. That Curtizan of Rome (according to the manner of that profeſſion) ſets out her ſelfe to ſale in the moſt tempting faſhion; here want no colours, no perfumes, no wanton dreſſes; whereas the poore Spouſe of CHRIST can onely ſay of her ſelfe, I am blacke, but comely. When on the one ſide they ſhall ſee ſuch rich ſhrines, gariſh Altars, ſtately Proceſſions, when they ſhall ſee a Pope adored of Emperors, Cardinalls preferd to Kings, Confeſſors made Saints, little children made Angels, in a word, nothing not outwardly glorious: on the other ſide, a ſervice without welt or gard, whoſe majeſtie is all in the heart, none in the face, how eaſily may they incline to the conceit of that Pariſian Dame, who ſeeing the proceſſion of S. Genevieſue goe by the ſtreets, could ſay, (O que belle, &c.) How fine a religion is ours in cõpariſon of the Huguenots? Whereto muſt bee added, that (ſuppoſing they doe not carry with them, but rather go to fetch the language of the place) ſome long time needs be ſpent, ere they can receive any help to their devotion; whiles in the meane ſeaſon, their unthriving intermiſſion is aſſayled with a thouſand ſuggeſtions: And who ſees not that this lucrum ceſſans (as the Civilians terme it) offers an open advantage to a buſie adverſarie?

SECT. VI.

IN a word, it hath beene the old prayſe of early riſing, that it makes a man healthfull, holy, and rich; whereof the firſt reſpects the body, the ſecond the ſoule, the third the eſtate: all fals out contrary in an early travell. For health: The wiſe providence of God hath ſo contrived his earth, and us, that he hath fitted our bodies to our clime, and the native ſuſtenance of the place unto our bodies. The apparent difference of dyet (and of drinkes eſpecially) falling into ſo tender age, muſt need cauſe a jarre in the conſtitution; which cannot in all likelihood but ſend forth diſtemper into the whole courſe of the enſuing life. The ſtreame runnes like the fountaine, and ſpeeds well, if at laſt, by many changes of ſoile it can leave an ill quality behinde it: beſides that the miſ-governance of diet, whereto their liberty layes them open in the weakneſſe of their pupillage, cannot but be extremely prejudiciall. In this point let experience be conſulted with; her unpartiall ſentence ſhal eaſily tell us, how few young travellers have brought home, ſound and ſtrong, and (in a word) Engliſh bodies. As for holineſſe, we loſe our labour, if this diſcourſe prove not that it hath none ſo great enemy as timely travel; at once doe we hazard to abandon God and our home: ſet an empty pitcher to the fire, it cracks preſently, whereas the full will abide boyling. It was the younger ſonne in the Goſpell, who therefore turnes unthrift, becauſe he got his portion too ſoone into his hands, and wandred into a far country. The eye of the Parent, and the ferule of the maſter, is all too little to bring our ſonnes to good. Where then there is neither reſtraint of evill, nor helpes to grace, how ſhould their condition be other then hopeles? The ſoile doth much in many plants: the Perſian Hyoſcyamus if it be tranſlated to Egypt, proves deadly; if to Ieruſalem, ſafe and wholeſome: neither is it otherwiſe with ſome diſpoſitions, which may juſtly curſe the place, as acceſſorie in their undoing. Laſtly, for riches, not of the purſe, (which is not here thought of) but of the minde, what can be expected from that age, which is not capable of obſervation, careleſſe of repoſition? whereof the one gets, the other keepes the treaſure of our underſtanding. What is this age fit to looke after but Butterflies? or birds neſts, or perhaps the gay coat of a Courtier? And if remarkable conſiderations be put into it by others, they are as ſome looſe pearles, which for want of filing upon a ſtring, ſhake out of our pockets; ſo as all the wealth of a young Traveller is onely in his tongue, wherein he exceeds his mothers Parat at home, both for that he can ſpeake more, and knowes that he ſpeaketh.

AND in truth, it is not onely in Travell, wherein we may juſtly complaine of the inconveniency of haſte, but (that wee may looke a little aſide) in all the important buſineſſes of our life, eſpecially in mariage and profeſſions: The ordinary haſte in the one (before the face can deſcry the ſex) fils the world full of beggery and impotence; and no leſſe haſte in the other, fils it as full of ignorance and imperfection. For on the one ſide, where the vigour of nature wants, what can be propagated but infirmitie? or how can hee skill to live, that wants experience? On the other, what plenty of water can there bee, where the lead of the ciſterne is
B put all into the pipes? where thoſe that ſhould be gathering knowledge for themſelves, ſpend it (like unthrifty heires) upon others, as faſt as they get it. I am deceived, if I have not touched one of the maine grounds of that univerſall decay of Arts and Men, wherewith the world is commonly checked: They muſt be mightier and wiſer; that know how to redreſſe it.

SECT. VIII.

BVt let us give our Traveller (that which parents ſeldome care to give) matu-
C ritie of age; let him be as ripe as time can make him; What is the beſt advantage which his abſence can promiſe us? Let us lay the benefits of Travell in the one ſcale, the inconveniences in the other; whetherſoever over-weighs ſhall ſway downe the beame of our judgement. The private contentment of a mans owne hart in the view of forraine things, is but a better name of an humorous curioſity. If a man yeeld to run after his appetite and his eye, he ſhall never know where to reſt, and after many idle excurſions, ſhould lie downe, weary, but unſatisfied. For, give me a man that hath ſeen Iudaſſes Lanthorne at Saint Denniſes, the Epheſian Diana in the Louvre, the great veſſell at Heidelberg, the Amphitheater at Niſmes the ruines, and halfe-lettered monuments of the ſeven hils, and a thouſand ſuch rarities; what peace hath his heart, above thoſe that ſit at home, and contemne theſe toies? And what if that mans fancy ſhall call him to the ſtables of the great Mogol, or to the ſolem-
D nities of Mecha, or to the Library of the Mountaine of the Moone, will he be ſo far the drudge or Lacquay of his owne imagination, as to undertake this pilgrimage? Or where will he ſtay at laſt, upon his returne? If he have ſmelt the ill ſented cities of France, or have ſeene faire Florence, rich Venice, proud Genua, Luca the induſtrious: if then his thoughts ſhall tempt him to ſee the rich Gluttons houſe in Ieruſalem, or invite him to Aſmere, or Bengala, muſt he goe? And if he can deny and chide his owne unprofitable deſires, at the laſt, why began he no ſooner? That could not be forborne too early, which at laſt wee repent to have done: he therfore that travells onely to pleaſe his fantaſie, is like ſome woman with childe, that longs for that peece which ſhee ſees upon anothers trencher, and ſwounds if ſhee miſſe it; or E ſome Squire of Dames that doats upon every beauty: and is every day love-ſicke anew: Theſe humors are fitter for controlment than obſervation.

SECT. IX.

IT is an higher faculty that Travell profeſſeth to advance, the ſupreme power of our underſtanding, which if from hence it may be manifeſtly improved, he ſhould not be worthy to tread upon the earth that would not emulate Drake and Candiſh, in cõpaſſing it: but ſet aſide the ſtudy of civill Law, (which indeed finds better helps abroad) all Sciences (the word may ſeeme proud, but it is true) may be more both fitly wooed, and more ſurely won, within our foure ſeas: for what learnings is that, which the ſeas, or Alpes, or Pyrenees have ingroſſed from us? what profeſſion either liberall, or manuary, wherein the greateſt maſters have not beene at leaſt equalled by our home-bred Ilanders? What hath this or the former age knowne, more eminent for learning, than ſome of ours, which have never trod on any but their owne earth? And (as good market-men by one handfull judge of all the whole ſacke) why may we not finde cauſe to thinke ſo of the reſt, if they would not bee wanting to themſelves? I am ſure the Univerſities of our Iland know no matches in all the world; unto whoſe perfection (that as they exceed others, ſo they may no leſſe exceed themſelves) nothing wanteth, but ſevere execution of the wiſe and carefull lawes of our Anceſtors, and reſtraint of that libertie, which is the common diſeaſe of the time. And why ſhould not the childe thrive as well with the mothers milke, as with a ſtrangers? Whether it be the envie, or the puſillanimity of us Engliſh, we are ſtill ready to under-value our owne, and admire forrainers; whiles other Nations have applauded no profeſſors more than thoſe which they have borrowed from us; neither have we beene ſo unwiſe, as to lend forth our beſt: our neighbours (which ſhould be our corrivals in this praiſe) ſhall be our Judges; if thoſe few of our Writers, which could bee drawne forth into the publike light, have not ſet copies to the reſt of the world, not without juſt admiration. And how many ſtarres have wee of no leſſe magnitude, that will not be ſeene? Bleſſed be God (who hath made this Word as true, as it is great) no Nation under heaven ſo aboundeth with all variety of learning, as this Iland. From the head of Gods annointed doth this ſweet perfume diſtill to the utmoſt skirts of this our region. Knowledge did never ſit crowned in the Throne of Majeſtie, and wanted either reſpect, or attendance. The double praiſe which was of old given to two great Nations, That Italie could not be put downe for armes, nor Greece for learning, is happily met in one Iland. Thoſe therfore that croſſe the Seas to fill their braine, doe but travell Northward for heat, and ſeeke that candle which they carry in their hand.

Sect. X.

YEa ſo farre is our ordinary Travell from perfecting the intellective powers of our Gentrie, that it rather robs them of the very deſire of perfection. For what diſcouragements ſhall they finde from the love of ſtudies, in thoſe parts which are moſt ſought to for civility? Who knowes not that they are growne to that height of debauchment, as to hold learning a ſhame to Nobility, eſteeming it as a fit gard for the long robe only, too baſe for their Tiſſues? An opinion ſo ſavouring of proud ignorance, & ignorant looſeneſſe; that I cannot honour it with a confutation. Who would thinke that the reaſonable ſoule of men, not profeſſedly barbarous, ſhould be capable of ſuch a monſter? What is learning, but reaſon improved? And can reaſon ſo farre degenerate, as to hate and contemne it ſelf? Were theſe men made only for a ſword, or a dogge, or an horſe? Only for ſport or execution? I know not wherein Lewis the Eleventh ſhewed himſelfe unwitty, but in the charge which hee gave to his Sonne, to learne no more Latine, but, Qui neſcit diſſimulare, neſcit vivere: and would this alone teach him to rule well? Doth the Art of Arts (ſuch is the government of men) require no grounds but diſſimulation, or ignorance? Even to the feeding of hogges, or ſheepe, there is more or better skill neceſſarie. How unlike is this to a ſucceſſor of Charles the Great, whoſe word it had wont to bee, that hee had rather abound in knowledge, than wealth? In the Court of our King Henry the Eight, a certaine great Peere (of this diet) could ſay, it was enough for Noblemens ſonnes to winde their horne, and carry their Hawke faire; that ſtudie was for the children of a meaner ranke: To whom Pace juſtly replied, that then Noblemen muſt bee content that their children may winde their hornes, and carry their Hawkes, while meaner mens ſonnes do weild the affaires of State. Certainly, it is a blinde and lame government that lackes learning, whoſe ſubjects, what are they elſe, but as limbs of a body whoſe head wanteth ſenſes, which muſt needs therfore faile of either motion, or ſafety? From hence it is, that ſo few of the forraine

A Forraine Nobles are ſtudious, in compariſon of ours; (in which regard I am not aſhamed to recant that which my un-experience hath (out of hearſay) written in praiſe of the French education, and thoſe few that have ſtolne the turning over of books, hide their skill, leſt they ſhould be made to bluſh at their vertue. What brave Trophees and rich monuments hath the pen of our gracious Soveraigne raiſed of himſelfe unto all poſterities? When ignorance & malice have ſhot their bolt, the glory of his great wiſdome, and knowledge, ſhall more fill the mouthes and affect the hearts of all ſucceeding ages, than of his greatneſſe. Paul the Fift, and his greateſt Chaplaines, Bellarmine and Perron, have felt the weight of his hand; whereas the great King that ſtiles himſelfe Catholike, when hee comes to paſſe his cenſorious edict upon Cardinall Baronius (who in the eleventh Tome of his Hiſtorie ſeemed
B too buſie in faſtening the Title of the Kingdome of Sicilie upon the Pope) profeſſeth to ground his intelligence of his wrong onely upon others eyes; as if a book (though of a Cardinall) were too meane an object for the view of Majeſtie. And as all ſubordinate greatneſſe flowes from the head, ſo doe commonly alſo the diſpoſitions: Neither have the Doctors of the Romiſh Church (upon whom the implicite faith of the Laitie is ſuſpended) found it any ill policie, to cheriſh this diſlike of bookiſhneſſe in the great: for whiles the candle is out, it is ſafe for them to play their tricks in the darke, and if the Aſſyrians be once blinded, how eaſily may they bee lead into the midſt of any Samaria? If the light of knowledge might freely ſhine to the world, Popery would ſoone be aſhamed of it ſelfe, and vaniſh amongſt the
C workes of darkneſſe: Now how well theſe examples, and this converſation, ſhall whet the appetite unto good ſtudies, it cannot be hard to judge.

Edicto del Rey Don Phelippi d' Eſpana contra e Tractado della Monarchia de Sicilia enxerido por Ceſar Baronio Cardinal en el Tomo undecimo de ſus Annales Eccleſiaſticos.

SECT. XI.

BVt perhaps it is not the learning of the Schoole, but of the State, wherein our Traveller hopes for perfection: The ſite and forme of Cities, the faſhion of government, the manners of people, the raiſing and rate of forraine revenues, the deportment of Courts, the menaging both of war and peace, is that wherein his owne eye ſhall be his beſt intelligencer; the knowledge whereof ſhall well requite his labour, whether for diſcourſe or for uſe. What if I ſay, that (ſave the ſoothing
D up of our fancie in all this) theſe leſſons may be as well taken out at home? I have knowne ſome that have travelled no further than their owne cloſet, which could both teach and correct the greateſt Traveller, after all his tedious and coſtly pererrations: what doe wee but loſe the benefit of ſo many journalls, maps, hiſtoricall deſcriptions, relations, if we cannot with theſe helps, travell by our owne fire-ſide? He that travells into foraine Countries, talks perhaps with a Peaſant, or a Pilgrim, or a Citizen, or a Courtier; and muſt needs take ſuch information as partiall rumour, or weake conjecture can give him, but he that travells into learned and credible Authors, talks with them who have ſpent themſelves in bolting out the truth of all paſſages; and who having made their labours publike, would have beene like to heare of it, if they had miſ-reported. The ordinary traveller propounds ſome prime E Cities to himſelfe, and thither he walkes right forward; if he meet with ought that is memorable in the way, he takes it up; but how many thouſand matters of note fall beſide him, on either hand; of the knowledge whereof he is not guilty: Whereas ſome grave and painfull Author hath collected into one view, whatſoever his Countrey affoords worthy of marke; having meaſured many a foule ſtep for that, which we may ſee dry-ſhod; and worne out many yeeres in the ſearch of that, which one houre ſhall make no leſſe ours, than it was his owne. To which muſt be added, that our unperfect acquaintance may not hope to finde ſo perfect information on the ſudden: as a naturall inhabitant may get, by the diſquiſition of his whole life. Let an Italian or French paſſenger walke thorow this our Iland, what can his Table-bookes carry home, in compariſon of the learned Britaine of our Camden, or the accurate Tables of Speed? Or if one of ours ſhould (as too many do) paſſe the Alpes, what pettances can his wild journy obſerve, in compariſon of the Itinerarie of Fr. Schottus, and Capugnanus? Or he that would diſcourſe of the Royalties of the French Lillies, how can he bee ſo furniſhed by flying report, as by the elaborate gatherings of Caſſaneus or of Degraſſalius? What ſhould I bee infinite? This age is ſo full of light, that there is no one country of the habitable world; whoſe beames are not croſſed and interchanged with other; Knowledge of all affaires, is like muſicke in the ſtreets, whereof thoſe may partake, which pay nothing. Wee doe not lie more open to one common ſinne, than to the eies and pens of our neighbours; Even China it ſelfe, and Japonia, and thoſe other remoteſt Iſles, and Continents (which have taken the ſtricteſt order for cloſeneſſe) have received ſuch diſcoveries, as would rather ſatisfie a Reader, than provoke him to amend them. A good booke is at once the beſt companion, and guide, and way, and end of our journey. Neceſſity drove our forefathers out of doores, which elſe in thoſe miſty times had ſeene no light: wee may with more eaſe, and no leſſe profit, ſit ſtill, and inherit, and enjoy the labours of them, and our elder brethren, who have purchaſed our knowledge with much hazard, time, toyle, expence, and have beene liberall of their bloud, (ſome of them) to leave us rich.

Sect. XII.

AS for that verball diſcourſe, wherein I ſee ſome place the felicity of their Travell (thinking it the onely grace to tell wonders to a ring of admiring ignorants) it is eaſie to anſwer; that table-talke is the leaſt care of a wiſe man; who like a deepe ſtreame deſires rather to runne ſilent; and as himſelfe is ſeldome tranſported with wonder, ſo doth he not affect it in others; reducing all to uſe, rather than admiration, and more deſiring to benefit, than aſtoniſh the hearer; withall, that the ſame meanes which enable us to know, doe at once furniſh us with matter of diſcourſe, and for the forme of our expreſſion, if it proceed not from that natural dexteritie which we carry with us, in vaine ſhall we hope to bring it home; the change of language is rather an hinderance to our former readineſſe: and if ſome have fetcht new noſes, and lips, and eares from Italy (by the help of Tagliacotius, and his ſchollers) never any brought a new tongue from thence. To conclude, if a man would give himſelfe leave to be thus vaine and free, like a mill without a ſcluſe, let him but travell through the world of bookes, and he ſhall eaſily be able to outtalke that tongue, whoſe feet have walkt the furtheſt: what hath any eye ſeene, or imagination deviſed, which the pen hath not dared to write? Out of our books we can tell the ſtories of the Monocelli, who lying upon their backs; ſhelter themſelves from the Sunne with the ſhaddow of their one onely foot. Wee can tell of thoſe cheape-dieted men, that live about the head of Ganges, without meat, without mouthes, feeding only upon aire at their noſthrils: Or thoſe headleſſe Eaſterne people, that have their eyes in their breaſts (a miſ-conceit ariſing from their faſhion of attire, which I have ſometimes ſeene:) Or of thoſe Coromandæ, of whom Pliny ſpeakes, that cover their whole body with their eares: Or of the perſecutors of Saint Thomas of Canterbury, whoſe poſteritie (if we beleeve the confident writings of Degraſſalius) are borne with long and hairie tailes, ſouping after them; which (I imagine) gave occaſion to that proverbiall jeſt, wherewith our mirth uſes to upbraid the Kentiſh: Or of Amazons, or Pigmees, or Satyres, or the Samarcaudean Lambe, which growing out of the earth by the navell, grazeth ſo farre as that naturall tether will reach: Or of the Bird Ruc, or ten thouſand ſuch miracles whether of nature, or event. Little need we to ſtirre our feet to learne to tell either loud lies, or large truths. We have heard a bird in a cage ſing more change of notes, than others have done in the wilde Liberty of the wood. And as for the preſent occurrences of the time, the world about us is ſo full of Preſſes, that it may, and is growne ſo good a fellow, that it will impart what it knowes to all the neighbours: whoſe relations, if ſometimes they ſwarve from truth, we may well conſider, what variety of report every accident will yeeld;

A yeeld; and that therfore our eares abroad are no whit more credible, than our eyes at home. Yea rather, as Tully could say, that at Antium he could heare the newes of Rome, better than at Rome, so may we oft-times better heare and see the newes of France, or Spaine, upon our Exchange, than in their Paris, or Madrill: Since (what liberty soever tongues may take to themselves) a discreet man will bee ashamed to subscribe his name to that, whereof hee may be afterwards convinced.

Sect. XIII.

B Since therefore Travell cannot out-bid us in these highest commodities, which concerne the wealth of the minde; all the advantage it can afford us, must bee in those mixt abilities, wherein our bodies are the greatest partners, as dancing, fencing, musicke, vaulting, horsemanship; the onely professions of the mis-named Academies of other Nations. Who can denie that such like exercises are fit for yong Gentlemen, not onely for their present recreation, but much more for the preparing of them to more serious action? Yet must these learne to know their places: what are they else but the varnish of that picture of Gentry, whose substance consists in the lines and colours of true vertue? but the lace or facing of a rich garment? but the hang-bies of that Royall court which the soule keeps in a generous heart? He that holds Gentilitie accomplished with these (though laudable) qualities, partakes more of his horse, than his horse can possibly of him. This skill then is worthy of C our purchase, yet may not be bought too deare; and perhaps need not to be fetcht so far. Neither my profession, nor my experience will allow me to hold comparisons in this kind; but I have bin heartned by no meane Masters of these Arts, to say that our Nation have yeelded some in all these faculties, which need not stoope unto the proudest forrainer: ours have no fault but one, that they are our owne; and what hath their Countrey offended, if their Art offend not? It is an humorous giddinesse to measure the goodnes of any thing by the distance of miles, and where there is equality of worth, to neglect the neerest. I slander our Nation if it bee not sicke of this disease, in the course of all Sciences; And if neerenesse and presence be the cause of our dislike, why doe we not hate our selves, which are ever in our owne bosome? Why doe we not hate this fastidious curiosity, which is too close to us? perhaps per- D fection in these qualities is thinner sowne amongst us, than some other-where; so as our Iland for want of worke, and incouragement, affords no such multitude of masters: but how can we complaine of rarenesse, since if our age yeeld us but one excellent in each kinde, it is more than we are willing to use; and if the fault were not in our selves, one candle might light a thousand: To instance in the best: The Horse is a noble creature, which as it is the strength and pride of France, so wins the hearts and heeles of that Nation. The generality of their skill is nothing to a stranger; each private mans cunning rests in himselfe; it is onely the Teacher, whose ability may concerne us. And whereas there is a double kinde of menage (as I have heard) one for service, the other for pleasure; in the first, our Masters thinke they cannot yeeld unto the best; in the latter, if they grant themselves exceeded, how many men have E taught their dogge the same tricks, with no lesse contentment? In both, we have the written directions of their greatest Artists: who (for the perpetuity of their owne honour) failed not to say their best. And if these dead Masters suffice not, we have had, we may have the best of their living: The conscience of a mans excellency will abide no limits; but spurs him forth to winne admiration abroad, and if therewithall hee can finde advancement of profit, how willingly doth he change his home? We have had experience of this in higher professions, much more of these under foot. One obscure towne of Holland in our memory, had by this meanes drawne together at once the greatest lights of Europe, and made it self then no lesse renowned for Professors, than it is now infamous for Schisme. Feare of envy forbids me to name those amongst us, which have honoured this Iland in the choice of their abode. Where Art is encouraged, it will soone rise high, and goe farre, farre, and not ſuffer a channell of the Sea to ſtay it from the preſence of a more bountifull patronage. A

SECT. XIV.

BVt let us grant theſe faculties ſo fixed upon any Nation, that all our water muſt neceſſarily bee fetcht at their Well; and adde unto theſe a few waſte complements, and mimicall courteſies, which muſt needs bee put into the match of our ordinarie travell: and now let us ſet done, and ſee what we paid for this ſtock, and count our winnings: What muſt our compleat Traveller ſtake downe for this goodly furniture of his Gentrie? If not loſſe, danger; danger of the beſt part, if not all: a double danger; of corruption of religion, and depravation of manners; both capitall: And can we thinke theſe endowments ſo pretious, that they ſhould bee worth fetching upon ſuch an hazard? Will any man (not deſperate) run into an infected houſe, to rifle for a rich ſuit? Will any man put his finger into a fiery crucible, to pull out gold? It is wittily taken of Chryſoſtome, when our Saviour ſaid, Ne exeatis in eremum; that hee ſaies not, Go forth into the deſart, and ſee, but beleeve not; but gives an abſolute prohibition of going forth at all, that they might be out of danger of misbeleefe. Tuſh, idle and melancholicke feares, ſay ſome of our Gallants: Wherefore ſerves diſcretion, but to ſever good from ill? How eaſily may a wiſe man pull a Roſe, and not pricke his hand? How freely may he dip in this ſtreame, and not be drowned? Little doe theſe peremptory reſolvers know, either the inſinuative power of evill, or the treachery of their own heart in receiving it, or the importunitie of deceivers in obtruding it. They are the worſe for their travell, and perceive it not. An egge covered with ſalt, as our Philoſophers teach us, hath the meat of it conſumed, whiles the ſhell is whole: many a one receives poiſon, and knowes not when he tooke it. No man proves extreamly evill on the ſudden. Through many inſenſible declinations doe we fall from vertue; and at the firſt are ſo gently ſeazed by vice, that we cannot beleeve our accuſers. It is miſchiefe enough, if they can bee drawne to a leſſe diſlike of ill; which now by long acquaintance is growne ſo familiar to their eyes, that they cannot thinke it ſo loathſome, as at the firſt view. The ſocietie of wilfull Idolaters will now downe with them, not without eaſe; and good meanings begin to be allowed for the cloakes of groſſe ſuperſtition. From thence they grow to a favorable conſtruction of the miſ-opinions of the adverſe part, and can complaine of the wrongfull aggravations of ſome contentious ſpirits: and from thence (yet lower) to an indifferent conceit of ſome more politike poſitions, and practiſes of the Romaniſts. Neither is there their reſt. Hereupon enſues an allowance of ſome of their doctrines, that are more plauſible, and leſſe important, and withall a cenſure of us that are gone too far from Rome. Now the mariage of Eccleſiaſticall perſons begins to miſlike them: the daily and frequent conſignation with the croſſe is not to no purpoſe: The retired life of the religious (abandoning the world forſooth) ſavours of much mortification; and Confeſſion gives no ſmall eaſe and contentment to the ſoule. And now by degrees, Popery begins to be no ill religion: If there cannot be a falſe fire of miſ-devotion kindled in them, it is enough, if they can be cooled in their love of truth; which how commonly it fals out amongſt us, I had rather experience ſhould ſpeaky, than my ſelfe. Some there are that by a ſpirituall Antiperiſtaſis have growne hotter in their zeale, by being encompaſſed with the outward cold of irreligion and error, who as they owe not this grace to themſelves, ſo are they more for wonder than imitation. If Daniel found a guard in the Lions den, ſhall another put himſelfe thither for ſhelter? And if Peter walk't upon the pavement of the water, did the reſt of the Diſciples ſtep forth and follow him? That valiant Champion of Chriſt (ſince we are fallen upon his name) who durſt draw his ſword upon a whole troupe, after all his proteſtations of his inſeparableneſſe from his Maſter, was yet infected with the ayre of the High Preiſts Hall: and whiles he but warmed himſelfe at that fire, cooled in his B C D E

reſpect

A reſpect to his Saviour. Although perhaps this cogitation working (as it commonly doth) remiſſely, cauſeth not any ſudden alteration in our Traveller, but (as we ſay of Comets and Eclipſes) hath his effect when the cauſe is forgotten. Neither is there any one more apparent ground of that luke-warme indifferency, which is fallen upon our times, than the ill uſe of our wandrings: for our Travellers being the middle ranke of men, and therefore either followers of the great, or commanders of the meaner ſort, cannot want convenience of diffuſing this temper of eaſe, vnto both.

SECT. XV.

B ALL this miſchiefe is yet hid with a formall profeſſion, ſo as every eye cannot finde it: in others it dares boldly breake forth to an open revolt. How many in our memory, whiles with Dinah they have gone forth to gaze, have loſt their ſpirituall chaſtity, & therewith both the Church and themſelves? How many (like unto the brooke Cedron) run from Hieruſalem thorow the vale of Iehoſaphat, and end their courſe in the dead ſea? A Popiſh writer of our Nation (as himſelfe thought) not unlearned, complaining of the obſtinacy of us hereticks, deſpaires of prevailing, becauſe he findes it to be long ago fore-prophecied of us in the Booke of the Chronicles, At tu proteſtantes audire noluerunt. It is well that Proteſtants were yet heard of in the old Teſtament, as wel as Jeſuites; whoſe name, one of their owne by
C good hap hath found, Num. 26. 44. Like as Eraſmus found Friers in S. Pauls time, inter fal, os Fratres. But it were better, if this mans word were as true as it is idle. Some of ours have heard to their coſt, whoſe loſſe joyned with the griefe of the Church, and diſhonour of the Goſpell, we have ſufficiently lamented. How many have wee knowne ſtrocken with theſe Aſpes, which have died ſleeping? And in truth, whoſoever ſhall conſider this open freedome of the meanes of ſeducement, muſt needs wonder that wee have loſt no more; eſpecially, if he be acquainted with thoſe two maine helps of our Adverſaries, importunity, and plauſibility. Never any Phariſee was ſo eager to make a Proſelyte, as our late factors of Rome: and if they be ſo hot ſet upon this ſervice, as to compaſſe ſea & land to winne one of us, ſhall we be ſo mad as to paſſe both their ſea and land, to caſt our ſelves into the mouth of danger?
D No man ſetteth foot upon their coaſt, which may not preſently ſing with the Pſalmiſt, They come about mee like Bees. It fares with them as with thoſe which are infected with the peſtilence, who (they ſay) are carried with an itching deſire of tainting others. When they have all done, this they have gained, that if Satan were not more buſie and vehement than they; they could gaine nothing. But in the meane time, there is nothing wherein I wiſh we would emulate them, but in this heat of diligence and violent ambition of winning. Pyrrhus did not more enuy the valour of thoſe old Romane ſouldiers, which he read of in their wounds, and dead faces, than wee do the buſie audacitie of theſe new. The world could not ſtand before us, if our truth might be but as hotly followed as their falſhood. Oh that our God, whoſe cauſe wee maintaine, would enkindle our hearts with the fire of holy zeale, but ſo much as Sathan hath inflamed theirs with the fire of fury and faction. Oh that he would ſhake us out of this dull eaſe, and quicken our ſlacke ſpirits unto his own worke. Ariſe O North, and come O South, and blow upon our garden, that the ſpices thereof may flow forth. Theſe ſuters will take no deniall, but are ready (as the faſhion was to doe with rich marches) to carry away mens ſoules whether they will or no. Wee ſee the proofe of their importunitie at home: No bulwarke of lawes nor barres of Juſtice (though made of three trees) can keepe our rebaniſhed fugitives from returning, from intermedling. How have their actions ſaid in the hearing of the world, that ſince heaven will not heare them, they will try what hel can doe? And if they dare bee ſo buſie in our owne homes, where they would ſeeme ſomewhat awed with the danger of Juſtice; what (thinke wee) will they not dare to doe in their owne territories, where they have not free ſcope only, but assistance, but incouragement? Never generation was so forward as the Jesuiticall, for captation of wills amongst their owne, or of soules amongst strangers. What State is not haunted with these ill spirits? yea what house? yea what soule? Not a Princes Councell-Table, not a Ladies Chamber can be free from their shameless insinuations. It was not for nothing, that their great Patron Philip the second King of Spaine, called them Clericos negociadores; and that Marcus Antonius Columna, Generall of the Navy to Pius Quintus in the battell of Lepanto, and Vice-roy of Sicilie could say to Father Don Alonso, a famous Jesuite, affecting to be of the counsell of his conscience, Voi altri padri di Iheſu havete la mente al cielo, le mani ol mondo, l' anima al diavolo.

Sect. XVI.

YEt were there the lesse perill of their vehemence, if it were onely rude and boysterous (as in some other sects) that so (as it is in Canon shot) it might be more easily shund, then resisted: but here, the skill of doing mischiefe contends with the power; their mis-zealous passions hide themselves in a pleasing sweetnesse; and they are more beholden to policy, then strength. What Gentleman of any note can crosse our Seas, whose name is not landed in their bookes before hand, in prevention of his person, whom now arrived, if they finde untractable through too much prejudice, they labour first to temper with the plausible conversation of some smooth Catholike of his owne Nation: the name of his Countrey is warrant enough for his insinuation. Not a word yet may be spoken of Religion; as if that were no part of the errand. So have we seene an Hawke cast off at an Hernshaw, to looke and flie a quite other way, and after many careleſſe, and overly fetches, to towre up unto the prey intended. There is nothing wherein this faire companion shall not apply himselfe to his welcome Countryman. At last, when he hath possest himselfe of the heart of his new acquaintance, and got himselfe the reputation of a sweet ingenuity, and delightfull sociableneſſe; he findes opportunities to bestow some witty scoffes upon those parts of our religion, which lie most open to advantage. And now it is time to invite him (after their rarities) to see the Monastery of our English Benedictines, or (if elsewhere) those English Colledges, which the devout beneficence of our well-meaning neighbours (with no other intention then some covetous Farmers lay saltcats in their dove-coats) have bountifully erected. There, it is a wonder if our Traveller meet not with some one, that shall claim kinred or Country of him in a more intire fashion. The Society welcomes him with more then ordinary courteſie: neither can he refuse (except he will be uncivill) to be their gueſt. He cannot mislike the love of his Country men, he cannot fault their carriage. And now that they have mollified the stiffeneſſe of his prejudice, and with much tempring fitted him for their mold, he is a task meet for one of their best workmen; who willingly undertaking it hath learned to handle him so sweetly as if he would have him thinke it a pleasure to be seduced. Do we thinke his Doctor will begin first with the infallibility of their great Master, and perswade him that a Necromancer, an Heretike, an Atheist, cannot erre in Peters Chaire? or tell him that he may buy off his sinnes as familiarly as he may buy wares in the market? or teach him that a man may and must both make and eat his God to his breakfast? This hard meat is for stronger mawes. Hee knowes how first to begin with the spoone, and to offer nothing to a weake stomacke, but discourse of easie digestion: As first, that a Catholike so living and dying (by our confession) may be saved: That there is but one Church, as but one Christ; and that out of this Arke, there is no way but drowning: That this one Church is more likly to be found in all the world, then in a corner; in all ages, then in the last Century of yeares; in unity, then in division. And now comes in the glorious brag of the Roman Universality, their invio'ate Antiquity, their recorded successions, their harmonious unity, their confessed magnificence That there is the mother Church, as to the rest of Christendome, so especially to the

A the Engliſh : How well a Monarchy (the beſt form of government) beſeemes the Church : How unlikely it is that Chriſt would leave his Spouſe in the confuſion of many heads, or of none. And how that we are but a rag torne from their coat ; and where was our religion before Luther lay with Bora ? And what miſerable ſubdiviſions are there in our Proteſtancie ? and what a gleaning are we to the harveſt of Chriſtendome ? with infinite ſuggeſtions of this nature ; able (as they are plauſibly urged) to ſhake an ungrounded judgement : which if they have ſo farre prevailed, as that the hearer will abide himſelfe hood-winkt with this vaile of the Church, how eaſily ſhall time leade him into thoſe hatefuller abſurdities ?

SECT. XVII.

IN all which proceeding, theſe impoſtors have a double advantage : Firſt, that they deliver the opinion of their Church with ſuch mitigation and favour, as thoſe that care to pleaſe, not to informe : forming the voice of the Church to the liking of the hearer, not the judgmẽt of the hearer to the voice of the Church: wherin is it not hard to obſerve that Popery ſpoken and written are two things ; in diſcourſe, nothing is more ordinary then to diſclaime ſome of their received poſitions, & to blanch others. It is the malice of an adverſarie that miſ-reports them, they doe not hold that Images ſhould be adored ; that the wood of the Croſſe ſhould be worſhipped with the very ſame devotion that is due to Chriſt himſelf ; that the Church
C is the Judge of Gods writings ; that Paul the Fift cannot erre ; that a man may merit of his maker, much leſſe ſupererogate ; that a mouſe can run away with that which either is, or was God Almighty ; that it is lawfull to kill an hereticall King, and all other thoſe monſters of opinion, which their moſt claſſicke Authors have both hatcht and ſhamelеſly thruſt into the light of the world. They defie thoſe ridiculous Legends, which we father upon their Church ; and how much do they ſcorn S. Francis his Bird, or his Wolfe, or his wounds, or his Apoſtles of Aſſiſe. Pope Ioane was but a fancy : Never Pope was an hereticke. If now we cry out of impudence, and call their allowed Writers to witnes ; Loe, even they alſo are forged by us, & are taught to play booty on our ſide. Thus reſolved to outface all evidence, they make faire weather of their fouleſt opinions, and enveigh againſt nothing ſo much as the
D ſpightfulneſſe of our ſlanders. It is not poſſible that any wiſe ſtranger ſhould bee in love with the face of their Church, if he might ſee her in her own likenes, & therfore they have cunningly masked one part of it, and painted another, ſo as thoſe features of hers, which are ugly and offenſive, ſhall not appeare to any but her own eyes. And becauſe books are dangerous blabs, and will be telling the generations to come, how ſtrangely that face is altered with Age and Art, therefore their tongues are clipped alſo, and made to ſpeake none but her owne words. Out of this licence, and hope to winne, they can fit their diſhes to every palate, and are ſo ſawcy, as to make the Church belie it ſelfe. Hence it was that a Spaniſh Father could teach, that it is not of the neceſſity of faith, to beleeve that the preſent Pope is the Vicar of Chriſt, and the ſucceſſor of Peter. That Hoſtius the Jeſuite could ſay, that the Pope abuſed his
E keyes, and the authority of the Church, in receiving Henry the Fourth. That another of his fellowes in a diſcourſe with a French Biſhop, could diſparage a deciſion of his Holineſſe in compariſon of a General Councel. That Menas the Reader of Divinity at Valedolid, following Salas the Jeſuite, could affirme the lawfulneſſe of the mariage of religious perſons upon a doubtful revelation. That more then one of that Order, have dared to broach Confeſſion by letters, againſt the Bull of Clement the Eight. And if theſe men be not ſparing of their contradictions to that Vice-God of theirs, whoſe vaſſals they are by peculiar profeſſion, how much more boldly will they ſwimme againſt the ſtreame of any common opinion, that may concerne the bodie of that head ?

Sect. XVIII.

THeir ſecond advantage is, that they regard not with what untruths they make good their own aſſertions: It is all one with what morter or rubbiſh they build up a ſide. From hence flow the confident reports, both of their miracles to convince us, and their ſlanders to diſgrace us. Father Hayndius, a Jeſuite of 33. yeares ſtanding, amongſt 52. complaints, which (out of an honeſt remorſe) he put up againſt his owne Societie, to their Generall Aquaviva, finds this not the leaſt, that his fellowes ſhamed not to ſeeke the honour of their Order, by cogging of miracles. What packets flie about daily of their Indian wonders? Even Cardinall Bellarmine can abide to come in as an avoucher of theſe coozenages; who dares averre that his fellow Xavier had not only healed the deafe, dumbe, and blinde, but raiſed the dead, whiles his brother Acoſta, after many yeares ſpent in thoſe parts, can pull him by the ſleeve, and tell him in his eare, ſo loud that all the world may heare him, Prodigia nulla producimus, neque vero eſt opus. Of the ſame ſtampe are the daily-renewed miracles, revelations, viſions, wherewith any mans eares muſt needs bee beaten amongſt them. Africke was at the beſt but barren of novelties, in compariſon of Rome; & yet the world is incredulous, if it will not ſuffer it ſelfe to be gulled with theſe holy frauds. And no fewer are thoſe lewd calumniations (the ſtuffe of all their invectives) whereby they labour to make us loathſome to the world: our perſons, our doctrines are loaded with reproaches; neither matters it how juſt they are, but how ſpightfull. What other meaſure can bee expected of us, when their beſt friends have thus (upon ſome private diſlikes) ſmarted from them? Their owne holy Fathers, Clement the Eighth, and Sixtus Quintus, and with them (the honour of the Jeſuiticall Order) Cardinall Tollet, can all ſhew bloody wales in their backes, from their laſhes. Their late Patron of famous memory, whoſe heart they well merited, and keepe it (as their deare relique) enſhrined in their la Fleſche, was after his death in their Pulpits proclaimed Tyran and worſe: no marvell then if after the virulent declamations of our Gifford (their Gabriel) and the malicious ſuggeſtions of others of that viperous brood, wee have much adoe to perſwade our neighbours, that we have any Churches, Baptiſme, Liturgie, Religion. I appeale then to all eyes and eares, how eaſie it is for a man that will take leave to himſelfe, of making what truths he liſts, and defending them by what untruths he pleaſeth, to leade a credulous heart whither he pleaſeth.

Sect. XIX.

BUt if the power of falſified reaſon prevaile not, theſe deſperate factors of Rome (as I have beene informed) have learned out of their acquaintance in the Court of the Prince of darkneſſe, to imploy ſtronger aid. On ſome of their hands, I feare, Magicall deluſions, & deviliſh incantations ſhall not want, rather than they will want a client. Neither can this ſeeme ſtrange to any that knowes how familiarly the Roman Church profeſſes the ſolemne practiſe of conjuration; in ſuch a faſhion, as it doth more than trouble the beſt Caſuiſts, to ſet down a perfect difference betwixt their ſacred Magick, and the Diabolicall. From hence perhaps have proceeded thoſe miraculous apparitions (if at leaſt they were any other but fancy, or fraud) wherewith ſome of our death-ſicke Gentlemen amongſt them have bin frighted into Catholikes. A famous Divine of France, ſecond to none for learning, or fidelitie, told me this one amongſt other inſtances, of his owne experience, which he yet lives to juſtifie: A Gentleman of the Religion, whoſe wife was popiſhly devoted, lying upon the bed of his ſickneſſe, in expectation of death, ſends for this Divine, his Paſtor; the ſicke mans wife ſends for a Jeſuite; both meet at the beds ſide; each perſwades him to his owne part; both plead for their religion at this barre, before theſe Judges: after two houres diſputation, not onely the Gentleman was cheerefully confirmed in in that Judgment, which he had embraced, but his wife alſo, out of the evidence of truth, began to incline to him, and it. The Jeſuit departed diſcontent; yet within ſome few houres after, returning (when the coaſt was cleerer) intreats ſome private conference with the Gentlewoman; with whom walking in her garden, he did vehemently expoſtulate, mixing therewithall his ſtrongeſt perſwaſions; at laſt, to ſhut up his diſcourſe, he importun'd her with many obſecrations, that ſhe would vouchſafe to receive from his hands a little box which he there offered her, and for his ſake weare about her continually: ſhe condeſcended. No ſooner had ſhee taken it, then ſhe fell to ſo great a deteſtation of her huſband, that ſhee could by no meanes bee drawne into his preſence, and within two dayes after in this eſtate ſhe died. An act more worthy the ſword of Juſtice, then the pen of an Adverſarie. Theſe courſes are as ſecret as wicked. Not daring therefore peremptorily to accuſe, I had rather leave theſe practiſes to further inquiry. Sure I am, that by their tongues, Satan labours to inchant the world, and hath ſtrongly deluded too many ſoules. And are we weary of ours, that we dare tempt God, and offer our ſelves as challengers to this ſpirituall danger? The Jeſuites, amongſt much change of houſes, have two famous for the accordance of their names; one called The Bow, at Nola; the other, The Arrow, (la Fleſche) in France: though this latter were more worthy of the name of a whole Quiver, containing not fewer then eight hundred ſhafts of all ſizes. Their Apoſtate Fryer (if I ſhall not honour him too much) plaid upon them in his Diſtich:

Arcum Nola dedit, dedit illis alma Sagittam
Gallia; quis funem, quem meruere, dabit?
Nola the bow, and France the ſhaft did bring:
But who ſhall helpe them to an hempen ſtring?

This proviſion is for the care of Chriſtian Princes: but in the meane time, what madneſſe is it in us, not onely to give aime to theſe roving Flights, but to offer our ſelves to bee their ſtanding Butt, that they may take their full aime and hit us level at pleaſure? Doe wee not heare ſome of their owne fellow Catholikes in the middeſt of their awfulleſt Senate, the Parliament of Paris, pleading vehemently againſt thoſe factious ſpirits, and crying out paſſionately of that danger (which will follow upon their admiſſion) both of lewd manners, and falſe doctrine; and doe we in greater oppoſition feare neither? and eſpecially from Engliſh Jeſuites? Some Countries yeeld more venomous vipers then others; ours the worſt. I would it were not too eaſie to obſerve, that as our Engliſh Papiſts are commonly moſt Jeſuitiſh, ſo our Engliſh Jeſuites are more furious then their fellowes. Even thoſe of the hotteſt Climates cannot match them in fiery diſpoſitions. And doe we put our ſelves out of our comfortable Sunneſhine, into the midſt of the flame of theſe noted Incendiaries? Doe we take pleaſure to make them rich with the ſpoile of our ſoules? and becauſe they will not come faſt enough to fetch theſe booties, doe we goe to carry them unto their pillage?

Sect. XX.

THe danger is in the men more then in their cauſe; and if this great Curtizan of the world had not ſo cunning Panders, I ſhould wonder how ſhee ſhould get any but fooliſh cuſtomers. The Searcher of all hearts (before whoſe Tribunall I ſhall once come to give an account of this Cenſure) knows that I ſpeak it not maliciouſly; Him I call to witneſſe, that I could not find any true life of Religion amongſt thoſe that would be Catholikes: I meddle not with the errors of Speculations, or Schoole points; wherein their judgement palpably offendeth: I ſpeake of the lively practice of Piety. What have they amongſt them but a very out-ſide of Chriſtianity, a meere formality of devotion? Looke into their Churches, there their poore ignorant Laity hope to preſent their beſt ſervices to God; and yet alas, they ſay they know not what, they heare they know not what, they doe they know not what; returning empty of all hearty edification, & onely full of confuſed intentions; and are taught to thinke this ſacrifice of fooles meritorious. Looke their Chemarims upon the ſacred actors in this religious Scene; what ſhall you ſee but idle Apiſhneſſe in their ſolemneſt worke, and either mockery or ſlumbering? Looke into their religious houſes; what ſhall you ſee but a trade of careleſſe and lazy holines? houres obſerved, becauſe they muſt, not becauſe they would. What doe they but lull piety a ſleepe with their heartleſſe and ſleepy Veſpers? Looke into the private cloſets of their devout Ignorants; what difference ſhall you ſee betwixt the Image and Suppliant? If they can heare their beads knacke upon each other, they are not bid to care for hearing their praiers reflect upon heaven: Shortly, in all that belongs to God, the worke done ſufficeth, yea meriteth; and what need the heart be wrought upon for a taske of the hand? Looke into the melancholike Cels of ſome auſtere Recluſes; there you may finde perhaps an haire-cloth, or a whip, or an heardle; but ſhew mee true mortification, the power of ſpirituall renovation of the ſoule. How ſhould that bee found there, when as that ſaving faith (which is the onely purger of the heart) is barred out as preſumptuous? and no gueſt of that kinde allowed, but the ſame which is common to Devills? what Papiſt in all Chriſtendome hath ever beene heard to pray daily with his family; or to ſing but a Pſalme at home? Look into the univerſall courſe of the Catholike life; there ſhall you finde the Decalogue profeſſedly broken, beſides the ordinary practiſe of Idolatry, and frequence of oathes. Who ever ſaw Gods day duly kept in any city, village, houſhold under the juriſdiction of Rome? Every obſcure holy-day takes the wall of it, and thruſts it into the channell. Who ſees not obedience to authority ſo ſlighted, that it ſtands only to the mercy of humane diſpenſation? and in the reſt of Gods Lawes, who ſees not how foule ſinnes paſſe for veniall? and how eaſily veniall ſinnes paſſe their ſatisfaction: for which a croſſe, or a drop of holy-water is ſufficient amends? Who ſees not how no place can be left for truth, where there is full roome given to equivocation? All this, though it be harſh to the conſcionable man, yet is no leſſe pleaſing to the carnall. The way of outward faſhionableneſſe in religion, and inward liberty of heart, cannot but ſeeme faire to nature; and eſpecially when it hath ſo powerfull angariation. It is a wonder if but one halfe of Chriſtendome be thus wonne to walke in it. Thoſe which are either ungrounded in the principles of religion, or the unconſcionable in the practiſe, are fit to travell into theſe miſerable errors: But though Iſrael play the harlot, yet let not Iudah ſinne. Come ye not to Gilgal, neither goe ye up to Bethaven.

SECT. XXI.

FRom the danger of corruption in judgement, let us turne our eyes to the depravation of manners; which not ſeldome goes before: Apples therefore fall from the tree, becauſe they be worme-eaten; they are not worm-eaten becauſe they fall: and, as uſually followes, Satan like the Raven, firſt ſeazes upon the eye of underſtanding, & then preyes freely upon the other carkaſe. We may be bad enough at home, certainly we are the worſe for our neighbours. Old Rome was not more jealous of the Grecian and African manners, then wee have reaſon to be of the Romane. It were well if wee knew our owne faſhions, better if we could keepe them.

What miſchiefe have we amongſt us that we have not borrowed? To begin at our skin: who knowes not whence we had the varietie of our vaine diſguiſes? As if wee had not wit enough to be fooliſh, unleſſe we were taught it. Theſe dreſſes being conſtant in their mutabilitie, ſhew us our maſters. What is it that wee have not learned of our neighbours, ſave onely to be proud good cheape? Whom would it not vex to ſee how that other ſexe hath learned to make Antiks and monſters of themſelves? Whence came their hips to the ſhoulders, and their breſts to the navill; but

A but the one from ſome ill-ſhap't Dames of France, and the other from the worſe-minded Curtizans of Italy? Whence elſe learned they to dawbe theſe mudde-walls with Apothecaries morter; and thoſe high waſhes, which are ſo cunningly lickt on, that the wet napkin of Phryne ſhould be deceived? Whence the friſled and poudred buſhes of their borrowed excrement? as if they were aſhamed of the head of Gods making, and proud of the Tire-womans? Where learned we that deviliſh Art and practice of Duell, wherein men ſeek honour in blood, and are taught the ambition of being glorious butchers of men? Where had we that luxurious delicacie in our feaſts, in which the noſe is no leſſe pleaſed, then the palate; and the eye no leſſe then either? wherein the piles of diſhes make barricadoes againſt the appetite, and with a pleaſing encombrance trouble an hungry gheſt? Where, thoſe formes of ceremo-
B nious quaffing, in which men have learned to make Gods of others, and beaſts of themſelves? and loſe their reaſon, whiles they pretend to do reaſon? where, the lawleſneſſe (miſ-called freedome) of a wilde tongue, that runnes with reynes in the necke, thorow the bed chamber of Princes, their Cloſets, their Counſell-Tables, and ſpares not the very Cabinet of their breſts, much leſſe can be barr'd out of the moſt retired ſecrecie of inferiour greatneſſe? Where, the change of noble attendance, and hoſpitalitie, into foure wheeles, and ſome few butterflies? Where, the Art of diſhoneſtie in practicall Machiaveliſme, in falſe equivocations? Where, the ſlight account of that filthineſſe, which is but condemned as veniall, and tolerated as not unneceſſarie? Where, the skill of civil & honourable hypocriſie, in thoſe formall complements, which doe neither expect beleefe from others, not carie any
C from our ſelves? where, that unnaturall villany, which though it were burnt with fire and brimſtone from heaven, and the aſhes of it drowned in the dead ſea, yet hath made ſhift to revive, and cals for new vengeance upon the actors? Where, that cloſe Atheiſme, which ſecretly laughs God in the face, and thinkes it weakeneſſe to beleeve, wiſdome to profeſſe any religion? Where, the bloody and tragicall ſcience of King-killing; the new divinity of diſobedience and rebellion; with too many other evils, wherewith foraine converſation hath indangered the infection of our peace? Lo here, deare Country-men, the fruit of your idle gaddings: Better perhaps might be had; but he was never acquainted at home, that knowes not our nature to be like unto fire, which if there be any infection in the roome, drawes it ſtraight to it ſelfe: Or like unto Iet, which omitting all precious objects, gathers up ſtrawes
D and duſt. Ilanders have beene ever in an ill name. Wherefore? ſave onely for the confluence of forainers, which never come without the fraight of their nationall wickedneſſe. The experience wherof hath moved ſome witty Nations, both ancient & preſent, to ſhut themſelves up within their owne bounds, and to barre the intercourſe of ſtrãgers, as thoſe that thought beſt to content themſelves with their owne faults. A corrupt diſpoſition, out of a naturall fertilitie, can both beget and conceive evill alone; but if it be ſeconded by examples, by precepts, by incouragements, the Ocean it ſelfe hath not ſo much ſpawne, as it: in all which regards, hee hath eſcaped well, that returnes but what he caried; but hee is worthy of memory, that returnes either more good, or leſſe evill. Some have come home perhaps more ſparing, others more ſuttle, others more outwardly courteous; others more capricious, ſome
E more tongue-free, few ever better. And if themſelves be not ſenſible of their alterations, yet their Countrey and the Church of God feeles and rues them.

Sect. XXII.

LEt me therefore have leave to ſhut up this Diſcourſe with a double Sute, one to our Gentry, the other to ſupreme authoritie; both which ſhall come from the bottome of an heart unfainedly ſacrificed to the common good: neither ſpeake I words, but my very ſoule unto both. To the former my ſuite is, that they would bee happy at home: God hath given us a world of our owne, wherein there is nothing wanting to earthly contentment. Whither goe ye then, worthy Countrymen, or what ſeeke yee? Here growes that wealth, which yee goe but to ſpend abroad: Here is that ſweet peace which the reſt of the world admires and envies: Here is that gracious and well-tempered government, which no Nation under heaven may dare once offer to parallel: Here all liberall Arts raigne and triumph: And for pleaſure, either our earth, or our ſea yeelds us all thoſe dainties, which their native Regions enjoy but ſingle. Laſtly, here Heaven ſtands open, which to many other parts is barred on the out-ſide with ignorance or miſbeleefe. And ſhall our wantonneſſe contemne all this bounty of God, and carry us to ſeeke that, which we ſhall finde no where but behinde us, but within us? Shall the affection of ſome frivolous toyes draw us away from the fruition of thoſe ſolid comforts, which are offered us within our owne doores? How many of ours, whom their juſt offence hath caſt out of the boſome of their Country, compare their exile with death, and can ſcarce abide to bid that breath welcome, which they are forced to draw in a foraine aire; and though freedome of conſcience entertaine them never ſo liberally abroad, yet reſolve either to live or die at home; and doe we ſuffer our folly to baniſh us from thoſe contentments, which they are glad to redeeme with the hazard of their blood? are wee ſo little in our owne bookes, that wee can be content to purchaſe outlandiſh ſuperfluities, with the miſ-cariage of our ſoules, with the danger of miſcariage, with the likelihood of danger? Are we ſo fooliſh, that whiles we may ſweetly enjoy the ſetled eſtate of our Primogeniture, we will needs bring upon our ſelves the curſe of Ruben, to runne abroad like water; whoſe qualitie it is, not eaſily to be kept within the proper bounds; yea the curſe of Cain, to put our ſelves from the ſide of Eden, into the land of Nod, that is, of demigration? None of the leaſt imprecations, which David makes againſt Gods enemies, is, Make them like unto a wheele, O Lord. Motion is ever accompanied with unquietneſſe, and both argues, & cauſes imperfection, whereas the happy eſtate of heaven is deſcribed by reſt; whoſe glorious ſpheres in the meane time, doe ſo perpetually move, that they are never removed from their places. It is not the leaſt part either of wiſdome, or happineſſe, to know when wee are well. Shall we not be ſhameleſſely unthankfull, if we cannot ſing the note of that great Choriſter of God, My lot is falne to mee in a good ground? Hath not the munificence of God made this Iland as it were an abridgement of this whole earth, in which he hath contrived (though in a leſſe letter) all the maine and materiall commodities of the greater world; and doe we make a priſon where God meant a Paradiſe? Enjoy therfore (happy Country-men) enjoy freely God and your ſelves; enrich your ſelves with your owne mines, improue thoſe bleſſed opportunities which God hath given you, to your mutuall advantage; and care not to be like any but your ſelves.

SECT. XXIII.

AND if at any time theſe unworthy papers may fall betwixt the hands of my Soveraigne Maſter, or any of his grave and honourable Miniſters of State, let the meanneſſe of ſo weake and obſcure ſolicitors preſume to commend this matter to their deepeſt conſideration, and out of an honeſt zeale of the common ſafetie, ſue to them for a more ſtrict reſtraint of that dangerous libertie, whereof too many are bold to carve to themſelves. Who can bee ignorant of thoſe wiſe and wholeſome lawes, which are enacted already to this purpoſe? or of thoſe carefull and juſt cautions, wherewith the licences of Travell are ever limited? But what are we the better for Gods owne lawes, without execution? Or what are limits unto the lawleſſe? Good lawes are the hedges of the Common-wealth: juſt diſpenſations are as gates, or ſtiles in the hedge. If every ſtraggler may at pleaſure caſt open a gap in this fence of the State, what are we the better for this quick-ſet, then if we lay open to the common? Who ſees not how familiarly our yong Recuſants immediatly upon their diſcloſing, are ſent over for their full hatching and making? Italy, Spaine, Artois, and now of late France it ſelfe provides neſts, and perches, and mewes for theſe birds

A birds, with the ſame confidence, wherewith wee breed our owne at home; which when they are once wel acquainted with the Romane lure, are ſent backe againe fit for the prey. And as for thoſe of our owne feather: whereas the libertie of their travell is bounded chiefly with this double charge: one, that they have no converſation or conference with Jeſuits, or other dangerous perſons; the other, that they paſſe not into the dominions of the Kings enemies; both theſe are ſo commonly neglected, as if they were intended onely for a verball formalitie, yea, as if the Prohibition meant to teach men what they ſhould doe. Every of our Novices hath learned to make no difference of men; and dare breathe in the poyſonous ayre of Italy it ſelfe, and touch the very pommell of the chaire of peſtilence. It is this licentious freedome (which we miſ-call Open hearted ingenuity) that undoes us. Doe we not
B ſee the wary cloſeneſſe of our Adverſaries, which wil not ſo much as abide one of our books (a mute ſollicitor) to harbour in any of their coaſts? How many of the Italian or Spaniſh Nobleſſe have we knowe allowed to venture their education in our Courts or Univerſities? Doe they lie thus at the locke, and doe we open our breſt, and diſplay our armes, and bid an enemie ſtrike where he liſt? Since then wee have no more wit, or care, then to bee willingly guilty of our owne ſhame; oh that the hands of ſupreme Authoritie would bee pleaſed to locke us within our owne doores, and to keepe the keyes at their owne girdle! And (to ſpeake truth) to what purpoſe are thoſe ſtrait and capitall inhibitions of the returne of our factious fugitives into this Kingdome, if whiles the wicket is ſhut upon them, that they ſhould not come to us, the Poſterne bee open to us, that we may goe to them? As all intercourſe is perilous, ſo that is moſt, which is by our owne provocation. Here yet they
C dare but lurke in ſecret, and take onely ſome ſudden ſnatches at a weake prey, like unto evening-wolves, that never walke forth but under the cloak of the night; but in their owne territories, they can ſhew the Sunne their ſpoiles, and thinke this act worthy of garlands and trophees. Here wee have maſtives to ſecure our flockes: there the prey goes ſtragling alone to the mouth of their dennes, without protection, without aſſiſtance, and offers to be devoured. Yee whom the choice of God hath made the great Shepheards of his people, whoſe charge it is to feed them by government, ſuffer not their ſimplicitie to betray their lives unto the fangs of theſe cruel beaſts; but chaſe them home rather, from the willfull ſearch of their owne perdition, and ſhut them up together in your ſtrong and ſpacious folds, that they may
D be at once ſafe, and yee glorious.

Sect. XXIV.

LAſtly, for thoſe, whom neceſſary occaſions draw forth of their owne coaſts (that wee may have done with thoſe, which like fooliſh Papiſts goe on pilgrimage to ſee another blocke better dreſſed then at home) let me ſay to them, as Simeon that prophetical Monk ſaid to the pillars which he whipped before the earthquake; Stand faſt, for ye ſhall be ſhaken. And therefore, as the Crane, when ſhee is to fly againſt an high wind, doth ballace her ſelf with ſtones in her bill, that ſhe may cut the ayre with more ſteddineſſe; ſo let them carefully fore-inſtruct, & poize them-E ſelves with the ſound knowledge of the Principles of Religion, that they may not be caried about with every wind of doctrine: Whereto if they adde but thoſe leſſons, which they are taught by the State, in their letters of paſſage, there may bee hope, they ſhall bring backe the ſame ſoules they caried. It was at leaſt an inclination to a fall, that Eve tooke boldneſſe to hold chat with the Serpent. And as ſubtill Lawyers deſire no more advantage in the quarrell which they would picke at conveyances, then many words: ſo neither doe our Adverſaries. Whiles our eares are open, and our tongues free, they will hope well of our very denials. Error is crafty, and out of the power of his Rhetorical inſinuations, oft-times caries away probabilitie from truth. I remember in that famous Embaſſie of three Philoſophers, which Athens ſent to Rome, Critolaus, Diogenes, and Carneades, there falling out many occaſions of diſcourſe, wiſe Cato perſwaded the Senate to a ſpeedie diſmiſſion of thoſe (otherwiſe wiſe welcome) gheſts, Becauſe (ſaid he) whiles Carneades diſputes, ſcarce any man A can diſcerne which is the truth. There is more danger of theſe ſpirituall Sophiſters, by how much the buſineſſe is more important, and their ſubtilty greater. Let our paſſenger therefore (as that wiſe Grecian ſerved his fellowes) ſtop up his eares with waxe againſt theſe Syrens. Our Saviour would not give Satan audience even whiles he ſpake true; becauſe he knew that truth was but to countenance error. There is ever true corne ſtrowed under a pitfall: thoſe eares are full and weightie, which we dreſſe with Lime to deceive the poore birds in a ſnow. No fiſher lets downe an empty hooke, but cloathed with a proper and pleaſing bait. Theſe Impoſtors have no other errand, but deceit. If he love himſelfe, let him be afraid of their favours, and thinke their frownes ſafer then their ſmiles. And if at any times (as no fly is B more importunate) they thruſt themſelves into his converſation, let him (as thoſe which muſt neceſſarily paſſe by a carrion in the way) hold his breath, and haſten to be out of their aire. And if they yet follow him in his flight, let him turne backe to them with the Angels farewell, Increpet te Dominus.

A N.

HOSPITALL SERMON PREACHED IN THE SOLEMNE ASSEMBLY OF THE CITY ON Munday in Easter weeke, 1618.

By Jos. Hall.

Imprinted at London in the yeare 1634.

TO MY MVCH HONOR'D FRIEND

Sir HENRY BAKER Knight and Baronet.

SIR,

AMongſt many, to whom my poore labours owe much for their acceptation, I know none that can challenge ſo deepe a debt as your ſelfe: If others have taſted of my well-meant papers, you have fed heartily on them; and ſo made them your owne, that your memory may compare with others eyes, and your practiſe with the ſpeculation of others: Neither have your hand or tongue beene niggardly diſſemblers of your ſpirituall gaine. Unto you therefore (to whoſe name I had long ſince in my deſires devoted my next) doe I ſend this meane preſent: A Sermon importunately deſired of many: That which the preſent Auditors found uſefull, the Preſſe ſhall communicate to poſteritie; The gaine of either, or both, is no leſſe mine: I doubt not but you have already ſo acted that part of this diſcourſe which concerneth you, that the direction I give to others, is but an hiſtory of what you have done. And goe on happily (worthy Sir) in thoſe your holy courſes which ſhall leade you to immortalitie; and ſo uſe your riches, that they may be made up into a Crowne for your head in a better world: My hearty well-wiſhes ſhall not be wanting to you and your vertuous Lady, as whom you have obliged to be juſtly

Worceſter, April 14.

Yours,
IOS: HALL.

THE RIGHTEOVS MAMMON.

1. TIM. 6. 17.

Charge them that are rich in this werld, that they be not high-minded, nor truſt in uncertaine riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy, &c.

THoſe things which are excellent, and beneficiall in their uſe, are dangerous in their miſcariage: It were loſt labour for me to perſwade you how good riches are: your pains and your cares are ſufficient proofes of your eſtimation; and how deadly the abuſe of them is many a ſoule feeles that cannot returne to complaine; There is nothing more neceſſary therefore for a Chriſtiau heart, then to bee rectified in the menaging of a proſperous eſtate; and to learne ſo to be happy here, that it may be more happie hereafter; a taske which this Text of ours undertakes, and (if ye be not wanting to it and your ſelves) will bee ſure to performe: what ſhould I need to entreat your attention (Right Honourable, right Worſhipfull, and beloved) to a buſineſſe ſo neere concerning you? The errand is Gods; the uſe of it yours.

I never held it ſafe to pull Scripture in peeces: theſe words fall alone into their parts. Timothy is ſet upon the ſpirituall Bench, and muſt give the charge. A charge, to whom? Of what? To whom? To the rich. Of what? what they muſt avoid, what they muſt indevour. What muſt they avoid? High-mindedneſſe and truſt in wealth: what are the duties they muſt labour unto? Confidence in God; Beneficence to men: And every one of theſe is backed with a reaſon to inforce it: Why ſhould they not be high-minded? Their wealth is but in this world; Why ſhould they not truſt in riches? They are uncertaine. Why ſhould they truſt in God? He is a living God, and a liberal God: why ſhould they extend their Beneficence to men? By this they lay up to themſelves a ſure foundation; Here is worke enough, you ſee, for my diſcourſe, and your practice: The God of Heaven bleſſe it in both our hands.

The Charge hath (Ianus lik) a double aſpect; one that looks up to S. Paul, the other that lookes downe to Timothy, and from him to the rich: In the firſt there is Apoſtolicall ſuperioritie; for (παραγγελλε) Charge thou, referres to παραγγελλω σοι verſ. 13. I Charge thee; ſo Paul charges Timothy to charge the rich; He that gives the Charge, if he be not the chiefe of the Bench, yet hee is greater then the Jurie. The firſt foundation of the Church is laid in an inequalitie, and hath ever ſince ſo continued; There can bee no harmony, where all the ſtrings or voices are of one tenour; In the latter, as it lookes on Timothy; it caries in it Epiſcopal power, Euangelical ſufficiency. Epiſcopall power; for this Charge is by the vulgar turned, and the Tranſlation of the Syriac, Præcipe, command; and ſo doe we tranſlate it in the firſt of this Epiſtle, and the third verſe; Timothy was left at Epheſus (ἵνα παραγγείλῃ) to command.

Maldonat could incline to that: in locum.

The rich are commonly great; Nobility in the account of God is joyned with wealth; Curſe not the King in thy thought, nor the rich in thy Bed-chamber, ſaith Salomon; ſo Dives at whoſe gates Lazarus lay, is by ſome no meane ones gheſſed to be Herod, or ſome other King; and ſo are Iobs friends termed by the ſeventy: Yea, the rich is not onely a little King among his neigbours, but Dives, quaſi divus; as a petty god to his underlings: and yet even the rich man that (as Salomon notes) ſpeakes with command unto others, he muſt be ſpoken to with command. Command the rich. That fooliſh ſhaveling ſoared too high a pitch, when in his imperious Bull he commands the Angels; Francis of Aſſiſe and he were both of a Diet; But we may ſafely ſay, that all powers below the Angels, are lyable to our ſpirituall Charge; and this Command implyes obedience; Elſe to what purpoſe doe we command & goe without? Chriſt gave us the keyes, (for that which the Romaniſts would plead out of Origen, of Claves cæli, The keyes of heaven to the reſt, and Claves cælorum, The keyes of heavens to Peter, is a diſtinction without a difference;) What becomes of them? That I may not ſay, on ſome of our hands they are ſuffered to ruſt for want of uſe; on others (as the Pontificians) the wards are altered, ſo as they can neither open not ſhut: ſure I am; that (if they be not loſt on their behalfe, whether in diſ-uſe, or abuſe) the power of them is loſt in the hearts of many: They have ſecret pick-locks of their owne making, Preſumption and Security, whereby they can open heaven-gates, though double-locked by our cenſures, and ſhut the gates of hell at pleaſure, which their owne ſinnes have opened wide to receive them. What uſe is there of us, but in our chaire? and there, but to be heard, and ſeene? Even in this ſenſe ſpectaculo facti ſumus; we are to gaze on, not to imploy. Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye raigne as Kings without us; wee are weake, ye are ſtrong; ye are Honourable, but we are deſpiſed. It was well noted by one, that the good father of the prodigall, though he might himſelfe have brought forth the prime robe, or have led his ſonne into his wardrobe to take it, yet hee commands his ſervants to bring it forth (Proferte ſtolam) becauſe he would bring meanes into credit, becauſe he would have his ſonne beholden to his ſervants, for their glory. It is a bold word, but a true one, Yee ſhall never weare the long white robe, unleſſe his ſervants your Miniſters bring it, and put it on. He that can ſave you without us, will not ſave you, but by us: He hath not tyed himſelfe to meanes, man he hath; He could create you immediately to himſelfe: but he will have you begotten by the immortall ſeed of your ſpirituall Fathers. Woe be to you therefore, if our word have loſt the power of it in you: you have loſt your right in heaven: Let us never come there, if you can come thither ordinarily without us. The words of the wiſe (ſaith Salomon) are like goades, like nayles; But if theſe goads light upon the skin of a Leviathan, who eſteemes yron as ſtraw, and braſſe as rotten wood; If theſe nayles meet with yron, or marble in their driving, that they turne againe: What ſhall we ſay, but our Goſpell is hid to them that periſh; and woe unto your ſoules, for ye have rewarded evill to your ſelves.

Hitherto the power implied in this charge; the ſufficiencie followeth: This Euangelicus muſt be parangelicus; like as the fore-runner of Chriſt had a charge for all ſorts, ſo muſt his followers; So hath Timothy in this Epiſtle, A charge for wives, for Biſhops, for Deacons, for widowes, for ſervants, and here for the rich. He muſt charge; and how ſhall he charge, if he have neither ſhot not powder. It is no bragge to ſay that no nation under Heaven ſince the Goſpell lookt forth into the world, ever had ſo many, ſo learned Teachers as this Iland hath at this day. Hierome ſaid of old to his Paulinus, De Hieroſolymis & de Britannia, æqualiter patet aula cæleſtis: Heaven is open in Britaine as in Hieruſalem. It holds well, if you take it for a propheticall compariſon betwixt Ieruſalem as it had beene, and Britaine as it ſhould be. Ieruſalem the type of Gods Church upon earth, in the glory of all her legall magnificence, was never more bleſſed then this Church of ours: For the Northerne part of it beyond the Twede, we ſaw not, wee heard not of a Congregation (whereof indeed there is not ſo great frequence) without a preaching Miniſter; and though their maintenance hath beene generally but ſmall, yet their paines have beene great, and their

A succeſſe ſutable: And now lately, his Sacred Majeſtie in his laſt yeares journey (as if the Sunne did out of compaſſion goe beyond his Tropick Line, to give heat unto the Northerne Climate) hath ſo ordered it, that their meanes ſhall be anſwerable to theirs labours; ſo as both Paſtors and People profeſſe themſelves mutually bleſſed in each other; and bleſſe God and their King for this bleſſednesse.

As for the learning and ſufficiency of thoſe Teachers (whether Prelats or Presbyters) our eares were for ſome of them ſufficient witneſſes; and wee are not worthy of our eares, if our tongues doe not thankfully proclaime it to the world. As for this Southerne part, when I conſider the face of our Church in an univerſality, me thinkes I ſee the firmament in a cleare night, beſpangled with goodly ſtarres of all magnitudes, that yeeld a pleaſing diverſitie of light unto the earth; But withall
B through the incomparable multitude of Cures and the incompetent proviſion of ſome, we cannot but ſee ſome of our people (eſpecially in the utmoſt skirts) like to thoſe that live under the Southerne Pole, where the ſtarres are thinner ſet; and ſome ſtarres there are in our Hemiſphere, like thoſe little ſparkles in the Galaxy, or Milkie circle, wherin yee can ſcarce diſcerne any light: The deſire of our hearts muſt be, that every Congregation, every ſoule might have a Timothy to deliver the charge of God powerfully unto it, even with Saint Pauls change of note: That every one which hath a charge, were (διδακτικὸς) able to give the charge; and every hearer (σποδεκτικὸς) ready to take it: Wherein I cannot but thankefully congratulate the happineſſe of this famous City, which if in other riches it equalize the beſt, I am ſure in this it exceeds all. There is not a Citie under the cope of heaven ſo wealthy
C in the ſpirituall proviſion; yea, there are whole countries in Chriſtendome, that have not ſo many learned Preachers, as are within theſe wals and liberties. Heare this ye Citizens, and be not proud, but thankefull; Others may exceede you in the glory of outward ſtructure, in the largeneſſe of extent, in the uniforme proportion of ſtreets, or ornaments of Temples, but your pulpits doe ſurpaſſe theirs; and if preaching can lift up Cities unto heaven, ye are not upon earth. Happie is it for you, if yee be well fed and taught; & woe be unto you, if you doe not thinke your ſelves happy.

Charge them, but whom? The rich. Man that came naked out of the wombe of the earth, was even then ſo rich, that all things were his; Heaven was his roofe or The rich.
Canopie, earth his floore, the ſea his pond, the Sunne and Moone his Torches, all creatures his vaſſals; And if he loſt the fulneſſe of this Lordſhip, by being a ſlave to D ſinne, yet we have ſtil Dominium gratificum, as Gerſon tearmes it: every ſonne of Abraham is heire of the world. But to make up the true reputation of wealth (for thus Rom. 4. 31.
we may bee as having all things, and poſſeſſing nothing) another right is required beſides ſpirituall, which is a civill and humane right; wherein I doubt not but our learned Wicklef, and the famous Archbiſhop of Armach, & the more famous Chancellor of Paris (three renowned Divines of England, France, and Ireland) have had much wrong, whiles they are accuſed to teach, that men in theſe earthly things have no tenure but grace, no title but Charitie: which queſtionleſſe they intended in foro interiori, in the Conſiſtorie of God, not in the Common pleas of men; in the Courts, not of Law, but of Conſcience, in which onely it may fall out, that the Civill owner Titulum Charitatis Dom.a Sotã de Iuſtitia & Iure.
E may bee a ſpirituall uſurper, and the ſpirituall owner may bee a civill beggar. God frames his language to ours, and ſpeaking according to that Ius Gentium, whereon the diviſions of theſe earthly poſſeſſiõs are grounded, he cals ſome rich, others poore. Thoſe heretikes which called themſelves Apoſtolique (as ſome-body doth now at Rome) before the time of Epiphanius and Auguſtine, which taught the unlawfulneſſe of al earthly proprieties, ſeconded in Auſtins time, by our countryman Pelagius, & in our times by ſome of the illuminate Elders of Munſter, are not worth confutation; or if hey were, our Apoſtle hath done it to our hands, in this one word, Rich; for therecan bee neither rich nor poore in a communitie; Neither doth he ſay, Charge men that they be not rich, but, Charge the rich that they be not high-minded.

Wth theſe let us couple our ignorant Votaries, that place holineſſe in want; with whom, their very croſſes cannot deliver their coyne from ſinne; which, to make good tie rule, that it is better to give then to receive, give all they have away at once for but a licence to begge for ever. Did theſe men ever heare that the bleſſing of God maketh rich? That the wings of riches carie them up to heaven? That the crowne of the wiſe is their wealth? Do they not know, that if Lazarus were poore, yet Abraham was rich, and Pium Pauperem ſuſcepit ſinus divitis; It was the happineſſe of poore Lazarus, that he was lodged in the boſome of rich Abraham. I am no whit afraid, (O ye rich Citizens) leſt this paradoxe of our holy Mendicants ſhall make you out of love with your wealth; I feare, ſome of you would be rich, though yee might not; Now we tell you from him, whoſe title is Rich in mercy, that ye may be at once rich and holy; In divitiis cupiditatem reprehendit, non facultatem, ſaith Auſtine: It is a true word of the ſonne of Sirach, which I would have you carie home with you, and write it as a fit Motto, in your Counting-houſe; Bona eſt ſubſtantia, ſi non ſit peccatum in conſcientia: Subſtance doth well in the hand, if there bee not evill in the heart, Eccleſiaſticus 13. 25. A B

Charge the rich. Who are they? There is nothing wherein is greater miſpriſion. One man in Laodician conceitednes thinks himſelfe rich, when he hath nothing; Another in a covetous humor thinks he hath nothing, when he is rich; and how eaſie is it for another man to miſtake us, if we may thus eaſily miſtake our ſelves? I feare, ſome of you are like the Pageants of your great ſolemnities, wherein there is the ſhew of a ſolid body, whether of a Lion, or Elephant, or Unicorn: but if they be curiouſly lookt into, there is nothing but cloth, and ſticks, and ayre. Others of you contrarily, are like a diſſembling Covent, that profeſſes poverty, and purchaſes Lordſhips. The very ſame did Salomon obſerve in his time, in the great Burgomaſters of Jeruſalem, Pro. 13. 7. For the avoiding of both extremes, let us inquire who is rich. And though greatneſſe and riches bee in the ranke of thoſe things which are held to have no abſolute determination, but conſiſt rather in reſpect and compariſon: (for a rich Farmer is yet poore to a rich Merchant, & a rich Merchant is but poore to a Prince, and he to ſome great Emperor: That great Mammoniſt would ſay, he is rich, that can maintaine an Armie: A poore man would ſay, according to that Italian inſcription, Hee is rich that wants not bread;) Yet certainely there are certaine general ſtakes & bounds, which divide betwixt povertie & competence, betwixt competency and wealth; As there were variety of ſhekels among the Jewes, yet there was one ſhekel of the Sanctuary that varied not; Who then is rich? I muſt give you a double anſwer, one will not ſerve. The one, according to true moralitie; the other, according to vulgar uſe: In the firſt he is rich that hath enough, whether the world think ſo or not; Even Eſau, though he were poore in grace, yet in eſtate he was rich: I have enough my brother. And he that ſaid, Soule, thou haſt goods enow for many yeares, was almoſt ſo; It was not his fault that he thought he had enough, but that he meant to lye downe, and wallow in it. A mans wealth or poverty is moſtwhat in himſelfe; And though nature have profeſſed to read unto heathen men this leſſon of wiſe moderation, yet it hath beene ſeldome ſeen, that any thing but true piety, hath taught them to take it out; Godlineſſe is great gaine with contentment: Victus & veſtitus divitiæ Chriſtianorum, ſaith Hierom: Food and raiment are the Chriſtians wealth; Thoſe men therefore, which are ſtill in the horſe-leeches note, ſucking and craving; which, like Pharaohs leane kine, are ever feeding, and never the fatter, are as farre from true wealth, as they would be from povertie; and further I am ſure they cannot bee, and not further from wealth then godlineſſe Having, is the meaſure of outward wealth: but it is thinking that muſt meaſure the inward thoughts, I ſay of contentment, cheerefulneſſe, and thankfulneſſe, which if ye want, it is not either or both the Indies that can make you rich. C D E

In the latter, he is rich, that hath more then enough, whether he thinke ſo or no: He that hath the poſſeſſion (whether civill or naturall) of more then neceſſarie. Now if neceſſarie and ſuperfluous ſeeme as hard to define as rich; know, there are juſt limits for both theſe: Superfluous is defined by neceſſarie; for what is above neceſſary, is ſuperfluous; There is then a double neceſſarie; One, of nature, the other, of eſtate: That is neceſſary to nature, without which wee cannot live; that to ſtate, without which wee cannot live well: That is neceſſary to eſtate, which were ſuperfluous

A fluous to nature; and that which were ſuperfluous to nature, is not ſo much as neceſſary to eſtate; Nature goes ſingle, and beares little breadth; Eſtate goes ever with a traine; The neceſſity of nature admits little difference, eſpecially for quantities, the neceſſitie of eſtate requires as many diverſities, as there are ſeverall degrees of humane conditions, and ſeverall circumſtances in thoſe degrees. Juſtly therfore do the Schoolemen and Caſuiſts teach, that this neceſſary to the decencie of eſtate, doth not conſiſt in puncto individuo, but hath much latitude; That is neceſſary to ſcarlet, which to ruſſet were ſuperfluous; that is but neceſſary to a Noblemian, which to an Eſquire were ſuperfluous; That were ſuperfluous to a Peere, which to a Prince is but neceſſary: That is neceſſary to the father of a family, which to a ſingle man were ſuperfluous: Neither doth this neceſſity looke onely to the
B preſent, but to the future; not to what may be (which were an endleſſe proſpect) but to what muſt be, the mariage of a daughter, the education of a ſonne, the honeſt proviſion for poſteritie: He that in a juſt eſtimate can goe beyond the bounds of this neceſſary, enters into the ſuperfluous eſtate, and may well paſſe with the world for rich.

Such a one is rich; let him looke how he became ſo: That God which can allow you to be rich, will not allow you all waies to your wealth: He hath ſet up a golden Goale, to which hee allowes you all to run, but yee muſt keepe the beaten rode of honeſty, juſtice, charity, and truth; if ye will leave this path, and will be croſſing over a ſhorter cut thorow by-wayes of your owne, yee may bee rich with a vengeance. The heathen Poet (one of them whome S. Paul cited) could obſerve (ὁσοις
C ἐπείγεται τις χήνως πλουτεῖν) which Salamon tranſlates to us, He that makes haſte to bee rich, ſhall not bee innocent. If you have filled your bags with fraud, uſury, extortion, this gaine may be hony in your mouth, but it will be gravell in your throat, and poyſon in your ſoule. There are ſome meanes of wealth in an ill name, as thoſe two truſty ſervants of Mammon, Uſe and Brocage; there are others as bad as they, little ſaid to. Since I ſpeake to Citizens, let me be bold to ſay, There is not ſo arrant uſury in letting of money, as in ſale of wares. This oppreſſion is both more, and more univerſall. There are two maximes that doe uſually miſ-lead men of Traffique, all the world over: The one is, Res valet quanti vendi poteſt, A thing is worth what it may be ſold for; The other, Caveat emptor, At the buyers perill: The one is in regard of the price; the other, in regard of the quality of the wares. In the firſt, whereas
D our Caſuiſts have ſet three prices, low, meane, rigorous, they ſuper-adde a fourth, exceſſive, & thinke they may lawfully get what they can: Whereas they ſhall once finde, that as the rigorous price is a ſtraine of charity, ſo the exceſſive is a violation of juſtice, neither doth this gaine differ ought from theft, but that it is honeſted by a fair coozenage. In the ſecond; It matters not how defective the meaſure be, how vicious the ſubſtance, how falſe the kind, let this bee the buyers care, No man is bound to buy, no man can doe wrong to himſelfe; Such wares muſt be put off, (perhaps not to cuſtomers) with concealment of faults, if not with proteſtations of faultleſſneſſe. In Salomons time, It is naught, it is naught, ſaid the buyer, and when he was gone apart, hee boaſted; But now, It is good, it is good, ſaith the ſeller, and when the buyer is gone, he boaſteth of his deceit. Let me appeale to your boſomes, if theſe
E two, Exceſſe of price, and deficiency of worth have not been the moſt ſerviceable factors to bring in ſome of your wealth; And let me tell you, if theſe bee guilty of your gaines, you may miſ-name your trades, Myſteries: but ſure theſe trickes are myſteries of iniquitie. It were envious and infinite to arraigne the ſeverall ſciences of their adulteration and fraud; let me rather ſhut them all up together in that feareſull ſentence of wiſe Salomon, The gathering of treaſures by a deceitfull tongue, is a vanity toſſed to and fro of them that ſeeke death: and (if you pleaſe) read on the next verſe, The robbery of the wicked ſhall deſtroy them, Search your cheſts, ſearch your hearts (O all ye that heare me this day) and if any of you finde any of this adulterine gold amongſt your heapes, away with it, as ye love your ſelves, away with it: Elſe know, (that as Chryſoſtome wittily) ye have lockt up a theefe in your Counting-houſe, which will cary away all, and if ye looke not to it the ſooner, your ſoules with it.

In this world.

Rich in this world, not Of it. As S. Iohn diſtinguiſheth of being in the Church, and being of it, ſo doth S. Paul of the world; Thoſe are the rich of the world, (which are worldlings in heart, as well as in eſtate;) Thoſe are rich in the world, whoſe eſtate is below, whoſe hearts are above: The rich of the world are in it, but the rich in the world are not of it: Marvell not there ſhould bee ſo much difference in little particles; The time was when this very difference of in, and of, ſet the world together by the eares in the controverſie of Eutyches, and Dioſcorus; and here, you ſee, there is no leſſe diſtance betweene them, then betwixt heaven and earth: If Timothy or S. Paul either ſhould have charged the rich of the world, he had charmed a deafe Adder; yea perhaps even with this charge (like a ruſty or ill wrought Peece) they had recoyled in his face with thoſe Athenians, What will this babbler ſay? The Prophet is a foole, the ſpirituall man is mad, as they ſay in the Prophet: There is no good to be done on a worldly heart, it is both hard and cold; Let the Smith ſtrike a barre new-come out of the fire (though it bee iron) it bowes; let him ſtrike on his anvile never ſo long, there is no impreſſion, but rather a rebound of the ſtroke. The Maker of all hearts tells us, that the unregenerate man hath Cor lapideum, an heart of ſtone: & to what purpoſe doe we with our venerable Countryman preach to an heape of ſtones? Will ye have the reaſon why wee preach our ſelves hoarſe and dead, and prevaile not? The world is in mens eares, the world is in their hearts; and they are not in the world, but of it; and there can be nothing in them that are of the world, but that which is enmity to God, and that which repayes with enmity; ſo as there is no way for them but periſhing with the world: It is for thoſe onely whoſe hearts are not in their bags, to receive the charge from God for their wealth, and to returne glory to him by it: To theſe (whereof I hope here are many before me) muſt Timothies charge, and my ſpeech be directed: Let theſe heare their condition firſt, and then their duty: Their condition, They are rich, but In this world; For diſtinction, for limitation; one implyes the eſtate of their riches, the other the time.

Their eſtate, as learned Beza, that they are but worldly riches. The very word imports that there are other riches, not of the world; as Auſtin diſtinguiſhes of Pauper in animo, and ſaeculo; poore in minde, and in purſe; ſo may we of the rich: There is a ſpirituall wealth, as well as a ſecular; and ſo true and pretious is the ſpirituall, that the ſecular wealth is but ſtarke beggery to it: This outward wealth is in acres of earth, in the bowels of the earth, the fruits of the earth, beaſts of the earth; and all of it is valued by pieces of earth, and one mouthfull of earth makes an end of all. Who knowes not that earth is the baſeſt piece of the world, and yet earth is at the end of all theſe riches, and all of them end in the earth? See what it is that the world dotes and dreames of; (for theſe earthly hopes, as the divine Philoſopher ſaid, are but dreames of the waking) even Nebuchadnezzars image, a compoſition of metals, and the foot of all is clay. Earthly men tread upon their felicity, and yet have not the wit to contemne it, and to ſeeke a better, which is the ſpirituall wealth; the cabinet whereof is the ſoule, and the treaſure in it, God himſelfe. O happy reſolution of that bleſſed Father, Auſtin. Omnis mihi copia, qua Deus meus non eſt, egeſtas eſt: All wealth beſides my God, is penury. Ambiant terrena, ſaith another: Let the Gentiles ſeeke after earthly things, which have not right to heavenly; let them deſire the preſent, which beleeve not the future; The Chriſtians wealth is his Saviour: and how can he complaine of meaſure, that hath the author of all? What ſhould I need to ſay more of the Chriſtian heart? He is rich in God: and therfore well may he ſing that contented ditty of the Pſalmiſt, Funes ceciderunt mihi in præclaris: My lot is falne in a good ground, and I have a goodly heritage. Oh that is could be our ambition that Nazianzen reports of his Philagrius, lutum contemnere, to ſcorne this baſe and (pardon an homly word) dirty god of the world, and to aſpire unto the true riches! And when Satan ſhall offer to greaze us in the fiſt, to remit but a little of the rigor of a good conſcience, we could caſt it in his face with S. Peters indignation, Thy gold and thy ſilver periſh with thee!

The eſtate of wealth is not more deſcribed by this world, then the time; For

A (a αἰων) when it is abſolutely ſpoken, be, as the Philoſopher (b ἀειών,) when it is reſtrained with a (c νῦν) it is ſcarce a time; and at the moſt, is turned juſtly ſeculum, a ſequendo, as Iſidore. Like as the ſame word in the Hebrew, that ſignifies eternity, at other times ſignifies but fifty yeares, the compaſſe of a Jubilee; So as (νῦν αἰων) is but the ſpace of humane life, which how ſhort ſoever, is the utmoſt extent of the uſe of worldly riches. Wealth is like unto words, by impoſition, not naturall; for commodities are as they are commonly valued; we know, bracelets of glaſſe, and copper chaines, and little bels, and ſuch like trifles, are good merchandiſe ſome-where, though contemptible with us; and thoſe things which the Indians regard not, Europe holds precious. What are coynes where their uſe and valuation ceaſes? The Patars, and Souſes, and Deniers, and Quart-d'eſcus, that are currant beyond the
B water, ſerve but for counters to us: Thus it is with all our wealth. Conſider, I beſeech you, that all our Crownes, and Soveraynes, and pieces and halfe-pieces, and Duckats, and double Duckats, are currant but to the brim of the grave, there they ceaſe; and we juſtly laugh at the folly of thoſe Eaſterne Pagans, which put coyne into the dead mans hand for his proviſion in another world: What ſhould we doe therefore, if we will be provident Travellers, but make over our money here, to receive it by exchange in the world to come? It is our Saviours counſell, Make you friends of the unrighteous Mammon, that they may receive you into everlaſting habitations. And as a Father ſayes ſweetly, If yee will bee wiſe Merchants, thriftie and happy uſurers, part with that which you cannot keepe, that you may gaine that which you cannot loſe: Which that ye may doe, both in preparation of mind, and (when need is) in C a charitable abdication, hearken to the Duties which God layes upon you. The removeall of evill muſt make roome for good: Firſt therefore our Apoſtle would have our hearts cleared of evill diſpoſitions, then ſetled in good: The evill diſpoſitions that doe commonly attend wealth, are Pride and Miſconfidence: Againſt theſe our Apoſtle bendeth his charge, That they bee not hye-minded; that they truſt not in uncertaine riches.

c Now.

That they be not hye minded.

For the firſt; It is ſtrange to ſee how this earthly droſſe, which is of it ſelfe heavy, and therefore naturally ſinkes downward, ſhould raiſe up the heart of man; and yet it commonly caries a man up, even to a double pitch of pride, one above others, the other above himſelfe: Above others in contempt, above himſelfe in over-weening: The poore & proud is the Wiſemans monſter, but the proud and rich are no newes:
D It is againſt all reaſon, that metals ſhould make difference of reaſonable men, of Chriſtians; for as that wiſe Law-giver ſaid, A free man can be valued at no price: Yet Salomon noted in his time, The rich rules the poore; not the wiſe: and Siracides in his, The rich ſpeakes proudly, and what fellow is this? and Saint Iames in his, The man with the gold ring lookes to ſit higheſt. And not to caſt backe our eyes, doe ye not ſee it thus in our times? If a man be but worth a foot-cloth, how big hee lookes on the inferiour paſſengers? and if he have purchaſed a little more land, or title then his neighbours, you ſhall ſee it in his garbe; if he command, it is imperiouſly, with ſirrah, and fellow; If he ſalute, it is overly, with a ſurly and ſilent nod; if he ſpeake, it is oracles; if hee walke, it is with a grace; if he controll, it is in the killing accent; if he entertaine, it is with inſolence; and whatſoever he doth, he is not as he was, not
E (as the Phariſee ſayes) like other men. He lookes upon vulgar man, as if they were made to ſerve him, and ſhould thinke themſelves happy to be commanded: and if he be croſſed a little, hee ſwels like the ſea in a ſtorme: Let it bee by his equall, he cares more for an affront, then for death, or hell; Let it be by his inferiour, (although in a juſt cauſe) that man ſhall be ſure to be cruſht to death for his preſumption: And alas, when all is done, after theſe hye tearmes, all this is but a man, and (God knowes) a fooliſh one too, whom a little earthly traſh can affect ſo deeply.

Neither doth this pride raiſe a man more above others, then above himſelfe: And what wonder is it if hee will not know his poore neighbours, which hath forgotten himſelfe? As Saul was changed to another man preſently upon his anointing, ſo are men upon their advancement; and according to our ordinary Proverb, Their good and their blood riſes together; Now it may not be taken as it hath beene; Other cariage,

cariage, other faſhions are fit for them; their attire, fare, retinue, houſes, furniture diſpleaſe them, new muſt be had; together with coaches, and lacquies, and all the equipage of greatneſſe: Theſe things (that no man miſtake me) I miſlike not: they are fit for thoſe that are fit for them. Charity is not ſtrait-laced, but yeelds much latitude to the lawfull uſe of indifferent things; (although it is one of Salomons vanities, that ſervants ſhould ride on horſe-backe; & hee tells us it becomes not a ſwine to bee ring'd with gold) but it is the heart that maketh all theſe evill: when that is puft up with theſe windy vanities, & hath learned to borrow that part of the devils ſpeech, All theſe things are mine; and can ſay with him that was turned into a beaſt, Is not this great Babel that I have built? or with that other patterne of pride, I ſit as a Queene, I am, and there is none beſides me. Now all theſe turne into ſinne. A

The buſh that hangs out, ſhewes what wee may looke for within? Whither doth the conceit of a little inheritance tranſport the Gallants of our time? O God, what a world of vanity haſt thou reſerv'd us to? I am aſham'd to thinke that the Goſpell of Chriſt ſhould bee diſgraced with ſuch diſguiſed clients. Are they Chriſtians, or Antikes in ſome Carnevale, or childrens puppets that are thus dreſſed? Pardon, I beſeech you, men, brethren, and fathers, this my juſt and holy impatience, that could never expreſſe it ſelfe in a more ſolemne aſſembly (although I perceive, thoſe whom it moſt concernes, are not ſo devout as to be preſent.) Who can without indignation looke upon the prodigies which this miſ-imagination produces in that other ſex, to the ſhame of their husbands, the ſcorne of Religion, the damnation of their owne ſoules? Imagine one of our fore-fathers were alive againe, and ſhould ſee one of theſe his gay daughters walke in Cheape-ſide before him; what doe you thinke he would thinke it were? Here is nothing to be ſeene but a verdingale, a yellow ruffe, and a periwig, with perhaps ſome fethers waving in the top; three things for which he could not tell how to find a name: Sure, he could not but ſtand amazed, to thinke what new creature the times had yeelded ſince he was a man: and if then he ſhould run before her, to ſee if by the fore-ſide he might gheſſe what it were, when his eyes ſhould meet with a poudred frizle, a painted hide ſhadowed with a fan not more painted, breſts diſplayd, and a looſe locke erring wantonly over her ſhoulders, betwixt a painted cloth and skinne; how would he yet more bleſſe himſelf to thinke, what mixture in nature could be guilty of ſuch a monſter? Is this (thinks he) the fleſh and blood? is this the hayre? is this the ſhape of a woman? or hath nature repented of her worke ſince my dayes, and begunne a new frame? It is no marvell if their forefathers could not know them; God himſelf that made them, will never acknowledge that face he never made, the hayre that he never made theirs, the body that is aſham'd of the Maker, the ſoule that thus diſguiſes the body. B C D

Let me therfore ſay to theſe dames, as Benet ſaid to Totilaes ſervant, Depone, filia, quod portas, quia non eſt tuum; Lay downe that ye weare, it is none of your owne. Let me perſwade them (for that can worke moſt) that they doe all this in their owne wrong. All the world knowes that no man will rough-caſte a marble wall, but mud, or unpoliſht ragge: that beauty is like truth, never ſo glorious as when it goes plaineſt; that falſe art, in ſtead of mending nature, marres it. But if none of our perſwaſions can prevaile, Heare this, ye gariſh Popingayes of our time, if you will not bee aſhamed to cloath your ſelves in this ſhameleſſe faſhion, God ſhall cloath you with ſhame and confuſion: heare this yee plaiſter-faced Iezabels, if you will not leave your dawbing, and your high waſhes, God will one day waſh them off with fire and brimſtome. E

I grant, it is not wealth alone that is acceſſary to this pride; there are ſome that (with the Cynicke, or that worſe dogge, the patcht Ciſtertian) are proud of rags; there are others, that are rich of nothing but cloathes, ſome what like to Nazianzens country of Oziala, that abounded in flowers, but was barren of corne; their cloathes are more worth then all the reſt; as wee uſe to ſay of the Elder, that the flower of it is more worth then all the tree beſides; but if there be any other cauſes of our hye-mindedneſſe, wealth is one, wich doth ordinarily lift up our heads above our ſelves, above others; and if there be here any of theſe empty bladders, that are puft

A up with the wind of conceit, give me leave to pricke them a little; & first, let mee tell them they may have much, and be never the better: The chimny over-lookes all the reſt of the houſe, is it not (for all that) the very baſeſt piece of the building? The very heathen man could obſerve (πολλοῖς ὁ δαίμων, &c.) That God gives many a man wealth for their greater miſchiefe: As the Iſraelites were rich in Quailes, but their ſawce was ſuch, that famine had beene better; little cauſe had they to bee proud that they were fed with meat of Princes, with the bread of Angels, whiles that which they put into their mouthes, God fetcht our of their noſtrils. Haman was proud that he alone was called to the honour of Eſters feaſt: this advancement raiſed him fifty cubits higher, to a ſtately gibbet. If your wealth be to any of you an occaſion of falling, if your gold be turned into fetters, it had beene better for you to have
B lived beggers. Let me tell them next, of the folly of this pride; They are proud of that which is none of theirs, That which law and caſe-divinity ſpeakes of life, that man is not dominus vitæ ſuæ, ſed cuſtos, is as true of wealth: Nature can tell him in the Philoſopher, that he is not Dominus, but Colonus, not the Lord, but the Farmer. It is a juſt obſervation of Philo, that God only by a propriety is ſtyled the Poſſeſſor of heaven and earth, by Melchiſedech, in his ſpeech to Abraham; we are onely the tenants, and that at the will of the Lord; At the moſt (if we will as Divines) we have jus ad rem, not dominium in rem, right to theſe earthly things, not Lordſhip over them; but right of favour from their proprietary, and Lord in heaven, and that liable to account. Doe we not laugh at the groome that is proud of his maſters horſe, or ſome vaine whiffler, that is proud of a borrowed chaine? So ridiculous are we to
C be puft up with that, whereof we muſt needs ſay, with the poore man of the hatchet, Alas, maſter, it is but borrowed; and wherof our account ſhall be ſo much more great, and difficult, as our receit it more. Hath God therefore laded you with theſe earthly riches? be ye like unto the full eare of corne, hang downe your heads in true humility towards that earth from which you came: And if your ſtalke be ſo ſtiffe, that it beares up above the reſt of your ridge, looke up to heaven, not in the thoughts of pride, but in the humble vowes of thankfulneſſe and bee not hie-minded, but feare.

Hitherto of the high-mindedneſſe that followes wealth; Now where our pride is, there will be our confidence: As the wealthy therfore may not be proud of their riches, ſo they may not truſt in them: What is this truſt, but the ſetting of our hearts
D upon them, the placing of our joy and contentment in them; in a word, the making of them our beſt friend, our patron, our idoll, our god? This the true and jelous God cannot abide, and yet nothing is more ordinary; The rich mans wealth is his ſtrong City, ſaith Salomon: and where ſhould a man thinke himſelfe ſafe, but in his fort? He ſees Mammon can doe ſo much, and heares him talke of doing ſo much more, it is no marvell if hee yeeld to truſt him: Mammon is ſo proud a boaſter, that his clients which beleeve in him cannot chuſe but be cõfident of him; For what doth he not brag to do? Silver anſwers to all, ſaith Salomon. That we grant; although we would be loath it could anſwer to truth, to juſtice, to judgement: But yet more, he vaunts to procure all, to pacifie al, to cõquer al; He ſaies, he can procure all ſecular offices, titles, dignities, yea (I would I might not lay in ſome ſacrilegious and perjured wretches) the ſacred
E promotions of the Church: and ye know that old ſong of the Pope, and his Romane trafficke, Claves, Altaria, Chriſtum: Yea, fooliſh Magus makes full account, the Holy Ghoſt himſelfe may be had for mony: He ſayes he can pacifie all; A gift in the boſome appeaſes wrath; yea, he ſayes (looke to it ye that ſit in the ſeats of judicature) hee can ſometimes bribe off ſinnes, and pervert judgement: He ſayes hee can overcome all, according to the old Greeke verſe, Fight with ſilver launces, and you cannot faile of victory; yea, he would make us beleeve he thought this a bait to catch the Sonne of God himſelf withall (All theſe will I give thee.) Briefly hee ſayes according to the French Proverbe, Silver does all. And let me tell you indeed, what Mammon can doe; Hee can barre the gates of hell to the unconſcionable ſoule, and helpe his followers to damnation: This he can doe; but for other things, howſoever with us men, the fooliſh Silver-ſmiths may ſhout out, Great is Mammon of the worldlings:

yet if we weigh his power aright, we ſhall conclude of Mammon (as Paracelſus doth of the Divell) that he is a baſe and beggerly ſpirit: For what, I beſeech you, can he doe? Can he make a man honeſt? can he make him wiſe? can he make him healthfull? Can he give a man to live more merily, to feed more heartily, to ſleepe more quietly? Can he buy off the gout, cares, death, much leſſe the paines of another world? nay, doth he not bring all theſe? Goe to then, thou rich man; God is offended with thee, and meanes to plague thee with diſeaſe and death; Now try what thy bagges can doe; Begin firſt with God, and ſee whether thou canſt bribe him with thy gifts, and buy off his diſpleaſure; Wherewith ſhalt thou come before the Lord, and bow thy ſelfe before the high God? Will the Lord be pleaſed with thouſands of Rams, or with ten thouſand rivers of oyle? The ſilver is mine, and the gold is mine, ſaith the Lord of hoſts, Haggai 2. If that ſpeed not, goe to the ſergeant of God, death; ſee if thou canſt ſee him, not to arreſt thee; He lookes thee ſternely in the face, and tells thee with Ehud, he hath a meſſage to thee from God, and bids thee with the Prophet, Set thine houſe in order, for thou muſt dye; Yet, if he heare thee not, goe to the under-bayliffe of Death, diſeaſe, ſee if he can be wrought to forbeare thee; he anſwers thee with Laban, This thing is proceeded of the Lord, I cannot therefore ſay to thee evill or good. In ſumme, Diſeaſe will ſummon thee unto death; death will arreſt thee to the Judgement ſeat of God, God will paſſe his doome upon thee; and in all theſe, Riches availe not in the day of wrath: And who would be ſo mad as to truſt a friend that hee knowes will be ſure never to faile him, but when he hath moſt need? Take heed therfore, as ye love your ſoules, how ye beſtow your Truſt upon riches; Ye may uſe them, and ſerve your ſelves of them; yea, yee may enjoy them in a Chriſtian moderation; God will allow it you: That praiſe which the Jeſuites Colledge at Granado gives of their Sanchez, that (though he lived where they had a very ſweet garden yet) he was never ſeene to touch a flower, & that he would rather dye then eate Salt, or Pepper, or ought that might give relliſh to his meat; like as that of ſome other Monkes, that they would not ſee the Sunne, nor ſhift their cloathes, nor cleanſe their teeth, caries in it more ſuperſtition and auſteritie and ſlovenry, then wit or grace: Wherefore hath God made his creatures but for uſe? This niggardlineſſe is injurious to the bounty of their Maker; wee may uſe them, wee may not truſt to them; we may ſerve our ſelves of them, we may not ſerve them; we may injoy them, we may not over-joy in them; ſo muſt wee be affected to our goods, as Theoderic the good King of Aquitaine was with his play, In bonis jactibus tacet, in malis ridet, in neutris iraſcitur, in utriſque Philoſophatur, In good caſts hee was ſilent; in ill, merry; in neither angry, a Philoſopher in both. But if we will be making our wealth a rivall unto God, now the jealouſie of God ſhall burne like fire: this is the way to bring a curſe upon our riches, and us; if we leane upon this reed, is ſhall breake, and runne into our hand; and he that truſteth in riches, ſhall fall, Prov. 11. 28.

Now as the diſdainfull rivall will bee ſure to caſt reproaches upon his baſe competitor; ſo doth God, that wee may ſee how unworthy riches are of our truſt, hee tells us, they are uncertaine, yea uncertaintie it ſelfe. Were our wealth tyed to our life, it were uncertaine enough; what is that but a flower, a vapour, a tale, a dreame, a ſhadow, a dreame of a ſhaddow, a thought, a nothing? What are great men but like Haileſtones, that leape up on the Tiles, and ſtraight fall downe againe, and lye ſtill, and melt away? But now, as wee are certaine that our riches determine with our uncertaine life (for goods and life are both in a bottome, both are caſt away at once,) ſo wee cannot bee certaine they will hold ſo long: Our life flyes haſtily away, but many times our riches have longer wings, and out-fly it. It was a witty obſervation of Baſil, that wealth roles along by a man, like as an heady ſtreame glides by the bankes: Time will molder away the very banke it waſheth, but the current ſtayes not for that, but ſpeeds forward from one elbow of earth unto another: ſo doth our wealth, even while wee ſtay, it is gone. In our penall lawes, there are more wayes to forfeit our goods, then our lives; On our high wayes, how many favourable theeves take the purſe, and ſave life? And generally, our life is the tree, our wealth is the leaves, or fruit; the tree ſtands ſtill, when the leaves are falne, the fruit beaten downe:

In uncertaine riches.

ῥᾴδιον ἡ φύσις τοῦ πλούτου, χειμάρρου ὀξυτέρου τὴν ῥοὴν ἔχοντος φερομένου, &c. Baſil. in Pſal. 61.

A Yea many a one is like the Pine-tree, which (they ſay) if his barke bee pulled off, laſts long, elſe it rots: ſo doth many a man live the longer for his loſſes: if therefore life and wealth ſtrive whether is more uncertaine, wealth will ſure carie it away. Iob was yeſterday the richeſt man in the Eaſt; to day he is ſoo needy, that hee is gone into a proverbe, As poore as Iob: Beliſarius the great and famous Commander, to whom Rome owed her life twice at leaſt, came to Date obolum Beliſario; one halfe-peny to Beliſarius. What do I inſtance? This is a point, wherein many of you Citizens that are my Auditors this day, might rather reade a lecture unto me; You could tell me how many you have knowne, reputed in your phraſe, good men, which all on the ſudden have ſhut up the ſhop windows, and broken for thouſands: You could reckon up to me a Catalogue of them, whome either caſualitie of fire, or
B inundation of waters, or Robberie of theeves, or negligence of ſervants, or ſuretiſhip for friends, or overſight of reckonings, or truſting of cuſtomers, or unfaithfulneſſe of Factors, or inexpected falls of markets, or Pyracie by Sea, or unskilfulneſſe of a Pilot, or violence of tempeſts have brought to an haſty povertie; and could tell me that it is in the power of one gale of winde, to make many of you either rich Merchants or beggers. Oh miſerable uncertainty of this earthly pelfe, that ſtands upon ſo many hazards, yea that falls under them! who would truſt it? who can dote upon it? what madneſſe is it in thoſe men, which (as Menot ſayes) like unto hunters, that kill an horſe of price, in the purſuit of an Hare worth nothing; endanger, yea caſt away their ſoules upon this worthleſſe and fickle traſh? Glaſſes are pleaſing veſſels, yet becauſe of their brittleneſſe, who eſteemes them pre-
C cious? All Salomons ſtate was not comparable to one Tulip: his royall Crowne was not like the Crowne Imperiall of our Gardens; and yet becauſe theſe are but flowers whoſe deſtiny is fading and burning, wee regard them thereafter; No wiſe man beſtowes much coſt in painting mud-wals, What meane we (my beloved) to ſpend our lives and hearts upon theſe periſhing treaſures? It was a wiſe meditation of Nazianzen to his Aſterius; that good is to no purpoſe, if it continue not; yea there is no pleaſant thing in the world, ſaith he, that hath ſo much joy in the welcome, as it hath ſorrow in the farewell: Looke therefore upon theſe heapes, O ye wiſe-hearted Citizens, with careleſſe eyes, as thoſe things whoſe parting is certaine, whoſe ſtay is uncertaine, and ſay with that worthy Father; By all my wealth, and glory, and greatneſſe, this alone have I gained, that I had ſome thing to which I D might preferre my Saviour. And know, that as Abraham whiles he was in his owne Countrey (it is Cyrils note) had never God appearing to him, ſave onely to bid him goe forth: but after, when hee was gone forth, had frequent viſions of his Maker: So whiles in our affections we remaine here below in our Cofers, we cannot have the comfortable aſſurances of the preſence of God; but if wee can abandon the love and truſt of theſe earthly things, in the conſcience of our obedience, now God ſhall appeare to us, and ſpeake peace to our ſoules, and never ſhall we finde cauſe to repent us of the change. Let mee therefore conclude this point with that divine charge of our Saviour, Lay not up for your ſelves treaſures on earth, where moth and ruſt doe corrupt, and theeves breake thorow and ſteale, but lay up for your ſelves treaſure in E heaven.

Thus much of the Negative part of our charge: wherein wee have dwelt ſo long, that we may ſcarce ſojourne in the other: Truſt not, but Truſt: The heart of man is ſo conſcious of his owne weakneſſe, that it will not goe without a prop: and better a weake ſtay then none at all: Like as in matter of policy, the very ſtate of Tyrannie is preferred to the want of a King; the ſame breath therefore that withdraws one refuge from us, ſubſtitutes a better; and in ſtead of Riches, which is the falſe god of the world, commends to us the true and living God of heaven and earth: Even as ſome good Carpenter raiſes up the ſtuds, and in ſtead of a rotten groundſell, layes a ſound; The ſame truſt then muſt we give to God, which wee may not give to riches: The object onely is changed, the act is not changed. Him muſt wee eſteeme above all things, to him muſt we looke up in all, on him muſt wee depend, for all both protection, and proviſion; from his goodneſſe and mercy muſt we acknowledge all, and in him must wee delight with contempt of all; and this is to Trust in God. It was a sweet ditty of the Psalmist, which wee must all learne to sing, Bonum est confidere in Domino, It is good to trust in the Lord: Good, in respect of him, and good for us. For him, it is one of the best pieces of glory to bee trusted-to: as, with us, Ioseph holds, Potiphar cannot doe him a greater honour, then in trusting him with all; And his glory is precious, that hee cannot part with that to any creature; all other things hee imparts willingly, and reserves nothing to himselfe but this: Beeing, life, knowledge, happinesse, are such blessings, as are eminently, originally, essentially, in God, & yet, Beeing he gives to all things, Life to many, Knowledge to some kindes of creatures, happinesse to some of these kinds: as for riches, he so gives them to his creature, that he keepes them not at all to himselfe; but as for his Glory (whereof our trust is a part) hee will not endure it communicated to Angell, or man; not to the best ghest in heaven, much lesse to the drosse of earth: Whence is that curse not without an indignation, Cursed bee the man that trusts in man; that maketh flesh his arme, yea or spirit either, besides the God of Spirits, Whom have I in heaven but thee? Herein therefore doe wee justice to God, when we give him his owne, that is, his glory, our confidence. A B

But the greatest good is our own; and God shewes much more mercy to us in allowing and inabling us to trust him, then we can doe justice in trusting him: For alas, he could in his just judgment glorifie himselfe in our not trusting him, in taking vengeance on us for not glorifying him: Our goodnesse reaches not to him; but his goodnesse reaches downe to us, in that our hearts are raised up to confidence in him. For, what safety, what inspeakable comfort is there in trusting to God? When our Saviour, in the last words of his Divine Farewell Sermon to his Disciples, would perswade them to confidence, he sayes θαρσεῖτε: and so doth the Angell to Paul, in prison; a word that signifies boldnesse: implying that our confidence in God, causeth boldnes and courage, and what is there in all the world that can worke the heart to so comfortable and unconquerable resolution, as our reposall upon God? The Lord is my trust, whom then can I feare? In the Lord put I my trust, how say ye then to my soule, Flee hence as a bird to the hils? Yea how oft doth David inferre upon this trust non confundar, I shall not be ashamed? And this case is generall, That they that put their trust in the Lord, are as mount Sion that cannot be moved. Faith can remove mountaines, but the mountaines that are raised on faith, are unremoveable. Here is a stay for you (O ye wealthy and great) worthy of your trust: If ye were Monarchs on earth, or Angels in heaven, ye could be no way safe but in this trust. How easie is it for him to inrich, or impoverish you, to hoyse you up to the seats of honor, or to spurn you down? What mynes, what Princes can raise you up to wealth, against him, without him? Hee can bid the winds and Seas favour your vessels, he can bid them sinke in a calme. The rich and the poore meet together, God is the maker of both. Ye may trade, and toyle, and carke, and spare, and put up, and cast about, and at last sit you downe, with a sigh of late repentance, and say, Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vaine that build it: It is in vaine to rise early, and lye downe late, and eate the bread of sorrow. Unto how many of you may I say with the Prophet Haggai, Yee have sowne much, and bring in little; ye eat, and have not enough; ye drinke, but ye are not filled: ye cloath you, but ye be not warme, and he that earneth much, puts his gaynes in a broken bag? And whence is all this? Yee looked for much, and loe, it came to little: when yee brought it home, I did blow upon it, saith the Lord of Hosts. Behold how easie a thing it is for the God of heaven to blast all your substance; yea not onely to diminish, but to curse it unto you, and to make you weary of it and of your selves. Oh cast your selves therefore into those Almighty hands: Seeke him in whom only you shall finde true rest and happinesse: Honour him with your substance, that hath honored you with it: Trust not in riches, but trust in God. Ioh. 16. ult.

It is motive enough to your trust, that hee is a God; all arguments are infolded in that one; yet this Text gives you certaine explicit inforcements of this confidence; Every one of these reasons (implying a secret kinde of disdainfull comparison betwixt the true God and the false) perswade you to trust in God: Riches are but

A are but for this world, the true God is Lord of the other; and beginnes his glory, where the glory of the world ends: therefore truſt in him. Riches are uncertaine, the true God is Amen, the firſt and the laſt, ever like himſelfe; therefore truſt in him. Riches are but a liveleſſe and ſenſeleſſe metall, the true God is a living God, therefore truſt in him. Riches are but paſſives in gift, they cannot beſtow ſo much as themſelves, much leſſe ought beſides themſelves: the true God gives you all things to enjoy, therefore Truſt in him: the two latter, becauſe they are more directly ſtood upon, and now fall into our way, require a further diſcourſe.

(El chai) the living God, is an ancient and uſuall title to the Almighty; eſpecially when hee would diſgrace an unworthy rivall: As Saint Paul in his ſpeech to the Lyſtrians, oppoſes to their vaine Idols, the living God. Vivo ego, As I live, is the B oath of God for this purpoſe, as Hierom noteth, neither doe I remember any thing beſides his holineſſe, & his life that he ſweares by. When Moſes askt Gods name, he deſcribed himſelfe by I AM. He is, hee lives: and nothing is, nothing lives abſolutely, but hee; all other things by participation from him. In all other things, their life and they are two; but God is his owne life, and the life of God is no other then the living God: and becauſe he is his owne life, he is eternall; for (as Thomas argues truely againſt the Gentiles) Nothing ceaſes to bee, but by a ſeparation of life; and nothing can bee ſeparated from it ſelfe; for every ſeparation is a diviſion of one thing from another: Moſt juſtly therefore is he which is abſolute, ſimple, eternall in his being, called the living God: Although not onely the life that he hath in himſelfe, but the life that hee gives to his creatures, challengeth a part in this title: A C glimpſe whereof perhaps the Heathen ſaw, when they called him Jupiter, (ζωα) from (ζῶ) which ſignifies to live, In him wee live, (ſaith Saint Paul to his Athenians.) As light is from the Sunne, ſo is life from God, (which is the true ſoule of the world, and more; for without him it could not bee ſo much as a carkaſe; and ſpreads it ſelfe into all the animate creatures. Life (we ſay) is ſweet; and ſo it is indeed; the moſt excellent and precious thing that is derived from the common influence of God. There is nothing before life, but Being; and Being makes no diſtinction of things; for that can bee nothing that hath no Being: Life makes the firſt and greateſt diviſion, Thoſe creatures therefore which have life, wee eſteeme far beyond thoſe that have it not, how noble ſoever otherwiſe: Thoſe things therefore which have the perfitteſt life, muſt needs be the beſt: Needs then muſt it D follow, that hee which is life it ſelfe, who is abſolute, ſimple, eternall, the fountaine of all that life which is in the world, is moſt worthy of all the adoration, joy, love, and confidence of our hearts, and of the beſt improvement of that life which he hath given us. Truſt therefore in the living God. Covetouſneſſe (the Spirit of God tells us) is Idolatry, or (as our old Tranſlation turnes it) worſhipping of Images. Every ſtampe or impreſſion in his coyne, is to the covetous man a very Idol: And what madneſſe is there in this Idolatry, to dote upon a baſe creature, and to beſtow that life which wee have from GOD, upon a creature that hath no life in it ſelfe, and no price but from men? Let me then perſwade every ſoule that heares me this day, as Iacob did his houſhold, Put away the ſtrange gods that are among you and bee cleane; and as S. Paul did his Lyſtrians: Oh turne away from theſe vanities unto the E living God.

Gen. 35. 2.

The laſt attractive of our truſt to God, is his mercy, and liberality: Who gives us richly all things to enjoy. A theme, wherein ye will grant it eaſie to leeſe our ſelves. Firſt, God not only hath all in himſelfe, but he gives to us. He gives, not ſomewhat (though a cruſt is more then wee are worthy of) but all things. And not a little of all, but richly; and all this, not to looke on, but to enjoy. Every word would require not a ſeverall houre, but a life to meditate of it; and the tongue not of men, but of Angels to expreſſe it. It is here with us, as in a throng, we can get neither in nor out: But as we uſe to ſay of Cares, ſo it ſhall be with out diſcourſe, that the greatneſſe of it ſhall procure ſilence; and the more we may ſay of this head, the leſſe we will ſay: It ſhall content us onely to top theſe ſheaves, ſince wee cannot ſtand to threſh them out.

Who gives us richly all things to enjoy.

Whither can ye turne your eyes to looke beſide the bounty of God? If ye look upward; His mercy reacheth to the heavens. If downeward: The earth is full of his goodneſſe, and ſo is the broad ſea. If ye looke about you; What is it that hee hath not given us? Ayre to breathe in, fire to warme us, water to coole us, clothes to cover us, food to nouriſh us, fruites to refreſh us, yea delicates to pleaſe us; beaſts to ſerve us, Angels to attend us, heaven to receive us, and which is above all, his owne Sonne to redeeme us. Laſtly, if ye looke into your ſelves: Hath hee not given us a ſoule to informe us, ſenſes to informe our ſoule, faculties to furniſh that ſoule? Underſtanding, the great ſurveyor of the ſecrets of Nature, and Grace: Fantaſie and Invention, the maſter of the workes: Memory the great keeper or Maſter of the rolles of the ſoule; a power that can make amends for the ſpeed of Time, in cauſing him to leave behinde him thoſe things, which elſe he would ſo cary away, as if they had not beene: Will, which is the Lord Paramount in the State of the Soule, the commander of our actions, the elector of our reſolutions: Judgement, which is the great Counſellor of the will: Affections, which are the ſervants of them both: a bodie fit to execute the charge of the ſoule, ſo wondrouſly diſpoſed, as that every part hath beſt opportunitie to his owne functions; ſo qualified with health ariſing from proportion of humors, that like a watch kept in good tune, it goes right, and is fit to ſerve the ſoule, and maintaine it ſelfe: an eſtate that yeelds all due conveniences for both ſoule, and body, ſeaſonable times, raine, and ſunſhine; peace in our borders; competency, if not plenty of all commodities, good lawes, religious, wiſe, juſt Governours, happy and flouriſhing dayes: and above all, the liberty of the Goſpell. Caſt up your bookes, O yee Citizens, and ſumme up your receits, I am deceived, if he that hath leaſt, ſhall not confeſſe his obligations infinit. There are three things eſpecially wherein yee are beyond others, and muſt acknowledge your ſelves deeper in the Books of God, then the reſt of the world: Let the firſt be the cleare deliverance from that wofull judgement of the peſtilence. Oh remember thoſe ſorrowful times, when every moneth ſwept away thouſands from among you: When a man could not ſet forth his foot but into the jawes of death; when piles of carcaſſes were caried to their pits, as dung to the fields: when it was cruelty in the ſicke to admit viſitation, & love was little better then murderous: And by how much more ſad and horrible the face of thoſe evil times looked, ſo much greater proclaim you the mercy of God, in this happy freedome which you now enjoy: that you now throng together into Gods Houſe without feare, and breathe into one anothers face without danger. The ſecond is, the wonderfull plenty of all proviſions both ſpirituall and bodily: You are the Sea, all the Rivers of the land runne into you: Of the land? Yea of the whole world: Sea and land conſpire to inrich you. The third is, the priviledge of carefull government: Your Charters as they are large and ſtrong, wherein the favour of Princes hath made exceptions from the generall rules of their municipall lawes; ſo your forme of adminiſtration is excellent, and the execution of Juſtice exemplary, & ſuch as might become the mother City of the whole earth. For all theſe you have reaſon to aske, Quid retribuam, with David? What ſhall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? and to excite one another unto thankefulneſſe, with that ſweet Singer of Iſrael, O that men would therefore praiſe the Lord for his goodneſſe! And (as beneficence is a binder) theſe favours of God call for your confidence: What ſhould you doe but ever truſt that God, whome you have found ſo gracious? Let him bee your God, bee ye his people for ever; and let him make this free and open challenge to you all: If there bee any power in heauen, or in earth, that can doe more for you then hee hath done, let him have your hearts and your ſelves.

About 30000. in one yeare.

That they doe good, and berich in good workes.

And thus from that duty we owe to God in our confidence, and his beneficence to us, wee deſcend to that beneficence which we owe to men, expreſſed in the variety of foure Epithets, Doing good; being rich in good workes, ready to diſtribute, willing to communicate; all to one ſenſe; all is but beneficence. The Scriptures of God (leſt any Atheiſt ſhould quarrell at this waſte) have not one word ſuperfluous: Here is a redoubling of the ſame words without fault of Tautology; a redoubling of

A of the ſame ſenſe in divers words, without Idleneſſe. There is fervour in theſe repetitions, not looſeneſſe; as it was wont for this cauſe to bee obſerved both in Councels, and acclamations to Princes, how oft the ſame word is reiterated, that by the frequence they might judge of the vehemence of affection. It were eaſie to inſtance in many of this kind, as eſpecially Exod. 25. 35. Pſal. 89. 30. Iohn 1. 20. and ſo many more, as that their mẽtion could not be void of that ſuperfluitie which we diſclaime. This heape of words therefore ſhewes the vehement intention of his deſire of good workes, and the important neceſſity of their performance; and the manner of this expreſſion inforces no leſſe, Charge the rich, that they doe good, and bee rich in doing good. Harken then, yee rich men of the world; it is not left arbitrary to you, that you may doe good if you will, but it is layd upon you as your charge and duty:
B You muſt doe good workes, and woe bee to you if you doe not. This is not a counſell, but a precept; Although I might ſay of God, as we uſe to ſay of Princes, his will is his command: The ſame neceſſity that there is of Truſting in God, the ſame is in Doing good to men. Let mee ſling this ſtone into the brazen foreheads of our adverſaries, which in their ſhameleſſe challenges of our Religion dare tell the world we are all for faith, nothing for workes, and that we hold workes to ſalvation, as a Parentheſis to a clauſe, that it may be perfit without them: Heaven and earth ſhall witneſſe the injuſtice of this calumniation; and your conſciences ſhall be our compurgators this day, which ſhall teſtifie to you, both now, and on your death-beds, that we have taught you, there is no leſſe neceſſitie of good workes, then if you ſhould be ſaved by them; and that though you cannot be ſaved by them, as the me-
C ritorious cauſes of your glory, yet that you cannot be ſaved without them, as the neceſſarie effects of that grace which brings glory.

It is an hard ſentence of ſome Caſuiſts (concerning their fellowes) that but a few rich mens Confeſſors ſhall be ſaved; I imagine, for that they dawbe up their conſciences with untempered morter, and ſooth them up in their ſins. Let this be the care of them whom it concerneth: For us, wee deſire to bee faithfull to God and you; and tell you roundly what you muſt truſt to: Doe good therefore, yee rich, if ever yee looke to receive good; if ever yee looke to bee rich in heaven, be rich in good works upon earth: It is a ſhame to heare of a rich man that dyes, and makes his Will of thouſands, & bequeathes nothing to pious and charitable uſes: God and the poore are no part of his heyre; We do not hover over your expiring ſoules on your death-
D beds as Ravens over a carkaſſe; wee doe not begge for a Covent, nor fright you with Purgatory, nor chaffer with you, for that inviſible treaſure of the Church, whereof there is but one Key-keeper at Rome; but wee tell you, that the making of friends with this Mammon of unrighteouſneſſe, is the way to eternall habitations. They ſay of Cyrus, that he was wont to ſay he laid up treaſures for himſelfe, whiles he made his friends rich: but we ſay to you, that you lay up treaſures for your ſelves in heaven, whiles you make the poore your friends upon earth: We tell you there muſt bee a Date, ere there can be a Dabitur; that he which gives to the poore lends upon uſe to the Lord; which paies large increaſe for all he borrowes; and how ſhall hee give you the Intereſt of glory, where hee hath not received the Principall of beneficence? How can that man ever looke to bee Gods heire, in the E Kingdome of Heaven, that gives all away to his earthly heires, and lends nothing to the God of heaven? As that witty Grecian ſaid of extreame tall men, that they were Cypreſſe-trees καλὰ μὲν ἀλλ' οὐκ ὠφέλιμα, &c. faire and tall, but fruitleſſe: ſo may I ſay of a ſtrait-handed rich man; And theſe Cypreſſes are not for the Garden of Paradiſe; none ſhall ever be planted there but the fruitfull: And if the firſt Paradiſe had any trees in it onely for pleaſure, I am ſure the ſecond, which is in the midſt of the new Jeruſalem, ſhall have no tree that beares not twelve fruits, yea whoſe very leaves are not beneficiall. Doe good therefore, O ye rich, and ſhew your wealth to be, not in having, but in doing good. And if God have put this holy reſolution into any of Rev. 22. 2.
your hearts, take this with you alſo, from him; Doe not talke, and purpoſe, and project, but execute; Doe not ſo doe good, that wee may thanke your death-bed for it, and not you: Late beneficence is better then none, but ſo much as early beneficence is better then late: He that gives not till he dyes, ſhewes that hee would not give, if hee could keepe it: And God loves a cheerefull giver: That which you give thus, you give it by your Teſtament, I can ſcarce ſay you give it by your will: The good mans praiſe is Diſperſit, dedit: he diſperſes his goods, not, he left them behind him; and his diſtribution is ſeconded with the retribution of God, His righteouſneſſe endureth for ever, Pſalme 112. 9. Our Saviour tells us that our good workes are our light, Let your light ſo ſhine, that men may ſee your good workes; which of you lets his light goe behinde him, and hath it not rather caried before him, that hee may ſee which way it goes, and which way himſelfe goes by it? Do good therefore in your life, that you may have comfort in your death, and a Crowne of life after death. A

Now all this have I ſpoken, not for that I have ought (as S. Paul ſayes) whereof to accuſe my Nation: Bleſſed be God, as good workes have abounded in this age, ſo this place hath ſuperabounded in good workes. Bee it ſpoken to the glory of that God, whoſe all our good workes are, to the honour of the Goſpell, to the conviction of that lewd ſlander of Soliſidianiſme; London ſhall vye good workes with any City upon earth: This day and your eares are abundant witneſſes; As thoſe therefore that by an handfull gheſſe at the whole ſacke, it may pleaſe you by this yeares Briefe to judge of the reſt: Wherein I doe not feare leſt Envie it ſelfe ſhall accuſe us of a vaine glorious oſtentation; Thoſe obſtreperous benefactors, that (like to Hens which cannot lay an egge, but they muſt cackle ſtraight) give no almes but with trumpets, loſe their thanks with God; Almes ſhould bee like oyle, which though it ſwimme aloft when it is ſalne, yet makes no noiſe in the falling; not like water, that ſtill ſounds where it lights: But howſoever private beneficence ſhould not bee acquainted with both the hands of the giver, but ſilently expect the reward of him that ſeeth in ſecret, yet God ſhould bee a great loſer, if the publike fruits of charity ſhould bee ſmothered in a modeſt ſecrecy: To the praiſe therefore of that good God, which gives us to give, and rewards us for giving, to the example of poſterity, the honour of our Profeſſion, to the encouragement of the wel-deſerving, and to the ſhame of our malicious adverſaries, heare what this yeare hath brought forth. B C

Here followeth a briefe memoriall of the charitable acts of the City this yeare laſt paſt, &c. And if the ſeaſon had not hindred, your eyes ſhould have ſeconded your eares in the comfortable teſtimonie of this beneficence, Euge, &c. Well done, good and faithfull ſervants; Thus ſhould your Profeſſion bee graced; thus ſhould the incenſe of your almes aſcend in Pillars of holy ſmoake into the noſtrils of God; thus ſhould your talents bee turned into Cities: This colour is no other then celeſtiall, and ſo ſhall your reward bee: Thus ſhould the foundation be laid of that building, whoſe wals reach up unto heaven, whoſe roofe is finiſhed and laid on, in the heaven of heavens, in that immortality of glory, which the God of all glory, peace, and comfort hath provided for all that love him; Unto the participation whereof, the ſame God of ours mercifully bring us through the Sonne of his love, JESVS CHRIST the righteous: to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, one infinite and incomprehenſible God, bee given all praiſe, honour and glory, now and for ever. Amen. D

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY MOST HONORED Lord, GEORGE, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and Metropolitaine, one of his Majesties most Honourable Privy Councell.

MOST REVEREND FATHER, and no lesse honored Lord,

IT was my desire and hope, to spend the residue of my Time and thoughts in sweet and sacred Contemplation. Satan envying me this happinesse, interrupts me by the malice of an importunate Adversarie. Twelve yeares agoe I wrote a little Apologeticall Letter for the Mariage of persons Ecclesiasticall; and now thus late, when I had almost forgot that I had written it, a moody Masse-priest drops out a tedious and virulent Refutation; thorow my sides striking at the most Honourable, and flourishing Clergie of the whole Christian world, labouring not so much for my disgrace (what would that availe him?) as the dishonour and scorne of our holy Profession, in the eyes of our people. I could contemne it in silence; if the Quarrell were onely mine; Now my wrong cannot be distinguished from thousands: God and his Church are ingaged in this cause, which in my foile could not but sustaine losse; neither may I be now silent with safetie, without mis-construction. Let this hand and Tongue bee no longer mine, then they may serve my Master in Heaven, and his Spouse on Earth. That which I wrote in some three houres, he hath answered in three quaternions of yeares; and what I wrote in three leaves, hee hath answered in no fewer Pages then 380. Should I follow him in this proportion, hee might after some Centuries of yeares expect an answer in Tostatus hydes; whose first word should be, Quis legit hæc? Or if my patience would delay my Reply to the just paces of his Answer, this Volume of his would perhaps be vanished into Grocers shop for waste Paper in thuris piperisve cucullos; and would no more neede answer then now now it deſerveth one. But hearing of the inſultation of ſome Popiſhly affected, who gloried and triumphed in this ACHILLES pro Catholicis, I addreſſed my ſelfe to the Worke, with no little indignation, and no leſſe ſpeed: That my ſelfe-conceited Adverſarie, and his ſeduced abettors, may ſee how little a well-ordered Mariage is guiltie of deadding our ſpirits, or ſlacking our hands. At the beginning of this Summers Progreſſe, when it pleaſed his ſacred Majeſtie to take notice of this ſorie Libell; and to queſtion with me concerning it, I had not ſo much as read it over, ſo newly was it come to my hands; ere his happy returne, (be it ſpoken to the only glory of him that enabled me) I had not only finiſhed this Anſwer, but twice written it over with mine own hand; and yet made this but the recreation of the weightier buſineſſe of my Calling, which now did more then ordinarily urge me.

It was my purpoſe to have anſwered (as beſeemeth the perſon à quo, not ad quem) mildely according to my knowne diſpoſition: but upon better deliberation, I found the inſolency of my Refuter ſuch, that I could not favour him, and not bee cruell to my cauſe. If therefore for many (it is his own art and word) relative Pages, he receive from my unwilling and enforced Pen now and then, though not a Relative to ſuch an Antecedent, yet perhaps ſome drop of ſharper Vineger, then my Inke uſeth to be tempered withall, he may forgive me, and muſt thanke himſelfe: What needed this cauſe ſo furious an Invective? As if the Kingdom of Heaven, & all Religion conſiſted in nothing but Maiden-head or Mariage? Cardinall Bellarmine, when he ſpeaks of the Greeke Church, wherin a maried Clergie is both allowed and required, ſhuts up moderately; That if this were all the difference betwixt them, and the Romane Church, they ſhould ſoone be at peace. If my Refuter had ſo thought, this had not beene his firſt Controverſie: Both eſtates meete in Heaven. Iohn the Virgin reſts in the boſome of maried Abraham; This inordinate heate therefore of proſecution riſes from faction, not from holy Zeale: Hence it was that my Adverſarie cunningly ſingled out this point from many others, ranged in my poore Diſcourſes, as that wherein (in Biſhop Iewels confeſſion) he might promiſe to himſelfe the likelieſt advantage of Antiquity; and how glorioufly doth he vaunt himſelfe in the oſtentation of Fathers and Councels! Which vaine flouriſh how little it availes him, the proceſſe ſhall ſhew; where it ſhall appeare upon what grounds no ſmal piece of Antiquitie was partiall to Virginity, and over-harſh to Mariage, as Beatus Rhenanus, a learned and ingenuous Papiſt confeſſeth. But this we may boldly ſay, that if thoſe holy men had out-lived the bloody times, and ſeene the fearefull inconveniences which would (after a ſetled peace) enſue upon the ambition, or conſtraint of a denyed Continencie, they had doubtleſſe changed their note; and with the moderate and wiſeſt ſpirits of the latter times, pleaded for that liberty which the Reformed Church now enjoyeth. The univerſall conceſſion whereof (after the the private Suffrages of worthy Authors) came to a publike treaty in the Romane Church, amidſt the throng of their late Tridentine Councell, and it is worth the while to obſerve on what grounds it received a repulſe. If Prieſts ſhould bee allowed Mariage (ſay thoſe wily Italians) it would follow that they would caſt their affections on their Wives and Children; and conſequently on their Families, and Countries, whereupon would ceaſe that ſtrait dependance which the Clergie hath upon the See Apoſtolike; In ſo much as to grant their Mariages, were as much as to deſtroy the Hierarchie of the Church, and to reduce the Pope within the meere bounds of the Romane Biſhoprick. This was the plea of the Clergie; their thrifty Laitie, (together with them) enemies to the bleſſing (or, as they conſtrue it, the curſe) of fruitfulneſſe, are wont to plead, Troppo teſte: our Gregory Martin of old computes the prejudiciall increaſe that might ariſe from theſe Mariages to the Common-wealth. It it not Religion, but wit that now lies in our way. Fond men that dare offer thus to controll the wiſedome of their Maker, and will bee tying the God of Heaven to their rules of ſtate As it is, no Church in the whole world (except the Romane) ſtands upon this reſtraint whereof the conſequences have been ſo notoriouſly ſhamefull, that wee might well hope, experience would have wrought, if not redreſſe of their courſes, yet ſilence of ours; And ſurely, if this man had not preſumed that (by reaſon of the long diſcontinuance of Popery) time had worne out of mens minds the memory of their odious filthineſſe, he durſt not thus boldly have pleaded for their abominable Celebate; The queſtion whereof, after all buſie diſcuſſions, and pretences of age, muſt be reſolved into no other then this; How farre the Tradition of a particular Church is worthy to prevaile againſt Scripture: yea, and againſt other Churches. A point, which a very weake judgement will bee able to determine.

HE man begins with a threat, I may not but tremble. Hee frights me with an universall Detection of my errors. It is almost as easie to finde faults, as to make them. Perhaps the Time had beene as well spent in tossing of his Beads: How happie a man am I that shall see all my over-sights? My comfort is, that if my Tree were fruitlesse, there would bee no stone throwne at it. In the meane while, how well doth the title of a Detector become him that hides himselfe? If bee be not afraid or ashamed of his cause, let his name be knowne, that his victories may be recorded. It is an injurious and base advantage to strike and hide; and after a pitcht Duell to gall a fixed Adversarie out of loope-holes. If his person be upon some treasonable act abnoxious, it is hard if some of his names be not free: But if I must needs be matcht with the shadow of a Libeller, I will so take him, as he deciphers himselfe: C. E. Cavillator Egregius; and under this true stile of his, am ready to encounter him, and doe here bid Defiance to an insolent, and unjust adversarie: And first, let me tell my Caviller, this order is preposterous. If all my errors be at the mouth of the Presse, how is it that two or three of them are thus suffered to out-runne their fellowes? Was his malice so bigge with these, that it could not stay the time of the common deliverie? Needs must they be notorious falshoods, that are thus singled out from the rest. Let them appeare in their owne shapes, vgly, (doubtlesse) and prodigious. The first is, That most shameleſse assertion that Bellarmine under his owne hand acknowledges 237. Contrarieties of Doctrine amongst his Catholiks. Could the man but have patience, he should finde above three hundred: What sayes my Detector to this? He hath not seene the severals, yet (like a brave man at Armes) he professes to kill his enemie ere he can appeare; and tells us those 237. Contrarieties, are nothing but 237. lyes in one assertion. That there are in them so many untruths I easily grant; for in contradictions one part must needs be false; And Truth is but single: They are untruths then, (lyes are too broad a word) but their owne. My assertion shall onely justifie that they are told; let him take care for the rest: But they are not in points belonging to Faith and Religion, only in matters undecided, and disputable: The sequell shall try that shift; Why doe we forestall our Reader? Who knowes not that there cannot be so many points fundamentall? Let him take them as they are, I aggravate nothing; It is but onely in such light chaffe as this; In the number and extent of Bookes Canonicall, wherein Driedo, Erasmus, Genebrard, Cajetan, Sixtus Senensis, are acknowledged to oppose the rest; In the Popes infallibilitie of judgement, wherein Gerson, Almayne, Pope Adrian, Eckius, Hosius, Pichius, Waldensis, are at quarrell; In the reach and originall of spirituall jurisdiction, wherein Abulensis, Turrecremata, Fran. à Victoria, Alphonsus de Castro, &c. proclaime to differ: what should I instance in more? It is but in the Popes power in Temporalities, in the inerrableneſse of Councells, whether particular, confirmed by the Pope, or Generall; in the authoritie of Councells above Popes, in the force of Vowes, in the worship due to Images, and the like. These and such other are the sleight Trifles (since all cannot bee weightie) impertinent to faith wherein the Romish Doctors varie.

Neither doth my assertion of their discord gall him more, then of our Vnity: O the forehead of Heretikes! I said that we in our Church differ only in Ceremonies, they in substance. Let him give leave to the contra-division of these two, and I will take leave to maintaine the indivision of the Church of England, in the dogmaticall points of Faith.

This boldnesse, together with my eminent ignorance, makes him admire the scarcitie of learned men in our Country, that could finde no better Doctors to send to Dort-Conference then Master HALL. To your griefe, Sir, it was a Synode, and that noble and celebrious; Neither was it out of want that your silly Adversarie was sent thither. This happy Hand

A which hath no blemish but that it yeelds such Vipers as your selfe) abounds (as you too well know) with store of incomparable Divines; such as may set your Rome to schoole. So as the Messenger of Pyrrhus long since called your Italy, a Countrey of Kings, and Egypt was wont to bee called the Countrey of Physicians: so may this blessed Iland of ours justly merit the title of The Region of DIVINES. For me, I can bee content to bee base enough in mine owne eyes, but if my disparagement shall redound to my betters, I dare tell him it is my comfort, that I was sent thither by a judgement no lesse infallible, then of Paul the Fift. Let himselfe, or any of his Eaves-dropping companions (to whom that place stood open) say wherein I shamed those that sent me. It was my just griefe that the necessitie of my health, yea of my life called me off immaturely: but since either death or departure must bee yeelded to, others shall judge whether I went away more laden with infirmitie, then (how ever unworthy) with approbation.

B But that second lye of mine is so loud, that all my Brethren of Dort must heare it, and they which were lately the Witnesses of my sinceritie (gracing mee with the deare Testimonie of their approose) are now made the Iudges of my impudencie. What monster of falshood will come forth? In my censure of Travell, glancing at the Jesuiticall bragge of their Indian Miracles (whereat their very friends make sport) I charge Cardinall Bellarmine for an avoucher of these Cozenages, who dares averre that his fellow Xavier, not onely healed the Deafe, Dumbe, and Blinde, but raised the Dead, to which I adde (whiles his Brother Acosta, after many yeares spent in those parts, can pull him by the sleeve, & tel him in his eare, so loud that all the World may heare: Prodigia nulla producimus.) This is my Indictment; Let me come to my Tryall: Cast me, if ye can, ye reverend heads; I

C crave no favour. Where lyes this so lewd lye, and malicious abuse? That Bellarmine sayes thus of the Iesuite Xavier, is not denyed; That Acosta sayes thus of himselfe, and his fellow Iesuites, is granted; The first lye yet is, Acosta was never in the East-Indies at all, nor Xavier in the West; and how then could Acosta spend many yeares in those parts? A perilous Plea! Who ever, I beseech you mentioned either East or West? I speake of the Indies in common; so did his Bellarmine from whom I cited this, Claruit etiam in Indiis omni genere miraculorum, &c. Here is not one of the Indies mentioned, but both or either; If both lived in the Indies, though not in one Towne, in one Country, in one Indie; wherein have I offended; whiles speaking of the Indies in generall, I said that Xavier and Acosta lived there? Yet this is one lye (he saith) and that so long a one, as that is reacheth as farre as it is from the East to the West, from the Artick to the Antartick Pole; wherein I doubt

D not but your reverences will easily marke the skill of this learned Cosmographer. Some parts of those instanced Indies differ not so farre; not to speake of the small strait of Anian; the mentioned Region of Mexico is not above fourescore degrees from Iapan: Either your construction must favour him, or else this must goe into the Booke of over sights.

The second lye is, that Acosta pulled Bellarmine by the sleeve in this assertion, as if hee denyed those Easterne Miracles, which he elsewhere confesseth. Indeed, this sawcinesse were dangerous: The red Hat (you say) is fellow to a Crowne. But shall I confesse where I erred? My dull head could not conceive that God should be the God of the Mountains, and not of the Valleys; Of the East Indies, not of the West; and yet be the Iesuites God in both: Especially, since the reason that Ioseph Acosta fetches from the persons (which should bee the E subject of those Wonders) holds as equally for both Indies, as an Almanack made for the Meridian of one Citie, serveth the Neighbours.

Hitherto then the prologue of my infamous falshoods, such, as if all my Writings, could have afforded any equally hainous, these had never beene chosen out to grace the front of his Detection; There must needs be much terrour in the sequel.

The rest of this storme fals upon our learned Professor, D. Collins; one of the prime ornaments of our Cambridge; the partnership of whose unjust disgrace doth not a little hearten my unworthinesse. The world knowes the eminency of that mans Learning, Wit, Iudgement, Eloquence: His workes praise him enough in the Gate: Yet this Malepert Corner-creeper doth so basely vilifie him for ignorance, sillinesse, pratling, rusticitie, lying, as if in these onely he were matchlesse. Indeed whom doth the aspersion of that foule hand forbeare? Vilium est hominum alios viles facere. I appeale to all the Tribunals of Learning thorow the World, whether all Doway have yeelded ought comparable to that mans Pen: whe-

SECT. I.

NEither my Charitie, nor my Leiſure, nor my Readers Patience, will allow me to follow my Detector, in all his Extravagancies, nor to change idle words of Contumely with a Babbler. His twelve firſt Pages, are but the light froth of an impotent Anger; wherein hee accuſeth my bitterneſſe, and profeſſeth his owne. For me I appeale unto all eies; if my Pen have been ſometimes zealous, it was never intemperate: Neither can he make me beleeve, that my Paſſions need to appeare to my ſhame, in calling Rome Proſtitute, or himſelfe ſhameleſſe; or in citing from the Quodlibet of his owne Catholike Prieſts, the Art of his Jeſuites, in * Drurying of young Heires. There is neither Slander, nor Shame in Truth. For, himſelfe, hee confeſſeth to have ſharpened his Pen, and to have dipt it (perhaps too deepe) in Gall: But where his Inke is too thicke, hee ſhall give me leave to put a little Vineger to it, that it may flow the better. In the meane time hee ſhall goe away with this glory; That a fouler Mouth hath ſeldome ever wiped it ſelfe upon cleane Paper.

Declamationes ambitioſorum opera, otioſorum cibi ſunt. Scal. Exer.

Proſtituta illa civitas.

* The particulars of this Hiſtorie he ſhall receive in duo place.

After thoſe waſte flouriſhes, his thirteenth Page begins to ſtrike; wherein hee chargeth me with odious baſeneſſe, and inſufficiencie, in borrowing all my proofes from Bellarmines Objections, diſſembling their Solutions. The Man were hard driven, that would go to borrow of an Enemy. If all my proofes be fore-alledged and fore-anſwered by his Bellarmine; to what purpoſe hath this Trifler blurred ſo much Paper? There (hee ſaith) ſhall the Reader ſee all my Scriptures anſwered, the Doctrine of Devils explicated; there, that other, Let him bee the Husband of one Wife; and Mariage is honorable: Anſwered indeed; but as hee ſaid (ὅτι ἀνέκδοτα) anſwerleſly. Such cleare Beames of Truth ſhine in the face of thoſe Scriptures, that all the Cob-web Vayles of a Jeſuites ſubtiltie cannot obſcure them.

Refut. p. 13.

Their very Citation confutes their Anſwer. And where had we this Law; That if a Jeſuite have once medled with a Scripture, all Pens, all Tongues are barred from ever alledging it? If Satan have miſcited the Pſalme (Hee ſhall give his Angels charge over thee) for Temptation, may not we make uſe of it, for the comfort of Protection? Briefely, let my Caviller know, that it is not the frivolous illuſion of any ſhuffling Jeſuite, that can drive us from the firme Bulwarke of the holy Scriptures. In this, they are clearely ours, after all pretences of Solution (as hee ſhall well feele in the Sequel) and ſhall ſecure us againſt all humane Oppoſition. Before the diſquiſition whereof, ſomewhat muſt of force bee premiſed, concerning the ſtate of our Queſtion.

Refut. p. 12.

WHere, that all Readers may see, how learnedly my wise Adversarie hath mistaken me, and himselfe; I must tell my Detector, That all his tedious discourse sits beside the Cushion: For thus he writes of my Epistle (so as his whole Scope is to disprove the single life of Catholike Priests; and thereby to oppugne our Doctrine in that behalfe) upon which conceit, hee runnes into a large proofe of the strong Obligation of Vowes, the necessitie of their Observation, the penaltie and danger of their Violation, the prayse of Virginitie, the possibilitie of keeping it; and upon this very ground builds hee the tottering wall of his whole ensuing Confutation: in so much, as (pag. 130.) he sayes, That Mariage all times, without contrary Injunction, was lawfull, is not denyed; nor will it be proved in haste, That Priests, or such as had vowed the contrary, might use that libertie: and we say not, that Virginity is violently to bee imposed on any, for it commeth by free election; but where the Vow is free, the Transgression is damnable. Thus he.

Now let all indifferent eyes see, whether the onely drift of mine Epistle bee not to justifie our Mariage, not to improve their Singlenesse; to defend the lawfulnesse of the Mariages of our Clergie, not to justifie the Mariages of the Romish; to plead for the mariage of our Ecclesiastiques, not of Popish Votaries.

In expresse tearmes, I dis-avowed it. The intervention of a Vow makes a new state, Let Baal plead for himselfe. What is it to me, if the Romish Clergie may not be Husbands? or if, according to the French Proverbe, they have a Law not to marry, and a Custome not to live chaste? Let it bee their care whom it concernes; onely I will have leave to speake for our owne. Neither did I ever derogate ought from sacred Virginitie, or lay it levell (whether absolutely, or in all circumstances) with holy Matrimonie; neither did I ever conceive of an impossibilitie of Continence in some persons: Take away these three Grounds, (which I utterly disclaime before God and Men) together with his petulant Railings, and idle Excursions; and what is become of the Volume of my great Adversarie? Those three vast Paragraphes are shrunke into so few sheets of Paper, that a Mouse may as soone runne away with his booke as with his god.

us such Antagonists, as may not faine Occasions to empty their Note-Bookes. One dash of a Penne might thus justly answer the most part of his bloughtie Volume; wherein, like a drunken Man, he makes a fray with his owne shadow, & like an idle Whelpe, runnes away after his owne Sterne. But, that he may not complaine to bee cast off too contemptuously, he shall receive a faire account of Particulars.

Sect. III.

THe Theme of my Epistle is plainely no other, then our Mariage censured, he answers, of Theirs. I would there were such cause of familiaritie and entirenesse, that what is said of one, might agree to both: But the world knowes we are two. If I say our Clergie is heartily loyall to their King; will he straight take it of theirs? If, that our Clergy is willingly subject to more then the directive Power of their Soveraigne, will he challenge this to theirs? The very Point which I purposely declined, he followes in hot chase. Even moderate Papists (they are the words of my Epistle) will grant us free, because not bound by Vow not so farre as those old Germanes pro posse & nosse: And yet all my Detectors refutation still drives at the supposition of a Vow. What have we to do with Votaries? Our Clergie is free, whether as Clergie, or as ours: First, as persons Ecclesiasticall (quà tales) For holy Orders, whether as orders, or as holy, are no hinderances of Matrimonie, as Cardinall Cajetan truly, and with him, the whole Schoole. That which may bee pretended for Impediment, is either a Vow annexed, or an Ecclesiasticall Statute.

A [b] As for the Vow, it is so far from being essentiall to holy Orders, as that it is made by [c] some learned Papists a difference betwixt the Obligation of their Religious, & their Priests; That their Religious are bound by a solemne Vow to single life in the very intrinsecall nature of their Profession; their Priests onely by a Church Constitution, without Vow. And those that go further with their famous Cardinal, and teach, That it is expresly forbidden to Bishops, to ordaine any, without the promise of single life, ground this but upon an Epistle of Pope Gregory [d], a late and weake foundation; and besides hold, that their Vow is but semi-solemne, and accidentally incident into this Profession: for so much as here is neither a direct Exhibition of the Body to this purpose in the Offerer, nor a direct Consecration to this end in the Admitter, both which make up the solemnity of the vow: upon which reason, according to
B them, a Religious Order, because it yeelds over the Body unto an estate repugnant to Matrimony, doth of it selfe in it owne nature, both hinder Mariage, and nullifie it; not so the Ecclesiasticall. To which we may adde. That according to their own [e] Doctors, Solemnitie and Simplicitie make no difference of the Vow before God, though before the Church. A distinction too slight, too newly upstart, to overturne an ancient and well grounded Institution. Neither need wee any better, or other proofe of the inconnexion of this Vow with holy Orders, then that of their own Dominicus à Soto, [f] Non est de essentia Sacerdotis, &c. It is not of the essence of a Priest (saith he) to keepe single; for that the Grecian Clergie are permitted even by the Roman Church to continue in the estate of Mariage. What can be more cleare? If there were a necessary &
C inseparable connexion of a vowed Continency, with holy Orders, then would not, neither could the Romane Church acknowledge a true Priesthood, where it finds conjugall Society. Their act of allowance to the Greeke Church, implyes a faire independency of these two, which some of their clamorous Clients plead to have indivisibly coupled. So as now all the strength of this necessary Celibate is resolved into the power of a Church statute; and of what Church, but the Roman? All other Churches in the World, as of Armenia, Grecia, Syria, Ethiopia, Russia, the Georgians, &c. allow the conjunction of Ministerie, and Mariage; and are so farre from requiring a Vow of necessarie Continencie, that they rather erroniously prerequire a necessity of Mariage in the persons to be ordained.

It is onely the Church of [g] Rome, the great and imperious Mistresse of the World, that imposes the yoke of this Vow, upon her Vassalls. Imposes it but ad libitum; so as
D her great Paramour (in whose vast Bosome that whole Church lyes) may dispense with it as he lists. Heare that irrefutable discourse of Cardinal Cajetan: His words beare weight, and are not unworthy the eyes of my Reader. Therefore (saith he) since the Pope may at his pleasure loose the Bond of that Statute, it followes necessarily, that if a Priest of the Westerne Church shall marry by the Popes leave, without any reasonable cause, that such Mariage of his is a true Mariage, and the parties maried are true Husband and Wife, and their Issue truely legitimate; although in so marying, both the parties should sinne mortally, in doing this act against the Vow of Chastity, without a reasonable, or at least a probable cause of their so licensing; and consequently, neither should the Pope himselfe bee excused from mortal sin: But if there be any reasonable cause of dispensing with this vow of Chastity; then the party thus marying, and dispensed with, may both safely marry, and live in Mari- E age. And hereupon it appeares, That since a reasonable cause of dispensing with this Vow of Chastity, may bee not onely the publike Vtilitie, whether Civill or Ecclesiasticall, but any other greater good then the observing of that Chastity; it justly followes, that the Pope not onely may, but with a safe Conscience may dispence with a Priest of the Westerne (or Roman) Church, that he may marry; even besides the cause of a publike benefit. And therefore the determination of some hath beene too presumptuous in affirming, That absolutely and without such cause the Pope cannot dispense: whereas (as wee have shewed) the Pope may doe it without any cause, though in so doing he should sinne; and with any reasonable cause, without sin: and in both, the Matrimony stands firme. Thus he.

Words that neede neither Paraphraſe, nor Inforcement. And how [h] uſuall the practice of this Diſpenſation hath beene (that wee may not reſt onely in Speculation) appeares enough by the ingenuous complaint of their [i] ſelected Cardinalls, to Paul the Third. Who cry downe the abuſe of thoſe over-frequent Grants, which they ſhould not have yeelded, but upon publicke and weighty cauſes; eſpecially (ſay they) in theſe times, wherein the Lutherans urge this matter with ſo much vehemence. Neither is it long ſince our kind Apoſtate M. Carier gave us here in England, (from bigger men then himſelfe) an overture of the likelihood of this liberall Diſpenſation, from his holy Father of Rome, upon the conditions of our re-ſubjection. Would we therfore but ſtoope to kiſſe the Carbuncle of that ſacred Toe, our Clergie might as well conſiſt with holy Wedlocke, as the Grecian. Oh, the groſſe mockery of Soules, not more ignorant, then credulous! Will his Holineſſe diſpenſe with us for our ſinne? Wee can bee diſpenſed with at home for his diſpenſation. It is their Sorrow, that the World is growne wiſer, and findes Heaven no leſſe neere to Dover-Cliffe, then to the Seven-hills.

And ere wee leave this point, it is very conſiderable, what may bee a reaſonable cauſe of this Diſpenſation: For thoſe very [k] Jeſuites, which hold the power of this Vow ſuch, That the vehementeſt tentations and foiles of the fleſh may not be relieved with an arbitrary Matrimonie, ſince the matter of this Vow is ſo important, & caries ſo much danger in the violation, as that it is not to bee left to the power of a private Judgement (though morally certaine) whether Matrimonie (all things conſidered) bee in this particular expedient (for that may bee fit for a man as a ſingular perſon, which is not fit for him as part of the communitie) yet they grant, that this extreme perplexedneſſe and violence of carnall motions, is a juſt cauſe of diſpenſation. What need wee more? Though ſome [l] Caſuiſts bee more favourable, and grant that in ſuch caſes wee may not onely allow, but perſwade Matrimonie to the perplexed Votary: As Cardinall [m] Aeneas Sylvius (who was never leſſe Pius, then when hee was Pius) gives this hearty adviſe to his friend Iohn Freünd, a Roman Prieſt, that hee ſhould (notwithſtanding his Orders) helpe himſelfe by Mariage; yet the former will ſerve our turne. If therefore thoſe ſuperious, which have all lawfull and ſpirituall authority over us, ſhall have thought good, upon this reaſonable cauſe, to give a generalitie of diſpenſation to all ſuch of our Clergie, as ſhall not, after all carefull and ſerious indevours, find themſelves able to containe; allowing them by theſe lawfull remedies to quench thoſe impure flames: What can any Jeſuit or Devill except againſt this? This is ſimply the cleare caſe of them whoſe cauſe I maintaine.

And yet further. Put the caſe this had not beene; if without the thought of any Romiſh Diſpenſation, the [n] Eaſterne Church never held it needfull to require the Vow of ſingle life in the Miniſters of the Altar, (they know the words of their own Gloſſe) why ſhould not our Church challenge the ſame immunity; for (that from the general conſideration of Eccleſiaſtiques, as ſuch, we may turne our eyes to our Eccleſiaſtiques in ſpeciall) no Church under heaven kept it ſelfe more free from the bondage of thoſe tyrannous Impoſitions?

The [o] Clergie of this Iland, from the beginning, never offered any ſuch Vow, the Biſhops never required it, for more (if any credit bee due to Hiſtories) then a thouſand yeeres after Chriſt. The great Champion of Rome, Maſter Harding, was driven to ſay, They did it by a becke, if not by a Dien-gard, but could never prove it done by either. Neither is it more worth my Readers note, then my Adverſaries indignation, that the wiſe Providence of God ſo pleaſed to contrive it of old, as that from the beginning of the firſt converſion of this happy Iland, it rather conſpired with the Greeke Church, then with the Roman: After the Grecian account we kept our Eaſter, inſomuch, as Beda tells us, that Pope Iohn the Fourth (about the

The story of S. Aidanus and Colmannus, may be herein an abundant witnesse: And for the Britans, Beda left them in the Cloze, both of his Life and History; fast to Greece, loose from Rome. yᵉ Ch: of Engl: menbaind her liberti of Mariagᵉ:

After the Grecian forme we celebrated the Sacrament of Baptisme. After the Grecian Liberty wee continued the Mariages of persons Ecclesiasticall (through so many Centuries of yeares) without the scandall, without the contradiction of the Christian World; so as now wee are but repossessed of the ancient right of our Forefathers, which the interposition of the Romish tyranny, for a while, injuriously debarred. Our Adversaries have wont to brand us for the uncharitable censures of our Forefathers,
B and can they thinke the successions of many Generations so faithlesse, that they made solemne Vowes, for no other purpose, but only to breake them? It was the question of the rich and precious Iewell of England, to which his Hardie Adversary had never the face to reply. My Refuters forehead is stronger, with a weaker wit; Let him try here the power of his audacitie. And if the Church of this Iland, in the dayes of her forced servitude to the Roman See, maintained this liberty (as wee prove in the sequell) and derived it to posterity, how much more free shall it be for us to renue and injoy it, after the just excussion of that servile yoke?

Let now C. E. goe waste good houres, and marre cleane Paper in disproving the Mariage of Romish Votaries: and in the meane time come as neere my question, as Thames is to Tiber: What is this but to mocke the Reader, and abuse himselfe? How
C much wiser is he growne in the processe of his discourse, where hee grants our Mariage, and denies our Clergie? from which weake and witlesse Hold, if we beat him not in the due place, we suffer not enough from that rude Hand.

SECT. IIII.

Refut. p. 17.

HAving then hitherto detected no error, no ignorance but his owne; he now descends to untruths, and finds here so many mistakings, lyes, falsifications, that a Reader would wonder by what Art I could couch so many of thē in so smal a roome; and might verily thinke that I could out-ly the Legends, and outjuggle a Jesuit. But
D ere I have done, these shall appeare to be but the fictions of a passionate fugitive, the Man shall be cooler, I shall be innocent, and my Reader shall say, that if that forehead had not beene so oft crossed, it could not have had so little shame.

My first untruth is, that I avouch S. Paul to call the single life of Priests, A Doctrine of Devills. Reader, is my detector awake? I said, that to maintaine the unlawfulnesse of the Mariage of the Minister of God, is, according to Saint Paul, A Doctrine of Devills, and now he would perswade the World, I said thus of the single life of his Priests. What can we make of this? That single life is a Doctrine? If not truth, yet let him learne to speake sense. But that he may not alwayes refute what I never affirmed; I must ghesse at what he meant: He would elude this charge, with that stale shift, worne out with the Pens of his Predecessors, that Saint Paul is to bee
E understood according to Theodoret, of those which call Mariage execrable: according to Saint Austin, that say, Mariage is evill, and of the Devills making: according to Clemens Alexandrinus, Of those that abhorre Mariage: Of Manichees, and other Heretikes, as Ambrose and Epiphanius, from which Catholikes are so farre that they approve it for a Sacrament. Nuptias execrabiles.

First, the words of Saint Paul, are (κωλυόντων γαμεῖν) forbidding to marry, not condemning Mariage. Then, we know well, what the Tacians, Ebionites, Encratites, Montanists, Marcionites, Manichees, Adamites, and Apostoliques held of Matrimonie. The Apostle brands them here: But what? Them only? Whiles he condemnes them, doth he free those that partake with them? The Act is one, Forbiddāce of Mariage; whether to some, or to more, or to al, S. Paul expresses not: The number doth not vary the quality. And if one be a part of all, then to condemne Mariage in some one kind of Men, can it be other then the partaking of an universall condemnation of it? This then only he hath gained, that some others have beene deeper in this evill then themselves. A Obiect. But our Apostle speakes of them which condemne Mariage as evill in it selfe.

can

Answ. We take what he gives: No mans mouth shall condemne my Refuter but his owne. What was he that accused Mariage of Vnholinesse, out of Sancti estote; of uncleanesse, out of Omnia munda mundis; of Contamination with carnall concupiscence? Was it not his owne Pope [p] Innocentius? Who was he that interpreteth of Mariage, the Text Rom. 8. 8. Those that are in the flesh cannot please God, that called the maried Man, no lesse then the Whoremonger, Sectatorem libidinum, Præceptorem vitiorum; A follower of Lust, a teacher of Vice; that said Mariage was a loosing the reynes to Luxury, an inhiation after obscene lusts? was it not his Pope [q] Siricius, the first Founder (if we may believe their now-defaced Glosse) of forced Continency? B

Who was it that called Mariage a defiling with uncleane society, and execrable contagion? Was it not his Councell of [r] Toledo? Who was it that called Mariage (Spurcitias immundas) filthy beastlinesse? Was it not his [s] Saint Dunstan and Oswald? Let him construe this, and then tell me, what it is (if this be not) to condemne Mariage as [t] evill. Yet more, his owne example shall convince him: He pleads out of Saint Austin, that this text, amongst others, intends to strike at the Manichees; now, the Manichees allowed Mariage to their Auditors, that is (Analogically) their Laity; forbad it to their Electi, that is, their Clergy; So farre approoving it in their laick-Clients, that no modest Penne may write [u] whence they fetched their Sacramentall Bread: Either then the Manichees must be excluded, or Papists must be taken in for company into this doctrine of Devils. It is true, they miss-call Mariage a Sacrament; So as wee may well wonder at these two extreames in one doctrine: and study in vaine how the same thing should be Sacred in a Ceremonious inchoation, and in the reall consummation morally impure; how a Sacrament should bee incompatible with a sacred Person: These Sphyngian Riddles are for better Heads: With what Brow then can my Detector adde, * That with Saint Chrysostome and Saint Austin, they do but compare mariage, they doe not condemne it; Onely teaching Mariage to be good, Virginity better; with Fulgentius not so comparing Virginity to Corne, that they count Mariage Cockle? In this where should they finde any adversary? But if Luxury, Filthinesse, Uncleannesse, Contagion, Beastlinesse, Vice, Obscenity, be the stiles of good, wee can well allow them to the honour of C. Es. Virginity, and are content our Mariages should passe for evill. C D

Sect. V.

Refut. p. 19. 20. MY second vntruth (he saith) is, That I make the single Life of Priests the brand of Antichristianisme. Shamelesse mouth! Where did I ever say so? My words are; Were it not for this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one evident brand of her Antichristianisme. The life is one thing, the opinion another. Single life is good; the opinion of the necessity of single life, and the unlawfulnesse of the Maried, is Antichristian. What can be more plaine? yet this wilfull slanderer tels the world, that I make the profession of Continencie, Antichristian: Whereas we doe willingly professe, that true profession of true Continencie is truly laudable; that the forcible imposition of it, as necessary to some state of men, savours strongly of that Man of sin: Now let my Reader judge, whose untruths my Adversary hath hitherto detected. E

Neither can I eate that word of mine, unlesse I would renounce the Apostle; who seemes purposely to decipher our Romanists by these lines: For, having immediately before described the condition of Bishops, and Deacons, with their Wives and Children (allowing them indifferently with others a married estate) hee presently (as foreseeing that Point which would bee most subject to contradiction) foretels, that the seducing spirits of Antichristianisme would forbid mariage; and this

A this hee forepropheſies ſhall bee done in the latter, or (as their Vulgar and Rhemiſts turne it) in the laſt Times; and that by them, which ſhall ſpeake lyes in hypocriſie. Neither of which can ſo exactly agree to thoſe firſt Heretikes; who, as they were early in time, ſo alſo groſſe in their Doctrine; wherein there was more open impiety, then ſecret diſſimulation.

And if ὑστεροι χρονοι may agree to all the ages of the Church after Chriſt, yet moſt to the laſt, and that other addition ſeemes to ſtrengthen this ſenſe. Reſut. p. 21.

SECT. VI. The Objector: of yt yong widows ſaith ſt

IN vaine therefore doth my Refuter bring in S. Paul, as an abetter of his forced Continencie; whiles he ſaith of yonger Widowes, that When they have begun to
B wax wanton againſt Chriſt, they will marry, having damnation, becauſe they have forſaken their firſt faith. In which place (boulted before to the Bran by many Controverſers) mine Adverſarie hath learned of his Bellarmine, to triumph above meaſure. This firſt faith (ſaith he) all the Fathers without exception, underſtand to bee a Vow, or Premiſe, made to God of Continence, in the ſtate of Widowhood. It is a wide word (All the Fathers) I had thought I had read in holy [x] Athanaſius, Væ vobis qui primam fidem baptiſmi cœlitus inſtitutam irritam facitis; Woe to you that make void the firſt faith of Baptiſme ordained from heaven. I had thought [y] Hierome had ſomewhere ſaid, They are not worthy of beliefe, which have voided their firſt beliefe, Marcion I meane and Baſilides; whom yet I never found condemned for the breach of any Vow of Continence. I had thought, the Author of the Interlineary Gloſſe, would not have croſſed
C all the Fathers, in expounding it, Fidem Baptiſmi; The faith of Baptiſme, which is indeed the firſt Faith, and the Apoſtle ſaith (the firſt) not (the former;) As for that other, which hee imagines a Vow of continued Viduitie, it was neither Faith nor Firſt; let him inſtance (if hee can) where our Apoſtle takes Faith for a Vow. Rather, as if he meant to expound his owne word in this very Scripture, and this occaſion, he cleeres this doubt, whiles he ſpeakes of the willfully improvident Man, that he hath denyed the Faith, and is worſe then an infidel; and now in the ſame Context, he ſpeakes of theſe perverted Widdowes that they have forſaken the Faith.

x Lib. 6. de Trin. de Beat. tit. Dei ad Theophilum. Et inſtrumenta libertatis ſemel conceſſa per iteronationem inſiſmatis.

y Non ſunt digni fide, qui primam fidem Baptiſmi irritam fecerunt, Marcionem loquor & Baſilidem. Hier. Proœm. in Epiſt. ad Tit.

Much leſſe is it the Firſt, whether in Time, or Dignitie: For, they could not have beene Church-Widowes, if not Chriſtians; and they could not bee Chriſtians, if they ſhould have valued the Vow of their widowhood above the vow of their
D Chriſtendome; yea, ſo farre was this from the firſt Vow (if it had beene one) as that it was the laſt of all; for according to them, their firſt Faith muſt bee to their Husband, their ſecond to CHRIST, in their initiation to Religion; their laſt in the Vow of Widowhood; So here is a fained vow made Faith, and laſt made firſt; and all to uphold a crazy conceit of our Romaniſts, which hath no other ground but this one ambiguity. Chryſoſtome indeed calls it (συνθήκη) pactum; a couenant; but what covenant, or with whom, he expreſſes not; whether of Chriſtianity, or of Widowhood, or of Miniſtration; Some of the others that followed him, ſpake according to the Gloſſe which the corrupt conceit of the Times had ſet upon him.

Reſut. p. 20.

But what need my Refuter ſtand upon particular Authors (he ſayes) when hee
E may bring 214. Biſhops, all ſitting in Councell at Carthage, all agreeing in this expoſition, poynting us to the fourth Councell of Carthage? (Canone ult.) His Gratian, had wont to tell us, (for the more Grace) that it was in the third Councell of Carthage, Can. 4. Now he is taught to change this note; So doth C. E. with his Binius, tell us it was the 4. Councell and the laſt Canon. We have reaſon to ſuſpect it was in neither; The very ſtile and manner of diſcourſe ſo different from the reſt of thoſe briefe Canons, and the faſhion of thoſe Times, cary in it open likelihood of Baſtardie: It was an eaſie fraud to patch it to the end of thoſe Canons; neither (which learned Iunius taught me firſt to obſerve) is it found among the Greeke; then which there cannot be a worſe ſigne.

Reſut. p. 21.

But that I may at once anſwer his vaunt of Antiquitie, and ſtop the mouth of this Caviller: Let me aske him whether thoſe Fathers, whom hee cites for this ſenſe, doe doe not take thoſe yong Widowes for Votaries? If they doe (as he cannot denie) how can theſe two ſtand together; That they ſhould have damnation, becauſe againſt their vow, they would mary; and yet that the Apoſtle ſhould wiſh them to marry? Can he imagine that Saint Paul would adviſe them to incurre wilfull damnation? A

And if in this I ſhould have diſſented from the interpretation of much Antiquitie, I ſhould but take to my ſelfe the libertie of his Maſters the Jeſuites, with whom this is no novelty; for inſtance, his not unlearned, and bold [a] Maldonate: (as wee ſhall ſee afterwards) upon a Text of this very queſtion, confeſſing the current of the ſtreame of Antiquity, can come in, at laſt, with a Doctorly wipe of Adduci non poſſum ut ſequar; I cannot goe with them: This priviledge is for none but the Fathers of the Society, to controll the Fathers of the Church.

The ſtate then of theſe Widowes was ſhortly this: They being for their poverty ſuſtained by Church-almes upon * condition of attendance on the Saints, whether ſicke or travelling, were to dedicate themſelves to this ſervice; but, ſome of the yonger ſort being inveigled by Infidell-Lovers, were drawne to leave, not their Station onely of their miniſtration, but their profeſſion of Chriſtianity: Theſe had damnation moſt juſtly, for caſting off their firſt Faith. Their mariage was accidentally faulty, becauſe it forced them from their holy imployment; Their apoſtaſie was abſolutely and damnably ſinfull, in that they left Chriſt, and followed after Satan. B

* De his agit quæ ad Eccleſiæ ſtipem, vel miniſterium recipiebantur ejus ſumptibus alendæ. Eſpenc. de Cont. lib. 4. cap. 1.

The inextricable Dilemma then in my detector is eaſily anſwered; (I demand now of Maſter Hall, whether theſe young Widowes in breaking their Vowes, did ſinne, or not? If they did not; why ſhall they have damnation? If they did ſinne (as indeed they did) then how is the Vow unlawfull? how the brand of Antichriſtianiſme?) Nothing can be more baſe then to beg the Queſtion; What doe wee diſpute, but whether any Vow were made? and if any, whether of Continence, or of Service? But why then ſhall they have damnation? For waxing wanton againſt Chriſt; not meerly for marying. If to marry, were to waxe wanton againſt Chriſt, why ſhould the Apoſtle have adviſed it them? In a word, for abandoning both their Office and Religion. C

Refut. p. 21. 22.

Laſtly, who can but wonder at the face of our Adverſaries, that dare bring forth ſo plaine a witneſſe againſt themſelves. For, if the Vow of Continence bee the firſt faith here ſpoken of, then may not any woman by the Apoſtles charge make this Vow, till ſhee bee threeſcore yeeres old; which, how is it at this day practized in the Romiſh Church? ſince, and as the Cæſar-Auguſtaine Councell, and the Agathenſe abated it to forty yeeres, and the third Councell of Carthage yet lower, to five and twentie; ſo Pope Gregorie fell yet lower to eighteene; and ſome other Councells, yet lower to twelve; Although the Trent-Conference very liberally riſe up to whole ſixteene: Either therefore let them grant that our Apoſtle ſpeakes not of Votaries, or elſe let them follow his rule of the age of Votaries, that the World may thinke they have honeſt Nunneries; and let them confeſſe their change preſumptuous. Thus, I hope, This Gordian knot, that requires more ſtrength then Maſter Halls learning, and a ſharper edge then Alexanders ſword to diſſolve, or cut, is proved more eaſie then the knot of a Friers girdle, which a very dull Whittle may cut aſunder; and C. E[s]. appeale to all Schollers, proclaimes him ignorantly confident. D E

IF it had not beene for two poore words of mine (both yet miſſe-underſtood) I wonder how C. E. could have diſcovered to the world his dexterity, in ſerving out his oft ſodden Coleworts; the refuſe of his Bellarmine and Coccius. [a] Threeſcore and foure Pages, or more, hath he bravely ſpent in the Vindication of Virginitie, which never honeſt and wiſe man oppoſeth. Let their ſhavelings (I ſaid) ſpeake for themſelves upon whom their unlawfull Vow hath forced a wilful and impoſſible neceſſitie. The man is angry that I medled with his crowne; but if his haire had not beene longer

A longer then his wit, this deepe offence had never beene; For, if hee had taken my words, Cum grano ſalis, in the ſenſe which they will onely well beare: (Let ſuch of their ſhavelings, as upon whom an unlawfull Vow hath forced an impoſſible neceſſity, ſpeake for themſelves) (none other need ſpeaking for) he had found the ſentence ſo particular, that it might have ſpared him both much ſpleene and worke; ſince, neither was it in my heart ever to affirme the obſervation of this Vow impoſſible to any man, neither will he (I hope) hold that it is kept by all: It is not in the power of the Razor, together with the haires, to cut off inordinate affections; ſome vow, which cannot containe: Upon this ſuppoſition onely, I called this neceſſitie impoſſible, and this Vow unlawfull; I cannot therefore but pity my paſſionate Detector, that hee hath ſet himſelfe all on a froth, in running this Wild-Gooſe chaſe
B alone, following nothing but his owne fancy, whiles hee purſues a certaine Chimericall Monſter, that holds Continence utterly and univerſally impoſſible. And that he may the better repent him of this witleſſe waſte and prevent the ſpoile of good Paper hereafter, let him know at once (which perhaps hath not hitherto beene allowed him) what we hold concerning this Point. We doe therefore from our hearts honour true Virginity, as the moſt excellent eſtate of life, which is incident to fraile Humanity; Gerſon hath taught us not to call it a Vertue, but it is Couſin German to a Vertue; Neither doe we thinke that the Earth affords any thing more glorious, then Eunuchiſme for the Kingdome of Heaven; which is therefore commended by our Saviour, not as a thing meerely arbitrarie, by way of advice, but of charge to the able. Qui poteſt capere capiat; In this we can gladly ſubſcribe to Saint Chryſoſtome,
C Bonum eſt Virginitas, &c. Virginity is good, I yeeld it; and better then Mariage, I confeſſe it. Secondly, every man therefore (not Eccleſiaſtiques onely) ſhould labour, and ſtrive to aſpire unto this eſtate, as the better, uſing all holy meanes both to attaine, and to continue it: Neither doe wee thinke it any other then blameable, that yong Perſons (not ſo much as adviſing with their owne abilities) without all indevour and ambition of ſo worthy a condition, leape raſhly into the bands of Wedlocke. Thirdly, though every man muſt reach for it, yet every man cannot catch it; ſince it hath pleaſed God to reſerve this as a peculiar gift for ſome perſons, not intending it as a common favour to all Suiters. Fourthly, thoſe then, which are upon good triall conſcious to themſelves of Gods call to this eſtate, and his gift inabling them unto it, may lawfully make profeſſion thereof to the glory of the Giver, and (if D need be) may vow (God continuing the ſame grace unto them) an holy perpetuation thereof to their end; the obſervation whereof, if they through their owne neglect ſhall let fall, they cannot be excuſed from * ſinne, or freed from cenſure: But thoſe, which after all ſerious indevours, find nothing but weakneſſe and uncertainties in this behalfe, ſhall ſin, if they abſolutely vow; ſhall not ſinne, if they marry, in what condition of life ſoever; nor ſinne in marying, however their mariage may have faulty circumſtances.

Now my Detector by this time in our aſſertions ſees his owne folly; if againſt this he can except ought, he knowes where to find an adverſary: In the meane time, hee needed not to take it ſo highly, that in the Romiſh uſe of vowes, I made mention of unlawfulneſſe, of impoſſibility; unlawfulneſſe in the making, impoſſibilitie in E keeping; I am ready to maintaine both, in reſpect of the indiſpoſition, yea incapacitie of the Votaries.

His Fathers, like Sepulchrall dogges, tore up the graves of Gods Saints, and gnawed upon their dead bones; and now this whelpe of theirs commingit cineres, Bedribbles their aſhes. Refut. p. 25, 26, 27.

The heroicall Spirit of Luther (for I cannot bee flouted out of that word) hated the the brothelry of their Cloyſters; and choſe rather (which gals them to the heart) to bee an honeſt Husband, then a fornicating Frier. A

Whar did he other in this, then the holy Fathers have adviſed him, yea, then he learned in their owne Schoole? for caſting, perhaps, his eye upon the Index of their Aquinas, he found there, Votum vergens, &c. A Vow tending to the danger of the perſon, may be ſecurely broken, if a diſpenſation cannot be had: What other then all their more ingenuous Caſuiſts would thinke fit to give way unto? If Luther would have ſtill kept on his Cowle, and but have paid the fees of a Concubine, he had lived and dyed an holy Auguſtinian: but now all his crimes ſinke downe out of ſight, una uxor ſupernatat, (as that Father ſaid) his wife only floteth: & poore honeſt Katherine Bora hath made more noyſe in their Papers, then ten thouſand of their Curtizans. Neither needs this man any other inſcription on his grave to make him odious, then B this, Here lyes the man that held mariage better then fornication. If now Doctor Luther in a vehement deteſtation of the impurity of their holy Stewes, after the homely plainneſſe of a blunt German liberty, uſed ſome over-broad ſpeeches to expreſſe his owne freedome, and their abhominations; what is this to us? If we honour the man, muſt we hold his pen impeccable? This is enough to maintaine in their Vice-god of the ſeven hills. For us, we have ſworne unto the words of no Maſter, but that One in Heaven, the eternall Word of his Father. But this we dare ſay, that this Adverſaries Truth is no more in fathering all theſe reports upon Luther, then in fathering Luther upon an Incubus. The crimes charged Upō Luther

One of them tells us, that a Devill begot him: Another tells us, that (by his owne confeſſion) a conference with the Devill begot his oppoſition to the Maſſe: Another, [d] that he was in league and favour with Solyman the Great Turke, who by his inſtigation was drawne to war upon Chriſtendome. Another, [e] that Luther would have beene a King alone, and that from him ſprang the rebellion of Muntzer: Another, [f] that Leonard Knoppen was his Baud: & that his Katherine, for two yeares together after her ſtealing away, was debauched by the Schollers of Wittenberge: And now laſtly comes in that malicious [g] Apoſtate (which ſhould rather have changed the falſe name of Iuſtus, then the over-worthy name of Calvinus) and avouches forſooth, that Luther was yeſterday a Monke, to day contracted, to morrow an Husband, the next day a Father. Goe on, ye brazen-faced Paraſites of Rome. Lyes and Blood may bring you into the Kalender. C

But this laſt, my Detector countenances by the teſtimony of Eraſmus, who, in a Letter of his to his friend Daniel Mauchius of Vlmes, delivers the ſame Storie in more words. Reader, bee intreated to looke over that large Volume of Eraſmus his Epiſtles, and if there bee no ſuch man found there (as there is not) no ſuch Letter, judge what to thinke of theſe mens fidelity. Yea to the plaine contrary, my Detector (having not memory enough for a true Lyer) in the Page 172. upon another occaſion contemptuouſly citing Luthers brood out of his owne Workes, confutes this ſpightfull Fiction. Anno 1525. Iunii 12. uxorem duxi, &c. In the yeere ſaith he, 1525. on the 12. of Iune, I married; In the yeere 1526. my eldeſt Sonne JOHN was borne: in the yeere 27. my Daughter ELIZABETH and ſo the reſt. Either then my man hath a new Kalender of his own, which contrary to the Gregorian, beginnes the yeare on D June the 13. or elſe Luther was not a Father the next day after hee was an husband. But what doe I trouble my Reader with this idle Scoganiſme? Scolds or Jeſters are onely fit for this combat. E

As for thoſe exceſſive ſpeeches of compariſon, whereby Luther points forth the neceſſity of carnall actions, they are ſpoken onely of ſuch perſons, as have not the gift of continency; whom naturall inclination (by which they are led) caries (without an higher reſtraint) importunately unto theſe deſires: wherein hee ſayes not much other then their owne Saint Aquinas, Omnibus animalibus, &c. In all perfect living creatures there is a naturall inclination to carnall conjunction.

But when Luther ſpeakes of men bleſſed from above with this gift, C. E. might have heard him in another ſtraine; pleading both the poſſibility and worthineſſe of this condition. As in his Commentarie upon the [h] Pſalme 128. verſe 3. (to give one for

Thus he gravely and holily.

SECT. IX.

B NOw to follow my Adverſary in particulars: Whereas all the world ſees that the unlawfulneſſe of their vow depends upon the inability of performance, he, like a true Artiſt, begins firſt with the unlawfulneſſe. It is well, that all theſe ſheets of Paper which he hath ſpent in this point, may ſerve for ſome neceſſary uſe; this which he hath put them to, is fooliſhly ſuperfluous. Refut p.19.

If the vow of Chaſtity be unlawfull (ſaith he) it muſt be either in reſpect of the vow, or the matter vowed; Not the firſt, becauſe vowes in generall are lawfull; which he will prove out of Scriptures and Fathers. Idle head! Who ever denied it, but the exploded Lampetians? His own Cardinall could have taught him, that Luther and Calvin approve the vowing of things commanded, firſt, and then of things not commanded too, to the avoyding of Sinne, or other good purpoſes. Not the Second, which he will prove by C many arguments; ſome of thē from the Fathers, extolling virginity, and comparing it with the ſtate of Angels, and preferring it before mariage. And who ever thought otherwiſe, except Iovinian? and perhaps not he. And at laſt, after ſome ſevere examples of penance injoyned to fornicating vow-breakers, by Chryſoſtome and Baſil, to incontinency and rape, by the civill Lawes (as if theſe concerned us ſo much as themſelves) he deſcends to this challenge; Let Mr Hall (if he be able) produce us ſome proofe, although but one claſſicall authority of any one ancient writer, where he hath ever perſwaded ſuch as have ſolemnely vowed Chaſtity, to uſe Mariage as a meanes to overcome temptations, and he ſhall have ſome excuſe for calling it a filthy vow; and his heroicall Luther for terming it a diabolicall thing; So he. I take him at his word, onely let him not fly forth upon the ſhift of Solemnity, which their Schoole lately hatched; That were D to ſeek gray haires in infancy; Firſt, I bring forth that famous place of Saint Cyprian, in his Epiſtle written both in his owne name, and his fellow-Biſhops, to Pomponius, concerning ſome vowed Virgins which were found in bed with men, whereof one was a Deacon; of which Virgins he with his Brethren paſſe this ſentence, [k] Quod ſi ſe ex fide Chriſto dicaverunt, &c. If they (ſaith he) have faithfully dedicated themſelves unto Chriſt, let them without all deceit perſevere in the courſe of chaſtity, and ſo couragiouſly and conſtantly expect the reward of their Virginity; Si autem perſeverare nolunt, vel non poſſunt, &c. But if either they will not, or cannot perſever, it is better that they marry, than by their wantonneſſe fall into the fire; Let them give no ſcandall to their Brethren and Siſters. What could Luther or Calvin write more directly? So that Eraſmus notes in the Margine, Etiam virginibus ſacris permittit nubere: Here Cyprian permits even holy Virgines to marry. [l] Bellarmines ſhift hereof is ridiculous, That Cyprian by occaſion of E ſome Virgins, which after their vow behaved themſelves diſhoneſtly, adviſed others, that if they had not a firme purpoſe of perſevering, they ſhould not vow, but marry; whom we remit to the checke of his owne Pamelius, yea, of his conſcience; Indeed, what is this but to mocke both the Author, and the Reader? For doth Cyprian at all vary the perſons of whom he ſpeakes? Doth he not ſpeake plainly of Virgins devoted to Chriſt? And what perſevering could there be, but in that which they had undertaken? And what had they undertaken, but a dedication of themſelves to Chriſt? What is this, Reader, but willingly to try his Oares againſt the ſtreame of truth?

To the ſame purpoſe is that noted ſentence of Hierome[m], (though otherwiſe none of the beſt friends to mariage) who ſpeaking of Virgins, aſcribed by their vow into the celeſtiall Family, addes, Quibus apertè dicendum, &c. Whom we muſt openly charge that either they would marry, if they cannot containe, or, that they would containe, if they will not marry. We know the eluſion of this place alſo; That Hierome ſpeakes of Virgins in purpoſe, not in vow; But whoſe name, I beſeech you, was defamed by their lewdnes? or, what was the heavenly and Angelicall Family, whoſe glory was blemiſhed herewith? Was it of any other then profeſſed Virgins? Or could the act of a purpoſed Virgin onely, ſhame Virgins profeſſed? To the ſame purpoſe is the advice of [n] Baſil, and [o] Epiphanius.

Adde to theſe an elder then they all, Tertullian, and with him all thoſe Fathers, which interpret Saint Pauls [volo juniores nubere] of young Widowes; All which muſt needs hold, that our Apoſtle allowes mariage for the lawfull remedy of unable Votaries.

Let not this malicious Maſſe-Prieſt then turne us over to his Tyberianus or Iovinian, for the firſt founders of our opinion, and practice, which we received from no other then that divine Arch-hereticke, that ſate at the feet of Gamaliel; from no other, then the holily-hereticall Fathers and Martyrs of the Church: As for thoſe two miſalledged Authors, to whom he aſcribes us, his ſkill doth palpably faile him in both. For Tyberianus, he being ſuſpected of Priſcillianiſme, wrote affectedly againſt that hereſie, at laſt foulely fell to that, which he diſclaimed; whereon it was that Hierome ſaies, Canis ad vomitum, not upon the mariage of his daughter. And for that particular fact, it is no leſſe miſtaken. Hierome ſaies onely, Filiam virginem Chriſto devotam, matrimonio copulavit; but Sophronius (who it ſeems well knew the ſtory) turnes it ([p] γαμικῶς κατανάγκασεν) compeld his daughter (a cõſecrated Virgin) to marry. A foule fact, which we deteſt no leſſe then the contrary practice of thoſe Romaniſts, who compell their daughters (which would marry) to be conſecrated Virgins. It is then no leſſe faiſe that Tyberian gave beginning to us, then it is true that Tyburne hath given a juſt end to ſome of them. For Iovinian, what is he to us? when neither our practice was his, nor his opinion ours. Not our practice; for he lived and dyed a ſingle Monke. Not his opinion; How can we be ſaid to admit mariage to an equall ſhare of merit with Virginity, when we deny merit in either? Againe that Eunuchiſme (not in it ſelfe, but) for the Kingdome of Heaven, is better then it, we doubt not; But when [q] theſe two are reduced to their ſubjects, their value is according to their uſe. Chryſoſtome could ſay [r] μὴ συμπεζίας, &c. Uſe marriage with meet moderation, and thou ſhalt be the firſt in the Kingdome; And Gregory Nazianzen (beſides that he ſaith of his Siſter Gorgonia) when he commends the children of Baſil the elder, [s] tels us, ſome of them ſo uſed their mariage, that it was no hinderance to them, quo minus ad parem virtutis gloriam aſpirarent; that they might not aſpire to an equall glory of vertue with the Virgins; and made theſe two rather different kinds of life, then manners of living. Saint Chryſoſtome then, and Nazianzene, ſhall uſher us into the Schoole of Iovinian. And if Iovinian were Formoſus Monachus, craſſus, nitidus, &c. A faire, fat, ſpruce Monke (as he ſaith;) Me thinks he ſhould rather have hoped to match him in their Sybariticall Cloyſters, where they abound with meat, and drinke, and eaſe, then in our laborious Clergy. It is happy for us, and for that reverend Archbiſhop Marcus Ant. de Dominis, that this Rayler can object nothing to him but an harmeleſſe loade of corpulency. It moves their ſpleene enough, that this learned Prelate hath honoured our Iland with a Dalmatian Pall. Their cauſe feeles that he can (notwithſtanding) paſſe into the Pulpit: What ſpeake they of this? when to their ſorrow, they ſee he could paſſe over the Alpes to leave Rome. This Beagle, and his balling Beyerlinck, and the kennell of Sarbon, may bay at him, but not one of their Bandogs dare faſten. But why do I ſuffer this babbler to lead me out of my way? What is all this ſleeveleſſe diſcourſe to a man that never ſaid, never thought every vow of this kind unlawfull, nor every breach of ſuch vow ſinleſſe? When he takes me with this Tenet, let him load me with authorities; Till then, his now-frivolous papers may ſerve for any honeſt uſe.

NO leſſe wiſe and proper is that other diſcourſe of Impoſſibility: For, to make ſhort worke; That no man can containe (though it be given him) I never ſaid; That any man may containe (though it be not given him) either he will not ſay, or if he do, he hath Chriſt for his Adverſarie. Why do we blot Paper? How the performance of this Vow is not poſſible onely for all, but [p] facill alſo, (which he contendeth) the iſſue proves too well, and the World bluſhes to ſee it. Let it not bee too much burden to his patience, that I ſaid, Some of their ſhavelings cannot hold; Hee knows what their Gloſſe upon Gratian ſaid of old (though now they have pulled out the tongue for blabbing) [q] Communiter dicitur, &c. It is commonly ſaid, that a Clerke ought not to be depoſed for ſimple fornication, Cùm pauci ſine illo vitio inveniantur; Since there are but a few found without that vice. This they have wiped out of the Booke, but the Margarita Decreti (as happy is) holds it ſtill: And their honeſt [r] Caſſander, yet more plainly, Vix centeſimum invenias, you ſhall ſcarce find one of an hundred free: And, if need were, I could tell him out of old [s] Bromiard what the voice of a Ghoſt ſaid to a Prieſt of theirs, but I will not; only thus he ſhuts up; That there came daily ſuch ſtore of Prieſts to Hell for their Luxury, in plaine Engliſh, Lechery, that he had not thought there had beene any left upon earth. And to theſe I could adde the jerkes of their zealous Preacher, Frier Menot, who fetches the threefold ſhame of their Clergie out of the Ave Mary: The ſecond whereof (though the firſt in miſchiefe) is In Mulieribus. But what ſhould I fil Carts with ſuch ſtuffe, as I eaſily might, when the ſalacity of the Romiſh Clergie, is growne to be the Proverbe, and ſcorne of the World? Let not my Refuter ſcare us with the threat of recriminations, we know that in all Profeſſions, there may be found lewdneſſe enough. But, when all is done, we ſhal juſtifie that which worthy B. Iewel ſaid long agoe, Scortum apud nos modeſtiùs vivit, quàm apud vos Penelope; Our ſtrumpet is their Penelope. What needed he therefore to upbraid us with that frumpe of Eraſmus (Quæ malùm eſt iſta tanta ſalacitas, &c.) when he knows how eaſily we can over-pay him in this Coyne? Was it not Eraſmus, whoſe word it was (which Maſter Doctor Collet Deane of Paules, was wont to have familiarly in his mouth) [t] Nunc is eſt rerum ac temporum ſtatus, ut nuſquam repertas minus inquinatam morum integritatem, quàm inter conjugatos? Now ſuch is the ſtate of the times, that you ſhall never finde leſſe corruption of manners and life, then amongſt the married. Was it not Eraſmus that ſaid, Atque utinam verè caſtrati ſint, quicunque ſuis vitiis magnificum caſtrationis prætexunt titulum, ſub umbra caſtitatis turpius libidinantes, &c. Neque enim mei pudoris eſſe puto commemorare; in quæ dedecora, ſæpe prolabantur qui naturæ repugnant, &c. This is enough to let my Detector ſee, we need not die in his debt for Eraſmus.

SECT. XI.

BUt it is no arguing from the Act to the poſſibility. Theſe did not containe, but they might. What? whether it were given them or no? So ſeemes mine Adverſarie to hold, whiles he cenſures Luther, for ſaying, that this is Gods gift; and that here we can onely take, and not give. Yea, but if they had aſked, it would have beene given them. Aske, and it ſhall be given: ſo ſaies my Refuter, out of Origen, none of the beſt Interpreters; ſo his Maſters the Jeſuits; Sufficit promiſſio generalis, ſaith * Bellar. By this Rule, if the Cardinall ſhould but pray for the Popedome, the three Crownes muſt come tumbling upon his Head; and if C.E. ſhould but pray for a red Hat, it would have Mercuriall wings, and come flying to Doway; I would he had but praid for Wit, he had then perhaps been ſilent: Not conſidering, that Virginity, and Honour, and degrees of Wit (though excellent in their kinds) yet are ſuch things as without which we may injoy God, and go to Heaven, and therefore that perhaps God ſees it beſt for us to aſke them and go without. What can be more plaine then

Who would not have thought, that this one text of our Saviour, ſhould have ſtopt all mouths? His Diſciples had ſaid; If thus, it is good not to marry: He replyes, All men cannot receive this Word, ſave they to whom it is given; and concludes, He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. Yet here ſee the forehead of a Jeſuite, Maldonate upon the place dares ſay thus: * That he ſaith, all men do not receive this Word, all Interpreters (almoſt) do ſo expound it, as if the ſenſe were, All men cannot performe this which you ſay, that is, Want a wife, becauſe all have not the gift of Chaſtity, but onely thoſe to whom it is given; for which he cites onely Origen, Gregory, Nazianzene, Ambroſe, concealing the reſt of his, Almoſt all; yet after the ſame Page (forgetting himſelfe) *ſolus D. It is happy yet that herein wee are granted to erre with Saint Auſtin; and yet ere long, wee take in Origen, Nazianzene, Ambroſe, Hierome, and at laſt, overtake, Fere omnes, ſo as we need not feare ſolitarineſſe in this error. But what ſaies the Jeſuite to this good company? Adduci non poſſum, ut ſequar; No marvell. Marke, how well the Jeſuites follow Jeſus himſelfe: Jeſus ſaies, All men cannot receive this. The Jeſuits ſay, * All men may receive it. Jeſus ſaies, It muſt be given from God. The Jeſuits ſay, a It is ſo the gift of God that it is in the power of Man. How can we looke to eſcape their Oppoſition, when they dare thus contradict our Saviour? For me, I ſhall be ſtill in this Hereſie, That all their Prieſts and Moncks, and Nuns cannot containe: And his b Bonaventure ſhall beare mee out, who teaches me, that to the third degree of Chaſtity (requiri privilegium ſingulare) there is a ſingular priviledge required; for that it ſeemes to bee above the pitch of naturall poſſibility, to live in the Fleſh, and not to feele the faults of Fleſh. why why not ſo long as Eve the Maid of Meurs?

The Spirit of God (if at leaſt he may be allowed for the Author of Continencie) breatheth where and when he liſteth, and that God which makes Mariages in Heaven, either averts the heart from theſe thoughts, or inclines it at his pleaſure. Shortly, The great Doctor of the Gentiles had never learned this Divinity of Doway, whoſe charge is, [c] Defraud not one another, except with conſent for a ſeaſon, that yee may give your ſelves to Faſting and Prayer: And againe, Come together, that Satan tempt you not through your incontinency. He onely wanted my Monitor, to jogge him on the Elbow, as here: What needs all this fleſhlineſſe (if they can ſafely containe) whiles they give themſelves to extraordinary devotion, Why not more? Why not alwaies? It is pitie, that no man would adviſe the Apoſtle, how great a gap this Doctrine of his opens to all laſciviouſneſſe. Let me have but leave to put S. Pauls Name in ſtead of mine, into this challenge of my Refuter, and thus he argues. c 1 Cor. 7. 5. Refut. p. 65.

If S. Paul ſay that πρὸς καιρὸν, for a while they are able to live chaſte, but not for any long while; I aske againe, How long that while ſhall endure? and what warrant they have therein for not falling? ſeeing it may ſo fall out, that in the while appointed, they may bee more tempted then they ſhall be againe in all their lives after: How ſawcy would this Sophiſtrie be? how ſhameleſſe? The words are his; onely the Name is changed; what the Elect veſſel would anſwer in ſuch a caſe for himſelfe, let C. E. ſuppoſe returned by mee. Refut. p. 65.

SECT. XIII.

THe Refuter hath borrowed ſome Weapons of his Maſter Bellarmine, and knowes not how to weare them. It would move any mans diſdaine, to ſee, how abſurdly thoſe poore Arguments are blundred together; We muſt diſtinguiſh them as we may.

Firſt, S. Paul condemnes the yong Widows mentioned, therefore he overthrowes this impoſſibility of containing. I anſwer: S. Paul adviſes the yong Widows to marry, and admits none into the Church booke, under threeſcore yeares: therefore he eſtabliſhes in ſome, this impoſſibility. Refut. p. 63.

Secondly, S. Paul adviſes Timothy to live chaſte. Reader, tel him the word is (σώφρονα) which their owne vulgar, 1 Tit. 8. turnes, Sober; and in 2 Tit. 5. Prudent; But, to grant him his own Phraſe: Can my Detector deſcry no difference betwixt Chaſte and Single? Did he and his fellowes never heare of a conjugall Chaſtity? So they have ſtill wont to ſpeake, as if Chaſtity were only oppoſite to mariage, as if no ſingle life could be unchaſte. His Eſpencæus might have taught him that Verſe in Virgil, Caſta pudicitiam ſervat domus: and he might have heard of that Roman law of Veſtals, Caſtæ ex caſtis, puræ ex puris ſunto; yea his Eraſmus might have taught him yet further, [f] E diverſo nihil prohibet in conjugio Virginitati locum eſſe; that even in Mariage there may be Virginity. Refut. p. 63, 64. f Eraſ. Apol. pro declam. Matr. Secundus gradus Virginitatis eſt Matrimonii caſta dilectio. Opus Imperf. in Mat. Refut. p. 64.

Thirdly, the Fathers exhort to Virginity; eſpecially S. Ambroſe and S. Auſtin, Let him tell this to them that know it not, to them that diſlike true chaſtity in Virgins; not to them that condemne unchaſtneſſe in a pretended Virginity. Ab his duabus Columnis crede mihi difficile duellor. Ibid ex Bernardo. C. E.

To what vertue do not the Fathers exhort? yet never ſuppoſing them to be within our Lure. Laſtly, where is the ſhame of my Refuter, that cites Auſtin as the Man on whom he depends for his univerſall poſſibility of Continency: when his owne Maldonat profeſſes, that S. Auſtin is the onely enemy to this Doctrine?

Fourthly, Where there is impoſſibility or neceſſity, there is no ſin, no counſell; as no man ſinnes in not making new Starres, in not doing Miracles. A ſtale ſhift, that oft ſounded in the eares of Auſtin and Proſper from their Pelagians; The naturall man in this depravedneſſe of eſtate cannot but offend God, therefore hee ſinnes not in ſinning: Counſell given ſhewes what wee ſhould doe, not what we can. [g] Iubendo admonet, &c. ſaith Auſtin; In commanding he admoniſheth us both to doe what we can, and to aſke that which we cannot do. In Continency then our indevour Refut. p. 64. g Aug. l. de Nat. & Grat. c. 43.

vour is required for the attaining of that which God will give us; God never imployed us in making of Starres; Though my Refuter is every day ſet on greater Worke, the making of him that made Starres. Laſtly, it is true, there is no ſinne in marying, there may bee ſinne (after a vow) in not uſing all lawfull meanes of Chaſtity: The Fathers therefore ſuppoſing a [h] pre-required aſſurance of the gift, and calling of God in thoſe, whom mature deliberation and long proofe had covered with the vaile of Virginitie, doe juſtly both call for their continuance, and cenſure their lapſes.

Reſut. pa. 65. Fiftly, upon this gound the Father cannot blame his Child for incontinence; To containe, implies impoſſibility. Aſke him wherefore ſerves Mariage? Yea, but to provide an Huſband or a Wife, is not a worke of an houres warning; in the meane time what ſhall they do? Sure, the man thinkes of thoſe hot Regions of his Religion, where they are ſo ſharpe ſet, that they muſt have Stewes allowed of one Sexe at leaſt; Elſe what ſtrange violence is this that he conceives? As our Iunius anſwered his Bellarmine, in the like, Hic homo ſibi videtur agere de equis admiſſariis ruentibus in venerem, & de hippomane, non de hominibus ratione præditis; he ſpeaks as if he had to do with Stallions, not with men, not with Chriſtians, amongſt whom is to be ſuppoſed a decent order, and due regard of ſeaſonableneſſe, and expediency: A doughty argument, wherewith Maſter Hall is ſore preſſed, (They may containe till they marry, and therefore they may ever containe and not marry.) How eaſie is it for me to take up this load, and lay it upon my Saviour, which ſaith, All men cannot receive it; and upon his great Apoſtle of the Gentiles, who hath taught us an (ἴδιον χάρισμα) a proper gift, which God hath beſtowed on ſome, not on others, and ſuppoſes a neceſſity, that may be of giving a Virgin in Mariage.

1 Cor. 7. 7.

Reſut. p. 65. Sixtly, The Huſband and wife are ſeparated upon diſcord, or diſeaſe: What ſhall they do? To live continent with this man is impoſſible. I anſwer; If onely their will ſunders them, that muſt yeeld to neceſſity; Diſſention may not abridge them of the neceſſary remedy of ſinne. If neceſſity, that finds reliefe in their prayers; If they call on him, who calls them to continencie by this Hand of his, he will heare them, and inable them to perſiſt. And why not then in the neceſſity of our Vowes? This is a neceſſity of our own making; that is of his; He hath bound himſelfe to keep his own promiſes, not ours.

Sect. XIV.

Reſut. p. 66. WHiles his Fellow, or Maſter Maldonate, talkes of confuting Auſtin in this very point, by Auſtin himſelfe, this man will confute us by him; whom he no otherwiſe cites for himſelfe, then his Anceſtor Pelagius cites Lactantius, Hilary, Ambroſe, Hierome, and Auſtin in this caſe. The thing (ſaith he) is in our power, and though it require the aſſiſtance of Gods grace, which ſtill preventeth our will, yet that hinders not, but that we may (if we liſt) live chaſte all the daies of our life, as we may upon the ſame termes beleeve in God, and love him. What impudency is this, to make him the Patron of the power of our Free-will to God, whom all the World knows to have beene Malleus Pelagianorum? and who in ſo many Volumes damnes this conceit to the Pit of Hell; evermore ſo eſtabliſhing the naturall facultie and uſe of the will againſt Stoicall neceſſity, as that he abandons any power of the act, or exerciſe of it unto good (without grace) againſt humane preſumption. When he ſpeaks of this, here is not a cold and feeble prevention, but an effectuall inoperation, yea a powerfull creation.

Since my Refuter then will needs be paralleling our ability of containing, and of beleeving, let him heare that holy Father ſay, [i] Non ſolum Deus poſſe noſtrum, &c. God doth not onely give, and helpe our power to good, but workes in us both our will and working of good, And elſewhere; [k] He is drawne to Chriſt, to whom it is given to beleeve in Chriſt: Power is therefore given unto them to bee made the ſonnes of God which beleeve in him, when this is given them to beleeve in him. And ſo farre is he from ſaying with my Detector

A Detector and his Bellarmine, that who liſts may beleeve when he liſts, that he reaſons thus: Quid mihi oſtendis, &c.[l] what doſt thou tell me of thy Freewill; which can never be free to do good, except thou be a ſheepe of God? Hee therefore that makes men to be his ſheepe, frees the wills of men to the obedience of Piety: But why doth he make theſe men ſheepe, and thoſe not, ſince with him is no reſpect of perſons? The Apoſtle anſwers, O homo! &c. Thus he. Either therefore let him never cite S. Auſtin againſt us in this point, or elſe we muſt bee forced to countercite him once more then wee meant. [m] Planè poſſumus dicere frontem hæreticorum non eſſe frontem: And if there could be any more on that holy Fathers ſcore, Father Maldonate hath paid it for us. To conclude therefore for him; Arbitrium humanæ voluntatis nequaquam deſtruimus: We know no man doth well againſt his will; God uſeth not to make Virgins by force; and the B ſame goodneſſe that gives Chaſtitie to the maried, continues Virginity to the ſingle: What of all this? Therefore (ſaith he) it is as well in the power of all ſingle perſons to bee alwayes continent, as of the maried to keepe conjugall Chaſtitie: An illation and concluſion worthy of my Refuters Logicke and Divinity; as if he argued thus for himſelfe; The ſame God that diſpoſes of Orders, diſpoſes of the Popedome: therefore I may as wel looke to weare three Crownes, as one ſhaven. Or the ſame God gives both Life, and Grace, and Glory. Therefore all thoſe that live the naturall life, may alſo live the ſpirituall and glorious. Who ſees not the reaſon of theſe unlike? Conjugall honeſty is abſolutely commanded of God to al maried perſons; perpetuation of Virginitie (hee grants) was never commanded: the breach of conjugall honeſty, is of it ſelfe a ſinne to all; Mariage is not ſo. Againſt the one therefore, wee may abſolutely pray in C [n] faith, againſt the other but with condition; God hath promiſed to deliver us from our ſins, not from our Mariage.

As for Saint Ambroſe, we eaſily grant him large in the praiſe of Virginitie. But no one word of all his cited authorities toucheth our Aſſertion: The helps of the Church, the ſervice of Angels, the merit of the Prayers of our Saviour, we yeeld to be good meanes of continence, where it is intended; but that it is meant to all commers, we deny; Let the ſucceſſe ſpeake.

Neither doe we taxe the Vow for any improbitie in it ſelf, but for the incapacitie of the perſons: The Vow were good, if the men were not either evill, or unfit. And here [o] by the way; whereas C. E. like a maſterly Monitor wiſhes Maſter Hall to reade the divine workes of Ambroſe, concerning this ſubject; Maſter Hall is bold (in requitall) D to tell C.E. that he knowes not Ambroſe; and to teach him (ſince he hath not learned it of other Maſters) that the Book which he ſo oft, and ſo ſolemnly cites for Ambroſes, [p] Ad Virginem lapſam, is a noted Counterfeit, a true Novatian; which his grave ignorance might have heard from his Bellarmine and Poſſevine.

And how much better is that other Tract which he [q] cites from Ambroſe, Epiſt. 82. wherein mention is made of * Venice; which was not extant till Ambroſe was not? And the Commentary of Ambroſe upon 1. Tim. 3. whence hee fetches his forceableſt [r] Teſtimony for forced Continency; ſlit in the Noſe, and bored in the Eare long ſince by [ſ] Salmeron, Baronius, Bellarmine, and Francis Lucas. Of the ſame ſtampe (that the Reader may here ſee once for all how he is gulled by this falſe Prieſt with foyſted Authorities) is his Auguſtine, De bono Viduitatis, [t] thrice by him here quoted, E not without great triumph; branded by Eraſmus, Hoſius, Lindanus: as likewiſe [u] his Auguſtine de Eccleſ. dogmat. confeſſed counterfeit by Bellarmine, and his friends of Lovain: and [x] the Sermons de Tempore, caſhier'd by Eraſmus, Mart. Lipſius, the Lovanians: Whereto let us adde the book of great Athanaſius, de Virginitate, [y] produced in great ſtate by C.E. not without great wrong and ſhame fathered upon that Saint, as (if Eraſmus and Nannius did not ſhew) the ridiculous precepts therein contained would ſpeake enough. To follow all were endleſſe: Of this kind, laſtly, is his Cyprian de Diſciplina & bono pudicitiæ, not more magnificently [z] brought forth by C. E. then fairely ejected by Eraſmus, & Eſpencæus. Theſe are the glorious Teſtimonies which grace the ſwelling Pages of mine Adverſarie; Theſe are the pious fraudes wherewith honeſt Readers are ſhamefully coozened. It ſhall ſuffice thus in a word to have thanked my Reverend Monitor for his ſage advice, & to adviſe my Reader to know whom he truſts.

For Origen, we have already anſwered; My Detector could not have choſen a better man for the proofe of the facility of this Worke, then him, who (according to the broad Tralation of his rude Rhemiſts) gelded himſelfe, and made himſelfe no man for it. That all graces are derived to us from the Fountaine, or rather the full Ocean of Chriſts Merits and Mercies (which he ſhewes from S. Hierom) we willingly teach againſt them; ſo farre are we from being injurious to the Paſſion of our Deare Redeemer; But if hee will therefore inferre, that every man may be a perpetuall Virgin, he may as well hope that therefore every Scribbler may write all true. Our Saviour himſelfe, which ſaid I will draw all men unto me, yet ſaid, All men cannot receive this; not I cannot give it, but they cannot take it.

As for that practice which he cites from S. Auſtin, of forcing men both into Orders, and Continency, it ſhewes rather the Fact then the Equity; what was done in a particular Church, rather then what ſhould be; The Refuter himſelfe renounceth it in the precedent Page; (For the Church forceth none thereunto) neither is it any other then a direct reſtraint of that, which the Councell of Nice determined to be left free.

Laſtly, that there may appeare to be no leſſe impoſſibility of honeſt Truth in ſome men, then true Chaſtity, he cites one place for all, out of S. Auſtin, * Let not the burden of Continency affright us, it will be light if it be of Chriſt, it will be of Chriſt if there be Faith, that obtaines of him which commands, the thing which he doth command. See Reader, with what fidelity; and by this eſteeme the reſt; S. Auſtin ſpeakes there of perſons divorced each from other, whom neceſſity (as he ſuppoſes the caſe) cals to Continency; the Detector cites him for the power of voluntary votaries; The very place confutes him. It will be Chriſts yoke (ſaith Auſtin) if there be faith that obtaines of him which commands the thing which he doth command: There can be no Faith where is no command; Now C.E. will grant there is no [o] command of ſingle life to all; Therefore all cannot aſke it in Faith, therefore all cannot thinke it the yoke of Chriſt, all cannot beare it.

SECT. XV.

NOw at laſt (like ſome ſorie Squib, that after a little hiſſing and ſparkling, ends in an unſavorie cracke) my Refuter, after al theſe Flouriſhes of their poſſibilitie, ſhuts up in a ſcurrilous Declamatiõ againſt our Miniſterie; granting it indeed impoſſible, amongſt us, to live chaſte; and telling his Reader that wee bluſh not to blaze in Pulpits, and printed Bookes, this bruti ſh Paradox, that Chaſtitie is a vertue impoſſible to all, becauſe ſo it is to ſuch laſcivious [p] Libertines, ſenſuall and ſinfull people, as Heretikes are and here are ſordes, dedecora, ſcabies libidinum: the bruti ſh ſpirit of Hereſie fleſhly and ſenſuall. Impure mouth! How well doth it become the ſonne of that Babylonian Strumpet, to call the Spouſe of Chriſt Harlot! How well doth it become lips drencht in the Cup of thoſe Fornications, to utter blaſphemous Slanders (Spumam Cerberi) againſt Innocence? By how much more bruti ſh that Paradox is, ſo much more devilliſh is the unjuſt imputation of it to us; Which of us ever blazed it? Which of us doth hate it leſſe, then the lye that charges it upon us? How many Reverend Fathers have we in the higheſt Chaires of our Church; how many aged Divines in our Univerſities, how many grave Prebendaries in our Cathedrall Churches, how many worthy Miniſters in their rural ſtations, that ſhine with this vertue in the eyes of the World? If therefore the proper place of Chaſtitie be the Church of God (as this Caviller pleads) it is ours in right, [q] theirs in pretence: And ſo much more noble is this in ours, for that in ours it is [r] free; in them, [ſ] forced, Infida cuſtos caſtitatis neceſſitas, as that Father ſaid; Neque opus paſſeri fugere ad montem: In them, as Chryſoſtome ſaid long ſince τὸ σεμνὸν τῆς Παρθενίας ἀπόλωλεν The grace of Virginitie it loſt: γελῶσιν αἱ κοσμικαὶ: The world makes ſport with ſuch Maiden-head. For the reſt; The God of Heaven judge betwixt us and our enemies; To him wee appeale how wee deſire to ſerve him in chaſte Wedlocke, whom they diſhonour with uncleane and falſe Virginitie.

SECT. XVI.

C AS if my Refuter had vowed to write no true word, he challenges me for tranſlating Iſidores Turpe votum, a filthy vow: I turne to my Epiſtle, and find it not engliſhed by me at all. His owne conſcience, belike, ſo conſtrues it, or if ſome former Impreſſion of mine (which I beleeve not) had ſo turned it, here is neither ignorance, nor unfaithfulneſſe. Whereſoever is ſin, there is filthineſſe: And if a lawfull vow be properly de meliore bono, can there not therefore be an unlawfull vow? What was that of Iepthaes, or that of S. Pauls forty Conſpirators? But the word there (ſaith he) ſignifies a promiſe; As if every vow were not a promiſe: and if Iſidore take votum, for promiſſum; [y] Gregory takes (by his conſtruction) promiſſum for votum, in this very caſe we have in hand.

This vow of theirs therefore is metonymically filthy, becauſe it makes them ſuch. In one word, (that he may rave no more of Epicures, Turkes, Pagans,) Their vow is in profeſſion glorious, filthy in effect. And now for a concluſion of this point, I muſt out of all theſe groſſe and ignorant paſſages of his (though unproperly, yet) truly vow to the world, that a truer Bayard did never ſtumble forth into the Preſſe.

SECT. XVII.

HEe hath done with their owne vowes, and now deſcends to us, whom hee confeſſes vowleſſe; His ſcorne cannot ſtrip us of the benefit of that Truth, which he confeſſeth: Thus then hee writes: I freely with other Catholikes grant, that our Engliſh Miniſters, according to their calling, make no vowes: I grant their mariage to be lawfull; I grant that every one of them may be the Husband of one Wife, &c. And why did not this liberality of my wiſe Detector tye up his Tongue in his purſe all this while? No more was required, no leſſe is yeelded; whereto is all this jangling? But, that his grant may prove worſe then a deniall, thus he proceeds: But we deny them to be truly Clergy-men, or to have any more authority in the Church, then their Wives or daughters have: and this becauſe they want all true calling and Ordination; For, they entred not in at the doore, like true Paſtors, but ſtole in at the Window like Theeves; Wee deny their miniſterie (I ſay) to be lawfull, becauſe they did runne before they were ſent, tooke their places by intruſion. Let Maſter Hall diſprove this, and I will ſay, Tu Phillyda ſolus habeto. Thus he.

A deep crimination, and ſuch, as if it could be proved, would rob our queſtion of the ſtate, and us of our duely challenged honor. Reader, this vehemency ſhewes thee where

where his ſhoo wrings him: It is the gall of Romiſh hearts that we proſper, and are not theirs; Where they have preſumed upon credulity, they have not ſtuck to ſay, we are not men like others, but more frequently and boldly, that we are no Chriſtian men; and here moſt peremptorily, that we are no Clergie-men: There is no Church, no Chriſtianity, no Clergie not theirs; Neither can we be in Orders, whiles we are out of Babylon. A

The man dreames of the Nags-head in Cheapſide, where his lying Oracle Tradition hath not ſhamed to report, Iewel, Sands, Horne, Scory, Grindall, and others in the beginning of Q. Elizabeths time (being diſappointed of the Catholik Biſhop of Landaffe) to have laid hands mutually on each other; & that from hence have flowed out pretended Orders. This our ſhameles * Sacroboſco heard of ſome good old ſolkes, and they had it of one Neale, Profeſſor Ebrius in Oxford; Kelliſon took it of Sacroboſco, and C.E of him. Concordat cum Originali; Diabolus eſt mendax & pater ejus. And is not this a worthy engine to batter downe the wals of a whole Church, to blow up all our ordination? Is it poſſible that any Chriſtian face ſhould be ſo graceleſſe, as to beare out ſuch an apparant and ridiculous falſhood, againſt ſo many thouſands of witneſſes, againſt the evidence of authentical Records, againſt reaſon, and ſenſe it ſelfe? For can they hope to perſwade any living man, that theſe having at that time a lawfull Archbiſhop of their owne religion, legally eſtabliſhed in the Metropoliticall chaire, by an acknowledged authority, the ſway of the times openly favouring thē, when all Churches, all Chappels gladly opened to them, that they would be ſo mad as to go and ordaine themſelves in a Taverne? He that would beleeve this, may be perſwaded that their adored blocks can weepe, and ſpeake, and move; that their Cake is God; Never truth could be cleared, if not this; No leſſe then the whole Kingdome knew, that Q. Mary dyed in the yeare 1558. November 17. and her Cardinall (then Archb. of Canterbury) accompanied her ſoule in death the ſame day. The ſame day was Q. Elizabeths Initium Regni; her Coronation, Ianuary 15. following, That leaſure enough might be takē in theſe great affaires, the See of Canterbury cōtinued void above a yeare. At laſt, in the ſecond yeare of Q. Elizabeth 1559. December 17. was Mathew Parker legally conſecrated Archb. of Canterbury, by foure Biſhops, William Barlow formerly Biſhop of Bathe, then elect of Chicheſter, Iohn Scory before of Chicheſter, now elect of Hereford, Miles Coverdale Biſhop of Exeter, Iohn Hogeſkins Suffragan of Bedford. Mathew Parker thus irrefragably ſetled in the Archiepiſcopall See, with three other Biſhops in the ſame Month of December, ſolemnely conſecrated Edmund Grindall, and Edwin Sands; The publike Records are evident and particular, relating the Time, Sunday morning after Prayers; The place, Lambeth-Chappell; The manner, Impoſition of hands, The conſecrators, Matthew Cant, William Chicheſter, Iohn Hereford, Iohn Bedford; The Preacher at the Conſecration, Alexander Nowel, afterwards the worthy Deane of Pauls; The Text, Take heed to your ſelves, and to all the flock, &c. The Communion, laſtly adminiſtred by the Archbiſhop. B C D

For Biſhop Iewel, he was conſecrated the month following in the ſame forme by Mathew Cant. Edmund London, Richard Ely, Iohn Bedford.

Laſtly, for Biſhop Horne, he was conſecrated a whole yeare after this, by Mathew Cant. Thomas S. Davids, Edmund London, Thomas Coventry and Lichfield; The circumſtances, Time, Place, Forme, Preacher, Text, ſeverally recorded. The particulars whereof, I referre to the faithfull and cleare relation of Maſter Francis Maſon; whoſe learned and full diſcourſe of this ſubject, might have ſatisfied all eyes, and ſtopped all mouths. What incredible impudency is this then, for thoſe which pretend not Chriſtianity only, but the Conſecration of God, wilfully to raiſe ſuch ſhamefull ſlanders from the pit of hel, to the diſgrace of Truth, to the diſparagement of our holy calling. E

Let me therefore challenge my Detector in this ſo important a point, wherein his zeale hath ſo far out-run his wit, and with him all the Brats of that proud Harlot, that no Church under heaven can ſhew a more cleere, eeven, uncontrolable, untroubled line of the juſt ſucceſſion of her Sacred Orders, then this of ours; if his

A Rome, for her tyrannous Primacy, could bring forth but such Cards, the world would be too strait for her. He shall (maugre) be forced to confesse, that either there were never true Orders in the Church of England (which he dares not say) or else that they are still Ours. The Bishops in the time of King Henry the eight, were undoubted; If they left Rome in some corrected opinions, their Character was yet, by confession, [a] indeleble. They laid their hands according to Ecclesiasticall constitution, upon the Bishops in King Edwards dayes; and they both upon the Bishops in the beginning of Queene Elizabeth; They againe, upon the succeeding Inheritors of their holy Sees, and they lastly upon us; so as never man could shew a more certaine and exquisite pedegree from his great Grand-father, then wee can from the acknowledged Bishops of King Henries time, and thence upwards to hun-
B dreds of Generations. I confesse indeed, our Archbishops, and Bishops have wanted some Aaronicall accoustrements, Gloves, Rings, Sandals, Miters, and Pall, and such other trash: and our inferiour Orders have wanted Greazing and Shaving, and some other pelting Ceremonies. But let C. E. prove these essentiall which wee want, or those Acts and Formes not essentiall, which we have, Et Phyllida solus habeto. In the meane time, the Church of England is blessed with a true Clergie, and glorious; and such a one, as his Italian generation may impotently envy, and snarle at, shall never presume to compete with, in worthinesse and honour; And (as Doctor Taylor, that couragious Martyr, said at his parting) Blessed be God for holy Matrimony.

SECT. XVIII.

MY Caviller purposely mistakes my rule of Basil the Great, and my text of the Great Apostle, whiles from both I resolve thus. I passe not what I heare men or Angels say, while I heare God say, Let him be the Husband of one Wife: he will needs so construe it, as if I tooke this of S. Pauls for a command, not for an allowance: As if I meant to imply from hence, that every Bishop is bound to have a Wife. Who is so blind as the wilfull? Their Leo [b] calls these words a Preception, I did not. If hee knew any thing, he could not be ignorant that this sense is against the streame of our Church, and no lesse then a Grecian errour. Who knows not the extreames of D Greece and Rome: and the Track of Truth betwixt them both? The Greeke Church saith, He cannot be in holy Orders, that is not married: The Romish Church saith, Hee cannot be in holy Orders, that is maried: The Church Reformed sayes, Hee may be in holy Orders, that is maried, and convertibly. Some good friends would needs fetch us into this idle Grecisme, and to the society of the old Frisons [c], and (if Saint Ierome take it aright of Vigilantius) Espencæus, and Bellarmine and our Rhemists free us. There is no lesse difference betwixt them and us, then betwixt May and Must; Libertie and Necessity. If then (Let him be the Husband of one Wife,) argue that a Bishop may be a maried man, I have what I would, and passe not for the contrary from Men and Angels. We willingly grant with Luther, that this charge is negative: Non velut sanciens dicit, saith Chrysostome. But this negative charge implies an affirmative al-E lowance; we seeke for no more: As for the authorities which my Detector hath borrowed of his Uncles of Rhemes, they might have beene well spared: He tells us, Saint Ierome sayes, Qui unam habuerit, non habeat, He who hath had one Wife, not he that hath one; I tell him Saint Paul saith, [d] (εἴ τις ἔστιν) if any man be the Husband of one Wife, not, If he have beene. Let [e] Saint Chrysostome therein answer Hierome, and Epiphanius, and all other pretended opposites: Obstruere prorsus intendit hæreticorum ora, qui nuptias damnant, &c. He purpos'd in this to stop the mouths of Hereticks, that condemned mariage, shewing that that estate is faultlesse, yea, so precious, that with it a man might be advanced to the holy episcopall Chaire. Thus he; whom their learned [f] Bishop Espencæus seconds; and by the true force of the Text cleareth this sense against all contradiction. Nec enim Paulini de Episcopis, &c. For (saith he) those places of S. Paul concerning Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, cannot be so eluded, as that they doe onely belong to men that have beene beene ſometimes maried, and are now Widdowers and ſingle; but the Text doth plainely note out Husbands, and thoſe that are now found in the preſent eſtate of mariage; which is implyed, both by the word eſſe, and by unius uxoris vir, that is, having one Wife, not (as ſome have underſtood it) which hath had one; for (as Chryſoſtome hath noted) the Apoſtle would by the ſociety of Mariage and Prieſthood, ſtop the mouths of Hereticks that condemned mariage: whereto adde, That the Apoſtle amongſt the vertues of a Biſhop reckons up this, That he doth governe his owne houſe well, not, that he did governe it. Thus he. Unto which let me yet adjoyne this other conſideration, that the Apoſtle deſcribes what manner of Wife a Biſhop ſhould have; which as in other profeſſions he hath not done, ſo in this would have beene uſeleſſe, if he had only aimed at an eſtate paſt, and not preſent. A

Where it is a cunning tricke of the Rhemiſts, and their Vulgar, in ſtead of Their Wives, to read The Women, quite beſides the Scope and Context of the Apoſtle: As to the ſame purpoſe, Whereas their Leo in the fore-cited Epiſtle ſayes, that this Precept of a Biſhop, to be Huſband of one Wife, was alwaies ſo ſacred, ut etiam de muliere Sacerdotis eligenda, eadem intelligatur ſervanda conditio: Bellarmine, and his Mates would needs face us out, that the Copies are corrupted, and contends to have it read, Sacerdotis Elegendi; of the Prieſt to be choſen, not, of the Wife: whom our induſtrious and worthy Doctor Iames hath refelled both by the Preſſe, and the Pen; by the Coleine Edition and Manuſcript authority. B

That the ſame condition is to be underſtood of her that is to bee choſen for the wife of the Prieſt.

Reſut. p. 92, 93.

As for that he cites frō Hierome againſt Vigilantius, he might have found the ſalve together with the Wound: Our Rhemiſts cleare us from the imputation of his opinion. For the reſt. Nothing is more plaine, than that our Apoſtle (according to the juſt interpretation of Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others) alludes to the looſe faſhiō, as of the Greeks, ſo eſpecially of the Iews, with whom Polygamy and re-mariages, after unjuſt divorces, were in ordinary uſe; Theſe the Apoſtolicall Spirit finds unfit for the Man of God, whom he therefore charges to be one'ly, The Husband of one Wife. C

Reſut. p. 94, 95.

Neither doth it argue too much wit in my Reſuter, to bring two Fathers upon the Stage for his purpoſe, and then to ſet them together by the eares with each other, Ambroſe (I meane) and Hierome, who in this which he cites them for, confute one another, Hierome (though otherwiſe a backe-friend to Wedlocke) cenſuring the opinion of Ambroſe, as ſavouring too ſtrongly of Caiuiſme, and ſuperſtition: How ever, even the more vehement of the two, out of this place doth hold Mariage, compatible with holy Orders, which is the only thing I required: So as ſtill, This one word ſhall confirme me againſt all impure mouths: Impure, Not for preferring Continency, as my Caviller will take it, but for depraving Mariage, by the foule titles of Fleſhlineſſe and Senſuality; ſuch as his owne; a worſe wee need not: Neither doth Saint Ambroſe at all controll me herein, whiles he teacheth that the Apoſtle doth not here invite us to beget children in the Prieſthood; Habentem enim dixit filios, non facientem: we did not challenge hence any command, wee challenge an allowance, which we have and proclaime: That I may not ſay, ſome Copies of Ambroſe runne (according as I have learned of our eminent Doctor Fulke) Habentem filios, aut facientem, Having children, or begetting them: The difference is not worth ſtanding for: Let it paſſe after his owne reading. I could ſtop his mouth with the ingenuous anſwer of his Eſpencæus: Habentem enim, &c. For he ſaid, Having children, not begetting them: Debellatum hic eſſet, &c. This field were wonne, if either this were the Text, and not the Gloſſe, or they that thus interpret it, were Apoſtles, as they are not. Thus their owne Biſhop. But I need not call for any ayde. The words of Ambroſe do plainely drive againſt an invitation, or command, which we doe willingly diſclaime. D E

SECT. XIX.

HOw unhappy is this man that ſtill ſhoots his Arrowes quite beſide the Butt? He proves, forſooth, with great zeale, that the Fathers never underſtood a poſitive command in our Apoſtles words, which I never thought ſo much as in dreame: and then he bends his Forces againſt Bygamie, which I no where avouched. The Man of valour loves to play his prizes alone. Refut. p. 96.

Here is no command then (ſaith he) but a permiſſion; How much are we bound to him for this favour? Permiſſiõ? Thus much he, with his holy Father, yeelds to their Stews. No, here is a direct allowance. Let him be the Husband of one Wife, Not, He may be ſo: But this was onely for a time, he ſaith, becauſe of the paucitie of ſingle Clergy-men: Let him ſhew me the Apoſtles limitation, and I am ſatisfied; otherwiſe, this miſſ-grounded conceit (what countenance ſoever it may find in a private humane authority) ſhall paſſe with us as a Gloſſe of Burdeaux, that marres the Text. But how ſhameleſly, how fraudulently, how like himſelfe, doth my Refuter cite Chryſoſtomes Caſtigat impudicos, &c. He checketh the incontinent (ſaith the Father) whiles he permitteth them not after their ſecond mariages, to be preferred to the government of the Church, and dignity of Paſtors; and there my Refuter ſtops, with, So he; whereas, if he had gone forward, the place had anſwered him, and it ſelfe: For (ſaith Chryſoſtome) he which is found not to have kept his benevolence towards his Wife, which is c gone from him, how ſhould he be a good Teacher to the Church? Plainly ſhewing us that he intends this to thoſe unchaſt Huſbands, which after an unjuſt divorſe of their former wives, have maried alſo a ſecond; not after the death of the firſt. Refut. p. 96. Chryſoſt. in Tit. Hom. 4.

c The word is τῇ ἀπωλείᾳ by them tranſlated falſly, Defunctum.

The like Prieſtly fidelity he uſeth in the place of Chryſoſtome, Hom. 2. upon Iob; the poore Man had taken up ſome ſcraps of quotations upon truſt, having never ſeen the Authors; For, Chryſoſtome never wrote any Homilies upon the Booke of Iob; onely he hath five Homilies of the Patience of Iob; whereof this cited is the ſecond; wherein his, errori ignoſcebat, hath reference rather to, ſine crimine, which he oppoſeth to irreprehenſibiles, than, to vir unius uxoris, as the ſequell plainely ſhewes. As for Bigamy, it is out of our way; but ſince his loquacity wil needs rove thither, let him ſhew that before Montanus infected the World with a prejudice againſt ſecond Mariages, after deceaſe, they were held unlawfull for any calling, or perſon, and we will grant him clamorous to ſome purpoſe. Refut. p. 97.

Refut. p. 98.

To prove this opinion and practice of the Church, like a wiſe Maſter, he brings in Tertullians* authority, in his Book which he wrote in the time of his Hereſie; whiles he was over the eares in Montaniſme; where he tels us, he hath knowne ſome ejected for ſecond Mariages. But if he had ever read the Booke following, of Monogamie, he might have found his Tertullian (then Montanizing) to upbraid the true and Catholike Church, which he calls Pſychicos, with the uſuall practice and allowance of the ſecond Mariages of their Biſhops. * Quot enim & digami, &c. For how many Biſhops are there amongſt you twice maried? But who ever was matcht with ſo vaine a Babler? I proved from Saint Paul, that a Biſhop might have one Wife: he proves by Councels and Fathers, that he may not have two. It is pity that his Maſters the Jeſuits have no more Trees for him to ſet with the roots upward: Any thing rather then to weary the World with his fooliſh clacking.

Out of this indiſcreet & odious verboſity (leſt he ſhould want noiſe) he ſtumbles upon the Councel of Conſtantinople, before it come in his way, and ſpends a whole leafe onely to tell us that he will talke of it hereafter. Hereafter he ſhall receive anſwer enough; What needs this diſorderly anticipation? To conclude then, this place of our Apoſtle ſtands for us unſhaken, by any the impotent blaſts of his frivolous Eluſions, and ſhall warrant us againſt Earth and Hell, that a Biſhop may be the Huſband of one Wife.

SECT. XX.

*Refut.p.*100. 101.

MY next place, of the honourableneſſe of Mariage amongſt all, he ſmoothes over with a pretended conceſſion; profeſſing with Fulgentius, and Hierom, to give all high Titles to that ſtate, only preferring the rule of a better life; praiſing Mariage, but more extolling Virginity: But who ever made the compariſon? Theſe are faire Nets to catch Fooles; Whiles he heaps up all the reproachfull termes that ſpight can deviſe againſt the very ſtate of Mariage, in ſome callings, not ſo much as prejudiced by Vow, how doth he grant Mariage honourable amongſt all? If the compariſon be the matter he ſtands upon, let him ſay, Mariage is good, and lawfull for all conditions; Virginity is better; he ſhal have no adverſary. And whereas (to cal him to reckoning for arrerages) he turned off this place (when it was) with a ſcoffe out of Bellarmine, That Mariage is honourable amongſt all, yet not betweene Father and Daughter, &c. The man alluded ſure to their great and good Alexander the ſixt, and the chaſte Lucrece, of whom he knows the Riddle.

*Refut.p.*13.

[d] Here lies Lucrece in name, Thais in life. The ſame Popes daughter, Lemman, and his owne ſonnes wife.

For us, that it is honorable in all eſtates of men by Apoſtolicall warrant, is ſufficient aſſurance, that to no calling, or eſtate, it can be diſhonourable and unlawfull, But to untie Bellarmines trifling knot: I ſay, Mariage is honourable, ἐν πᾶσιν but not πάντων πρὸς πασας· in all, but not betweene all: That is every man may marry with a woman, but not with any woman whatſoever, as with his Mother, or Siſter. So Father and Daughter may marry, but not one the other. See now what a worthy Meſſe of Sophiſtry is laid in S. Pauls diſh by theſe Carvers, and how eaſily over-turned: So as I might very wel proclaime to all the world (which I do now confidently ſecond) that if God might be Iudge of this Controverſie, it were ſoone at an end. If my Refuter make faces at this, their whole Schoole ſhall beare me out in it. Et [e] ſanè communis eſt ſcholæ reſolutio, &c. And in truth it is (ſaith their Eſpencæus) the common reſolution of the Schoole that if we inſiſt onely in thoſe things which were ſpoken by Chriſt, and written by the Apoſtles in the Canon of the New Teſtament (ſecluding the Lawes of the Church) holy Orders, neither as Orders, nor as holy, are any hindrances of Matrimony. Thus he. And ſaid I any more? any other?

By their confeſſion then, God never impoſed this Law. My proofe was, that even in the time of that legall ſtrictneſſe, he allowed Wedlock to the Miniſters of his Sanctuary. Herein how am I refuted? If he meane (ſaith my Detector) that for purity and perfection of life, the Law of Moſes was more ſtrict thē the Goſpell, the untruth is notorious, To which he addes out of Hierome, that the greater perfection of the Evangelical Sacrifice exacteth greater Holineſſe; and concludes, that the permiſſion of Wives in the Aaronicall Prieſthood, argues evidently the imperfection of that Law. So he. Surely, God wanted this Counſellor upon Mount Sinai; he could have adviſed him better Rules of his miſ-contrived Prieſthood.

Would my Refuter make himſelfe ſo ignorant, as not to know; that notwithſtanding the rather greater perfection of Morality required under the Goſpell, yet that Leviticall Law placed impurity in many of thoſe creatures and actions, wherein the Evangelicall findeth none? Did not the touch of ſome Veſſels or Garments make a man legally uncleane? Did not the lawfull act of Conjugall Benevolence? Did not the accidents of the holieſt Child-bed cary in thē an expiable impurity? If he be not a Jew, he will not ſay it is ſtill thus under the Goſpell. How juſtly therefore might I inferre, that if our holy God, unto whoſe Wiſdome it ſeemed good to ſtand of old upon ſuch points of outward uncleanneſſes, did notwithſtanding allow Wedlocke to his Prieſthood, much more (at leaſt no leſſe) under the Goſpell, doth he allow it, when as all thoſe imputations of impurity are vaniſhed.

SECT.

Sect. XXI.

I Produced the Teſtimony of their Pope, their Cardinal, their Doctor. Baſils Rule is a ſure one, that the Witneſſes of Enemies are moſt convictive. Their Cardinal was Panormitan, Their Pope, Pius the ſecond, Their Doctor, Gratian. For Panormitan; My Refuter likes his words ſo well, that like a ſawcy fellow he dare pull off his red Hat, and trample it in the Floore; denying his Cardinalſhip, and charging him With participation of the Schiſme. Reſut. 103, 104.

But firſt, he cannot (I hope) deny him to have been their Abbot, then their Archbiſhop; As for his red Hat, it never came from Wittenberge nor Geneva; it was of their owne dying; Felix the falſe Pope (he ſayes) gave it him. Reader, the famous Councell of Baſil, conſiſting of no leſſe then foure hundred reverend Perſons, Cardinalls, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Doctors, gathered & allowed at firſt, by Pope Martin, then by his Succeſſor Eugenius the fourth, afterwards was upon ſome Politick conſiderations called off by Eugenius; The Father of the Councell finding their owne ſtrength, ſtood upō the right of their Superiority, &(as they wel might) cenſured the Pope; he proceeded to obſtinacy; thoſe brave ſpirits (upon ripe conſideration) juſtly depoſed him. In the roome of this Eugenius, (otherwiſe called Gabriel Condulmarius) was by juſt number of voyces elected Amadeus the devout Duke of Savoy, & named Felix the Fifth; a man too good for that See; neither had he ever any ſo great blemiſh in all his life, as the name of a Pope: Volateran can tell us, what a Kennell of Hounds he ſhowed to the Ambaſſadors, namely, whole Tables of poore ſoules daily fed by him; All Hiſtories ſpeake of his Devotion, and Piety; This man called from his intended retiredneſſe, muſt cary the Keyes. He makes choyce of Archbiſhop Panormitan for one of his Cardinalls: What offence is here? But he was a falſe Pope. If the Councell of Baſil were a true Councell, then was Felix a true Pope. It is in my Readers choice whether he will beleeve foure hundred Divines repreſenting the whole Church, or a Popes paraſite. But Panormitan dyed in the Schiſme againſt Eugenius. The World knows that the greateſt blot Panormitan ever had, was his violent plea for Eugenius; againſt the Biſhop of Argens, againſt eloquent Segovius, againſt the whole ſtreame of that Councell; This is the thanke he now caries away, Felix ſcelus virtus vocatur; If Eugenius had not dealt under-hand with the Dolphin of France, and Fredericke of Auſtria, (then ambitious of the Empire) and tryed all his wits, both to make new Cardinals, and to divert the Neutrals, Eugenius had not been Felix; and Felix had beene ſtill Eugenius, the true and undoubted Succeſſor of Peter: However, if theſe points ſhould be ſtrictly ſtood upon, Rome would be at a loſſe, which many a time hath been to ſeeke for her Head. But what though it were granted that Panormitan was Cardinalated by an intruding Pope? Can this call down the authority of his judgement and Writings? eſpecially thoſe which he wrote before he was Cardinall or Archbiſhop, being only Abbot. And yet may be cited by us under the name of Cardinall: as Bellarmines Dictates and Compoſures elder then his red Hat, yet are fathered upon that Title.

Once, this I am ſure of, that [f] Cardinall Bellarmine doubts not to ſtile Panormitan a Catholike and learned Doctor. This is the man that ſtands with his Hat off to this worſhipfull Clarke of Doway, and tells him that Continency is not of the ſubſtance of Order, nor by Divine Law annexed to it; whereto he ſhufles out a miſerable and deſperate anſwer, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequell.

But in the meane time, ſee the cunning of my Catholike Caviller, This is not the ſentence I ſtood upon, of Panormitan, it was not this, whereto I proclaimed mine Oyez, but another, which he ſlily ſmothers, not daring ſo much as to repeat it, leſt his Romanizing popular ignorant Readers ſhould heare, and ſee, and ſmell, that the ſacred Celibate of Prieſts did ſtinke an hundred yeares before Luthers time. I will therefore here ſupply for him, and, hoping he will in his next take notice of the ſentence, will repreſent it here againe.

The words are theſe, Melius foret, & pro bono & ſalute animarum ſalubrius, ſi & uniuſcuiuſq;

uniuſcujuſq; voluntati relinqueretur, ita ut non valentes aut non volentes continere, poſſint contrahere; Quia experientia docente experimur contrarium effectum ſequi ex illa lege continentiæ, cum hodie plerique non vivant ſpiritualiter, nec ſint mundi, ſed emaculentur illicito coitu cum ipſorum graviſſimo peccato, ubi cum propria uxore eſſet caſtitas. That is, It were better, and more wholeſome for the good, and ſalvation of ſoules, if it were left to every mans will; ſo as they which either cannot, or will not containe, might marry, For we finde by experience a contrary effect to follow upon that Law of Continency; ſince the greateſt part (of our Prieſts) at this day live not ſpiritually, neither are chaſte, but are defiled with unlawfull copulations, not without their moſt hainous ſinne; whereas, with their owne Wives it ſhould be Chaſtity. Thus he. A ſentence worthy of that Epiphonema of mine. (Is this a Cardinall thinke you or an Huguenot?) With this, my Detector deales, as their Inquiſition doth with a miſ-named Hereticke; he chokes it up in ſecret, or, if he bring it forth, it is not without a gag in the mouth: All his anſwer is, We tye not our ſelves to every mans opinion, and, This ſentence is cenſured by Bellarmine as erroneous; As if Panormitan were every body, and Bellarmine an Oracle. It is enough for us, that one of their own greateſt, learnedſt, zealouſeſt Prelates juſtifieth our Mariages; and wiſheth them in uſe rather then their Continency.

To that other Teſtimony of Panormitan, he anſwers by a grant, yeelding us freely, That if we take divine Law for that which is expreſſely determined in Scripture, it muſt needes be ſaid, that there is no evident proofe ſet downe of continency in Eccleſiaſticall men by the Apoſtles; yet, that it is ſo inſinuated, and the obſervation of it hath beene ſo ancient, as Bellarmine noteth, that it may be truly termed Apoſtolicall; Thus he. And even for this are we beholden to him; All his friends would not have beene ſo liberall. His Ioannes Major, his Cliſtovæus, his Torrenſis, and all their rigorous Clients would not have ſaid ſo: As, on the other ſide, the old gloſſe was not ſo wiſe, that could only ſay (which is now expunged) Apoſtoli docuerunt exemplo, The Apoſtles taught this by their example. But what are theſe ſo pregnant inſinuatiõs? Good wits have found thẽ out; One was that of [g] Innocentius the ſecond, That theſe men are the veſſels and Temples of God, therefore they may not, Cubilibus & immunditiis ſervire, ſerve for chambring and wantonneſſe. Ywis, no Lay-man is ſuch; therefore he may be allowed to be filthy. Another was of Franc. Torrenſis, Take heed leſt your hearts be oppreſſed with ſurfetting and drunkenneſſe, and cares of this life: Whereof Biſhop [h] Eſpencæus is ſo aſhamed, that he anſwers it with an Abſit; God forbid (ſaith he) that we ſhould think that the Lord, which is the Author and ſanctifier of Mariage, ſhould hold it in the ſame rank with ſurfetting and drunkennes. Another was of the ſame Author ([i] teaching us to deny ungodlineſſe and worldly luſts:) us, of the Clergy; belike the reſt need not; And who knows not the witty and learned inſinuations of their good Siricius, Thoſe that are in the fleſh cannot pleaſe God? Theſe, and ſuch like are the forcible inſinuations of this impoſed continency, which even very boyes and Ideots can hiſſe out of the Schooles.

In my next Shrift, he ſhall heare, meâ culpâ; The words are Gratians, that Copula Sacerdotalis vel conſanguineorum, The mariage or (as this Clerkly Grammarian tranſlates it) the carnall copulation of Prieſts, or kinsfolke, is not forbidden by any Legall, Evangelicall, or Apoſtolicall authority, but by Eccleſiaſticall Law it is forbidden. Wee could not hyre a Proctor to ſay more. But herein *C. The other, That I concealed the mariage of kinsfolke, within the prohibited degrees: which (ſaith he) although onely forbidden

A by Eccleſiaſticall Law, yet dares not M. Hall (I thinke) tranſgreſſe it; ſo as this Law hath greater force then he ſuppoſeth it to have. So he. Plainly, my Refuter knowes not what he ſaith, elſe he would never thus palpably plead againſt himſelf; For, what ever thing was there in all the conſtitutions of his Church, more ſubject to variation, than the legall ſupputation of the forbidden degrees? which was a long time confined to the third degree incluſively; another while extended to the fourth, and ſometime to the ſeventh. Let him herein reconcile his Pope Nicholas & Gregory, with Pope Innocent; Whereof the one left al free that were without the pale of the fourth degree, the other reſtrained all to the ſeventh; And when he finds an unalterablenes in the determination of theſe degrees, let him plead for an equally-fatall neceſſity of his Eccleſiaſticall continence; in the meane time, let him take it patiently to be beaten with

B his own Rod.

No divine Law then (he grants) hath injoyned this Celebate, but an Eccleſiaſticall. What is this other than I ſaid? God never impoſed this Law of continency; Who then? [k] The Church. And why may not I go on, to aſke, Whether a good wife would gain-ſay what her husband willeth? Flouriſhing will not anſwer this. All the praiſes of beauty and fidelity which are given to the true Church, argue Rome to be the falſe. Whereas therefore the Prieſt ſhuts up thus bravely; And this Miniſter; who would make the one to gain ſay the other; ſhould bring ſome place or ſentence to ſhow the ſame (which he may chance to do the next morning after the Greek Calends) or elſe never avouch ſo unchriſtian a Paradoxe. He ſhall underſtand that his Greek Calends are paſt. The Spirit of God ſaith, A Biſhop may be the Husband of one Wife. The Church of Rome ſayes, A Biſhop

C may not be the Husband of any Wife at all: Whether is this a contradiction? The Spirit of God ſayes, Mariage is honourable amongſt all men, The Church of Rome ſayes, Mariage is diſhonourable to ſome. The Spirit of God ſayes, To avoid Fornication, let every man have his Wife. The Church of Rome like a quick-huſwife, ſaies, Some Order of men ſhall not have a Wife, though to avoid Fornication. Let my Maſſe-Prieſt ſhew theſe to be no contradictions (which he may chance to do at the Greek Calends) or elſe grant this to be neither Paradox, nor unchriſtian.

[k] Eſpenc. ex Teſt. Abb. l. 1. c. 3. Faceret igitur Eccleſiæ boni medici inſtar, medicinam quæ obſit magis quam proſit tollentis. The Church ſhould therefore doe like a good Phyſitian in removing the medicine which it ſees to doe more harme then good. Refut. p. 107.

SECT. XXIII.

D FRom Cardinall Panormitan, I aſcended to Pope Pius the Second, whom I uſhered in with this Preface, Let a Pope himſelfe ſpeake out of Peters Chayre, Pius the ſecond, as learned as hath ſit in that roome this thouſand yeeres. Two things my Caviller ſnarles at in the Preface, two in the authority it ſelfe. Refut. p. 108.

My firſt manifeſt untruth is, that Pius the Second ſpake this as out of the Chaire. A witleſſe miſpriſiō. I hope he ſate in Peters Chayre that ſpake it, if he ſpake it not as from the Chaire, I care for no more. Is not this ſufficient to win reſpect from a Catholike Prieſt? Otherwiſe, whether it were Stoole, or Chayre; or if a chaire, whether the cōſiſtoriall, or the Porphyry chaire, wherein he ſits before his firſt triumph, [l] tanquam in ſtercoraria, it is all one to me. Themſelves muſt firſt agree what it is to ſpeake as from the Chaire, ere I can affirme that Pius the Second ſo ſpake this. Id Populus

E curet, I referred the chaire to the man, not to the ſpeech: In the meane time C. E. is not ſo good a groome to that Chaire, as Gregory of Valence, who attributes infallibility to a Popes ſentence, though it be [m] ſine cura & ſtudio. My ſecond wrong is the ſuperlative laſhing (ſo he cals it) of other Popes learning in compariſon of this. I cry him mercy; I did not know what ſin it was to commend a Popes learning; That is not it (I confeſſe) that caries away the Crownes and the Keyes: But the compariſon offended. Perhaps C. E. hath knowne the Chaire more learnedly furniſhed: It may be he thinkes of Boniface the Ninth, called before Peter de Thomacellis, a Neapolitan, [n] who could neither write, nor ſing; hardly underſtanding the propoſitions of the Advocates in the Conſiſtorie; inſomuch as in his time, Inſcitia ferè venalis facta fuit in ipſa curia; Ignorance was growne valuable. Or it may be he thinks of thoſe ancient ferule-fingred Boy-Popes; one of the Benedicts, a grave father of tenne yeeres old; or Iohn the thirteenth an aged Stripling of ninteene. Or perhaps he alludes to thoſe learned times (within my compaſſe) which were acknowledged in the Councell of Rhemes; where, when offer was made of requiring the Popes judgement, it was publikely replied, that beſides the expoſedneſſe of the City to ſale, Romæ jam nullum fere eſſe qui literas didicerit, There was ſcarce a man at Rome, that could ſpell his Letters.

Heu quàm perfatuæ ſunt tibi, Roma, togæ!

If I ſhould here adde out of Alphonſus de Caſtro, that ſome Popes were ſuch great Clerkes, ° ut Grammaticam penitus ignorent, That they had no skill in Gram-mar, C. E. would tell me that my Booke is not of a corrected edition, though it was printed at Coleine. Such bran hath beene caſt out in their later ſifting and ſhifting of Authors.

SECT. XXIIII.

IN the authority it ſelfe, his Cavils are childiſh; Where Pius ſaid * Sacerdotibus magna ratione ſublatas nuptias, maiore reſtituendas videri: My firſt fault is, that I turne Sacerdotes, The Clergie, inſtead of Prieſts; which word is of a large extent, including alſo Biſhops: The ſilly man ſees not that I tranſlated it to his advantage, againſt my owne; For, every Sacerdos is Clericus, not every Clericus, Sacerdos. Very frequently are Biſhops comprehended under the name of Sacerdotes, as well as of Clerus; and no leſſe uſual under the name of Clerici the ſuperior Orders are not comprehended. He is not worthy to write himſelf Prieſt, that underſtands his Orders no better.

Mariage upon good reaſon was forbidden to Prieſts, but upon greater reaſon ſeemes fit to be reſtored. Refut. p. 169.

My ſecond error is, That I turned the laſt Clauſe of the Sentence, (Is to be reſtored) whereas the words are Reſtituendas videri. Here could be no fraud, whiles I ſet the Latin words in the Margine. The man thinks of his (δοκεῖ μοὶ δὲ) or his, Videtur quod ſic; probatur quod non, but if his Grammer had not beene ill learned, he had knowne that (Videri) doth not alwaies ſignifie a doubtfull probability, but ſometimes a certaine evidence, as, Viſum eſt Spiritui Sancto & nobis; and Qui videbantur columnæ; Or, if this Logicke had fully taught him the Diſtinctions of (Sunt and Videntur) this quarrell had beene ſpared. This Seeming was Being; Or, if this lawleſſe Lurker had ever had any taſte of the Civill or Canon Law, hee might have beene able to conſtrue that Maxime, Quod quis per alium facit, per ſe facere videtur: and that judged Caſe, Qui nomen debitoris legatum vivens exegerit, legatum ademiſſe videtur. In this ſtile ſpake this learned Pope, which my unlearned Adverſarie cannot reach unto. For, if Pius, or Sylvius, may have leave to comment upon himſelfe, when the queſtion was of ſuffecting Amadeus Duke of Savoy, a maried man, in the roome of Eugenius, Ex quo conſtat (ſaith he) &c. It is apparant that not onely he, which hath beene married, but he that is maried, may be aſſumed to the Popedome: and a little after, Fortaſſe pejus non eſſet, &c. And perhaps it were not worſe, if more Prieſts had Wives, for many would be ſaved in a married Prieſthood, which now in a ſingle Prieſthood are damned; hee ſaith directly; Damnantur, They are damned, not, They ſeeme to bee damned. And therefore to prevent this reall damnation, Mariage is really to bee reſtored to them, not that it ſhould onely ſeeme to bee reſtored. To conclude, take Videri, for bare ſeeming, ſurely, it muſt bee conſtrued, Videtur mihi, I Pope Pius thinke, or iudge; that it were fit that Prieſts ſhould have the libertie of Mariage reſtored againe to them; which together with ſublatas implyeth, that in former times Prieſts were maried; and as the caſe now ſtandeth, ought againe ſo to bee. Which is the very ſtate of this queſtion, which wee avouch.

And in his Epiſtle to Iohn Freünd, Credimus te non inſulſo uti conſilio; I think it is no ill Counſell for thee (ſince thou canſt not containe) to ſeeke for a Wife; although that ſhould have beene thought of, before thou didſt enter into holy Orders; but wee are not all Gods, that we can fore-ſee future things; ſince it is comne to this, that thou canſt not reſiſt the Law

A of thy Fleſh, it is better for thee to marry then to burne. Thus he. For which advice, doubtleſſe he found good cauſe in his owne experience; who having beene imployed formerly in this Iland of ours, left two Baſtards behind him, the one, begotten of an Engliſh woman, the other, of a Scottiſh; The one whereof he commends to his Father Sylvius, a Citizen of Syenna; the other he confeſſes to his friend P. de Noxeto: But this indeed was before his Prieſthood; Afterwards, it is ſtrange what he confeſſes of himſelfe in his 92. Epiſtle; Mihi herclè parum meriti eſt in caſtitate; I cannot boaſt of any merit in my chaſtity, for to tell the truth (Magis me Venus fugit at quã ego illam horreo) Venus doth rather flie from me, then I abhorre it. It was not therefore out of ſpeculation, but ſenſe, not out of ſeeming, but certainty, that Sylvius paſſes his Reſtituendas videri.

Whiles he was Cardinall, hee had his Concubine, to whom at laſt hee gave threeſcore Florens for her Dowry. Epiſt. 361.

B So now to ſhut up this point, the bleſſed Apoſtle St. Paul, and (in his Attendance) Panormitan, Gratian, and Pius (in their cleere ſuffrages for us) are fully acquitted from the vaine cavils of my Detector; and God is on my ſide, the Church of Rome, on his. Let Sincerity judge which Scale of the Ballance is heavier.

SECT. XXV.

FRom the lawfulneſſe of our Mariages; I deſcended to the Antiquity; where my Refuter takes an ignorant exception. I ſaid, Some things have nothing to plead for them but Time: Age hath beene an old refuge for falſhood: Then I lay for my foundation Refut p. 110.

C Tertullians Rule; * That which is firſt is trueſt; My Detector findes here a flat contradiction, and cryes out, Do theſe men wake or ſleepe when they write? There are none of his wiſe friends which wil not be aſhamed of this groſſe ſtupidity; For whether of theſe two Sentences can he diſlike? and if both be allowable, how can they be contradictory? neither am I his Adverſary herein, but Tertullian. What ſurer way could there be, then to controll the pretences of a ſecondary antiquity by the firſt? And what contradiction is in this? The firſt is true: all under the firſt is obnoxious to error; The puiſne poſthumous Antiquity hath been a refuge for falſhood, the Primigenious Antiquity (which proceeded from the ancient of Dayes) is certaine. Let this Trifler go learne to ſpell Engliſh, ere he preſume to Divinity. This antiquity is the touch, whereby we deſire all truth to be tryed; which eaſily finds all the gilded Coynes of

D Romiſh innovations, ſhamefully counterfeit.

Not to go back ſo far as Paradiſe (though I well might) where God made the firſt wedding in perfect Innocence; I began with Moſes and his Leviticall Brother-hood; to which my Refuter replyes; That yet in eating their Paſcall Lamb they had their loynes girt. Juſtly concluded! All the Jews did eat the Paſchall Lamb with their loynes girt, for the expedition, or moment of their flight, therefore their Prieſts and Levites did not converſe with their Wives. If his Superiours of Doway do not bluſh at this Logick, his wit and their ſhame are gone together. Refut. p. 111.

But, They abſtained (he ſaith) from their Wives, whiles they did miniſter in the Sanctuary; What if we yeeld this? Their Miniſtration was by courſes, and had intermiſſions. There is an holy and decent modeſty in all thoſe which are worthy to ſerve at

E the Altar, which teacheth them to give God his due times, with reſpect even of outward purity; which is all that q Euſebius by them miſſe-tranſlated, & miſſe-alleaged by him, requireth. But what will my Refuter ſay to the High Prieſt himſelfe, which was bound every day to a morning and evening Sacrifice, who yet was not reſtrained from a conjugall ſociety? That Bone hath troubled, blunted, and broken better Teeth than his.

q Euſeb. de præp. Evang. l. 11. c. 9. τοῖς ἱερωμένοις i. Sacra facientibus, they turne it, Sacratis, &c. Refut. p. 112.

But (ſaith he) The figure of the eternall Prieſthood of Chriſt (to wit) Melchiſedeck, is not read to have had any wife at all; What of this? He, whom he prefigured, was only a ſpirituall Huſband to his Church. If this man be not read to have had a Wife; no more is he read to have had Father or Mother. Nay, he is read to have had neither. Why doe they not thence infer that Prieſts ought to have neither, but to be begotten and borne of Angels, not of humane kinde? which is as good for an inference as that foppery is for a Legendary fable, that Luther was begotten by an Incubus. Yet had the Literall (not mysticall) Melchisedec both Father and Mother: and if Sem were Melchisedec (as wiser men then mine Adversarie have upon good probabilities thought) he may passe, I hope, for a maried man. A

As for the perfection of the new Law above the old, it only bars those institutions which had in them an imperfection, not those which God thought fit for Paradise it selfe. So as the practise of the Jewish Church, founded by God himselfe, is an all-sufficient warrant for the mariage of his Evangelicall Ministers.

SECT. XXVI.

FRom Moses and the Prophets I descend to the Apostles, What did they? C.E. answers roundly: They did not marie; and they who were maried before, did leave their wives. I urge S. Pauls report of the rest of the Apostles, and the Brethren of the Lord and Cephas, that, they not onely had Wives, but caried them along in their Travels. He answers, They were not Wives, but other devout Women, which followed them to administer maintenance to them. A likely tale, if they could all agree in it; That the Apostles would cast off their owne Wives, and carry about strange Women with them, upon what-ever pretence; Credat Iudæus Apella, Non ego. Yet my shameles Refuter cryes out of my pride and ignorance in not allowing this, which he dares proclaime for the received exposition of all the Fathers, and all that ever wrote in the Greeke and Latine Church: When he knowes that his [f] Clement in his Recognitions and his owne Pope in the Canon Law, hath expounded contrarily, of Wives, not of strange Women: [t] Leo the ninth, against the Epistle of Nicetas the Abbot, where he directly affirmes that the Apostles did cary about their Wives, Vt de mercede prædicationis sustentarentur ab iis; That they might be maintained by the reward of their preaching, making the force of the word to lie in circumducendi, non amplectendi: Eyther therefore his Pope erres in a deliberate exposition of Scripture, or else I have not erred; And either his Popes are no Fathers, or C.E. hath no forehead. B C

Nothing can make the Rhemists (ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα, a Sister, a Woman) not ridiculous; not that Visor of Age, which my Refuter pleases to fasten upon it, There wants an Article (he saith.) Our Apostle should have comne to Cardinal Bellarmine and him to learne when, and where to use it.

That our last acurate translation of the English Bible, hath Woman in the margin, is a poore advantage: who seeth not, that it is the manner of that exquisite Edition, to set all the Idiotismes of either Language, and divers readings in the Margin? Every Schoole-Boy knowes that the word signifies both; but whether of them is fit to be received into the Text, our Text it selfe shewes. How wittily is Saint Pauls, A Woman, a Sister, paralleled with Saint Peters, Viri Fratres? Ye Men which are Brethren, is a meet predication, but, Ye Sisters which are Women, is absurd; Neither doth Saint Peter say (ἀδελφοὶ ἄνδρες) Brethren men, as Saint Paul sayes, ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα, A Sister Woman. As for the authority of Hierome, well may we appeale from his judgment as incompetent, whom his own Doctors accuse as partiall, and censure as * μεμψίμοιρον, (if not μισόγαμον.) Yet even he against Helvidius translates it, Vxores circumducendi. D

For the rest, it is worth my Readers note, how the Plagiary Priest having stolne this whole passage (as most of the rest) verbatim out of Bellarmine, yet over-reaches his Master; for where Bellarmine sayes, Ita ferè omnes Græci & Latini; So almost all the Greeke and Latine; this Bayard dares say, All (saving Clemens) as well Greeke, as Latine; and when he hath done, names some that say nothing of it at all, as Chrysostom; Another that in Heresie speaks for him one where, another-where against him, as Tertullian; who being also himself a maried Priest, could say in his exhortation, Licebat & Apostolis nubere, & uxores circumducere; Another that grounds upon an evidēt misreading, as Ambrose; and to make up the Bulke, puts in Saint Bede and St. Thomas, parties to the cause, and then sings Iō pæan. It is well yet that he grants Clemens of Alexandria, and Saint Ignatius to be on our side, for this interpretation; and when he hath done, he must be forced to yeelde to his Pope Clement, Pope Leo, seconded by Gratian, and Lauerentius Valla, and others cited by Erasmus; in so much as Espencæus himselfe E himself grants herein, [x] διαφωνίαν veterum, a difference amongst the Ancient, And if these had never been, the Text cleares it selfe; for, not to inforce the word (περιάγειν) which implyes a power over the party caried; The Apostle speaks of a matter of charge to the Church, by this circumduction; Now, that rich Matrons should follow the Apostles, and minister to them of their substance, was a matter of ease to the Church. Neither was this attendance for ministration, so much an act of Cephas, & the other Apostles, as a voluntary act of the women themselves. To conclude, in this the Apostles practice should have crossed their Doctrine. For if Saint Paul gave that charge (of being the Husband of one Wife) on purpose (as [y] Chrysostome saith) to stop the mouth of the Enemies to Mariage; how must this needs open them againe, and breed a conceit of that impurity, which Saint Paul meant to oppose, that the Apostles themselves as ashamed of their wives, forsooke them; and chose rather to be attended by Strangers. So as I must take leave to be ever in this Heresie, that the Apostles had wives, and caried them about.

SECT. XXVII.

BUt what Boyes-play is this, To give and take? Our doughty Champion hath granted us Clemens of Alexandria, and now hee puls him back againe; Clemens (saith he) grants the Apostles to have had wives, but he denyes that they used them as Wives; cunningly dissembling that which Clemens said in the beginning of the same period; For Peter and Philip (saith hee) did beget children, &c. How did Peter beget them, if he were not Peter when he begot them? In the time of their painfull Evangelicall peregrination they forbore perhaps: doth it therefore follow that they did alwaies forget to be husbands? Whence, in all likelihood, had S. Peter his Petronella; if she were not borne after he was Peter? Whence was that inscription on Pilagiaes Tombe, (if we may beleeve [z] Perionius) Hic sita est sponsa Dionysii, Thomæ Apostoli filia? There is not (I grant) necessity in this proofe, there is probability. It is therefore too boldly affirmed by my Detector, that the Apostles, after that publike calling undertaken, used not their Wives. Is that of Saint Ignatius nothing against him? Opto Deo dignus, &c. I desire to be found worthy of God, as Peter and Paul, and the rest of the Apostles which were maried men, and [a] not for lusts sake, but for propagation of posterity injoyed their Wives. Thus he. So much against C. E. that C. E. is no lesse against him. The testimony of S. Ignatius (saith he) is a meere forgery, easily answered. If Ignatius had either denyed or disliked these Mariages, no mans word had beene more authentik; now, this clause hath made him falsified: He cannot (I hope) say, that the sentence came out of our Forge, we take him as we find him; neither doth B. Espencæus, or any other ingenuous Writer, take such exception, but finds the authority weighty. That more unlikely Epistle which Ignatius wrote to S. Iohn, and the blessed Virgin (though palpably rejected by their owne) is classicall enough, when it may serve a Coccius, or [b] a Bellarmine, or a Pierre Cotton; But here the Epistle it selfe is not questioned, onely this clause is bored in the Eare. And why so? Forsooth the ancient Greeke Copies have it not. Doubtlesse the man hath vexed the old Greek Manuscripts; but when he hath done, his owne Fellow shall give him the lye; who confesses it to be in all Copies both Greeke and Latine, old and new, whiles he saith, those words ([b] Et alii Apostoli) ex textu abradenda. Or if that will not serve, there is yet to be seene in Baliol Colledge in Oxford, an old Copy of the age of seven hundred or eight hundred yeeres wherein the words are found; Onely the words (Saint Paul, and the other Apostles) blurred; yet so, as they are stil to be wel discern'd. If the Greek should want the clause, what were this? The first edition of Ignatius in Greeke was (1558.) as the Centuriists have noted; & how easie was it to leave out one sentence that seemed prejudicial? Let him never cast this upon the Græcians: they never so excelled in this faculty of counterfeiting as the Romans: Greece in this must yeeld to Italy, how-ever it pleases [c] Pope Gregory and Cardinall Bellarmine herein only to give it superiority.

Amongst the rest, this very place puts me in mind of a memorable jugling Trick of his Fellowes. The old Platina printed at Paris by Francis Regnault, Anno 1500. (which I have seene) and other old Copies, read thus of S. Luke; Vixit annos 84. Vxorem

Which is all I contended for. Sect. XXVIII.

Refut. p. 118. FRom the practice of the Apoſtles (which is yet cleare for us) wee deſcended to their Canons. It troubles my Refuter, that I ſay, the Romiſh Church fathers theſe upon the Apoſtles, and that their Ieſuit Turrian ſweats to defend it, (inſinuating my contrary opinion) and yet that I cite them for my ſelf; whereas his wiſdome might have conſidered, that their force is no whit leſſe ſtrong againſt them, notwithſtanding our doubt or denyall. For example, The Trent Canons rore terribly to them: to us, or the French, they are but as the Pot-guns of Boyes: wee may cite theſe to them as Goſpell, they may cite them to us as Alchoran. C

By this it appeares how farre not onely Schoole-learning, but even Logick tranſcends this poore Refuters capacity, who could not diſtinguiſh betweene diſputing ad rem and ad hominem.

What I ſaid in my Epiſtle to my reverend and worthy friend Maſter Doctor Iames, the incomparably induſtrious and learned Bibliothecary of Oxford (a man whom their Poſſevine thought ſo well of, that he hath handſomely ſtolne a booke of his, and clapt it out for his owne, a man whom ſo baſe a Tongue as my Detectors cannot diſgrace) I profeſſe ſtill, that I hold thoſe Canons of the Apoſtles uncanonicall; And do I hold this alone? Doth not his Pope Gelaſius ſo? Doth not Iſidore, Biſhop of Hiſpalis ſo? Doth not Leo the Ninth ſo? Are not ſome of them at pleaſure rejected by Poſſevine, Baronius, Bellarmine? Or, in a word, if they be the true iſſue of the Apoſtles, are they accordingly reſpected, and obſerved of the Roman Church? Doth not his [g] Medina grant to their ſhame, that the Latine Church ſcarce obſerves ſix or eight of them? Theſe Canons then I do not hold Apoſtolicall, I do hold ancient, and not unworthy of reſpect; & ſuch as I wonder they have eſcaped the Roman Purgations. As for thoſe other nine or ten noted Counterfeits, which I ioyned herewith for cōpany, in that Epiſtle, his ſhame would ſerve him to iuſtifie, if his leaſure would, whereas there is ſcarce one of thē whom his own Authors have not branded. My Refuter muſt have a fling; In an idle excurſiō therfore he unjuſtly railes on the Proteſtant practice, in rejecting thoſe Fathers for baſtardie one while, whom otherwhiles they cite for currant; when his own eminent impudency in the very paſſage next going before, and in the next following (to goe no further) offends in the ſame kind. The truth is the Proteſtants take liberty to refuſe thoſe Fathers, whom even ingenuous Papiſts have cenſured as baſe; The Papiſts take libertie, when they liſt to reject the authority of thoſe Fathers, whoſe truth they cannot deny. The inſtances hereof would be endleſſe. But with what face can any Papiſt taxe us for this when all the World may ſee above three hundred and twenty of their Authors, whom D E

SECT. XXIX.

NOt to follow therefore this babling vagary of my Adversary against Zuinglius, Luther, Musculus, Whitakers, (what Puppy cannot barke at a dead Lyon?) wee come close to the Canon: That no Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon shall forsake or cast off his Wife in pretence of Religion, or Piety, upon paine of deposition. Wherewith how much my Refuter is pressed, appeares, in that he is faine with Baronius to avoid it, with, Apocryphorum non est tanta authoritas; There is no such great authority in Apocryphall Canons. Ref. p. 126, 127. Apost. Can. 5.

B Where is the man that even now upbraided us with the lawlesse rejection of ancient Records, and by name would undertake to justifie those whom my Epistle taxed for Adulterine, whereof these Canons of the Apostles, were a part? now he is fayne to change his note, Apocryphorum non est tanta authoritas. He hath cast off Ignatius already, anon you shall find him rejecting Socrates, Sozomen, Nicephorus, Gratian, Sigebert, H. Huntingdon, and whom not? upon every occasion shamelesly practizing that which he censures.

If I alleage the sixth general Councel, that of Constantinople, proclaiming this sense truly Apostolicall, even the sixth generall Councell is reiected as neither sixth, nor generall, nor Councell; That this Apostolicall Canon is bent against the denyall of C Matrimoniall conversation; is apparantly expressed in those Canons of Constantinople, how-ever the extent of it in regard of some persõs is restrained. There is no way therfore to unty this knot, but by cutting it; and my cavilling Priest with his Jesuits may gnaw long enough upon this bone, ere they suck in any thing from hence, but the blood of their own jawes.

Any of those words single might be avoided, but so set together, will abide no illusion, Let him not upon pretence of religion reject his Wife.

The shift that C.E. borrowes from Bellarmine, is grosse, and such as his own heart cannot trust (πρόφασιν δολερὰν saith he) that is, * prætextu cautionis. Looke over all the Copies; all interpretations of these Canons; that of Dionysius Exiguus, that of Gentianus Hervetus; that of Caranza, that which Gratian (whom my either graceless or D ignorant adversarie dares name against me) citeth from hence; all of them run prætextu religionis. How cleare is that of their own [h] Law? Si quis docuerit Sacerdotem, &c If any man shall teach that a Priest, under pretence of Religion, may contemne his owne wife, let him be accursed. *Refut. p. 128. * In pretence of hezdimesse.* h Dist. 28. Sub obtentu religionis propriam uxorem contemnere.

And Zonaras, whom both our Iunius, and their Espencæus cite out of Quintinus his Exposition, is most cleere; Hoc enim videtur in calumniam fieri nuptiarum, &c. For this ejection (saith he) would seeme to be done in reproach of mariage, as if the Matrimoniall knowledge of Man and Wife caused any uncleanesse. Thus he. Where it is plaine, that he takes it not of maintenance, but (περὶ τῆς μίξεως) of the Conjugall act. The necessity of which sense also is evicted by their owne * Espencæus out of Saint Chrysostome, in his second Homily upon Titus. And [i] Balsamon no lesse directly; Because (saith hee)
E before that Law of Justinian, it was lawfull for a man upon any cause to divorce his Wife: therefore the present Canon gives charge, that it shall not be lawfull for a Bishop, Priest or Deacon, upon pretence of piety, to put away his Wife. Thus he. * Espenc. l. 1. de cont. c. 4. i In Canon. Apost. in Phot. in novo Can.

From all which it is not hard to see, that in those young dayes of the Church, the mystery of iniquity began in this point to worke; so as Mariage, according to the Apostles prediction, began to be in an ill name, though the cleare Light of that Primitive Truth would not endure the disgrace.

So as in all this I have both by Moses, and the examples of that Leviticall Priesthood; by the testimonies of the Apostles, by their practice, by their anciently-reputed Canons; and by the testimonie of the agedest Fathers, so made good the lawfulnesse and antiquity of the Mariages of persons Ecclesiasticall, that I shall not need to feare a Divorce either from my Wife, or from the Truth in that my Confident and just Assertion.

SECT. I.

Refut.p.130.

AND now, since in this point wee have happily won the day; lesse labour needs in the other. It is safe erring with Moses and the Prophets, with Christ and his Apostles; soone after (according to Saint Pauls Prophecie) Spirits of Errors were abroad; and whether out of the necessary exigence of those persecuted times, or out of an affectation to win favour & admiration in the eyes of Gentilisme, Virginity began to raise up it selfe in some private conceits, upon the ruines of honest Wedlock; neither is it hard to discerne by what degrees; yet never with such absolute successe, as to proceed to any Law of restraint. I do not therefore faine to my selfe (as mine idle Refuter) golden ages of mirth, and [k] marying, under those tyrannous persecutions, but in those bloody ages, I do avouch to him, and the World, an immunity from the tyrannous yoke of forced continency. This if he could have disproved by any just instances, he had not given us words.

k Though Amram the Levite father to Moses married in the heat of Pharaohs persecution: and David did the like in Sauls. Refut.p.131. Refut.p.131, 132, 133.

If he be angry that I said, some of the pretended Epistles of his ancient Popes to this purpose are palpably foysted: Let him fasten where he lists. if he have not an answer, let me have the shame; in the meane time, it is enough to snarle where he dares not bite.

That which I cited from Origen, advising the son of Clergie-men not to be proud of their parentage, he cannot deny, he can cavil at. The same perswasion (saith he) might be made to S. Peters daughter (as many are of opinion that he had one) yet will it not follow that he knew his wife, after he was an Apostle. So he. But what needs this Parenthesis, if the man be true to his owne Authors? Did we devise the Storie of Petronilla? Did we invent her passage of her Sutor Flaccus; Of her Fever, the cure whereof her father denyed? Of the Epitaph ingraven in marble, by her Fathers own hand: Aureæ Petronillæ, dilectissimæ filiæ, To my deare and precious Petronilla, my most beloved daughter, found by Paul the First? Are nor these things reported by their own Volateranus Petr. Natalis, Beda, Vssuardus, Sigebertus, Platina? Still where is the man that cryes out of rejecting authorities in other cases allowed? either then let him give the lye to his Histories;

The place of Origen which he [m] cites to the contrary, he tooke up ſomewhat on truſt : let him go and enquire better of his Creditor; by the ſame token, that in the Homily of Origen, whither he ſends us, he ſhall find nothing but Balaams Aſſe; an object fit for his meditation. As for that parcell of the teſtimony, which he ſaith my chin-cough cauſed me to ſuppreſſe (in ipſa Chriſtianitate) it is a Herbe-John in the Pot, to the purpoſe of my allegation. Origen ſpeakes of that Text, Many that are firſt, ſhall be laſt, &c. Which he applies as a cooling-eard to the children of Chriſtian Parents, eſpecially, Si fuerint B ex patribus Sacerdotali ſede dignificatis; If they be the Sons of them, which are dignified with Sacerdotall honor : The change of the Prepoſition is remarkable, ex Patribus, arguing that he ſpeakes not of their education, but their deſcent, and therefore implying no leſſe then I affirmed, that their parentage gives them a ſuppoſed cauſe of exaltation.

SECT. II.

HOly [n] Athanaſius was brought by me in ſtead of a thouſand Hiſtories : Who tels us that it was no rare thing to find maried Biſhops in his time. My wiſe Refuter, C after he hath idly gone about the buſh a little, comes out with this dry verdict, What will Maſter Hall hence infer? That Biſhops and Prieſts may lawfully marrie? Saint Athanaſius ſaith it not, but onely recounteth the fact, that ſome maried of both ſorts, but whether they did well or ill, or whether himſelfe did approve or condemne the ſame, there is no word in this ſentence. Thus he. We take what he gives, and ſeeke for no more : We cited Athanaſius in ſtead of many Hiſtories, not of many Arguments; Hiſtories de facto, not diſcourſes de jure : The lawfulneſſe was diſcuſſed before; the practice and uſe is now inquired of. This Athanaſius witneſſes, and C. E. yeelds: Wherein yet I may not forget to put my Refuter in minde, how brittle his memory is, who in the ſame leafe contradicts himſelfe : For when he had before confeſſed that Athanaſius doth neither approve nor condemne the practice, either as good or evill, now he plainlie tels us, that D the words were not ſpoken by way of ſimple narration, but of diſlike and reprehenſion. He would be a good lyer if he could agree with himſelfe. Why of diſlike? For (ſaith he) it was never lawfull for Monkes or Biſhops to beget children. Ipſe dixit, we muſt beleeve him : Not to tell him that [o] Chryſoſtome teaches us (δυνατὸν μετὰ γάμου τὰ τῶν μοναζόντων ποιεῖν) it is poſſible with Mariage to do the acts of Monkes : not to convince him with counter teſtimonies, let him tell me what fault it is, to do or not to do miracles. Theſe in this ſentence of * Athanaſius go in the ſame ranke with Mariage. But, to cleare Athanaſius, he brings Hierom againſt Vigilantius (impudently called by him, The father of the Proteſtants, who would have all Clergy men to marry; whē his very Rhemiſts have checkt him for this ſlander) plead ng againſt that neceſſity, from which we have oft waſht our hands; when as the ſame Author againſt Iovinian affirmes de facto, the E ſame with Athanaſius, and us.

To ſay then that Athanaſius ſpoke this only of lewd licentious Monks or Biſhops, is but the lewd liberty of a licentious tongue that hath over-runne both truth and it ſelfe.

From hence this Orator, this parcell of wit, flies out into a pleaſant frumpe, as he thinks, but indeed an ugly, inhumane, loathſome ribaldry, ill-beſeeming the mouth of any that was born of a woman, I wil not ſay whether ill or wel beſeeming the Pen of a Virgin-Prieſt, forſooth ſo pure and angelical, that Mariage would un Saint him. His unmanly unnatural Stile belcheth thus: Thus Luther, of Katherine Bore, his Sow, had ſixe Pigs. Away naſty C. E. transformed by Circe! Hoy! backe to her Styes, yea thine, where thou maiſt freely

Pag. 137.

Then proceeds he, envying the matrimoniall fruitfulnes of Bucer: who surely, had he under the vaile of maydenly Priesthood beene farre more fruitfull in a whole swarme of Bastards, should never have heard of it, unlesse perhaps he had denied to pay Taxam Cameræ. As for Ochin's allowing Polygamy, and perhaps other worse obliquities in his opinions, what are they to us? For the mariage of P. Martyr, Oecolampadius, Pellican, &c. Let him take for an acquittance that which hath beene paid them thus, Nobis nostræ sunt Junones, vobis vestræ Veneres. And then I aske, Vivat uter nostrum cruce dignior. If this will not serve for repaiment, I must eeke it out with a smal yet currant commodity of two poore verses, which I learned of his Mantuan at the Grammer Schoole.

P Job 41.27. *Refut.p.*138, 139.

HItherto my Refuters P Yron hath beene as Straw, his Brasse as rotten Wood, his Sling-stones as stubble, but now he hath found that will kill me dead; and sayes no lesse then Hoc habet. q Cyprian is by me alledged for the History of Numidicus; who I avouched a maried Presbyter, by the same token that he saw his wife burning (besides him) with the flames of Martyrdome. And Lord, what out-cryes are here of fraud and corruption! and how could this Masse-Priest wish himself neere me when I should be urged with this imposture, to see what face I would make thereon? Evē such a one (good sir Shorne) as is framed by the confidence of honest innocence. God deale with my soule, as it meanes nothing but ingenuous sincerity; neither hath my pen swarved one letter from the Text: My margine said, Numidicus Presbyter; so doth Cyprian himselfe, two or three lines before this report of his wife; so (besides the Text) doth the margin of Erasmus. And what trechery could it be to adde the word of Cyprians own explication? But Numidicus was not then Priest, when his wife was martyred; rather upon that constancy was honored with holy Orders. How appeares that, when Cyprian only sayes, Numidicus Presbyter ascribatur Presbyterorum Carthaginensium numero & nobiscum sedeat in clero. He was before a Priest, for ought this Libeller, or any mortall man knows, and now was ascribed into the honoured Clergie of Carthage, soone after to be promoted to Episcopall dignity. Before the report therefore of his wives martyrdome, he is named a Priest. What have I offended in seconding S. Cyprian? Let this peremptory babler prove this ordination to be after that noble proofe of his faith; I shall confesse my selfe mistaken in the time, never false in mine intentions.

Till then; he shall give me leave to stile the man as I find him, Numidicus Presbyter.

Numid. Presbyter Presbyterorum Carth. numero ascr.

If Cyprian had said, Numidicus Presbyterorum numero ascribatur, the cause had been cleare; but now doubling the word, he implies him a Priest before; and how long before, and whether not before his Confession, it will trouble my learned Adversarie to determine. How faine would this man crow, if he could but get the colour of an advantage?

In the meane while, this impotent insultation bewrayes nothing but malice and ignorance.

Sect. IIII.

*Refut.p.*140.

MY Refuter may transpose the History of Paphnutius, but he shall never answer it. After his old guise therefore he fals to his Hatchet, and when he hath tried to bow it a little and finds it stiffe, he cuts it up by the roots. What one word can he controll controll in the relation of[r] Socrates, or mine illation? The Biſhops went about to bring in a new law of Continency to be impoſed upon their Clergie, ſaith Socrates and Sozomen; therfore before it was not. Paphnutius reclaimed and called that yoake heavy and unſupportable; the uſe of the Mariage-bed, Chaſtity. The iſſue was, Poteſtas permiſſa cuiq; pro arbitratu: Every man left to his own liberty. The ſtory is plaine, there is no place for cavils. The only comfort that my Detector and his Tutors find in the Hiſtory, is, that Paphnutius is not all ours: He cals for the uſe of mariage to the wedded Clergie, not for wedlock of the unmaried. True; therein I muſt retort the anſwer of Sotus, that the good Martyr gave way to the corruptiõ of the Times; wherein the wicked myſtery had begun with St. Pauls (καλυόντων.) But in the meane time, let him know, that if Paphnutius pleade but by halves for us, he pleads againſt them altogether; yea, this he knows already, elſe he would never be ſo audacious as to condemne the authors for unſincere, and fabulous, yea, hereticall; and to bring the clamours of his Bellarmine, to diſcredit Socrates in three groſſe untruths, & Sozomẽ with Multa mentitur. O impudẽcy without meaſure, without example! Caſſiodorus & Epiphanius, Socrates, Sozomen, Nicephorus, grave and approved Authors of our Eccleſiaſticall Story, for but reporting one piece of an Hiſtory, in favour of Clergy-mens mariages, are ſpit upõ, & diſcarded with diſgrace. This is no new Song; my Refuter hath learned it of Copus, Torrẽſis, Bellarmine, Baronius, and others. All whoſe mouths together with his, in theſe particular exceptions, let me ſtop with that ingenuous anſwer of * B. Eſpencæus, there needs no other Advocate, Excipit Torrenſis, &c. But Torrenſis excepts againſt Socrates and Sozomen, as though they had lewdly, and ſhamefully belyed this ſtory of Pathnutius; and ſayes, the one was a friend of the Novatians, the other an abettor of Theodorus the Heretick; that both their Hiſtories are in this, voyd of credit, authority, probability. As if they could not at once be bad Men, and yet good hiſtorians; or, if they lye in any other place, they muſt needs lye in this: For Sozomen, Tritemius commends him for a worthy furtherer of ſecular learning, and well verſed in the Scriptures. And for Socrates, he extols him for a learned and eloquent man, for a very excellent, and greatly experienced Hiſtorian. Thus he, and much more; to which (for brevity) I referre my peremptory Refuter; who ſhal there find ſatisfaction to his Objections of the ſilence of other Authors, and the Canon alledged againſt the ſubintroduction of (Mulieres extraneæ) ſtrange Women into the houſes of Clergie-men: His Clictovæus telling him uxores dici non poſſe extraneas, and the Law made afterwards by Honorius and Theodoſius, plainly commenting upon this conſtitution.

AS for his teſtimonie of Leo the Great, living in the time of Socrates, I anſwer it by the teſtimony of * Socrates, living in the time of Leo the Great, Multi enim, &c. For many (ſaith he) in this Epiſcopall dignity, in their Epiſcopall houſes, in the time of their being Biſhops, do beget children of their Wives, whom they had before lawfully maried. Thus he. A place that anſwers for it ſelfe, and many others. Wherein yet my Refuter finds ſome of my faulty concealements. Firſt, that the more, and more famous Biſhops, and Prieſts did the contrary. True, they did ſo, but voluntarily, as with us ſome of the Heads of our Clergie, and others of the Body, do containe, not forced; [c] Continent ſponte ac pro arbitrio: This I think is not the Roman faſhion. Secondly, They converſed with the Wives which they maried before their Ordination, they did not marry after. Let his wiſdome ſhew me upon what reaſon the act of marying ſhould be unlawful, where the act of maryage is lawfull, and we wil yeeld him juſtly to ſticke at this difference. And when he hath done, let him bite upon their old [d] Gloſſe (though now by them defaced,) Dicunt quod olim, ante Siricium ſacerdotes poterant contrahere.

Sect. VI.

Refut.p.150. IN the reſt, he fals not upon me, but the received Hiſtorians, Socrates & Nicephorus, They have done him a ſpight, and he will revenge it. Theſe he will convince of a double lye. The one, that Heliodorus was the firſt Author of the Law of Continencie in Theſſalia; the other, that this Continencie was arbitrarie. His reaſon for the former is weighty; It is not likely (ſaith he) that Heliodorus which would rather loſe his Biſhoprick then recall his laſcivious Book, would be ſo eager above the reſt for the continencie of his Clergie. As if ever any man had been more luxurious then the greateſt enemies to mariage; as if it were poſſible for Pope Iohn the thirteenth (from whom Dunſtan received his rigorous Commiſſion) to be unnaturally inceſtuous; as if it were impoſſible for his great Prelate of Crema, when he came to oppoſe the Mariage of our Engliſh Clergie, to be [c] found that night in bed with an Harlot.

And here my childiſh Adverſarie will needs make ſport for Boyes; I cited in my Margin Heliodorus, the Author of the Æthiopick Hiſtory; As if (ſaith he) Heliodorus had written ſome Hiſtorie of Æthiopia, whereas he only intituled his work Æthiopia. Ridiculous head! what Schoole-boy, what apprentice knows not Heliodorus? Noſque manum ferulæ, &c. If this learned Critick had but ever opened the Booke, he had found Αἰθιοπικῶν; Neither doth any Engliſh man know it by any other name, then, as it is tranſlated (ere I was borne) The Æthiopick Hiſtory; yea, if a man were not reſolute to ſhut his eyes, in the very place of Socrates, which he cites, the Book is called Æthiopica, whereto what conſtruction can be given, but this of mine? Such folly is for the rod or Ferule; This is (I confeſſe) a Trifle; yet ſuch as may give my Reader a taſte of the bold blindneſſe of my impudent Detector.

Sect. VII.

Refut.p.151. THe other ſtings yet more, that this Epiſcopall and Prieſtly Continency was upon no other termes, then [f] Modo ipſi voluerint, and, Nulla lege coacti; and conſuetudo invalait. And now all in a rage my Refuter will prove againſt Socrates that there was a Law for this: & to this purpoſe he brings in two Canons of the Conſtantinopolitan Councell in Trullo: Marke, Reader, with what judgment. The Trullan Councell was above two hundred yeares after: Socrates ended his Hiſtory in the yeare [g] 443. The Trullan Councell was held (as their Binius computes it) in the yeare 692. and yet the Canon of the Trullan Councell, in a matter of fact, diſproves Socrates. The other Councels of Ancyra, Cæſaria, and Nice, are either Provinciall, or againſt him. As for the plea of Syneſius, that he might not be a Biſhop, becauſe he would not leave his wife, it is anſwered by the fact of Syneſius, that he was made a Biſhop, and left not his Wife. But what an idle and inſolent boldneſſe is this, for an obſcure Libeller, to go about now almoſt 1200. yeares after, to controll a grave approved Hiſtorian of the Church, in a matter of ordinary practice, which his owne eyes and the Worlds did daily witnes; As if he durſt have publiſhed ſuch a report of the common uſe of his time, wherein all the Age he lived in, could have convinced him.

Refut.p.153. The witleſſely-malicious Proſopopey, wherein my Refuter brings in the Reverend and Peereleſſe Biſhop of London, pleading for his wife to his Metropolitan, becomes wel the mouth of a ſcurrile Maſſe-Prieſt, and is worthy nothing but a ſcorne. Thoſe two incomparable Prelates are the chiefe objects of theſe evill eyes; whom God hath raiſed happily above the reach of their envy. It galls this Romiſh Rabble, that theſe two Ring-leaders of the Engliſh Clergy (beſides their buſie imployments in their carefull, prudent, and zealous government) preach more Sermons in a yeare, then, perhaps, all the Biſhops under the Papacie. Rumpantur & ilia.

Sect.

Sect. VIII.

IT pleaseth his discretion to marshal my Epistle as he lists, and thē to complaine of disorder, & my leaping over hundreds of yeares from the Nicen Councell to Gratian the Canonist: My Readers eyes can confute him, which cannot but witnesse that I name divers in all ages recorded for maried Bishops and Presbyters. This Bead-role (saith he) is idle, because I shew not that they then used their Wives when they were Bishops. An hard conditiō; That I must bring witnesses from their Bed-sides. It is not enough that we shew they had wives, that they had childrē? No (saith my Refuter) It must be proved that they had these children by these Wives after Ordination. We were neither their Midwives nor their Gossips, to keepe so strict an account. But what meanes, * Cum uxoribus dormiunt? and, Tempore Episcopatus filios gignunt ex propriis uxoribus. This we have shewed out of Socrates. What was that which Dyonisius the ancient B. of Corinth, (before ever Paphnutius was) wrote to Pinytus, charging him, [x] Ne grave servandæ castitatis onus necessario fratribus imponat.

What was that, for which Eustathius, B. of Sebastia, the unworthy son of Eulanius B. of Cæsaria was censured? was not this one of the Articles, [y] Benedictionem, &c. That he taught men to decline the blessing and communion of maried Priests? Away then with this either ignorant, or impudent facing of so evident a falshood.

The testimony of Hierom, the example of Vrbicus B. of Claramont, and of Genebaldus B. of Laudune, shew what was the cōceit & practice of those particular places wherin they lived. And yet Hierome in the same book can say; [z] Quasi non hodie quoque plurimi sacerdotes habeant matrimonia. In the story of Vrbicus, related by Greg. Turonensis, I can but wonder how far men may be transported by superstitiō; so as to make the Apostles charge give way to a humane opinion. The wife of [a] Vrbicus comes to his doore, and alledges S. Pauls charge; (Meet together againe, lest Satan tempt you, &c.) Cur conjugem spernis, &c? he yeelds to do the duty of an Husband, and now in remorse injoynes himselfe a perpetuall penance. What penance do we think S. Paul was worthy of, for giving this charge which she alledged? Let my Reader judge whether of the two was the better Divine. How insolent is traditiō, thus to trample upō Scripture? But since it pleased my Refuter to lend me this one example of Greg. Turonensis, I am ready to give him use for it. In the 2. book of Turonensis he shall find [b] Sidonius a maried Bishop and his Wife, a Noble Matron, in all likelihood living with him, for (nesciente conjuge) without his wives knowlege he gave silver plate to the Poore. [c] In the fourth Book he shal find Anastatius a maried Presbyter, feoffed in some Tēporalties which he would rather die then not leave to his issue. [d] In the eight Book he shal find Badegisilus, the cruell Bishop of the Cenomans, matched with an ill wife, who yet lived with him (as it seemes) all his time, and had altercations with Bertram Archdeacon of Paris, for his goods, deceased. In these three is strength of legall presumption, though no necessity of inference. But what do I instance in these, or any other, whē Balsamon tels us cleerly that before the sixt Synod [e] it was lawfull for Bishops to have wives, Etiā post dignitatē Episcopalē? And his own Canon law can tel him that in the East Church, their Priests, Matrimonio copulantur; which his wariest Masters expounding, would interpret by copulato utuntur. Judge then Reader, what to think of the metall of this mans forehead, who would beare us downe, that no one Bishop or Priest was allowed, after Orders, to have any Wife. Yea, even for the very contraction of mariage it selfe after Orders, [f] honest Espencæus can cite one [g] Ioannes Marius, a Dutch-man by birth, but a French Historian, to whom he allowes the title of (non indiligeris) who writes, that he knows that in the times of Pope Formosus, and Ludovicus Balbus, Priests were maried, Et iis licuisse sponsam legitimam ducere modò Virginē, non verò Viduam; and that it was lawfull for them to marry a Wife, so she were a Virgin, not a Widow.

As for that base slander wherewith his venomous Pen besprinkles the now glorious face of our renowned Archbishop and Martyr Doctor Cranmer; whom he most lewdly charges with lasciviousnesse and incontinent living with I know not what Dutch Fraw, is worthy of no other answer then, Increpet te Dominus. It is true that the holy man wiſely declining the danger & malignity of the times, made not at the firſt any publike profeſſion of his Mariage; as, what needed to invite miſchiefe? But that he ever had any diſhoneſt converſatiõ with her or any other, it is no other then the accent of the mouth of Blaſphemy. And if any one of our Clergy, after a legall and juſt Divorce long ſince, have taken to himſelf that liberty wᶜʰ other Reformed Churches publikely allow (as granting in ſome caſe a full releaſe, both à thoro, and à vinculo) what ground is this for an impure wretch to caſt dirt in the eyes of our Clergie, and in the teeth of our Church? If I reckoned not examples enow, or ſuch as he likes not, (as unjuſtly ſeeming litigious) there is choice enough of more; Tertullian, Proſper, Hilary, Eupſychus, Polycrates, and his ſeven Anceſtors; to which let him adde 24. But whereas this mighty Champion challenges me with great inſultation in many paſſages of his braving diſcourſe, to name but one Biſhop or Prieſt of note, which after holy Orders converſed conjugally with his Wife; without the ſcandall of the Church branding ſuch (if any were) for infamous; and daring to pawne his cauſe upõ this tryal; I do here accept his offer, and am ready to produce him ſuch an Example, as if all the Jeſuits heads in the world ſtood upon his ſhoulders, they could not tell how to wrangle againſt. SECT.

Sect. IX.

I Descend to the Testimony of Gratian; Champion E. calls this picking of Strawes. If picking of Straws be boyes-play, and argue that they which use it are foiled, and have lost all, as our Refuter merrily pipeth, let him acknowledge how beggarly the proofes are growne of the martyrdome of their Saintly Jesuits and Priests amongst us, did they not stoop to picke straws, to thresh out a miracle (when it was) for translating Father Garnet from a Traytor to a Martyr? yea, and that Chaffe, the gullery whereof themselves smile at here, is devoutly transported beyond the Seas, and enshrined for a sacred relique, and proclaimed by their Kornmannus for one of the great Wonders of the Dead; Ridet aruspex ubi aruspicem viderit.

It is wel that the great Compiler of the Canō Law of Rome is grown so base with Catholique Priests. He witnesses plainly, that some Bishops of Rome were the sons of Priests, not spurious, but begot in lawfull wedlocke; [m] Which was (according to Gratian) every where lawfull to the Clergie, before the prohibitiō. C. E. bites the lip at this authority, and first he tells us, it is the Palea, not Gratian. But if this be Chaffe, there is no Corne. Reader, try by this the egregious impudence of this fellow. Turne to the place, thou shalt find the words to be none but Gratians: and the notes allowed by publique authority, openly to confirme it: Hic apertè ostendit Gratianus se in ea fuisse opinione, &c. Here Gratian openly shewes, that he was in that opinion, that heretofore the Priests of the Latin Church might be maried.

m Dist. 56. Cenomanens, &c.

Refut. p. 161.

Refut. p. 162. Secondly, my Parenthesis displeases him (As now adayes:) But what needs this quarrell? He must grant if the Romish Priests have sons, they can be no other than spurious. It is his best not to presse this point too far. This idle jealousie of his can argue no good. I touched not the continency of his Paulus Quintus so much as in my thought, I onely wish that his holinesse would bestow some of the offals of his Nephewes great Benefices, upon this Masse-Priest for the reward of his superfluous Oleum peccatorum.

Refut. p. 163, 164, 165. My third untruth (and that a grosse one) is, that I say many Bishops of Rome followed their Fathers in the Pontificall Chaire: whereas in this Chaffe of Gratian, he findes but one Sylverius Pope, son of Sylverius Bishop of Rome. And what if in his Chaffe he find but one, whiles I in my Corne-heap can find more? Did I tie my selfe in this clause only to Gratian? Was not Pope Iohn the Eleventh, or, in some accounts, the tenth, son to Pope Sergius? And is there no Chaire Pontificall but the Roman? Was not Theodorus Pope, son to Theodorus Bishop of Jerusalem? Felix the thrid, son to Bishop Valerius? Pope Adrian the Second, son to Bishop Taralus? His Platina can supply his Gratian in these.

Refut. p. 166. What have I to do with his quarrels about Hosius, Felix, Agapetus, Steven? They are their own; Let him wring Gratian by the eare, till I feele: And surely, the poore Canonist bleeds on all hands. Bellarmine, Baronius, Possevine, & this stout Beagle have every one a snatch at him; and he must be content to go away with this gash; (Wee are not bound to follow him as an infallible Writer, but may with free libertie reject him.) Yea, how merry doth my Refuter make himselfe with his despised Gratian? Like a Philistim he hath pulled out the eyes of this Sampson, & now makes sport with him, If Doway like it well, it shall not be displeasing to us. The man (as ill as he loves mariage) will needs make a match betwixt his Gratians Pope Steven, and his Pope Ioan, Iō Hymen! Was ever man so mad, to make himselfe pastime with his owne shame? Was the History of that their monstrous Papesse, of our making? Do not [n] the whole streame of their Writers of Chronicles, their own Bishops, Monks, Recluses, Registers record it openly to all posterity, without the contradiction of the next ages, yea of any, til this last? Let them take to themselves therefore, this fruitfull Successor in the infallible Chayre; she is their owne, they may dispose of her, where they list; and since my Refuter will find out a match for her out of the Chayre of exploration, why should not we dance at the wedding? Why do we not help him to a piece of an Epithalamium?

SECT. X.

I See, that whiles I follow this Wrangler by the foot, I am become inſenſibly tedious; the reſidue of his longſome Treatiſe is ſpent upon the Councell of Conſtantinople, Gregories charge, Iſidores rule, Hulderick, Hildebran, Dunſtan, and Anſelme, and the eſtate of our fore-fathers in the Engliſh Clergie. The diſcuſſion of all which, as not being eſſential to our buſineſſe, (except only the laſt) will admit more brevity of diſpatch. The vitall parts of our cauſe being ſecured, there will be leſſe danger in the remoter limbs, which yet if our Target guard not, our ſword ſhall. In all theſe, it ſhall be beſt to reduce his Cavils unto heads, that we may crop them with more ſpeed and eaſe; Only I muſt crave leave to dwell ſome while in the laſt.

Concerning the Councell of Conſtantinople (after ſome idle miſ-taken diſcourſe of the occaſion thereof, he inſiſts upon theſe foure points. Concil. 6. Conſt. in Trullo.

Firſt, That it was not generall: Secondly, Not the ſixt: Thirdly, Not peremptorily ours: Fourthly, Not by them defaced or torne out. Refut. p. 168. uſque ad 174.

Firſt, it is no truſting what a Roman Prieſt ſayes in choller of a Grecian Councell. The Greek Church is equally in their Books with ours; and this Councell, with the Synod of Dort. It is an eternal quarrell, which all the vaſſals of Rome have againſt this Councell, that it equalled the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, with the Romane: A crime that cannot be forgiven.

The invectives of our Popiſh Divines, eſpecially Pighius, [p] Bellarmine, Baronius, have made good that note of [q] Balſamon, Occidentales Epiſcopi, &c. The Weſterne Biſhops (ſaith he) that is, the Italian or Latine (Ab huius Synodi Canonibus opportunè icti) finding themſelves galled with the Canons of this Synod, have given it out not to be Generall: Thus he. And why was it not Generall? It had no forme of a Councell (ſaith my Refuter) No Legates of the Pope, no invitation of the Latin Biſhops, neither were any of the other Patriarkes preſent or conſenting. Every word a ſhameleſſe untruth. Baſilius Biſhop of Gortyna the Metropolis of Creete, (which was then under the Archbiſhop of Rome) and the Biſhop of Ravenna (ſaith Balſamon) were there to repreſent the Roman Church; The Biſhops of Theſſalonica, Sardinea, Heracles, Corinth, were there and then the Popes Legates. And for the Patriarks; Baſilius (ſaith the ſame Balſamon) Biſhop of Gortyna, which was preſent in the name of the Roman Church, is found to have ſubſcribed after the foure Patriarks; & certaine other Metropolitans: what can be more plaine? But S. Beda (ſaith C. E.) tels us, that Juſtinian the Yonger, commanded Sergius Biſhop of Rome to be caried to Conſtantinople, becauſe he would not ſubſcribe, huic erraticæ Synodo. Still miſtaking & ignorance. His Surius and Turrian could have taught him out of Theophanes, this was another a Pſeudo-Synod, which the ſame Iuſtinian had in his firſt government called in favour of the Monothelites; which was ſome yeares after the true Synod under Conſtantine the Bearded. This mans wit wanders with his erraticall Synod.

SECT. XI.

FOr the number of Sixt, wee need not be ſcrupulous; whether it were the fift, or ſixt, or both (as Balſamon cals it, πανδέκτην) or neither. It is enough for me that Gratian, Caranza, Eſpencæus, and other his own great Maſters call it familiarly both Sixt and Generall; In this I cannot but be ſafe enough. I grant, that (to ſpeake preciſely) the ſixt Synod under Conſtantine publiſhed no Canons, but afterwards many of the ſame Fathers which had formerly met in the ſixt Synod, and others to the number of 227. being called together by the then penitent and reſtored Iuſtinian, (μνήσεως) gathered gathered up, and ſet forth with univerſal conſent, the Canons formerly made, and by them re-enforced. But what need I trouble my ſelfe with any other anſwer to all theſe windie cavils of my Adverſarie, then that which Tharaſius himſelfe, the Patriarke of Conſtantinople, hath moſt fully given; [r] Quæ eſt hæc ignorantia, &c. What ignorance (ſaith he) is this, wherewith many men are tainted, about theſe Canons? For it is a ſcandall to doubt whether they were the Canons of the ſixt Synod. Let theſe men therefore know, that the ſixt Synod was gathered in the time of Conſtantine, againſt thoſe which aſcribe one onely action and will to Chriſt; The Fathers then condemning thoſe Hereticks, and confirming the Orthodoxe Faith about the fourteenth yeere of Conſtantine, returned home: After foure or five yeares, the ſame Fathers (being met under Juſtinian the ſon of Conſtantine) ſet forth the foreſaid Canons; Neither let any man doubt of this; For thoſe very ſame Fathers, which in the time of Conſtantine ſubſcribed, did alſo under Juſtinian ſubſigne this preſent Paper; which thing is evident enough by the unchangeable likeneſſe of their owne hands. So he. Whether therfore the computation of Tharaſius or Theophanes, be followed, we have what we deſire; The ſame acts are ſet forth, if not by altogether the ſame perſons, and [s] Gratians judgment is herein ours.

Sect. XII.

Refut. p. 175. uſq; ad 182.

For the third point. To prove that this Synod is not peremptorily for us; Hee urgeth divers other Canons of it, which in other things ſound againſt us. Then he ſhewes the inſtanced thirteenth Canon, not to be ſo abſolutely and fully ours, as is pretended.

First, where finds he this Law, that no man may alledge one teſtimony of a Father, or a Councell, but he muſt be tied to juſtifie all the reſt? Himſelfe would be the firſt that would ſhrinke at this condition. This challenge is unreaſonable, and might turn off all allegation. For example, If a man ſhould alledge the Nicene Councell, Canon 1. againſt any ſuperſtitious Foole that hath made himſelf a corporall Eunuch; might he ſtraight for his juſtification fly upon the laſt Canon of that Councell, unneceſſarily injoyning us to ſtand at our Sundaies Prayers. Or if a man ſhould cite the Synod of Laodicea againſt a Deacon (though a Cardinall) ſitting before a Prieſt, or againſt the worſhipping of Angels; were it meet to choke him with a returne of the laſt Canon of that Councell, forbidding the Apocryphall books; or the 37. Canon forbidding his Holineſſe to take ſo much as a Bible in his ſolemnity, from the hands of Jewes: If a man ſhall alledge a Teſtimony of Cyprian, were it fit to upbraid him with the error of re-baptization? Or if of Auguſtine, with the errour of the neceſſity of Infants communicating? This is clavum clavo. For mee, I have undertaken no ſuch taſke, to warrant them that once ſaid true, from ever erring: I doe therefore herein ſcorne my ſilly Refuters compaſſion, who is ſo farre from cruſhing me in this, that he hurts none but his own fiſts, in beating them about his own hard head. For, if the preſſing us with the authority of ſome of theſe Canons, be to juſtifie the reſt; then the 36. Canon of that Councell beares him and his Rome down before it, whiles it ſets Conſtantinople cheeke by jole with it, maugre. A point, which rather then they will yeeld, they wil be glad to abate us all the reſt: This we are ſure of, that the alledged Canon is peremptorily, fully, cautelouſly ours: For this, my credit is at the ſtake; which my Refuter pleaſes himſelf with the hope to impaire, inſulting in the idle fancy of a juſt advantage, whiles he ſhews the Canon to come ſhort in ſome points of our requiſition and practice; For there, Biſhops are excepted, and the freedome of Mariage after Ordination.

Reader, compare the Canon with the words of my ingagement, I undertooke thou ſhouldeſt finde no decree could be made more peremptory, more cautelous, more full and abſolute, for the lawfulneſſe of the Mariage of Eccleſiaſticall perſons.

For firſt; The Fathers profeſſe herein to croſſe the practice and Decree of the Roman Church. Secondly, they profeſſe the conjugall cohabitations of ſacred perſons to ſtand by the Apoſtolike Canons, and to be a ſincere, exquiſite, and orderly conſti-

A constitution. What could be ſaid more? They (thirdly) ratifie this libertie for ever. They (fourthly) give charge that no man by the cohabitation with his lawfull wife, be hindred frō aſcending to the higheſt degree of holy Orders. (Fiftly) that in the time of their Ordination, it be not ſo much as required of them, to abſtaine frō the lawfull cōpanying with their Wives; which were (ſay they) to offer injury to mariage ordained by God, and bleſſed by his preſence, and to croſſe him that ſaid, Thoſe whom God hath joyned together, let no man ſeparate; and, Mariage is honourable amongſt all, &c. (Sixtly) That if any man ſhall preſume ſo far, as to offer to debar any Prieſt, Deacon, or Subdeacon, from the conjunction and ſociety with his lawfull Wife, he ſhall be depoſed; Or if any Prieſt, or Deacon ſhall voluntarily caſt off his Wife, upon pretence of Religion, that he ſhall be ſuſpended, and, (if he go on) depoſed. Judge
B now whether herein my proteſtation have erred; Not that there can be no circumſtance deviſed, as of the extent of the perſons, or time, or manner, wherein curioſity might inlarge the ſcope of this libertie (ſo I never meant:) but if this one point (That the mariage of perſons Eccleſiaſticall is lawfull) can be more fully and warily ſet down, let me lye open to cenſure; if not, hate the vanity of this idle Mountebanke, and confeſſe with Ariſtophanes,

The Parliamentall law in the time of King Edward, was (I grant) more full in extending the liberty, could not be more full in avouching the lawfulneſſe of our Ma-
C riages. Where I muſt take leave to tell my Refuter, that the compariſon he preſumes to make of King Edwards Parliament, with the proceedings of Iacke Straw, Wat Tiler, &c. is, like himſelfe, ſedicious and traiterous. And what marvell if ſuch repiners blow out the foggie vaporous blaſt of ſeditious words, againſt our higheſt Court of Parliament, which ſome of their companions have attempted to blow up with a blaſt of fire? This Conſtitution was not civill onely, but Synodicall: And may not a lawfull Synod or Convocation, with the concurrence of the three States, and the ſway of Royall authority, make or re-eſtabliſh a Law agreeable to the Word of God, and the received practice of their Progenitors, but every Jack-ſawce of Rome ſhall thus odiouſly dare to controll and diſgrace it? One of his Capitoline gods of Rome called England his Aſſe; So it was, whiles it might beare nothing but his Etiam Aſinus meus recalcitrat?
D Trumperie, and go but where his Groomes would either leade, or drive it: now that it hath taken heart, and (with Cardinal Campegius his Sumpter) caſt off this baſe load; and hath happily over-runne his ſervitude; they are ready, with the Keeper of metamorphoſed Apuleius, to ſeeke a deſperate remedy from the next Tree.

SUch then is the Canon of Conſtantinople, which therefore (I ſaid) becauſe they cannot blemiſh enough, they have indignely torne out of the Councels: and here is much vehement and braving Rhetoricke, ſpent upon me as a ſhameleſſe Writer; and
E this paſſage as the groſeſt lye, that ever was publiſhed by Proteſtant, & now I am cōjured, How blemiſhed? how torne? what? where? how? when? Becauſe innocence is bold, the man will be bold, that he may ſeem innocent; but we ſhall well find that facing will not ſerve his turne. Is he ſo ignorant as not to know that all his great [t] Maſters diſcard this whole Coūcell as ſpurious? Doth he not know that it is (if not torn) yet left out in divers of their Editiōs of the Councels? Let him learn, if he know not; that their ancient collections of Canons, which was called Codex, or Corpus Canonum, which was in uſe in Leo the fourths time, mentioned by Gratian, diſt. 20. c. de libellis, and printed An. 1526. at Mentz, and re-printed at Paris, in octavo, Anno. 1609. omits it. The other Collection of Councels by Iſidorus Mercator, which began to be received about Charles the Great his time, wherein beſides the forged Decretall Epiſtles of divers Popes, are the Canons of many Provincicall Councels of Africke, France, Spaine, *Spaine,&c.*set forth by Iac.Merlin at Coleine 1530. and which hath beene usually received in the Westerne Church,in the times of the Schoolemen,who usually (as do also Ivo and Burchardus) alledge them, likewise omits it. The two Editions of the Councels by P.Crabbe, likewise omit it; and if it had not been for starke shame, so would the rest also. Doth he not know what his Anastatius and Nũbertus protest of some particular Canons;and this for one,[u] Hæc capitula omnino refutamus,and,nullatenùs recipiantur.And for this very particular Canon;If he know not, There is first an attempt of a double blemish to be cast upon it: The one,in that they read it so,as if the Roman Clergie professed quòd copulentur uxoribus non suis, as by way of scorne; whereas the words runne, se deinceps cum uxoribus suis non congressuros.

The other,in that some of their Authors would refer Sacrorũ virorum to Constitutiones,not to Nuptias;marring quite the sense of the Canon.This for the blemish.For the wiping out of this very Canon, & denying it place with the rest; let him heare his own [x] Espencæus,telling him,that even they w^ch allowed this Synod rejected by Pighius,& others,yet hanc Canonẽ duriter tractant,&c.Vse this Canon somewhat hardly, as altogether prophane,full of errour,insolence, immodestie, manifest falshood, Apocryphall, and most corrupted; and his ingenuity is faine to plead, in conclusion, Canonem hunc legitimũ esse,non gratis.sed necessario donemus;That they must(not upon controversie,but of necessity) yeeld this Canon for legitimate, not suppositicious. And what is this in my Detectors construction, but a cashiering of this Canon out of the Councels against the authority of Gratian,and the Greeke Copies? Lastly,the eyes of learned Chemnitius, are undoubted witnesses to us, what credit soever they find with this Italianate generation, In Tomis Conciliorum prorsus expunxerunt, & omiserunt hunc Canonem : [y] In the Tomes of the Councels they have altogether wip't out, and omitted this Canon. So as if wee had those blurred Copies which he saw bleeding from the hand of the Inquisitors,there could be no fence for this charge,but that which serves for al,impudent denials.

Neither needed my Refuter to take it so highly,that I objected to thẽ the tearing, blemishing,& defacing of this,and other Records against them;Ere long the world shall see,to the foule shame of these self-condemned Impostors, that in the writings both of ancient and later Authors,they have blotted out more than an hundred places(some of them containing above two sheets apiece) concerning this very point which we have in hand.

This is no news therefore;neither needed my Detector to make it so dainty.

I Cited from Gratian the free confession of Pope Steven the second,acknowledging the open liberty of Mariage to the Clergie of the Easterne Church,Matrimonio copulantur.A place truly irrefragable;My Refuter first excepts against the number,telling us that Steven the second lived but three or foure dayes at the most,& therefore he could not be the man;what spirit of Cavillatiõ possesses this Masse-Priest?He cannot but know that his own Sigebertus ascribes five yeares to this Steven,and Hermannus,six: But five is the least:And his Binius tels him that the Steven he speaks of (sitting but two dayes exclusively) [z] is by the most omitted in the Catalogue of the Romane Bishops: whence it is that the Chronicle names not two Sevens betwixt the first & the fourth.But this man(he saith)called no Councell;what is that to me?Gratian affirmes it, I do not. Let him fall out,for this,with his friends. And now according to the old wont,(after he hath tried to shift off Matrimonio copulantur,with the sleeveles evasion of a false glosse (i.utuntur) which Cajetan hath sufficiently confuted for us) he fals to a flat rejection of Gratian, and tels us out of Bellarmine, That Canon to be perhaps of no authority,but an error of the Collectors.Good God! what face have these men? That none of their received Authors can be produced against them, but they are straight counterfeit,and yet the very same,where they speak for them,canonicall?Their Clyents,if they might but know these tricks,would be ashamed of their Patrons.

That

That the Clergy not only of the East might Matrimonio copulari, but of the West also might Matrimonium contrahere (which are the words they are unwilling to know in their owne Canon Law) shew sufficiently that they not only were maried of old, but might marry; But for the Easterne Clergy, it is freely granted, by all ingenuous spirits; insomuch as Espencæus tels us, that never Author, either old or new, imputed this for a fault unto the Greeke Church, that their Clergy was maried. Refut. p. 204.

What shall we say then to this bold Bayard, that compares this toleration of Mariage in the Greeke Church with Moses permission of the Bill of Divorce unto the Iewes? As if Mariage had beene only tolerated, not allowed; as if unjust Divorce were a fit match for lawfull Wedlocke; while he here talkes of Duritia cordis, well may we talk of his Duritia frontis. It is true; every Church, every Countrey, hath their customes and Fashions; which Ioannes Maior pleades against Beda's Censure of the English & Scottish and Brittish observation of Easter, and may be as justly in this case pleaded for us. This was of old no lesse ours, than the Greekes; And if any Church will be prescribing against God, we have no such Custome, nor the Church of God; But what a ridiculous insinuation is it, that the Greek Priests are dispensed with by supreame authority Ecclesiasticall? Forsooth, by the Pope of Rome. Faine would I learne when, upon what termes, at what rate the Græcians purchased in the Court of Rome Dispensation for their Mariages. Refut. p. 206, 207.

I would my Refuter had the Office appointed him to shuffle over all the Records of the Apostolike Chamber, till he find such a grant made propter duritiem cordis; then should a great deale of good Paper escape the misery of being besmeared by his Pen.

What strange fantastike Dreames are put upon the World? Where the Papacy cannot prevaile, there forsooth his Holinesse dispenseth. The Greeke Church admitteth maried Priests, the Pope dispenseth with them; They deny and defie the Popes Supremacy; I trow he dispenseth with them for that too: and why not with the Church of England? We pay no Peter-pence, we run not to Romes-market to buy trash I hope his Holinesse dispenseth with us for these Peccadillo's; we take liberty here to marry rather than to burne, why should we not hope to receive that Dispensation, wherof we heard the newes of late from a poore Bankrupt Carier? Ad populũ phaleras Refut. p. 207, 208.

SECT. XV.

AS for the contradiction, which his sagacity findes (not without much scorne) in the two Parliamentall Lawes of the Father, and the Sonne, King Henry the Eight, and King Edward the sixt, whereof the one forbids, the other allowes the Mariage of Ecclesiastiques, it needed not have beene any wonder to a learned Priest, which might have knowne Councels enow, diametrally opposite to each other: what fault was it in the recovered blinde man, that he first saw men walke like Trees, and after like men? Even the best man may correct himselfe. Neither was there here any contradiction. King Henry spake with the Romane Church, (whose one halfe of him then was) King Edward spake with the Scriptures, and purer antiquity: King Henry never said, God disallowed these Mariages; King Edward never said, they were allowed by the Romish Church. Refut. p. 209. usq; ad 214.

And why may not we draw out the like absurditie out of Queene Maries Parliaments; wherein she reversed many things established by King Edward, as in this very case concerning Mariage of Priests? May not we hereupon aske, What will you say to such Parliaments wherein the Brother is thwarted by the Sister, & that with the consent of the most of the same Parliament-men enacting in a few yeares contrarily?

Or as if it were any newes with Popes rescindere acta prædecessorum; even of those which immediately preceded them. Who knowes not the Story of Pope Formosus, and Stephanus, and the many and strong contradictions of decrees in the frequent, long and desperate Schismes of the Romish Church.

This lash is indifferently fit for all backs; let him that hath no cause to smart, complaine.

Refut.p.212. What needed this foule mouth then to breake forth into so papable slanders of that holy Archbishop and Martyr Doctor Cranmer, charging him with deep dissimulation, in soothing up both these Kings in their contrary Decrees? When it is most manifest, that this Worthy Metropolitan was the onely man, which durst for three dayes together openly in Parliament oppose those wickedly projected Articles of King Henry; and this, in speciall. Insomuch, as he was willed out of the house, till the act might passe; which (notwithstanding he well knew King Henry) he stoutly refused. Would this man (thinke we) care to bely all the Saints in Heaven for an advantage? What will not he dare to say, that will object inconstancie to him who sealed Gods truth with his blood?

Refut.p.216.218 The contradictions and weakenesses that he findes in this Synod of Constantinople doe no whit move us; If he can allow and commend, & cite against us the seven and thirtieth Canon of the councell, for the worship of the Crosse, or the fourescore and fifteenth for the holy Chrisme, and yet disallow the thirteenth, why may not we by the same Law cite and approve the thirteenth Canon against them, and yet disavow those others?

Sect. XVI.

Refut.p.220. NEither was it for want that I mentioned onely this Councell of Constantinople; The more ancient constitutions of Ancyra and Gangra; and the first and fourth of Toledo, besides the Apostolicall and Nicene, might have been urged by mee. It was not mine intent (with this babler) to say more than all; but onely to take an handfull out of the Sacks mouth for a taste to the buyer; That faire flourish therefore of Councels which he musters up against me herein, will be but, Arma armis contraria: Wherin since my Refuter will needs make himselfe so busie, let me intreat him by the way to compare the Councell of [a] Gangra, with the Decree of his Pope Hildebrand; The Councell sayes flatly, Si quis discernit Presbyterum conjugatum, &c. If any man make difference of a maried Priest, so as that by occasion of his mariage he ought not to offer, and doth therefore abstaine from his oblation, let him be accursed. But his Hildebrand, uxoratos Sacerdotes à divino removit officio, & laicis missam eorum audire interdixit; novo exemplo, &c. That is, removed maried Priests from their divine office, and forbad Lay men to heare their Masses, saith [b] Sigebert; Therefore by the sentence of the Councell, Pope Hildebrand is accursed; And accursed for that very point which made him a Romish Saint: When my Refuter hath gnawed awhile upon this bone, he may hope to be rewarded with a crust.

Refut.p.225. And now for his Councels, to make up the number, he names for the fore-man of the Quest, the Councell of Ancyra (somewhat before the Nicene) one who hath passed a direct verdict against him, allowing Deacons, upon their profession, to marry. The miserable evasions of his [c] Binius, and Baronius, in this point, argue both a minde and a cause desperate; whiles (without all colour of warrant) they imperiously turne downe these maried Deacons to a lay-communion, and faine this liberty onely in a forced Ordination, not in a voluntary.

Refut.p.225. As for that first Canon which he citeth of the Councell of Arles, That a man cannot be made Priest in the band of Wedlocke, unlesse he promise conversion, It is a grosse counterfeit: And that the world may see wee use not to passe these censures without evident reason; It mentions the Arrians which were not yet hatched; It mentions Bonosus, which lived long after in the time of Innocent 1. It mentions the Concilium Vasense, which was yet later, in the time of Leo the first. When his authors can agree of the time, and make good the Synode, hee shall receive an answer to it: In the meane time, it was either before the Councell of Nice, or after it; if before, it

A it was corrected by the Nicene; a Provinciall must yeeld to a Generall; if after, it was presumptuous, in decreeing that peremptorily which the Generall determinately left free.

The Councell of Araustica is cited by him in direct termes opposite to the Ancyran. He must make them friends, ere he can bring it forth against an enemie. As for the maine stay of this cause of his, which is the two Councels of Africk, lent him by his Bellarmine, it is grounded (as our learned Iunius hath probably answered) upon meere corruption, and mis-taking; the Latine Copies taking propria, for priora: The charge of the Councell being only, that Deacons, Priests, Bishops, (κατὰ τὸν ἴδιον ὅρον) according to their turnes of ministration, should abstaine from their Wives, which no modest Divine will not willingly subscribe unto. However, I am sure, if the one word B be not corrupted, the other is ambiguous, and may as well signifie Balsamons ἐπιπλέον. And if these Canons were first Latine, and after translated into the Greeke; yet the Greeke shewes what was the first Latine, and may well correct the mistaken Originall. But to discusse the severall Councels, which he only thinkes fit to name, and utter by whole-sale against us, were a worke for a volume apart. The old word is Dolosus versatur in generalibus; There is deceit in generalities; It were easie to shew that some of these are impertinent; others plainly against them; others corrupted to speak against us, as that of Mentz and Wormes, whereof in the sequell; others partiall to the faction of Rome. So then, here, Obruimur numero, He thinkes to carry it by number, not by weight; where with us, one piece of Gold is worth a whole bagge of Counters. But, if after the Tyrannicall impositions of his Siricius and Innocentius tooke place in C the Church, he could name for every one of his Provinciall Synods, an hundred, it were all one to us; we are not the worse, his cause no whit the better. This Tradition, after that in an emulation of the Montanistical vaunt of Virginitie, it had gotten head in the Church, ranne like fire in a traine; Those Provinces that held correspondence at Rome, according to the charge of [d]Gregory, spake as shee did prompt them: What should they doe but follow their Mistresse? The Greek Church, and those that either had dependance upon it, or which had continued in the succession of this custome of mariage, still maintaining the lawfulnesse and use of it inviolable. So then, in summe. This he hath gained, which I am ready ever to avow; The ancientest Coūcels are against him; The later are against us; and God with us against them; of which we have learned [e] to say, Væ vobis filii desertores, ut faceretis Concilium & non ex me. D And if his Mistris of Rome have else-where found vassals, it followes not, that we may not be free. Yea, it is more than manifest, by those evidences we have already produced from their owne records, that notwithstanding this cogged number of his provinciall Synods, and Private decrees (as Volusian termes them) all the time of the first seven hundred yeares, the freedome of this practice continued in many parts of the Christian world; In so much as amongst the rest, the Church of Armenia, for the time of the yeares mentioned, upheld a Tradition, [f] not to admit of any Clergy-man, but those which descended ex genere Sacerdotali, descended from Priests; Witnesse the Fathers of Constantinople, in their three and thirtieth Canon. Where my Detector should doe well to enquire what Balsamons Clerici Chryso-bullati meanes; Sure I am, that this example sufficiently prooves the practical liberty of those Churches in the E questioned limits of the seven first Centuries. To which wee may adde the Church of Bulgaria, out of his [g] Gratian; The Church of Germany out of [h] Aventine; The Church of Ireland out of [i] Bernard, who confesses the Episcopall See of Armach to have been furnished with a lineall descent of Bishops, for eight generations, before the time of his Malachias; which were still both uxorati & literati. How those men were Bishops, and yet sine ordinibus, is a Riddle which (I confesse) I cannot aread. Perhaps, they were without Romane Orders, but if they were not Clerkes after the then Irish fashion, what needed they be Literati, that they might be Bishops? The Church of our Brittaine (as we shall see in the Processe) and others. These are more than enough to let the World see this restraint, for all this pretence of Provinciall and partial Councels never universally obtained.

Refut. p.235. YEt the man having unmercifully cruſht me in peeces with this emptie bladder of windy and worthleſſe authority, crowes over me, thus, in concluſion: And truly to me he ſeemeth not to be more mad, than blinde; for otherwiſe he would never have proclaimed this freedome of ſeven hundred yeares, ſeeing the very forme of words uſed by his owne ſacred Councell, doth ſo ſtrongly withſtand his fond collection; For therein it is decreed, Qui ſunt in ſacris, &c. We will that the mariages of ſuch as be in holy Orders, from this time forward be firme and valid: For in caſe this freedome had been common before, why did they ſay, Deinceps, from this time forward? Thus he. Wherein I would his ſuperiours did but ſee how kindly he buffets himſelfe. For if this be the force of Deinceps or A modo, I thus argue againſt him; He hath pleaded before, that neither this nor any other Church ever allowed, nor ever practiſed the celebration of mariage after Ordination; Now, if he turne to the ſixth Canon of this Councell of Conſtantinople, he ſhall finde Decernimus ut nulli deinceps hypodiacono, &c. We decree that from hence forward no Sub-Deacon, Deacon, or Prieſt may marry after his Ordination; Therefore by the force of his inference before this time (for almoſt ſeven hundred yeares) this was commonly practiſed. And now to anſwer my Refuters Deinceps: If his wit had been any way matchable with his malice, he might have ſeene that this Deinceps had relation to the Romane Church, not to the Greeke; For, (if he know not) this Synod meant to preſcribe Lawes to his Miſtreſſe, and to correct that their injurious Tradition of reſtraint, and to enlarge this liberty thorow all the Territories of the Univerſall Church; For this purpoſe is the Deinceps of the Conſtantinopolitane Fathers, who well knew, how much it needed in the Weſterne Church, which had inthralled their Clergy in the bondage of that unlawfull prohibition. So as the Refuter, whiles hee playes upon my want of Logick, in not deſcrying the dangerous neceſſity of this inference upon me, plainly bewrayes his owne want of braines, in not deſcrying the folly of his objection; and where he tels me (like a dull Jeſter) That all the Walls and Windowes, from the Hall to the Kitchin, may mourne to ſee an Vniverſitie-man have ſo little wit; I muſt tell him that all the Doores of Doway may leape off their hinges, to ſee their Champion ſo childiſhly abſurd.

From this time forward.

Refut. p.236.

Refut p.237. Now then to anſwer his idle Epilogue; if it appeare that his owne Pope and Canoniſt, and the received Hiſtories of the Church, and the examples of ſeverall Nations and perſons acknowledge this ancient liberty both in the Eaſterne and (ſome) Weſterne Churches de facto; And Moſes and the Prophets, Chriſt and his Apoſtles, the ancient Councels, with the ſixt of Conſtantinople, approve it de iure; it followes that the neceſſary impoſition of profeſſed continencie, is but a part of that ſowre milke wherewith the Shee-Wolfe of the Seven-hils feeds the faction of her Romuliſts and Rhemiſts, and none of that wholeſome ſuſtenance which God and his purer Church have provided for their Children.

SECT. I.

THe Mariage of Eccleſiaſtiques, which had the commō allowance of the firſt Times, had in ſome parts but the cō nivence of the ſubſequent, & the prohibition of the laſt. Thoſe Churches that were not parties to the faction of Rome, could not but be much moved with ſo perēptory a Decree of a famous Councell, reducing them, in this point, to the exactneſſe of Apoſtolique inſtitution, and profeſſing to rectifie that Roman deviation; No marvell therefore, if not long after, there enſued a colliſion of oppoſite parts, & much ſcuffling betwixt the abettors of Antichriſtian ſervitude, & Evangelical liberty; whom this Hedge-creeper dare term incontinent Grecians, Schiſmatiques, Hereticks; his Pen is no ſlander: The multitude of his Synods, wherein was ſuch reiteration of the ſame Law, ſhewes the oppoſition which it ſtill found in the Church, and the prevailing uſe of the contrary practice. Refut. p. 245.

The Epiſtle of Pope Gregory the Third, to the Clergie of Bavaria, which gives that diſjunct charge, Of either living chaſtely, or marying a Wife whom they may not divorce, is no where (forſooth) extant, becauſe he findes it not in his Binius or Baronius; as if no water had gone beſide their Mill; and here I am threatned with the Cornelian Law for forgery; no leſſe crime: To avoid the perill whereof, let my farre ſeen Detector turne to the Bavarian Annals of * Aventine, in the third Booke, there he ſhall finde it; An Epiſtle ſent to Vivilus, and the other Clergie of Bavaria, by the hands of Martinian, George, Dorotheus, a Biſhop, Prieſt, Deacon, with this expreſſe diſjunction, Aut caſtè vivat, aut uxorem ducat, &c. That which he brings from the ſucceſſor of this Gregory, Zacharias, ſhewes what his Pope wiſhed, when he had gotten better footing in Germany but the ſucceſſe makes for us; for B. Boniface either never durſt, or at leaſt never did urge theſe rules to his Germans. So, I hope, his mouth is ſtopt for my forged Teſtimony of his Gregory, which could not in his cōceit be other, becauſe he never ſaw it peepe forth before this in other mens bookes. Ywis nothing ever lookt out of the Preſſe, that eſcaped that bookiſh eye: witnes the next paſſage, which if his Superiours could have had the leiſure to have viewed, they had bluſhed at their Champiō. This charge of Gregory (I ſaid) was according to that rule of Clerkes cited frō Iſidore, & renued in the Councell of Mentz; but by our juggling adverſaries clipped in the recitall: Here the man cryes Refut. p. 243.  Avent. Boiorum Annal. l. 3.* Refut. p. 244. Refut. p. 245.

cryes out, as before of forgery, ſo now of ignorance, telling his Readers, that I have only taken this upon truſt from anothers note-booke. Reader, by this judge of the ſpirit of my Detractor. It is true; Iſidore wrote no booke of this title: but in the ſecond Booke of his Eccleſiaſticall Offices, he makes the title of his ſecond Chapter, De Regulis Clericorum; Of the Rules of Clerkes. From this Chapter, I cite a confeſſed paſſage, and am thus cenſured; whereas the Councell of Mentz cites it by this very ſtile, Sicut in Regula Clericorum dictum eſt, As it is ſaid in the Rule of Clerkes. Is it ſimplicitie that he knowes not this title of Iſidore? or malicioufneſſe, that he conceales it? One of them is unavoidable. It is cleere then, to his ſhame (if he have any) that the teſtimony is aright cited; and is it leſſe cleere that it is maimed, & cut off by the hams in their Moguntine Councell? Compare the places, the fraud ſhall be manifeſt. That Councell in the tenth Chapter profeſſes to tranſcribe (verbatim) the words of Iſidore in the forecited Tract; and where Iſidore ſaith, Caſtimoniam inviolati corporis perpetuo conſervare ſtudeant, aut certe unius matrimonii vinculo fœderentur; Let them live chaſte or marry but one; Their good Clerkes have utterly left out the latter clauſe, and make Iſidore charge his Clerkes with perpetuall continencie; Let them live chaſte. He that denies this, let him deny that there is a Sun in the Heaven, or light in that Sunne; what need I ſay more? Let the bookes ſpeake.

Conc. Mogunt. 1.

Here my Refuter doth ſo ſhuffle and cut, that any man may ſee he ſpeakes againſt his owne heart; for (to omit his ſtrained mis-interpretation of Iſidore, ſince we now contend not of the ſenſe, but of the citation) how poorely doth he ſalve up the credit of his Moguntine Fathers, whiles he ſaith, Iſidore ſpake in generall, the Fathers in that Councell more ſtrictly; when hee that hath but one halfe of an eye may ſee, that both ſpeake in one latitude of the ſame perſons? Thoſe Fathers giving the ſame title to that Chapter, and profeſſing to follow the Letters and Syllables of Iſidore; both name only Clericos in that rule, without diſtinction. Away then with this graceleſſe facing of wilful frauds in your faithleſſe Secretaries, which have alſo fetcht two Canons out of Carthage to Wormes, and learne to be aſhamed of your groſſe falſifications, and injurious expurgations; elſe doubtleſſe the World will be aſhamed of you.

Sect. II.

I Did but name Huldericus his Epiſtle in mine, as a witneſſe, not as the foundation of my cauſe; my Refuter ſpends but one and thirty whole Pages upon him: how elſe ſhould he have made a Volume? In all this what ſayes he? Little in many words; and the ſame words thrice over for failing.

Refut. p. 252. to 282.

And firſt he wonders at my extreame prodigality of credit, & fearedneſſe of conſcience; in citing an Epiſtle ſo convicted by Bellarmine, Baronius, Eckius, Faber, Fitz-Simons the Jeſuit, and others. Why doth he not wonder that the Moone wil keep her pace in the ſkie, whiles ſo many Dogs barke at her below? When theſe Proctors of Rome have ſaid their worſt, there is more true authority in the very face of this Letter, & better Argumēts in the body of it, than in an hūdred Decretal Epiſtles which he adoreth. Let the World wonder rather at his ſhameleſnes, who relating the occaſion of this fable (as he termes it) faines it to be only a Lutheran fiction to cover their inceſtuous mariages, whereas their owne Cardinall Æneas Sylvius, almoſt two hundred yeares ago, mentions it, & reports the argument of it; whereas it is yet extant (as Illyricus) in the Libraries of Germany; whereas Hedio found an ancient copy of it in Holland; & our Iohn Bale, Archbiſhop Parker, B. Iewel, Iohn Fox, had a copy of it remarkable for reverend Antiquitie, in aged Parchment here in England; which, I hope to have the meanes to produce. Wheras, laſtly, the very ſtile importeth age. As wel may he queſtion all the Records of their Vatican, all report of Hiſtories, all Hiſtories of Times: He that would doubt whether ſuch an Epiſtle were written, may as wel doubt whether Pope Zachary wrote to B. Boniface in Germany a directiō when to eat bacon: may doubt whether Paul the fift wrote to his Engliſh Catholikes to perſwade them not to ſweare they would be good ſubjects: may doubt whether Spider-catcher, corner-

A ner-creeper C.E. Pseudo-Catholike Priest, wrote a scurrilous Letter of above two quire of paper, in a twelve-yeares answer to three leaves of I.H. It is not more sure that there is a Rome, or that Gregory and Nicolas sate there, than that such an Epistle was written thither above seven hundred yeares agoe. It was extant of old, before ever those Lutheran quarrels were hatched. Let him therefore goe fish for Frogs in the Pond of his Gregory, whiles he derives thence the vaine pleas of improbalitie. If there were differences in relating the circumstances of that story (as I know none) must it needs thereupon be false? Which of their Histories is not lyable to variety of report? To begin with the first: The succession of Linus, and Cletus, and Clemens, is diversly reported; is there no truth in it? To end with the last: The title of Paul the fift to the chaire of Peter in the lawfulnesse of his Election, is diversly reported; hath hee
B therefore no true claime to his seat? But who ever placed Gregories pond in Sicily? This is one of the fittens of his Fitz-Simons. If other authors have mentioned this narration, then all the strength of this History lyeth not on Hulderick; If none besides him, his words vary not; These are but trickes to out-face truth.

The Epistle, in spight of contradiction, is so ancient; and what care wee then for names? Whether it were Saint Vdalrick, or Hulderick, or Volusianus, wee labour not much. Let it be the taske of idle Criticks to dispute who was Hecuba's mother, and what was her age; No lesse vain is my Refuter, that spends many waste words about his Saint Vdalrick, in shewing the difference of time, betwixt him, and Pope Nicolas; the one dying, Anno 869. the other being borne, 890. and proving out of his obscure Sorboniſt Monchiacenus, that there were five Bishops of Ausburge, betwixt the times of
C the one, and the other: whereby a simple Reader might easily be deluded, & drawne to thinke, there is nothing but impossibility and untruth in our report: whereas there is nothing in all this peremptory and colourable flourish of his, but meere cogging or misprision: For both Illyricus apart, and the Centuriſts, & Chemnitius (all Germanes that should be best acquainted with the state of their own) have long since told him, that his Saint Vdalrick was not the man, whom they held the Author of this Epistle, but, Hulderick, another, not much different in name, but differing in time, above seventy yeares; Ne nominis æquivocatio lectorem turbet, and left the equivocation of the name (saith Chemnitius) should trouble the Reader; There is another Vdalrick of Augusta, whom Aventine writes to have died Anno 973. But this Hulderick, Æneas Sylvius writes to have died, Anno 900. and in the yeare of his age 83. Thus he: from the authority of two
D their famousest Historians: from whose account Onuphrius differs not much: But (that my Refuter may hereafter save the labour of scanning their discordant Computations) whether it were either, or neither of them, it is not worth to us one haire of his crowne: since with our faithfull and learned Fox, we rather from the authority of ancient English Copies, ascribe it to Volusianus, whose second Epistle also in the same stile, to the same purpose, is extant from the same Records, not inferiour to the former: What matters it for the name, when it appeares that the Epistle it selfe is truly ancient, ponderous, reverend, Theologicall, convictive: and such as the best Romanes heads cannot after seven hundred yeares shape a just answer unto? Even in some Canonical Books, though there be difference in the names of the Pen-men, there is full assent to their divine authority: And why is it not so in humane? Thus then we have
E easily blowne away these light bubbles of Discourse, which our Adversary hath raised out of the Nut-shell of his computation; from the Age, Person, Writings, of his Saint Vdalrick; and returne his impuram nescio cujus nebulonis Epistolam; with his ferrei oris, and plumbei cordis, backe whence it came; to the Writer cited by my Adversary, not named: But by better due to the next hand; whereto I am no whit beholding for leaving it un-englished: In that C.E. spared not me but himselfe: who is nescio quis, but he that leapeth into the Presse without a name? Who Nebulo, rather than he that maskеth and marcheth sub nebula, hoping to passe in the conflict for a doughty Knight or Champion Sconoscinto, not daring to lift up his Bever? Who writes impuram Epistolam, but he that hath scribbled a Voluminous Epistle, to cry downe pure and Honourable Mariage, for the inhauncing of impure Celibate? not that, in Thesi, Celibate is impure, but in Hypothesi theirs, forced and hypocriticall.

Chem. hist. de Celibatu.

Act. & Mon. p. 1055.

Sect. III.

AS for the difference that he findes in our number of Pope Nicolas, whether first, or second, or third, we may thanke his Gratian; whose fashion it is (as likewise Sigeberts) to name the Popes without the note of their number; we are sure it was not Nicolas Nemo, which wrote to Odo, Bishop of Vienna, reproving him for giving leave to Alvericus a Deacon to marry: thereupon sending his contrary Decree to the Germane Churches; which it seemes, (or the like imposition) gave occasion to this noble Epistle.

But can there be any Game amongst our English Popish Pamphleters, where the Fox is not in chase? Where is the shame of this Roman Priest, whiles he so manifestly belyes our holy, reverēd, worthy Master Fox, whom this Scoganly Pen dare say playes the Goose in the inconstancy of his Relation of this Nicolas, first reporting him the first, then the second; when it is most manifest in the during Monuments of that industrious and excellent Author, that he stil insists upon Nicolas the second; rejecting by many arguments, the opinion of them which have referred it to the first? Such truth there is in shorne crownes.

Iohn Husse was a Goose by name, and now Iohn Fox is a Goose by reproach; Two such Geese are more worth than all the fawning Curres of the Romane Capitoll.

And how much more wit than fidelity is there in my Detector, whiles he would prove that Pope Gregory had then no pond; becausе there are now no pōds at Rome? As if Rome were now in any thing as it was; as if twelve hundred yeares had made no alteration; As if the streets of Troy were not now Champaine; As if his Lipsius could now finde Rome in Rome: As if lastly, that man were uncapable of a large pond, whose Sea is universall.

Nunc seges est ubi Troja fuit.

As for the number of childrens heads, I can say no more for it, than he can against it; this History shall be more worth to us than his deniall; But this I dare say, that I know persons both of credit and honour, that saw betwixt fifty and threescore, cast up out of the little Mote of an Abbey where I now live: Let who list cast up the proportion.

Vid. quæ supra, l. 1. S. 12. Histor. Radulphi Bourn, &c.

After the refusall of this worthy Epistle, according to his fashion he tryes to disgrace it with us; telling us, that therein the Bishop of Rome is stiled Supreame Head and Governour of the whole Church. If it were thus, so much more powerfull is the Testimony against them, by how much more the witnesse was theirs. There must needs be much cause, when he that so humbly over-titles the person, resists the Doctrine so vehemently. But the truth is, that the Epistle stiles Pope Nicolas no otherwise in the superscription, than Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ provisorem: Over-seer of the holy Romane Church. And in the body of the letter, Summæ sedis Pontificem; Bishop of the chiefe See; to whom the examination of the common affaires of the Church doth appertaine; which is far other, than in the now Romane sense, the Supreame head of the Church. Secondly, he tels us that this Epistle both grants and allowes a Vow of Continency: Nullum excipit nisi professorem continentiæ; wherein wee are no other than friends; wee yeeld no lesse, where there is good evidence of the gift and calling of God. But whiles our Volusian grants the professor of continency bound, and pleades the Clergy to be free, how plainly doth he shew us that there was no such Vow, then required of, no such made by the Clergie.

He excepts none, but a professor of Continence.

But what needs the man to be so furiously angry with the good old Epistler, for saying, that the Apostles charge (Let every one have his own Wife) is generall to all; reaching to the Clergie as well as the Laity? excepting none but those which have the gift of Continency. What Logick, (the want whereof he sometimes causlesly objecteth to me) ever taught him that ἕκας & unusquisque was any other then universall? Or what other sense can be put upon the words of the Apostle? Could I as truly upbraid Sir Refuter with reading the Logick Lesson, as he doth mee with the Rhetorick, surely I should not now be put to paines to teach this Novice, that ἕκας & (unusquisque)

Pag. 272.

Every one.

A quiſque) is a terme of collective univerſalitie, and muſt be extended to all, where kinde is excepted tacitely, ex naturarei, as this caſe muſt needs be acknowledged to be; fore-prizing none but ſuch as have the gift of Continencie; which S. Paul toucheth upon, in that Chapter.

Judge then, Reader, whether the Catholike Biſhop that wrote this, or the Miſ-Catholike Maſſe-Prieſt that reproves it, be more worthy of Bedleem.

SECT. IV.

B LAſtly yet, as if in the looſe he would ſhake hands and be friends with him, whom he had ſo long defied; he thus cloſes up: Then if Prieſts have this gift, and have prefixed this courſe to themſelves in the Lord, they ſhall not need to marry. And this is the caſe of all Clergy-men who vow Chaſtitie. Thus he. Beleeve him, Readers, if ye can: All the Romiſh Clergie, all Votaries have the gift of Continencie; Witneſſe our foreſaid Voluſianus in the ſame Period; Multos ejuſdem conſilii aſſentatores hominibus non Deo pro falſa ſpecie continentiæ placere volentes, graviora vides committere, patrum ſcilicet uxores ſubagitare, maſculorum ac pecudum amplexus non abhorrere. I will not Engliſh it for ſhame: Would God the World did not too well finde ſtill theſe proofes of Romiſh Chaſtitie. Refut. p. 273.

Nunc etiam Romæ quidlibet audet Amor.

C But as one that thinks no man can be his friend, except alſo he be our enemy; like a true Make-bate, he will tell us a tale in our eare, that ſhall ſet a perpetuall jarre betwixt us and our Hulderick. Iwis, ſayes my Refuter, your Vdalrick is not the man you take him for; For thus he there writes to the Pope, Wherefore, O reverend Father, it ſhall be your part to cauſe and over-ſee, that whoſoever either with hand or mouth hath made a Vow of Continencie (as all Clergy men in holy Orders have) and afterwards would forſake the ſame, ſhould be either compelled to keep his Vow, or elſe by lawfull authority ſhould be depoſed from his order. So he. But we are not ſo light of beleefe to loſe a friend thus eaſily. Know then, Reader, that the *Parentheſis (which is the harſheſt peece of this clauſe) is foiſted into the Text, and forged by this Caviller; the quite contrary whereof is affirmed in the former Period of our Vdalrick, where thus he writes: Non parum quippe, &c. From this holy diſcretion thou haſt not a little ſwarved, when as thou wouldſt have thoſe Clergie men, whom thou oughteſt only to adviſe to Abſtinence from Mariage, compelled unto it by a certaine imperious violence; For is not this juſtly in the judgement of all wiſe men to be accounted violence, when as againſt the Evangelicall Inſtitution, and the charge of the Holy Ghoſt, any man is conſtrained to the execution of private Decrees? The Lord in the old Law appointed Mariage to his Prieſt which he is never read afterwards to have forbidden; So he. Let my Refuter then reconcile this falſe Parentheſis with the true Text, (which he can never doe, ſince it directly croſſeth the whole ſcope of Huldericks Epiſtle) and then he ſhall ſee us eaſily reconcile Huldericks propoſition with ours. Propert. Refut. p. 274. * (As all Clergie men in holy Orders have.)

D But, not ſo long to delay my Readers ſatisfaction; the truth is; The Author pleads for an indifferent immunity of Clergy men from the neceſſity of this Vow, elſe the Epiſtle were contradictory to it ſelfe: for if he ſuppoſe that all the Clergy had vowed, and all that had vowed ſhould be compelled to keepe their Vow, how could hee plead that the Clergy ſhould not be compelled to Continẽce? The drift of Vdalrick or Voluſian, then, is, that it may be equally lawfull, equally free for Prieſts either to vow, or not to vow continency; which granted, if any one having liberty not to have vowed, or obſerved it, ſhall notwithſtanding prefixe this courſe to himſelfe in the Lord, out of a long ſetled experience and aſſurance of this calling and gift of God, & now when he hath thus ingaged himſelfe to the expectation of the Church, voluerit apoſtare, ſhall be froward wantonly to abandon this vow, willingly neglecting all good meanes for the continued obſervation thereof, ſuch a one ſhall be liable either to compulſion, or depoſition; As now, if any one of ours ſhould in the midſt of freedome binde himſelfe by a voluntary vow, it were pity and ſhame that hee ſhould play faſt and looſe at pleaſure with impunity. Præfixit hoc ſibi in Domino, ibid.

What

What Wooll then is here worthy of this cry? Or wherein hath our Author offended us? whiles we neither make this vow, nor can therefore ever breake it, nor ever allowed the breakers of so made vowes, guiltlesse? A Refut. p. 276. One quarrell yet he cannot remit to Master Fox and me; that for this fore-named Hulderick, we cite Æneas Silvius in his Germania; a booke that never was.

This great helluo librorum hath wearied all Libraries, and consulted with his Tritemius and Possevine; neither of them mention any such work of Æneas Silvius; whereas, if he had but taken the booke next the doore, Gesners Bibliotheca, he had found (if at least he could have seene the Wood for Trees) Silvius his Germania; which (for failing) he might have heard of in a double Edition; The one larger, the other more contracted. The first, Gesner expresses thus, Extat ejusdem Germania, qua continentur gravamina nationis Germanicæ, & confutatio eorundem; cum replica. The latter is, Æneæ Sylvii Germania excerpta, &c. The Germania of Æneas Sylvius gathered out of that book, wherein the grievances of the Germane nation objected to the See of Rome, by Martine Mere a Lawyer of Mentz, are refelled. B

There is extant the same Authors Germania, wherein are contained the grievances of the German-nation, and a confutation of the same with a reply.

See now, Reader, whether my Refuter can blush. In the one of these, which (after deniall) he confesseth to have seene, he findes somewhat that likes him not. Sylvius speaking of Ausburge, Sanctus Vdalricus huic præsidet (saith he) qui Papam arguit de Concubinis; Vdalrick is the Saint of that Citie, who reproved the Pope concerning Concubines. The bone lyes before him, let him picke out the marrow as he can; which because he findes hard to breake, he casts it from him in a chafe, and tels us for the Last refuge; He hath seene a printed Copie, and two manuscripts without these words. In verbo Sacerdotis. And so just have we found him of his word, all this while, that he were hard-hearted that would not beleeve him. C

Sect. V.

Refut. p. 280. But still I am taken tardy in my time, or rather doe over-take. I reckon this Liberty to have continued in Germany after Hulderick, for some two hundred yeares; Whereas betwixt S. Vdalricke and Gregory the seventh, were but a hundred and twelve yeares.

But still his Saint deceives him, and (if I should have erred) his owne Chronologers should have deceived me. For his Onuphrius in his Eccleſiasticall Chronicle, makes our Hulderick Bishop of Aspurge in the beginning of Pope Nicolas, Anno 859. And his Sigebert & other Chroniclers cast Gregory the seventh his oppositiō to Priests mariage, upon the yeare 1074. Where now is my errour? Where is my over-reaching? Count it, Reader, and see whether I cannot make my word good & give him fifteen yeares into the bargaine: & now judge whether of us may say, Non sat commodè divisa sunt temporibus tibi, Dave, hæc; and whether of us it is, from whom nothing commeth, savouring of any learning or truth: and if thou thinkst it fit, blush for him. D

Refut. p. 281. The like (I feare) willing errour upon the same ground is the mis-calculation of the times of Leo the ninth, and Nicolas the second, betwixt whose times, and Vdalrick he makes but fifty yeares; abating one other halfe of the hundred, to expose mee to the laughter of his Credulous Clients, which may now say, Loe the man which in a reckoning of 200. yeares did out-lash but 150. When as both their Sigebert and Hermannus Contractus, (and who not?) make Leo the ninth, Pope, An. 1049, and Nicolas the second some ten yeares after him; The very elder whereof, if we reckon to Hulderick, An. 859. will be in no lesse than 190. yeares distance. The man wanted either counters, or wit, or honesty; Truth I am sure he wants. E

Sect. VI.

Refut. p. 283. Antichrist, which was conceived in the Primitive times, saw the light in Boniface the third, and was growne to his stature and ἀκμὴν in Gregory the seventh. So as I might

A might well say, that the body of Antichristianisme, together with the prohibition of mariage, began to be complete in that Hildebrand. The times accord better than our Papists would have them. After a thousand yeares Satan was loosed: at that very time did this Hildebrand (otherwise Gregory) by the instigation of the Devill (as himselfe confessed at his death (witnesse Cardinall Benno and Sigebert) trouble the Church; belike with the violent obtrusion of this doctrine of Devils (prohibition of mariage) and insolent detrusion of imperiall authority. It is then but a Sardonian laughter that my Refuter takes up at our complete Antichrist; whose supparasitation may one day cost him teares and gnashing.

But (good God!) what Saints hath the Romane Church? Hildebrand is one of their Calender; the Legend of whose holinesse shall anon make any man save C. E.

B ashamed.

Since it will be no better; Perge mentiri; I am now charged with a faire contradiction, whiles I am accused to say, That the liberty of Priests mariages was universall for a thousand yeares, and yet had before granted, that in Steven the second his time (which was two hundred and forty yeares before) the Westerne Clergy was restrained. In all which hee perswades his friends that I would faine lye grossely, if my memory would let mee. Reader, doe but review my words. These they are: After him (that is, Hulderick) so strongly did he plead and so happily, that for two hundred yeares more, this freedome still blessed those parts. I speake of Germany, he of Italy: I speak of those parts, he of all. Is not this a Logicall and faithfull refutation? Yet more, this bold and false hand dares write, that Leo the ninth, and Nicolas the second, never medled with the prohibition of

C these mariages; Onely the one made a decree against Harlots, the other against Concubines: neither of which (he hopes) we will apply to our selves. We are so used to these Impudent assertions, that now we cease to wonder at them. Let him tell me what was that Epistle which Leo the ninth wrote to Peter the Hermite? Whose very title is Incontinentiam Clericorum detestatur, & puniendam describit. The Epistle is bitter, like my Libellers. And lest he should say we guiltily take to our selves the imputation of Incõtinencie, it is bent against quadrimodam carnalis contagionis pollutionem: a foure-fold pollution of Clergy-men: Whereof one he will not sure deny to be mariage.

Let him tell me what was done under Leo in the Councell of Mentz (about the yeare 1049) of which Adam Bremensis (who was there present) writes, Simoniaca hæresis & nefanda Sacerdotum conjugia holographa Synodi manu perpetuo damnata est. That is

D [a] The heresie of Symony, and the wicked mariages of Priests, by the consent of the Synod was condemned. Is this Nothing done by his Leo, the Leo rugiens of that time.

As for his Nicolas the second; good man, he did nothing neither: Onely he stayned women as honest as himselfe, with the name of Concubines, & men more holy than himselfe, with the name of Nicolaitans, (whom hee must needs love for the name sake) and an estate of life, as holy as his owne, with the name of Filthy copulation. Let his Popes shamefull decrees, and his shameless lyes, goe both together for company whence they came.

YEt still the further we goe, the worse. My Refuter surpasses himselfe in the prizes that he playes for his Pope Gregory the seventh, who first (he saith) did not ruine this liberty of mariages: Let Vincentius, and Radulphus de Diceto and Sigebert speake for us both; [b] Vxoratos Sacerdotes à divino, &c. He removed maried Priests from their function, and forbad the people to heare their Masses; a new example, and as many thought inconsiderately prejudiciall, against the judgement of the holy Fathers, &c. But hee fully prevailed not (saith my Refuter.) What thanke is that to him? he did his best, and kindled those coales that could never yet be quenched. He led the way to his Vrban the second, and Paschal the second. They followed him, and prevailed; The broyles were his; if not the victory. Gratum opus scortatoribus (saith Aventine.) Aventine (saith my Refuter) a late Gospelling brother. For us, we are glad of the fraternity of so worthy an an Author, whom Beatus Rhenanus gratulates to his Germany, & cals [c] Eruditiſſimum Aventinum, and [d] Variarum cognitione diſciplinarum præſtantem; and Eraſmus, [e] Hominem ſtudio indefatigabili, ac reconditæ lectionis. Laſtly, whom his juſt Epitaph ſtiles, [f] Rerum antiquarum indagatorem ſagaciſſimum: But the truth is; no man by his Hiſtory can tell his Religion: The Canons of Auguſta praiſe him for the light he gives to the inſtitutions of their Monaſteries; And when he ſpeakes of the Shrines of Berg, Valentia and Halle, I am ſure he mentions them with too Popiſh devotion; & when of Io. Huſſe and Ierome of Prage, he taxes them with crimen irreligioſitatis; Yet this man (borne An. 1466.) when he but ſpeakes a famous truth of Hildebrand, and the German Clergie, he is become a late Goſpelling brother. Still let us have Brethren that care more for their honeſty, than their faction.

Neither yet (to give the Devill his due) doe we thinke ſo ill of thoſe enemies of maried chaſtity, that they did purpoſely enact Lawes of unmaried looſeneſſe: but that all abominable filthines did follow upon the reſtraint of lawfull remedies, who ſees not? [g] Sigebert himſelfe (their owne Monk) freely acknowledges it. Iohn Haywood our old Epigrammatiſt told Queen Mary, her Clergy was ſawcy: if they had not Wives they would have Lemans. Where there is not the gift of holy continency, how could it be otherwiſe? Where the water is dammed up, & yet the ſtreame runs full, how can it chooſe but riſe over the banks? There is purity therefore out of Wedlock, but not out of Continence. And what needed my detector to travell ſo farre as England, for an example of incontinencie in a King Henry, or any wife of his, whether falſely or truly objected, when hee might have looked neerer the centre of their Church, and have found his owne Pope Iohn (in the very time now queſtioned for this prohibition) [h] killed by the Devill in the act of adultery with another mans wife? Hildebrand (as I learned of Aventine) is as much as Titio amoris. But how little he differed in name or nature from Hellebrand, Titio infernalis (as Chemnitius cals him) his Hiſtory ſhewes too well. And is it poſſible that any man ſhould riſe up after ſo many hundred yeares, to Canonize Saint Hildebrand, even in that for which he condemned himſelfe? My Reader muſt know the man a little from the witneſſe of his owne Conclave, his Cardinall Benno, Arch-prieſt of the Romane Church, then living: Others, beſides, tell of his beginnings in wicked Necromancy, and murderous underminings, and tyrannical ſwaying of the Keyes, ere he had them: Benno tels how he got them, how he uſed them gotten. He got them by fraud, mony, violence; uſed them with tyranny. There was a knot, & a ſucceſſion of Necromancers in thoſe dayes. Gerbertus, which was Sylveſter the ſecond, was the Maſter of the Schoole: His chiefe Schollers in the Blacke Art, were Theophilactus (afterwards changed into Pope Benedict) and Laurentius, and Gratianus. Theſe were the Tutors of Hildebrands younger times, of whom he learned both Magicke and Policie. It is a world to ſee what work theſe Magicians made (like the ill ſpirits they raiſed) in Church & Commonwealth, oppoſing Emperours, ſetting up what Popes they pleaſed, poiſoning whom they diſliked: at laſt it came to Hildebrands turne to take the Chaire: [i] To which purpoſe he ſeparated firſt the Biſhops from the Cardinals averſe from him: when he had done, he compelled them by terrour and force to ſweare unto his part; which done, he was elected in ſpight of the Canons, only by Lay-perſons, by Souldiers; he expelled the Cardinals, raſhly excommunicated the Emperour, of his owne head, without any Canonical accuſation, without ſubſcription of any Cardinall; hired a bloody Villaine to murder the Emperor; conſulted with the Oracle of his breaden God, which becauſe it anſwered not, he caſt it into the fire; he exerciſed moſt horrible cruelties upon many, hanging up men at his pleaſure unconvicted; in a word, quantis hæreſibus mundum corruperit, &c? ſaith Benno in his concluſion, His hereſies, his perjuries, can ſcarce be deſcribed by many Pens; Clamat tamen altius, &c. But the Chriſtian blood ſhed by his inſtigation and command, (ſaith he) cries yet louder to God; yea, the blood of the Church, which the ſword of his tongue in a miſerable prodition hath ſhed, cries out againſt him; for which i Benno Cardin. vita Hildebr.

A which things, the Church did most justly depart from all communion with him. Thus Benno; who yet (to make amends) [k] tels us that Hildebrand upon his death-bed repented of these lewd courses, and sent to the Emperour and the Church to cry them mercy: confessing (as Sigebert reports) that he had by the perswasion of the Devill raised these wicked tumults.

Yet this is the man whom Bellarmine will justifie by seven and twenty Authors, and C.E. can adde two more to the heape; yea, in those very things for which he condemned himselfe.

Reader, if one of his evill spirits should have stept into Peters chaire, doe ye think he could have wanted Proctors? But how good an account we were like to have of seven and twenty Authors (if it would requite the cost to examine them) appeares,

B in that [l] Lambertus Schafnaburgensis (which is cited for the man that magnifies the miracles of this Gregory) sayes only this one word of him, that he wrought many prodigies. And what prodigies these were, Benno the Cardinal tels us, that he raised Devils familiarly; that he shaked sparkes of fire out of his sleeve by his Magick. A tricke that well beseemed an Hellebrand, who set all the world on fire by his wicked impetuosity. We will not envy Rome this Saint, let them enjoy him, let them celebrate him, and cry downe Henry the Emperour, and all that opposed him. Still may such as these be the Tutelar gods of that holy Citie; For us, it is comfort enough to us, that our mariages had such a persecutor.

That the Churches did hereupon ring of him for Antichrist, Aventine is my Author: Pro concione, &c. In their Sermons (saith he) they did curse Hildebrand, they cryed out

C on him as a man transported with hatred and ambition, Antichristum esse prædicant, They declared him to be Antichrist; They said that under the colourable title of Christ, hee did the service of Antichrist; That he sits in Babylon in the Temple of God, and is advanced above all that is called God. So he. And little better is that which his [m] Schafnaburgensis (so much extolled by C.E.) recordeth: Adversus hoc decretum infremuit tota factio Clericorum, &c. Against this Decree (saith he) all the whole faction of Clergy-men fretted and mutined; accusing him as an Heretik, and a man of perverse opinion, who forgetting the word of Christ which said All men cannot receive this, did by a violent exaction compell men to live in the fashion of Angels.

To which if I should adde the sentence of the Synod of Wormes, & that of Brixia my Reader would easily see, that it is not the applause of some devoted Pen, that can

D free him from these foule imputations of deserved infamie.

That untruth then cleared, another belike hangs upō the score; My refuter charges me with falshood, in saying, That Gregory the seventh was deposed by the French and German Bishops. Only the Germans (he saith) were Actors in that Tragedie. But if not at Wormes, yet let him tell me what was done at Brixia, & by whom: Quamobrem Italiæ, Germaniæ, Galliæ Pontifices, &c. Wherefore (saith Aventinus) the Bishops of Italy, Germany, and France, the seventh of the Kalends of July, met at Brixia in Bavaria, and sentenced Hildebrand to have spoken and done against Christian piety, &c. and condemned him of Heresie, Impietie, Sacriledge, &c. And that my Refuter may finde himselfe answered at once to the last of his Cavils, wherein he pleads that this deposition was not so much as pretended for the inhibition of these mariages, but for other causes, let him see the Copy

E of the judgement passed against him in the said Councell; wherein, after the accusation of his Simoniacall climbing into the Chaire (the vice which he pretended most to persecute in others) his forcible possession, his heresie, his machinations against the Emperor, his perverting of the Lawes both of God and Men, his false doctrines, sacriledges, perjuries, lyes, murders, by him suborned and commended, his tyranny, his setting of discord betwixt Brethren, Friends, Cousins; It followes; Inter conjuges divortia facit; suavis homo sacerdotes qui uxores habent legitimos sacrificos esse pernegat; interim tamen scortatores, adulteros, incestuosos aris admovet, &c. He causes divorces betwixt Man & Wife; The fine man denies those Priests, which have lawfull Wives, to be Priests at all; in the meane time he admits to the Altar whore-mongers, adulterers, incestuous persons, &c. Nos ergo. We therefore by the authority of Almighty God, pronounce him deposed from his Popedome. Thus Aventine specifies the Decree; which alone without Commentary, without in-

FRom foraine parts, I returne at last to our owne; so I feare hath C. E. done long since; lurking some-where in Englād for no good. These Fugitives love not home more, than their home hath cause to hate them. His cavils of the wondrous contradiction betwixt my Margin and my Text, are too childish to be honoured with an answer. My Text was; The bickerings of our English Clergie with their Dunstans, about this time are memorable. My Margin cites Henry of Huntingdon, affirming Anselme to be the first that forbad Mariage: Betwixt these two, saith my Refuter, was an hundred yeares difference. I grant it: But (had my words been thus) if my Detector were not disposed to seek a knot in a Rush, he had easily noted that in a generall survay of all Ages, the phrase (About that time) admits much latitude, & will easily stretch without any straine to one whole Century of yeares. Had the Quotation been as he pleadeth, this answer were sufficient. But my words need no such reconciliation; I stand to the censure, and disclaime the mercy of any Reader: For that citation of Anselme hath plaine reference to the following words, Our Histories testifie how late, how repiningly our Clergie stooped under this yoke: it is for this that my Margin points to Henry Huntingdon, and Fabian, reporting Anselme the first man that prohibited these mariages. What contradiction now can his acuteneſſe detect in these two? The English Clergy had bickerings with their Dunstans; and stooped late and repiningly to this yoke under Anselme. See, Reader, and admire the equall Truth and Logick of a Catholike Priest, and judge how well he bestoweth his Pages.

* Oswald and Ethelwold.
a Gul. Malmesb. Ft. Legend, &c.

IT is true, Dunstan was the man who first with his other * two Cousins & partners in canonization, opposed any appendance of the maried Clergy; Hee wrought it with good King Edgar, by dreames, and visions, and miracles. He, who when the Devill came to tēpt him to lust, a caught him by the nose with an hot paire of Tongs, & made him rore out for mercy, supposed that every Clergy-man had the same Irons in the fire; & therefore blew the coales to that good King of the dislike of these Clerical mariages; & with the same breath inkindled the zeale of Monkery. The Church wherein I am now interessed, and wherein I doe (by the providence of God, and the bounty of my gratious Master) succeed their Saint Oswalds Priors, yeelds me sufficient records hereof; which because they are both worthy of publike light, & give no small light to the businesse in hand, I have thought good here to insert.

* The names of the Founders of the Church of Worcester. In the time of King Ethelred was Worcester made an Episcopall see; Boſel was the first bishop. The 17 was Saint Oswald; in whose time King Edgar gave, &c. And by the mediation of Saint Oswald was this Cathedrall Church translated frō maried Clerks unto Monks.

* Nomina Fundatorum Ecclesiæ Wigornienſis, Tempore Ethelredi Regis, &c. —— constituta est sedes Episcopalis Wigorn: Boſel Episcopus primus —— Septimusdecimus, Sanctus Oſwaldus, tempore cujus Edgarus Rex dedit —— Mediante vero Beato Oſwaldo, à Clericis in Monachos translata est sedes Pontificalis honoris.

Then followes the Charter of King Edgar founding the Monkes with this Title, Carta Regis Eadgari, de Oswaldeslaw.

In the end dated thus, Facta ſunt hæc An. Dominicæ Nativitatis D.CCCC.LXIIII. Indictione VIII. Regni Eadgari Anglorum Regis, 6. in Regia urbe quæ ab incolis Glouceaſtre nominatur, in Natale Domini. In Engliſh thus.

C BY the bountifull mercy of Almighty God, which is King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, I Edgar King of England; and of all the Kings of the Ilands of the Ocean lying about Brittaine, and of all the Nations that are included within it, Emperor and Lord; doe give thankes to Almighty God my King, which hath inlarged my Empire, and exalted it above the Kingdome of my Fathers.——

Wherefore I alſo having devoted my ſelfe to exalt the glory and praiſe of Chriſt in my Kingdome, and to enlarge his ſervice, have intended, & by my faithfull Welwillers Dunſtan Archbiſhop, Athelwold and Oſwald Biſhops, (whom I have choſen for my ſpirituall Fathers, and Counſellors) I have for the greateſt part already performed what I intended, &c.——

And by the diligent indevours of my fore-ſaid Helpers, I have now conſtituted and made ſeven and forty Monaſteries with Monkes and Nunnes; and if Chriſt ſhall

D give me to live ſo long, I have decreed to draw forth the Oblation of this my devout Munificence unto God, to the full number of fifty, which is the number of my remiſſion. * Whereupon, now for the preſent, I doe by my Royall Authority confirme to perſons of Monaſticall Religion, and by the conſent and aſtipulation of my Princes and Peeres, doe eſtabliſh and conſigne to them, that Monaſtery which the fore-ſaid reverend Biſhop Oſwald, (to the honour of the bleſſed Mother of God) hath amplified in the Epiſcopall See of Wereceaſtre, and expelling the wanton and filthy lasciviouſneſſe of Clerkes, hath, by my conſent and favour, beſtowed it upon the religious ſervants of God, the Monks; ſo as from henceforth it ſhall not be lawfull for the ſaid Clerkes, to challenge any thing therein, as thoſe which have rather choſen (with the danger of their Order, and the loſſe of their Eccleſiaſticall * Benefice) to ſtick unto

E their wives, then chaſtely and canonically to ſerve God. And therefore all that ever they poſſeſſed of the ſaid Church, whether Eccleſiaſticall or Secular, moveable, or unmoveable, together with the Church it ſelfe, I doe from this day forward for ever, give and conſigne to the ſaid Monkes, to bee poſſeſſed of them in the right of my Royall Munificence; ſo firmely, that it ſhall not be lawfull for any Prince or any Biſhop ſucceeding to ſubſtract ought from them, or to withdraw any of the premiſſes from their power, and to deliver it back againe to the right and poſſeſſion of Clerks, ſo long as the Chriſtian Faith ſhall remaine in England, &c.——

Facta ſunt hæc, &c. Theſe things were done in the yeare of Chriſts Nativity, D.CCCC.LXIIII. Indiction VIII. In the ſixt yeare of the Raigne of Edgar King of England; in the Royall City, which by the Inhabitants is named Glouceaſtre, in the Feaſt of the Nativity of our Lord; &c.——

* So as it appeares, this number was ſet to King Edgar by Dunſtan for his penance.

* That is, their Prebend.

That Dunſtan did this, none ever doubted; but withall it is conſiderable, who himſelfe was; an Abbot; and therefore partiall to the Cloyſters; and who put him into this Commiſſion; Pope Iohn the thirteenth: a Monſter of men, yea, of Popes; one who (as was articled againſt him in a generall Councell) had committed Inceſt with two of his owne ſiſters, who called to the Devill for his help at Dice; who defloured Virgins, who lay with Stephana his Fathers Concubine, who dranke to the Devill, beſides many other horrible criminations; A man fit to ſet a Saint on worke againſt lawfull Mariages. And thirdly, what the ſtate of the Times were, wherein libertie was degenerate into ſtrange licentiouſneſſe; Even change of Wives (if wee may beleeve Hiſtories) was then no wonder; For the correcting whereof, the Reformers (according to the Philoſophers advice) laboured towards the other extreame; as thoſe which to ſtraighten a ſticke, bow it as much the contrary way. And laſtly, how far this act and endeavour extended: for Dunſtan ſought not to thruſt maried men out of the Clergy, but to thruſt* maried Clergy-men out of the Cathedrall Churches, which required a quotidian attendance, which is evident both by the ſentence of Dunſtan (Aut Canonice vivendum, aut ab Eccleſia exeundum) either that they muſt live Canonically, or get out of the Church; that is, Ex Eccleſiis majoribus, as Hiſtorians relate it; And by the ſentence of the Rood for Dunſtan: Mutaretis non bene: How much difference there was in theſe two, appeares in the Decree of Biſhop Lanfranc, Anſelm's Predeceſſor, which tolerating maried Seculars, drives directly againſt maried Canons. Little needed my Refuter then (but that he muſt have ſomething to ſay) to fall upon our right Reverend and learned Biſhop of Hereford (whoſe worthy labours have juſtly indeared him to all Poſterity) for that true compariſon he makes betwixt theſe three Saints of theirs, and Anſelme: They by action, hee by Synodicall Decree perſecuted the Clergy: They bent their endeavours againſt Cathedrall Clerkes, he againſt Prieſts; Their project was particular, his univerſall.

* Expulit malos Presbyteros, introduxit pejores Monachos. Polyd. From the greater Churches.

Refut. p. 321.

Refut. p. 319. That a peremptory ſentẽce paſſed generally againſt the mariage of Eccleſiaſtiques in a publique Synod under Dunſtan, he refers us to Binius, which at randome talkes of Concilium Anglicanum: without all particulars of place, or perſons, and refers us to Surius, as if he had bidden us aſke his Fellow if hee lye: Why did hee not ſend us to Father Parſons, or his Gabriel Gifford? Sure, it was in ſome obſcure hole of the Peake, or ſome blinde Dormitorie of a Covent; neither can we ſay of it with the Apoſtle, Theſe things were not done in a Corner; The Canons, whereto the fore-alledged Charter, and the ſentence of Dunſtan have reference, were no other than Romiſh, which theſe Monkiſh Prelates had perſwaded King Edgar to receive, and in part to urge upon his maried prebendaries. The ſucceſſe of his Synod at Reading, or Wincheſter he knowes well enough: And is he aſhamed of the miraculous ſentence of his Holy-Rood (which Iornalenſis reports) who there openly ſpake for the Monkes againſt the Clergy? Abſit ut hoc fiat; that he paſſes over to that of Calne, where the falling of an over-charged floore, cruſhed the Mariage of Clergy-men. Idle Monks who for their owne turne ſet ſuch a ſuperſtitious gloſſe upon that accident, which (as Henry Huntingdon* more probably interprets it) was Signũ excelſi Dei, quod proditione & interfectione Regis ſui ab amore Dei caſuri eſſent, & à diverſis gentibus digna contritione conterendi: A ſigne from the High God, that by their Treaſon and Murder of their King (who was ſlaine in the yeare after) they ſhould fall from the favour of God, and be worthily cruſhed by other Nations. Thus he. Such was the event; For the conſtruction of it the Reader may chuſe, whether he will beleeve an Archdeacon of Huntingdon, or a Monk of Malmesbury. Ywis theſe rotten joyſts are foundation enough whereon to build the prohibition of our Mariages.

Sect. XI.

Refut. p. 332. VNder theſe late Romiſh Saints, Dunſtan and Anſelme, I might ſafely ſay, our Engliſh Clergy found the firſt machinations againſt their Mariage, & at laſt ſtooped perforce to this yoke of conſtrained continencie. Neither doth my wit or my Logicke faile

A faile me in this collection. If these were the men that made the first opposition to the mariage of Clergymen in England, then it formerly obtained here, without contradiction. The bare word of my Refuter, is a hot-shot to batter this necessary illation; and to assure the Reader that the forced Celibate of the English Clergy is of greater Antiquity than these his Saints; To wch he addes (in an ignorāt begging of the questiō) A thing so filthy, after a solemne vow to God, to take a wife; as it never appeared without the brand of infamy. As if our predecessors in the English Clergy had been ever charged with a vow; As if the solemnity of this vow had never had beginning? Chimericall fancies fit for a shorn head. [q] When as his Master Harding could not produce so much as a probabilitie of any vow anciently required, or undertaken; whether by beck, or Dieu gard. When as the ancient Saxon Pontificall makes not the least mention of any such pro-

B fession; yea, when Girardus (who was the second Bishop of York after the conquest) writes flatly to Anselme concerning his owne Canons, Professiones verò mihi penitus abnegant Canonici, &c My Canons (saith he) utterly deny to give me profession of continency, which without this profession have beene disorderly advanced to holy Orders; Cum verò ad ordines aliquos invito, dura service renituntur, ne in ordinando castitatem profiteantur, And when I doe invite any to take Orders, they doe resist me very stubbornly, that they will make no profession of Chastity in their Ordination. Thus he. Shewing us plainly that the Clergy in those times challenged no other thā the liberty of their Predecessors. But wel may he face us down in this more obscure (though certaine) truth, when he dares to say that Greece never tolerated this estate in their Clergie, till by bad life it fell to Schisme, and from Schisme to open Heresie; whiles their owne Canon Law (be-

C sides all Histories) give him the lye; and what [r] Espencæus hath ingenuously spoken concerning this point, we have formerly shewed. If he did not presume upon Readers that never saw Books, he durst not be thus impudent.

This argument therefore shall ever stand good, and shal scornfully trample upon all his vaine cavills; Ethelwold was the first, which by the command of King Edgar expelled maried Priests, out of [s] the old erection of Winchester; Anno 963. Dunstan and Oswald together with him were the men, who (two yeares after) first expelled maried Clergie-men out of the greater houses of Mercelande; 1177. in the dayes of King Henry the Second, the secular Prebendaries of Waltham, were first turned out, to give way to their Irregulars; therefore untill these times, these places were interruptedly possessed by maried Clergie-men. If now he shal except; that this pos-

D session of theirs was not of long continuance, but upon usurpatiō; whereby the maried Incumbents had injuriously incroached upon the right of Monks; our Monks of Worceſter shall herein fully convince him; who write under their Oswaldus Archiepiscopus; Per me fundatus fuit ex clericis monachatus, That is, By me were Monks first founded out of Clerks; Which was also the fashion of all other erections of this nature; so as it is manifest, that originally these Churches were founded in maried Clergie-men; afterwards wrongfully translated, frō them to Monks; And if the first possessors had been [t] Monks, how could Monks have beene there first founded by Oswald, when as Ethelred had long before both founded, and furnished it? and how out of Clerkes, if Monks had been there before? Let my Refuter shew me but a Verse of equall antiquity in a contrary rime,

E Per me fundatus fuit ex Monachis Clericatus.

And I yeeld him my argument: Otherwise let the world judge, if he be not shamelesly obstinate in not yeelding.

therefore doubtles they ſaid nothing for theſelves; and if they urged other proofes, which are not now deſcended to us by any relation, why not this for one? Who can but hiſſe out ſo ſilly ſophiſtry? But to ſtop that clamorous mouth in this poore cavil; doth not his owne [u] Monke of Malmesbury tell him, that the Clergie urged this plea for themſelves, Ingens eſſe & miſerabile dedecus, ut novus advena veteres colonos migrare compelleret, &c. That it was a great and miſerable ſhame, that theſe upſtarts the Monks ſhould thruſt out the ancient poſſeſſors of thoſe places; that this was neither pleaſing to God, which had given them that long-continued habitation, nor yet to any good man, who might juſtly feare the ſame hard meaſure which was offered to them: Thus they, whoſe plea and complaint ſeemed ſo juſt, that Alfgina the Queene, Prince Alfere, and others of the Nobility, overthrew many of thoſe new-founded Monaſteries, and re-inſtalled the Prieſts in their former right.

His next proofe is from the Letters of Pope Gregory, which he wrote to Auſtin the Monke here in England. Riſum teneatis? Did ever any man doubt, but that Pope Gregory was deſirous to eſtabliſh Romiſh Laws, and orders, amongſt the Engliſh. Where yet his Legate found many as good Chriſtians as himſelfe under another rule, conforme to the Greek Church? But how followes this? This Pope was willing to inromanize the Engliſh; therefore the ſtaffe ſtands in the corner: And yet even Pope Gregory allowed mariage to thoſe of the [x] Engliſh Clergie, which were not within the higher Orders; appointing them to receive their ſtipends apart; a favour which he ſaw neceſſarily to be yeelded to our Nation, whiles he abridged others.

From Gregory, he deſcends to Beda, a man doubtles venerable for his learning, and vertue; but (as it is in his Epitaph) Monachorum nobile ſydus. Whether a neighbour at leaſt to Italy, by birth (as they contend) I am ſure a Diſciple of Abbot Benedict, and ſo great a fautor of the Roman faction, that he cenſures S. Aidanus and Colmannus, for adhering to thoſe Greek forms, which the Churches of this Iland had anciently followed; whoſe part Ioannes Major juſtly takes againſt him. This Beda in a general ſpeculation ſpeakes his conceit of the voluntary continency which he holds requiſite in the Prieſthood; ſaies nothing of the particular cuſtome of the Engliſh Clergy; rather in divers paſſages inſinuating the contrary. Amongſt the reſt, he tels us that in the [y] Synod holden by Archbiſhop Theodorus, and other Biſhops (at Hereford) in the third yeare of King Egfride, (which was about An. 673.) their tenth and laſt Canon was pro conjugiis; ut nulli liceat niſi legitimum habere connubium; For Mariages; That no man ſhould marry unlawfully, no man ſhould commit inceſt, no man ſhould leave his owne Wife, unleſſe (as the Goſpell teacheth) for fornication onely, &c. I know my Refuter will plead the univerſality of this Canon, and wil contend, that a law generally made for all Chriſtians, is not without injury reſtrained to Eccleſiaſtiques; But let my Reader well conſider both the Prologue and Epilogue of that Synod, he ſhall ſee, that they who are required to keep theſe Laws, are Conſacerdotes omnes; and that whoſoever ſhall violate them, Noverit ſe ab omni officio Sacerdotali & noſtra ſocietate ſeparatum; Muſt know himſelfe ſeparate from all ſacerdotall office and ſociety, ſo as it will neceſſarily follow, that this Law did (at leaſt) concerne the Clergie with others, though not apart; Neither is there any other of thoſe Canons, which concernes not the Clergie onely; except the firſt, concerning the obſervation of Eaſter, which principally alſo belonged to them. Whereto it makes not a little, that in the Book of Saxon-Canons ſet out for the governing of the ſecular Prieſts, the rule is, Let them alſo do their indevour, that they hold with perpetuall diligence their chaſtity, in an unſpotted body, or elſe let them be coupled with the bond of one Matrimony. Words, wherein our Clergie meant to regulate themſelves (as it ſeemes) by the holy preſcript of Iſidore, whereof we have ſpoken. Laſtly, my Adverſary cannot deny, that this Synod gives order for many accidentall matters, concerning the Clergie, for their fixed ſtation, for their maintenance, &c. but except in this Canon, there is no one word of their ſtate of life; neither is there in all thoſe Canons, one ſyllable of this pretended Celibate, as that, which the cõtrary receaved cuſtome of our Church would never have endured; my Reſuter dares not ſay that theſe mariages were ſo quite out of uſe, that it was needles to ordaine ought againſt them; he knows that his Dunſtan found here this courſe ſo inveterate, that the very age and deep rooting of it hindred his deſignes.

FRom Bede he comes downe to his three premiſed Saints, Dunſtan, Oſwald, and Ethelwold; and, to make ſure worke, cites an obſcure [z] Scholler of Ethelwold, for an authentique Witneſſe againſt eight honeſt Prieſts, and the lawfulneſſe of all Prieſts mariages. And laſtly, he makes up the mouth of his diſcourſe with the full Decree of Archbiſhop Anſelme Richard in the Synods of London: and why not King Henries ſix Articles? and why not the Councell of Trent? Sic concluſum eſt contra hæreticos; Now, becauſe his heart told him, how light theſe proofes were, he layes in the ſcales with them certaine grave ponderations, which all put together, will prove almoſt as waighty as the Feather he wrote withall.

The firſt is, That there cannot be a greater nationall proofe, then to have the Biſhops, and the King, and his Nobilitie to define, and deliver this point with ioynt conſent. Take this, Reader, of King Edward the ſixt, and his Parliament, and convocation, and all is well. King Edgars Utopicall decree was hatcht in a Monks Cowle, and to his two King Henries, he might have added Philip and Mary. And why might not we oppoſe King Edmund to Edgar, & Oſulphus his Biſhop to Dunſtan? And the Clergie before Anſelme to the Clergie after him? This match were made with ſome indifferencie: But how idly hath my Refuter miſlaid the compariſon betwixt Henry of Huntingdon, and Fabian on our part, and all the Clergy and Laity of theirs? Since thoſe two Authors (if we had no more) report only de facto, that Prieſts mariages were not before forbidden; and the cited Clergie and Laity do now thus late-ward diſcuſſe de jure; Neither have the Clergy and Laity by him alledged, ever contradicted that which Huntingdon and Fabian have out of the courſe of all Story affirmed; Unto which, let me adde [a] Polydore Virgil, ſeconding this their aſſertion, who plainly tels us, that for 970. yeares, the reſtraint of mariage was never in uſe amongſt the Engliſh Clergie. Search not for this, Reader, in the later editions, leſt thou complaine of loſt labour; Poore Polydore may cry out of his grave with that other Polydore in Virgil: Fas omne abrumpit, Polydorum obtruncat. Let him then (to anſwer this vaine challenge) produce but any one author of equall authority to any of theſe, which doth avouch the contrary to that which theſe three have thus confidently delivered, and I ſhall confeſſe my ſelfe herein ſufficiently anſwered; In the meane time, let him, and the world know, that all the ancient Clergie, and Laity of this Iland, was for this liberty, altogether ours: Whereto if he yeild not, let him name the man, before his Dunſtan, that ever in this Ile opened his mouth againſt it; Til then, the Reader cannot but ſee, that whereas our proofe is, Ex ore duorum, aut trium, his ſide is mute, that for our Something, he can ſhew Nothing at all; and that our Huntingdon, Fabian, and Polydore, are better then C. E. and his man in the Moone.

SECT. XIIII.

HIs ſecond Ponderation of the ſanctity of the perſons, is no truer avoir-de-pois. That B. Dunſtan was an holy man, we may eaſily grant; but taken from the Covent of Glaſtenbury. Neither would the Nobility of his time be ſo liberall as to yeeld this; who accuſed him to the King, de libidinibus & præſtigiis; for (two remarkable qualities in his Saintſhip) lechery & ſorcery, whereupō he was caſt out frō the Court; & that he was received againe, he might thanke the Kings horſe, whoſe ſudden ſtop on the verge of a ſteep down-fall, reſtored Dunſtan to the good opinion of the ſuperſtitious Prince; who yet was ſo far from being guilty of this deliverance, that he did not ſo much as know of the danger; an acquitall at leaſt as cauſleſſe as the accuſation.

That Biſhop Anſelme was devout and learned, we willingly grant, but withal an Italian, & takē from a Norman * Covent; he was holy, but how impetuouſly addicted to his own will; and how refractary to authority, I had rather Hiſtories ſhould ſpeak than my ſelf. Neither is it any wonder if both theſe Prelates (how holy ſoever) favored

To King Athelſtan, who firſt brought him from his Cell.

* The Clergy of England did ſo well approve theſe Monkiſh Archbiſhops, that after Anſelme, and Radulph, the Biſhops of the Land became Suiters to the King, that they might never have any Archbiſhop of Canterb. choſen from the Monkiſh profeſſion. Sax. Chron. Ann. 1123.

red ſomewhat too ſtrong of the Cloiſters,& of Rome.Something muſt be yeelded to times and places;wee will not thinke but a well-meant zeale caried them into theſe reſolutiõs;but a zeale miſguided with the ſway of the times.The name of Saints,the truth of their ſanctity did not priviledge them from errors; wee know how to ſever their chaffe from their wheat,and to ſend one of them to the winds,the other to the granary. As for the maried Clergie, That they were ever accounted the ſcumme and refuſe of their Order,it is but the ſcurrilous ſcummy blurre of an intemperate pen;what was Spiridion? what was Hilary? what were both Gregories? what was Sidonius? what was Tertullian, Proſper, Simplicius, Euſtychius? In a word, what were all thoſe whom his Damaſus recounteth?what was the father of the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, whõ within two leaves he recordeth(from his Epitaph)for [t] the ſtar of the Clergy. This ſcum is better than their broth: which though it ſend forth a fume,ſeemingly delicious,yet many times being neerer taſted,proveth but cock-crowne pottage. Theſe Saints he ignorantly ballanceth again with our Huntingdon and Fabian, as if their preſent decree did contradict the hiſtory of things paſſed; as if we had no more hiſtories on our ſide,becauſe my margin cited them not.In the mean time he finds this teſtimony of Huntingdon ſo too much,that he would faine ſtrip us of it;denying peremptorily that Huntingdon affirmes Anſelme to be the firſt that forbad mariage to the Clergy.Reader,in ſtead of all other põderations weigh the words, [u] Eodem anno ad feſtũ S. Michaelis tenuit Anſelmus Archiepiſcopus Concilium, apud Londoniã, in quo prohibuit uxores ſacerdotibus Anglorũ, antea non prohibitas,i.The ſame yeare, on the Feaſt of S. Michael, Archbiſhop Anſelme held a Synod at London, wherein he forbad wives to the Prieſts of England, before not forbidden;and tell me whether my Detector be true.

The words are too plaine; he will wrangle yet with the ſenſe, and tels us that the word,Before,may ſignifie,perhaps,Immediately before,in the raign of the Williams,and not all ſucceſſions of times.It were well if he could eſcape ſo: But this ſtarting hole will not hide him.For (not to ſend him to Schoole to learne the difference betwixt Antea and Dudum,or Pridem)The ſame Author,in the following words,ſhews us the cenſures and conceits that paſſed upon this Act,as an abſolute & unheard-of novelty, like as in Germany,the Hiſtorians brand this ſame act in Hildebrand,with a novo exemplo,and inconſiderato prajudicio. And for the times preceding, Polydore Virgil gives the very ſame witneſſe.Neither let him fly for ſuccour to his Dunſtan,who never can be proved to have prohibited the mariage of Prieſts,though he diſliked that Monaſteries and Cathedrall Churches ſhould be poſſeſſed by maried Clerks.

Laſtly where the teſtimony is diſpleaſing,the witneſſe himſelf muſt be diſgraced. Curioſity led my Detector to ſearch who this H.Huntingdon might be, with one inquiry he might find him to be a Canon Regular of Auſtins Order,and for dignity an Archdeacõ;a perſon paſt exceptiõ. But for his parentage,he went no further then to the next Leafe,to find that he was the ſon of a noted, and, in thoſe dayes, eminent Clergy-man: His Epitaph at Lincolne ſhews him to have been the ſtar of the Clergy; no whit dimmed in his acknowledged light,or hindered in his influence,by his conjunction in lawfull wedlocke: What better inſtance could my Refuter have given againſt himſelfe?If he thinke to inſinuate that his birth made him partiall; The Reader will eaſily conſider,that if ſuch Parentage had beene then accounted ſhamefull, the Hiſtorian would have had the wit to have ſuppreſſed it;and withall that he durſt not, writing in the times when this thing was ſo familiarly and univerſally known, have offered ſuch a Propoſition to the light, out of a vaine partiality, to incurre the controlment of all eyes.

AS for our Fabian,if C.E. find him a Merchant, I find him to have been Sheriffe of the Honourable City of London; A man whoſe credit would ſcorne to be poiſed with an hundred nameleſſe Fugitives,paraſitical petty-chapmen of the late ſmalwares of Rome. Neither can the name of a Citizen diſparage him to any wiſe judge.

How

A How many have our times yeelded of that rank, whom both Academicall educatiō, and experience, and travell, and ſtudy have wrought to an eminent perfection in all Arts, eſpecially in mathematikes, and Hiſtory! Such was Fabian, whoſe fidelity (beſides his other worths) was never (that I find) taxed but by this inſolēt Pen that hath learned to forbeare no man; He was too old for us to bribe, and too credible for C. E. to diſgrace. If he would have lent Rome but this one lye, no man had beene more authenticall; now his truth makes him fabulous Fabian. That one fault hath marred our Archdeacon of Huntingdon alſo.

The Story which he tells of the Cardinal of Crema the Popes Legate, taken in bed (after his buſie indevours againſt the maried Clergie) the ſame day with an Harlot, hath undone his reputation. Why will C. E. ſtirre this ſinke? No man provoked him: B If he did not long to blazon the ſhame of his friends, he had rather ſmothered this foule occurrence, but ſince he will be medling, Res apertiſſima negari non potuit, celari non debuit, ſaith Huntingdon. The thing was moſt openly knowne, it could not be denied, it might not be concealed. Yet now comes an Upſtart-Novice, and dares tell us from Baronius, that this was a meere Fable; how publike and notorious ſoever Huntingdon makes it: with theſe men this rule is univerſal, whatſoever may tend to the diſhonor of the Church of Rome, is falſe and fabulous.

Refut. p. 348.

Indeed, I remember what their Gloſſe ſaid of old, [x] Clericus amplectens mulierem, præſumitur bene agere, ſi ergo Clericus amplectitur mulierem, interpretabitur quòd cauſa benedicendi eam, hoc faciat: That is, A Clergy man imbracing a Woman, muſt be preſumed to do well; If therefore a Clerke take a Woman by the middle, it muſt be interpreted that he C doth it to give her his bleſſing. * Perhaps, the good Legate was but beſtowing his ghoſtly bleſſing on ſo needful a ſubject; but that he was found in bed with her, if C. E. were not as ſhameles as that Cardinal, or his bed-fellow, he durſt not deny; For what impudency is this, to caſt this relation only upō H. Huntingdon, whē ſo many uncontrolable Pens have recorded it to the world? Men of their own ſtamp, for Religion, for Devotion. Matthew Paris, Ranulfus Ceſtrenſis, Roger Hoveden, Polydore Virgil, Fabian, Matthæus Weſtmonaſterienſis, otherwiſe called Florilegus, Dictus Joannes, qui in Concilio, &c. ſaith he, The ſaid John which in the open Councel had grievouſly condemned all the [y] Concubinary Prieſts was taken himſelfe in the ſame crime. Now let my Reader judge, whether this Prieſts Truth, or that Cardinals honeſty were greater.

x Diſt. 96. in ſcript.

* So the Chronicle tels us of Adelme, Abbot of Malmesbury, who when hee was ſtirred to the vice of the fleſh, had wont to deſpite the Devill, and torment himſelfe with holding a faire yong Virgin in his bed, ſo long as hee might ſay over the whole Pſalter. Vid. Pask. Def. Polyd. ſuppreſſing the name, telleth the Hiſtory.

y Viz. the maried: ſo did the enemies of Marriage diſgracefully terme the maryed Clergy; and ſo are the words of the Legate to bee underſtood, de latere meretricis; hee then railing againſt Marriage (not whoredome properly) was deprehended in whoredome.

SECT. XVI.

HIs third Ponderation is the ſame with the firſt; Every thing eekes. His S. Dunſtan and Anſelme, Gregory and Beda are againe laid in our diſh; wee cannot feed on theſe over-oft-ſod Coleworts. I am challenged here to produce any Prieſt or Deacō that lived in Wedlocke before the times of Dunſtan; The man preſumes upon the ſuppreſſion of Records. For one, I name him hundreds. Who were they that Dunſtan and his fellow Saints, found ſeated in the Cathedrall Churches of this Land? Whom did they eject? Were they not maried Prieſts? What did the ejected Clergy plead but ancient poſſeſſion? After that, in the Synod which Archbiſhop [a] Lanfranck held E at Wincheſter (which I wonder my Detector would over-ſee: This neglect is not for nothing;) was it not decreed that the Canons ſhould not have Wives, but that the Prieſts which dwelt in Townes and Villages, ſhould not be compelled to put away their Wives; though caution is put in for the future?

What doth this imply, but that in thoſe anciēt Times the Engliſh Clergy were inoffenſively maried? To which adde that old Record from an ancient Martyrologue of the Church of Canterbury: Lanfrancus Archiepiſcopus reddidit Eccleſiæ Sancti Andreæ, &c. Lanfranck Archbiſhop hath reſtored to Saint Andrews Church, the Monaſterie of S. Mary, with the Lands and Houſes which Livingus Prieſt, and his wife had in London, &c. And before him, or Dunſtan either, in King Edmunds time, [b] Biſhop Oſulphus with Athelme and Vlrick, Laicks, thruſts out the Monks of Eveſham, and placed Canons (maried Prieſts) in their roome.

a Ex Act. Concil. Winton. ſub Lanfr. Martyrol. Cant.

b Fox. Act. & Mon.

Laſtly,

If hee be the Sonne of a Bishop, &c.

Lastly, Iornalensis records it as king Ina's Law, long before these times; Si Episcopi filiolus sit, sit dimidium hoc, &c. as supposing this no other then ordinary in those times.

Now let my Refuter comfort himself and his Catholiks, with the weak defence of Heresie, and the strong Bulwarks of Roman Truth; who in the meane time must be put in mind, that he puts on me the burden which should lye upon his own shoulders; I have produced Histories which affirme peremptorily, that the English Clergy were never forbidden to marry untill Anselmes time; it is now his taske to disprove this assertion of theirs by equall authority to the contrary; which till he have done, the day is ours.

Sect. XVII.

Refut. p. 347.

His fourth Ponderation, is the difficulty of this grant in King Edwards Parliament. And is it possible the man should not see the greater difficulty that was found in the inforcement of this glorious Celibate? How Alfere and the Nobles dispossessed the Monks of Dunstan; justly restoring the maried Priests to their ancient right? How Lanfranck durst not speak it out; Anselme did; but prevailed little: Let [c] Girardus the Archbishop of Yorke witnesse. After whom Roger Archbishop of that See (as Newbrigensis records) thrust out [d] Anselmes Monks, and stood for the libertie of Mariage: in so much as in the succession of Times, even by Royall leave also, Mariage of spirituall persons yet continued. Neither could Anselmes Successors, Radulphus, Gulielmus de Turbine and the rest, (notwithstanding all their Canons & practices) prevaile against it. How plaine is that of the [e] Saxon Chronicle? Thus did the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops, which were in England; And yet all these Decrees and biddings stood not; All held their Wives by the Kings leave, even as they did. In so much as Archbishop William referred it to the King. The King decreed that the Priests should continue with their Wives still. Neither were any thing more easie than to give store of instances in this kinde. What need I give more than that of Galfrid B. of Ely, who was avouched before the Pope himself to have maried a Wife! which [f] Evangelicall excuse (uxorem duxit) was made for his not appearing at Rome with the rest. Of Richard Bishop of Chichester. Robert Bishop of Lincolne maried men, after these Decrees; yea, good Evidences of ancient Charts are ready in our hands, to shew the use and legall use of these Mariages for no lesse than two hundred yeares after.

c Vid supra. Epist. ad Ansel. Neubr. l. 3. c. 5.

d Pope Paschalis writing to Anselme, saith, that there was at this time so great a number of Priests Sons in England, that the greater part of the Clergie consisted of them.

e Chron. Saxon. Anno 1129. Chron. Fornal.

f Habet excusationem Evangelicam. resp. est ab Epis. Arelat. Alexandro Papæ.

And for those idle words which his sawcinesse throws after our reverend Martyr, Archbishop Cranmer, (whom he falsly affirmes to have been the first maried Archbishop of this Kingdome, when as Archbishop Boniface sate maried in that See three hundred yeares before him) and King Edwards Parliament, we answer them with silence and scorne. Let losers have leave to talke.

Anno 1250.

The approbation, and better expedience of single life in capable subjects, we do willingly subscribe unto; The lawfulnesse, yea, necessity of Mariage where the gift of Continency is denyed, our Saviour and his chosen vessell justifie with us. So as I still conclude, He that made mariage, saith it is honourable, what care we for the dishonour of those that corrupt it.

Sect. XVIII.

Refut. p. 351.

His last Ponderation is leaden indeed; That frō the bickerings of our English Clergie with their Dunstans, it will not follow, that Continency was not ancient, but was repiningly, lately, unjustly imposed. By this reason, he will prove there was never Thiefe nor Malefactor in our Countrie, before the time of King James; since all Iudges have yeerely bickerings with such people. Thus he. But did ever such loose Besome sweep the presse before?

C. E. writes in the margine, Master Halls loose manner of disputing.

Reader, vouchsafe yet once more to cast thine eye upon the close of my Epistle; Doth my argument runne thus wildly as he makes it? The English Clergie had bickerings

A rings with their Dunſtans, therefore Continency was repiningly and unjuſtly impoſed? Canſt thou think I have met with a ſober Adverſarie? My words are; That our Hiſtories teach us how late, how repiningly, how unjuſtly our Engliſh Clergy ſtooped under this yoake. And what can this ſophiſter make of this? Are ye not aſhamed (ye Superiours of Doway) are ye not aſhamed of ſuch a Champion; fitter for a troope of Pigmies to traile a reed in their bickerings with Cranes, than to be committed with any reaſonable or Scholler-like Antagoniſt? In the bickerings with his Dunſtans, the Patiens pleaded preſcription (as we have ſhewed out of Malmesbury) and taxed his Saints with novelty: In my bickerings with him, I plead Antiquity, Scripture, Reaſon; and taxe him moſt juſtly with impudence, and abſurdity. How well is that man, that is matcht but with an honeſt Adverſary?

The Concluſion.

THe Concluſion follows, a fit cover for ſuch a diſh; The Reader was not weary enough, but he muſt be tyred with a tedious recapitulation; wherein my Refuter recollects all his diſperſed folly, that it may ſhew the fairer: Telling his Proteſtant friend, what I have bragged, what I have undertaken; what I have not performed; how I have falſifyed, how I have miſtaken; what himſelfe hath in al paſſages performed againſt me, how he hath anſwered, how he hath conquered; The beſt is, the Concluſion can ſhew no more than the Premiſes. By them, let me be judged: Thoſe C have made good to my Reader, that C.E. hath accuſed much, and proved nothing; vanted much, and done nothing, railed much, and hurt nothing; laboured much, and gained nothing; talked much, and ſaid nothing.

Refp. 353. &c.

It is a large and bold word: but if any one clauſe of mine be unproved, if any one clauſe of mine be diſproved, any one exception againſt my defence proved juſt, any one charge of his proved true, any one falſhood of mine detected, any one argumēt of mine refelled, any one argument or propoſition of his not refelled: Let me go away convicted with ſhame. But if I have anſwered every challenge, vindicated every * authority, juſtified every proofe, wiped away every cavil, affirmed no propoſition untruly, cenſured nothing unjuſtly; ſatisfied al his malicious objections, and warranted every ſentence of my poore Epiſtle: Let my apologie live and paſſe; and let my D Refuter go as he is, C.E. Cavillator Egregius: Cet my cauſe be no more victorious than juſt; and let honeſt Mariages ever hold up their heads; in deſpite of Rome and Hell: With this Farewel, I leave my Refuter, either to the acting of his unbloudy executions of the Son of God, or the plotting of the bloudie executions of the Deputies of God, or (as it were his beſt) to the knocking of his Beads; but if he wil needs be medling with his pen, & will have me, after ſome Jubilees, to expect an anſwer to my ſix weeks labour, I ſhall in the meane time pray, that God would give him the grace to give way to the known Truth, and ſometimes to ſay true.

 I only except that one ſlip of my pen, that I ſaid Gratian elted a ſentence out of Auſtin, which was indeed his owne.*

Yet to gratifie my Reader at the parting, I may not conceale from him an anciēt and worthy Monumēt, which I had the favour and happines to ſee in the Inner Library of Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Cambridge; An excellent Treatiſe written (amongſt ſeventeene other) in a faire ſet hand, by an Author of great learning and Antiquity; He would needs ſuppreſſe his name, but deſcribes himſelf to be Rotomagenſis: The time wherein it was written, appeares to be amids the heat of contentiō, which was between the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and York, for precedency; * which quarrell fell betwixt Rodulph of Canterbury, and Thurſtin of Yorke, in the yeare (1114.) at which time Pope Paſchalis wrote to King Henry concerning it; and was renued after about the yeare 1175. The Diſcourſe ſhall ſpeake enough for it ſelfe.

ROTO-

ROTOMAGENSIS ANONYMUS.

AN LICEAT SACERDOTIBUS INIRE MATRIMONIA.

Scire volui quis primus instituit ne Sacerdotes Christiani inire deberent Matrimonia. Deus an homo? Si enim Deus, ejus certe sententia & tenenda & observanda est cum omni veneratione & reverentia. Si verò homo & non Deus, de corde hominis, & non ex ore Dei talis egressa est traditio: Ideoq; nec per eam salus adquiritur si observetur, nec amittitur si non observetur. Non enim est hominis salvare vel perdere aliquẽ pro meritis, sed Dei propriũ unius est: scilicet, quod Deus hoc instituerit, nec in veteri Testamento nec in Evangelio, nec in Apostolorũ Epistolis scriptũ reperitur, in quibus quicquid Deus hominibus præcipit insertum describitur. Traditio ergo hominis est & non Dei, non Apostolorum institutio. Quemadmodum & Apostolus instituit, ut oportet Episcopum esse unius uxoris virum. Quod minime instituisset, si adulterium esset quod Episcopus haberet simul & uxorem, & Ecclesiam, quasi duas uxores, ut quidam asserunt. Quodq; de Scripturis sanctis non habet authoritatem eadem facilitate contemnitur qua dicitur. Sancta enim Ecclesia non Sacerdotis uxor, non sponsa, sed Christi est, sicut Ioannes dicit, Qui habet sponsam, sponsus est: hujus inquam sponsi Ecclesia sponsa est, & tamen huic sponsæ licet in parte inire matrimonia ex Apostolica traditione. Dicit enim Apostolus ad Cor. Propter fornicationes (inquit) unusquisq; uxorem suam habeat, & cæteranusq; volo omnes homines esse sicut meipsũ, sed unusquisq; proprium donũ habet à Deo, alius quidem sic, alius verò sic. Non enim omnes habent unum donũ virginitatis, scilicet, & continentiæ, sed quidam virgines sunt & continentes, quidam vero incontinentes, quibus concedit nuptias, ne tentet eos Sathanas propter incontinentiã suã & in ruinam turpitudinis corruant. Sed & Sacerdotes quoq; alij quidẽ continentes sunt, alij vero incontinentes, & qui continentes sunt, continẽtiæ suæ donum à Deo consecuti sunt: sine ejus dono & gratia continentes esse non possunt. Incontinentes verò hoc donũ gratiæ minime percipiunt, qui cùm intemperantia suæ conspersionis, tum etiam animi infirmitate per carnis desideria diffluunt. Quod nullo modo facerent, si continentiæ gratiam & virtutẽ à Deo percepissent. Sentiunt enim & ipsi aliam legem in membris suis repugnantẽ legi mentis suæ, & captivantẽ eos in lege peccati, & quod nolunt agere cogentẽ, qui de corpore mortis hujus liberantur gratia Dei. Hac itaq; eos lege captivante, & carnis concupiscentia stimulante, aut fornicari coguntur aut nubere. Quorum quid melius sit Apostolica docemur authoritate, qua dicitur, melius nubere quàm uri. Quod melius est, id certe eligendum & tenendũ est: Melius est inquam nubere, quia pejus est uri. Quia melius est nubere quàm uri, conveniens est incontinentibus ut nubant, non ut urantur. Bonæ etenim sunt nuptiæ, sicut Augustinus ait in libro super Genesin ad literam, in ipsis commendatur bonum naturæ quo incontinentiæ regitur pravitas, & naturæ decoratur fœcunditas. Nam utriusq; sexus infirmitas propendens in ruinam turpitudinis, rectè excipitur honestate nuptiarum, ut quod sanis pũsit esse officium, sit ægrotis remedium. Neque enim quia incontinentia malum est ideo connubium, vel quo incontinentes copulantur non est bonum. Imo vero non propter illud malum culpabile est bonum, sed propter hoc bonum veniale est illud malum: quoniam id quod bonũ habent nuptiæ, & quod bonæ sunt nuptiæ, peccatũ esse nunquã potest. Hoc autem tripartitũ est, fides, proles, Sacramentũ. In fide attenditur, ne præter vinculũ cõjugale, cum altera vel cum altero cõcubatur. In prole, ut amanter suscipiatur, benigne suscipiatur, religiose educetur.

In

A In Sacramento, vt conjugium non ſeparetur, & demiſſus aut demiſſa ne cauſa prolis alteri conjugatur. Hæc eſt tanquam regula nuptiarum, qua vel naturæ decoratur fœcunditas, vel incontinentiæ regitur pravitas. Hanc autem regulam nuptiarum, & hoc tripartitum bonum inſtituit æterna veritas ordine decenti & lege æterna, contra quam quicquid fit, vel dicitur, vel concupiſcitur, peccatũ eſt. Quod in libro contra Fauſtũ Manichæum Auguſtinus teſtatur, dicens, Peccatum eſt factum, vel dictũ, vel concupitum contra æternam legem. Æterna lex eſt divina voluntas, ſive ratio ordinem naturalem perturbari vetans, conſervari jubens. Quicquid igitur ordinem naturalem perturbari jubet, conſervari vetat, exercere nuptias & earum tripartitum bonum, fidem, ſcilicet, prolem & Sacramentum eos habere prohibet, & regulam illam æternæ veritatis qua naturæ decoratur fœcunditas, vel incontinentiæ regitur pravitas eis ſolvere præcipit, &c. quibus naturalis ordo peragitur, abhominari jubet. Hoc inquam

B mandatum naturalem ordinem conſervari vetat, perturbari jubet, & ideo contra æternam legem fit, & peccatum eſt: peccant enim qui mandatum tale inſtituunt, quo naturalis ordo deſtruitur. Nam etiam ut videtur, minime credunt quod de Sacerdotum filijs aſſumat Deus ad ædificandam ſupernam Civitatem, & ad reſtaurandum Angelorum numerum. Si enim crederent, nunquam tale mandatum inſtituerent, quia ſcienter & nimia temeritate id efficere conarentur, ut ſuperna Civitas nunquam proficiatur, & Angelorum numerus nunquam repararetur: ſi enim ſuperna Civitas de filijs etiam Sacerdotum perficienda eſt, & ſi Angelorum numerus de ipſis etiam reparandus eſt, qui hoc efficere conatur ut nulli ſint, quantum in ipſo eſt, & ſupernam civitatem deſtruit, & Angelorum numerus ne perficiatur efficit. Quo quod perverſius poteſt fieri? Hoc enim fit contra voluntatem & prædeſtinationem illius, qui quæ futura ſint fecit. Fecit enim prædeſtinatione quæ futura ſunt in opere. Quicunque ergo id efficere conatur ut non faciat Deus in opere quæ fecit in Prædeſtinatione, ipſam Prædeſtinatio-

C nem Dei conatur evacuare. Si ergo Deus fecit in Prædeſtinatione, ut filij Sacerdotum futuri ſint in opere, qui hoc efficere conatur ut non futuri ſint, in opere deſtruere molitur facta Dei quod fecit prædeſtinatione, & ita prædeſtinationem Dei nititur evertere, & voluntatem Dei contraire quæ æterna eſt. Voluit enim Deus ab æterno, & ante ſæculum omnes homines creare in ſæculo, certo quidem ordine quo præcogitavit & prædeſtinavit eos ſe creaturum. Nihil enim inordinate facit, nihil in ſæculo creat, quod non ante in prædeſtinatione ſuæ mentis procedente omnia ſæculo diſponendo præordinaverit. Quæcunq; ergo in hoc ſæculo ab ipſo creantur, Prædeſtinationem mentis prædiſponentem ac præordinantem omnia neceſſario ſequuntur, quod impoſsibile eſt non fieri quod Deus ab æterno voluit & præordinavit fieri. Neceſſe eſt igitur omnes homines eo ordine creari, quo voluit ab æterno & præordinavit. Alio-

D quin non ſicut voluit Deus neq; ſicut præordinavit omnes homines ſunt creati, ſed quod hoc inconveniens eſt neceſſe eſt illos creari, ſicut voluit ab æterno & præcogitavit atq; præordinavit, quod omnia quæ voluit fecit, & nihil unquam fecit quæ non voluit ab æterno & præcogitavit decreto certo & incommutabili. Quia nec ejus voluntas irrita poteſt fieri, nec præcogitatio falli, nec præordinationes commutari. Quæ cùm ita ſint, neceſſe eſt ut ſicut Laici, ita etiam Sacerdotes de quibus homines creantur, ad ipſos creandos miniſterium exhibeant divinæ voluntati & præordinationi. Parentes non ſunt authores creationis filiorum, ſed miniſtri. Qui ſi miniſterium non exhiberent voluntatem Dei & præcogitationem ſi poſsibile eſſet irritam facerent, ordinationique reſiſterent. Quid ſi ſcienter facerent gra-

E vius utique delinquerent, ſi neſcienter minus, non ſolum in Deum Patrem, ſed & in cæleſtem Ieruſalem ſanctorum omnium matrem, quod quantum in ipſis eſſet illos creari non permitterent, ex quibus ea ædificanda & cœleſtis patriæ dantia ſunt præparanda. Sed ab hoc delicto defendit eos impotentia, quod non poſſunt voluntati Dei reſiſtere & præordinationi contraire. Voluntas enim Dei & prædeſtinatio lex æterna eſt, in qua omnium rerum curſus decretus eſt, et paradigma eſt, in quo omnium ſæculorum forma depicta eſt, quod nulla ratione aboleri poteſt. Huic igitur miniſterium non exhibere malum eſt, quod exhibere bonum eſt & maxime cum bona ſit voluntate. Quod tum fit, cum parentes conveniunt cauſa gignendæ prolis, non appetitu exercendi libidinis. Gignendæ prolis dico, quia & præſens Eccleſia multiplicetur, & cœleſtis Civitas fabricetur, & electorum numerus compleatur, quorum nihil poteſt fieri ſine conventione tali. Si enim primi parentes Sanctorum omnes aut continentes permanſiſſent aut virgines, nullus Sanctorum ex eis eſſet natus in ſæculo, nullus gloria & honore coronatus in cælo, nullus adſcitus in Angelorum numero. Sed quia ineſtimabile bonum eſt, quod ſancti nati ſunt in ſæculo, quod gloria & honore coronantur in cælo, & quod *adſciti ſunt in Angelorum numero, ex eo parentum fœcunditas beatior prædicatur, & conventus ſanctior. Sic ergo melius fuit eis tales filios genuiſſe quam non genuiſſe, talemq; fructum nuptiarum protuliſſe, quam ſine fructu continentes, aut virgines extitiſſe. Quamvis bonum ſit quibuſdam continentes eſſe, vel virgines, illis viz. quos Deus voluit ab æterno, & præordinavit ita creandos eſſe in ſæculo, ut continentia vel virginitate permaneant: ſicut enim voluit ab æterno, & præordinavit quoſdam, ita creandos eſſe in ſæculo, ut fructum nuptiarum faciant & filios generent, ita etiam voluit & præordinavit ab æterno, quoſdam ita creandos eſſe, ut in continentia vel virginitate permaneant. Et ſicut illi ad creandos filios voluntati Dei & præordinationi miniſterium exhibent, ita & iſti ad conſeruandã & continentiã & virginitatẽ voluntati Dei et præordinationi miniſtrant. Ac per hoc & illorum fœcunditas & iſtorum virginitas bona eſt atque laudabilis, quæ ſi non miniſterium exhiberet voluntati Dei & præordinationi, nec bona eſſet nec laudabilis. Omne enim quod voluntati Dei & præordinationi contrarium eſt, nec bonum eſt nec laudabile. Sic ergo voluit Deus & prædeſtinavit alios futuros virgines, alios nuptiarum fructum façientes. Si enim omnes eſſent virgines, nullus Sanctorum qui vel naſcitur vel naſciturus ſit, in hoc ſæculo natus eſſet, vel naſciturus. Nec ipſi etiam virgines eſſent, quia nati non eſſent. Ex fœcunditate enim illorum orta eſt iſtorum virginitas. Magnum igitur bonum eſt fœcunditas, de qua ſancta præceſſit virginitas. Qui autem virgines eſſe debeant, & qui nuptiarum fructus facientes, docet eos verbũ quod Deus ſeminat in cordibus illorum. In aliorum enim cordibus ſeminat verbum bonæ fœcunditatis nuptiarum fructum facientis, in aliorum vero cordibus ſeminat verbum virginitatis, ipſi virginitatem ſervare deſiderant: In quibus veró verbum nuptiarum ſeminat, ipſi facere nuptiarum fructum appetunt.

* Deeſt (opinor) pars clauſulæ; Illi ergo in quibus ſeminat verbum virginitatis, &c.

Which, for my Countrymens ſake, I have thus Engliſhed.

I Would faine know who it was that firſt ordained, that Chriſtian Prieſts might not marrry, God or Man? For, if it were God, ſurely, his determination is to be held and obſerved with all veneration and reverence; But, if it were Man, and not God; and this Tradition came out of the heart of Man, not out of the Mouth of God, then neither is ſalvation got by it, if it be obſerved; nor loſt, if it be not obſerved: For it doth not belong to Man either to ſave or deſtroy any man for his merits, but it is proper only unto God. That God hath ordained this, it is neither found written in the Old Teſtament, nor in the Goſpell, nor in the Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, in all which is ſet downe whatſoever God hath enjoyned unto men. It is therefore a Tradition of man, and not an inſtitution of God, nor of his Apoſtles: As the Apoſtle inſtituted (rather) that a Biſhop ſhould be the husband of one Wife; which he would never have appointed, if it had beene adultery for a Biſhop to have at once a Wife, and a Church, as it were two Wives, like as ſome affirme: Now, that which hath not authority from the holy Scripture, is with the ſame facility cõtemned, that it is ſpoken: For, the holy Church is not the Wife, not the Spouſe of the Prieſt, but of Chriſt, as S. Iohn ſaith, He that hath the Bride, he is the Bridegroome, Of the Bridegroome, I ſay, is the Church the Spouſe; and yet it is lawfull even for this Spouſe in part to marry, by Apoſtolique Tradition; For the Apoſtle ſpeakes thus to the Corinthians: Becauſe of fornication let every man have his owne Wife. And I would that all men were as I am, but every man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, another otherwiſe. For, all men have not one gift, namely, of Virginity and Continency, but ſome are Virgins and containe, others containe not; to whom he granteth mariage, leſt Sathan tempt them through their incontinency, and they ſhould miſcary in the ruine of their uncleanneſſe. So alſo of Prieſts, ſome are continent, and others incontinent; and thoſe which are continent, have received the gift of their continence from God, without whoſe Gift and Grace, they cannot be continent. But thoſe which are incontinent, have not received this gift of grace, but, whether by the intemperance of their humour, or the weakeneſſe of their mind, run out into fleſhly deſires; which they would in no wiſe doe, if they had received from God the Grace and Vertue of Continence. For they alſo which are delivered by the Grace of God from the body of this death, feele another Law in their members rebelling againſt the Law of their minde, and captivating

vating them to the Law of ſin, and compelling them to doe that which they would not. This Law therefore, holding them captive, and this Concupiſcence of the fleſh provoking them, they are compelled either to fornicate, or marry: whereof whether is the better, we are taught by the authority of the Apoſtle, who tells us, it is better to marry then to burne. Surely, that which is the better, is to be choſen and held; now it is better to marry, becauſe it is worſe to burne; and becauſe it is better to marry then to burne, it is convenient for thoſe which containe not, to marry, not to burne. For mariage is good, as Auguſt. ſpeakes in his booke (Super Geneſin ad Literam) in it is commended the good of nature, whereby the pravity of incontinence is ruled, and the fruitfulneſſe of Nature graced; For the weakeneſſe of either Sexe, declining towards the ruine of filthineſſe, is well relieved by honeſty of mariage, ſo as the ſame thing, which may be the office of the ſound, is alſo the remedy unto the ſicke: Neither yet, becauſe incontinence is evill, is therefore Mariage (even that wherewith the Incontinent are joyned) to be reputed not good; yea rather, not for that evill, is the good faulty, but for this good is that evill pardonable, ſince that good which mariage hath, yea which mariage is, can never be ſin. Now, this good is three-fold, the Fidelity, the Fruit, the Sacrament of that eſtate; In the Fidelity, is regarded: That beſides this bond of Mariage, there be not carnall ſociety with any other. In the fruit of it, That it be lovingly raiſed and religiouſly bred. In the Sacrament of it, That the mariage be not ſeparated, and that the diſmiſſed party of either Sexe, be not joyned to any other, no not for iſſues ſake. This is as it were the Rule of Mariage, whereby the fruitfulneſſe of Nature is graced, or the pravity of Incontinence ruled. And this rule of Mariage, and this three-fold good, the eternall Truth hath appointed in the order of his Decree, and that eternall Law of his, againſt which whatſoever is done, ſpoken, or willed, is ſinne; which Auguſtine in his booke againſt Fauſtus the Manichee witneſſeth, ſaying, Sin is either Deed, Word, or deſire againſt the Law eternall. This Eternall Law is the divine Will or Decree, forbidding the diſturbance, and commanding the preſervation of due naturall order; whatſoever therefore commands naturall Order to be diſturben, forbids it to be conſerved, prohibits Men to uſe Mariage; and attaine to the threefold good thereof, Fidelitie, Iſſue, Sacrament; and commands them to breake that Rule of Eternall Truth, whereby the fruitfulneſſe of nature is graced, or the pravity of Incontinency is ruled, commands men to abhorre thoſe things whereby naturall order is held and maintained. This Commandement, I ſay, forbids naturall Order to be obſerved, commands it to be diſturbed, and therefore is againſt the Law of God, and by conſequence, is ſinne: For, they ſinne that ordaine ſuch a command by which naturall Order is deſtroyed.

Theſe men do not (it ſeemes) beleeve, that of the children of Prieſts, God takes for the building of his City above, and for the reſtoring of the number of Angels: For, if they did beleeve it, they would never ordaine ſuch a Mandate, becauſe they ſhould wittingly and over-raſhly, goe about to effect, that the ſupernal City ſhould never be perfited & the number of Angels never repayred. For if the ſupernall City be to be perfited even of the ſons of Prieſts, and if the number of Angels be of them to be repayred, thoſe that endeavour to procure that they ſhould not be, do (what in thē lies) deſtroy the ſupernall City, & labour that the number of Angels may not be perfited; then which, what can be more perverſely done? For this is done againſt the will and predeſtination of him which hath done thoſe things, which ſhal be; for he hath done in his predeſtination thoſe things which ſhall be in effect; whoſoever therefore goes about to procure that God may not in effect do thoſe things, which he hath done in his predeſtination, goes about to make void the very predeſtination of God. If then God have already in his predeſtination decreed, that the ſons of Prieſts ſhall once be in effect, he that goes about to procure that they may not be in effect, endeavours to deſtroy the worke of God, becauſe he hath already done it in predeſtination; and ſo ſtri ves to overthrow Gods predeſtination, and to gain-ſtand that will of God which is eternall: For God would from eternity, and before all worlds, create all men in the world, in that certaine order wherein he preconceived, and predeſtinated to create them; He doth nothing diſorderly, he createth nothing in the world which he hath not fore-ordained, by diſpoſing it in the predeſtinatiõ of his mind that went before all worlds. Whatſoever therefore is by him created in this world, doth neceſſarily follow the predeſtination of his minde, prediſpoſing and preordaining all things; becauſe it is impoſſible that ſhould not be done, which God from eternity hath willed and fore-ordained to be done. It is therefore neceſſary that all men ſhould be created in that very Order, wherein he willed, and from eternity fore-ordained; Or elſe, all men are not created as God would have them, nor as he fore-ordained them; But becauſe this is inconvenient, it muſt needs bee that they are created as he willed from eternity, and fore-thought, and fore-ordained, becauſe he hath done all things that he would, and never did any thing which he willed not from everlaſting, and hath fore-conceived in his certaine and unchangeable Decree. For neither can his will be fruſtrated, nor his fore-thought deceived, nor his fore-ordinations altered: Which, ſince it is ſo, needs muſt it be, that as Laicks, ſo Prieſts alſo, of whom men are created, ſhould yeeld their ſervice to the divine will and preordination to the creating of them. For Parents are not the authors of the creation of their children, but the ſervants; who if they ſhould not yeild their ſervice, they ſhould (if it were poſſible) make void the fore-thought of God, and reſiſt his ordination; which if they ſhould wittingly doe, they ſhould offend the more, if ignorantly the leſſe; not onely againſt God the Father, but alſo againſt the heavenly Jeruſalem, the Mother of all Saints, becauſe (what in them were) they ſhould not ſuffer thoſe to be created of whom it is to be builded, and thoſe things to be prepared, whereby that Celeſtiall Countrey is beſtowed. But from this offence their impotence frees them, becauſe they cannot reſiſt the will of God and croſſe his preordination. For the will and predeſtination of God is that eternall Law, in which the courſe of all things is decreed; and the patterne wherein the forme of all ages is ſet forth, which can by no meanes be defaced. Not to yeeld our ſervice then hereunto, is evill, becauſe to yeeld it, is good, and eſpecially if it be done with a good intent, which is then done, when as Parents meet together in a deſire of propagation of iſſue, not in an appetite of exerciſing their luſt. Of propagation, I ſay, that both the preſent Church may be multiplied, and the celeſtiall City built, and the number of the Elect made up, none of which could be done without ſuch conjugall meeting. For if the firſt Parents of the Saints had continued all either continent or Virgins, no Saints had beene borne of them in the world, none of them had beene crowned with glory and honour in heaven, none of them aſcribed into the number of Angels. But ſince it is an ineſtimable good, that Saints are borne in the world, that they are crowned with glory and honour in heaven, and that they are aſcribed into the number of Angels: thereupon the fruitfulneſſe of Parents is more bleſſed, and their meeting holyer. So then it is better for them to have begotten ſuch children, then not to have begotten them, and to have brought forth ſuch fruit of mariage, then to have been continent, or Virgins, without fruit. Although it is good for ſome to be continent, or virgins, namely, for them whom God eternally willed and preordained to be ſo created in the world, that they ſhould remaine either in Continence, or Virginity: For as he hath eternally willed and fore-ordained that ſome ſhould be ſo created in the world, as that they ſhould yeeld the fruit of mariage, and beget children, ſo alſo hath he willed, and from eternity fore-ordained, ſome to be ſo created, that they ſhould continue in Continency or Virginity: And as thoſe other yeeld their ſervice to the will and preordination of God in the creation of children: ſo theſe alſo ſerve the will and preordination of God in conſerving their continence, and Virginity; and hereupon is both the fruitfulneſſe of the one, and the virginity of the other good, and laudable; which if it did not yeeld ſervice to the wil & preordination of God, would be neither good nor laudable. For whatſoever is contrary to the will and preordination of God, is neither good nor laudable. If therefore God willed and predeſtinated ſome to be Virgins, others to yeeld the fruit of mariage (for if all were virgins, no Saint that now is, or ſhall be borne, ſhould either be now or hereafter borne in the world, neither ſhould thoſe Virgins be at all, becauſe they ſhould not be borne; for of the fruitfulneſſe of the one ariſes the others virginity) therefore is fruitfulneſſe a great good, from which holy

A holy Virginty hath proceeded: now that there ſhould be ſome Virgins, and others that ſhould beare the fruits of mariage, the word which God ſoweth in their hearts, teacheth us. For in the hearts of ſome he ſoweth the word of good fruitfulneſſe, yeelding the increaſe of mariage, and in the hearts of others he ſowes the word of Virginity; Thoſe then in whom he ſowes the word of virginity, they deſire to keep virginity, but thoſe in whom he ſowes the word of mariage, they deſire to yeeld the fruit of mariage.

Whereto I will adde for Concluſion the wiſe and ingenuous judgement of Eraſmus Roterodamus; The rather, becauſe it pleaſed my Refuter to lay this worthy Author in our diſh;

In his Epiſtle to Chriſtopher Biſhop of Baſil, concerning humane Conſtitutions, Thus he writes.

Habetur Tom. nono Op. Eraſ. pag. 982.

*For thoſe things which are altogether of humane Conſtitution, muſt (like to remedies in diſeaſes) be attempered to the preſent eſtate of matters and times. Thoſe things which were once religiouſly inſtituted, afterwards according to occaſion, and the changed quality of manners and times, may be with more Religion and Piety abrogated; which yet is not to be done by the temerity of the people, but by the authority of Governors; that tumult may be avoyded, and that the publicke cuſtome may be ſo altred, that concord may not be broken: the very ſame is perhaps to bee thought concerning the Mariage of Prieſts of old, as there was great paucity of Prieſts, ſo great Pietie alſo; They, that they might more freely attend thoſe holy Services, made thēſelves chaſte of their own accord. And ſo much were thoſe Ancients affected to Chaſtitie, that they would hardly permit Mariage vnto that Chriſtian, whom his Baptiſme found ſingle, but a ſecond Mariage yet more hardly: And now that which ſeemed plauſible in Biſhops and Prieſts: was tranſlated to Deacons, and at laſt to ſub-Deacons, which voluntarily received cuſtome was confirmed by the anthority of Popes. In the meane time, the number of Prieſts increaſed, and their Pietie decreaſed. How many ſwarmes of Prieſts are maintained in Monaſteries and Colledges? and amongſt them how few are there that live chaſtly? I ſpeake of them which doe publikely keepe Concubines in their houſes, inſtead of their Wives. I doe not now meddle with the myſteries of their more ſecret luſts, I onely ſpeake of thoſe things which are moſt notoriouſly knowne to the world: And yet, when we know theſe things, how eaſie are wee to admit men into holy Orders, and how difficult in releaſing this conſtitution of ſingle life? when as contrarily S. Paul teaches, that hands muſt not be raſhly laid upon any; and more then once hath preſcribed what manner of men Prieſts and Deacons ought to be, but of a ſingle life, neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, have ever given any Law in the holy Scriptures. Long ſince hath the Chureh abrogated the nightly Vigils at the Tombes of Martyrs, which yet had beene received by the publike cuſtome of Chriſtians, and that for divers Ages. Thoſe Faſts which were wont to continue till the evening, it hath transferred to noone; and many other things hath it changed according to the occaſions ariſing: * And why then doe we ſo obſtinately urge this humane conſtitu-*

tion, especially when so many causes perswade us to an alteration? For first a great part of our Priests lives with an ill name; and with an unquiet conscience handleth those holy Mysteries; And then the fruit of their labours (for the most part) is utterly lost, because their doctrine is contemned of their people by reason of their shamefull life. Whereas, if Mariage might bee yeelded to those which doe not containe, both they would live more quietly, and should preach Gods Word to the people with authority, and might honestly bring up their Children, neither should the one of them be a mutuall shame to the other,

A BRIEFE SVMME OF THE Principles of Religion, fit to be knowne of such as would addresse themselves to Gods TABLE.

Q. How many things are required of a Christian?
A. Two: Knowledge and Practice.
Q. What are wee bound to know?
A. God and our selves.
Q. What must wee know of God?
A. What one he is, and what he hath done.

Q. What is God?

A. He is one Almightie and infinite Spirit, Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost.

Q. What hath he done?

A. He hath made all things, he governeth and preserveth all things, and hath eternally decreed how all things shall bee done, and hath revealed his will to us in his Word.

Q. What more must be knowne concerning God and his actions?

A. That God the Son, Christ Jesus, tooke our nature upon him, dyed for our redemption, rose againe & now liveth gloriously in Heaven, making intercession for us.

Q. Thus much concerning God. What must wee know of our selves?

A. What we were, what we are, and what we shall be.

Q. What were we?

A. We were made at first perfect and happy, according to Gods Image, in knowledge, in holinesse, in righteousnesse.

Q. What are we?

A. Ever since the fall of our first Parents, we are all naturally the sonnes of wrath, subject to misery and death: But those whom God chooseth out to himselfe, are in part renewed through grace, and have the Image of God in part repaired in them.

Q. What shall we be?

A. At the generall resurrection of all flesh, those which were in part renewed here, shal be fully perfited and glorified in body and soule: those which have lived and dyed in their sinnes, shall be judged to perpetuall torments.

Q. Thus much for our knowledge: Now for our practice what is required of us?

A. Due odedience and service of God, both in our ordinary course of life, and also in the speciall exercise of his worship.

Q. What is that obedience which is required of us in the ordinary course of our life?

A. It is partly prescribed us by the Law, and partly by the Gospell.

Q. What doth the Law require?

A. The Law contained in Ten Commandements, enjoyneth us all piety to God, and all juſtice and charity to our neighbour. A

Q. What doth the Goſpell require?

A. Faith in the Lord Jeſus, with the fruit of it, Repentance, as our onely remedie for the breach of the Law.

Q. What is faith?

A. The affiance of the ſoule upon Chriſt Jeſus, depending upon him alone for forgiveneſſe and ſalvation.

Q. What is Repentance?

A. An effectuall breaking off our old ſinnes, with ſorrow and deteſtation, and an earneſt purpoſe and endevour of contrary obedience.

Q. Thus much of our obedience in the whole courſe of life: What are the ſervices required more ſpecially in the immediate exerciſes of Gods worſhip? B

A. They are chiefly three: firſt, Due hearing and reading the word: ſecondly, Receiving the Sacraments: thirdly, Prayer.

Q. Which call you the word of God?

A. The holy Scriptures contained in the Old and New Teſtament.

Q. How many Sacraments are there?

A. Two: Baptiſme, and the Lords Supper.

Q. What is the uſe of Baptiſme?

A. By water waſhing the Body, to aſſure us that the blood of Chriſt, applied to the ſoule of every beleever, cleanſeth him from his ſinnes.

Q. What is the uſe of the Lords ſupper?

A. To be a ſigne, a ſeale, a pledge, unto us of Chriſt Jeſus given for us, & given to us. C

Q. What ſignifies the Bread and Wine?

A. The body and blood of Chriſt, broken and powred out for our redemption.

Q. What is required of every Receiver?

A. Upon paine of judgement, that he prepare himſelfe by examination.

Q. Whereof muſt a man examine himſelfe?

A. Whether he finde in himſelfe, firſt Competent knowledge: ſecondly, A true (though weake) Faith: thirdly, Unfained repentance for his ſins: fourthly, Charity, & readineſſe to forgive: fiftly, An hungring deſire to this Sacrament: Sixtly, A thankfull heart for Chriſt, and it.

Q. What is Prayer?

A. A calling upon God through Chriſt for a ſupply of all our wants, and praiſing him for all his bleſſing. D

IN FOVRE BOOKES.

BY I. H. D. D.

Imprinted at London in the yeare 1634.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE OF WALES,

HIS HIGHNESSES VNWORTHY Servant dedicates all his labours, and wiſhes all Happineſſe.

Moſt Gracious Prince:

THis worke of mine, which (if my hopes and deſires faile mee not) time may hereafter make great, I have preſumed both to dedicate in whole to your Highneſſe, and to parcell out in ſeveralls unto ſubordinate hands. It is no marvell if Bookes have this freedome, when wee our ſelves can and ought to be all yours, while we are our owne, and others under you. I dare ſay theſe Meditations, how rude ſo ever they may fall from my Pen, in regard of their ſubject are fit for a Prince. Here your Highneſſe ſhall ſee how the great patterne of Princes, the KING of HEAVEN, hath ever ruled the World, how his Subſtitutes, earthly Kings, have ruled it under him, and with what ſucceſſe either of glory or ruine. Both your Peace and and VVarre ſhall finde here holy and great examples. And if Hiſtorie and obſervation be the beſt Counſellors of your youth; what ſtorie can bee ſo wiſe and faithfull as that which God hath written for Men, wherein you ſee both what hath beene done and what ſhould bee? What obſervation ſo worthy as that which is both raiſed from God, and directed to him? If the proprietie which your Highneſſe juſtlie hath in the VVorke, and Author, may draw your Princely eyes and heart the rather to theſe holy Speculations, your Servant ſhall be happier in this favour, then in all your outward bountie; as one to whom your ſpirituall progreſſe deſerves to be dearer then his owne life; and whoſe daily ſuit is, that God would guide your ſteps aright in this ſlipperie Age, and continue to rejoyce all good hearts in the view of your gracious proceedings.

Your Highneſſes humbly

devoted Servant,

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE

THOMAS,

EARLE OF EXCETER, ONE OF his Majesties most Honorable Privy Councell;

All Grace and Happinesse.

Right Honorable,

I Knew I could not bestow my thoughts better then upon Gods owne Historie, so full of edification and delight: which I have in such sort indevoured to do, that I shal give occasion to my Reader of some Meditatiõs, which perhaps he would have missed. Every helpe in this kinde deserves to be precious. I present the first part to your Honour, wherein you shall see the World both made, and smothered againe: Man in the glorie of his Creation, and the shame of his fall: Paradise at once made and lost. The first Man killing his seed, the second his brother. If in these I shall give light to the thoughts of any Reader, let him with me give the praise to him from whom that light shone forth to me. To whose grace and protection I humbly commend your Lordship: as in all observance and duty,

Your Honours unfainedly devoted

Jos. Hall.

The Creation.

WHat can I ſee, O God in thy creation, but miracles of wonders? Thou madeſt ſomething of nothing, and of that ſomething, all things. Thou which waſt without a beginning, gaveſt a beginning to Time, and to the World in time. It is the praiſe of us men, if when we have Matter, we can give faſhion: thou gaveſt a being to the Matter, without forme; thou gaveſt a forme to that Matter, and a glory to that Forme. If wee can but finiſh a ſlight and unperfect Matter according to a former patterne, it is the height of our ſkill: but to begin that which never was, whereof there was no example, whereto there was no inclination, wherein there was no poſſibilitie of that which it ſhould be, is proper onely to ſuch power as thine; the infinite power of an infinite Creator: with us, not ſo much as a thought can ariſe without ſome Matter; but here with thee, all Matter ariſes from nothing. How eaſie is it for thee to repaire all out of ſomething, which couldeſt thus fetch all out of nothing? wherein can wee now diſtruſt thee, that haſt proved thy ſelfe thus Omnipotent? Behold: to have made the leaſt Clod of nothing, is more above wonder, then to multiply a World; but now the Matter doth not more praiſe thy power, then the forme thy wiſedome: what beauty is here? what order? what order in working? what beauty in the worke.

Thou mighteſt have made all the World perfect in an inſtant, but thou wouldeſt not. That Will which cauſed thee to create, is reaſon enough why thou didſt thus create. How ſhould wee deliberate in our actions, which are ſo ſubject to imperfection? ſince it pleaſed thine infinite perfection (not out of need) to take leaſure. Neither did thy wiſdome herein proceed in time onely, but in degrees: At firſt thou madeſt nothing abſolute; firſt thou madeſt things which ſhould have being without Life; then thoſe which ſhould have life and being; laſtly, thoſe which have Being, Life, Reaſon: So we our ſelves in the ordinary courſe of generation, firſt live the life of Vegetation, then of Senſe, of Reaſon afterwards. That inſtant wherein the Heaven and the earth were created in their rude Matter, there was neither Day nor Light, but preſently thou madeſt both Light and Day. Whiles we have this example of thine, how vainely doe we hope to be perfect at once? It is well for us, if through many degrees wee can riſe to our conſummation.

But (alas) what was the very Heaven it ſelfe without Light? how confuſed? how formeleſſe? like to a goodly Body without a Soule, like a Soule without thee. Thou art Light, and in thee is no darkeneſſe. Oh how incomprehenſibly glorious is the light that is in thee, ſince one glimpſe of this created light, gave ſo lively a glory to all thy workmanſhip! This, even the brute Creatures can behold; That, not the very Angels. That ſhines forth onely to the other ſupreme World of immortality, this to the baſeſt part of thy creation. There is one cauſe of our darkeneſſe on earth, and of the utter darkeneſſe in Hell; the reſtraint of thy light. Shine thou, O God, into the vaſt corners of my ſoule, and in thy light I ſhall ſee light.

But whence, O God was that first light? the Sun was not made till the fourth day; light the first. If man had been, he might have seene all lightsome; but whence it had come he could not have seene; as in some great Pond, we see the bankes full, we see not the springs from whence that water ariseth. Thou madest the Sunne, madest the Light without the Sun, before the Sunne, that so light might depend upon thee, and not upon thy Creature. Thy power will not be limited to meanes. It was easie to thee to make an Heaven without Sunne, Light without an Heaven, Day without a Sunne, Time without a day: It is good reason thou shouldest be the Lord of thine owne workes: All meanes serve thee: why do we weake wretches distrust thee, in the want of those meanes, which thou canst either cõmand; or forbeare? How plainly wouldest thou teach us, that we Creatures need not one another, so long as we have thee? One day we shall have light againe without the Sun. Thou shalt be our Sunne; thy presence shall be our light: Light is sowne for the righteous. The Sunne and Light is but for the World below it selfe; thine onely for above. Thou giv'st this light to the Sun, which the Sunne gives to the world: That light which thou shalt once give us, shall make us shine like the Sun in glory.

Now this light which for 3. dayes was thus dispersed through the whole heavens, it pleased thee at last to gather and unite into one body of the Sun. The whole Heaven was our Sun, before the Sun was created: but now one Star must be the Treasury of Light to the heaven and Earth. How thou lovest the union and reduction of all things of one kind to their own head and centre! so the Waters must by thy cõmand be gathered into one place, the sea; so the upper Waters must be severed by these Aerie limits from the lower: so heavy substances hasten downeward, and light mount up; so the general light of the first dayes must be called into the compasse of one Sun, so thou wilt once gather thine Elect, from all coasts of Heaven, to the participatiõ of one glory. Why do we abide our thoughts and affections scattered from thee, from thy Saints, from thine anointed? Oh let this light which thou hast now spread abroad in the hearts of all thine, once meet in thee: We are as thy Heavens in this their first imperfection, be thou our Sun, unto which our light may be gathered.

Yet this light was by thee interchanged with darknes, which thou mightest as easily have commanded to be perpetuall. The continuance, even of the best things, cloyeth & wearieth: there is nothing but thy selfe; wherein there is not satiety. So pleasing is the vicissitude of things, that the inter-course even of those occurrents which in their owne nature are lesse worthy, gives more contentment, then the un-altered estate of better. The day dyes into night, and rises into the morning againe, that we might not expect any stability here below, but in perpetuall successions: It is alwayes day with thee above: the night savoureth onely of mortality: Why are we not here spiritually as we shall be hereafter? Since thou hast made us children of the light, and of the day, teach us to walke ever in the light of thy presence, not in the darknesse of error and unbeliefe.

Now in this thine inlightened frame, how fitly, how wisely are al the parts disposed; that the Method of the Creation might answer the Matter, & the forme both. Behold all purity above; below, the drugs and lees of all. The higher I go, the more perfection; each Element superior to other, not more in place then dignity; that by these staires of ascending perfection, our thoughts might climbe unto the top of all glory, & might know thine imperiall Heaven no lesse glorious above the visible, then those above the earth. Oh how miserable is the place of our pilgrimage, in respect of our home! Let my soule tread a vvhile in the steps of thine owne proceedings; and so think as thou vvroughtest: When vve vvould describe a man, vve begin not at the feet but the head: The head of thy Creation is the Heaven; how high? how spatious? how glorious? It is a vvonder that we can looke up to so admirable an height, and that the very eie is not tyred in the way. If this ascending line could be drawne right forwards, some that have calculated curiously, have found it five hundred yeares journey unto the starrie Heaven. I doe not examine their Art; O Lord I wonder rather at thine, which hast drawne so large a line about this little point of earth: for in the plainest rules of Art and experience the Compasse must needs be six times as much as halfe the height.

A height. We thinke one Iland great, but the Earth unmeasurable. If we were in that Heaven with these eyes, the whole earth (were it equally enlightned) would seeme as little to us, as now the least star in the firmament seemes to us upon Earth: And indeed, how few Starres are so little as it? And yet how many voyd and ample spaces are there beside all the Starres? The hugenesse of this thy work, O God, is little inferior for admiration to the majesty of it. But oh what a glorious heaven is this which thou hast spred over our heads? With how precious a Vault hast thou walled in this our inferiour World? What worlds of light hast thou set above us? Those things which we see, are wondrous: but those which wee beleeve and see not, are yet more. Thou dost but set out these unto view, to shew us what there is within. How proportionable are thy works to thy selfe? Kings erect not cottages, but set forth their magB nificence in sumptuous buildings: so hast thou done, O King of glory. If the lowest pavement of that Heaven of thine be so glorious, what shall wee thinke of the better parts yet unseene? And if this Sunne of thine be of such brightnesse and majesty, oh what is the glory of the Maker of it? And yet if some other of thy Starres were let downe as low as it, those other Starres would be Sunnes to us; which now thou hadst rather have admired in their distance. And if such a Skie be prepared for the use and benefit even of thine Enemies also upon Earth, how happy shal those eternall Tabernacles be, which thou hast sequestred for thine owne?

Behold then in this high and stately building of thine, I see three stages; This lowest Heaven for Fowles, for Vapours, for Meteors: The second, for the Starres: The third, for thine Angels and Saints. The first is thine outward Court, open for all: The second C is the body of thy covered Temple, wherin are those Candles of Heaven perpetually burning: The third is thine Holy of Holies. In the first is Tumult and Vanity: In the second immutability & Rest: In the third, Glory and Blessednesse. The first we feele; the second we see; the third we beleeve. In these two lower is no fecility; for neither the Fowles, nor Starres are happy. It is the third heaven alone, where thou, O blessed Trinity, enjoyest thy self, and thy glorified spirits enjoy thee. It is the manifestation of thy glorious presence that makes Heaven to be it self. This is the priviledge of thy Children: that they here seeing thee (which art invisible) by the eye of faith, have already begunne that heaven which the perfect sight of thee shal make perfect above. Let my soule then let these heavens alone, till it may see, as it is seene. That we may descend to this lowest and meanest Region of Heaven, wherewith our senses are D more acquainted, What marvels doe even here meet with us? There are thy Clouds thy bottles of Raine, Vessels as thinne as the liquor which is contained in them: there they hang, and move, though weighty with their burden: How they are upheld, and why they fall, here & now, we know not, and wonder. These thou makest one while as some Aerie Seas to hold water: another while, as some Aerie Furnaces whence thou scattерest the sudden fires unto all the parts of the Earth, astonishing the World with the fearfull noyse of that eruption: out of the midst of water thou fetchest fire, & hard stones out of the midst of thin vapours; another while as some steele-glasses, wherein the Sunne looks and shews his face in the variety of those colours which he hath not; There are thy streames of light, blazing and falling Starres, fires darted up and down in many formes, hollow openings, (& as it were) Gulfes in the skie, bright E circles about the Moone, and other Planets, Snowes, Haile: In all which it is enough to admire thine hand, though we cannot search out thine action. There are thy subtil Winds, which we heare and feele, yet neither can see their substance, nor know their causes: whence & whither they passe, and what they are thou knowest. There are thy Fowles of all shapes, colours, notes, & natures: whilst I compare these with the inhabitants of that other heaven, I find those Stars, and spirits like one another; Those Meteors and fowles, in as many varieties, as there are severall creatures. Why is this? Is it because Man (for whose sake these are made) delights in change; thou in cõstancy? Or is it, that in these thou mayest shew thine owne skill, and their imperfection? There is no variety in that which is perfect, because there is but one perfection; & so much shall we grow nearer to perfectnesse, by how much we draw nearer to unity, and uniformitie. From thence, if we goe downe to the great Deepe, the Wombe of moisture, moiſture; the Wel of fountaines, the great Pond of the World; we know not whether to wonder at the Element it ſelfe, or the gueſts which it containes. How doth that ſea of thine roare, and foame and ſwell, as if it would ſwallow up the earth? Thou ſtayeſt the rage of it by an inſenſible violence; and by a naturall miracle confineſt his waves; why it moves, and why it ſtayes, it is to us equally wonderfull: what living Mountaines (ſuch are thy Whales) rowle up and down in thoſe fearefull billowes: for greatneſſe of number, hugeneſſe of quantity, ſtrangeneſſe of ſhapes, variety of faſhions, neither aire nor earth can compare with the Waters. I ſay nothing of thy hid treaſures which thy Wiſedome hath repoſed in the bowels of the earth and ſea; How ſecretly, and how baſely are they laid up? ſecretly, that wee might not ſeeke them; baſely, that wee might not over-eſteeme them: I need not dig ſo low as theſe metalls, mineries, quarries which yeeld riches enough of obſervation to the ſoule; How many millions of wonders doth the very face of the earth offer me; Which of theſe Herbes, Flowers, Trees, Leaves, Seeds, Fruits, is there; what Beaſt, what Worme, wherein we may not ſee the footſteps of a Deity? Wherein wee may not read infiniteneſſe of power, of skill: and muſt be forced to confeſſe, that hee which made the Angels and Starres of heaven, made alſo the vermine on the earth? O God the heart of man is too ſtrait to admire enough, even that which he treads upon! What ſhall wee ſay to thee the Maker of all theſe? O Lord, how wonderfull are thy workes in all the World? In Wiſdome haſt thou made them all. And in all theſe thou ſpakeſt and they were done. Thy Will is thy Word, and thy Word is thy Deede. Our tongue, and hand, and heart are different: all are one in thee; which art ſimply one, and infinite. Here needed no helps, no inſtruments: what could be preſent with the Eternal? what needed, or what could be added to the infinite? Thine hand is not ſhortned, thy Word is ſtill equally effectuall; ſay thou the word, and my ſoule ſhall be made new againe: ſay thou the word and my body ſhall be repaired from his duſt. For all things obey thee, O Lord, why doe I not yeeld to the word of thy counſell; ſince I muſt yeeld, as all thy creatures to the word of thy command.

Of Man.

But (O God) what a little Lord haſt thou made over this great World? The leaſt corne of ſand is not ſo ſmall to the whole Earth as man is to the Heaven: when I ſee the Heavens, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; O God, what is man? who would thinke thou ſhouldeſt make all theſe Creatures for one? and that one well neere the leaſt of all? Yet none but he can ſee what thou haſt done; none but he can admire, and adore thee in what he ſeeth; how had he need to do nothing but this, ſince he alone muſt doe it? Certainely, the price and vertue of things conſiſt not in the quantity: one diamond is more worth then many Quarries of ſtone, one Loadſtone hath more vertue then Mountaines of earth: It is lawfull for us to praiſe thee in our ſelves: All thy creation hath not more wonder in it, then one of us: other Creatures thou madeſt by a ſimple command; Man, not without a divine conſultation: others at once; Man, thou didſt firſt forme, then inſpire: others in ſeveral ſhapes like to none but themſelves; Man, after thine owne Image: others with qualities fit for ſervice; Man, for dominion. Man had his name from thee; They had their names from Man. How ſhould wee be conſecrated to thee above all others ſince thou haſt beſtowed more coſt on us then others? What ſhall I admire firſt? Thy providence in the time of our Creation? Or thy power and wiſedome in the act? Firſt, thou madeſt the great houſe of the World, and furniſheſt it: then thou broughteſt in thy Tenant to poſſeſſe it. The bare walls had beene too good for us, but thy love was above our deſert: Thou that madeſt the earth ready for us before wee were, haſt by the ſame mercy prepared a place in heaven for us whiles we are on earth. The ſtage was firſt fully prepared, then was man brought forth thither, as an Actor or Spectator: that he might neither be idle nor diſcontent: behold, thou hadſt addreſſed an earth for uſe, and Heaven for contemplation: after thou hadſt drawne that large reall

Map

A Map of the World; thou didst thus abridge it into this little table of Man; hee alone consists of Heaven and Earth; Soule and body. Even this earthly part, which is vile in cõpariſõ of the other; as it is thine (O God) I dare admire it, though I can neglect it as mine owne; for lo, this heape of Earth hath an outward reference to Heaven: other Creatures grovell downe to their earth, and have all their ſenſes intent upon it; this is reared up towards Heaven, and hath no more power to looke beſide Heaven, then to tread beſide the Earth. Unto this, every part hath his wonder. The head is neareſt to heaven, as in place, ſo in reſemblance; both for roundneſſe of figure, & for thoſe divine gueſts which have their ſeat in it; There dwel thoſe majeſticall Powers of reaſon, which make a Man; all the ſenſes as they have their originall from thence, ſo they do all agree there to manifeſt their vertue: how goodly proportions haſt thou ſet in the face? ſuch as tho oft times we can give no reaſon when they pleaſe, yet tranſport us to admiration. What living glaſſes are thoſe which thou haſt placed in the midſt of this viſage, whereby all objects from farre are cleerely repreſented to the minde? and becauſe their tendernes lies open to dangers, how haſt thou defenced them with hollow bones, and with prominent browes, and lids? And leſt they ſhould be too much bent on what they ought not, thou haſt given them peculiar nerves to pull thẽ up towards the ſeat of their reſt. What a tongue haſt thou given him, the inſtrument not of taſte only, but of ſpeech? how ſweet and excellent voyces are formed by that little looſe filme of fleſh? what an incredible ſtrength haſt thou given to the weake bones of the jawes? What a comely and towre-like necke therefore moſt ſinewy, becauſe ſmalleſt? And leſt I be infinite, what able armes and active hands haſt thou framed him, whereby he can frame all things to his own conceit? In every part beauty, ſtrength, convenience meet together. Neither is there any whereof our weakeneſſe cannot give reaſon, why it ſhould be no otherwiſe. How haſt thou diſpoſed of all the inward veſſels, for all offices of life, nouriſhment, egeſtion, generation? No veine, ſinew, arterie is idle. There is no piece in this exquiſite frame, whereof the place, uſe, forme, doth not admit wonder, and exceed it: Yet this body if it be compared to the ſoule, what is it, but as a clay wall that encompaſſes a treaſure; as a wodden boxe of a Jeweller; as a coorſe caſe to a rich inſtrument; or as a maske to a beautifull face? Man was made laſt, becauſe he was worthieſt. The ſoule was inſpired laſt, becauſe yet more noble; If the body have this honour to be the companiõ of the Soule, yet withall it is the drudge. If it be the inſtrument, yet alſo the clog of that divine part. The companion for life, the drudge for ſervice, the inſtrument for action, the clog in reſpect of contemplation. Theſe externall workes are effected by it, the internall which are more noble, hindered, contrary to the bird which ſings moſt in her cage, but flyes moſt and higheſt at libertie. This my ſoule teaches me of it ſelf, that it ſelfe cannot conceive how capable, how active it is. It can paſſe by her nimble thoughts from heaven to earth in a moment: it can be all things, can comprehend all things; know that which is; and conceive that which never was, never ſhall be: Nothing can fill it, but thou which art infinite: nothing can limit it, but thou which art every-where. O God which madeſt it, repleniſh it, poſſeſſe it, dwell thou in it, which haſt appointed it to dwell in clay. The body was made of earth common to his fellowes, the ſoule inſpired immediately from God. The body lay ſenſeleſſe upon the earth like it ſelfe: the breath of lives gave it what it is; and that breath was from thee. Senſe, motion, reaſon, are infuſed into it, at once. From whence then was this quickening breath? No ayre, no earth, no water was here uſed to give helpe to this Worke: Thou that breathedſt upon man, and gaveſt him the Holy Spirit; didſt alſo breathe upon the bodie & gaveſt it a living Spirit; we are beholden to nothing but thee for our ſoule. Our fleſh is from fleſh, our ſpirit is from the God of Spirits. How ſhould our ſoules riſe up to thee, and fixe themſelves in their thoughts upõ thee, who alone created them in their infuſion, and infuſed them in their creation? How ſhould they long to returne back to the fountaine of their being, and Author of being glorious? Why may wee not ſay that this ſoule as it came from thee, ſo it is like thee? as thou, ſo it, is one, immateriall, immortall, underſtanding ſpirit, diſtinguiſhed into three powers which all make up one Spirit. So thou the wiſe Creator of all things, wouldeſt have

have ſome things to reſemble their Creator. Theſe other creatures are all body; Man is body and ſpirit; the Angels are all ſpirit not without a kinde of ſpirituall compoſition; Thou art alone after thine owne manner, ſimple, glorious, infinite; no creature can be like thee in thy proper being; becauſe it is a creature; How ſhould our finite, weake compounded nature give any perfect reſemblance of thine? Yet of all viſible creatures thou vouchſafeſt Man the neareſt correſpondence to thee: not ſo much in the naturall faculties, as in thoſe divine graces, wherewith thou beautifieſt his ſoule.

Our knowledge, holineſſe, righteouſneſſe, was like the firſt copy from which they were drawne. Behold, we were not more like thee in theſe, then now we are unlike our ſelves in their loſſe. O God we now praiſe our ſelves to our ſhame, for the better we were we are the worſe, as the ſonnes of ſome prodigall, or tainted Anceſtors, tell of the Lands, and Lordſhips which were once theirs. Onely do thou whet our deſires anſwerably to the readineſſe of thy mercies, that wee may redeeme what wee have loſt; that we may recover in thee, what wee have loſt in our ſelves. The fault ſhall be ours, if our damage prove not beneficiall.

I do not finde, that Man thus framed, found the want of an helper. His fruition of God gave him fulneſſe of contentment; the ſweetneſſe which he found in the contemplation of this new workmanſhip, and the glory of the Author, did ſo take him up, that he had neither leaſure nor cauſe of complaint. If Man had craved an helper, he had grudged at the condition of his Creation, and had queſtioned that which he had; perfection of being. But he that gave him his being, and knew him better then himſelfe, thinkes of giving him comfort in the creature, whiles he ſought none but in his Maker: He ſees our wants, and fore-caſts our reliefe, when we thinke our ſelves too happy to complaine: How ready will he be to helpe our neceſſities, that thus provides for our perfection?

God gives the nature to his creatures: Man muſt give the name; that he might ſee they were made for him, they ſhall be to him, what he will. In ſtead of their firſt homage, they are preſented to their new Lord, & muſt ſee of whom they hold. He that was ſo carefull of mans ſoveraigntie in his innocencie, how can he be careleſſe of his ſafety in his renovation.

If God had given them their names, it had not bin ſo great a praiſe of Adams memory to recall them, as it was now of his judgement (at firſt ſight) to impoſe them: he ſaw the inſide of all the creatures at firſt; (his Poſteritie ſees but their skins ever ſince;) and by this knowledge he fitted their names to their diſpoſitions. All that he ſaw were fit to be his ſervants, none to be his companions. The ſame God that findes the want, ſupplyes it. Rather then Mans innocencie ſhall want an outward comfort, God will begin a new creation. Not out of the Earth, which was the matter of Man, not out of the inferiour creatures, which were the ſervants of Man, but out of himſelfe, for deareneſſe, for equality. Doubtleſſe ſuch was Mans power of obedience, that if God had bidden him yeeld up his rib, waking, for his uſe, he had done it cheerefully: but the bounty of God was ſo abſolute, that he would not ſo much as conſult with mans Will, to make him happy. As man knew not while he was made, ſo ſhal he not know while his other ſelfe is made out of him: that the comfort might be greater, which was ſeene before it was expected.

If the Woman ſhould have been made, not without the paine, or will of the Man, ſhe might have beene upbraided with her dependance, and obligation. Now ſhee owes nothing but to her Creator: The ribbe of Adam ſleeping, can challenge no more of her, then the earth can of him. It was an happy change to Adam, of a rib, for an helper; what helpe did that bone give to his ſide? God had not made it, if it had beene ſuperfluous: and yet if Man could not have beene perfit without it, it had not beene taken out.

Many things are uſefull and convenient, which are not neceſſarie: and if God had ſeene Man might not want it, how eaſie had it beene for him, which made the Woman of that bone, to turne the fleſh into another bone? But hee ſaw man could not complaine of the want of that bone, which he had ſo multiplied, ſo animated.

O God,

A O God, wee can never bee loſers by thy changes, wee have nothing but what is thine: take from us thine owne, when thou wilt, we are ſure thou canſt not but give us better.

Of Paradiſe.

MAn could no ſooner ſee, then he ſaw himſelf happy: His eye-ſight and reaſon were both perfect at once, and the objects of both were able to make him as happy as he would. When he firſt opened his eyes, he ſaw heaven above him, earth under him, the creatures about him, B God before him, he knew what all theſe things meant as if he had been long acquainted with them all: He ſaw the heavens glorious, but farre off: his Maker thought it requiſite to fit him with a Paradiſe nearer home. If God had appointed him immediately to heaven, his body had beene ſuperfluous; It was fit his body ſhould be anſwered with an earthen Image of that heaven, which was for his ſoule: had Man been made onely for contemplation, it would have ſerved as well to have beene placed in ſome vaſt deſart, on the top of ſome barren Mountaine; But the ſame power which gave him a heart to meditate, gave him hands to worke; and worke fit for his hands. Neither was it the purpoſe of the Creator, that Man ſhould but live: pleaſure may ſtand with innocence; he that rejoyced to ſee all he had made to be good, rejoyceth to ſee all that he had made to be well. God loves C to ſee his creatures happy; Our lawful delight is his: they know not God that think to pleaſe him with making themſelves miſerable.

The Idolaters thought it a fit ſervice for Baal, to cut and launce themſelves; never any holy man lookt for thankes from the True God, by wronging himſelfe. Every Earth was not fit for Adam, but a Garden; a Paradiſe. What excellent pleaſures, and rare varieties have men found in Gardens planted by the hands of men? And yet all the World of men cannot make one twigge or leafe, or ſpire of graſſe: When he that made the matter, undertakes the faſhion, how muſt it needs be beyond our capacity, excellent? No herb, no flower, no tree was wanting there, that might be for ornament or uſe; whether for ſight, or for ſent, or for taſte. The bounty of God raught further then to neceſſity, even to comfort & recreation: Why are we niggardly to our ſelves, D when God is liberall? But for all this; if God had not there converſed with man, no abundance could have made him bleſſed.

Yet behold: that which was mans ſtore-houſe was alſo his worke-houſe; his pleaſure was his taske: Paradiſe ſerved not onely to feed his ſenſes, but to exerciſe his hands. If happineſſe had conſiſted in doing nothing, man had not beene employed; All his delights could not have made him happy in an idle life. Man therfore is no ſooner made, then he is ſet to worke: neither greatneſſe nor perfection can priviledge a folded hand; he muſt labour, becauſe he was happy; how much more we, that we may be? This firſt labour of his was, as without neceſſity, ſo without paines, without wearineſſe; how much more cheerefully we go about our buſineſſes, ſo much nearer we come to our Paradiſe.

E Neither did theſe Trees afford him onely action for his hands, but inſtruction to his heart: for here he ſaw Gods Sacraments grow before him; All other trees had a naturall uſe; theſe two in the middeſt of the Garden, a ſpirituall. Life is the act of the Soule, Knowledge the life of the Soule; the Tree of Knowledge, and the Tree of Life then, were ordained as earthly helps of the ſpirituall part: Perhaps hee which ordained the end, immortalitie of life; did appoint this Fruit as the meanes of that life. It is not for us to enquire after the life we had; and the meanes we ſhould have had. I am ſure it ſerved to nouriſh the ſoule by a lively repreſentation of that living Tree, whoſe fruit is eternall life, and whoſe leaves ſerve to heale the Nations.

O infinite mercy! Man ſaw his Saviour before him ere he had need of a Saviour; he ſaw in whom he ſhould recover an heavenly life, ere he loſt the earthly; but after he

he had tasted of the Tree of Knowledge, he might not taste of the Tree of life; That immortall food was not for a mortall stomach: Yet then did he most savour that invisible Tree of Life, when he was most restrained from the other.

O Saviour, none but a Sinner can relish thee: My taste hath been enough seasoned with the forbidden fruit, to make it capable of thy sweetnesse; Sharpen thou as well the stomacke of my soule by repenting, by beleeving: so shall I eate and in despite of Adam live for ever. The one tree was for confirmation; the other for tryall: one shewed him what life he should have; the other what knowledge he should not desire to have: Alas, he that knew all other things, knew not this one thing, that hee knew enough: how Divine a thing is knowledge, whereof even Innocencie it selfe is ambitious? Satan knew what he did: If this bait had been gold, or honour, or pleasure, Man had contemned it: who can hope to avoid error, when even mans perfection is mistaken? he lookt for speculative knowledge, he should have lookt for experimentall: he thought it had been good to know evill: Good was large enough to have perfected his knowledge, and therein his blessednesse.

All that God made was good, & the Maker of them much more good; they good in their kindes, he good in himselfe. It would not content him to know God, and his creatures; his curiositie affected to know that which God never made, evill of sinne, and evill of death, which indeed himselfe made by desiring to know them; now wee know well evill enough, and smart with knowing it. How deare hath this lesson cost us that in some cases it is better to be ignorant, and yet do the sonnes of Eve inherit this saucy appetite of their Grand-mother: How many thousand soules miscary with the presumptuous affectation of forbidden-knowledge!

O God, thou hast revealed more then wee can know, enough to make us happy: teach me a sober knowledge, and a contented ignorance.

Paradise was made for Man, yet there I see the Serpent; What marvell is it if my corruption find the serpent in my Closset, in my Table, in my bed, when our holy Parents found him in the midst of Paradise? No sooner he is entred, but he tempteth: he can no more be idle, then harmelesse; I do not see him at any other Tree; hee knew there was no danger in the rest, I see him at the Tree forbidde. How true a Serpent is he in every poynt; In his insinuation to the place; in his choice of the Tree, in his assault of the Woman, in his plausiblenesse of speech to avoid terror, in his question to move doubt, in his reply to worke distrust, in his protestation of safety, in his suggestion to envie and discontent, in his promise of gaine!

And if he were so cunning at the first, what shal we think of him now, after so many thousand yeares experience? Onely thou (O God) and these Angels that see thy face, are wiser then he; I do not aske why, when he left his goodnesse, thou didst not bereave him of his skill? Still thou wouldest have him an Angell, though an evil one: And thou knowest how to ordaine his craft to thine own glory; I do not desire thee to abate of his subtilty, but to make me wise; Let me begge it without presumption, make me wiser then Adam; even thine Image which he bore, made him not (through his owne weakenesse) wise enough to obey thee; thou offeredst him all Fruits, and restrainedst but one; Satan offered him but one, and restrained not the rest: when he choose rather to be at Satans feeding, then thine, it was just with thee to turne him out of thy gates with a curse; why shouldest thou feed a Rebell at thine owne boord?

And yet we transgresse daily & thou shutteſt not heaven against us: how is it that we finde more mercy then our fore-father? His strength is worthy of severity, our weakenesse finds pity. That God, from whose face he fled in the Garden, now makes him with shame to flie out of the Garden: those Angels that should have kept him, now keepe the gates of Paradise against him; It is not so easie to recover happinesse, as to keepe it, or leese it: Yea the same cause that drave Man from Paradise, hath also withdrawne Paradise from the World.

That fiery sword did not defend it against those waters wherewith the sins of men drowned the glory of that place: neither now doe I care to seeke where that Paradise was, which we lost; I know where that Paradise is, which wee must care to seeke

A seeke and hope to finde. As man was the Image of God, so was that earthly Paradise an Image of Heaven; both the Images are defaced, both the first Patternes are eternall: Adam was in the first, and stayed not: In the second, is the second Adam which said, This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. There was that chosen Vessell, and heard, and saw what could not be expressed: by how much the third heaven exceeds the richest Earth; so much doth that Paradise, whereto wee aspire, exceed that which wee have lost.

Of CAIN and ABEL.

B LOoke now (O my soule) upon the two first Brethren, perhaps Twins; and wonder at their contrary dispositions and estates: If the priviledges of Nature had beene worth any thing, the first borne Child should not have beene a Reprobate.

Now, that we may ascribe all to free Grace, the elder is a Murderer, the yonger a Saint; though goodnesse may bee repaired in our selves, yet it cannot bee propagated to ours: Now might Adam see the Image of himselfe in Cain, for after his owne Image begot he him; Adam slue his Posteritie, Cain his Brother: wee are too like one another in that wherein we are unlike to God: Even the cleanest graine sends forth that chaffe from which it was fanned, ere the sowing: yet is this Cain a possession, the same Eve that mistooke the fruit of the Garden, mistooke also the fruit of her owne body, her hope deceived her in both; so, many good names are ill bestowed; & our comfortable expectations in earthly things doe not seldome disappoint us.

C Doubtlesse, their education was holy, For Adam though in Paradise he could not be innocent, yet was a good man out of Paradise; his sinne and fall now made him circumspect, and since hee saw that his act had bereaved them of that Image of God, which he once had for them, he could not but labor by all holy indeavours to repaire it in them, that so his care might make amends for his trespasse. How plaine is it, that even good breeding cannot alter destinie? That which is crooked can none make straight; who would thinke that Brethren, & but two Brethren, should not love each other? Dispersed love grows weake, & fewnes of objects vseth to unite affections: If D but two brothers be left alive of many, they think that the love of all the rest should survive in them; & now the beames of their affection are so much the hotter, because they reflect mutually in a right line upon each other: yet behold, here are but two Brothers in a World, & one is the Butcher of the other. Who can wonder at dissentions amongst thousands of brethren, when he sees so deadly opposition betwixt two, the first roots of brotherhood? who can hope to live plausibly, & securely amongst so many Cains, when he sees one Cain the death of one Abel? The same Devill that set enmity betwixt Man and God; sets enmity betwixt Man and Man; and yet God said, I will put enmity betweene thy seed and her seed. Our hatred of the Serpent and his seed is from God: Their hatred of the holy Seed is from the Serpent: Behold here at once, is one person, the Seed of the Woman and of the Serpent: Cains naturall parts E are of the Woman; his vitious qualities of the Serpent: The Woman gave him to be a brother, the Serpent to be a man-slayer; all uncharitablenesse, all quarrels are of one Author: we cannot entertaine Wrath, and not give place to the Devill. Certainly, so deadly an act must needs be deeply grounded.

What then was the occasion of this capital malice? Abels sacrifice is accepted; what was this to Cain? Cains is reiected, what could Abel remedie this? Oh envie, the corrosive of all ill minds; and the roote of all desperate actions: the same cause that moved Satan to tempt the first Man, to destroy himselfe, and his posteritie, the same moves the second Man to destroy the third.

It should have beene Cains joy to see his brother accepted; It should have beene his sorrow, to see that himselfe had deserved a rejection, his Brothers example should have excited, and directed him: Could Abel have stayed Gods fire from descending cending? Or ſhould he (if he could) reject Gods acceptation, and diſpleaſe his Maker, to content, a Brother? Was Cain ever the farther from a bleſſing, becauſe his Brother obtained mercy? How proud and fooliſh is malice? which growes thus mad, for no other cauſe, but becauſe God, or Abel is not leſſe good; It hath beene an old and happy danger to be holy; Indifferent actions muſt be carefull to avoid offence; But I care not what Devill or what Cain be angry that I doe good, or receive good.

There was never any nature without envie; Every man is borne a Cain; hating that goodneſſe in another, which he neglecteth in himſelfe. There was never envie that was not bloody; for if it eate not anothers heart, it will eate our owne: but unleſſe it be reſtrained, it will ſurely feed it ſelfe with the blood of others, oft-times in act, allwayes in affection, And that God, which (in good) accepts the will for the deed, condemnes the will for the deed in evill. If there bee an evill heart, there will bee an evill eye; and if both theſe, there will be an evill hand.

How early did Martyrdome come into the world? the firſt man that dyed, dyed for Religion; who dare meaſure Gods love by outward events, when he ſees wicked Cain ſtanding over bleeding Abel; whoſe ſacrifice was firſt accepted, and now himſelfe is ſacrificed? Death was denounced to man as a curſe; yet behold, it firſt lights upon a Saint: how ſoone was it altered by the mercy of that juſt hand which inflicted it? If death had beene evill, and Life good, Cain had beene ſlaine, and Abel had ſurvived; now that it begins with him that God loves, O Death where is thy ſting?

Abel ſayes nothing, his blood cryes: Every drop of innocent blood hath a tongue, and is not onely vocall, but importunate: what a noyſe then did the blood of my Saviour make in Heaven? who was himſelfe the Shepheard and the Sacrifice; the Man that was offered, and the God to whom it was offered; The Spirit that heard both, ſayes, It ſpake better things then the blood of Abel. Abels blood called for revenge, his for mercy. Abels pleaded his owne innocency, his the ſatisfaction for all the beleeving world: Abels procured Cains puniſhment, his freed all repentant ſoules from puniſhment; better things indeed, then the blood of Abel. Better, and therefore that which Abels blood ſaid, was good: It is good, that God ſhould be avenged of ſinners. Execution of juſtice upon offenders, is no leſſe good, then rewards of goodneſſe.

No ſooner doth Abels blood ſpeake unto God, then God ſpeakes to Cain; There is no wicked man to whom God ſpeakes not, if not to his eare, yet to his heart: What ſpeech was this? Not an accuſation, but an inquirie; yet ſuch an inquirie as would inferre an accuſation. God loves to have a ſinner accuſe himſelfe, and therefore hath he ſet his Deputie in the breſt of man; neither doth God love this more then nature abhorres it: Cain anſwers ſtubbornly: The very name of Abel wounds him no leſſe, then his hand had wounded Abel; Conſciences that are without remorſe, are not without horror: wickedneſſe makes men deſperate; the Murderer is angry with God as of late for accepting his brothers oblation, ſo now for liſtning to his blood.

And now he dares anſwer God with a queſtion, Am I my brothers Keeper? where he ſhould have ſaid, Am not I my brothers murderer? Behold, hee ſcorneth to keepe whom he feared not to kill: Good duties are baſe and troubleſome to wicked minds, whiles even violences of evill are pleaſant. Yet this miſcreant; which neither had grace to avoid his ſinne, nor to confeſſe it, now that he is convinced of ſinne, and curſed for it, how he howleth, how he exclaimeth? He that cares not for the act of his ſinne, ſhall care for the ſmart of his puniſhment. The damned are weary of their torments, but in vaine. How great a madneſſe is it to complaine too late! He that would not keepe his brother, is caſt out from the protection of God; he that feared not to kill his brother, feares now, that whoſoever meets him will kill him. The troubled conſcience projecteth fearefull things, and ſinne makes even cruell men cowardly: God ſaw it was too much favour for him to die: hee therefore wills that which Cain wills. Cain would live; It is yeelded him, but for a curſe: how often doth God heare ſinners in anger? He ſhall live baniſhed from God, carrying his hell in his boſome, and the brand of Gods vengeance in his fore-head: God rejects him, the Earth repines at him, men abhorre him; himſelfe now wiſhes that death which he feared, and no man dare pleaſure him with a murder; how bitter is the end of ſin, yea, without end; ſtill

Cain

A Cain finds that he killed himſelfe more then his brother. Wee ſhould never ſin, if our fore-ſight were but as good as our ſenſe; The iſſue of ſin would appeare a thouſand times more horrible then the act is pleaſant.

Of the Deluge.

THE World was growne ſo foule with ſinne, that God ſaw it was time to waſh it with a Floud. And ſo cloſe did wickedneſſe cleave to the Authors of it, that when they were waſht to nothing, yet it would not off: yea ſo deep did it ſtick in the very graine of the earth, that God ſaw it meet to let it ſoke long under the waters. So under the Law the very veſſels B B that had touched uncleane water, muſt either be rinced, or broken. Mankinde began but with one; and yet he that ſaw the firſt man, lived to ſee the Earth peopled with a world of men: yet men grew not ſo faſt as wickedneſſe. One man could ſoone and eaſily multiply a thouſand ſins, never Man had ſo many children: ſo that when there were men enow to ſtore the earth, there were as many ſins as would reach up to heaven, whereupon the waters come downe from heaven, and ſwelled up to heaven againe; If there had not beene ſo deepe a Deluge of ſin, there had beene none of the waters; From whence then was this ſuperfluity of iniquity? Whence, but from the unequall yoke with Infidels? Theſe mariages did not beget men, ſo much as wickedneſſe, from hence religions husbands both loſt their piety, and gained a rebellious C C and godleſſe generation.

That which was the firſt occaſion of ſinne, was the occaſion of the increaſe of ſin: A woman ſeduced Adam, women betray theſe ſons of God: the beauty of the Apple betrayed the woman, the beauty of theſe women betrayed this holy ſeed: Eve ſaw, & luſted, ſo did they, this alſo was a forbidden fruit, they luſted, taſted, ſinned, died; the moſt ſins begin at the eyes, by them commonly Satan creeps into the heart: that ſoule can never be in ſafety, that hath not covenanted with his eyes.

God needed not have given theſe men any warning of his judgement; they gave him no warning of their ſins, no reſpite: yet that God might approve his mercies to the very wicked; he gives them an hundred and twenty yeares reſpite of repenting: how loth is God to ſtrike, that threats ſo long! He that delights in revenge, ſurpriſes D D his adverſarie, whereas he that gives long warnings, deſires to be prevented: if wee were not wilfull, we ſhould never ſmart.

Neither doth he give them time onely, but a faithfull teacher. It is an happy thing when he that teacheth others is righteous; Noahs hand taught them as much as his tongue. His buſineſſe in building the Arke, was a reall ſermon to the world, wherein at once were taught mercy and life to the beleever; and to the rebellious deſtruction.

Me thinks I ſee thoſe monſtrous ſonnes of Lamech comming to Noah, and aſking him, what he meanes by that ſtrange worke; whether he meane to ſale upon the dry land. To whom when he reports Gods purpoſe and his, they go away laughing at his idleneſſe, and tell one another, in ſport, that too much holineſſe hath made him mad: yet cannot they all flout Noah out of his faith, he preaches, and builds, and finiſhes. E E Doubtleſſe more hands went to this worke then his: many a one wraught upon the Arke, which yet was not ſaved in the Arke. Our outward Workes cannot ſave us, without our Faith; wee may helpe to ſave others, and periſh our ſelves: what a wonder of mercy is this that I here ſee? One poore Family called out of a world, and as it were eight graines of corne fanned from a whole barnefull of chaffe: one Hypocrite was ſaved with the reſt for Noahs ſake; not one righteous man was ſwept away for company; For theſe few was the Earth preſerved ſtill under the waters; and all kinds of Creatures upon the Waters; which elſe had beene all deſtroyed. Still the World ſtands, for their ſakes, for whom it was preſerved; Elſe fire ſhould conſume that, which could not be cleanſed by water.

This difference is ſtrange; I ſee the ſavageſt of all creatures, Lyons, Tygres, Beares, by an inſtinct frō God come to ſeeke the Arke (as we ſee ſwine fore-ſeeing a ſtorme runne home crying for ſhelter) men I ſee not; Reaſon once debauched is worſe then A bruitiſhneſſe: God hath uſe even of theſe fierce and cruell beaſts, and glory by them:

even they being created for man, muſt live by him, though to his puniſhment: how gently do they offer & ſubmit thēſelves to their Preſerver; renewing that obeyſance to this Repairer of the World, which they, before ſin, yeelded to him that firſt ſtored the World: Hee that ſhut them into the Arke when they were entred, ſhut their mouthes alſo while they did enter. The Lyons fawne upon Noah, and Daniell; What heart cannot the Maker of them mollifie.

The uncleane beaſts God would have to live, the cleane to multiply; and therfore he ſends to Noah ſeaven of the cleane, of the uncleane two: He knew the one would annoy Man with their multitude, the other would inrich him; Thoſe things are worthy of moſt reſpect which are of moſt uſe. B

But why ſeven? Surely that God that created ſeven dayes in the Weeke, and made one for himſelfe; did here preſerve of ſeven cleane beaſts, one for himſelfe, for ſacrifice; Hee gives us ſix for one in earthly things, that in ſpirituall wee ſhould be all for him:

Now the day is come, all the gueſts are entred, the Arke is ſhut, & the windows of Heaven opened: I doubt not but many of thoſe ſcoffers, when they ſaw the violence of the Waves deſcending, and aſcending, according to Noahs prediction, came wading middle-deepe unto the Arke, and importunately craved that admittance, which they once denyed: But now as they formerly rejected God, ſo are they juſtly rejected of God. Ere vengeance begin, repentance is ſeaſonable; but if judgement be once C gone out, wee cry too late. While the Goſpell ſolicites us, the doores of the Arke are open, if we neglect the time of grace, in vaine ſhall we ſeek it with teares; God holds it no mercy to pity the obſtinate. Others more bold than they, hope to over-runne the judgement, and climbing up to the high Mountaines, looke downe upon the Waters, with more hope than feare: and now when they ſee their Hills becomne Ilands, they climb up into the talleſt Trees; there with paleneſſe and horror at once look for death, & ſtudy to avoyd it, whom the waves over-take at laſt half dead with famine, and halfe with feare. Lo now from the tops of the Mountaines they deſcry the Arke floating upon the waters, and behold with envie that which before they beheld with ſcorne.

In vaine doth he fly whom God purſues. There is no way to fly from his judgements, but to fly to his mercy by repenting. The Faith of the righteous cannot bee ſo D much derided, as their ſucceſſe is magnified: How ſecurely doth Noah ride out this uproare of Heaven, Earth and waters! He heares the powring downe of the raine above his head; the ſhrieking of Men, and roaring and bellowing of Beaſts, on both ſides him; the raging and threats of the waves under him; he ſaw the miſerable ſhifts of the diſtreſſed unbeleevers; and in the meane time ſits quietly in his dry Cabbin, neither feeling, nor fearing evill: he knew that he which owed the waters, would ſteere him; that he who ſhut him in, would preſerve him. How happy a thing is Faith?
what a quiet ſafety, what a heavenly peace doth it worke in the ſoule, in the midſt of all the inundations of evill?

Now when God hath fetcht againe all the life which he had given to his unworthy creatures, and reduced the world unto his firſt forme wherein waters were over the face of the Earth, it was time for a renovation of all things to ſucceed this deſtructiō.
To have continued the Deluge long, had beene to puniſh Noah, that was righteous.
After forty dayes therfore, the Heavens cleare up, after an hundred and fifty the waters ſinke downe: How ſoone is God weary of puniſhing, which is never weary of bleſſing! yet may not the Arke reſt ſuddenly. If we did not ſtay ſome-while under Gods hand, we ſhould not know how ſweet his mercy is, and how great our thanke-fulneſſe ſhould be. The Arke though it was Noahs Fort againſt the waters; yet it was his priſon; he was ſafe in it, but pent up; he that gave him life by it, now thinkes time to give him liberty out of it.

God doth not reveale all things to his beſt ſervants: behold, He that told Noah an hundred and twenty yeares before, what day he ſhould go into the Arke, yet foretels him

A him not now in the Arke what day the Arke ſhould reſt upon the Hills,& he ſhould goe forth. Noah therefore ſends out his intelligencers, the Raven, and the Dove; whoſe wings in that vaprous ayre might eaſily deſcry further then his ſight : The Raven of quicke ſent,of groſſe feed,of tough conſtitution; no Fowle was ſo fit for diſcovery;the likelieſt things alwayes ſucceed not.He neither will venture far into that ſolitary world for feare of want, nor yet come into the Arke for love of liberty ; but houers about in uncertainties. How many carnall minds flye out of the Arke of Gods Church;and imbrace the preſent world: rather chooſing to feed upon the unſavoury carcaſſes of ſinfull pleaſures, then to be reſtrained within the ſtraight liſts of Chriſtian obedience.

The Dove is ſent forth, a Fowle,both ſwift and ſimple. Shee like a true Citizen of
B the Arke, returnes; and brings faithfull notice of the continuance of the Waters, by her reſtleſſe and empty returne;by her Olive leafe,of the abatement : how worthy are thoſe Meſſengers to be welcome,which with innocence in their lives,bring glad tydings of peace,and ſalvation,in their mouthes !

Noah rejoyces and beleeves ; yet ſtill hee waits ſeven dayes more:It is not good to devoure the favours of God too greedily;but to take them in,that we may digeſt them. O ſtrong faith of Noah, that was not weary with this delay ; ſome man would have ſo longed for the open ayre after ſo long cloſeneſſe, that upon the firſt notice of ſafety he would have uncovered, and voyded the Arke, Noah ſtayes ſeven dayes ere he will open;and well neere two Moneths ere he will forſake the Arke; and not then, unleſſe God, that commanded to
C enter, had bidden him depart. There is no action good without Faith : no Faith without a word. Happy is that man, which in all things (neglecting the counſels of fleſh and blood) depends upon the commiſſion of his Maker.

Durſt appeale to the judgement of a carnall Reader (let him not be prejudicate) that there is no Hiſtory ſo pleaſant as the Sacred. Set aſide the Majeſtie of the Inditer; none can compare with it for the Magnificence and Antiquity of the Matter, the ſweetneſſe of compiling, the ſtrange varietie of memorable occurrences: And if the delight be ſuch, what ſhall the profit be eſteemed of that which was written by GOD for the ſalvation of Men? I confeſſe, no thoughts did ever more ſweetly ſteale Mee and Time away, then thoſe which I have imployed in this ſubject, and I hope, none can equally benefit others: for, if the meere relation of theſe holy things be profitable, how much more when it is reduced to uſe? The Second Booke.

Noah.

NO ſooner is Noah come out of the Arke,but he builds an Altar: not an houſe for himſelfe,but an Altar to the Lord: Our faith will ever teach us to preferre God to our ſelves.Delayed thankfulneſſe is not worthy of acceptatiõ, Of thoſe few creatures that are left,God muſt have ſome; they are all his: yet his goodneſſe will have Man know that it was hee, for whoſe ſake they were preſerved. It was a priviledge to thoſe very bruit creatures, that they were ſaved from the waters,to be offered up in fire unto God:What a favour is it to men, to be reſerved from common deſtructions,to be ſacrificed to their Maker and Redeemer!

Loe this little fire of Noah, through the vertue of his faith,purged the world, and aſcended up into thoſe heavens,from which the waters fel,& cauſed a glorious Rainbow to appeare therein for his ſecuritie:All the ſins of the former world were not ſo unſavoury unto God, as this ſmoake was pleaſant. No perfume can be ſo ſweet as the holy obedience of the faithful.Now God that was before annoyed with the ill ſavour of ſinne,ſmels a ſweet ſavour of reſt:Behold here a new and ſecond reſt: Firſt,God reſted from making the World,now he reſts from deſtroying it:Even while we ceaſe not to offend, he ceaſes from a publike revenge. His word was enough,yet withall hee gives a ſigne,which may ſpeake the truth of his promiſe to the very eyes of men: thus he doth ſtill in his bleſſed Sacraments,which are as reall words to the ſoule.The Rain-bow is the pledge of our ſafety, which even naturally ſignifies the end of a ſhower:all the ſignes of Gods inſtitution are proper, and ſignificant.

But who would looke after all this, to have found righteous Noah, the Father of the new World, lying drunken in his tent? Who would thinke that wine ſhould overthrow him that was preſerved from the waters? That he who could not be tainted with the ſinfull examples of the former world, ſhould begin the example of a new ſinne of his own?What are we men,if we be but our ſelves? While God upholds us,no temptation can move us:when he leaves us, no temptation is too weake to overthrow us. What living man ever had ſo noble proofes of the mercy,of the juſtice of God?Mercy upon himſelfe,juſtice upon others. What man had ſo gracious approbation from his maker?Behold,he of whom in an uncleane world God ſaid,Thee onely have I found righteous,proves now uncleane when the world was purged. The Preacher of righteouſneſſe unto the former age, the King, Prieſt, and Prophet of the world renued,is the firſt that renues the ſinnes of that world which he had reproved, and which he ſaw condemned for ſin:Gods beſt children have no fence for ſins of infirmity: Which of the Saints have not once done that,whereof they are aſhamed? God that lets us fall, knowes how to make as good uſe of the ſins of his holy ones, as of their obedience:If we had not ſuch patternes,who could chooſe but deſpaire at the ſight of his ſinnes?

Yet we find Noah drunken but once. One act can no more make a good heart unrighteous,then a trade of ſinne can ſtand with regeneration:but when I looke to the effect effect of this ſinne, I cannot but bluſh and wonder; Loe, this ſin is worſe then ſin; Other ſinnes move ſhame, but hide it: this diſplayes it to the world. Adam had no ſooner ſinned, but he ſaw and abhorred his owne nakedneſſe, ſeeking to hide it even with buſhes.

Noah had no ſooner ſinned, but he diſcovers his nakedneſſe, and hath not ſo much rule of himſelfe, as to be aſhamed: One houres drunkenneſſe bewrayes that, which more then ſix hundred yeares ſobriety had modeſtly concealed; he that gives himſelfe to wine is not his owne: what ſhall we thinke of this vice, which robs a man of himſelf, and layes a beaſt in his roome? Noahs nakedneſſe is ſeen in wine, it is no unuſuall quality, in this exceſſe to diſcloſe ſecrets; drunkenneſſe doth both make imperfections, and ſhew thoſe we have, to others eyes; ſo would God have it, that we might be double aſhamed, both of thoſe weakeneſſes which we diſcover, and of that weakneſſe which moved us to diſcover. Noah is uncovered; but in the midſt of his owne Tent: It had been ſinful: though no man had ſeene it: unknowne ſins have their guilt and ſhame, and are juſtly attended with knowne puniſhments. Ungracious Cham ſaw it and laughed, his fathers ſhame ſhould have bin his; the deformity of thoſe parts from which he had his being, ſhould have begotten in him a ſecret horror, and dejection: how many graceleſſe men make ſport at the cauſes of their humiliation? Twife had Noah given him life: yet neither the name of a Father, and Preſerver, nor Age, nor vertue could ſhield him from the contempt of his owne. I ſee that even Gods Arke may nouriſh Monſters: ſome filthy toads may lye under the ſtones of the Temple. God preſerves ſome men in judgement; Better had it beene for Cham to have periſhed in the waters, then to live unto his Fathers curſe. Not content to be a witneſſe of this filthy ſight; he goes on to be a Proclaimer of it. Sinne doth ill in the eye, but worſe in the tongue: As all ſinne is a worke of darkeneſſe, ſo it ſhould be buried in darkeneſſe. The report of ſinne is oft-times as ill, as the commiſſion; for it can never be blazoned without uncharitableneſſe; ſeldome without infection: Oh the unnaturall and more then Chammiſh impietie of thoſe ſonnes; which reioyce to publiſh the nakedneſſe of their ſpirituall Parents, even to their Enemies.

Yet it was well for Noah that Cham could tell it to none but his own; and thoſe, gracious and dutifull Sonnes. Our ſhame is the leſſe, if none know our faults but our friends. Behold, how love covereth ſinnes; theſe good Sonnes are ſo farre from going forward to ſee their Fathers ſhame, that they go backeward to hide it. The cloake is laid on both their ſhoulders, they both goe backe with equall paſes, and dare not ſo much as looke backe, leſt they ſhould unwillingly ſee the cauſe of their ſhame; and wil rather adventure to ſtumble at their Fathers body, then to ſee his nakednes: How did it grieve them to thinke, that they which had ſo oft come to their holy Father with reverence, muſt now in reverence turne their backs upon him; and that they muſt now cloath him in pity; which had ſo often cloathed them in love! And which addes more to their duty, they covered him, and ſaid nothing. This modeſt ſorrow is their praiſe, and our example; The ſinnes of thoſe wee love and honour, wee muſt heare of with indignation, fearefully and unwillingly beleeve, acknowledge with griefe and ſhame, hide with honeſt excuſes, and burie in ſilence.

How equall a regard is this both of piety and diſobedience? becauſe Cham ſinned againſt his father, therfore he ſhall be plagued in his children; Iapheth is dutifull to his Father, and finds it in his poſterity. Becauſe Cham was an ill Son to his Father, therefore his ſonnes ſhall be ſervants to his Brethren; becauſe Iapheth ſet his ſhoulder to Sems, to beare the cloake of ſhame, therefore ſhall Iapheth dwell in the Tents of Sem, partaking with him in bleſſings as in duty. When we do but what we ought, yet God is thankfull to us; and rewards that, which we ſhould ſinne if we did not: who could ever yet ſhew me a man rebelliouſly undutifull to his Parents, that hath proſpered in himſelfe, and his ſeed?

Of BABEL.

HOw ſoone are men and ſinnes multiplyed? within one hundred yeares the World is as full of both, as if there had beene no Deluge. Though men could not but ſee the fearfull monuments of the ruine of their Anceſtors, yet how quickly had they forgotten a flood? Good Noah lived to ſee the World both populous, and wicked againe; and doubtleſſe oft-times repented to have beene preſerver of ſome, whom he ſaw to traduce the vices of the former World, to the renued. It could not but grieve him to ſee the deſtroyed Gyants revive out of his owne loynes, and to ſee them of his fleſh and blood tyrannize over themſelves. In his ſight Nimrod caſting off the awe of his holy Grandfather grew imperious and cruell, and made his owne kinſmen ſervants. How eaſie a thing it is for a great ſpirit to be the head of a faction; when even brethren will ſtoope to ſervitude. And now when men are combined together, evill and preſumptuous motions finde encouragement in multitudes; and each man takes a pride in ſeeming forwardeſt: we are the cheerfuller in good when wee have the aſſiſtance of company; much more in ſinning, by how much we are more prone to evill then good. It was a proud word; Come let us build us a Citie and a Tower, whoſe top may reach to Heaven.

They were newly come downe from the Hils unto the Playnes, and now thinke of raiſing up an Hill, of building in the Plaine: when their Tents were pitched upon the Mountaines of Armenia, they were as neere to Heaven as their Tower could make them; but their ambition muſt needs aſpire to an height of their owne raiſing. Pride is ever diſcontented, and ſtill ſeekes matter of boaſting in her owne workes.

How fondly doe men reckon without God, Come, let us build; As if there had been no ſtop but in their owne will: As if both Earth and time had beene theirs: Still doe all naturall men build Babel forecaſting their owne plots ſo reſolutely, as if there were no power to countermand them: It is juſt with God that peremptorie determinations ſeldome proſper: whereas thoſe things which are fearfully, and modeſtly undertaken, commonly ſucceed.

Let us build us a Citie. If they had taken God with them, it had beene commendable; eſtabliſhing of ſocieties is pleaſing to him that is the God of order: But a Tower whoſe top may reach to Heaven, was a ſhamefull arrogance, an impious preſumption. Who would thinke that wee little Ants that creepe upon this Earth, ſhould thinke of climbing up to Heaven, by multiplying of Earth?

Pride ever lookes at the higheſt: the firſt Man would know as God, theſe would dwel as God, Couetouſnes & Ambition know no limits. And what if they had reacht up to Heaven? ſome Hils are as high as they could hope to be, and yet are no whit the better; no place alters the condition of Nature: an Angell is glorious, though he be upon earth; and Man it but earth, though he be above the clouds: The neerer they had been to Heaven, the more ſubject ſhould they have been to the violences of Heaven; to thunders, lightenings, and thoſe other higher inflammations; what had this beene, but to thruſt themſelves into the hands of the revenger of all wicked inſolencies? God loves that Heaven ſhould be lookt at, and affected with all humble deſires, with the holy ambitions of faith, not with the proud imaginations of our owne atchievements.

But wherefore was all this? Not that they loved ſo much to bee neighbours to heaven, as to bee famous upon earth; It was not commodity that was here ſought, not ſafety, but glory: whither doth not thirſt of fame carie men, whether in good or evill? It makes them ſeek to climbe to heaven, it makes them not feare to runne downe headlong to hell: Even in the beſt things deſire of praiſe ſtands in competition with conſcience, and brags to have the more clients. One builds a temple to Diana, in hope of glory, intending it for one of the great wonders of the World, another in hope of Fame burnes it. He is a rare man that hath not ſome Babel of his owne, whereon hee beſtowes paines and coſt, onely to be talked of. If they had done better things in a vaine-glorious purpoſe their act had been accurſed; if they had built built houſes to God, if they had ſacrificed, prayed, lived well; the intent poyſons the action: but now both the act & the purpoſe are equally vaine, and the iſſue is as vaine as either.

God hath a ſpeciall indignation at pride above all ſinnes, and will croſſe our endevours, not for that they are evill (what hurt could bee in laying one bricke upon another?) but for that they are proudly undertaken: He could have hindred the laying of the firſt ſtone; & might as eaſily have made a trench for the foundation, the grave of the builders: but he loves to ſee what wicked men would doe; & to let fooles run themſelves out of breath: what monument ſhould they have had of their owne madneſſe, and his powerfull interruption, if the wals had riſen to no height? To ſtop them then in the midſt of their courſe, he medles not with either their hands, or their feet, but their tongues; not by pulling them out, not by looſing their ſtrings, not by making them ſay nothing, but by teaching them to ſay too much: Here is nothing varied but the ſound of Letters; even this fruſtrates the worke, and befooles the workmen: How eaſie it is for God ten thouſand wayes to correct & foreſtall the greateſt projects of men? He that taught Adam the firſt words, taught them words that never were. One cals for bricke, the other lookes him in the face, and wonders what he commands, and how and why he ſpeakes ſuch words as were never heard; and in ſtead thereof brings him morter, returning him an anſwere as little vnderſtood: each chides with other, expreſſing his choler, ſo as hee onely can underſtand himſelfe: From heat they fall to quiet intreaties, but ſtill with the ſame ſucceſſe. At firſt every man thinkes his fellow mocks him: but now perceiving this ſerious confuſion, their onely anſwer was ſilence, and ceaſing; they could not come together, for no man could call them to bee underſtood; and if they had aſſembled, nothing could be determined becauſe one could never attaine to the others purpoſe: No, they could not have the honour of a generall diſmiſſion, but each man leaves his Trowell and ſtation, more like a foole then hee undertooke it: So commonly actions begun in glory, ſhut up in ſhame. All externall actions depend upon the tongue: No man can know anothers minde, if this bee not the interpreter; hence, as there were many tongues given to ſtay the building of Babel, ſo there were as many given to build the new Ieruſalem, the Euangelicall Church. How deare hath Babel coſt all the word? At the firſt, when there was but one language, men did ſpend their time in Arts; (ſo was it requiſite at the firſt ſetling of the world) and ſo came early to perfection, but now we ſtay ſo long (of neceſſitie) upon the ſhell of tongues, that wee can hardly have time to chew the ſweet kernell of knowledge: Surely men would have growne too proud, if there had beene no Babel: It fals out oft-times that one ſinne is a remedy of a greater. Diviſion of tongues muſt needs ſlacken any worke: Multiplicitie of language had not beene given by the Holy Ghoſt, for a bleſſing to the Church, if the world had not beene before poſſeſſed with multiplicitie of languages for a puniſhment: Hence it is, that the building of our Sion riſes no faſter, becauſe our tongues are divided; Happy were the Church of God, if we all ſpake but one language: Whiles we differ, we can build nothing but Babel; difference of tongues cauſed their Babel to ceaſe, but it builds ours.

Of Abraham.

IT was fit that he which ſhould be the Father and patterne of the faithfull, ſhould be throughly tryed: for in a ſet copie every fault is important, and may prove a rule of errour: of ten trials which Abraham paſſed, the laſt was the ſoreſt: No ſonne of Abraham can hope to eſcape temptations, while he ſees that boſom, in which he deſires to reſt, ſo aſſaulted with difficulties. Abraham muſt leave his Countrey, and kinred, and live amongſt ſtrangers; The calling of God never leaves men, where it findes them; The earth is the Lords, and all places are alike to the wiſe and faithfull: If Chaldea had not been groſſely idolatrous Abraham had not left it; no bond muſt tie us to the danger of infection.

But

A But whither must hee goe? to a place he knew not, to men that knew not him: it is enough comfort to a good man, whereſoever he is, that he is acquainted with God; we are never out of our way, while we follow the calling of God. Never any man loſt by his obedience to the Higheſt; becauſe Abraham yeelded, God gives him the poſſeſſion of Canaan: I wonder more at his faith in taking this poſſeſſion, then in leaving his owne; Behold, Abraham takes poſſeſſion for that Seed which he had not; which in nature he was not like to have; of that Land whereof hee ſhould not have one foot, wherein his Seed ſhould not be ſetled of almoſt five hundred yeares after: The power of faith can prevent time, and make future things preſent; if wee be the true ſonnes of Abraham, wee have already (while wee ſojourne here on earth) the poſſeſſion of our Land of Promiſe: while we ſeeke our Countrey, we have it.

B Yet even Canaan doth not afford him bread, which yet hee muſt beleeve ſhall flow with milke and honey to his Seede: ſenſe muſt yeeld to faith; woe were us, if wee muſt judge of our future eſtate by the preſent: Ægypt gives reliefe to Abraham when Canaan cannot. In outward things, Gods enemies may fare better then his friends: Thriſe had Ægypt preſerved the Church of God, in Abraham, in Iacob, in Chriſt; God oft-times makes uſe of the world, for the behoofe of his; though without their thankes: as contrarily hee uſes the wicked for ſcourges to his owne inheritance, and burnes them; becauſe in his good they intended evill.

But what a change is this? Hitherto hath Sarah bin Abrahams wife, now Ægypt hath made her his ſiſter; feare hath turned him from a huſband to a brother; No ſtrength of faith can exclude ſome doubtings: God hath ſaid, I will make thee a great C Nation; Abraham ſaith, the Ægyptians will kill me: He that lived by his faith, yet ſhrinketh, and ſinneth. How vainely ſhall we hope to beleeve without all feare, and to live without infirmities? Some little aſperſions of unbeliefe cannot hinder the praiſe and power of faith; Abraham beleeved, and it was imputed to him for righteouſneſſe. Hee that through inconſideratenes doubted twiſe of his own life, doubted not of the life of his Seed, even from the dead and dry wombe of Sarah, yet was it more difficult that his Poſteritie ſhould live in Sarah, then that Sarahs huſband ſhould live in Ægypt: This was above nature, yet he beleeves it. Sometimes the beleever ſticks at eaſie trials, and yet breakes through the greateſt temptations without feare: Abraham was old ere this promiſe and hope of a ſonne; and ſtill the older, the more uncapable: yet God makes him waite twenty five yeares for performance. D No time is long to faith; which had learned to deferre hopes without fainting and irkeſomeneſſe.

Abraham heard this newes from the Angell, and laughed: Sara heard it, and laughed: they did not more agree in their deſire, then differ in their affection: Abraham laughed for joy; Sara for diſtruſt: Abraham laughed, becauſe he beleeved it would be ſo; Sarah, becauſe ſhe beleeved it could not bee ſo: the ſame act varies in the manner of doing, and the intention of the doer: Yet Sarah laught but within her ſelfe, and is bewraied: How God can finde us out in ſecret ſinnes! how eaſily did ſhee now thinke, that he which could know of her inward laughter, could know of her conception! & now ſhe that laughed, and beleeved not, beleeveth and feareth.

What a lively patterne doe I ſee in Abraham and Sarah, of a ſtrong faith, and E weake! of ſtrong in Abraham, and weake in Sarah: She to make God good of his word to Abraham, knowing her owne barrenneſſe, ſubſtitutes an Hagar; and in an ambition of Seed perſwades to Polygamy. Abraham had never looked to obtaine the promiſe by any other then a barren wombe, if his owne wife had not importuned him to take another: when our own apparent means faile, weake faith is put to the ſhifts; and projects ſtrange devices of her owne, to attaine the end. Shee will rather conceive by another wombe, then be childleſſe: when ſhee heares of an impoſſibilitie to nature, ſhee doubteth, and yet hides her diffidence, and when ſhe muſt beleeve, feareth, becauſe ſhe did diſtruſt: Abraham heares and beleeves, and expects and rejoyces; he ſaith not, I am old and weake; Sarah is old and barren; where are the many Nations that ſhall come from theſe withered loynes? It is enough to him that God hath ſaid it: hee ſees not the meanes, he ſees the promiſe. He knew that God would rather raiſe him up ſeed from the very ſtones that be trod upon, then himſelfe ſhould want a large and happy iſſue.

There is no faith where there is either meanes or hopes. Difficulties and impoſſibilities are the true objects of beliefe: Hereupon Gods addes to his name, that which hee would fetch from his loynes, and made his name as ample as his poſteritie: never any man was a loſer by beleeving: Faith is ever recompenced with glory.

Neither is Abraham content onely to wait for God, but to ſmart for him: God bids him cut his owne fleſh; he willingly ſacrifices this parcell of his ſkin and blood to him that was the owner of all: How glad he is to carrie this painfull marke of the love of his Creator? How forward to ſeale this covenant with blood, betwixt God & him? not regarding the ſoreneſſe of his body, in compariſon of the confirmation of his ſoule. The wound was not ſo grievous as the ſignification was comfortable. For herein he ſaw, that from his loynes ſhould come that bleſſed Seed, which ſhould purge his ſoule from all corruption. Well is that part of us loſt, which may give aſſurance of the ſalvation of the whole; our faith is not yet ſound, if it have not taught us to neglect paine for God, and more to love his Sacraments, then our owne fleſh.

Of Isaac ſacrificed.

But all theſe are but eaſie taſkes of Faith: all ages have ſtood amazed at the next; not knowing whether they ſhould more wonder at Gods command, or Abrahams obedience: Many yeares had that good Patriarch waited for his Iſaac; now at laſt hee hath joyfully received him, and that with this gratious acclamation; In Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called, and all Nations bleſſed. Behold, the ſonne of his Age, the ſonne of his Love, the ſonne of his Expectation, he that might not endure a mocke from his brother, muſt now endure the knife of his Father; Take thine onely ſonne Iſaac whom thou loveſt, and get thee to the Land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering.

Never any gold was tryed in ſo hot a fire. Who but Abraham would not have expoſtulated with God? What? Doth the God of mercies now begin to delight in blood? Is it poſſible that Murder ſhould become Piety? Or if thou wilt needs take pleaſure in an humane ſacrifice, is there none but Iſaac fit for thine Altar, none but Abraham to offer him? Shall theſe hands deſtroy the fruits of mine owne loynes? Can I not be faithfull unleſſe I be unnaturall? Or if I muſt needs bee the monſter of all Parents, will not Iſmael yet be accepted? O God where is thy mercy; where is thy juſtice? Haſt thou given me but one onely ſonne, and muſt I now ſlay him? Why did I wait ſo long for him? Why didſt thou give him me? Why didſt thou promiſe mee a bleſſing in him? What will the Heathen ſay, when they ſhall heare of this infamous maſſacre? How can thy Name, and my profeſſion eſcape a perpetuall blaſphemie? With what face ſhall I looke upon my wife Sarah, whoſe ſonne I have murdered? How ſhall ſhe entertaine the Executioner of Iſaac? Or who will beleeve, that I did this from thee? How ſhall not all the World ſpet at this holy cruelty, and ſay, There goes the man that cut the throat of his owne ſonne. Yet if he were an ungracious or rebellious child, his deſerts might give ſome colour to this violence: but to lay hands on ſo deare, ſo dutifull, ſo hopefull a ſonne, is uncapable of all pretences.

But grant that thou which art the God of Nature, mayſt either alter or neglect it; what ſhall I ſay to the truth of thy promiſes? Can thy Juſtice admit contradictions? Can thy decrees be changeable? Canſt thou promiſe and diſappoint? Can theſe two ſtand together, Iſaac ſhall live to be the father of Nations; and Iſaac ſhall now dye by the hand of his Father? when Iſaac is once gone, where is my ſeed, where is my bleſſing? O God, if thy commands and purpoſes be capable of alteration, alter this bloody ſentence, and let thy firſt word ſtand.

Theſe would have been the thoughts of a weake heart: But God knew that he ſpake to an Abraham, and Abraham knew that he had to doe with a God: Faith had taught him not to argue, but obey. In a holy wilfulneſſe he either forgets Nature, or deſpiſes despiſes her, he is ſure that what God commands, is good; that what he promiſes is infallible, and therefore is careleſſe of the meanes, and truſts to the end.

In matters of God, whoſoever conſults with fleſh and blood ſhall never offer up his Iſaac to God; there needs no counſellor when wee know God is the Commander; here is neither grudging nor deliberating, nor delaying: His faith would not ſuffer him ſo much as to be ſorie for that hee muſt doe. Sarah her ſelfe may not know of Gods charge, and her husbands purpoſe, leſt her affection ſhould have overcome her faith; leſt her weakneſſe now growne importunate, ſhould have ſaid, Diſobey God and dye. That which he muſt doe, he will doe; he that hath learned not to regard the life of his ſonne, had learned not to regard the ſorrow of his wife. It is too much tenderneſſe to reſpect the cenſures and conſtructions of others, when wee have a direct word from God. The good Patriarch riſes early, and addreſſes himſelfe to his ſad journey. And now muſt he travell three whole dayes to this execution; and ſtill muſt Iſaac be in his eye, whom all this while he ſeemes to ſee bleeding upon the pile of Wood which hee caries; there is nothing ſo miſerable as to dwell under the expectation of a great evill; That miſery which muſt bee, is mitigated with ſpeed, and aggravated with delay. All this while if Abraham had repented him, hee had leiſure to returne. There is no ſmall tryall, even in the very time of tryall: now when they are come within ſight of the choſen Mountaine, the ſervants are diſmiſſed; what a devotion is this that will abide no witneſſes? he will not ſuffer two of his owne Vaſſals to ſee him doe that, which ſoone after all the world muſt know he hath done; yet is not Abraham afraid of that pietie, which the beholders could not ſee without horror, without reſiſtance, which no eare could heare of without abomination. What ſtranger could have endured to ſee the Father carie the knife and fire, inſtruments of that death, which hee had rather ſuffer then inflict? The ſonne ſecurely carrying that burden which muſt carie him?

But if Abrahams heart could have knowne how to relent, that queſtion of his deare, innocent, and religious ſonne had melted it into compaſſion, My Father, Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the ſacrifice? I know not whether that word, My Father, did not ſtrike Abraham as deepe as the knife of Abraham could ſtrike his ſonne yet doth he not ſo much as thinke, (O miſerable man, that may not at once be a Sonne to ſuch a God, and Father to ſuch a Sonne:) Still he perſiſts, and conceales, and where hee meant not, propheſies, My ſonne, God ſhall provide a Lambe for the burnt offering.

The heavie tidings was loath to come forth: It was a death to Abraham to ſay what he muſt doe: He knowes his owne faith to act this, he knowes not Iſaacs to endure it. But now when Iſaac hath helped to build the Altar, whereon he muſt be conſumed; he heares (not without aſtoniſhment) the ſtrange command of God, the finall will of his Father: My ſonne thou art the Lambe which God hath provided for this burnt-offering: If my blood would have excuſed thee, how many thouſand times had I rather to give thee mine owne life, then take thine! Alas, I am full of dayes, and now of long lived not but in thee; Thou mighteſt have preſerved the life of thy Father, and have comforted his death, but the God of us both hath choſen thee: He that gave thee unto me miraculouſly, bids me by an unſuall meanes returne thee unto him. I need not tell thee, that I ſacrifice all my worldly joyes, yea and my ſelfe in thee, but God muſt be obeyed; neither art thou too deare for him that cals thee: Come on my Sonne, reſtore the life that God hath given thee by me: offer thy ſelfe willingly to theſe flames; ſend up thy ſoule cheerfully unto thy glory; and know that God loves thee above others, ſince he requires thee alone to be conſecrated in ſacrifice to himſelfe.

Who cannot imagine with what perplexed mixtures of paſſions, with what changes of countenance, what doubts, what feares, what amazement, good Iſaac received this ſudden meſſage from the mouth of his Father, how he queſtioned, how hee pleaded? But when he had ſomewhat digeſted his thoughts, and conſidered that the Author was God, the actor Abraham, the action a ſacrifice, hee now approves himſelfe the ſonne of Abraham; now he encourages the trembling hand of his Father; with whom he ſtrives in this praiſe of forwardneſſe and obedience; now he offers his hands and feet to the cords, his throat to the knife, his body to the Altar; and growing ambitious of the ſword and fire, intreats his Father to doe that, which he would have done though he had diſſwaded him. O holy emulation of faith! O bleſſed agreement of the Sacrificer, and Oblation: Abraham is as ready to take, as Iſaac to give; he binds thoſe deare hands which are more ſtraitly bound with the cords of duty, and reſolution: he layes his ſacrifice upon the wood, which now before-hand burnt inwardly with the heavenly fire of zeale and devotion.

And now having kiſſed him his laſt, not without mutuall teares; he lifts up his hand to fetch the ſtroke of death at once, not ſo much as thinking, perhaps God will relent after the firſt wound. Now the ſtay of Abraham, the hope of the Church, lyes on bleeding under the hand of a father, what bowels can chooſe but yearne at this ſpectacle? which of the ſavageſt Heathens that had bin now upon the hill of Moriah, & had ſeen (through the buſhes) the ſword of a Father hanging over the throat of ſuch a ſonne, would not have beene more perplexed in his thoughts, then that unexpected ſacrifice was in thoſe briers? yet hee whom it neereſt concerned, is leaſt touched; Faith hath wrought the ſame in him, which crueltie would in others, Not to be moved, He contemnes all feares, and overlookes all impoſſibilities; His heart tels him that the ſame hand which raiſed Iſaac from the dead wombe of Sarah, can raiſe him againe from the aſhes of his ſacrifice: with this confidence was the hand of Abraham now falling upon the throat of Iſaac, who had given himſelfe for dead, and rejoyced in the change; when ſuddenly the Angell of God interrupts him, forbids him, commends him.

The voyce of God was never ſo welcome, never ſo ſweet, never ſo ſeaſonable as now: It was the tryall that God intended, not the fact; Iſaac is ſacrificed, and is yet alive: and now both of them are more happy in that they would have done, then they could have been diſtreſſed if they had done it. Gods charges are oft-times harſh in the beginnings and proceeding, but in the concluſion alwayes comfortable: true ſpirituall comforts are commonly late and ſudden: God defers on purpoſe, that our tryals may be perfect, our deliverance welcome, our recompence glorious; Iſaac had never beene ſo precious to his father, if he had not been recovered from death; if he had not been as miraculouſly reſtored, as given,: Abraham had never beene ſo bleſſed in his ſeed, if he had not neglected Iſaac for God.

The onl y way to finde comfort in any earthly thing, is to ſurrender it (in a faithfull careleſneſſe) into the hands of God. Abraham came to ſacrifice, he may not goe away with dry hands: God cannot abide that good purpoſes ſhould be fruſtrate. Leſt either he ſhould not doe that, for which hee came: or ſhould want meanes of ſpeedy thanksgiving for ſo gracious a diſappointment; Behold a Ram ſtands ready for the ſacrifice, and as it were, proffers himſelfe to this happy exchange. Hee that made that Beaſt, brings him thither, faſtens him there: Even in ſmall things there is a great providence; what myſteries there are in every act of God! the onely Sonne of God upon this very hill, is laid upon the Altar of the Croſſe; and ſo becomes a true ſacrifice for the world, that yet he is raiſed without impeachment, and exempted from the power of death: The Lamb of God which takes away the ſins of the World, is here really offred, and accepted: One Saviour in two figures; in the one, dying; reſtored in the other. So Abraham whiles he exerciſes his faith, confirmes it; and rejoyces more to foreſee the true Iſaac in that place offered to death for his ſinnes, then to ſee the carnall Iſaac preſerved from death for the reward of his Faith. Whatſoever is deareſt to us upon earth is our Iſaac; happy are we if we can ſacrifice it to God; thoſe ſhall never reſt with Abraham, that cannot ſacrifice with Abraham.

Of Lot and Sodom.

BEfore Abraham and Lot grew rich, they dwelt together; now their wealth ſeparates them; Their ſocietie was a greater good then their riches: Many a one is a loſer by his wealth; who would account thoſe things good which make us worſe? It had beene the duty of yong Lot to offer rather then to chooſe; to yeeld rather then contend: who would not here thinke Abraham the Nephew, and Lot the Uncle? It is no diſparagement for greater perſons to begin treaties of Peace. Better doth it beſeeme every ſonne of Abraham to winne with love, then to ſway with power. Abraham yeelds over this right of his choiſe; Lot takes it. And behold, Lot is croſſed in that which he choſe, Abraham is bleſſed in that which was left him; God never ſuffers any man to leeſe by an humble remiſſion of his right in a deſire of peace.

Wealth hath made Lot not only undutifull, but covetous; hee ſees the goodly Plaines of Iordan, the richneſſe of the ſoyle, the commoditie of the Rivers, the ſituation of the Cities, and now not once inquiring into the conditions of the Inhabitants, hee is in love with Sodom: Outward appearances are deceitfull guides to our judgement, or affections: they are worthy to be deceived that value things as they ſeeme: It is not long after that Lot payes deare for his raſhneſſe. He fled for quietneſſe with his Uncle, and finds Warre with ſtrangers: Now is he carried priſoner with all his ſubſtance, by great Enemies; Abraham muſt reſcue him, of whom he was forſaken. That wealth which was the cauſe of his former quarrels, is made a prey to mercileſſe Heathens: That place which his eye covetouſly choſe, betrayes his life and goods. How many Chriſtians, whiles they have looked at gaine, have loſt themſelves.

Yet this ill ſucceſſe hath neither driven out Lot, nor amended Sodom, he ſtill loves his commoditie, and the Sodomites their ſinnes: wicked men grow worſe with afflictions, as water growes more cold after an heat: And as they leave not ſinning, ſo God leaves not plaguing them, but ſtill followes them with ſucceſſion of judgements. In how few yeares hath Sodom forgot ſhe was ſpoiled, and led captive? If that wicked Citie had beene warned by the ſword, it had eſcaped the fire; but now this viſitation hath not made ten good men, in thoſe five Cities: How fit was this heape for the fire, which was all chaffe? Onely Lot vexed his righteous ſoule with the ſight of their uncleanneſſe; Hee vexed his owne ſoule, for who bade him ſtay there? yet becauſe he was vexed, he is delivered. He eſcapeth their judgement from whoſe ſinnes he eſcaped. Though he would be a gueſt of Sodom, yet becauſe hee would not entertaine their ſinnes, he becomes an Hoſt to the Angels: Even the good Angels are the executioners of Gods judgement: There cannot be a better or more noble act then to doe juſtice upon obſtinate Malefactors.

Who can be aſhamed of that which did not miſ-beſeeme the very Angels of God? Where ſhould the Angels lodge but with Lot? the houſes of holy men are full of theſe heavenly Spirits, when they know not; they pitch their Tents in ours, and viſit us, when we ſee not; and when we feele not, protect us, It is the honour of Gods Saints to be attended by Angels. The filthy Sodomites now flocke together, ſtirred up with the fury of envy, and luſt, & dare require to doe that in troopes, which to act ſingle, had been too abominable, to imagine. unnatural. Continuance & ſociety in evil makes wicked men outrageous, and impudent: It it not enough for Lot to bee the Witneſſe, but he muſt be the Bawd alſo. (Bring forth theſe men that we may know them.)

Behold: even the Sodomites ſpeake modeſtly; though their acts & intents be villanous. What a ſhame is it for thoſe which profeſſe purity of heart, to ſpeake filthily? The good man craves and pleads the lawes of hoſpitalitie; and when hee ſees headſtrong purpoſes of miſchiefe, chooſes rather to bee an ill Father, then an ill hoſt: His intention was good, but his offer was faulty; If through his allowance the Sodomites had defiled his daughters; it had beene his ſinne: If through violence they had defiled his gueſts; it had beene onely theirs: There can be no warrant for us to ſinne, leſt others ſhould ſinne: It is for God to prevent ſinnes with judgements, it is not for men to prevent a greater ſinne with a leſſe: the beſt mindes when they are troubled, yeeld inconſiderate motions; as water that is violently ſtirred, ſends up bubbles: God meant better to Lot, then to ſuffer his weake offer to be accepted: Thoſe which are bent upon villany are more exaſperated by diſſwaſion; as ſome ſtrong ſtreames, when they are reſiſted by flood-gates, ſwell over the bankes.

Many a one is hardned by the good word of God; and in ſtead of receiving the counſell, rages at the meſſenger: When men are growne to that paſſe, that they are no whit better by afflictions, and worſe with admonitions, God findes it time to ſtrike; Now Lots gueſts begin to ſhew themſelves Angels, and firſt deliver Lot in Sodom, then from Sodom: Firſt ſtrike them with blindneſſe, whom they will after conſume with fire: How little did the Sodomites thinke that vengeance was ſo neere them! While they went groping in the ſtreets, and curſing thoſe whom they could not find: Lot with the Angels is in ſecure light, and ſees them miſerable, & fore-ſees them burning. It is the uſe of God to blind and beſot thoſe whom hee meanes to deſtroy: The light which they ſhall ſee ſhall be fierie, which ſhall be the beginning of an everlaſting darkneſſe, and a fire vnquenchable: Now they have done ſinning, & God begins to judge: Wickedneſſe hath but a time, the puniſhment of wickedneſſe is beyond all time. The reſidue of the night was both ſhort and dangerous. Yet good Lot, though ſought for by the Sodomites, and newly pull'd into his houſe by the Angels, goes forth of his houſe to ſeeke his ſonnes in law: No good man would bee ſaved alone; faith makes us charitable with neglect of all perill: Hee warnes them like a Prophet, and adviſes them like a Father, but both in vaine; hee ſeemes to them as if he mocked, and they doe more then ſeeme to mock him againe. Why ſhould to morrow differ from other dayes? Who ever ſaw it raine fire? Or whence ſhould that brimſtone come? Or if ſuch ſhowres muſt fall, how ſhall nothing burne but this Valley? So to carnall men preaching is fooliſhneſſe, devotion idleneſſe, the Prophets mad men, Paul a babler: Theſe mens incredulitie is as worthy of the fire, as the others vncleanneſſe. He that beleeves not, is condemned already.

The meſſengers of God do not onely haſten Lot, but pull him by a gracious violence out of that impure Citie. They thirſted at once after vengeance upon Sodom, and Lots ſafety; they knew God could not ſtrike Sodom, till Lot were gone out, and that Lot could not be ſafe within thoſe walls. Wee are all naturally in Sodom: if God did not hale us out, whiles wee linger, wee ſhould be condemned with the world. If God meet with a very good field, hee puls up the weeds, and lets the corne grow; if indifferent, he lets the corne and weeds grow together; if very ill, he gathers the few eares of corne, and burnes the weeds.

Oh the large bounty of God which reacheth not to us onely, but to ours! God ſaves Lot for Abrahams ſake, and Zoar for Lots ſake; If Sodom had not beene too wicked, it had eſcaped: Were it not for Gods deare children, that are intermixed with the world, it could not ſtand: The wicked owe their lives unto thoſe few good, whom they hate and perſecute. Now at once the Sunne riſes upon Zoar, and fire fals downe upon Sodom: Abraham ſtands upon the hill, and ſees the Cities burning; It is faire weather with Gods children, when it is foulеſt with the wicked. Thoſe which burned with the fire of luſt, are now conſumed with the fire of vengeance: They ſinned againſt nature; and now againſt the courſe of nature, fire deſcends from Heaven, and conſumes them: Lot may not ſo much as looke at the flame, whether for the ſtay of his paſſage, or the horror of the ſight, or tryall of his faith, or feare of commiſeration. Small precepts from God are of importance; obedience is as well tryed, and diſobedience as well puniſhed in little, as in much: His wife doth but turne back her head, whether in curioſitie, or unbeleefe, or love & compaſſion of the place; ſhee is turned into a monument of diſobedience: what doth it availe her not to be turned into aſhes in Sodom, when ſhe is turned into a pillar of Salt in the Plaine? He that ſaved a whole Citie, cannot ſave his owne Wife. God cannot abide ſmall ſinnes, in thoſe whom hee hath obliged. If wee diſpleaſe him, God can as well meet with us out of Sodom: Lot now comne into Zoar, marvels at the ſtay of her, whom hee might not before looke backe

A backe to call; and ſoone after returning to ſeeke her, beholds this change with wonder and griefe: He finds Salt in ſtead of fleſh, a Pillar in ſtead of a Wife: he findes Sodome conſumed, and her ſtanding; and is more amazed with this, by how much it was both more neere him, and leſſe expected.

When God delivers us from deſtruction, he doth not ſecure us from all afflictions: Lot hath loſt his Wife, his allies, his ſubſtance, and now betakes himſelfe to an uncomfortable ſolitarineſſe.

Yet though he fled from company, he could not fly from ſinne: He who could not be tainted with uncleanneſſe in Sodom, is overtaken with drunkenneſſe and inceſt in a Cave: Rather then Satan ſhall want baits, his owne daughters will prove Sodomites; Thoſe which ſhould have comforted, betrayed him: How little are ſome
B hearts moved with judgements? The aſhes of Sodom, and the Pillar of Salt, were not yet out of their eye, when they dare thinke of lying with their owne Father. They knew that whileſt Lot was ſober, he could not be unchaſte: Drunkenneſſe is the way to all beſtiall affections, and acts. Wine knowes no difference either of perſons, or ſins: No doubt, Lot was afterwards aſhamed of his inceſtuous Seed, and now wiſhed he had come alone out of Sodom; yet even this unnaturall bed was bleſſed with increaſe; and one of our Saviours worthy Anceſtors ſprung after from this line. Gods election is not tyed to our meanes; neither are bleſſings or curſes ever traduced; The chaſte bed of holy Parents hath ofttimes bred a monſtrous generation; and contrarily God hath raiſed ſometimes an holy Seed from the drunken bed of Inceſt, or Fornication. It hath beene ſeene, that weightie eares of corne have growne out
C of the compaſſe of the tilled field: Thus will God magnifie the freedome of his owne choyce; and let us know that wee are not borne, but made good.

THE LORD DENNY,

C BARON OF WALTHAM,

My ſingular good Patron,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Honorable,

D Know, and in all humilitie confeſſe, how weake my Diſcourſe is, and how unworthie of this Divine ſubject, which I have undertaken; which if an Angell from Heaven ſhould ſay hee could ſufficiently comment upon, I ſhould diſtruſt him: Yet this let me ſay (without any vaine boaſting) that theſe E thoughts (ſuch as they are) through the bleſſing of God, I have woven out of my ſelfe, as holding it (after our Saviours rule) better to give, than to receive. It is eaſier to heape together large volumes of others labours, then to worke out leſſer of our owne: and the ſuggeſtion of one new thought, is better then many repeated.

This part (which together with the Author is yours) ſhall preſent to your Lordſhip the buſieſt of all the Patriarks, together with with his tryalls, and ſucceſſe: wherein you ſhall ſee Eſau ſtripped by fraud of that which he willingly ſold, Jacobs hard adventures for the bleſſing, and no leſſe hard ſervices for his wives and ſubſtance, his dangerous encounters ending joyfully, the rape of his only daughter, ſeconded with the trecherous murder of his ſonnes; Judahs wrong to Thamar repayed by his owne uncleanneſſe; Joſephs ſale, impriſonment, honour, pietie; The ſinne of his brethren well beſtowed, well anſwered. I ſo touch at the uſes of all theſe, as one that knowes it is eaſie to ſay more, and impoſſible to ſay enough. God give a bleſſing to my endeavours, and a pardon to my weakneſſe, to your Lordſhip an increaſe of his graces, and perfection of all happineſſe.

Your Lordſhips humbly and

The Third Booke.

Of Jacob and Esau.

OF all the Patriarkes, none made so little noyse in the World as Isaac; none lived either so privately, or so innocently: Neither know I whether hee approved himselfe a better sonne or an Husband. For the one; he gave himselfe over to the knife of his Father, and mourned three yeares for his Mother: for the other he sought not to any handmaids bed, but in a chaste forbearance reserved himselfe for twenty yeeres space, and prayed: Rebecca was so long barren, his prayers prooved more effectuall then his seed. At last she conceived, as if she had been more then the daughter in law to Sarah; whose son was given her, not out of the power of Nature, but of her husbands Faith.

God is oft better to us then we would: Isaac prayes for a sonne; God gives him two at once: Now, she is no lesse troubled with the strife of the children in her wombe, then before with the want of children: we know not when we are pleased; that which we desire, oft-times discontents us more in the fruition; wee are ready to complaine both full and fasting. Before Rebecca conceived, she was at ease: Before spirituall regeneration there is all peace in the soule: No sooner is the new man formed in us, but the flesh conflicts with the spirit: There is no grace where is no unquietnesse: Esau alone would not have striven: Nature will ever agree with it selfe; Never any Rebecca conceived onely an Esau; or was so happy as to conceive none but a Iacob; She must be the mother of both, that she may have both joy and exercise. This strife began early; Every true Israelite begins his warre with his being. How many actions which we know not of, are not without presage and signification?

These two were the champions of two Nations; the field was their mothers wombe; their quarrell precedency and superiority; Esau got the right of Nature; Iacob of grace: yet that there might be some pretence of equality, lest Esau should out-run his brother into the World, Iacob holds him fast by the heele: So his hand was borne before the others foot: But because Esau was some minutes the elder; that the younger might have better claime to that which God had promised, he buies that which hee could not winne : If either by ſtrife, or purchaſe, or ſuit, wee can attaine ſpirituall bleſſings, wee are happy : If Iacob had come forth firſt, hee had not knowne how much hee was bound to G O D for the favour of his advancement.

There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, ſo deare bought as this broth of Iacob; In both the receiver and the Eater is accurſed : Every true ſonne of Iſrael will be content to purchaſe ſpirituall favours with earthly; And that man hath in him too much of the blood of Eſau, which will not rather dye then forgoe his birth-right.

But what hath careleſſe Eſau loſt, if having ſold his birth-right, he may obtaine the bleſſing? Or what hath Iacob gained, if his brothers Veniſon may countervaile his Pottage? Yet thus hath old Iſaac decreed; who was not now more blind in his eyes, then in his affections : God had forewarned him that the elder ſhould ſerve the yonger, yet Iſaac goes about to bleſſe Eſau.

It was not ſo hard for Abraham to reconcile Gods promiſe and Iſaacs ſacrifice, as for Iſaac to reconcile the ſuperiority of Iacob, with Eſaus benediction: for Gods hand was in that, in this none but his owne: The deareſt of Gods Saints have beene ſometimes tranſported with naturall affectiõs: He ſaw himſelf preferred to Iſmael, though the elder; he ſaw his Father wilfully forgetting nature at Gods command, in binding him for ſacrifice; He ſaw Eſau lewdly matched with Heathens; and yet he will remẽber nothing, but, Eſau is my firſt born; But how gratious is God, that when we would, will not let us ſinne : And ſo orders our actions, that wee doe not what we will, but what we ought.

That God which had ordained the Lordſhip to the yonger, will alſo contrive for him the bleſſing; what he will have effected, ſhall not want meanes : the Mother ſhall rather defeat the Sonne, & beguile the Father, then the Father ſhall beguile the choſen ſonne of his bleſſing. What was Iacob to Rebecca more then Eſau? or what Mother doth not more affect the elder? But now God inclines the love of the Mother to the yonger, againſt the cuſtome of nature, becauſe the father loves the elder, againſt the promiſe : The affections of the Parents are divided, that the promiſe might be fulfilled; Rebeccaes craft ſhall anſwer Iſaacs partiality : Iſaac would unjuſtly turne Eſau into Iacob, Rebecca doth as cunningly turne Iacob into Eſau : her deſire was good, her meanes were unlawfull : God doth oft-times effect his juſt will by our weakeneſſes; yet neither thereby juſtifying our infirmities, nor blemiſhing his owne actions.

Here was nothing but counterfeiting; a fayned Perſon, a fayned Name, fayned Veniſon, a fained Anſwer, and yet behold, a true bleſſing; but to the man, not to the meanes: Thoſe were ſo unſound, that Iacob himſelfe doth more feare their curſe then hope for their ſucceſſe. Iſaac was now both ſimple and old : yet if he had perceived the fraud, Iacob had beene more ſure of a curſe, then he could be ſure, that he ſhould not be perceived.

Thoſe which are plaine-hearted in themſelves, are the bittereſt enemies to deceit in others: Rebecca preſuming upon the Oracle of God, and her husbands ſimplicity, dare be his ſurety for the danger, his counſellor for the cariage of the buſineſſe, his cooke for the dyet, yea dreſſes both the meat and the man: and now puts words into his mouth, the diſh into his hand, the garments upon his backe, the Goats haire upon the open parts of his body, and ſends him in thus furniſhed for the bleſſing, Standing, no doubt, at the doore, to ſee how well her leſſon was learned, how well her device ſucceeded. And if old Iſaac ſhould by any of his ſenſes have diſcerned the guile, ſhe had ſoone ſtept in and undertaken the blame, and urged him with the known wil of God concerning Iacobs Dominion, and Eſaus ſervitude, which either age or affection had made him forget.

And now ſhe wiſhes ſhe could borrow Eſaus tongue as well as his garments, that ſhe might ſecurely deceive all the ſenſes of him, which had ſuffered himſelfe more dangerouſly deceived with his affection : But this is paſt her remedy : her ſonne muſt name himſelfe Eſau with the voice of Iacob. It is hard if our tongue doe not bewray wray what we are, in ſpight of our habit. This was enough to worke Iſaac to a ſuſpition, to an inquiry, not to an incredulity: He that is good of himſelfe, will hardly beleeve evill of another; And will rather diſtruſt his owne ſenſes, then the fidelity of thoſe he truſted: All the ſenſes are ſet to examine; none ſticketh at the judgement but the Eare; to deceive that, Iacob muſt ſecond his diſſimulation with three lyes at one breath: I am Eſau, as thou badſt me, my Veniſon: one ſinne entertained fetcheth in another: and if it be forced to lodge alone, eyther departeth or dyeth: I love Iacobs bleſſing but I hate his lye. I would not do that wilfully, which Iacob did weakly, upon condition of a bleſſing: He that pardoned his infirmitie, would curſe my obſtinateneſſe.

Good Iſaac ſets his hands to try whether his eares informed him aright; he feeles the hands of him whoſe voyce he ſuſpected: that honeſt heart could not thinke, that the skinne might more eaſily be counterfeited, then the lungs: A ſmall ſatisfaction contents thoſe whom guiltineſſe hath not made ſcrupulous: Iſaac beleeves and bleſſes the younger Sonne in the garments of the elder: If our heavenly Father ſmell upon our backes the ſavour of our elder brothers Robes, we cannot depart from him unbleſſed.

No ſooner is Iacob gone away full of the joy of his bleſſing, then Eſau comes in, ful of the hope of the bleſſing: And now he cannot repent him to have ſold that in his hunger for pottage; which in his pleaſure he ſhall buy againe with Veniſon. The hopes of the wicked faile them whē they are at higheſt, where as Gods children find thoſe comforts in extremitie which they durſt not expect.

Now he comes in blowing, and ſweating for his reward, and finds nothing but a repulſe: Lewd men when they thinke they have earned of God, and come proudly to challenge favour, receive no anſwer, but, Who art thou? Both the Father and the Son wonder at each other, the one with feare, the other with griefe; Iſaac trembled and Eſau wept; the one upon conſcience, the other upon envy: Iſaacs heart now told him that he ſhould not have purpoſed the bleſſing where he did; and that it was due to him unto whom it was given, and not purpoſed; hence he durſt not reverſe that which he had done with Gods will; beſides his owne: For now he ſaw that he had done unwilling Juſtice: God will find both time and meanes to reclaime his owne, to prevent their ſins, to manifeſt and reforme their errours. Who would have looked for teares from Eſau? Or who dare truſt teares, when he ſees them fall from ſo graceleſſe Eyes?

It was a good word, Bleſſe me alſo my Father; Every miſcreant can wiſh himſelfe wel: No man would be miſerable, if it were enough to deſire happineſſe: Why did he not rather weep to his brother for the pottage; then to Iſaac for a bleſſing? If he had not then ſold, he had not needed now to beg: It is juſt with God to deny us thoſe favours which wee were careleſſe in keeping, and which wee undervalued in enjoying. Eſaus teares findes no place for Iſaacs repentance; Except it were that he hath done that by wile, which he ſhould have done upon duty.

No motive can cauſe a good heart to repent that he hath done well; How happy a thing it is to know the ſeaſons of grace, and not to neglect them! how deſperate to have known and neglected them! theſe teares were both late and falſe; the teares of rage, of envy, of carnall deſire; worldly ſorrow cauſeth death: yet whiles Eſau howles out thus for a bleſſing, I heare him cry out of his Fathers ſtore (Haſt thou but one bleſſing, my Father?) of his brothers ſubtlety (Was he not rightly called Iacob?) I doe not heare him blame his owne deſerts. He did not ſee, while his Father was deceived, and his Brother crafty, that God was juſt, and himſelfe uncapable: he knew himſelfe profane, and yet claimes a bleſſing.

Thoſe that care not to pleaſe God, yet care for the outward favours of God, and are ready to murmure if they want them, as if God were bound to them, and they free. And yet ſo mercifull is God, that he hath ſecond bleſſings for thoſe that love him not, and gives them all they care for. That one bleſſing of ſpecial love is for none but Iſrael; but thoſe of common kindneſſe are for them that can ſell their birth-right: this bleſſing was more then Eſau could be worthy of: yet like a ſecond Cain, he reſolves to kill his brother, becauſe he was more accepted: I know not whether he were a worſe ſonne or brother; he hopes for his fathers death, and purpoſes his brothers, and vowes to ſhed blood in ſtead of teares. But wicked men cannot be ſo il as they would; that ſtrong Wreſtler againſt whō Iacob prevailed, prevailed with Eſau, and turned his wounds into kiſſes. An hoaſt of men came with Eſau, an army of Angels met Iacob: Eſau threatned, Iacob prayed: His prayers and preſents have melted the heart of Eſau into love. And now in ſtead of the grim and ſterne countenance of an executioner, Iacob ſees the face of Eſau, as the face of God. Both men and Devils are ſtinted, the ſtouteſt heart cannot ſtand out againſt God. He that can wreſtle earneſtly with God, is ſecure from the harmes of men. Thoſe minds which are exaſperated with violence, and cannot be broken with feare, yet are bowed with love; when the wayes of a man pleaſe God, he will make his enemies at peace with him.

Of Iacob and Laban.

ISAACS life was not more retyred and quiet, then Iacobs was buſie and troubleſome. In the one I ſee the image of contemplatiō, of action in the other. None of the Patriarkes ſaw ſo evill dayes as he; from whom juſtly hath the Church of God therfore takē her name. Neither were the faithful ever ſince called Abrahamits, but Iſraelites. That no time might be loſt, he began his ſtrife in the womb; after that, he flyes for his life from a cruell brother to a cruell uncle. With a ſtaffe goes he over Jordan alone, doubtfull and comfortleſſe, not like the ſonne of Iſaac. In the way, the earth is his bed, and a ſtone his pillow; Yet even there he ſees a viſion of Angels: Iacobs heart was never ſo full of joy, as when his head lay hardeſt. God is moſt preſent with us in our greateſt dejection, and loves to give comfort to thoſe that are forſaken of their hopes.

He came farre to finde out an hard friend; and of a Nephew becomes a Servant. No doubt when Laban heard of his ſiſters ſonne, he looked for the Camels and attendance that came to fetch his ſiſter Rebecca; not thinking that Abrahams ſervant could come better furniſhed then Iſaacs ſonne: but now when he ſaw nothing but a ſtaffe, he looks upon him, not as an Uncle, but a maſter. And while he pretends to offer him a wife as the reward of his ſervice, he craftily requires his ſervice as the dowry of his wife.

After the ſervice of an hard Apprentiſhip hath earned her whom he loved; his wife is changed, and he is in a ſort, forced to an unwilling adultery: His mother had before in a cunning diſguiſe ſubſtituted him who was the younger ſonne, for the elder; and now not long after, his father in law by a like fraud, ſubſtitutes to him the elder daughter for the younger: God comes oftentimes home to us in our owne kinde; and even by the ſinne of others payes us our owne, when we looke not for it. It is doubtfull whether it were a greater croſſe to marry whom he would not, or to be diſappointed of her whom he deſired. And now he muſt begin a new hope, where he made account of fruition. To raiſe up an expectation once fruſtrate, is more difficult, then to continue a long hope drawne on with likelihoods of performance: yet thus deare is Iacob content to pay for Rachel, fourteene yeares ſervitude. Commonly Gods children come not eaſily by their pleaſures: what miſeries will not love digeſt and overcome? And if Iacob were willingly conſumed with heat in the day, and froſt in the night, to become the ſonne in law to Laban, What ſhould we refuſe to be the ſonnes of God?

Rachel whom he loved, is barren: Lea which was deſpiſed, is fruitfull; How wiſely God weighes out to us our favours and croſſes in an equall ballance: ſo tempering our ſorrowes that they may not oppreſſe, and our joyes that they may not tranſport us: each one hath ſome matter of envy to others, and of griefe to himſelfe.

Lea envies Rachels beauty, and love; Rachel envies Leahs fruitfulneſſe: Yet Leah would not be barren nor Rachel bleare-eyed. I ſee in Rachel the image of her Grandmother Sara; both in her beauty of perſon, in her actions, in her ſucceſſe: ſhee alſo will

A will needs ſuborne her handmaid to make her a mother; and at laſt beyond hope her ſelfe conceiveth: It is a weake greedineſſe in us to affect Gods bleſſings by unlawfull meanes; what a proofe and praiſe had it beene of her faith if ſhee had ſtayed Gods leaſure, & would rather have endured her barrenneſſe, then her huſbands polygamy? Now ſhe ſhewes her ſelfe the daughter of Laban; the Father for covetouſneſſe, the daughters for emulation have drawne ſinne into Iacobs bed: he offended in yeelding, but they more in ſoliciting him, and therefore the fact is not imputed to Iacob, but to them. In thoſe ſinnes which Satan drawes us into, the blame is ours: in thoſe which we move each other unto, the moſt fault and puniſhment lyes upon the tempter. None of the Patriarkes divided his ſeed into ſo many wombes as Iacob; none was ſo much croſſed in his ſeed.

B Thus, rich in nothing but wives and children, was he now returning to his Fathers houſe, accounting his charge his wealth. But God meant him yet more good. Laban ſees that both his Family and his Flocks were well encreaſed by Iacobs ſervice. Not his love therefore but his gaine makes him loth to part. Even Labans covetouſneſſe is made by God the meanes to enrich Iacob.

Behold; his ſtrait maſter entreats him to that recompence, which made his nephew mighty, and himſelfe envious: God conſidering his hard ſervice, payd him wages out of Labans folds. Thoſe Flocks and Herds had but few ſpotted Sheepe and Goates, untill Iacobs covenant: then (as if the faſhion had beene altered) they all ran into Party-colours; the moſt and beſt (as if they had beene weary of their former owner) changed the colours of their young, that they might change their maſter.

C In the very ſhapes and colours of brute creatures there is a divine hand, which diſpoſeth them to his owne ends. Small and unlikely meanes ſhall prevaile where God intends an effect. Little pilled ſticks of Haſell or poplar laid in the troughs, ſhall inrich Iacob with an increaſe of his ſpotted flocks; Labans ſonnes might have tried the ſame meanes, & failed: God would have Laban know that he put a difference betwixt Iacob and him, that as for fourteene yeares he had multiplied Iacobs charge of cattel to Laban, ſo now for the laſt ſix yeares he would multiply Labans flock to Iacob: and if Laban had the more, yet the better were Iacobs: Even in theſe outward things, Gods children have many times ſenſible taſtes of his favours above the wicked.

I know not whether Laban were a worſe Uncle, or Father, or Maſter: he can like well Iacobs ſervice, not his wealth. As the wicked have no peace with God, ſo the D godly have no peace with men; for if they proſper not, they are deſpiſed; if they proſper, they are envied. This Uncle, whom his ſervice had made his father, muſt now upon his wealth be fled from as an enemy, and like an enemy purſues him: If Laban had meant to have taken a peaceable leave, hee had never ſpent ſeven dayes journey in following his innocent ſonne: Iacob knew his churliſhneſſe, and therefore reſolved rather to bee unmannerly then injured: well might he thinke, that hee, whoſe oppreſſion changed his wages ſo often in his ſtay, would alſo abridge his wages in the parting; now therefore he wiſely prefers his owne eſtate to Labans love: it is not good to regard too much the unjuſt diſcontentment of worldly men, and to purchaſe unprofitable favour with too great loſſe.

Behold: Laban followes Iacob with one troope, Eſau meets him with another,

E both with hoſtile intentions: both goe on till the utmoſt point of their execution: both are prevented ere the execution. God makes fooles of the enemies of his Church, he lets them proceed, that they may be fruſtrate, and when they are gone to the utmoſt reach of their tether, hee puls them backe to their taſke with ſhame: Loe now, Laban leaves Iacob with a kiſſe; Eſau meets him with a kiſſe: Of the one he hath an oath, teares of the other, peace with both: Who ſhall need to feare man that is in league with God?

But what a wonder is this? Iacob received not ſo much hurt from all his enemies, as from his beſt friend. Not one of his hairs periſhed by Laban, or Eſau; yet he loſt a joint by the Angell, and was ſent halting to his grave: He that knowes our ſtrength, yet will wreſtle with us for our exerciſe, and loves our violence and importunity.

O happy loſſe of Iacob! he loſt a joint, and wonne a bleſſing: It is a favour to halt from God, yet this favour is ſeconded with a greater. He is bleſſed becauſe he would rather halt, then leave ere he was bleſſed. If he had left ſooner, he had not halted, but he had not proſpered. That man ſhall goe away ſound but miſerable, that loves a limbe more then a bleſſing. Surely if Iacob had not wreſtled with God he had beene foyled with evills: how many are the troubles of the righteous!

Now long after, Rachel, the comfort of his life, dyeth. And when, but in her travell, and in his travell to his Father? When hee had now before digeſted in his thoughts the joy and gratulation of his aged Father, for ſo welcome a burden. His children, (the ſtaffe of his age) wound his ſoule to the death. Reuben proves inceſtuous, Iudah adulterous, Dinah raviſhed, Simeon and Levi murderous, Er and Onan ſtricken dead, Ioſeph loſt, Simeon impriſoned; Beniamin, the death of his Mother, the Fathers right-hand, indangered; himſelfe driven by famine in his old age to die amongſt the Ægyptians, a people that held it abomination to eat with him. If that Angell, with whom he ſtrove, and who therefore ſtrove for him, had not delivered his ſoule out of all adverſity, he had beene ſupplanted with evills, and had beene ſo farre from gaining the name of Iſrael, that he had loſt the name of Iacob: now what ſonne of Iſrael can hope for good dayes, when he heares his Fathers were ſo evill? It is enough for us, if when we are dead, wee can reſt with him in the land of Promiſe. If the Angell of the Covenant once bleſſe us, no paine, no ſorrowes can make us miſerable.

Of Dinah.

I Find but one only daughter of Iacob. Who muſt needs therfore be a great darling to her Father; and ſhe ſo miſcaries, that ſhe cauſes her Fathers griefe to be more thē his love. As her mother Leah; ſo ſhe hath a fault in her eyes; which was Curioſitie: She will needs ſee, and be ſeene; and whiles ſhe doth vainely ſee, ſhe is ſeene luſtfully. It is not enough for us to looke to our owne thoughts, except we beware of the provocations of others: If we once wander out of the liſts that God hath ſet us in our callings, there is nothing but danger: Her Virginity had beene ſafe, if ſhe had kept home; or if Sechem had forced her in her mothers tent, this loſſe of her Virginity had beene without her ſin; now ſhe is not innocent that gave the occaſion.

Her eyes were guilty of the temptation; Onely to ſee is an inſufficient warrant to draw us into places of ſpirituall hazard: If Sechem had ſeene her buſie at home, his love had been free from out-rage, now the lightneſſe of her preſence gave encouragement to his inordinate deſires. Immodeſty of behaviour makes way to luſt; & gives life unto wicked hopes: yet Sechem bewrayes a good nature even in filthineſſe; He loves Dinah after his ſinne, and will needs marry her whom he had defiled. Commonly luſt ends in loathing: Ammon abhors Thamar as much, after his act, as before, he loved her; and beats her out of doores, whom he was ſicke to bring in. But Sechem would not let Dinah fare the worſe for his ſinne. And now hee goes about to entertaine her with honeſt love whom the rage of his luſt had diſhoneſtly abuſed. Her deflouring ſhall be no prejudice to her, ſince her ſhame ſhal redound to none but him, and he will hide her diſhonour with the name of an Huſband. What could he now doe, but ſue to his Father, to hers, to her ſelfe, to her brethren; intreating that with humble ſubmiſſion, which he might have obtained by violence? Thoſe actions which are ill begun, can hardly be ſalved up with late ſatisfactions; whereas good entrances give ſtrength unto the proceedings, and ſucceſſe to the end.

The yong mans father doth not only cōſent, but ſolicite; and is ready to purchaſe a daughter either with ſubſtance, or paine: The two old men would have ended the matter peaceably; but youth commonly undertakes raſhly, and performes with paſſion. The ſons of Iacob thinke of nothing but revenge, and (which is worſt of all) begin their cruelty with craft, and hide their craft with Religion: A ſmiling malice is moſt deadly;

A deadly; and hatred doth moſt rancle the heart, when it is kept in and diſſembled. We cannot give our ſiſter to an uncircumciſed man; here was God in the mouth, and Satan in the heart: The bloodieſt of all projects have ever wont to be coloured with Religion: becauſe the worſe any thing is, the better ſhew it deſires to make; and contrarily, the better colour is put upon any vice, the more odious it is; for as every ſimulation addes to an evill, ſo the beſt addes moſt evill: themſelves had taken the daughters and ſiſters of uncircumciſed men; yea Iacob himſelfe did ſo; why might not an uncircumciſed man obtaine their ſiſter? Or if there be a difference of giving and taking; it had beene well, if it had not beene only pretended. It had beene an happy Raviſhment of Dinah, that ſhould have drawne a whole Countrey into the boſome of the Church: but here was a Sacrament intended, not to the good of the B ſoule, but to murder of the body: It was a hard taſke for Hamor and Sechem, not onely to put the knife to their owne foreſkins, but to perſwade a multitude to ſo paineful! a condition.

The ſons of Iacob diſſemble with them, they with the people. (ſhall not their flocks and ſubſtance be ours?) Common profit is pretended; whereas onely Sechems pleaſure is meant. No motive is ſo powerfull to the vulgar ſort, as the name of Commoditie; The hope of this, makes them prodigall of their ſkin and blood; Not the love to the Sacrament, not the love to Sechem: ſiniſter reſpects draw more to the profeſſion of Religion, then conſcience: if it were not for the loaves and fiſhes, the traine of Chriſt would bee leſſe. But the Sacraments of God miſ-received, never proſper in the end. Theſe men are content to ſmart, ſo they may gaine.

C And now that every man lyes ſore of his owne wound, Simeon and Levi ruſh in armed, and wound all the males to death: Curſed be their wrath, for it was fierce, and their rage, for it was cruell. Indeed, filthineſſe ſhould not have beene wrought in Iſrael: yet murder ſhould not have beene wrought by Iſrael; if they had beene fit Judges (which were but bloody executioners) how far doth the puniſhment exceed the fault? To puniſh above the offence, is no leſſe injuſtice, then to offend: one offendeth, and all feele the revenge: yea all (though innocent) ſuffer that revenge, which he that offended, deſerved not. Sechem ſinneth, but Dinah tempted him: She that was ſo light, as to wander abroad alone, only to gaze, I feare was not over difficult to yeeld: And if having wrought her ſhame, he had driven her home with diſgrace to her Fathers tent, ſuch tyrannous luſt had juſtly called for blood: but now hee craves, and offers,
D and would pay deare for but leave to give ſatisfaction.

To execute rigour upon a ſubmiſſe offender, is more mercileſſe than juſt: Or if the puniſhment had bin both juſt and proportionable from another, yet from them which had vowed peace and affinitie, it was ſhamefully unjuſt. To diſappoint the truſt of another, and to neglect our owne promiſe and fidelity for private purpoſes, adds faithleſneſſe unto our cruelty. That they were impotent, it was through their circumciſion: what impiety was this; in ſtead of honouring an holy ſigne, to take an advantage by it? What ſhrieking was there now in the ſtreets of the City of the Hivites? And how did the beguiled Sichemits, when they ſaw the ſwords of the two brethren, die curſing that Sacrament in their hearts, which had betrayed them? Even their curſes were the ſins of Simeon and Levi; whoſe fact, though it were abhorred by E their Father, yet it was ſeconded by their brethren. Their ſpoile makes good the others ſlaughter. Who would have looked to have found this outrage in the family of Iacob? How did that good Patriarke, when he ſaw Dinah come home blubbered and wringing her hands, Simeon and Levi ſprinkled with blood, wiſh that Leah had beene barren as long as Rachel! Good Parents have griefe enough (though they ſuſtaine no blame) for their childrens ſinnes: What great evills ariſe from ſmall beginnings! The idle curioſity of Dinah hath bred all this miſchiefe; Raviſhment followes upon her wandring, upon her raviſhment murder, upon the murder ſpoyle: It is holy and ſafe to be jealous of the firſt occaſions of evill, either done or ſuffered.

Of IUDAH and THAMAR.

I Finde not many of Iacobs ſonnes more faulty then Iudah; who yet is ſingled out from all the reſt, to be the royall Progenitor of Chriſt; and to be honoured with the dignity of the birth-right, that Gods election might not be of merit, but of grace: Elſe howſoever hee might have ſped alone, Thamar had never beene joyned with him in this line: Even Iudah marries a Canaanite; it is no marvell though his Seed proſper not: And yet that good children may not be too much diſcouraged with their unlawfull propagation, the Fathers of the promiſed Seed are raiſed from an inceſtuous bed: Iudah was very yong, ſcarce from under the rod of his Father, yet he takes no other counſell for his marriage, but from his owne eyes, which were like his ſiſter Dinahs, roving and wanton: what better iſſue could be expected from ſuch beginnings? Thoſe proud Jewes that glory ſo much of their Pedigree and Name from this Patriarke, may now chooſe whether they will have their mother a Canaanite, or an Harlot: Even in theſe things oft-times the birth followes the belly. His eldeſt ſonne Er, is too wicked to live; God ſtrikes him dead ere he can leave any iſſue, not abiding any ſiens to grow out of ſo bad a ſtocke: Notorious ſinners God reſerves to his owne vengeance. Hee doth not inflict ſenſible judgments upon all his enemies, leſt the wicked ſhould thinke there were no puniſhment abiding for them elſe-where. Hee doth inflict ſuch Judgments upon ſome, leſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of evill. It were as eaſie for him to ſtrike all dead, as one: but hee had rather all ſhould be warned by one; and would have his enemies find him mercifull, as well as his children, juſt: His brother Onan ſees the judgment, and yet followes his ſins. Every little thing diſcourages us from good; nothing can alter the heart that is ſet upon evil: Er was not worthy of any love; but though hee were a miſcreant, yet he was a brother. Seed ſhould have been raiſed to him; Onan juſtly leeſes his life with his Seed; which hee would rather ſpill, then lend to a wicked brother. Some duties we owe to humanity, more to neereneſſe of blood. Ill deſervings of others can be no excuſe for our injuſtice, for our uncharitableneſſe. That which Thamar required, Moſes afterward, as from God, commanded; the ſucceſſion of brothers into the barren bed: Some lawes God ſpake to his Church, long ere he wrote them: while the Author is certainly knowne, the voyce and the finger of God are worthy of equall reſpect. Iudah hath loſt two ſonnes, and now doth but promiſe the third, whom hee ſinnes in not giving. It is the weakneſſe of nature, rather to hazard a ſinne, then a danger; and to neglect our owne duty, for wrongfull ſuſpicion of others: though he had loſt his ſon in giving him, yet hee ſhould have given him: A faithfull mans promiſe is his debt, which no feare of damage can diſpenſe with.

But whereupon was this ſlackneſſe? Iudah feared that ſome vnhappineſſe in the bed of Thamar was the cauſe of his ſonnes miſcariage; whereas it was their fault, that Thamar was both a widow and childleſſe. Thoſe that are but the patients of evill, are many times burdened with ſuſpitions; and therefore are ill thought of, becauſe they fare ill: Afflictions would not bee ſo heavy, if they did not lay us open unto uncharitable conceits.

What difference God puts betwixt ſinnes of wilfulneſſe, and infirmitie? The ſons pollution is puniſhed with preſent death, the fathers inceſt is pardoned, and in a ſort proſpereth

Now Thamar ſeekes by ſubtlety, that which ſhe could not have by award of juſtice; the neglect of due retributions drives men to indirect courſes; neither know I whether they ſin more in righting themſelves wrongfully, or the other in not righting them: She therefore takes upon her the habit of an harlot, that ſhe might performe the act: If ſhe had not wiſhed to ſeeme an Whore, ſhe had not worn that attire, nor choſen that place. Immodeſty of outward faſhion or geſture bewrayes evill deſires: the heart that meanes well, will never wiſh to ſeeme ill; for commonly we affect to ſhew better then wee are. Many harlots will put on the ſemblances of chaſtity,

A chastity, of modesty; never the contrary. It is no trusting those, which doe not wish to appeare good. Iudah esteemes her by her habit: and now the sight of an harlot hath stird up in him a thought of lust; Satan finds well, that a fit object is halfe a victory.

Who would not be ashamed to see a sonne of Iacob thus transported with filthy affections? At the first sight he is inflamed; neither yet did he see the face of her, whom he lusted after: it was enough motive to him that she was a woman; neither could the presence of his neighbour, the Adullamite, compose those wicked thoughts, or hinder his unchast acts.

That sinne must needs be impudent which can abide a witnesse: yea so hath his lust besotted him, that he cannot discerne the voyce of Thamar, that he cannot fore-
B see the danger of his shame in parting with such pledges. There is no passion, which doth not for the time bereave a man of himselfe: Thamar had learned not to trust him without a pawne; He had promised his sonne to her as a daughter, and failed; now he promised a Kid to her, as an Harlot, and performeth it: Whether his pledge constrained him or the power of his word, I inquire not: Many are faithfull in all things save those which are the greatest, and dearest; If his credit had beene as much indangered in the former promise he had kept it: now hath Thamar requited him. She expected long the enjoying of his promised son, and he performed not: but here hee performes the promise of the Kid, and shee stayes not to expect it. Iudah is sorry that he cannot pay the hire of his lust, and now feareth lest he shall be beaten with his owne staffe, lest his signet shall be used to confirme, and seale his reproach,
C resolving not to know them; and wishing they were unknowne of others. Shame is the easiest wages of sin, and the surest, which ever begins first in our selves. Nature is not more forward to commit sinne, then willing to hide it.

I heare as yet of no remorse in Iudah, but feare of shame. Three moneths hath his sinne slept, and now when he is securest, it awakes and baites him. Newes is brought him that Thamar begins to swell with her conception, and now he swels with rage, and cals her forth to the flame like a rigorous Judge, without so much as staying for the time of her deliverance, that his cruelty in this Justice, should be no lesse ill, then the unjustice of occasioning it. If Iudah had not forgotten his sinne, his pittie had beene more then his hatred to this of his daughters: How easie is it to detest those sinnes in others, which we flatter in our selves! Thamar doth not deny the sinne, nor D refuse punishment, but cals for that partner in her punishment, which was her partner in the sinne: the staffe, the signet, the handkerchiefe accuse and convince Iudah, and now he blushes at his owne sentence, much more at his act, and cries out, Shee is more righteous then I. God will finde a time to bring his children upon their knees, and to wring from them penitent confessions: And rather then he will not have them soundly ashamed, he will make them the trumpets of their owne reproach.

Yet doth he not offer himselfe to the flame with her, but rather excuses her by himselfe. This relenting in his own case, shamed his former zeale: Even in the best men nature is partiall to it selfe: It is good so to sentence others frailties, that yet we remember our owne, whether those that have beene, or may be: with what shame, yea with what horror must Iudah needs looke upon the great belly of Thamar, and
E on her two sons, the monuments of his filthinesse?

How must it needs wound his soule, to heare them call him both Father and Grandfather; to call her mother and sister? If this had not cost him many a sigh, hee had no more escaped his Fathers curse, then Reuben did: I see the difference not of sinnes, but of men: Remission goes not by the measure of the sinne, but the qualitie of the sinner; yea rather the mercy of the Forgiver: Blessed is the man (not that sinnes not, but) to whom the Lord imputes not his sinne.

Of Ioseph.

I Marvell not that Ioseph had the double portion of Iacobs land, who had more then two parts of his ſorrowes: None of his ſonnes did ſo truly inherit his afflictions; none of them was either ſo miſerable, or ſo great: ſuffering is the way to glory: I ſee in him not a cleerer type of Chriſt, then of every Chriſtian; Becauſe wee are deare to our Father, and complaine of ſinnes, therefore are we hated of our carnall brethren: If Ioſeph had not medled with his brothers faults, yet hee had beene envied for his Fathers affection; but now malice is met with envy: There is nothing more thankleſſe or dangerous then to ſtand in the way of a reſolute ſinner: That which doth correct and oblige the penitent, makes the wilfull minde furious and revengefull.

All the ſpight of his brethren cannot make Ioſeph caſt off the livery of his Fathers love: what need we care for the cenſures of men, if our hearts can tell us that we are in favour with God?

But what meant young Ioſeph to adde unto his owne envy, by reporting his dreames? The concealement of our hopes, or abilities, hath not more modeſty, then ſafety: Hee that was envied for his dearneſſe, and hated for his intelligence, was both envied and hated for his dreames. Surely God meant to make the relation of theſe dreames, a means to effect that which the dreames imported. We men work by likely meanes; God by contraries. The maine quarrell was, Behold, this dreamer commeth. Had it not been for his dreames, he had not bin ſold: if he had not bin ſold, he had not bin exalted. So Ioſephs ſtate had not deſerved envy, if his dreams had not cauſed him to be envied. Full little did Ioſeph thinke, when he went to ſeeke his brethren, that this was the laſt time he ſhould ſee his fathers houſe: Full little did his brethren thinke, when they ſold him naked to the Iſmaelites, to have once ſeene him in the Throne of Ægypt. Gods decree runnes on; and while we either thinke not of it, or oppoſe it, is performed.

In an honeſt and obedient ſimplicity, Ioſeph comes to enquire of his brethrens health, and now may not returne to carry newes of his own miſery: whiles he thinkes of their welfare, they are plotting his deſtruction; Come, let us ſlay him. Who would have expected this cruelty in them, which ſhould be the fathers of Gods Church? It was thought a favour, that Reubens entreaty obtained for him that he might be caſt into the pit alive; to dye there. He lookt for brethren, and behold murtherers; Every mans tongue, every mans fiſt was bent againſt him: Each one ſtrives who ſhall lay the firſt hand upon that changeable coate, which was dyed with their Fathers love, and their envy: And now they have ſtript him naked; and haling him by both armes, as it were, caſt him alive into his grave. So in pretence of forbearance, they reſolve to torment him with a lingring death: the ſavageſt robbers could not have beene more mercileſſe: for now beſides (what in them lyes) they kill their Father in their brother. Nature, if it once degenerate, growes more monſtrous and extreme, then a diſpoſition borne to cruelty.

All this while Ioſeph wanted neither words nor teares; but like a paſſionate ſuppliant (bowing his bare knees to them, whom he dreamed ſhould bow to him) intreats & perſwades by the deare name of their brotherhood, by their profeſſion of one common God, for their Fathers ſake, for their owne ſoules ſake, not to ſinne againſt his blood. But envy hath ſhut out mercy; and makes them not onely forget themſelves to be brethren, but men: What ſtranger can thinke of poore innocent Ioſeph, crying naked in that deſolate & dry pit (only ſaying that he moyſtned it with teares) and not be moved? Yet his hard-hearted brethren ſit them downe careleſly, with the noyſe of his lamentation in their eares, to eate bread, not once thinking by their owne hunger, what is was for Ioſeph to be affamiſht to death.

Whatſoever they thought, God never meant that Ioſeph ſhould periſh in that pit; and therefore hee ſends very Iſmaelites to ranſome him from his Brethren; the ſeed of him that perſecuted his brother Iſaac, ſhall now redeeme Ioſeph from his brethrens brethrens perſecution. When they came to fetch him out of the pit, hee now hoped for a ſpeedie diſpatch; That ſince they ſeemed not to have ſo much mercy, as to prolong his life, they would not continue ſo much cruelties, as to prolong his death.

And now, when hee hath comforted himſelfe with hope of the favour of dying, behold, death exchanged for bondage: how much is ſervitude, to an ingenuous nature, worſe then death? For, this is common to all; that, to none but the miſerable: Iudah meant this well, but God better: Reuben ſaved him from the ſword, Iudah from affamiſhing: God will ever raiſe up ſome ſecret favourers to his owne, amongſt thoſe that are moſt malicious. How well was this favour beſtowed? If Ioſeph had dyed for hunger in the pit, both Iacob, and Iudah, and all his brethren had dyed for hunger in Canaan. Little did the Iſmaelitiſh Merchants know what a treaſure they bought, carried and ſold; more precious then all their Balmes and Myrrhs. Little did they thinke that they had in their hands the Lord of Ægypt, the Jewell of the World. Why ſhould we contemne any mans meanneſſe, when wee know not his deſtiny?

One ſinne is commonly uſed for the vaile of another: Ioſephs coat is ſent home dipped in blood, that whiles they ſhould hide their owne cruelty, they might afflict their Father, no leſſe then their brother. They have deviſed this reall lye, to puniſh their old Father, for his love, with ſo grievous a monument of his ſorrow.

Hee that is mourned for in Canaan, as dead, proſpers in Ægypt under Potiphar; and of a Slave, is made Ruler: Thus God meant to prepare him for a greater charge; hee muſt firſt rule Potiphars Houſe, then Pharaohs Kingdome: his owne ſervice is his leaſt good, for his very preſence procures a common bleſſing: A whole Family ſhall fare the better for one Ioſeph. Vertue is not lookt upon alike with all eyes: his fellowes praiſe him, his Maſter truſts him, his Miſtreſſe affects him too much. All the ſpight of his brethren was not ſo great a croſſe to him, as the inordinate affection of his Miſtreſſe. Temptations on the right hand, are now more perillous, and hard to reſiſt, by how much they are more plauſible and glorious; But the heart that is bent upon God, knowes how to walke ſteddily, and indifferently betwixt the pleaſures of ſinne, and feares of evill. He ſaw, this pleaſure would advance him: He knew what is was to be a Minion of one of the greateſt Ladies in Ægypt: yet reſolves to contemne it: A good heart will rather lye in the duſt, then riſe by wickedneſſe. How ſhall I doe this, and ſinne againſt God?

He knew that all the honours of Ægypt could not buy off the guilt of one ſinne, & therefore abhors not onely her bed, but her company: He that will be ſafe from the acts of evill, muſt wiſely avoid the occaſions. As ſinne ends ever in ſhame, when it is committed, ſo it makes us paſt ſhame, that we may commit it; The impudent ſtrumpet dare not onely ſolicite, but importune, and in a ſort force the modeſty of her good ſervant; She layes hold on his garment; her hand ſeconds her tongue.

Good Ioſeph found it now time to flee, when ſuch an enemie purſued him: how much had he rather leave his cloake, then his vertue! and to ſuffer his Miſtreſſe to ſpoyle him of his livery, rather then he ſhould blemiſh her honour, or his Maſters in her, or God in either of them.

This ſecond time is Ioſeph ſtript of his garment; before in the violence of envy, now of luſt; before of neceſſitie, now of choyce: Before, to deceive his Father, now his Maſter: for behold, the pledge of his fidelity, which he left in thoſe wicked hands, is made an evidence againſt him, of that which he refuſed to doe: therefore did hee leave his cloake becauſe he would not doe that; of which he is accuſed and condemned, becauſe he left it: what ſafety is there againſt great Adverſaries, when, even arguments of innocence are uſed to convince of evill? Luſt yeelded unto, is a pleaſant madneſſe, but is a deſperate madneſſe when it is oppoſed: No hatred burnes ſo furiouſly, as that which ariſes from the quenched coales of love.

Malice is witty to deviſe accuſations of others out of their vertue, and our owne guiltineſſe: Ioſeph either pleads not, or is not heard.

Doubtleſſe he denied the fact, but hee dare not accuſe the offender: There is not onely the praiſe of patience, but oft-times of wiſedome, even in unjuſt ſufferings:

Hee

Hee knew that God would finde a time to cleare his innocence, and to regard his chaſte faithfulneſſe.

No priſon would ſerve him, but Pharaohs. Ioſeph had lyen obſcure and not beene knowne to Pharaoh, if he had not beene caſt into Pharaohs dungeon: the afflictions of Gods children turne ever to their advantages, No ſooner is Ioſeph a priſoner, then a Guardian of the priſoners. Truſt and honour accompany him whereſoever he is: In his fathers houſe, in Potiphars, in the Iayle, in the Court: ſtill he hath both favour and rule.

So long as God is with him, hee cannot but ſhine in ſpight of men: The wals of that dungeon cannot hide his vertues, the irons cannot hold them. Pharaohs Officers are ſent to witneſſe his graces, which he may not come forth to ſhew: the Cupbearer admires him in the Iayle, but forgets him in the Court. How eaſily doth our owne proſperitie make us either forget the deſervings, or miſeries of others! But as God cannot neglect his owne, ſo leaſt of all in their ſorrowes. After two yeares more of Ioſephs patience; that God which cauſed him to bee lifted out of the former pit to be ſold, now cals him out of the dungeon to honour. Hee now puts a dreame into the head of Pharaoh. He puts the remembrance of Ioſephs ſkill into the head of the Cupbearer; who to pleaſure Pharaoh, not to requite Ioſeph, commends the Priſoner, for an Interpreter: He puts an interpretation into the mouth of Ioſeph: he puts this choyce into the heart of Pharaoh, of a miſerable priſoner, to make him the Ruler of Ægypt. Behold: one houre hath changed his fetters into a chain of gold; his rags into fine linnen, his ſtocks into a Chariot, his Iayle into a Palace, Potiphars captive into his Maſters Lord, the noiſe of his chaines into Abrech. He whoſe chaſtitie refuſed the wanton allurements of the Wife of Potiphar, hath now given him to his Wife the daughter of Potipherah. Humilitie goes before honour; Serving and Suffering are the beſt Tutors to Government. How well are Gods children paid for their patience! How happy are the iſſues of the faithfull! Never any man repented him of the advancement of a good man.

Pharaoh hath not more preferd Ioſeph, then Ioſeph hath enriched Pharaoh; If Ioſeph had not ruled, Ægypt and all the bordering Nations had periſhed. The providence of ſo faithfull an Officer hath both given the Ægiptians their lives; and the money, cattel, lands, bodies of the Ægyptians to Pharaoh. Both have reaſon to bee well pleaſed. The ſubjects owe to him their lives; the King his Subjects, and his Dominions: the bounty of God made Ioſeph able to give more then hee received. It is like the ſeven yeares of plenty were not confined to Ægypt; other Countries adjoyning were no leſſe fruitfull: yet in the ſeven yeares of famine, Ægypt had corne when they wanted.

See the difference betwixt a wiſe prudent frugalitie, and a vaine ignorant expence of the benefits of God: The ſparing hand is both full and beneficiall, whereas the laviſh is not onely empty, but injurious.

Good Iacob is pinched with the common famine. No piety can exempt us from the evils of neighbourhood. No man can tell by outward events, which is the Patriarke, and which the Canaanite.

Neither doth his profeſſion leade him to the hope of a miraculous preſervation. It is a vaine tempting of God, to caſt our ſelves upon an immediate proviſion, with neglect of common meanes: His tenne ſonnes muſt now leave their flocks, and goe downe into Ægypt, to be their Fathers purveyours. And now they goe to buy of him whom they had ſold; and bowe their knees to him for his reliefe, which had bowed to them, before for his owne life. His age, his habite, the place, the language, kept Ioſeph from their knowledge; neither had they called off their minds from their folds, to enquire of matters of forraine State, or to heare that an Hebrew was advanced to the higheſt honour of Ægypt. But he cannot but know them, whom hee left at their full growth, whoſe tongue, and habit, and number were all one: whoſe faces had left ſo deepe an impreſſion in his minde, at their unkinde parting: It is wiſedome ſometime to conceale our knowledge, that we may not prejudice truth.

Hee that was hated of his brethren, for being his Fathers ſpye; now accuſes his brethren

A brethren for common ſpyes of the weakneſſe of Ægypt; he could not without their ſuſpicion have come to a perfit intelligence of his Fathers eſtate, and theirs, if he had not objected to them that which was not. Wee are alwayes bound to goe the neareſt way to truth. It is more ſafe in caſes of inquiſition, to fetch farre about; that he might ſeeme enough an Ægyptian, he ſweares heatheniſhly : how little could they ſuſpect, this Oath could proceed from the ſonne of him, which ſwore by the feare of his Father Iſaac? How oft have iniſter reſpects drawne weake goodneſſe to diſguiſe it ſelf even with ſinnes?

It was no ſmall joy to Ioſeph, to ſee this late accompliſhment of his ancient dreame; to ſee the ſuppliants (I know not whether more brethren, or enemies) groveling before him in an unknowne ſubmiſſion: and now it doth him good to ſeeme mercileſſe
B to them, whom he had found wilfully cruell; to hide his love from them which had ſhewed their hate to him; and to thinke how much he favoureth them, & how little they knew it : And as ſporting himſelfe in their ſeeming miſery, he pleaſantly imitates all thoſe actions reciprocally unto them, which they in deſpight & earneſt had done formerly to him, hee ſpeakes roughly, rejects their perſwaſions, puts them in hold, and one of them in bonds. The minde muſt not allwayes be judged by the outward face of the actions. Gods countenance is oft-times as ſevere, and his hand as heavy to them whom he beſt loveth. Many a one, under the habit of an Ægyptian, hath the heart of an Iſraelite. No ſong could be ſo delightfull to him, as to heare them in a late remorſe condemne themſelves before him, of their old crueltie towards him, who was now their unknowne witneſſe and Judge.

C Nothing doth ſo powerfully call home the conſcience, as affliction, neither need there any other art of memory for ſinne, beſides miſery. They had heard Ioſephs deprecation of their evill with teares, & had not pitied him; yet Ioſeph doth but heare their mention of this evill which they had done againſt him, and pitties them with teares; he weepes for joy to ſee their repentance, and to compare his ſafety and happineſſe with the cruelty which they intended, and did, and thought they had done.

Yet hee can abide to ſee his brother his priſoner; whom no bonds could bind ſo ſtrong, as his affection bound him to his captive: Simeon is left in pawne, in fetters; the reſt returne, with their corne, with their money, paying nothing for their proviſion, but their labour; that they might be as much troubled with the beneficence of that ſtrange Ægyptian Lord, as before with his imperious ſuſpition. Their wealth was
D now more irkeſome to them, then their need: and they feare, God meanes to puniſh them more in this ſuperfluitie of money then in the want of victuals (What is this that God hath done to us?) It is a wiſe courſe to be jealous of our gaine; and more to feare, then deſire abundance.

Old Iacob that was not uſed to ſimple and abſolute contentments, receives the bleſſing of ſeaſonable proviſion, together with the affliction of that heavy meſſage the loſſe of one ſonne, and the danger of another; and knowes not whether it be better for him to dye with hunger, or with griefe, for the departure of that ſonne of his right hand: He drives off all til the laſt; Protraction is a kinde of eaſe in evils that muſt come.

At length (as no plea is ſo importunate, as that of famine) Benjamin muſt goe; one
E evill muſt be hazarded for the redreſſe of another; What would it availe him, to ſee whom he loved, miſerable? How injurious were that affection to keepe his ſonne ſo long in his eye, till they ſhould ſee each other dye for hunger!

The ten brothers returne into Ægypt loaded with double money in their ſacks, & a preſent in their hands; the danger of miſtaking is requited, by honeſt minds, with more then reſtitution. It is not enough to finde our owne hearts cleare in ſuſpicious actions except we ſatisfie others: Now hath Ioſeph what he would, the ſight and preſence of his Benjamin, whom he therefore borrowes of his Father for a time, that hee might returne him with a greater intereſt of joy : And now hee feaſts them whom hee formerly threatned, and turnes their feare into wonder : all unequall love is not partiall; all the brethren are entertained bountifully, but Benjamin hath a five-fold portion: By how much his welcome was greater, by ſo much his pretended theft seemed more hainous; for good turnes aggravate unkindnesses, and our offences are encreased with our obligations; How easie is it to finde advantages where there is a purpose to accuse! Benjamins sacke makes him guilty of that whereof his heart was free; Crimes seeme strange to the innocent; well might they abjure this fact, with the offer of bondage & death: For they which carefully brought againe that which they might have taken, would never take that which was not given them. But thus Ioseph would yet dally with his brethren, and make Benjamin a thiefe, that he might make him a servant, & fright his brethren with the peril of that their charge, that he might double their joy, and amazednesse, in giving them two brothers at once: our happinesse is greater, and sweeter, when we have well feared, and smarted with evils.

But now when Iudah seriously reported the danger of his old Father, and the sadnesse of his last complaint, compassion and joy will be concealed no longer, but breake forth violently at his voyce and eyes. Many passions doe not well abide witnesses, because they are guilty to their owne weakenesse. Ioseph sends forth his servants; that hee might freely weepe. He knew hee could not say, I am Ioseph, without an unbeseeming vehemence.

Never any word sounded so strangly as this, in the eares of the Patriarkes. Wonder, doubt, reverence, joy, feare, hope, guiltinesse, strucke them at once. It was time for Ioseph to say, Feare not; No marvell if they stood with paleneſse and silence before him; looking on him, and on each other: the more they considered, they wondred more; and the more they beleeved, the more they feared: For those words (I am Ioseph) seemed to sound thus much to their guilty thoughts; You are murtherers: and I am a Prince in spight of you: My power and this place, give me all opportunities of revenge; My glory is your shame, my life your danger, your sinne lives together with me. But now the teares and gracious words of Ioseph have soone assured them of pardon and love, and have bidden them turne their eyes from their sinne against their brother, to their happinesse in him, and have changed their doubts into hopes & joyes; causing them to looke upon him without feare, though not without shame. His loving embracements cleare their hearts of all jealousies; and hasten to put new thoughts into them of favour, and of greatnesse: So that now forgetting what evill they did to their brother, they are thinking of what good their brother may doe to them. Actions salved up with a free forgivenesse, are as not done: and as a bone once broken, is stronger after well setting, so is love after reconcilement.

But as wounds once healed, leave a scarre behind them; so remitted injuries leave commonly in the actors a guilty remembrance; which hindred these brethren from that freedome of joy, which else they had conceived: This was their fault, not Iosephs: who strives to give them all securitie of his love; and will be as bountifull, as they were cruell. They send him naked to strangers, hee sends them in new and rich liveries to their Father; they tooke a small summe of money for him, hee gives them great treasures; They sent his torne coat to his Father; He sends varietie of costly rayments to his Father, by them. They sold him to be the load of Camels; He sends them home with Chariots. It must be a great favour that can appease the conscience of a great injury. Now they returne home rich and joyfull, making themselves happy to thinke how glad they should make their Father with this newes.

That good old man would never have hoped that Ægypt could have afforded such provision as this: Ioseph is yet alive: This was not food, but life to him. The returne of Benjamin was comfortable: but that his dead sonne was yet alive after so many yeares lamentation, was tidings too happy to be beleeved, and was enough to endanger that life with excesse of joy, which the knowledge thereof doubled. Over-excellent objects are dangerous in their sudden apprehensions. One graine of that joy would have safely cheered him, whereof a full measure over-layes his heart with too much sweetnesse. There is no earthly pleasure whereof we may not surfet: of the spirituall we can never have enough.

Yet his eyes revive his mind, which his eares had thus astonished. When hee saw the Chariots of his sonne, hee beleeved Iosephs life, and refreshed his owne. He had too much before, so that he could not enjoy it: now he saith, I have enough, Joseph my sonne is yet alive.

They

A They told him of his honour, he ſpeakes of his life: life is better then honour. To have heard that Ioſeph lived a ſervant, would have joyed him more, then to heare that he dyed honourably. The greater bleſſing obſcures the leſſe. He is not worthy of honour, that is not thankefull for life.

Yet Ioſephs life did not content Iacob without his preſence: (I will goe downe and ſee him ere I dye:) The ſight of the eye is better then to walke in deſires; Good things pleaſure us not in their being, but in our enjoying.

The height of all earthly contentment appeared in the meeting of theſe two; whom their mutuall loſſe had more endeared to each other: The intermiſſion of comforts hath this advantage, that it ſweetens our delight more in the returne, then was abated in the forbearance. God doth oft-times hide away our Ioſeph for a time,
B that we may bee more joyous and thankfull in his recoverie: This was the ſincereſt pleaſure that ever Iacob had, which therefore God reſerved for his age.

And if the meeting of earthly friends be ſo unſpeakably comfortable; how happy ſhall we be in the light of the glorious face of God our heavenly Father! of that our bleſſed Redeemer whom we ſold to death by our ſinnes! and which now after that noble Triumph hath all power given him in Heaven and Earth.

Thus did Iacob rejoyce when he was to goe out of the Land of Promiſe, to a forraine Nation, for Ioſephs ſake; being glad that hee ſhould loſe his Countrey, for his ſonne. What ſhall our joy be, who muſt goe out of this forraine Land of our Pilgrimage, to the home of our glorious inheritance, to dwell with none but our owne; in that better and more lightſome Goſhen, free from all the incumbrances of this Æ-
C gypt, and full of all the riches and delights of God? The guilty conſcience can never thinke it ſelfe ſafe: So many yeares experience of Ioſephs love could not ſecure his brethren of remiſſion: thoſe that know they have deſerved ill, are wont to miſ-interpret favours, and thinke they cannot bee beloved: All that while his goodneſſe ſeemed but concealed and ſleeping malice; which they feared in their Fathers laſt ſleepe would awake, and bewray it ſelfe in revenge: Still therefore they plead the name of their Father, though dead, not daring to uſe their owne: Good meanings cannot bee more wronged then with ſuſpicion: It grieves Ioſeph to ſee their feare, and to find they had not forgotten their owne ſinne, and to heare them ſo paſſionately crave that which they had.

(Forgive the treſpaſſe of the ſervants of thy Fathers God:) What a conjuration of par-
D don was this? What wound could be either ſo deepe, or ſo feſtred, as this plaſter could not cure? They ſay not, the ſonnes of thy Father, for they knew Iacob was dead, and they had degenerated; but the ſervants of thy Fathers God: How much ſtronger are the bonds of Religion then of Nature? If Ioſeph had beene rancorous, this deprecation had charmed him; but now it reſolves him into teares: They are not ſo ready to aeknowledge their old offence, as he to proteſt his love; and if he chide them for any thing, it is for that they thought they needed to intreat; ſince they might know, it could not ſtand with the fellow-ſervant of their Fathers God to harbour maliciouſneſſe, to purpoſe revenge. Am not I under God? And fully to ſecure them; hee turnes their eyes from themſelves to the Decree of God, from the action to the event; as one that would have them thinke, there was no cauſe to repent of E that which proved ſo ſucceſſefull.

Even late confeſſion finds forgiveneſſe; Ioſeph had long agoe ſeene their ſorrow, never but now heard he their humble acknowledgment; Mercy ſtayes not for outward ſolemnities. How much more ſhall that infinite goodneſſe pardon our ſinnes, when hee findes the truth of our repentance?

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE IAMES LORD HAY, ALL GRACE AND HAPPINESSE.

C

Right Honorable,

ALL that I can say for my selfe, is a desire of doing good; which if it were as fervent in richer hearts, the Church which now wee see comely, would then be glorious: this honest ambition hath carried mee to neglect the feare of seeming prodigall of my little; and while I see others Talents rusting in the earth, hath drawne me to traffique with mine in publike. I hope, no adventure that ever I made of this kinde, shall be equally gainefull to this my present labour, wherein I take Gods owne Historie for the ground, and worke vpon it by what Meditations my weakenesse can afford: The divinenesse of this subject shall make more then amends for the manifold defects of my discourse; although also the blame of an imperfection is so much the more, when it lighteth upon so high a choice. This part which I offer to your Lordship, shall shew you Pharaoh impotently envious and cruell, the Israelites of friends become slaves, punished onely for prospering; Moses in the Weedes, in the Court, in the Desart, in the Hill of Visions; a Courtier in Ægypt, a Shepheard in Midian, an Ambassador from God, a Leader of Gods people: and when you see prodigious varietie of the plagues of Ægypt, you shall not not know whether more to wonder at the miracles of Moſes, or Pharaohs obſtinacie. Finally, you ſhall ſee the ſame Waves made both a wal and a gulfe in one houre; the Ægyptians drowned, where no Iſraelite was wet-ſhod: and if theſe paſſages, yeeld not abundance of profitable thoughts, impute it (not without pardon) to the povertie of my weake conceit; which yet may perhaps occaſion better unto others. In all humble ſubmiſſion I commend them (what they are) to your Lordſhips favourable acceptation, and your ſelfe with them to the gracious bleſſing of our God.

The Fourth Booke.

The affliction of Israel.

EGYPT was long an harbour to the Israelites; now it proves a Jayle: the Posteritie of Iacob finds too late, what it was for their forefathers to sell Ioseph, a slave into Ægypt. Those whom the Ægyptians honoured before as Lords, now they contemne as drudges: One Pharaoh advances, whom another labours to depresse: Not seldome the same man changes copies: but if favours out-live one age, they prove decrepit and heartlesse: It is a rare thing to find posteritie heires of their fathers love: How should mens favour be but like themselves, variable and inconstant? there is no certaintie but in the favour of God, in whom can be no change; whose love is intayled upon a thousand generations.

Yet if the Israelites had beene trecherous to Pharaoh, if disobedient, this great change of countenance had beene just; now the onely offence of Israel, is, that he prospereth; that which should be the motive of their gratulation, and friendship, is the cause of their malice. There is no more hatefull sight to a wicked man, then the prosperitie of the conscionable; None but the spirit of that true Harbinger of Christ, can teach us to say with contentment, He must encrease, but I must decrease.

And what if Israel be mighty and rich? (If there be warre, they may joyne with our enemies, and get them out of the Land.) Behold, they are afraid to part with those whom they are grieved to entertaine: either staying, or going is offence enough, to those that seeke quarrels; There were no warres, and yet they say, If there be warres. The Israelites had never given cause of feare to revolt, and yet they say, Lest they joyne to our enemies, to those enemies which we may have; So they make their certaine friends slaves, for feare of uncertaine enemies. Wickednesse is ever cowardly, and full of unjust suspitions; it makes a man feare, where no feare is; fly, when none pursues him. What difference there is betwixt David and Pharaoh! The faith of the one sayes, I will not be afraid for ten thousand that should beset me; The feare of the other sayes, Lest if there be warre, they joyne with our enemies; therefore should hee have made much of the Israelites, that they might be his; his favour might have made them firme; Why might they not as well draw their swords for him.

Weake and base minds ever incline to the worse; and seeke safety, rather in an impossibility of hurt, then in the likelihood of iust advantage. Favours had bin more binding binding then cruelties: yet the fooliſh Ægyptian had rather have impotent ſervants, then able friends. For their welfare alone, Pharaoh owes Iſrael a miſchiefe; and how will he pay it? A (Come let us worke wiſely;) Lewd men call wicked policies wiſedome, and their ſucceſſe happineſſe: Herein Satan is wiſer then they; who both layes the plot, and makes them ſuch fooles, as to miſtake villany and madneſſe, for the beſt vertue.

Injuſtice is upheld by violence, whereas juſt governments are maintained by love: Taske-maſters muſt be ſet over Iſrael; they ſhould not be the true ſeed of Iſrael, if they were not ſtill ſet to wreſtle with God in afflictions: Heavy burdens muſt be laid upon thē: Iſrael is never but loaded, the deſtiny of one of Iacobs ſons is common to al; To lye downe betwixt their burdens. If they had ſeemed to breathe them in Goſhen ſometimes, yet even there it was no ſmall miſerie to be forainers, and to live among Idolaters; but now the name of a ſlave is added to the name of a ſtranger. Iſrael had gathered ſome ruſt in Idolatrous Ægypt, & now he muſt be ſcowred: they had borne the burden of Gods anger, if they had not borne the burdens of the Ægyptians. B

As God afflicted them with another minde then the Ægyptians; (God to excerciſe them, the Ægyptians to ſuppreſſe them;) ſo cauſes he the event to differ. Who would not have thought with theſe Ægyptians, that ſo extreme miſery ſhould not have made the Iſraelites unfit both for generation and reſiſtance? Moderate exerciſe ſtrengthens, extreame deſtroyes nature: That God which many times workes by contrary means, cauſed them to grow with depreſſion, with perſecution to multiply; How can Gods Church but fare well, ſince the very malice of their enemies benefits them? Oh the ſoveraigne goodneſſe of our God that turnes all our poiſons into cordials! Gods Vine beares the better with bleeding. C

And now the Ægyptians could be angry with their owne maliciouſneſſe, that this was the occaſion of multiplying them whom they hated, and feared; to ſee that this ſervice gained more to the workmen, then to their Maſters; The ſtronger therfore the Iſraelites grew, the more impotent grew the malice of their perſecutors. And ſince their owne labour ſtrengthens them, now tyrannie wil try what can be done by the violence of others: ſince the preſent ſtrength cannot be ſubdued; the hopes of ſucceſſion muſt be prevented: women muſt be ſuborned to bee murderers; and thoſe whoſe office is to helpe the birth, muſt deſtroy it.

There was leſſe ſuſpition of crueltie in that ſexe, and more opportunitie of doing miſchiefe. The male children muſt be borne, and die at once; what can be more innocent, then the childe that hath not lived ſo much as to cry, or to ſee light? It is fault enough to be the ſonne of an Iſraelite: the daughters may live for bondage, for luſt; a condition ſo much (at the leaſt) worſe then death, as their ſex was weaker. O marvelous cruelty, that a man ſhould kill a man, for his ſexes ſake! Whoſoever hath looſed the reynes unto cruelty, is eaſily carried into incredible extremities. D

From burdens, they proceed to bondage, and from bondage to blood: from an unjuſt vexation of their body, to an inhumane deſtruction of the fruit of their body. As the ſins of the concupiſcible part, from ſlight motions, grow on to foule executions, ſo doe thoſe of the iraſcible; there is no ſinne, whoſe harbour is more unſafe, then of that of malice: But oft-times the power of tyrants anſwers not their will: evill commanders cannot alwayes meet with equally miſchievous agents. E

The feare of God teaches the Midwives to diſobey an unjuſt command; they well knew, how no excuſe it is for evill, I was bidden. God ſaid to their hearts, Thou ſhalt not kill: This voyce was lowder then Pharaohs. I commend their obedience in diſobeying; I dare not commend their excuſe; there was as much weakeneſſe in their anſwer, as ſtrength in their practice: as they feared God in not killing, ſo they feared Pharaoh in diſſembling: oft-times thoſe that make conſcience of greater ſinnes, are overtaken with leſſe. It is well and rare, if wee can come forth of a dangerous action without any ſoyle; and if we have eſcaped the ſtorme, that ſome after drops wet us not.

Who would not have expected that the Midwives ſhould be murdered, for not murthering? Pharaoh could not be ſo ſimple to thinke theſe women truſty; yet his indignation had no power to reach to their puniſhment. God proſpered the Midwives,

A wives, who can harme them? Even the not doing of evill is rewarded with good. And why did they prosper? Because they feared God; Not for their dissimulation, but their piety. So did God regard their mercy, that he regarded not their infirmity. How fondly doe men lay the thanke upon the sinne, which is due to the vertue: true wisedome teaches to distinguish Gods actions and to ascribe them to the right causes; Pardon belongs to the lye of the Mid-wives, and remuneration to their goodnesse, prosperity to their feare of God,

But that which the Mid-wives will not, the multitude shall doe, It were strange, if wicked rulers should not finde some or other instruments of violence: all the people must drown whō the women saved. Cruelty hath but smoked before, now it flames up, secret practising hath made it shameleſſe, that now it dare proclaime tyranny. It is
B a miserable state, where every man is made an executioner: there can be no greater argument of an ill cause, then a bloody persecution, whereas Truth upholds her selfe by mildnesse, and is promoted by patience. This is their act, what was their issue? The people must drowne their males, themselves are drowned: they died by the same meanes, by which they caused the poore Israelitish infants to dye; that law of retaliation which God will not allow to us, because we are fellow-creatures, he justly practiseth in us. God would have us reade our sins in our judgements, that we might both repent of our sins, and give glory to his Justice.

Pharaoh raged before, much more now, that he received a message of dismission, the monitiōs of God make il men worse: the waves do not beat, nor roare any where so much, as at the banke which restraines thē. Corruption when it is checked, growes
C mad with rage; as the vapour in a cloud would not make that fearefull report, if it met not with opposition. A good heart yeelds at the stilleſt voice of God: But the most gratious motions of God harden the wicked. Many would not be so desperately setled in their sins, if the word had not controuled them. How mild a message was this to Pharaoh, and yet how galling? Wee pray thee let us goe. God commands him that which he feared. He tooke pleasure in the present servitude of Israel: God calls for a release. If the sute had beene for mitigation of labour, for preservation of their children, it might have carried some hope, and have found some favour: but now God requires that which he knowes will as much discontent Pharaoh, as Pharaohs crueltie could discontent the Israelites; Let us goe. How contrary are Gods precepts to naturall minds? and indeed, as they love to crosse him in their practice, so he loves to crosse
D them in their commands before, and his punishments afterwards: It is a dangerous signe of an ill heart to feele Gods yoke heavy.

Moses talks of sacrifice, Pharaoh talkes of worke. Any thing seemes due worke to a carnall mind saving Gods service: nothing superfluous, but religious duties. Christ tels us, there is but one thing necessarie: Nature tels us there is nothing but that needlesse: Moses speakes of devotion, Pharaoh of idlenesse. It hath bin an old use, as to cast faire colours upon our owne vicious actions, so to cast evill aspersions upon the good actions of others. The same Devill that spoke in Pharaoh, speakes still in our scoffers, and cals Religion Hypocrisie, conscionable care, singularity. Every vice hath a title, and every vertue a disgrace.

Yet while possible taskes were imposed, there was some comfort: Their diligence
E might save their backes from stripes. The conceit of a benefit to the commander, and hope of impunity to the labourer, might give a good pretence to great difficulties: but to require tasks not faisible, is tyrannicall, and doth onely picke a quarrell to punish, they could neither make straw, nor finde it, yet they must have it. Do what may be, is tolerable; but do what cannot be, is cruell. Those which are above others in place, must measure their commands, not by their owne wils, but by the strength of their inferiours. To require more of a beast then he can doe, is inhumane. The taske is not done; the task-masters are beaten: the punishment lyes where the charge is; they must exact it of the people, Pharaoh of them. It is the misery of those which are trusted with authority, that their inferiours faults are beaten upon their backs. This was not the fault to require it of the taske-masters, but to require it by the taske-masters, of the people. Publike persons do either good or ill with a thousand hands, and with no fewer shall receive it.

Of the birth and breeding of Moses.

IT is a wonder that Amram the father of Moſes, would thinke of the mariage bed in ſo troubleſome a time, when he knew he ſhould beget children either to ſlavery or ſlaughter: yet even now in the heat of this bondage he maries Iochebed: the drowning of his ſons was not ſo great an evill, as his owne burning; the thraldome of his daughters not ſo great an evil, as the ſubjection unto ſinfull deſires. He therefore uſes Gods remedie for his ſinne; and referres the ſequell of his danger to God. How neceſſary is this imitation for thoſe which have not the power of containing! perhaps we would have thought it better to live childleſſe: but Amram and Iochebed durſt not incurre the danger of a ſinne, to avoid the danger of a miſchiefe. No doubt when Iochebed the mother of Moſes, ſaw a man child borne of her, and him beautifull and comely, ſhe fel into extreame paſſion, to thinke that the executioners hand ſhould ſucceed the Midwives. All the time of her conception, ſhe could not but feare a ſonne; now ſhe ſees him, and thinkes of his birth and death at once, her ſecond throes are more grievous then her firſt. The paines of travell in others are ſomewhat mitigated with hope, and countervailed with joy, that a man-child is borne; in her they are doubled with feare; the remedy of others is her complaint: ſtill ſhe lookes when ſome fierce Ægyptian would come in, and ſnatch her new-borne infant out of her boſome; whoſe comelineſſe had now alſo added to her affection.

Many times God writes preſages of Majeſty and honor, even in the faces of childrē. Little did ſhe thinke, that ſhe held in her lap the Deliverer of Iſrael. It is good to hazard in greateſt appearances of danger. If Iochebed had ſaid, If I beare a ſon, they will kill him, where had beene the great Reſcuer of Iſrael? Happy is that reſolution which can follow God hood-winkt, and let him diſpoſe of the event: When ſhe can no longer hide him in her wombe, ſhe hides him in her houſe, afraid leſt every of his cryings ſhould guide the executioners to his cradle. And now ſhe ſees her treaſure can be no longer hid, ſhe ſhips him in a barke of bulruſhes, and commits him to the mercy of the waves, and (which was more mercileſſe) to the danger of an Ægyptian paſſenger, yet doth ſhe not leave him without a guardian.

No tyranny can forbid her to love him, whom ſhe is forbidden to keepe; Her daughters eyes muſt ſupply the place of her armes. And if the weake affection of a mother, were thus effectually carefull, what ſhall we thinke of him, whoſe love, whoſe compaſſion is (as himſelfe) infinite? His eye, his hand, cannot but be with us, even when we forſake our ſelves: Moſes had never a ſtronger protection about him, no not when all his Iſraelites were pitched about his Tent in the Wilderneſſe, then now when hee lay ſprawling alone upon the waves: no water, no Ægyptian can hurt him. Neither friend nor mother dare owne him, and now God challenges his cuſtodie. When wee ſeeme moſt neglected and forlorne in our ſelves, then is God moſt preſent, moſt vigilant.

His providēce brings Pharaohs daughter thither to waſh her ſelf. Thoſe times lookt for no great ſtate: A Princeſſe comes to bathe her ſelf in the open ſtreame: ſhe meant only to waſh her ſelf; God fetches her thither, to deliver the Deliverer of his people. His deſignes go beyond ours. We know not (whē we ſet our foot over our threſhōld) what he hath to do with us. This event ſeemed caſuall to this Princeſſe, but predetermined aud provided by God, before ſhe was: how wiſely and ſweetly God brings to paſſe his own purpoſes, in our ignorance and regardleſneſſe! She ſaw the Arke, opens it, finds the child weeping; his beauty and his teares had God provided for the ſtrong perſwaſions of mercy. This young and lively Oratorie prevailed. Her heart is ſtrucke with compaſſion, and yet her tongue could ſay; It is an Hebrew child.

See here the mercifull daughter of a cruell father: It is an uncharitable and iniurious ground, to judge of the childs diſpoſition by the parents. How well doth pitty beſeeme great perſonages! and moſt in extremities. It had beene death to another to reſcue

A reſcue the child of an Hebrew; in her it was ſafe and noble. It is an happy thing, whē great ones improve their places to ſo much more charity, as their liberty is more.

Moſes his ſiſter finding the Princeſſe compaſſionate, offers to procure a nurſe, and fetches the mother: and who can be ſo fit a nurſe as a mother? She now with glad hands receives her child, both with authority and reward. She would have givē all her ſubſtance for the life of her ſon; & now ſhe hath a reward to nurſe him. The exchange of the name of a mother, for the name of a nurſe, hath gained her both her ſon, and his education, and with both a recompence. Religion doth not call us to a weake ſimplicitie, but allowes us as much of the Serpent as of the Dove: lawfull policies have from God both liberty in the uſe, and bleſſing in the ſucceſſe.

The good Lady did not breed him as ſome child of almes, or as ſome wretched B outcaſt, for whom it might be favour enough to live, but as her own ſon; in all the delicacies, in all the learning of Ægypt. Whatſoever the Court or the Schoole could put into him, he wanted not; yet all this could not make him forget that he was an Hebrew. Education workes wondrous changes, and is of great force either way: a little aduancement hath ſo puffed ſome up above thēſelves, that they have not only forgot their friends, but ſcorned their parents. All the honours of Ægypt could not win Moſes not to call his nurſe, mother, or weane him from a willing miſery with the Iſraelites. If we had Moſes his faith, we could not but make his choice. It is onely our infidelity that binds us ſo to the world, and makes us preferre the momentany pleaſures of ſinne, unto that everlaſting recompence of reward.

He went forth, and looked on the burdens of Iſrael. What needed Moſes to have C afflicted himſelfe with the afflictions of others? Himſelfe was at eaſe and pleaſure in the Court of Pharaoh. A good heart cannot endure to be happy alone: and muſt needs, unbidden, ſhare with others in their miſeries. He is no true Moſes that is not moved with the calamities of Gods Church. To ſee an Ægyptian ſmite an Hebrew, it ſmote him, and moved him to ſmite. He hath no Iſraelitiſh blood in him, that can endure to ſee an Iſraelite ſtricken either with hand or with tongue.

Here was his zeale: where was his authority? Doubtleſſe, Moſes had an inſtinct from God of his Magiſtracy; elſe how ſhould he thinke they would have underſtood what himſelfe did not? Oppreſſions may not be righted by violence, but by law. The redreſſe of evil by a perſon unwarranted, is evil. Moſes knew that God had called him, he knew that Pharaoh knew it not: therfore he hides the Ægyptian in the ſand. Thoſe D actions which may be approoved unto God are not alwaies ſafe with men: as contrarily, too many things goe current with men, which are not approved of God.

Another Hebrew is ſtrickē, but by an Hebrew: the act is the ſame, the agents differ: neither doth their profeſſion more differ, then Moſes his proceedings. He gives blowes to the one: to the other, words. The blowes, to the Ægyptian were deadly, the words, to the Hebrew, gentle & plauſible. As God makes a difference betwixt chaſtiſements of his owne, and puniſhments of ſtrange children: ſo muſt wiſe Governors learn to diſtinguiſh of ſins and judgements, according to circumſtances. How mildly doth Moſes admoniſh! Sirs, ye are brethren. If there had been but any dram of good nature in theſe Hebrewes, they had relented: now it is ſtrange to ſee, that being ſo univerſally vexed with their common adverſary, they ſhould yet vexe one another: One would have E thought that a common oppoſition ſhould have united them more, yet now private grudges do thus dangerouſly divide thē. Blowes enow were not dealt by the Ægyptians, their own muſt adde to the violence. Still Satan is thus buſie, and Chriſtians are thus malicious, that (as if they wanted enemies) they flye in one anothers faces. While we are in this Ægypt of the world, all unkind ſtrifes would eaſily be compoſed, if we did not forget that we are brethren.

Behold an Ægyptian in the ſkin of an Hebrew: how dogged an anſwer doth Moſes receive to ſo gentle a reproofe? who would not have expected that this Hebrew had bin enough dejected with the common afflictiō? But vexations may make ſome more miſerable, not more humble; as we ſee ſickeneſſes make ſome tractable, others more froward. It is no eaſie matter to beare a reproofe well, if never ſo well tempered; no Sugar can bereave a Pill of his bitterneſſe. None but the gracious can ſay, Let the righteous ſmite mee. Next to the not deſerving a reproofe, is the well taking of it. But who is ſo ready to except and exclaime as the wrong-doer? The patient replies not. One injurie drawes on another: firſt to his brother, then to his reproover. Guiltineſſe will make a man ſtirre upon every touch: he that was wronged, could incline to reconciliation: Malice makes men uncapable of good counſell; and there are none ſo great enemies to Juſtice, as thoſe which are enemies to peace.

With what impatience doth a galled heart receive an admonition! This unworthy Iſraelite is the patterne of a ſtomackfull offender, firſt, hee is mooved to choler in himſelf: then he cals for the authority of the admoniſher: a ſmall authority will ſerve for a loving admonition. It is the duty of men, much more of Chriſtians, to adviſe againſt ſin; yet this man askes, Who made thee a Judge? for but finding fault with his injury. Then he aggravates, and miſconſtrues, Wilt thou kill me? when Moſes meant onely to ſave both. It was the death of his malice onely that was intended, and the ſafety of his perſon. And laſtly, he upbraids him with former actions, Thou killedſt the Ægyptian: What if he did? What if unjuſtly? What was this to the Hebrew? Another mans ſin is no excuſe for ours. A wicked heart never lookes inward to it ſelfe, but outward to the quality of the reprover; if that afford exception, it is enough; as a dog runs firſt to revenge on the ſtone: What matter is it to me who he be that admoniſheth me? Let me looke home into my ſelfe: let me looke to his advice. If that be good, it is more ſhame to me to be reprooved by an evil man. As a good mans allowance cannot warrant evill, ſo an evil mans reproofe may remedy evill: If this Hebrew had beene well pleaſed, Moſes had not heard of his ſlaughter; now in choler all will out; and if this mans tongue had not thus caſt him in the teeth with blood, he had beene ſurpriſed by Pharaoh, ere he could have knowne that the fact was knowne.

Now he growes jealous, flees, and eſcapes. No friend is ſo commodious in ſome caſes as an adverſarie; This woūd which the Hebrew thought to give Moſes, ſaved his life. As it is good for a man to have an enemy, ſo it ſhall be our wiſdome to make uſe of his moſt cholericke objectiōs. The worſt of an enemy may prove moſt ſoveraigne to our ſelves. Moſes flees. It is no diſcomfort for a man to flee when his conſcience purſues him not: Where Gods warrant will not protect us, it is good for the heeles to ſupply the place of the tongue.

Moſes when he may not in Ægypt, he will be doing juſtice in Midian. In Ægypt, he delivers the oppreſſed Iſraelite; in Midian the wronged daughters of Iethro. A good man will be doing good, wherſoever he is; his Trade is a compound of Charity and Juſtice; as therfore evill diſpoſitiōs cannot be changed with ayres, no more wil good. Now then he ſits him downe by a Well in Midian. There he might have to drinke, but where to eat he knew not. The caſe was altered with Moſes; To come from the dainties of the Court of Ægypt, to the hunger of the fields of Midian: it is a leſſon that all Gods children muſt learne to take out, To want & to abound. Who can think ſtrange of penury whē the great governor of Gods people once hath nothing? Who would not have thought in this caſe, Moſes ſhould have beene heartleſſe and ſullen; ſo caſt downe with his own complaints, that he ſhould have had no feeling of others; yet how hot is he upon Juſtice? No adverſity can make a good man neglect good duties: he ſees the oppreſſion of the Shepherds, the image of that other he left behind him in Ægypt: the Maids (daughters of ſo great a Peere) draw water for their flocks, the inhumane ſhepherds drive them away; rudeneſſe hath no reſpect either to Sexe or Condition; if we lived not under lawes, this were our caſe; Might would be the meaſure of Juſtice: we ſhould not ſo much as enjoy our owne water. Unjuſt courſes will not ever proſper: Moſes ſhall rather come from Ægypt to Midian to beat the ſhepheards, then they ſhall vex the daughters of Iethro. This act of Juſtice was not better done then taken. Reuel requites it kindly with an hoſpitall entertainement. A good nature is ready to anſwer courteſies: we cānot do too much for a thankful man. And if a courteous Heathen reward the watring of a ſheep in this bountiful manner, how ſhall our God recōpence but a cup of cold water that is given to a Diſciple? This favour hath won Moſes, who now cōſents to dwel with him, though out of the Church. Curioſity, or whatſoever idle occaſions may not draw us (for our reſidence) out of the

A the bounds of the Church of God: danger of life may; we love not the Church if we easily leave it: if in a case of life, wee leave it not (upon opportunity) for a time of respit, we love not our selves. The first part of Moses his requitall was his wife, one of those whom he had formerly protected.

I do not so much marvell that Iethro gave him his daughter (for he saw him valiant, wise, learned, nobly bred) as that Moses would take her; a stranger both in Blood and Religion. I could plead for him necessity: his owne nation was shut up to him: if he would have tried to fetch a daughter of Israell, he had endangered to leave himselfe behind: I could plead some correspondence in common principles of Religion; for doubtlesse Moses his zeale could not suffer him to smother the truth in himselfe: hee should have beene an unfaithfull servant if he had not beene his Masters teacher. Yet
B neither of these can make this match either safe, or good. The event bewrayes it dangerously inconvenient. This choice had like to have cost him deare: she stood in his way for circumcision; God stands in his way for revenge. Though he was now in Gods message, yet might he not be forborne in this neglect. No circumstance either of the deareness of the Solicitor or our owne ingagement, can beare out a sinne with God: Those which are unequally yoked, may not ever looke to draw one way. True love to the person cannot long agree with dislike of the religion. He had need to be more then a man that hath a Zipporah in his bosome, and would have true zeale in his heart. All this while Moses his affection was not so tied to Midian, that he could
C forget Ægypt. He was a stranger in Midian: what was he else in Ægypt? Surely, either Ægypt was not his home, or a miserable one; and yet in reference to it, he cals his son Gershom, a stranger there. Much better were it to be a stranger there then a dweller in Ægypt. How hardly can we forget the place of our abode or education, although never so homely! And if he so thought of his Ægyptian home, where was nothing but bondage and tyranny; how should wee thinke of that home of ours, above, where is nothing but rest and blessednesse?

Of Moses calling.

D FOrty yeares was Moses a Courtier, and forty yeares (after that) a Shepheard. That great men may not be ashamed of honest vocatiõs: the greatest that ever were have beene content to take up with meane trades. The contempt of honest callings in those which are well borne, argues pride without wit. How constantly did Moses stick to his hooke? and yet a man of great spirits, of excellent learning, of curious education: and if God had not (after his forty yeares service) called him off, he had so ended his daies. Humble resolutions are so much more heroicall, as they fall into higher subjects.

There can be no fitter disposition for a leader of Gods people, then constancy in his undertakings, without either wearinesse, or change. How had he learned to subdue all ambitious desires, and to rest content with his obscurity! so he might have the freedome of his thoughts and full opportunity of holy meditations, he willingly leaves the World to others, and envies not his proudest acquaintance of E the Court of Pharaoh. He that hath true worth in himselfe, and familiarity with God, finds more pleasure in the Desarts of Midian, then others can doe in the Palaces of Kings.

Whiles he is tending his sheepe, God appeared unto him: God never graces the idle with his visions; when he finds us in our callings, we find him in the tokens of his mercy. Satan appeares to the idle man in manifold temptations; or rather presents himselfe, and appeares not. God was ever with Moses, yet was he not seene till now. He is never absent from his; but sometimes he makes their senses witnesses of his presence. In small matters may be greater wonders. That a bush should burne, is no marvell; but that it should not consume in burning, is justly miraculous: God chuseth not ever great subjects wherin to exercise his power. It is enough that his power is great in the smallest. When I look upon this burning bush with Moses, me thinkes I can ne-verſee a worthier and more lively Embleme of the Church; that in Ægypt was in the furnace, yet waſted not. Since then how oft hath it beene flaming, never conſumed! The ſame power that enlightens it, preſerves it; and to none but to his enemies is he a conſuming fire: Moſes was a great Philoſopher: but ſmall ſkill would have ſerved to know the nature of fire, & of the buſh: that fire meeting with combuſtible matter, could not but cõſume: If it had bin ſome ſolid wood, it would have yeelded later to the flames; but buſhes are of ſo quicke diſpatch, that the joy of the wicked is compared to a fire of thornes. He noted a while, ſaw it continued, and began to wonder. It was ſome marvell how it ſhould come there: but how it ſhould continue without ſupply, yea, without diminution of matter, was truely admirable. Doubtleſſe he went oft about it and viewed it on all ſides, and now when his eyes and mind could meet with no likely cauſes, ſo farre off, reſolves, I will go ſee it: His curioſity led him neerer, and what could he ſee but a buſh and a flame, which he ſaw at firſt unſatisfied? It is good to come to the place of Gods preſence, howſoever; God may perhaps ſpeake to thy heart, though thou come but for novelty: Even thoſe which have come upon curioſitie have beene oft taken: abſence is without hope; If Moſes had not come, he had not been called out of the buſh.

To ſee a fire not conſuming the buſh, was much; but to heare a ſpeaking fire, this was more; and to heare his owne name out of the mouth of the fire, it was moſt of all. God makes way for his greateſt meſſages by aſtoniſhment and admiration: as on the contrary, careleſneſſe caries us to a meere unproficiency under the beſt meanes of God: If our hearts were more awfull, Gods meſſages wou'd be more effectuall to us.

In that appearance God meant to call Moſes to come, yet when he is come, inhibits him (Come not hither.) Wee muſt come to God, muſt not come too neare him. When we meditate of the great myſteries of his word, we come to him: we come too neere him when we ſearch into his counſels. The Sun and the fire ſay of themſelves, Come not too neere: how much more the light which none can attaine unto? We have all our limits ſet us: The Gentiles might come into ſome outer courts, not into the inmoſt. The Jewes might come into the inner Court, not into the Temple: the Prieſts and Levites into the Temple, not into the Holy of Holies: Moſes to the Hill, not to the Buſh. The waves of the Sea had not more need of bounds, thē mans preſumption. Moſes muſt not come cloſe to the buſh at all; and where he may ſtand, he may not ſtand with his ſhooes on. There is no unholineſſe in clothes: God prepared them for man at firſt, and that of ſkinnes, leſt any exception ſhould be taken at the hides of dead beaſts. This rite was ſignificant. What are the ſhooes but worldly and carnall affections? If theſe be not caſt off when wee come to the holy place, wee make our ſelves unholy: how much leſſe ſhould we dare to come with reſolutions of ſinne? This is not only to come with ſhooes on, but with ſhooes bemired with wicked filthineſſe; the touch whereof profanes the pavement of God, and makes our preſence odious.

Moſes was the Sonne of Amram, Amram of Kohath, Kohath of Levi, Levi of Iacob, Iacob of Iſaac, Iſaac of Abraham. God puts together both ends of his pedigree, I am the God of thy father, and of Abraham, Iſaac, Iacob. If he had ſaid onely, I am thy God, It had beene Moſes his duty to attend awfully; but now that he ſayes, I am the God of thy Father, and of Abraham, &c. He challenges reverence by preſcription. Any thing that was our Anceſters, pleaſes us; their Houſes, their Veſſels, their Cote-armour; How much more their God? How carefull ſhould parents be to make holy choices? Every preſident of theirs are ſo many monuments and motives to their poſterity. What an happineſſe it is to be borne of good Parents! hence God claimes an intereſt in us and we in him, for their ſake. As many a man ſmarteth for his fathers ſinne, ſo the goodneſſe of others is crowned in a thouſand generations. Neither doth God ſay, I was the God of Abraham, Iſaac, Iacob; but, I am. The Patriarkes ſtill live after ſo many thouſand yeares of diſſolution. No length of time can ſeparate the ſoules of the juſt from their Maker. As for their body, there is ſtill a reall relation betwixt the duſt of it, & the ſoule: & if the being of this part be more defective, the being

A ing of the other is more lively, and doth more then recompence the wants of that earthly halfe.

God could not describe himselfe by a more sweet name then this, I am the God of thy father, and of Abraham, &c. yet Moses hides his face for feare, If he had said, I am the glorious God that made heaven and earth, that dwels in light inaccessible, whom the Angels cannot behold; or, I am God the avenger, just and terrible, a consuming fire to mine enemies, here had beene just cause of terror.

But why was Moses so frighted with a familiar compellation? God is no lesse awfull to his own in his very mercies. Great is thy mercy that thou maiest be feared: for to them no lesse majesty shines in the favours of God, then in his judgements and justice. The wicked heart never feares God but thundring, or shaking the earth, or
B raining fire from heaven; but the good can dread him in his very sunne-shine: his loving deliverances & blessings affect them with awfullnesse. Moses was the true son of Iacob, who when he saw nothing but visions of love and mercy, could say, How dreadfull is this place!

I see Moses now at the bush hiding his face at so mild a representation: hereafter wee shall see him in this very Mount betwixt heaven and earth; in Thunder, Lightning, Smoake, Earth-quakes, speaking mouth to mouth with God, bare-faced, and fearlesse: God was then more terrible, but Moses was lesse strange. This was his first meeting with God, further acquaintance makes him familiar, and familiarity makes him bold: Frequence of conversation gives us freedome of accesse to God; and makes us powre out our hearts to him as fully and as feareleslly as to our friends.
C In the meane time now at first he made not so much haste to see, but hee made as much to hide his eyes: Twice did Moses hide his face; once for the glory which God put upon him, which made him so shine, that he could not bee beheld of others; once for Gods owne glory, which he could not behold. No marvell. Some of the creatures are too glorious for mortall eyes: how much more, when God appeares to us in the easiest manner, must his glory needs overcome us? Behold the difference betwixt our present and future estate: Then the more Majesty of appearance, the more delight: when our sinne is quite gone, all our feare at Gods presence shall be turned into joy. God appeared to Adam before his sinne with comfort, but in the same forme which after his sin was terrible. And if Moses cannot abide to looke upon Gods glory when he descends to us in mercy, how shall wicked ones abide to see his fearfull presence
D when he sets upon vengeance! In this fire he flamed and consumed not, but in his revenge our God is a consuming fire.

First, Moses hides himselfe in feare, now in modesty. Who am I? None in all Ægypt or Midian was comparably fit for this embassage. Which of the Israelites had bin brought up a Courtier, a Scholler, an Israelite by blood, by education an Ægyptian, learned, wise, valiant, experienced? Yet, Who am I? The more fit any man is for whatsoever vocation, the lesse he thinkes himselfe. Forwardnesse argues insufficiency. The unworthy thinkes still, Who am I not? Modest beginnings give hopefull proceedings, and happy endings. Once before, Moses had taken upon him, and laid about him; hoping then they would have known, that by his hand God meant to deliver Israel: but now when it comes to the point, Who am I? Gods best servants are not ever in an E equall disposition to good duties. If we find differences in our selves sometimes, it argues that grace is not our owne. It is our frailty, that those services which we are forward to, aloofe off, we shrinke at, neere hand, and fearfully misse-give. How many of us can bid defiances to death, and suggest answers to absent temptations, which when they come home to us, we flye off, and change our note, and instead of action, expostulate!

Of the plagues of Ægypt.

IT is too much honour for fleſh and blood to receive a meſſage from heaven, yet here God ſends a meſſage to man, and is repulſed: well may God aske, Who is man that I ſhould regard him? but for man to aske, Who is the Lord? is a proud and bold blaſphemy. Thus wild is Nature at the firſt; but ere God have done with Pharaoh, he will be knowne of him, he will make himſelf knowne by him, to all the world. God might have ſwept him away ſuddenly. How unworthy is he of life, who with the ſame breath that he receives, denies the Giver of it! But he would have him convinced, ere he were puniſhed; Firſt therefore he workes miracles before him, then upon him. Pharaoh was now, from a ſtaffe of protection & ſuſtentation to Gods people, turned to a Serpēt that ſtung thē to death; God ſhewes himſelfe in this real Embleme; doing that ſuddenly before him, which Satan had wrought in him by leiſure; And now when he crawles, and winds, and hiſſes, threatning perill to Iſrael, he ſhews him how in an inſtant he can turne him into a ſenſleſſe ſticke, and make him if not uſefull, yet fearleſſe: The ſame God which wrought this, gives Satan leave to imitate it; the firſt plague that he meant to inflict upon Pharaoh, is deluſion: God can be content the devill ſhould winne himſelfe credit, where he meanes to judge; and holds the honour of a miracle well loſt, to harden an enemy: Yet to ſhew that his miracle was of power, the others of permiſſion; Moſes his Serpent devours theirs: how eaſily might the Ægyptians have thought, that hee which cauſed their Serpent not to bee, could have kept it from being: and that they which could not keep their Serpent from devouring, could not ſecure them from being conſumed! but wiſe thoughts enter not into thoſe that muſt periſh. All Gods judgments ſtand ready, and wait but till they be called for. They need but a watch-word to be given them: No ſooner is the rod lift up, but they are gone forth into the world, preſently the waters run into blood, the Frogs and Lice crawle about, and all the other troops of God come ruſhing in upon his adverſaries: All creatures conſpire to revenge the injuries of God. If the Ægyptians looke upward, there they have Thunder, lightning, Hayle, Tempeſts; one while no light at all, another while ſuch fearefull flaſhes as had more terror then darknes. If they look under them, there they ſee their waters changed into blood, their earth ſwarming with Frogs and Graſhoppers: if about them, one while the Flies fill their eyes and eares; another while they ſee their fruits deſtroyed, their cattell dying, their children dead. If, laſtly, they looke upon themſelves, they ſee themſelves lothſome with Lice, painful and deformed with Scabs, Biles, and Botches.

First, God begins his Judgements with waters. As the river of Nilus was to Ægypt, inſtead of heaven, to moiſten and fatten the earth; ſo their confidence was more in it then in heaven. Men are ſure to be puniſht moſt and ſooneſt, in that which they make a corrivall with God. They had before defiled the rivers with the blood of Innocents; and now it appeares to them, in his owne colour. The waters will no longer keepe their coūſell: Never any man delighted in blood, which had not enough of it ere his end: they ſhed but ſome few ſtreames, and now behold, whole rivers of blood: Neither was this more a monument of their ſlaughter paſt, then an image of their future deſtruction. They were afterward over-whelmed in the Red Sea, and now before hand they ſee the Rivers red with blood. How dependant and ſervile is the life of man, that cannot either want one Element, or endure it corrupted! It is hard to ſay whether there were more horror, or annoyance in this plague. They complaine of thirſt, and yet doubt whether they ſhould dye, or quench it with blood. Their fiſh (the chiefe part of their ſuſtenance) dyes with infection, & infecteth more by being dead. The ſtench of both is ready to poyſon the inhabitants; yet Pharaohs curioſitie caries him away quite from the ſenſe of the judgement: he had rather ſend for his Magiciās to worke feats, thē to humble himſelf under God for the removall of this plague; and God plagues his curioſity with deceit, thoſe whom he truſts

A shall undoe him with prevailing; the glory of a second miracle shall be obscured by a false imitation, for a greater glory to God in the sequell.

The rod is lift up again, Behold, that Nilus which they had before adored, was never so beneficiall as it is now troublesome; yeelding them not onely a dead, but a living annoyance: It never did so store them with Fish, as now it plagues them with Frogges; whatsoever any man makes his god, besides the true one, shall be once his tormenter. Those lothsome creatures leave their owne element, to punish them which rebelliously detaine Israel from their owne. No Bed, no Table can be free from them, their daintie Ladies cannot keepe them out of their bosomes; neither can the Ægyptians sooner open their mouthes, then they are ready to creepe into their throats; as if they would tell them, that they came on purpose to revenge the
B wrongs of their Maker: yet even this wonder also is Satan allowed to imitate. Who can marvell to see the best vertues counterfaited by wicked men, when hee sees the Devill emulating the miraculous power of God? the feats that Satan playes may harden, but cannot benefit. He that hath leave to bring Frogs, hath neither leave, nor power, to take them away, not to take away the stench from them. To bring them, was but to adde to the judgement; to remove them was an act of mercy. God doth commonly use Satan in executing of judgement, never in the workes of mercy to men,

Yet even by thus much is Pharaoh hardned, and the Sorcerers growne insolent. When the devill and his agents are in the height of their pride, God shames them in a trifle. The rod is lift up: the very dust receives life: Lice abound every where, and
C make no difference betwixt Beggers and Princes. Though Pharaoh and his Courtiers abhorred to see themselves lousy, yet they hoped this miracle would be more easily imitable: but now the greater possibility, the greater foyle. How are the great wonder-mongers of Ægypt abashed, that they can neither make Lice of their owne, nor deliver themselves from the Lice that are made! Those that could make Serpents and Frogs, could not either make or kill Lice; to shew them that those Frogs and Serpents were not their own workmanship. Now Pharaoh must needs see how impotent a devill he served that could not make that vermine which every day rises voluntarily out of corruption. Iannes and Iambres cannot now make those Lice (so much as by delusion) which at another time they cannot chuse but produce unknowing, and which now they cannot avoid. That spirit which is powerfull to exe-
D cute the greatest things when he is bidden, is unable to doe the least when he is restrained. Now these corrivals of Moses can say, This is the finger of God. Ye fooliſh inchanters, was Gods finger in the Lice, not in the Frogs, not in the Blood, not in the Serpent? And why was it rather in the lesse, then in the greater? Because ye did imitate the other, not these. As if the same finger of God had not beene before in your imitation, which was now in your restraint: As if yee could have failed in these, if ye had not been onely permitted the other. Whiles wicked minds have their full scope, they never looke up above themselves; but when once God crosses them in their proceedings, their want of successe teaches them to give God his owne. All these plagues perhaps had more horror then paine in them. The Frogs creep upon their clothes, the Lice upon their skins: but those stinging Hornets which succeed
E them, shall wound and kill. The water was annoyed with the first plague, the earth with the second and third; this fourth fils the ayre, and besides corruption brings smart. And that they may see this winged army comes from an angry God (not either from nature, or chance) even the very Flies shall make a difference betwixt Ægypt and Goshen. He gave them their being, sets them their stint. They can no more sting an Israelite, then favor an Ægyptian. The very wings of Flies are directed by a providence, and doe acknowledge their limits. Now Pharaoh finds how impossible it is for him to stand out with God, since all his power cannot rescue him from Lice and Flies.

And now his heart begins to thaw a little: Goe, doe sacrifice to your God in this Land: or (since that will not be accepted,) Goe into the wildernesse, but not far: but how soone it knits againe! Good thoughts make but a thorow-fare of carnal hearts, they can never settle

ſettle there: yea, his very miſgiving hardens him the more: that now neither the murren of his cattell, nor the botches of his ſervants can ſtir him a whit. He ſaw his cattle ſtrucke dead with a ſudden contagion; hee ſaw his Sorcerers (after their conteſtation with Gods meſſengers) ſtrucke with a ſcab in their very faces, and yet his heart is not ſtrucke. Who would thinke it poſſible that any ſoule could be ſecure in the middeſt of ſuch variety, and frequence of judgements? Theſe very plagues have not more wonder in them, then their ſucceſſe hath. To what an height of obduration will ſinne lead a man, and of all ſins, incredulity? Amidſt all theſe ſtorms Pharaoh ſleepeth, till the voice of Gods mighty thunders, and hayle mixed with fire, rouzed him up a little.

Now, as betwixt ſleeping and waking, he ſtarts up, and ſayes, God is righteous, I am wicked; Moſes pray for us; and preſently layes downe his head againe. God hath no ſooner done thundering, then he hath done fearing. All this while you never find him carefull to prevent any one evill, but deſirous ſtill to ſhift it off, when hee feeles it; never holds conſtant to any good motion; never prayes for himſelfe, but careleſly wills Moſes & Aaron to pray for him; never yeelds God his whole demand, but higgleth & dodgeth, like ſome hard chapman, that would get a releaſe with the cheapeſt: Firſt, They ſhall not goe; then, Goe and ſacrifice, but in Ægypt; next, Goe ſacrifice in the wildernes but not far off; after, Goe ye that are men; then, Goe you and your children onely; at laſt, Goe all ſave your ſheepe and cattle. Whereſoever meere Nature is, ſhe is ſtill improvident of future good, ſenſible of preſent evill, inconſtant in good purpoſes; unable, through unacquaintance, and unwilling to ſpeake for her ſelfe, niggardly in her grants, and uncheerfull. The plague of the Graſſhoppers ſtartled him a little; and the more through the importunity of his ſervants: for when hee conſidered the fiſh deſtroyed with the firſt blow, the cattle with the fift, the corne with the ſeventh, the fruit and leaves with this eighth, and nothing now left him, but a bare fruitleſſe earth to live upon (and that, covered over with Locuſts) neceſſity drove him to relent for an advantage: Forgive me this once; take from me this death onely.

But as conſtrained repentance is ever ſhort and unſound; the Weſt wind, together with the Graſſhoppers, blowes away his remorſe; and now is he ready for another judgement. As the Graſſhoppers tooke away the ſight of the earth from him, ſo now a groſſe darkneſſe takes away the ſight of heaven too: other darkneſſes were but privative, this was reall and ſenſible. The Ægyptians thought this night long, (how could they chuſe when it was ſix in one?) and ſo much the more, for that no man could riſe to talk with other, but was neceſſarily confined to his owne thoughts: One thinkes the fault in his owne eyes, which he rubs oftentimes in vaine: Others think, that the Sunne is loſt out of the Firmament, & is now withdrawn for ever: Others, that all things are returning to their firſt confuſion: all think themſelves miſerable, paſt remedy, and wiſh (whatſoever had befalne them) that they might have had but light enough to ſee themſelves die.

Now Pharaoh proves like to ſome beaſts that grow mad with baiting: grace often reſiſted, turnes to deſperatneſſe, Get thee from me, looke thou ſee my face no more; whenſoever thou commeſt in my ſight, thou ſhalt dye. As if Moſes could not plague him as well in abſence: as if he that could not take away the Lice, Flyes, Frogs, Graſſhoppers, could at his pleaſure take away the life of Moſes, that procured them. What is this but to run upon the judgements, and run away from the remedies? Evermore when Gods meſſengers are abandoned, deſtruction is neere. Moſes will ſee him no more, till he ſee him dead upon the ſands; but God will now viſit him more then ever: The fearefulleſt plagues God ſtill reſerves for the upſhot: All the former do but make way for the laſt. Pharaoh may exclude Moſes and Aaron, but Gods Angell hee cannot exclude: Inſenſible meſſengers are uſed, when the viſible are debarred.

Now God begins to call for the Blood they owed him: In one night every houſe hath a carkaſſe in it, and (which is more grievous) of their firſt borne, and (which is yet more fearefull) in an inſtant. No man could comfort other; every man was too full of his owne ſorrow, helping rather to make the noiſe of the lamentation more dolefull

A dolefull, and aſtoniſhing. How ſoone hath God changed the note of this tyrannicall people! Ægypt was never ſo ſtubborne in denying paſſage to Iſrael, as now importunate to entreat it: Pharaoh did not more force them to ſtay before, then now to depart: whom lately they would not permit, now they hire to go. Their rich Jewels of ſilver and gold were not too deare for them, whom they hated; how much rather had they to ſend them away wealthy, then to have them ſtay to be their Executors? Their love to themſelves obtained of them the enriching of their enemies; and now they are glad to pay them well for their old worke, and their preſent journey: Gods people had ſtayed like Slaves, they goe away like Conquerors, with the ſpoile of thoſe that hated them; armed for ſecurity, and wealthy for maintenance.

B Old Iacobs ſeventy ſoules which he brought downe into Ægypt, in ſpight of their bondage and blood-ſhed, goe forth ſix hundred thouſand men, beſides children. The world is well mended with Iſrael, ſince he went with his ſtaffe and his ſcrip over Jordan. Tyranny is too weake, where God bids, Increaſe and multiply. I know not where elſe the good herbe over-growes the weeds; the Church out-ſtrips the World. I feare if they had lived in eaſe and delicacie, they had not beene ſo ſtrong, ſo numerous. Never any true Iſraelite loſt by his affliction. Not onely for the action, but the time, Pharaohs choice meets with Gods: That very night, when the hundred and thirty yeares were expired, Iſrael is gone, Pharaoh neither can, nor can will to keepe them any longer; yet in this, not fulfilling Gods will, but his owne. How ſweetly doth God diſpoſe of all ſecond cauſes, that whiles they doe their owne will, they doe his!

C The Iſraelites are equally glad of this haſte. Who would not be ready to goe, yea to fly out of bondage? They have what they wiſhed; it was no ſtaying for a ſecond invitation. The loſſe of an opportunity is many times unrecoverable: the love of their liberty made the burden of their dough light: who knew whether the variable mind of Pharaoh might returne to a deniall, and (after all his ſtubbornneſſe) repent of his obedience? It is fooliſh to hazard where there is certainty of good offers, and uncertainty of continuance. They goe therefore; and the ſame God that fetcht them out, is both their guide and protector. How carefully doth he chuſe their way! not the neerer, but the ſafer. He would not have his people ſo ſuddenly change from bondage to war.

D It is the wondrous mercy of God, that he hath reſpect, as to his owne glory, ſo to our infirmities. He intends them warres hereafter, but after ſome longer breathing, and more preparation; his goodneſſe ſo orders all, that evils are not ready for us, till we be ready for them. And as he chuſes, ſo be guides their way. That they might not erre in that ſandy and untracted wilderneſſe, himſelfe goes before them: who could but follow cheerfully, when he ſees God lead him? He that led the wiſe men by a Star, leads Iſrael by a Cloud: That was an higher object, therefore he gives them an higher and more heavenly conduct; This was more earthly; therefore he contents himſelfe with a lower repreſentation of his preſence; A pillar of cloud and fire: A pillar for firmnes; of cloud and fire for viſibility and uſe. The greater light extinguiſhes the leſſe; therefore in the day he ſhewes them not fire, but a cloud: In the night nothing is ſeene without light; therefore he ſhewes them not the cloud, but fire: The E cloud ſhelters them from heat by day; the fire digeſts the rawneſſe of the night. The ſame God is both a cloud and a fire to his children, ever putting himſelfe into thoſe formes of gracious reſpects, that may beſt fit their neceſſities.

As good motions are long ere they can enter into hard hearts, ſo they ſeldome continue long. No ſooner were the backs of Iſrael turned to depart, then Pharaohs heart and face is turned after them, to fetch them backe againe. It vexes him to ſee ſo great a command, ſo much wealth, caſt away in one night; which now he reſolves to redeem, though with more plagues. The ſame ambition and covetouſneſſe that made him weare out ſo many judgements, wil not leave him, till it have wrought out his full deſtruction. All Gods vengeances have their end; the finall perdition of his enemies, which they cannot reſt till they have attained: Pharaoh therefore and his Ægyptians will needs go fetch their bane. They well knew that Iſrael was fitter to ſerve then to fight; weary with their ſervitude, not trained up to war, not furniſhed with proviſion for a field: Themſelves Captaines and Souldiers by profeſſion, furniſhed with horſes, and Chariots of warre. They gave themſelves therefore the victory beforehand, and Iſrael either for ſpoile or bondage: yea, the weake Iſraelites gave up themſelves for dead, and already are talking of their graves. They ſee the Sea before them; behind them the Ægyptians: they know not whether is more mercileſſe, and are ſtricken with the feare of both. O God, how couldeſt thou forbeare ſo diſtruſtfull a people! they had ſeene all thy wonders in Ægypt and in their Goſhen; they ſaw even now thy pillar before them, and yet they did more feare Ægypt then beleeve thee. Thy patience is no leſſe miracle then thy deliverance. But in ſtead of removing from them, the cloudy pillar removes behind them, and ſtands betwixt the Iſraelites and Ægyptians: as if God would have ſaid, They ſhall firſt overcome me, O Iſrael, ere they touch thee. Wonder did now juſtly ſtrive with feare in the Iſraelites, when they ſaw the cloud remove behind them, and the ſea remove before them. They were not uſed to ſuch bulwarkes. God ſtood behind them in the cloud; the ſea reared them up wals on both ſides them. That which they feared would be their deſtruction, protected them: how eaſily can God make the cruelleſt of his creatures both our friends and patrons.

Yet here was faith mixed with unbeleefe. Hee was a bold Iſraelite that ſet the firſt foot into the channell of the Sea: and every ſtep that they ſet in that moiſt way, was a new exerciſe of their faith. Pharaoh ſees all this, and wonders; yet hath not the wit or grace to thinke (though the pillar tels him ſo much) that God made a difference betwixt him and Iſrael. He is offended with the Sea, for giving way to his enemies, and yet ſees not why he may not truſt it as well as they. He might well have thought, that he which gave light in Goſhen, when there was darkneſſe in Ægypt, could as well diſtinguiſh in the Sea: but he cannot now either conſider, or feare: it is his time to periſh. God makes him faire way, and lets him run ſmoothly on, till he be come to the midſt of the Sea; not one wave may riſe up againſt him, to wet ſo much as the hoofe of his horſe. Extraordinary favours to wicked men, are the forerunners of their ruine.

Now when God ſees the Ægyptians too far to returne, he findes time to ſtrike thē with their laſt terror: they know not how, but they would returne too late. Thoſe Chariots in which they truſted now faile them, as having done ſervice enough, to carie them into perdition. God purſues them, and they cannot flye from him. Wicked men make equall haſte, both to ſin, and from judgement: but they ſhall one day finde, that it is not more eaſie to run into ſin, then impoſſible to run away from judgement: the ſea will ſhew them, that it regards the Rod of Moſes, not the Scepter of Pharaoh; and now (as glad to have got the enemies of God at ſuch advantage) ſhuts her mouth upon them, and ſwallowes them up in her waves, and after ſhee had made ſport with them a while, caſts them upon her ſand, for a ſpectacle of triumph to their adverſaries.

What a ſight was this to the Iſraelites, when they were now ſafe on the ſhore, to ſee their enemies come floating after them upon the billowes, and to find among the carkaſſes upon the ſands, their knowne oppreſſors, which now they can tread upon with inſultation! They did not cry more loud before, then now they ſing. Not their faith, but their ſenſe, teaches them now to magnifie that God after their deliverance, whom they hardly truſted for their deliverance.

THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCE, CHARLES, PRINCE of Great Britaine.

Most excellent Prince:

ACcording to the true dutie of a ſervant, I entended all my Contemplations to your now glorious Brother, of ſweet and ſorowfull memorie. The firſt part whereof, as it was the laſt Booke, that ever was dedicated to that deare, and immortall name of his: ſo it was the laſt, that was turned over by his gracious hand.

NOw, ſince it pleaſed the GOD of ſpirits to call him from theſe poore Contemplations of ours, to the bleſſed contemplation of himſelfe, to ſee him as Hee is, to ſee as hee is ſeene; to whom is this ſequell of my labours due; but to your Highneſſe, the heire of his Honor and Vertues? Every yeare of my ſhort pilgrimage, is like to adde ſomething to this Worke; which in regard of the ſubject, is ſcarce finite: The whole doth not onely crave your Highneſſes Patronage, but promiſes to requite your Princely acceptation, with many ſacred examples, and rules, both for pietie, and wiſedome; towards the decking up of this flouriſhing ſpring of your Age; in the hopes whereof, not onely wee live, but he that is dead, lives ſtill in you: And if any piece of theſe endevours, come ſhort of my deſires, I ſhall ſupply the reſt with my prayers: which ſhall never be wanting to the God of Princes, that your happy proceedings may make glad the Church of God, your ſelfe in either World, glorious. A

Your Highneſſes in all humble devotion, and faithfull obſervance,

The waters of Marah.

ISRAEL was not more loth to come to the Red Sea, then to part from it. How ſoone can God turne the horror of any evill into pleaſure! One ſhore reſounded with ſhriekes of feare; the other with Timbrels and Dances: and Songs of Deliverance. Every maine affliction is our Red Sea, which while it threats to ſwallow, preſerves us. At Laſt, our Songs ſhall be lowder then our cries. The Iſraelitiſh Dames, when they ſaw their danger, though they might have left their Timbrels behind them; how unprofitable a burden ſeemed thoſe inſtruments of Muſick! yet now they live to renue that forgotten Minſtralſie, and Dancing, which their bondage had ſo long diſcontinued: and well might thoſe feet dance upon the ſhore, which had walked thorow the Sea. The land of Goſhen was not ſo bountifull to them, as theſe Waters. That afforded them a ſervile life: This gave them at once freedome, victorie, riches; beſtowing upon them the remainder of that wealth which the Ægyptians had but lent. It was a pleaſure to ſee the floating carcaſes of their Adverſaries; and every day offers them new booties: It is no marvell then if their hearts were tyed to theſe bankes. If we finde but a little pleaſure in our life, we are ready to dote upon it. Every ſmall contentment glues our affections to that we like: And if here our imperfect delights hold us ſo faſt, that wee would not bee looſed; how forcible ſhall thoſe infinite joyes be above, when our ſoules are once poſſeſſed of them!

Yet if the place had pleaſed them more, it is no marvell they were willing to follow Moſes; that they durſt follow him in the Wilderneſſe, whom they followed through the Sea: It is a great confirmation to any people, when they have ſeene the hand of God with their guide. O Saviour, which haſt undertaken to cary me from the ſpirituall Ægypt to the Land of Promiſe; How faithfull, how powerfull have I found thee? How feareleſly ſhould I truſt thee? how cheerefully ſhould I follow thee through contempt, poverty, death it ſelfe! Maſter, if it be thou, bid us come unto thee.

Immediately before, they had complained of too much water: now they goe three dayes without. Thus God meant to puniſh their infidelitie, with the defect of that, whoſe abundance made them to diſtruſt. Before, they ſaw all Water, no Land; now all dry and dustie Land,and no water.Extremities are the best tryals of men; as in bodies, those that can beare sudden changes of heats and cold without complaint, are the strongest. So much as an evill touches upon the meane, so much helpe it yeelds towards patience; Every degree of sorrow is a preparation of the next: but when we passe to extreames without the meane, we want the benefit of recollection; and must trust to our present strength. To come from all things to nothing, is not a descent but a downfall; and it is a rare strength and constancy, not to be maimed at least. These headlong evills, as they are the sorest, so they must be most provided for; as on the contrary, a sudden advancement from a low condition to the height of Honour, is most hard to manage. No man can marvel how that Tyrant blinded his Captives, when he heares that he brought them immediately, out of a darke dungeon, into Roomes that were made bright and glorious. Wee are not worthy to know,for what wee are reserved: no evill can amate us, if we can overcome sudden extremities.

The long deferring of a good (though tedious) yet makes it the better when it comes. Well did the Israelites hope that the Waters which were so long in finding, would be precious when they were found: Yet behold,they are crossed, not onely in their desires,but in their hopes;for after three dayes travell,the first Fountaines they finde are bitter Waters. If these Wels had not runne pure Gall, they could not have so much complained.Long thirst will make bitter Waters sweet;yet such were these Springs,that the Israelites did not so much like their moisture,as abhorre their relish. I see the first handsell that God gives them in their voyage to the Land of Promise; Thirst and Bitternesse. Satan gives us pleasant entrances into his wayes,and reserves the bitternesse for the end:God invites us to our worst at first; and sweetens our conclusion with pleasure.

The same God that would not lead Israel through the Philistins Land, lest they should shrinke at the sight of Warre, now leads them through the Wildernesse, and feares not to try their patience with bitter potions.If he had not loved them,the Ægyptian Furnace or Sword had prevented their thirst, or that Sea whereof their Enemies drunke dead; and yet see how hee dyets them. Never any have had so bitter draughts upon Earth as those he loves best: The palate is an ill judge of the favours of God. O my Saviour, thou didst drinke a more bitter Cup from the hands of thy Father, then that which thou refusedst of the Jewes, or then that which I can drinke from thee.

Before,they could not drinke if they would; now they might and would not. God can give us blessings with such a tang,that the fruition shall not much differ from the want:So many a one hath riches,not grace to use them;many have children,but such as they preferre barrennesse.They had said before, Oh that we had water! now, Oh that we had good water!It is good so to desire blessings from God, that we may be the better for injoying them; so to crave water, that it may not be sawced with bitternes.

Now,these fond Israelites in stead of praying,murmur; in stead of praying to God, murmur against Moses. What hath the righteous done? Hee made not either the Wildernesse dry, or the Waters bitter; Yea (if his conduct were the matter) what one foot went he before them without God? The Pillar led them,and not he;yet Moses is murmured at. It is the hard condition of authoritie, that when the multitude fare well, they applaud themselves;when ill,they repine against their Governours. Who can hope to be free,if Moses escape not? Never any Prince so merited a people. Hee thrust himselfe upon the Pikes of Pharaohs tyrannie.Hee brought them from a bondage worse then death. His rod divided the Sea, and shared life to them, death to their Pursuers.Who would not have thought these men,so obliged to Moses, that no death could have opened their mouthes or raised their hands against him? Yet now, the first occasion of want makes them rebell. No benefit can stop the mouth of Impatience;If our turne be not served for the present,former favours are either forgotten, or contemned. No marvell if we deale so with men, when God receives this measure from us. One yeere of Famine, One Summer of Pestilence, One Moone of unsea-

A unſeaſonable weather, makes us over-looke all the bleſſings of God; and more to mutine at the ſenſe of our evill, then to praiſe him for our varieties of good: whereas favours well beſtowed, leave us both mindfull and confident; and will not ſuffer us either to forget or diſtruſt. O God, I have made an ill uſe of thy mercies, if I have not learned to be content with they corrections.

Moſes was in the ſame want of water with them, in the ſame diſtaſte of bitterneſſe, and yet they ſay to Moſes, What ſhall we drinke? If they had ſeene him furniſhed with full veſſels of ſweet water, and themſelves put over to this unſavoury liquor, envie might have given ſome colour to this mutiny: but now their Leaders common miſerie, might have freed him from their murmurs. They held it one piece of the late Egyptian tyrannie, that a taſke was required of them, which the impoſers
B knew they could not performe; to make Bricke when they had no Straw; Yet they ſay to Moſes, What ſhall wee drinke? Themſelves are growne Exactors, and are ready to menace more then ſtripes, if they have not their ends, without meanes. Moſes tooke not upon him their proviſion, but their deliverance: and yet, as if he had been the common Victualer of the Campe, they aſke, What ſhall wee drinke? When want meets with impatient minds, it tranſports them to fury; Every thing diſquiets, and nothing ſatisfies them.

What courſe doth Moſes now take? That which they ſhould have done, and did not: They cryed not more fervently to him, then he to God: if he were their Leader, God was his, That which they unjuſtly required of him, he juſtly requires of God, that could doe it; He knew whence to looke for redreſſe of all complaints; this was
C not his charge, but his Makers, which was able to maintaine his owne act. I ſee and acknowledge the harbour, that we muſt put into, in all our ill weather. It is to thee, O God, that wee muſt powre out our hearts, which onely canſt make our bitter waters ſweet.

Might not that Rod, which tooke away the liquid nature from the waters, and made them ſolid; have alſo taken away the bitter qualitie from theſe waters, and made them ſweet: ſince to flow is naturall unto the water; to bee bitter is but accidentall. Moſes durſt not imploy his Rod without a Precept; he knew the power came from the commandement. Wee may not preſume on likelihoods, but depend upon warrants; therefore Moſes doth not lift up his Rod to the Waters, but his hand and voyce to God.

D The hand of faith never knocked at heaven in vaine: no ſooner hath Moſes ſhewed his grievance, then God ſhewes him the remedie: yet an unlikely one, that it might be miraculous. He that made the waters, could have given them any ſavour: How eaſie is it for him that made the matter, to alter the qualitie! It is not more hard to take away, then to give. Who doubts but the ſame hand that created them, might have immediately changed them? Yet that Almightie power will doe it by meanes; A piece of wood muſt ſweeten the waters: What relation had wood to water? or that which had no ſavour, to the redreſſe of bitterneſſe? Yet here is no more poſſibilitie of failing, then proportion to the ſucceſſe. All things are ſubject to the command of their Maker; He that made all of nothing, can make every thing of any: There is ſo much power in every creature, as he will pleaſe to give. It is the praiſe of E omnipotencie to worke by improbabilities; Eliſha with Salt, Moſes with wood, ſhall ſweeten the bitter waters; Let no man deſpiſe the meanes, when he knowes the Author.

God taught his people by actions, as well as words. This entrance ſhewed them their whole journey; wherein they ſhould taſte of much bitterneſſe: but at laſt through the mercy of God, ſweetned with comfort. Or did it not repreſent themſelves rather, in the journey? in the fountaines of whoſe hearts, were the bitter waters of manifold corruptions, yet their unſavorie ſoules are ſweetned by the graces of his Spirit. O Bleſſed Saviour: the Wood of thy Croſſe, that is, the application of thy ſufferings, is enough to ſweeten a whole Sea of bitterneſſe. I care not how unpleaſant a portion I finde in this Wilderneſſe, if the power and benefit of thy pretious death may ſeaſon it to my ſoule.

Of the Quailes and Manna.

THE thirſt of Iſrael is well quenched: for beſides the change of the waters of Marah, their ſtation is changed to Elim; where were twelve Fountaines, for their twelve Tribes, and now they complaine as faſt of hunger.

Contentation is a rare bleſſing; becauſe it ariſes either from a fruition of all comforts, or a not deſiring of ſome which we have not. Now, wee are never ſo bare, as not to have ſome benefits; never ſo full, as not to want ſomething, yea as not to be full of wants. God hath much adoe with us; either we lacke health or quietneſſe, or children, or wealth, or company, or our ſelves in all theſe. It is a wonder theſe men found not fault with the want of ſawce to their Quailes, or with their old cloathes, or their ſolitary way. Nature is moderate in her deſires; but conceit is unſatiable. Yet who can deny hunger to be a ſore vexation? Before, they were forbidden ſowre bread, but now what leaven is ſo ſowre as want? When meanes hold out, it is eaſie to be content. Whiles their dough, and other cates laſted, whiles they were gathering of the Dates of Elim, we heare no newes of them. Who cannot pray for his dayly bread, when he hath it in his cup-bord? But when our owne proviſion failes us, then not to diſtruſt the proviſion of God, is a noble tryall of faith. They ſhould have ſaid; He that ſtopt the mouth of the Sea, that it could not devoure us, can as eaſily ſtop the mouth of our ſtomacks: It was no eaſier matter to kill the firſt-borne of Ægypt, by his immediate hand, then to preſerve us; He that commanded the Sea to ſtand ſtill and guard us, can as eaſily command the earth to nouriſh us: He that made the Rod a Serpent, can as well make theſe ſtones, bread: He that brought armies of Frogs and Caterpillers to Ægypt, can as well bring whole drifts of birds and beaſts to the deſart: He that ſweetened the waters with Wood, can as well refreſh our bodies with the fruits of the earth. Why doe we not wait on him, whom we have found ſo powerfull? Now they ſet the mercy and love of God upon a wrong laſte; Whiles they meaſure it onely by their preſent ſenſe. Nature is jocond and cheerefull, whiles it proſpereth: let God withdraw his hand; no ſight, no truſt. Thoſe can praiſe him with Timbrels for a preſent favour, that cannot depend upon him, in the want of meanes for a future. Wee all are never wearie of receiving, ſoone weary of attending.

The other mutiny, was of ſome few male-contents, perhaps, thoſe ſtrangers, which ſought their owne protection under the wing of Iſrael; this, of the whole troope, Not that none were free: Caleb, Ioſhua, Moſes, Aaron, Miriam, were not yet tainted: uſually God meaſures the ſtate of any Church or countrey by the moſt; the greater part caries both the name and cenſure. Sinnes are ſo much greater, as they are more univerſall: ſo farre is evill from being extenuated by the multitude of the guilty, that nothing can more aggravate it. With men commonneſſe may plead for favour; with God it pleads for judgement. Many hands draw the Cable with more violence, then few: The leproſie of the whole body is more loathſome, then that of a part.

But what doe theſe mutiners ſay? Oh that wee had died by the hand of the Lord! And whoſe hand was this, Oh ye fond Iſraelites, if yee muſt periſh by famine? God caried you forth; God reſtrained his creatures from you: and while you are ready to die thus, ye ſay, Oh that we had dyed by the hand of the Lord!

It is the folly of men, that in immediate judgments they can ſee Gods hand; not in thoſe, whoſe ſecond cauſes are ſenſible: whereas God holds himſelfe equally intereſſed in all: challenging that there is no evill in the City, but from him. It is but one hand, and many inſtruments, that God ſtrikes us with: The water may not loſe the name, though it come by chanels and pipes from the ſpring. It is our faithleſneſſe, that in viſible meanes we ſee not him that is inviſible.

And when would they have wiſht to die? Whē we ſate by the fleſh-pots of Ægypt:

Alas

A Alas, what good would their fleſh pots have done them, in their death? If they might ſuſtaine their life, yet what could they availe them in dying? For, if they were unpleaſant, what comfort was it, to ſee them? If pleaſant, what comfort to part from them? Our greateſt pleaſures are but paines in their loſſe. Every mind affects that which is like it ſelfe. Carnall minds are for the fleſh-pots of Ægypt, though bought with ſervitude; ſpirituall are for the preſence of God, though redeemed with famine; and would rather die in Gods preſence, then live without him in the ſight of delicate or full diſhes.

They loved their lives well enough: I heard how they ſhrieked, when they were in danger of the Ægyptians; yet now they ſay, Oh that we had dyed! Not, Oh that wee might live by the fleſh-pots; but, Oh that wee had dyed! Although life bee
B naturally ſweet, yet a little diſcontentment makes us weary. It is a baſe cowardlineſſe, ſo ſoone as ever wee are called from the gariſon to the field, to thinke of running away. Then is our fortitude worthy of praiſe, when wee can endure to bee miſerable.

But what? can no fleſh-pots ſerve but thoſe of Ægypt? I am deceived, if that Land affoorded them any fleſh-pots ſave their owne: Their Landlords of Ægypt held it abomination to eat of their diſhes or to kill that which they did eate. In thoſe times then they did eat of their owne; and why not now? They had droves of cattell in the Wilderneſſe: why did they not take of them? Surely, if they would have beene as good huſbands of their cattell, as they were of their dough, they might have had e-
C nough to eat without need of murmuring: for if their back-burden of dough laſted for a moneth; their heards might have ſerved them many yeares. All grudging is odious; but moſt, when our hands are full. To whine in the midſt of abundance, is a ſhamefull unthankfulneſſe.

When a man would have looked that the anger of God ſhould have appeared in fire: now behold, his glory appeares in a Cloud. Oh the exceeding long ſuffering of God, that heares their murmurings! and as if he had beene bound to content them, in ſtead of puniſhing, pleaſes them; as a kind mother would deale with a crabed child, who rather ſtils him with the breſt, then calls for the rod. One would have thought, that the ſight of the cloud of God ſhould have diſpel'd the cloud of their diſtruſt; and this glory of God ſhould have made them aſham'd of themſelves, and afraid of him: Yet I doe not heare them once ſay, What a mighty and gracious God have we diſtru-
D ſted? Nothing will content an impotent mind: but fruition. When an heart is hardned with any paſſion, it will endure much, ere it will yeeld to relent.

Their eyes ſaw the cloud; their eares heard the promiſe, the performance is ſpeedy and anſwerable. Needs muſt they be convinced, when they ſaw God as glorious in his worke, as in his preſence; when they ſaw his word juſtified by his act. God tels them afore-hand what he will doe, that their expectation might ſtay their hearts. He doth that which he foretold, that they might learne to truſt him, ere he performe. They deſired meat, and receive Quailes; they deſired bread and have Manna. If they had had of the courſeſt fleſh, and of the baſeſt Pulſe, hunger would have made it dainty: But now God will pamper their famine; and gives them meat of Kings, and Bread of Angels. What a world of Quailes were but ſufficient to ſerve ſix hundred thouſand
E perſons? They were all ſtrong, all hungry; neither could they be ſatisfied with ſingle Fowles. What a Table hath God prepared in the Deſart, for abundance, for delicacie? Never Prince was ſo ſerved in his greateſt pompe, as theſe rebellious Iſraelites in the Wilderneſſe. God loves to over-deſerve of men; and to exceed not only their ſinnes; but their very deſires, in mercy. How good ſhall wee finde him to thoſe that pleaſe him, ſince he is ſo gracious to offenders! If the moſt graceleſſe Iſraelites be fed with Quailes and Manna; Oh, what goodneſſe is that he hath laid up for them that love him! As on the contrary, If the Righteous ſcarce be ſaved, where will the Sinners appeare? Oh God, thou canſt, thou wilt make this difference. Howſoever with us men, the moſt crabed and ſtubborne oftentimes fare the beſt; the Righteous Judge of the World frames his remuneration as hee findes us: And if his mercy ſometime provoke the worſt to repentance by his temporall favours, yet he ever reſerves

ſo much greater reward for the Righteous: as eternitie is beyond time, and heaven above earth. A

It was not of any naturall inſtinct, but from the over-ruling power of their Creator, that theſe Quailes came to the Deſart. Needs muſt they come whom GOD brings. His hand is in all the motions of his meaneſt Creatures. Not onely wee, but they moove in him. As not many Quailes, ſo not one Sparrow falls without him: How much more are the actions of his beſt creature, Man, directed by his providence? How aſhamed might theſe Iſraelites have beene, to ſee theſe creatures ſo obedient to their Creator, as to come and offer themſelves to their ſlaughter; whiles they went ſo repiningly to his ſervice and their owne preferment? Who can diſtruſt the proviſion of the great Houſe-keeper of the world, when hee ſees how hee can furniſh his tables at pleaſure? Is hee growne now careleſſe, or we faithleſſe rather? Why doe we not repoſe upon his mercy? Rather then we ſhall want, when wee truſt him, hee will fetch Quailes from all the coaſts of heaven to our boord. Oh Lord, thy hand is not ſhortned to give: let not ours be ſhortned, or ſhut in receiving. B

Eliahs ſervitors, the Ravens, brought him his full ſervice of bread, and fleſh at once; each morning and evening. But theſe Iſraelites have their fleſh at even, and their bread in the morning: Good reaſon their ſhould be a difference. Eliahs table was upon Gods direct appointment; the Iſraelites upon their mutiny: Although God will relieve them with proviſion, yet he will puniſh their impatience with delay; ſo ſhall they know themſelves his people, that they ſhall finde they were murmurers. Not onely in the matter, but in the order, God anſwers their grudging; Firſt they complaine of the want of fleſh-pots, then of bread. In the firſt place therefore they have fleſh, bread after. When they have fleſh, yet they muſt ſtay a time ere they can have a full meale; unleſſe they would eat their meat breadleſſe, and their bread dry. God will be waited on and will give the conſummation of his bleſſings at his leaſure. In the evening of our life, we have the firſt pledges of his favour: but in the morning of our reſurrection, muſt we looke for our perfect ſacietie of the true Manna, the bread of life. C

Now the Iſraelites ſped well with their Quailes; thy did eat and digeſt, and proſper: not long after, they have Quailes with a vengeance; the meat was pleaſant, but the ſauce was fearfull. They let downe the Quailes at their mouth, but they came out at their noſtrils. How much better had it beene to have died of hunger, through the chaſtiſement of God, then of the plague of God, with the fleſh betwixt their teeth! Behold, they periſh of the ſame diſeaſe then, whereof they now recover. The ſame ſinne repeated, is death, whoſe firſt act found remiſſion: Relapſes are deſperate, where the ſickneſſe it ſelfe is not. With us men, once goes away with a warning, the ſecond act is but whipping, the third is death. It is a mortall thing to abuſe the lenity of God; we ſhould be preſumptuouſly mad, to hope that God will ſtād us for a ſinning-ſtock, to provoke him how wee will. It is more mercy then he owes us, if he forbeare us once: it is his juſtice to plague us the ſecond time: We may thanke our ſelves, if we will not be warned. D

Their meat was ſtrange, but nothing ſo much as their bread. To find Quailes in a Wilderneſſe was unuſuall; but for bread to come downe from Heaven was yet more. They had ſeene Quailes before (though not in ſuch number:) Manna was never ſeene till now. From this day till their ſetling in Canaan, God wrought a perpetuall miracle in this food. A miracle in the place: other bread riſes up from below, this fel down from above; neither did it ever raine bread till now; Yet ſo did this heavenly ſhowre fall, that it is confined to the campe of Iſrael. A miracle in the quantitie: That every morning ſhould fall enough to fill ſo many hundred thouſand mouthes and mawes. A miracle in the compoſition; That it is ſweet like hony-cakes, round like Corianders, tranſparent as dew. A miracle in the qualitie; That it melted by one heat, by another hardened. A miracle in the difference of the fal; That (as if it knew times, and would teach them as well as feed them) it fell double in the even of the Sabbath, and on the Sabbath fell not. A miracle in the putrifaction and preſervation; That it E

was

A was full of wormes, when it was kept beyond the due houre for diſtruſt: ful of ſwe etneſſe, when it was kept a day longer for religion; Yea many Ages, in the Arke for a monument of the power and mercy of the Giver. A miracle in the continuance and ceaſing; That this ſhowre of bread followed their Campe in all their removals, till they came to taſte of the bread of Canaan, and then withdrew it ſelfe, as if it ſhould have ſaid: Ye need no miracles, now yee have meanes.

They had the types; we have the ſubſtance. In this wilderneſſe of the World, the true Manna is rained upon the tents of our hearts. He that ſent the Manna, was the Manna, which he ſent: He hath ſaid, I am the Manna that came downe from Heaven. Behold, their whole meales were ſacramentall: Every morſell they did eat, was ſpirituall. We eat ſtill of their Manna: ſtill hee comes downe from heaven. Hee hath
B ſubſtance enough for worlds of ſoules; yet onely is to be found in the liſts of the true Church; He hath more ſweetneſſe then the hony, and the hony-combe. Happy are we if we can find him ſo ſweet as he is.

The ſame hand that rained Manna upon their tents, could have rained it into their mouths, or laps. God loves we ſhould take paines for our ſpirituall food. Little would it have availed them, that the Manna lay about their tents, if they had not gone forth and gathered it, beaten it, bak'd it: Let ſalvation be never ſo plentifull, if wee bring it not home, and make it ours by faith, we are no whit the better. If the worke done, and meanes uſed, had beene enough to give life, no Iſraelite had dyed: Their bellies were full of that bread, whereof one crumme gives life: yet they dyed many of them in diſpleaſure. As in naturall, ſo in ſpirituall things, we may not truſt to
C meanes: The carcaſſe of the Sacrament cannot give life, but the ſoule of it; which is the thing repreſented. I ſee each man gather, and take his juſt meaſure out of the common heape. We muſt be induſtrious, and helpfull each to other: but when we have done, Chriſt is not partiall. If our ſanctification differ, yet our juſtification is equall in all.

He that gave a Gomer to each, could have given an Ephah: As eaſily could he have rained downe enough for a moneth, or a yeare at once, as for a day. God delights to have us live in a continuall dependance upon his providence, and each day renue the acts of our faith and thankfulneſſe. But what a covetous Iſraelite was that, which in a fooliſh diſtruſt would be ſparing the charges of God; and reſerving that for morning,
D which he ſhould have ſpent upon his ſupper? He ſhall know, that even the bread that came downe from heaven, can corrupt: The Manna was from above; the wormes and ſtinke from his diffidence. Nothing is ſo ſoveraigne which being perverted, may not annoy in ſtead of benefiting us.

Yet I ſee ſome difference between the true and typicall Manna; God never meant that the ſhadow and the body ſhould agree in all things. The outward Manna reſerved, was poiſon: the ſpirituall Manna is to us, as it was to the Arke; not good, unleſſe it be kept perpetually; If we keepe it, it ſhall keepe us from putrefaction. The outward Manna fell not at all on the Sabbath: The ſpirituall Manna (though it balkes no day) yet it fals double on Gods day: and if we gather it not then, wee famiſh. In that true Sabbath of our glorious reſt, we ſhall for ever feed of that Manna which we have gathered in this even of our life.

Of the Rocke of Rephidim.

BEfore, Iſrael thirſted and was ſatisfied; after that, they hungred and were filled; now they thirſt againe. They have bread and meat, but want drink: It is a marvell if God doe not evermore hold us ſhort of ſomething, becauſe he would keepe us ſtill in exerciſe. Wee ſhould forget at whoſe coſt we live, if we wanted nothing. Still God obſerves a viciſſitude of evill, and good; and the ſame evils that we have paſſed, returne upon us in their courſes. Croſſes are not of the nature of thoſe diſeaſes, which they ſay a man can have but once. Their firſt ſeiſure doth but make way for their re-entry. None but our laſt enemie comes once

once for all; and I know not, if that: for even in living we dye daily. So must wee take our leaves of all afflictions, that wee reserve a lodging for them, and expect their returne. A

All Israel murmured when they wanted bread, meat, water; and yet all Israel departed from the wilderneſſe of Sin to Rephidim, at Gods command. The very worſt men will obey God in ſomething; none but the good; in all: He is rarely deſperate, that makes an univerſall oppoſition to God. It is an unſound praiſe that is given a man, for one good action: It may be ſafely ſaid of the very Devils themſelves, that they doe ſomething well: They know and beleeve, and tremble. If we follow God, and murmur, it is all one, as if we had ſtayed behind.

Thoſe diſtruſt his providēce in their nēceſſity, that are ready to follow his guidance in their welfare. It is an harder matter to endure in extreame want, then to obey an hard commandement. Sufferings are greater tryals, then actions: How many have we ſeen jepard their lives, with cheerefull reſolution, which cannot endure in cold blood to loſe a limbe with patience! But God will have his throughly tryed, he puts them to both, and if we cannot endure both to follow him from Sin, and to thirſt in Rephidim, we are not ſound Iſraelites. B

God led them, on purpoſe to this drie Rephidim: He could as well have conducted them to another Elim, to convenient waterings: Or hee that gives the waters of all their channels, could as well have derived them to meet Iſrael: But God doth purpoſely carry them to thirſt. It is not for neceſſity, that we fare ill, but out of choyce: It were all one with God to give us health, as ſickneſſe; abundance as poverty. The treaſure of his riches hath more ſtore then his creature can be capable of; we ſhould not complaine, if it were not good for us to want. C

This ſhould have beene a contentment able to quench any thirſt: God hath led us hither; If Moſes out of ignorance had miſguided us, or we chanceably falne upon theſe dry deſarts, though this were no remedy of our griefe; yet it might be ſome ground of our complaint. But now the counſell of ſo wiſe and mercifull a God, hath drawne us into this want; and ſhall not he as eaſily finde the way out? It is the Lord, let him doe what he will. There can be no more forcible motive to patience, then the acknowledgement of a divine hand that ſtrikes us. It is fearfull to be in the hand of an adverſarie; but who would not be confident of a Father? Yet in our fraile humanitie, choler may tranſport a man from remembrance of nature; but when wee feele our ſelves under the diſcipline of a wiſe God, that can temper our afflictions to our ſtrength, to our benefit; who would not rather murmur at himſelfe; that hee ſhould ſwerve towards impatience? Yet theſe ſturdy Iſraelites wilfully murmur: and will not have their thirſt quenched with faith, but with water. Give us water. D

I looked to heare when they would have entreated Moſes to pray for them: but in ſtead of entreating, they contend, and in ſtead of prayers, I finde commands: Give us water. If they had gone to God without Moſes, I ſhould have praiſed their faith: but now they goe to Moſes without God, I hate their ſtubborne faithleſſeneſſe. To ſeeke to the ſecond meanes, with neglect of the firſt, is the fruit of a falſe faith.

The anſwer of Moſes is like himſelfe, mild and ſweet; Why contend ye with me? Why tempt ye the Lord? In the firſt expoſtulation condemning them of injuſtice; ſince not he, but the Lord had afflicted them. In the ſecond, of preſumption; that ſince it was God that tempted them by want, they ſhould tempt him by murmuring. In the one, he would have them ſee their wrong; in the other their danger. As the act came not from him, but from God; ſo he puts it off to God, from himſelfe: Why tempt yee the Lord? The oppoſition which is made to the inſtruments of God, redounds ever to his perſon. He holds himſelfe ſmitten through the ſides of his Miniſters: ſo hath God incorporated theſe reſpects, that our ſubtiltie cannot divide them. E

But what temptation is this? Is the Lord among us or no? Infidelity is crafty, and yet fooliſh; Crafty in her inſinuations, fooliſh in her conceits. They imply, If we were ſure the Lord were with us, we would not diſtruſt; They conceive doubts of his preſence, after ſuch confirmations. What could God doe more, to make them know him preſent,

A sent unlesse every moment should have renued miracles? The plagues of Ægypt, and the division of the Sea were so famous, that the very Innes of Iericho rang of them. Their waters were lately sweetned; the Quailes were yet in their teeth; their Manna was yet in their eye; yea, they saw God in the Pillar of the Cloud, and yet they say, Is the Lord amongst us? No argument is enough to an incredulous heart; not sense, not experience. How much better was that faith of Thomas, that would beleeve his eyes and hands, though his eare he would not? Oh the deepe infidelity of these Israelites, that saw and beleeved not!

And how will they know if God be amongst them? As if hee could not bee with them, and they be athirst: either God must humour carnall minds, or be distrusted: If they prosper (though it be with wickednes) God is with them; If they be thwarted
B in their owne designes; straight, Is God with us? It was the way to put God from thē, to distrust and murmure. If he had not been with them, they had not lived; If he had beene in them, they had not mutined. They can thinke him absent in their want, and cannot see him absent in their sinne: and yet wickednesse, not affliction, argues him gone; yea, then is he most present, when he most chastises.

Who would not have looked, that this answer of Moses should have appeased their fury? As what can still him that will not be quiet to thinke he hath God for his Adversary? But as if they would wilfully warre against heaven, they proceed; yet with no lesse craft than violence; bending their exception to one part of the answer: and smoothly omitting, what they could not except against. They wil not heare of tempting God? they maintaine their strife with Moses, both with words and stones. How
C malicious, how heady is impatience! The act was Gods, they cast it upon Moses, Wherefore hast thou brought us? The act of God was mercifull, they make it cruell, To kill us and our children: As if God and Moses meant nothing but their ruine, who intended nothing but their life and liberty. Foolish men! What needed this journey to death? Were they not as obnoxious to God in Ægypt? Could not God by Moses as easily have killed them in Ægypt, or in the Sea, as their enemies? Impatience is full of misconstruction; If it be possible to finde out any glosse to corrupt the Text of Gods actions, they shall be sure not to scape untainted.

It was no expostulating with an unreasonable multitude; Moses runs straight to him that was able at once to quench their thirst, and their fury: What shall I doe to this people? It is the best way, to trust God with his owne causes: when men will bee in-
D termedling with his affaires, they undoe themselves in vaine. We shall finde difficulties in all great enterprises: If we be sure we have begun them from God, wee may securely cast all events upon his providence, which knowes how to dispose, and how to end them.

Moses perceived rage, not in the tongues onely, but in the hands of the Israelites. Yet a while longer and they will stone me. Evē the Leader of Gods people, feared death; and sinned not in fearing. Life is worthy to be deare to all; especially to him, whom publike charge hath made necessary: Meere feare is not sinfull; It is impotence and distrust that accompany it, which make it evill. How well is that feare bestowed, that sends us the more importunately to God. Some man would have thought of flight; Moses flies to his Prayers; and that not for revenge, but for helpe. Who but Moses
E would not have said, This twice they have mutined, and beene pardoned; and now againe thou seest, O Lord, how madly they rebell; and how bloodily they intend against me; preserve me, I beseech thee, and plague thē. I heare none of this, but imitating the long suffering of his God, he seekes to God for them, which sought to kill him for the quarrell of God.

Neither is God sooner sought than found: All Israel might see Moses goe towards the Rocke: None but the Elders might see him strike it. Their unbelieve made them unworthy of this priviledge. It is no small favour of God, to make us witnesses of his great Workes; That he crucifies his Son before us; that he fetches the water of Life out of the true Rocke, in our sight, is an high prerogative; If his rigour would have taken it, our infidelity had equally excluded us, whom now his mercy hath received.

Moses must take his Rod; God could have doē it by his will, without a word; or by his word, without the Rod; but hee will doe by meanes, that which hee can as easily doe without. There was no vertue in the Rod, none in the stroke; but all in the command of God. Meanes must be used, and yet their efficacy must bee expected out of themselves.

It doth not suffice God to name the Rod, without a description; (Whereby thou smotest the River:) Wherefore? but to strengthen the faith of Moses, that hee might well expect this wonder from that, which hee had tryed to bee miraculous. How could hee but firmely beleeve, that the same meanes which turned the waters into blood, and turned the sea into a wall, could as well turne the stone into water? Nothing more raises up the heart in present affiance, than the recognition of favours, or wonders passed. Behold, the same Rod that brought plagues to the Egyptians, brings deliverances to Israel. By the same meanes can God save and condemne: like as the same sword defends and kils.

That power which turned the wings of the Quailes to the wildernesse, turned the course of the water through the Rock: Hee might (if he had pleased) have caused a Spring to well out of the plaine earth; but hee will now fetch it out of the stone, to convince and shame their infidelity.

What is more hard and dry than the Rocke? What more moist and supple than water? That they might be ashamed to thinke, they distrusted lest God could bring them water out of the Clouds or Springs, the very Rocke shall yeeld it.

And now, unlesse their hearts had beene more rocky than this stone, they could not but have resolved into teares, for this diffidence.

I wonder to see these Israelites fed with Sacraments: Their bread was sacramentall, whereof they communicated every day: lest any man should complaine of frequence, the Israelites received daily; and now their drinke was sacramentall, that the ancient Church might give no warrant of a dry Communion.

Twice therefore hath the Rock yeelded them water of refreshing; to signifie that the true spirituall Rocke yeelds it alwayes. The Rocke that followed them was Christ: Out of thy side, O Saviour, issued that bloody streame, whereby the thirst of all beleevers is comfortably quenched: Let us but thirst; not with repining, but with faith; this Rocke of thine shall abundantly flow forth to our soules, and follow us, till this water be changed into that new wine, which we shall drinke with thee in thy Fathers Kingdome.

The Foyle of Amalek: or the hand of Moses lift up.

NO sooner is Israels thirst slaked, then God hath an Amalekite ready to assault them. The Almighty hath choice of rods to whip us with; and will not be content with one tryall. They would needs bee quarrelling with Moses, without a cause; and now God sends the Amalekites to quarrell with them. It is just with God, that they which would be contending with their best friends, should have work enough of contending with enemies.

In their passage out of Ægypt, God would not leade them the neerest way, by the Philistims Land, lest they should repent at the sight of warre; now they both see, and feele it. He knows how to make the fittest choice of the times of evill; and withholds that one while, which he sends another, not without a just reason, why he sends, and with-holds it: And though to us they come ever (as wee thinke) unseasonably, and at some times more unfitly than others; yet he that sends them knowes their opportunities.

Who would not have thought, a worse time could never have beene pickt for Israels warre, than now? In the feebleness of their troopes, when they were wearied, thirsty, unweaponed; Yet now must the Amalekites doe that, which before, the Philistims might not doe: We are not worthy, not able to chuse for our selves.

To

A To be ſicke, and dye in the ſtrength of youth, in the minority of children: To be pinched with poverty, or miſcariage of children in our age, how harſhly unſeaſonable it ſeemes! But the infinite wiſdome that orders our events, knows how to order our times. Unleſſe wee will be ſhameleſſe unbeleevers, O Lord, wee muſt truſt thee with our ſelves and our ſeaſons, and know, that not that which wee deſire; but that which thou haſt appointed, is the fitted time for our ſufferings.

Amalek was Eſau's gran-child; and theſe Iſraelites the Sons of Iacob. The abode of Amalek was not ſo farre from Ægypt, but they might well heare what became of their Couſins of Iſrael; and now, doubtleſſe out of envy watcht their oportunity of revenge for their old grudge. Malice is commonly hereditary, and runs in the blood, and (as we uſe to ſay of Runnet) the older it is, the ſtronger.

B Hence is that fooliſh hoſtility, which ſome men unjuſtly nouriſh upon no other grounds than the quarrels of their forefathers. To wreake our malice upon poſterity, is at the beſt, but the humour of an Amalekite.

How cowardly and how crafty was the Skirmiſh of Amalek! They doe not bid them battell in termes of Warre, but without all noiſe of warning, come ſtealing upon the hindmoſt, and fall upon the weake and ſcattered remnants of Iſrael.

There is no looking for favour at the hands of malice: The worſt that either force or fraud can doe, muſt be expected of an Adverſary; but much more of our ſpirituall enemy; by how much his hatred is deeper. Behold, this Amalek lyes in ambuſh to hinder our paſſage unto our Land of Promiſe; and ſubtilly takes all advantages of our weakneſſes. We cannot be wiſe or ſafe if we ſtay behind our colours; and ſtrengthen

C not thoſe parts, where is moſt perill of oppoſition.

I doe not heare Moſes ſay to his Ioſhua; Amalek is come up againſt us; it matters not whether thou goe againſt him or not; or if thou goe, whether alone or with company; or if accompanied, whether with many or few, ſtrong or weake; or if ſtrong men, whether they doe fight or no; I will pray on the Hill: but, Chooſe us out men and goe fight.

Then onely can we pray with hope, when we have done our beſt. And though the meanes cannot effect that, which we deſire; yet God will have us uſe the likelieſt meanes on our part, to effect it. Where it comes immediately from the charge of God, any meanes are effectuall; One ſtick of wood ſhall fetch water out of the Rock, another ſhall fetch bitterneſſe out of the water: but in thoſe projects which wee

D make for our owne purpoſes, wee muſt chuſe thoſe helps which promiſe moſt efficacy. In vaine ſhall Moſes be upon the Hill, if Ioſhua be not in the Valley. Prayer without meanes, is a mockery of God.

Here are two ſhadowes of one ſubſtance; The ſame Chriſt in Ioſhua fights againſt our ſpirituall Amalek, and in Moſes ſpreads out his armes upon the hill; and in both, conquers. And why doth hee climbe up the hill rather than pray in the valley? perhaps that he might have the more freedome to his thoughts; which, following the ſenſe, are ſo much more heavenly, as the eye ſees more of heaven. Though vertue lies not in the place, yet choice muſt be made of thoſe places, which may be moſt help to our devotion: Perhaps that hee might be in the eye of Iſrael.

The preſence and ſight of the Leader gives heart to the people: neither doth any

E thing more move the multitude, than example. A publike perſon cannot hide himſelfe in the Valley: but yet it becomes him beſt to ſhew himſelfe upon the Hill.

The hand of Moſes muſt be raiſed, but not empty; neither is it his owne Rod that he holds, but Gods. In the firſt meeting of God with Moſes, the Rod was Moſes's; it is like, for the uſe of his trade: now the propriety is altered; God hath ſo wrought by it, that now he challenges it; and Moſes dare not call it his owne.

Thoſe things which it pleaſes God to uſe for his owne ſervice, are now changed in their conditiõ. The bread of the Sacrament was once the Bakers, now it is Gods; the water was once every mans, now it is the Laver of Regeneration. It is both unjuſt and unſafe to hold thoſe things common, wherein God hath a peculiarity.

At other times, upon occaſion of the plagues, and of the Quailes, and of the Rock, he was commanded to take the Rod in his hand, now hee doth it unbidden. Hee doth it now for miraculous operation, but for incouragement. A

For when the Israelites should cast up their eyes to the Hill, and see Moses and his Rod, (the man and the meanes that had wrought so powerfully for them) they could not but take heart to themselves, and thinke, There is the man that delivered us from the Egyptian, Why not now from the Amalekite? There is the Rod which turned waters to blood, and brought varieties of plagues upon Egypt, Why not now on Amalek?

Nothing can more hearten our faith, than the view of the monuments of Gods favour: if ever wee have found any word or act of God cordiall to us, it is good to fetch it forth oft to the eye. The renewing of our sense, and remembrance, makes every gift of God perpetually beneficiall.

If Moses had received a command, that Rod which fetcht water from the Rocke, B could as well have fetcht the blood of the Amalekites out of their bodies? God will not worke miracles alwayes; neither must we expect them unbidden.

Not as a Standard-bearer so much as a suppliant doth Moses lift up his hand: The gesture of the body should both expresse and further the piety of the soule. This flesh of ours is not a good servant unlesse it help us in the best offices: The God of Spirits doth most respect the soule of our devotion; yet it is both unmannerly and irreligious to be misgestured in our Prayers. The careless and uncomely carriage of the body helpes both to signifie and make a prophane soule.

The hand and the Rod of Moses never moved in vaine; Though the Rod did not strike Amalek, as it had done the Rocke: yet it smote Heaven, and fetcht downe victory. And that the Israelites might see, the hand of Moses had a greater stroke in C the fight than all theirs, the successe must rise and fall with it: Amalek rose, and Israel fell with his hand falling: Amalek fell, and Israel rises, with his hand raised. Oh the wondrous power of the prayers of faith! All heavenly favours are derived to us from this channall of grace: To these are wee beholden for our peace, preservations, and all the rich mercies of God which wee enjoy. We could not want if wee could aske.

Every mans hand would not have done this, but the hand of a Moses. A faithlesse man may as well hold his hand and tongue still; hee may babble, but prayes not; hee prayes ineffectually, and receives not: Onely the prayer of the Righteous availeth much; and onely the beleever is righteous.

There can be no merit, no recompence answerable to a good mans praier; for hea- D ven and the eare of God is open to him: but the formall devotions of an ignorant, and faithlesse man, are not worth that crust of bread which he askes: Yea, it is presumption in himselfe; how should it be beneficiall to others? it prophanes the name of God, in stead of adoring it.

But how justly is the fervency of the prayer added to the righteousnesse of the person? When Moses hand slackned, Amalek prevailed. No Moses can have his hand ever up; It is a title proper to God, that his hands are stretched out still: whether to mercy or vengeance. Our infirmity will not suffer any long intention, either of body or minde. Long prayers can hardly maintaine their vigour; as in tall bodies the spirits are diffused. The strongest hand will languish, with long entending: And when our devotion tires, it is seene in the successe; then straight our Amalek pre- E vailes. Spirituall wickednesses are mastered by vehement prayer; and by heartlesnes in prayer overcome us.

Moses had two helps, A stone to sit on, and an hand to raise his: And his sitting and holpen hand is no whit lesse effectuall. Even in our prayers will God allow us to respect our owne infirmities. In cases of our necessity, hee regards not the posture of body, but the affections of the soule.

Doubtlesse Aaron and Hur did not onely raise their hands, but their mindes with his: The more cords the easier draught. Aaron was brother to Moses: There cannot be a more brotherly office, than to help one another in our prayers, and to excite our mutuall devotions. No Christian may thinke it enough to pray alone; Hee is no true Israelite, that will not be ready to lift up the weary hands of Gods Saints:

All

A All Israel saw this: or if they were so intent upon the slaughter, and spoile, that they observed it not, they might heare it after from Aaron and Hur: yet this contents not God; It must be written. Many other miracles had God done before; not one, directly commanded to be recorded: The other were onely for the wonder; this for the imitation of Gods people. In things that must live by report, every tongue addes or detracts something; The word once written is both inalterable and permanent.

As God is carefull to maintaine the glory of his miraculous victory: so is Moses desirous to second him; God by a Booke, and Moses by an Altar, and a name. God commands to enroule it in parchment; Moses registers it in the stones of his Altar; which he raises not onely for future memory, but for present use. That hand which
B was weary of lifting up, straight offers a sacrifice of praise to God: How well it becomes the just to be thankfull! Even very nature teacheth us men to abhorre ingratitude in small favours. How much lesse can that Fountaine of goodnesse abide to bee laded at with unthankfull hands? O God, we cannot but confesse our deliverances: where are our Altars? where are our Sacrifices? where is our Iehovanissi? I doe not more wonder at thy power in preserving us, than at thy mercy, which is not weary of casting away favours upon the ingratefull.

Of the Law.

C IT is but about seven weekes, since Israel came out of Ægypt: In which space God had cherished their faith by five severall wonders: yet now he thinkes it time to give them Statutes from heaven, as well as bread. The Manna and water from the Rock (which was Christ in the Gospell) were given before the Law. The Sacraments of Grace, before the legal Covenant. The grace of God preventeth our obedience; Therefore should wee keepe the Law of God, because we have a Saviour. Oh the mercy of our God! which before we see what we are bound to doe, shewes us our remedy, if wee doe it not: How can our faith disanull the Law, when it was before it? It may helpe to fulfill that which shall be: it cannot frustrate that which was not. The Letters which God had written in our fleshly tables, were now (as those that were carved in some D barkes) almost growne out; hee saw it time to write them in dead Tables, whose hardnesse should not be capable of alteration: Hee knew, that the stone would bee more faithfull than our hearts.

O marvellous accordance betwixt the two Testaments! In the very time of their delivery, there is the same agreement, which is in the substance. The ancient Iewes kept our Feasts, and we still keepe theirs. The Feast of the Passeover is the time of Christs resurrection, then did he passe from under the bondage of Death. Christ is our Passeover, the spotlesse Lambe, whereof not a bone must be broken. The very day, wherein God came down in fire and thunder to deliver the Law: even the same day came also the Holy Ghost downe upon the Disciples in fiery tongues, for the propagation of the Gospell. That other was in fire and smoake, obscurity was
E mingled with terrour: This was in fire without smoake, befitting the light and clearnes of the Gospell: Fire, not in flashes, but in tongues; not to terrifie, but to instruct. The promulgation of the Law, makes way for the Law of the Gospell; No man receives the Holy Ghost, but he which hath felt the terrours of Sinai.

God might have imposed upon them a Law perforce; They were his creatures, and he could require nothing but justice. It had beene but equall that they should bee compelled to obey their Maker; yet that God which loves to doe all things sweetly, gives the Law of justice in mercy, and will not imperiously command, but craves our assent for that, which it were rebellion not to doe.

How gentle should be the proceeding of fellow creatures, who have an equality of being, with an inequality of condition; when their infinite Maker requests, where he might constraine! God will make no covenant with the unwilling; how much lesse the covenant of Grace; which ſtands all upon love? If we ſtay till God offer violence to our will, or to us, againſt our will, wee ſhall die ſtrangers from him. The Church is the Spouſe of Chriſt; he will enjoy her love by a willing contract, not by a raviſhment. The obſtinate have nothing to doe with God; The title of all Converts, is, A willing people. A

Then Iſrael inclined to God, it was from God; he enquires after his own gifts in us, for our capacity of more. They had not received the Law, unleſſe they had firſt received a diſpoſition fit to be commanded. As there was an inclination to heare, ſo there muſt be a preparation for hearing. Gods juſtice had before prepared his Iſraelites, by hunger, thirſt, fear of enemies; his mercies had prepared them by deliverances, by proviſions of water, meat, bread: and yet beſides all the ſight of God in his miracles, they muſt be three dayes prepared to hear him. When our ſoules are at the beſt, our approach to God requires particular addreſſes: And if three dayes were little enough to prepare them to receive the Law; how is all our life ſhort enough to prepare for the reckoning of our obſerving it? And if the word of a command expected ſuch readines, what ſhall the word of promiſe, the promiſe of Chriſt & ſalvatiõ? B

The Moraine of Ægypt was not ſo infectious as their vices; the contagion of theſe ſtucke ſtill by Iſrael: All the water of the Red Sea, and of Marah, & that which guſhed out of the Rocke, had not waſhed it off. From theſe, they muſt now be ſanctified. As ſinne is alwayes dangerous; ſo moſt, when we bring it into Gods ſight: It envenometh both our perſons and ſervices, and turnes our good into evill. As therefore we muſt be alwayes holy: ſo moſt, when we preſent our ſelves to the holy eyes of our Creator. Wee waſh our hands every day; but when wee are to ſit with ſome great perſon, we ſcowre them with balls. And if we muſt be ſanctified onely to receive the Law, how holy muſt we be to receive the grace promiſed in the Goſpell? C

Neither muſt themſelves only be cleanſed, but their very cloathes: Their garments ſmelt of Ægypt, even they muſt be waſhed: Neither can cloathes be capable of ſinne, nor can water cleanſe from ſinnes: The danger was neither in their garments, nor their skin; yet they muſt bee waſhed, that they might learne by their cloathes, with what ſoules to appeare before their God. Thoſe garments muſt bee waſhed, which ſhould never waxe old, that now they might begin their age in purity; as thoſe which were in more danger of being foule, than bare. It is fit that our reverence to Gods preſence ſhould appeare in our very garments; that both without and within wee may bee cleanly: but little would neatneſſe of veſtures availe us with a filthy ſoule. The God of ſpirits lookes to the inner man; and challenges the purity of that part which reſembles himſelfe: Cleanſe your hands you ſinners, and purge your hearts yee double minded. D

Yet even when they were waſhed, and ſanctified, they may not touch the Mount; not onely with their feet; but not with their eyes: The ſmoake keepes it from their eyes; the marks from their feet. Not only men that had ſome impurity at their beſt, are reſtrained, but even beaſts which are not capable of any unholineſs. Thoſe beaſts which muſt touch his Altars, yet might not touch his hill: And if a beaſt touch it, he muſt die: yet ſo as no hands may touch that, which had touched the hill. Vnreaſonableneſſe might ſeem to be an excuſe in theſe creatures: that therfore which is death to a beaſt, muſt needs be capitall to them, whoſe reaſon ſhould guide them to avoid preſumption. Thoſe Iſraelites which ſaw God every day in the pillar of fire, and the cloud, muſt not come neare him in the Mount. God loves at once familiarity and feare; Familiarity in our converſation, and feare in his commands. He loves to be acquainted with men, in the walkes of their obedience: yet he takes ſtate upon him in his ordinances; and will be trembled at, in his word and Iudgements. E

I ſee the difference of Gods cariage to men in the Law, and in the Goſpel: There the very Hill where he appeared, may not be touched of the pureſt Iſraelite; here the hemme of his garment is touched by the woman, that had the flux of blood; yea, his very face was touched with the lips of Iudas. There the very earth was prohibited them, on which hee deſcended: Here, his very body and blood is profered to our touch and taſte. Oh the marvellous kindneſſe of our God! How unthankful are we,

if

A if we doe not acknowledge this mercy above his ancient people! They were his owne; yet ſtrangers in compariſon of our liberty. It is our ſhame and ſinne, if in theſe meanes of intireneſſe, wee bee no better acquainted with God, than they; which in their greateſt familiarity were commanded alooſe.

God was ever wonderfull in his workes, and fearfull in his judgments: but he was never ſo terrible in the execution of his will, as now in the promulgation of it. Here was nothing but a majeſticall terror in the eyes, in the eares of the Iſraelites; as if God meant to ſhew them by this, how fearful he could be. Here was the lightning darted in their eyes, the thunders roaring in their eares, the Trumpet of God drowning the thunderclaps, the voyce of God out-ſpeaking the Trumpet of the Angel; the Cloud enwrapping, the ſmoake aſcending, the fire flaming, the Mount trembling, Moſes
B climbing & quaking, paleneſs and death in the face of Iſrael, uproare in the Elemẽts, and all the glory of Heaven turned into terror. In the deſtruction of the firſt world, there were clouds without fire: In the deſtruction of Sodom there was fire raining without clouds; but here was fire, ſmoak, clouds, thunder, earthquakes, and whatſoever might worke more aſtoniſhment, than ever was in any vengeance inflicted.

And if the Law were thus given, how ſhall it be required? If ſuch were the Proclamation of Gods Statutes, what ſhall the Seſſions be? I ſee and tremble at the reſemblance. The Trumpet of the Angel called unto the one: The voyce of an Archangell, the Trumpet of God ſhall ſummon us to the other. To the one Moſes (that climbed up that Hill, and alone ſaw it) ſayes, God came with ten thouſands of his Saints; In the other, thouſand thouſands ſhall miniſter to him, & ten thouſand thou-
C ſands ſhall ſtand before him. In the one, Mount Sinai onely was on a flame; all the World ſhall be ſo, in the other. In the one there was fire, ſmoake, thunder and lightning; In the other a fiery ſtreame ſhall iſſue from him, wherewith the heavens ſhall be diſſolved, and the Elements ſhall melt away with a noiſe. O God, how powerfull art thou to inflict vengeance upon ſinners, who didſt thus forbid ſinne! and if thou wert ſo terrible a Lawgiver, what a Judge ſhalt thou appeare? What ſhall become of the breakers of ſo fiery a Law? Oh where ſhall thoſe appeare that are guilty of the tranſgreſſing that Law, whoſe very delivery was little leſſe than death? If our God ſhould exact his Law but in the ſame rigor wherein he gave it, ſinne could not quite the coſt: But now the fire wherin it was delivered, was but terrifying; the fire wherein it ſhall be required, is conſuming. Happy are thoſe that are from under the D terrours of that Law, which was given in fire, and in fire ſhall be required.

God would have Iſrael ſee, that they had not to doe with ſome impotent Commander, that is faine to publiſh his Lawes without noyſe, in dead paper; which can more eaſily injoyne, than puniſh; or deſcry, than execute; and therefore, before hee gives them a Law, he ſhews them that he can command Heaven, Earth, Fire, Ayre, in revenge of the breach of the Law; That they could not but thinke it deadly to diſpleaſe ſuch a Law-giver, or violate ſuch dreadfull Statutes; that they might ſee all the Elements, examples of that obedience, which they ſhould yeeld unto their Maker.

This fire wherein the Law was given, is ſtill in it; and will never out: Hence are thoſe terrours which it flaſhes in every conſcience, that hath felt remorſe of ſinne. E-E very mans heart is a Sinai, and reſembles to him both a heaven and hell. The ſting of death is ſinne, and the ſtrength of ſinne is the Law.

That they might ſee he could finde out their cloſeſt ſinnes, he delivers his Law in the light of fire, from out of the ſmoake; that they might ſee what is due to their ſinnes, they ſee fire above, to repreſent the fire that ſhould be below them; that they might know he could waken their ſecurity, the Thunder, and lowder voyce of God ſpeakes to their hearts. That they might ſee what their hearts ſhould doe, the Earth quakes under them. That they might ſee they could not ſhift their appearance, the Angels call them together. Oh royall Law, and mighty Law-giver! How could they think of having any other God, that had ſuch proofes of this? How could they think of making any reſemblance of him whom they ſaw could not bee ſeene, and whom they ſaw in not being ſeene, infinite? How could they thinke of daring to prophane his Name, whom they heard to name himselfe, with that voyce, Iehovah? How could they thinke of standing with him for a day, whom they saw to command that heaven, which makes and measures day? How could they thinke of disobeying his Deputies, whom they saw so able to revenge? How could they thinke of killing, when they were halfe dead with the feare of him, that could kill both body and soule? how could they thinke of the flames of lust, that saw such fires of vengeance? How could they thinke of stealing from others, that saw whose the heaven and the earth was to dispose of at his pleasure? How could they thinke of speaking falsly, that heard God speake in so feareſull a tone? How could they thinke of coveting others goods, that saw how weake and uncertaine right they had to their owne? Yea, to us was this Law so delivered; to us in them: neither had there beene such state in the promulgation of it, if God had not intended it for Eternity. Wee men, that so feare the breach of humane Lawes, for some small mulcts of forfeiture; how should we feare thee (O Lord) that canst cast body and soule into hell!

Of the Golden Calfe.

IT was not much above a moneth, since Israel made their covenant with God; since they trembled to heare him say, Thou shalt have no other Gods but me; since they saw Moses part from them, and climbe up the Hill to God: and now they say, Make us gods, wee know not what is become of this Moses. Oh, ye madd Israelites, have ye so soone forgotten that fire and thunder, which you heard and saw? Is that smoake vanished out of your minde, as soone as out of your sight? Could your hearts cease to tremble with the earth? Can ye in the very sight of Sinai, call for other gods? And for Moses; was it not for your sakes that hee thrust himselfe into the midst of that smoake and fire, which yee feared to see a farre off? Was he not now gone after so many sudden embassages, to be your Leiger with God? If yee had seene him take his heeles, and runne away from you into the wildernesse, what could ye have said or done more? Behold, our better Moses was with us a while upon earth, he is now ascended into the Mount of Heaven, to mediate for us; shall wee now thinke of another Saviour? Shall wee not hold it our happinesse, that he is for our sakes above?

And what if your Moses had beene gone for ever? Must yee therefore have gods made? If ye had said, Choose us another Governour, it had beene a wicked and unthankfull motion, ye were too unworthy of a Moses, that could so soone forget him: but to say, Make us gods, was absurdly impious. Moses was not your God, but your Governour: neither was the presence of God tyed to Moses: You saw God still whē he was gone, in his pillar, and in his Manna, and yet ye say, Make us gods: Every word is full of senseleſse wickednesse. How many gods would yee have? or what gods are those that can bee made? or (what ever the Idolatrous Ægyptians did) with what face can ye, after so many miraculous obligations, speake of another God? Had the voyce of God scarce done thundring in your eares? Did you so lately heare and see him to be an infinite God? Did ye quake to heare him say out of the midst of the flames, I am Iehovah thy God: Thou shalt have no gods but me? Did yee acknowledge God your Maker, and doe yee now speake of making of gods? If ye had said, Make us another man to goe before us, it had beene an impossible suite. Aaron might help to marre you and himselfe; He could not make one haire of a man: and doe yee say, Make us gods? And what should those gods doe? Goe before you. How could they goe before you that cannot stand alone? your help makes them to stand, and yet they must conduct you. Oh the impatient ingratitude of carnall mindes! Oh the sottishnesse of Idolatry! Who would not have said, Moses is not with us, but hee is with God for us? He stayes long: He that called him withholds him: His delay is for our sakes, as well as his ascent. Though we see him not, we will hope for him: his favours to us have deserved not to be rejected: Or, if God will keepe him from us; hee that withholds him, can supply him: He that sent him can leade us without him; His fire

A fire and Cloud is all-ſufficient; God hath ſaid and done enough for us, to make us truſt him: Wee will, we can have no other God; wee care not for any other guide. But behold here is none of this: Moſes ſtayes but ſome five and thirty dayes, and now he is forgotten, and is become but this Moſes: Yea, God is forgotten, with him; and, as if God and Moſes had beene loſt at once, they ſay; Make us gods. Naturall men muſt have God at their bent: and if hee come not at a call, hee is caſt off, and they take themſelves to their owne ſhifts: like as the Chinois whip their gods, when they anſwer them not; whereas his holy ones waite long, and ſeeke him; and not onely in their ſinking, but from the bottome of the deepes, call upon him; and though hee kill them, will truſt in him.

Superſtition beſots the mindes of men, and blindes the eye of reaſon; and firſt
B makes them not men, ere it makes them Idolaters. How elſe could hee that is the Image of God fall down to the Images of creatures? how could our forefathers have ſo doted upon ſtockes and ſtones, if they had beene themſelves? As the Syrians were firſt blinded and then led into the midſt of Samaria: ſo are the Idolaters firſt bereaved of their wits and common ſenſe, and afterwards are carried brutiſhly into all palpable impiety.

Who would not have beene aſhamed to heare this anſwer from the brother of Moſes, Plucke off your Earings? He ſhould have ſaid, Plucke this Idolatrous thought out of your hearts: and now in ſtead of chiding he ſoothes them. And as if he had bin no kin to Moſes, he helps to leade them backe againe from God to Ægypt. The people importuned him, perhaps with threats. He that had waded through all the menaces of
C Pharaoh, doth he now ſhrinke at the threats of his owne? Moſes is not afraid of the terrors of God: His faith that caried him thorow the water, led him up to the fire of Gods preſence; whiles his brother Aaron feares the faces of thoſe men, which he lately ſaw pale with the feare of their glorious Law-giver. As if he that forbad other gods, could not have maintained his owne act, and agent, againſt men. Sudden fears when they have poſſeſſed weak mindes, lead them to ſhamefull errors. Importunity or violence may leſſen, but they cannot excuſe a fault. Wherfore was he a Governor, but to depreſſe their diſordered motions? Facility of yeelding to a ſin, or wooing it with our voluntary ſuit, is a higher ſtaire of evill: but, even at laſt to bee won to ſin, is damnable. It is good to reſiſt any onſet of ſinne; but one condeſcent loſes all the thankes of our oppoſition. What will it availe a man, that others are plagued for ſol-
D liciting him, whiles he ſmarteth for yeelding? If both bee in hell, what eaſe is it to him that another is deeper in the pit?

What now did Aaron? Behold, he that alone was allowed to climbe up the trembling and fiery Hill of Sinai, with Moſes, and heard God ſay, Thou ſhalt not make to thy ſelfe any graven Image, for I am a Iealous God: (as if hee meant particularly to prevent this act) within one moneth, cals for their earings, makes the graven Image of a Calfe, erects an Altar, conſecrates a day to it, cals it their god, and weepes not to ſee them dance before it. It is a miſerable thing, when Governours humour the people in their ſinnes; and in ſtead of making up the breach, enlarge it. Sinne will take heart by the approbation of the meaneſt looker on; but if authority once ſecond it, it grows impudent: As contrarily where the publike government oppoſes evill, (though it
E bee under-hand practiſed, not without feare) there is life in that State.

Aaron might have learned better counſell of his brothers example. When they came to him with ſtones in their hands, and ſaid, Give us water, he ranne as roundly to God, with prayers in his mouth; ſo ſhould Aaron have done, when they ſaid, Give us gods: but he weakely runnes to their earings, that which ſhould be made their god: not to the True God, which they had and forſooke. Who can promiſe to himſelfe freedome from groſſe infirmities; when he that went up into the Mount, comes downe, and doth that in the valley, which he heard forbidden in the Hill?

I ſee yet, and wonder at the mercy of that God, which had juſtly called himſelfe jealous. This very Aaron, whoſe infirmity had yeelded to ſo foule an Idolatry, is after choſen by God, to bee a Prieſt to himſelfe: hee that had ſet up an Altar to the Calfe, muſt ſerve at the Altar of God: Hee that had melted and carved out the

Calfe

Calfe for a god, muſt ſacrifice Calves and Rams, and Bullocks unto the True God: He that conſecrated a day to the Idol, is himſelfe conſecrated to him, which was diſhonoured by the Idol; the groſeſt of all ſins cannot prejudice the calling of God; Yea, as the light is beſt ſeene in darkneſſe, the mercy of God is moſt magnified in our unworthineſſe. A

What a difference God puts betweene perſons and ſinnes! while ſo many thouſand Iſraelites were ſlaine, that had ſtomackfully deſired the Idol; Aaron that in weakneſſe condeſcended, is both pardoned the fact, and afterwards laden with honour from God. Let no man take heart to ſin, from mercy: He that can purpoſe to ſin upon the knowledge of Gods mercy, in the remiſſion of infirmities, preſumes, and makes himſelfe a wilfull offender. It is no comfort to the wilfull that there is remiſſion to the weake and penitent. B

The earings are pluckt off: Ægyptian jewels are fit for any Idolatrous uſe. This very gold was contagious. It had been better the Iſraelites had never borrowed theſe ornaments, thē that they ſhould pay them back to the Idolatry of their firſt owners. What coſt the ſuperſtitious Iſraelites are content to bee at for this lewd devotion! The riches and pride of their outward habite, are they willing to part with, to their molten god; as glad to have their eares bare that they might fill their eyes. No gold is too deare, for their Idol; each man is content to ſpoile their wives and children, of that whereof they ſpoyled the Ægyptians.

Where are thoſe worldlings, that cannot abide to bee at any coſt for their Religion; which could be content to doe God chargeleſſe ſervice? Theſe very Iſraelites that were ready to give gold, not out of their purſes, but from their very eares to miſ-devotion, ſhall once condemne them. O Sacriledge ſucceeding to Superſtition! of old they were ready to give gold to the falſe ſervice of God; wee, to take away gold from the true: How doe wee ſee men prodigall to their luſts and ambitions, and we hate not to be niggards to God. C

This gold is now growne to a Calfe; Let no man think that forme came forth caſually out of the melted earings: This ſhape was intended by the Iſraelites, and perfected by Aaron: they brought this god in their hearts with them out of Ægypt, & now they ſet it up in their eyes. Still doth Ægypt hurt them: Servitude was the leaſt evill that Iſrael receives from Ægypt; for that ſent them ſtill to the true God, but this Idolatrous example led them to a falſe. The very ſight of evill is dangerous: and it is hard for the heart not to runne into thoſe ſinnes, to which the eye and eare is inured: Not out of love, but cuſtome, we fall into ſome offences. D

The Iſraelites wrought ſo long in the furnaces of the Ægyptian bricke, that they have brought forth a molten Calfe. The blacke Calfe with the white ſpots, which they ſaw worſhipped in Ægypt, hath ſtollen their hearts: And they, which before would have beene at the Ægyptian fleſh-pots, would now be at their devotions. How many have fallen into a faſhion of ſwearing, ſcoffing, drinking, out of the uſuall practice of others; as thoſe that live in an ill ayre, are infected with diſeaſes! A man may paſſe thorow Æthiopia unchanged: but he cannot dwell there, and not be diſcoloured.

Their ſin was bad enough, let not our uncharitableneſſe make it worſe: No man may thinke they have ſo put off humanity, and ſenſe, with their Religion, as to thinke that Calfe a god; or that this Idoll, which they ſaw yeſterday made, did bring them out of Ægypt, three moneths agoe. This were to make them more beaſts than that Calfe, which this Image repreſented: Or if they ſhould have beene ſo inſenſate, can we thinke that Aaron could be thus deſperately mad? The Image and the Holy-day were both to one Deity: To morrow is the Holy-day of the Lord your God. It was the True God they meant to worſhip in the Calfe: and yet at beſt this Idolatry is ſhamefull. It is no marvell if this foule ſinne ſeekes pretences; yet no excuſe can hide the ſhame of ſuch a face. Gods jealouſie is not ſtirred only by the rivality of a falſe god; but of a falſe worſhip: nothing is more dangerous than to mint Gods ſervice in our owne braine. E redreſſed it. He knew ere Moſes came up, what Iſrael would doe ere he came downe: like as he knew the two Tables would be broken, ere he gave them. God moſt wiſely permits, and ordains ſin to his owne ends, without our excuſe: And though he could eaſily by his owne hands remedy evils; yet he will doe it by meanes, both ordinary, & ſubordinate. It is not for us to look for any immediate redreſſe from God, when we have a Moſes, by whom it may be wrought: Since God himſelfe expects this from man, why ſhould man expect it from God?

God ſends down Moſes to remedy this ſinne. He could as eaſily have prevented, as redreſſed

Now might Moſes have found a time to have beene even with Iſrael for all their unthankfulneſſe, and mutinous inſurrections; Let me alone: I will conſume them, and make thee a mighty Nation. Moſes ſhould not need to ſollicite God for revenge; God ſollicites him, in a ſort, for leave to revenge. Who would look for ſuch a word from God to Man, Let me alone? As yet Moſes had ſaid nothing; Before hee opens his mouth, God prevents his importunity as fore-ſeeing that holy violence, which the requeſts of Moſes would offer to him. Moſes ſtood trembling before the Majeſty of his Maker; and yet heares him ſay, Let me alone. The mercy of our God hath, as it were, obliged his power to the faith of men: The fervent prayers of the faithfull, hold the hands of the Almighty. As I finde it ſaid afterwards of Chriſt, That hee could doe no miracles there becauſe of their unbeliefe: So now, I heare God (as if hee could not doe execution upon Iſrael, becauſe of Moſes's faith) ſay, Let mee alone, that I may conſume them.

We all naturally affect propriety, and like our owne ſo much better, as it is freer from parteners. Every one would be glad to ſay, with that proud one, I am, and there is none beſide me: ſo much the more ſweetly would this meſſage have ſounded to nature, I will conſume them, and make of thee a mighty Nation: How many indeavour that (not without danger of curſes and uproare) which was voluntarily tendred unto Moſes! Whence are our depopulations, and incloſures, but for that men cannot abide either fellowes or neighbours? But how graciouſly doth Moſes ſtrive with God, againſt his owne preferment? If God had threatned, I will conſume thee, and make of them a mighty Nation: I doubt whether he could have beene more moved. The more a man can leave himſelfe behinde him, and aſpire to a care of community, the more ſpirituall he is. Nothing makes a man ſo good a patriot, as Religion.

Oh the ſweet diſpoſition of Moſes; fit for him that ſhould be familiar with God! He ſaw they could be content to be merry and happy without him, he would not be happy without them. They had profeſſed to have forgotten him: hee ſlacks not to ſue for them. He that will ever hope for good himſelfe, muſt returne good for evill unto others.

Yet was it not Iſrael ſo much that Moſes reſpected, as God in Iſrael. He was thrifty and jealous for his Maker; and would not have him loſe the glory of his mighty deliverances; nor would abide a pretence for any Ægyptian dogge to barke againſt the powerfull worke of God; Wherefore ſhall the Egyptians ſay? If Iſrael could have periſhed without diſhonour to God, perhaps his hatred to their Idolatry would have overcome his natural love, & he had let God alone. Now ſo tender is he over the Name of God, that he would rather have Iſrael ſcape with a ſinne, than Gods glory ſhould be blemiſhed in the opinions of men, by a juſt judgement. He ſaw that the eyes and tongues of all the world were intent upon Iſrael; a people ſo miraculouſly fetcht from Ægypt, whom the Sea gave way to; whom heaven fed; whom the Rocke watered; whom the fire and cloud guarded, which heard the audible voyce of God. Hee knew withall, how ready the world would be to miſconſtrue, and how the Heathēs would be redie to caſt imputations of levity or impotence upon God; and therefore ſayes, What will the Egyptians ſay? Happy is that man which can make Gods glory the ſcope of all his actions, and deſires; neither cares for his owne wel-fare, nor fears the miſeries of others, but with reſpect to God in both. If God had not given Moſes this care of his glory, hee could not have had it: and now his goodneſſe takes it ſo kindly, as if himſelfe had received a favor from his creature; and for a reward of the grace he had wrought, promiſes not to doe that which he threatned. But what needs God to care for the ſpeech of the Ægyptians, men, Infidels? And if they had beene good

yet their cenſure ſhould have bin unjuſt. Shall God care for the tongues of men; the holy God, for the tongues of Infidels? The very Iſraelites, now they were from under the hands of Ægypt, cared not for their words; and ſhall the God of Heaven regard that which is not worth the regard of men? Their tongues could not walke againſt God, but from himſelfe; and if it could have beene the worſe for him; would he have permitted it? But, O God, how dainty art thou of thine honour, that thou canſt not endure the worſt of men ſhould have any colour to taint it! What doe we men ſtand upon our juſtice and innocence, with neglect of all unjuſt cenſures; when that infinite God, whom no cenſures can reach, wil not abide that the very Ægyptiãs ſhould falſely taxe his power and mercy? Wiſe men muſt care, not onely to deſerve well, but to heare well, and to wipe off, not onely crimes, but cenſures. A

There was never ſo precious a Monument, as the Tables written with Gods owne hand. If we ſee but the ſtone which Iacobs head reſted on; or, on which the foot of Chriſt did once tread; we looke upon it with more than ordinary reſpect: With what eye ſhould we have beheld this ſtone, which was hewed and written with the finger of God! Any manu-ſcript ſcroll written by the hand of a famous man, is laid up amongſt our jewels; What place then ſhould we have given to the hand-writing of the Almighty! B

That which he hath dictated to his ſervants the Prophets, challedges iuſt honour from us; how doth that deſerve veneration, which his own hand wrote immediately!

Propheſies and Euangelicall diſcourſes he hath written by others, never did hee write any thing himſelfe but theſe Tables of the Law: neither did he ever ſpeak any thing audibly to whole mankinde, but it; The hand, the ſtone, the Law were al his. By how much more precious this Record was, by ſo much was the fault greater, of defacing it. What King holds it leſſe than rebelliõ, to teare his writing, & blemiſh his Seale? At the firſt he ingraved his image in the table of mans heart; Adam blurred the Image, but (through Gods mercy) ſaved the Tablet. Now hee writes his will in the Tables of ſtone; Moſes breakes the Tables, and defaced the writing: if they had beene given him for himſelfe, the Author, the matter had deſerved, that as they were written in ſtone, for permanency; ſo they ſhould be kept for ever: and as they were everlaſting in uſe, ſo they ſhould be in preſervation. Had they beene written in clay, they could out have beene broken: but now they were given for all Iſrael, for all mankinde. He was but the meſſenger, not the owner. Howſoever therefore Iſrael had deſerved, by breaking this Covenant with God, to have this Monument of Gods Covenant with them broken by the ſame hand that wrote it: yet how durſt Moſes thus careleſly caſt away the Treaſure of all the world; and by his hands vndoe that, which was with ſuch coſt and care done by his Creator? How duſt he faile the truſt of that God, whoſe pledge he received with awe, and reverence? He that expoſtulated with God, to have Iſrael live and proſper, why would hee deface the rule of their life, in the keeping wherof they ſhould proſper? I ſee, that forty daies talk with God cãnot bereave a mã of paſſionate infirmity: he that was the meekeſt upon earth, in a ſudden indignation abandons that, which in cold blood he would have held faſter than his life: He forgets the Law written, when he ſaw it broken; His zeale for God hath tranſported him from himſelfe, and his duty to the charge of God: Hee more hates the Golden Calfe, wherein he ſaw ingraven the Idolatry of Iſrael, than hee honoured the Tables of ſtone, wherein God had ingraven his Commandements; and more longed to deface the Idol, than he cared to preſerve the Tables. Yet that God, which ſo ſharpely revenged the breach of one Law, upon the Iſraelites, checkes not Moſes for breaking both the Tables of the Law. The Law of God is ſpirituall; the internall breach of one Law, is ſo hainous, that in compariſon of it, God ſcarce counts the breaking of the outward Tables, a breach of the Law. The goodneſſe of God winks at the errours of honeſt zeale, and ſo loves the ſtrength of good affections, that it paſſeth over their infirmities: How highly God doth eſteeme a well governed zeale; when his mercy crownes it with all the faults! C D E

The Tables had not offended: the Calfe had, and Iſrael in it. Moſes takes revenge on both: Hee burnes and ſtamps the Calfe to powder, and gives it Iſrael to drinke;

A drinke; that they might have it in their guts, in ſtead of their eyes: How he haſteth to deſtroy the Idol, wherein they ſinned! that, as an Idol is nothing, ſo it might bee brought to nothing; and Atomes and duſt is neareſt to nothing: that in ſtead of going before Iſrael, it might paſſe thorow them; ſo as the next day they might finde their god in their excrements; to the juſt ſhame of Iſrael, when they ſhould ſee their new god cannot defend himſelfe, from being either nothing, or worſe.

Who can but wonder to ſee a multitude of ſo many hundred thouſands (when Moſes came running downe the Hill) to turne their eyes from their god, to him; And on a ſudden, in ſtead of worſhipping their Idol, to batter it in pieces, in the very height of the novelty? In ſtead of building Altars, and kindling fires to it, to kindle an hotter fire than that, wherewith it was melted, to cõſume it? In ſtead of dancing
B before it, to abhorre and deface it; in ſtead of ſinging, to weepe before it? There was never a more ſtiffe-necked people: yet I doe not heare any one man of them ſay, He is but one man; We are many; how eaſily may wee deſtroy him, rather than hee our god? If his brother durſt not reſiſt our motion in making it: Why will wee ſuffer him to dare reſiſt the keeping of it? It is our act, and we will maintaine it. Here was none of this; but an humble obeyſance to the baſeſt and bloodieſt revenge that Moſes ſhall impoſe. God hath ſent ſuch an impreſſion of Majeſty in the face of lawfull authority, that wickedneſſe is confounded in it ſelfe to behold it. If from hence viſible powers were not more feared than the inviſible God, the world would be over-run with out-rage. Sinne hath a guiltineſſe in it ſelfe, that when it is ſeaſonably checked, it puls in his head, and ſeekes rather an hiding place than a fort.

C The Idol is not capable of a further revenge: It is not enough, unleſſe the Idolaters ſmart: The gold was good, if the Iſraelites had not beene evill: ſo great a ſinne cannot be expiated without blood. Behold, that meeke ſpirit, which in his plea with God, would rather periſh himſelfe, than Iſrael ſhould periſh, armes the Levites againſt their brethren, and rejoyces to ſee thouſands of the Iſraelites bleed, and bleſſes their executioners.

It was the mercy of Moſes that made him cruell: He had been cruell to all, if ſome had not found him cruell. They are mercileſſe hands, which are not ſometimes imbrued in blood: There is no leſſe charity, than iuſtice, in puniſhing ſinners with death; God delights no leſſe in a killing mercy, than in a pitifull iuſtice: ſome tender hearts would be ready to cenſure the rigour of Moſes. Might not Iſrael have repen-
D ted and lived? Or if they muſt die, muſt their brethrens hand be upon them? Or, if their throats muſt be cut by their brethren, ſhall it be done in the very heate of their ſinne? But they muſt learne a difference betwixt pity, and fondneſſe; mercy and iuſtice. Moſes had an heart as ſoft as theirs, but more hot; as pitifull, but wiſer. He was a good Phyſitian, and ſaw that Iſrael could not live unleſſe hee bled: hee therefore lets out this corrupt blood, to ſave the whole body. There cannot be a better ſacrifice to God than the blood of Malefactors: and this firſt ſacrifice ſo pleaſed God in the hands of the Levites, that he would have none but them ſacrifice to him for ever. The blood of the Idolatrous Iſraelites cleared that Tribe from the blood of the innocent
E Sichemites.

THE SIXTH BOOKE.

Of the Vayle of MOSES.

IT is a wonder, that neither Moſes nor any Iſraelite gathered up the ſhivers of the former Tables: Every ſheard of that ſtone, and every letter of that writing had been a Relike worth laying up: but he well ſaw how headlong the people were to Superſtition; and how unſafe it were to feed that diſpoſition in them.

The ſame zeale that burnt the Calfe to aſhes, concealed the ruines of this Monument. Holy things, beſides their uſe, challenge no further reſpect. The breaking of the Tables did as good as blot out all the Writings; the writings defaced, left no vertue in the ſtone, no reverence to it.

If God had not beene friends with Iſrael, he had not renewed his Law. As the Iſraelites were wilfully blinde, if they did not ſee Gods anger in the Tables broken: ſo could they not but hold it a good ſigne of grace, that God gave them his Teſtimonies.

There was nothing wherein Iſrael out-ſtripped all the reſt of the world more, than in this priviledge; the pledge of his Covenant, the Law written with Gods owne hand. Oh what a favour then is it, where God beſtowes his Goſpell upon any Nation? That was but a killing letter: this is the power of God to ſalvation.

Never is God throughly diſpleaſed with any people, where that continues. For, like as thoſe which purpoſed love, when they fall off, cal for their tokens back againe; ſo when God begins once perfectly to miſlike, the firſt thing hee withdrawes, is his Goſpell.

Iſrael recovers this favor, but with an abatement; Hew thee two Tables. God made the firſt Tables: The matter, the forme was his; now Moſes muſt hew the next: As God created the firſt man after his owne Image; but, that once defaced, Adam begat Cain after his owne; Or, as the firſt Temple razed, a ſecond was built; yet ſo far ſhort that the Iſraelites wept at the ſight of it. The firſt works of God are ſtill the pureſt: thoſe that he ſecondarily workes by us decline in their perfection. It was reaſon that though God had forgotten Iſrael, they ſhould ſtill find they had ſinned. They might ſee the footſteps of diſpleaſure in the differences of the Agent.

When God had told Moſes before, I will not goe before Iſrael, but my Angell ſhall lead them; Moſes ſo noted the difference, that he reſted not till God himſelfe undertook their conduct: So might the Iſraelites have noted ſome remainders of offence, whiles in ſtead of that which his owne hand did formerly make, he ſaith now, Hew thee; And yet theſe ſecond Tables are kept reverently in the Arke, when the other lay mouldred in ſhivers upon Sinai; like as the repaired Image of God in our Regeneration is preſerved, perfited, and laid up at laſt, ſafe in Heaven; whereas the firſt Image of our created innocence is quite defaced; ſo the ſecond Temple had the glory of Chriſts exhibition, though meaner in frame. The merciſull reſpects of God are not tyed to glorious out-ſides; or the inward worthineſſe of things or perſons: Hee hath choſen the weake and ſimple, to confound the wiſe and mighty. A

Yet God did this worke by Moſes; Moſes hewed, and God wrote: Our true Moſes repaires that Law of God which we in our nature had broken; Hee revives it for us, and it is accepted of God, no leſſe than if the firſt Characters of his law had been ſtill entire. We can give nothing but the Table; it is God that muſt write in it. Our hearts are but a bare boord, till God by his finger engrave his Law in them; yea, Lord, wee are a rough Quarry; hew thou us out, and ſquare us fit for thee to write upon. B

Well may we marvell, to ſee Moſes, after this overſight, admitted to this charge againe: Who of us would not have ſaid, Your care indeed deſerves truſt; you did ſo carefully keepe the firſt Tables, that it would doe well to truſt you with ſuch another burden.

It was good for Moſes, that hee had to doe with God, not with men: The God of mercy will not impute the ſlips of our infirmity to the prejudice of our faithfulneſſe. Hee that after the miſ-anſwer of the one Talent, would not truſt the evill ſervant with a ſecond, becauſe he ſaw a wilfull neglect; will truſt Moſes with his ſecond Law, becauſe he ſaw fidelity in the worſt error of his zeale. Our charity muſt learne as to forgive, ſo to beleeve where we have beene deceived: Not that we ſhould wilfully beguile our ſelves in an unjuſt credulity, but that we ſhould ſearch diligently into the diſpoſition of perſons, and grounds of their actions; perhaps none may be ſo ſure as they that have once diſappointed us. Yea, Moſes brake the firſt; therefore he muſt hew the ſecond: If God had broken them, he would have repaired them; The amends muſt be where the fault was. Both God and his Church looke for a ſatisfaction in that wherein we have offended. C

It was not long ſince Moſes his former faſt of forty dayes: when he then came downe from the hill, his firſt queſtion was not for meat: and now going up againe to Sinai, he takes not any repaſt with him: That God which ſent the Quailes to the Hoſt of Iſrael, and Manna from Heaven, could have fed him with dainties: He goes up confidently in a ſecure truſt of Gods proviſion. There is no life to that of faith; Man lives not by bread onely: The Viſion of God did not onely ſatiate but feaſt him. What a bleſſed ſatietie ſhall there be, when we ſhall ſee him as he is; and he ſhall bee all in all to us; ſince this very fraile mortality of Moſes was ſuſtained, and comforted but with repreſentations of his preſence! D

I ſee Moſes the receiver of the Law, Elias the Reſtorer of the Law, Chriſt the Fulfiller of the old Law, and Author of the new, all faſting forty dayes: and theſe three great faſters I finde together glorious in Mount Tabor. Abſtinence merits not; For Religion conſiſts not in the belly, either full or empty: What are meats or drinkes to the Kingdome of God, which is like himſelfe, ſpirituall? But it prepares beſt for good duties. Full bellies are fitter for reſt: not the body, ſo much as the ſoule, is more active with emptineſſe; Hence, ſolemne prayer takes ever faſting to attend it, and ſo much the rather ſpeeds in Heaven, when it is ſo accompanied. It is good ſo to diet the body, that the ſoule may be fatned. E

When Moſes came downe before, his eyes ſparkled with anger; and his face was both interchangeably pale, and red with indignation: now it is bright with glory. Before there were the flames of fury in it, now the beames of Majeſty. Moſes had before ſpoken with God; why did not his face ſhine before? I cannot lay the cauſe upon the inward trouble of his paſſions, for this brightneſſe was externall. Whither ſhall we impute it, but to his more intireneſſe with God.

The more familiar acquaintance we have with God, the more doe we partake of him. He that paſſes by the fire, may have ſome gleames of heate; but he that ſtands by it,

A it, hath his colour changed. It is not possible a man should have any long conference with God, and be no whit affected. Weeare strangers from God, it is no wonder if our faces be earthly; but he that sets himselfe apart to God, shall finde a kinde of Majesty and awfull respect put upon him, in the mindes of others.

How did the heart of Moses shine with illumination, when his face was thus lightsome! And if the flesh of Moses in this base composition, so shined by conversing with God forty dayes in Sinai, what shall our glory be, when clothed with incorruptible bodies, we shall converse with him in the highest Heavens?

Now his face onely shone: afterwards the three Disciples saw all his body shining. The nature of a glorified body, the clearer Vision, the immediate presence of that fountaine of glory, challenge a farre greater resplendence to our faces, than his.

B O God, wee are content that our faces bee blemished a while with contempt, and blubred with teares; how can we but shine with Moses, when we shall see thee more than Moses!

The brightnesse of Moses's face reflected not upon his own eyes; He shone bright, and knew not of it: he saw Gods face glorious, he did not think others had so seene his. How many have excellent graces, and perceive them not! Our owne sense is an ill iudge of Gods favors to us; Those that stand by, can convince us in that which we deny to our selves. Here below it is enough if we can shine in the eyes of others; above, we shall shine and know it. At this instant Moses sees himselfe shine: then hee needed not. God meant not that he should more esteem himselfe, but that he should be more honoured of the Israelites: That other glory shall bee for our owne happi-

C nesse, and therefore requires our knowledge.

They that did but stand still to see anger in his face; ranne away to see glory in it: Before, they had desired that God would not speake to them any more but by Moses; and now that God doth but looke upon them in Moses, they are afraid; and yet there was not more difference betwixt the voyces, than the faces of God and Moses. This should have drawne Israel to Moses so much the more, to have seen this impression of Divinity in his face.

That which should have comforted, affrights them: Yea, Aaron himself, that before went up into the Mount to see and speak with God, now is afraid to see him that had seene God: Such a feare there is in guiltinesse, such confidence in innocency. When the soule is once cleared from sin, it shall run to that glory with ioy, the least glimpse

D whereof now appales it, and sends it away in terrour. How could the Israelites now chuse but thinke; How shall wee abide to looke God in the face, since our eyes are dazeled with the face of Moses! And well may we still argue, If the Image of God, which he hath set in the fleshly forehead of authority, dant us; how shall wee stand before the dreadfull Tribunall of Heaven?

Moses marvels to see Israel run away from their Guide, as from their Enemy; and lookes backe to see if hee could discerne any new cause of feare; and not conceiving how his milde face could affray them, cals them to stay and retyre.

Oh my people, whom doe ye flee? It is for your sakes that I ascended, staid, came downe: Behold, here are no armed Levites to strike you, no Amalekites, no Ægyptians to pursue you, no fires and thunders to dismay you. I have not that Rod of God

E in my hand, which you have seene to command the Elements: Or if I had; so farre am I from purposing any rigour against you, that I now lately have appeased God towards you; and loe here the pledges of his reconciliation. God sends me to you for good, and doe you runne from your best friend? Whither will ye goe from me, or without me? Stay and heare the charge of that God, from whom ye cannot flee.

They perceive his voyce the same, though his face were changed, and are perswaded to stay, and returne and heare him, whom they dare not see; and now after many doubtfull paces, approaching nearer, dare tell him he was growne too glorious.

Good Moses, finding that they durst not look upon the Sunne of his face, clouds it with a vayle: Choosing rather to hide the work of God in him, than to want opportunity of revealing Gods will to his people. I doe not heare him stand upon termes of reputation; If there be glory in my face, God put it there; he would not have placed ced it ſo conſpicuouſly, if he had meant it ſhould be hid: Hide ye your faces rather, which are blemiſhed with your ſinne; and looke not that I ſhould wrong God and my ſelfe, to ſeeme leſſe happy in favour of your weakneſſe. But without all ſelfe reſpects, he modeſtly hides his glorified face; and cares not their eyes ſhould pierce ſo farre, as to his ſkinne, on condition, that his words may pierce into their eares. It is good for a man ſometimes to hide his graces; Some Talents are beſt improved by being laid up: Moſes had more glory by his Vaile, than by his face. Chriſtian modeſty teaches a wiſe man, not to expoſe himſelfe to the faireſt ſhew, and to live at the utmoſt pitch of his ſtrength.

There is many a rich ſtone laid up in the bowels of the Earth; many a faire Pearle laid up in the boſome of the Sea, that never was ſeene, nor never ſhall bee. There is many a goodly Starre, which becauſe of height comes not within our account. How did our true Moſes, with the Vaile of his fleſh, hide the glory of his Deity, and put on vileneſſe, beſides the laying aſide of Majeſty: and ſhut up his great & Divine Miracles, with, See you tell no man! How farre are thoſe ſpirits from this, which care only to be ſeene; and wiſh onely to dazle others eyes with admiration, not caring for unknowne Riches? But thoſe yet more, which deſire to ſeeme above themſelves, whether in parts or graces, whoſe Vaile is fairer than their ſkinne. Modeſt faces ſhall ſhine through their Vailes, when the vain-glorious ſhal bewray their ſhame through their covering.

That God which gave his Law in ſmoke, delivered it againe through the Vaile of Moſes. Iſrael could not looke to the end of that, which ſhould be aboliſhed; for the ſame cauſe had God a Vaile upon his face, which hid his preſence in the Holy of Holies. Now as the Vaile of God did rend, when he ſaid, It is finiſhed; ſo the Vaile of Moſes then pulled off, wee clearly ſee Chriſt, the end of the Law. Our Ioſhua that ſucceeded Moſes, ſpeakes to us bare-faced: what a ſhame is it there ſhould bee a Vaile upon our hearts, when there is none on his face?

When Moſes went to ſpeake with God, he pulled off his Vaile: It was good reaſon he ſhould preſent to God that face which he had made. There had beene more need of his Vaile, to hide the glorious face of God from him, than to hide his from God: but his faith and thankfulneſſe ſerve for both theſe uſes. Hypocrites are contrary to Moſes: he ſhewed his worſt to men, his beſt to God; they ſhew their beſt to men, their worſt to God: but God ſees both their Vayle and their face: and I know not whether he hates their vayle of diſſimulation, or their face of wickedneſſe.

Of Nadab and Abihv.

That God which ſhewed himſelfe to men in fire when hee delivered his Law, would have men preſent their Sacrifices to him in fire: and this fire he would have his owne, that there might bee a juſt circulation in this creature, as the water ſends up thoſe vapours, which it receives, downe againe in raine. Hereupon it was, that fire came downe from God unto the Altar: That as the charge of the Sacrifice was delivered in fire and ſmoke, ſo God might ſignifie the acceptation of it in the like faſhion wherein it was commanded. The Baalites might lay ready their Bullock upon the wood, and water in their Trench: but they might ſooner fetch the blood out of their bodies, and deſtroy themſelves, than one flaſh out of Heaven to conſume the Sacrifice.

That Devill which can fetch downe fire from Heaven, either maliciouſly, or to no purpoſe; (although he abound with fire; & did as fervently deſire this fire in emulation to God, as ever he deſired mitigation of his own) yet now he could no more kindle a fire for the Idolatrous Sacrifice, than quench the flames of his own torment. Herein God approves himſelfe only worthy to be ſacrificed unto, that he creates the fire of his owne ſervice; whereas the impotent Idols of the Heathen muſt fetch fire from their neighbors Kitchen; and themſelves are fit matter for their borrowed fire.

The Iſraelites (that were led too much with ſenſe) if they had ſeene the Bullocke conſumed

A consumed with a fire fetcht from a cō non hearth, could never have acknowledged what relation the Sacrifice had to God; had never perceived that God tooke notice of the Sacrifice; but now they see the fire comming out from the presence of God, they are convinced both of the power and acceptation of the Almighty; They are at once amazed, & satisfied to see the same God answer by fire, which before had spoken by fire: God doth not lesse approve our Euangelicall Sacrifices, than theirs under the Law; but as our Sacrifices are spirituall, so are the signes of his acceptation; Faith is our guide, as Sense was theirs. Yea even still doth God testifie his approbation by sensible evidences: when by a lively faith and fervent zeale our hearts are consecrated to God, then doth this heavenly fire come downe upon our Sacrifices, then are they holy, living, acceptable.

B This flame, that God kindled, was not as some momentany bonfire, for a sudden and short triumph, nor as a domesticall fire, to goe out with the day; but is given for a perpetuity, and neither must dye, nor be quenched. God, as he is himselfe eternal, so he loues permanency and constancy of grace in us: If wee bee but a flash and away, God regards us not; all promises are to perseverance. Sure, it is but an elementary fire, that goes out; that which is celestiall, continues: it was but some presumptuous heat in us that decayes upon every occasion.

But he that miraculously sent downe this fire at first, will not renew the miracle every day, by a like supply; It began immediately from God, it must be nourished by means. Fuell must maintaine that fire which came from Heaven; God will not work miracles every day: if he haue kindled his Spirit in us, we may not expect hee shall
C every day begin againe; we have the fuell of the Word and Sacraments, Prayers, and Meditations, which must keep it in for ever. It is from God that these helps can nourish his graces in us; like as every flame of our materiall fire hath a concourse of providence, but we may not expect new infusions: rather know, that God expects of us an improvement of those habituall graces we have received.

While the people with feare and joy see God lighting his owne fire, fire from heaven, the two sonnes of Aaron, in a careless presumption, will be serving him with a common flame; As if he might not have leave to choose the formes of his own worship. If this had beene done some ages after, when the memory of the originall of this heavenly fire had been worne out, it might have beene excused with ignorance: but now, when God had newly sent his fire from above, newly commanded the cōti-
D nuance of it; either to let it goe out, or whiles it stil flamed, to fetch prophane coales to Gods Altar, could savour of no lesse than presumption and Sacriledge: when we bring zeale without knowledge, misconceits of faith, carnall affections, the devices of our Will-worship, superstitious Devotions into Gods Service; wee bring common fire to his Altar; these flames were never of his kindling; Hee hates both Altar, Fire, Priest and Sacrifice. And now behold, the same fire which consumed the Sacrifices before, consumes the Sacrificers. It was the signe of his acceptation, in consuming the beast; but whiles it destroyed men, the fearfull signe of his displeasure. By the same meanes can God bewray both love and hatred. Wee would have pleaded for Nadab and Abihu; They are but young men, the sonnes of Aaron, not yet warme in their Function; let both age, and blood, and inexperience excuse them as yet. No
E pretences, no priviledges can bear off a sin with God: Men think either to patronize, or mitigate evils, by their fained reasons. That no man may hope the plea eyther of birth, or of youth, or of the first commission of evill, may challenge pardon; I see here young men, sonnes of the Ruler of Israel, for the first offence strooke dead.

Yea, this made God the more to stomack, and the rather to revenge this impiety, because the sons of Aaron did it. God had both pardoned and graced their father, hee had honoured them; of the thousands of Israel, culling them out for his Altar: and now, as their father set up a false god, so they bring false fire unto the True God.

If the sonnes of Infidels live godlesly, they doe their kinde; their punishment shall be, (though just) yet lesse: but if the Children of religious Parents, after all Christian nurture, shall shame their Education; God takes it more hainously, and reve: ges it more sharply. The more bonds of duty, the more plagues of neglect.

If

If from the Agents, wee looke to the act it selfe; set aside the originall descent, & what difference was there betwixt these fires? Both lookt alike, heated alike, ascended alike, consumed alike: both were fed with the same materiall wood, both vanished into smoke; There was no difference, but the Commandement of God.

If God had injoyned ordinarie fire, they had sinned to looke for celestiall: now he commanded onely the fire which he sent; they sinned in sending up Incense, in that fire, which he commanded not. It is a dangerous thing in the service of God to decline from his owne institutions; wee have to doe with a power which is wise to prescribe his owne worship, just to require what he hath prescribed, powerfull to revenge that which he hath not required.

If God had strooke them with some Leprosie in their forehead, as he did their Aunt Miriams, soon after; or with some palsie, or lingring consumption, the punishment had beene grievous: but he, whose judgements are ever just, sometimes secret, saw fire the fittest revenge, for a sinne of fire; his owne fire fittest to punish strange fire; A sudden judgement, fit for a present and exemplarie sinne; He saw, that if he had winkt at this, his service had been exposed to prophanation.

It is wisedome in governours to take sinne at the first bound; and so to revenge it, that their punishments may bee preventions. Speed of death is not alwayes a judgement: suddennesse as it is ever justly suspicable; so then certainely argues anger, whē it finds us in an act of sinne. Leasure of repentance is an argument of favour; when God gives a man Law, it implyes that he would not have judgement surprize him.

Doubtlesse, Aaron lookt somewhat havily on this sad spectacle; It could not but appale him, to see his two sonnes dead before him, dead in displeasure, dead suddenly, dead by the immediate hand of God. And now hee could repent him of his new honour, to see it succeed so ill with the sonnes of his loynes: neither could he chuse but see himselfe striken in them. But his Brother Moses that had learned not to know either Nephewes, or Brother, when they stood in his way to God, wisely turned his eyes from the dead carkasses of his Sonnes, to his respect of the living God; My Brother, this event is fearfull, but just; These were thy sons, but they sinned; it was not for God, it is not for thee, to looke so much who they were, as what they did. It was their honour & thine, that they were chosen to minister before the Lord: He that called them, justly required their Sanctification and obedience. If they have profaned God, and themselves; can thy naturall affection so miscary thee, that thou couldest wish their impunity with the blemish of thy Maker? Our sonnes are not ours, if they disobey our Father: to pittie their misery, is to partake of their sinnes; If thou grudge at their judgement, take heed lest the same fire of God come forth upon this strange fire of nature. Shew now whether thou more lovest God, or thy sonnes; Shew whether thou be a better Father, or a Sonne.

Aaron, weighing these things, holds his peace, not out of an amazement, or sullennesse, but out of patient and humble submission; and seeing Gods pleasure, and their desert, is content to forget that hee had sonnes. He might have had a silent tongue, and a clamorous heart. There is no voyce louder in the eares of God, then a speechlesse repining of the soule. Heat is more intended with keeping in; but Aarons silence was no lesse inward: He knew how little hee should get by brawling with God. If he breathed out discontentment, he saw God could speake fire to him againe; And therefore he quietly submits to the will of God; And held his peace, because the Lord had done it. There is no greater proofe of grace, then to smart patiently; and humbly & contentedly to rest the heart in the justice, & wisedome of Gods proceeding; and to bee so farre from chiding, that we dispute not. Nature is froward; and though shee well knowes we meddle not with our match, when we strive with our Maker, yet she pricks us forward to this idle quarrell; and bids us with Iobs wife, Curse and dye. If God either chide or smite (as servants are charged to their Masters) wee may not answer againe; when Gods hand is on our backe, our hand must be on our mouth: else, as mothers doe their children, God shall whip us so much the more for crying.

It is hard for a stander by, in this case, to distinguish betwixt hard-heartednesse, & piety.

piety. There Aaron ſees his ſonnes lye; he may neither put his hand to them, to bury them, nor ſhed a teare for their death. Never parent can have juſter cauſe of mourning, then to ſee his ſonnes dead in their ſinne; if prepared, and penitent, yet who can but ſorrow for their end? but to part with children to the danger of a ſecond death, is worthy of more than teares. Yet Aaron muſt learne ſo farre to deny nature, that he muſt more magnifie the juſtice of God, than lament the iudgement. Thoſe whom God hath called to his immediate ſervice, muſt know, that hee will not allow them the common paſſions and cares of others. Nothing is more naturall than ſorrow for the death of our owne: if ever griefe be ſeaſonable, it becomes a funerall. And if Nadab and Abihu had dyed in their beds, this favor had bin allowed them, the ſorrow of their Father and brethren: for when God forbids ſolemne mourning to his Prieſts, over the dead, he excepts the caſes of this nearneſſe of blood. Now all Iſrael may mourne for theſe two; onely the father and brethren may not. God is iealous leſt their ſorrow ſhould ſeeme to countenance the ſin, which he had puniſhed: even the fearfulleſt acts of God muſt be applauded by the heavieſt hearts of the faithfull.

That which the Father and Brother may not doe, the Couſins are commanded: dead carcaſſes are not for the preſence of God; his iuſtice was ſhowne ſufficiently in killing them: They are now fit for the grave, not the Sanctuary: neither are they carryed out naked, but in their coates. It was an unuſuall ſight for Iſrael to ſee a linnen Ephod upon the Beere; The iudgement was ſo much the more remarkable, becauſe they had the badge of their calling upon their backs.

Nothing is either more pleaſing unto God, or more commodious to men, then that when he hath executed iudgment, it ſhould be ſeene and wondred at; for therefore he ſtrikes ſome that he may warne all.

Of AARON and MIRIAM.

THe Iſraelites are ſtayed ſeven dayes in the ſtation of Hazzeroth, for the puniſhment of Miriam. The ſins of the Governours are a iuſt ſtop to the people; all of them ſmart in one; all muſt ſtay the leaſure of Miriams recovery. Whoſoever ſeekes the land of Promiſe, ſhall finde many lets: Amalek, Og, Sehon, and the Kings of Canaan meet with Iſrael: theſe reſiſted, but hindered not their paſſage, their ſinnes onely ſtay them from removing. Afflictions are not croſſes to us, in the way to heaven, in compariſon to our ſinnes.

What is this I ſee? is not this Aaron that was brother in nature, & by office ioynt-Commiſſioner with Moſes? Is not this Aaron, that made his Brother an interceſſor for him, to God, in the caſe of his Idolatry? Is not this Aaron, that climbed up the Hil of Sinai, with Moſes? Is not this Aaron, whom the mouth and hand of Moſes conſecrated an high Prieſt unto God? Is not this Miriam, the elder Siſter of Moſes? Is not this Miriam, that led the Triumph of the Women, and ſung glorioufly to the Lord? Is not this Miriam, which layd her Brother Moſes in the Reeds, and fetcht her Mother to bee his Nurſe? Both, Prophets of God; both the fleſh and blood of Moſes: And doth this Aaron repine at the honour of him, which gave himſelfe that honour, and ſaved his life? Doth this Miriam repine at the proſperity of him whoſe life ſhee ſaved? Who would not have thought this ſhould have beene their glory, to have ſeene the glory of their owne brother? what could have beene a greater comfort to Miriam, than to thinke, How happily doth he now ſit at the Sterne of Iſrael, whom I ſaved from periſhing in a Boate of Bul-ruſhes! It is to mee, that Iſrael owes this Commander; But now envy hath ſo blinded their eyes, that they can neither ſee this priviledge of nature, nor the honour of Gods choyce. Miriam and Aaron are in mutiny againſt Moſes. Who is ſo holy that ſinnes not? What ſinne is ſo unnaturall that the beſt can avoid without God: But what weakneſſe ſoever may plead for Miriam, who can but grieve to ſee Aaron at the end of ſo many ſinnes? Of late I ſaw him carving the molten Image, & conſecrating an Altar to a falſe god: now I ſee him ſecōding an unkinde mutiny againſt his brother: Both ſinnes find him acceſſary; neither principall.

principall. It was not in the power of the Iegall Prieſthood to performe, or promiſe innocency to her Miniſters: It was neceſſary wee ſhould have another high Prieſt, which could not be tainted. That King of righteouſneſſe was of another order; He being without ſinne, hath fully ſatisfied for the ſinnes of men. Whom can it now offend, to ſee the blemiſhes of the Euangelicall Prieſthood, when Gods firſt high Prieſt is thus miſcarried. A

Who can looke for love and proſperity at once, when holy and meeke Moſes finds enmity in his owne fleſh and blood? Rather than we ſhall want, A mans enemies ſhall be thoſe of his owne houſe. Authority cannot faile of oppoſition, if it be never ſo mildly ſwayed: that common make-bate will rather raiſe it out of our owne boſome. To doe well, and heare ill, is Princely.

The Midianitiſh wife of Moſes coſt him deare. Before, ſhe hazzarded his life; now, the favour of his people: Vnequall matches are ſeldome proſperous. Although now this ſcandall was onely taken: Envy was not wiſe enough to chooſe a ground of the quarrell. Whether ſome ſecret and emulatory brawles paſſed betwene Zipporah and Miriam, (as many times theſe ſparkes of private brawles grow into a perillous and common flame) or whether now that Iethro and his Family was joyned with Iſrael, there were ſurmiſes of tranſporting the government to ſtrangers; or whether this unfit choyce of Moſes is now raiſed up to diſparage Gods gifts in him; Even in ſight, the exceptions were frivolous: Emulation is curious; and out of the beſt perſon, or act, will raiſe ſomething to cavill at. B

Seditions doe not ever looke the ſame way they move; Wiſe men can eaſily diſtinguiſh betwixt the viſor of actions, and the face. The wife of Moſes is mentioned, his ſuperiority is ſhot at. Pride is lightly the ground of all ſedition. Which of their faces ſhined like Moſes? yea, let him but have drawne his vayle, which of them durſt looke on his face? Which of them had faſted twice forty dayes? Which of them aſcended up to the top of Sinai, and was hid with ſmoake and fire? Which of them received the Law twice in two ſeverall Tables, from Gods owne hand? And yet they dare ſay, Hath God ſpoken only by Moſes? They doe not deny Moſes his honor, but they challenge a part with him: and as they were the elder in nature, ſo they would be equall in dignity, equall in adminiſtration. According to her name, Miriam would be exalted. And yet how unfit were they? One, a woman, whom her ſexe debarred from rule; the other a Prieſt, whom his office ſequeſtred from earthly government. C

Selfe-love makes men unreaſonable, and teaches them to turne the glaſſe to ſee themſelves bigger, others leſſe thā they are. It is an hard thing for a man, willingly and gladly to ſee his equals lifted over his head, in worth and opinion. Nothing will more try a mans grace, than queſtions of emulation. That man hath true light which can be content to be a candle before the Sunne of others. D

As no wrong can eſcape God; ſo leaſt of all thoſe which are offered to Princes: he that made the eare needs no intelligence of our tongues. Wee have to doe with a God, that is light of hearing, we cannot whiſper any evill ſo ſecretly, that hee ſhould not cry out of noyſe: and what need we any further evidence, when our Judge is our witneſſe.

Without any delation of Moſes, God heares and challenges them. Becauſe he was meek, therfore he complayned not: Becauſe he was meek and complayned not, therfore the Lord ſtruck in for him the more. The leſſe a man ſtrives for himſelfe, the more is God his Champion. It is the honour of great perſons, to undertake the patronage of their Clients: How much more will God revenge his Elect, which cry to him day and night! He that ſaid, I ſeeke not mine owne glory, addes, But there is one that ſeekes it, and judges. God takes his part ever that fights not for himſelfe. E

No man could have given more prooſes of his courage, than Moſes. He ſlew the Ægyptian; He confronted Pharaoh in his owne Court; he beate the Midianite ſhepherds; he feared not the troopes of Ægypt! He durſt looke God in the face, amidſt all the terrours of Sinai: and yet that ſpirit, which made and knew his heart, ſayes, He was the mildeſt man upon earth. Mildneſſe and fortitude may well lodge together in one breaſt; to correct the miſ-conceits of thoſe men, that think none valiant, but thoſe that are fierce and cruell.

No

A No ſooner is the word out of Miriams mouth, than the Word of Gods reproofe meets it; How he beſtirs him, and will be at once ſeene and heard, when the name of Moſes is in queſtion! Moſes was zealouſly carefull for Gods glory, and now God is zealous for his. The remunerations of the Almighty, are infinitely gratious. He cannot want honour and patronage, that ſeeks the honor of his Maker. The ready way to true glory, is goodneſſe.

God might have ſpoken ſo lowd, that Heaven & Earth ſhould have heard it, ſo as they ſhould not have needed to come forth for audience: but now, he calls them out to the barre, that they may be ſeene to heare. It did not content him, to chide them within doores: the ſhame of their fault had beene leſſe in a private rebuke: but the ſcandall of their repining was publike. Where the ſin is not affraid of the light, God
B loves not the reproofe ſhould be ſmothered.

They had depreſſed Moſes, God advances him: They had equalled them to Moſes, God prefers him to them. Their plea was, that God had ſpoken by them, as well as by Moſes: Gods reply is, That he hath in a more intire faſhion ſpoken to Moſes, than them. God ſpake to the beſt of them, but either in their dream, ſleeping; or in viſion, waking. But to Moſes he ſpake with more inward illumination, with more lively repreſentation: To others, as a ſtranger; to Moſes as a friend. God had never ſo much magnified Moſes to them, but for their envy. We cannot deviſe to pleaſure Gods ſervants, ſo much as by deſpiting them.

God was angry when he chode them, but more angry when he departed. The withdrawing of his preſence, is the preſence of his wrath. Whiles he ſtayes to re-
C prove, there is favour in his diſpleaſure: but when he leaves either man, or Church, there is no hope but of vengeance. The finall abſence of God, is hell it ſelfe. When he forſakes us (though for a time) it is an introduction to his utmoſt judgment. It was time to looke for a judgment, when God departed: ſo ſoone as he is gone from the eyes of Miriam, the leproſie appeares in her face: her foule tongue is puniſhed with a foule face. Since ſhe would acknowledge no difference betwixt her ſelfe and her brother Moſes, every Iſraelite now ſees his face glorious, hers leprous. Deformitie is a fit cure of Pride. Becauſe the venome of her tongue would have eaten into the reputation of her brother, therefore a poiſonous infection eates into her fleſh. Now both Moſes and Miriam, need to weare a vaile: the one to hide his glory; the o-
D ther her deformity. That Midianite Zipporah, whom ſhe ſcorned, was beautiful in reſpect of her.

Miriam was ſtriken, Aaron eſcaped: both ſinned; his Prieſthood could not reſcue him; the greatneſſe of his dignity did but adde to the haynouſneſſe of his ſinne: his repentance freed him; Alaſſe, my Lord, I beſeech thee lay not this ſinne upon us, which we have fooliſhly committed. I wonder not to ſee Aaron free, while I ſee him penitent; This very confeſſion ſaved him before, from bleeding for Idolatry, which now preſerves him from Leproſie, for his envious repining. The univerſal Antidote, for all the judgments of God, is our humble repentance.

Yea, his ſad deprecation prevailed, both to cleare himſelfe, and recover Miriam; The brother ſues for himſelfe and his ſiſter, to that brother whom they both emula-
E ted, for pardon from himſelfe, and that God which was offended in him. Where now is that equality which was pretended? Behold, he that ſo lately made his brother his fellow, now makes him his God: Lay not this ſinne upon us; Let her not be as one dead: As if Moſes had impoſed this plague, and could remove it. Never any oppoſed the ſervants of God, but one time or other they have beene conſtrained to confeſſe a ſuperiority.

Miriam would have wounded Moſes with her tongue; Moſes would heale her with his, O Lord, heale her now: The wrong is the greater, becauſe his ſiſter did it. He doth not ſay, I ſought not her ſhame, ſhee ſought mine; if God have revenged it, I have no reaſon to looke on her, as a ſiſter, who lookt at me, as an adverſarie: But, as if her leproſie were his, he cries out for her cure. O admirable meekneſſe of Moſes! His people the Jewes rebelled againſt him; God profers revenge; He would rather dye, than they ſhould periſh: His ſiſter rebelled againſt him, God workes his revenge: He will not give God peace, till ſhe be recured. Behold a worthy and noble patterne for us to follow. How farre are they from this diſpoſition, who are not onely content God ſhould revenge; but are ready to prevent Gods revenge with their owne? A

Gods love to Moſes ſuffers him not to obtaine preſently his ſute for Miriam; his good nature to his ſiſter, made him pray againſt himſelfe. If the judgment had beene at once inflicted, and removed, there had been no example of terror for others: God either denies, or defers the grant of our requeſts, for our good; It were wide for us, if our ſuits ſhould be ever heard. It was fit for all parts, Miriam ſhould continue ſome while leprous. There is no policie in a ſudden removall of juſt puniſhment: unleſſe the raine ſo fall that it lye, and ſoake into the earth, it profits nothing. If the Judgments of God ſhould be only as paſſengers, and not ſojourners at leaſt, they would be no whit regarded. B

Of the Searchers of Canaan.

I Can but wonder at the counſell of God. If the Iſraelites had gone to Cannan, without inquiry; their confidence had poſſeſſed it: now they ſend to eſpie the Land, ſix hundred thouſand of them never lived to ſee it: And yet I ſee God enjoyning them to ſend; but enjoyning it, upon their inſtance. Some things God allowes in judgment; their importunity, and diſtruſt extorted from God this occaſion of their overthrow. That which the Lord moves unto, proſpers; but that which we move him to firſt, ſeldome ſucceedeth. What needed they doubt of the goodneſſe of that Land, which God told them did flow with milke and honey? What needed they doubt of obtaining that, which God promiſed to give? When we wil ſend forth our ſenſes, to be our ſcouts in matter of faith, and rather dare truſt men, than God, we are worthy to be deceived. C

The baſeſt ſort of men are commonly held fit enough for intelligencers; but Moſes, to make ſure work, chooſeth forth the beſt of Iſrael, ſuch as were like to be moſt judicious in their inquiry, and moſt credible in their report. Thoſe that ruled Iſrael at home could beſt deſcry for them abroad; What ſhould direct the body, but the head? Men can judge but by appearance; It is for him onely that ſees the event, ere hee appoint the meanes, not to be deceived. It had beene better for Iſrael to have ſent the offall of the multitude: By how leſſe the credit of their perſons is, by ſo much leſſe is the danger of ſeducement. The error of the mighty is armed with authority, and in a ſort commands aſſent; whether in good or evill, Greatneſſe hath ever a traine to follow it at the heeles. D

Forty daies they ſpent in this ſearch; and this cowardly unbeliefe in the ſearch ſhall coſt thē forty yeares delay of the fruition. Who can abide to ſee the Rulers of Iſrael ſo baſely timorous? They commend the Land, the fruit commends it ſelfe, and yet they plead difficulty: We be not able to go up. Their ſhoulders are laden with the grapes; and yet their hearts are overlaid with unbeliefe: It is an unworthy thing to plead hardnes of atchieving, where the benefit wil more than requite the indeavour. Our Land of Promiſe is above; we know, the fruit therof is ſweet and glorious, the paſſage dificult. The gyantly ſons of Anak (the powers of darkneſſe) ſtand in our way: If we ſit down and complaine, we ſhall once know, that without ſhall be the fearefull. E

See the idle pleas of diſtruſt; We are not able: They are ſtronger. Could not God inable them? Was he not ſtronger than their Giants? Had he not promiſed to diſplace the Canaanites, to ſettle them in their ſtead? How much more eaſie is it for us to ſpy their

A their weaknes, than for them to espie the strength of their adversaries? When wee measure our spirituall successe by our owne power, wee are vanquished before wee fight: He that would overcome, must neither looke upon his owne arme, nor the arme of his enemy, but the mouth and hand of him that hath promised, and can performe. Who are we flesh and blood, with our breath in our nostrils, that wee should fight with Principalities, powers, spirituall wickednesses in heavenly places? The match is too unequall; we are not like Grashoppers to these Giants; when wee compare our selves with them, how can we but despaire? when we compare them with God, how can we be discouraged? He that hath brought us into this field, hath promised us victory. God knew their strength, ere he offered to commit us.

Well might they have thought, Were not the Amalekites stronger than we? were
B not they armed, we naked? Did not the onely hand of Moses, by lifting up, beate them downe? Were not the Ægyptians no lesse our masters? Did not Death come running after us in their Chariots? Did we not leave these buried in the Sea, the other unburied in the wildernesse? Whence had the Anakims their strength; but from him that bids us goe up against them? Why have the bodies of our forefathers taken possession of their Hebron, but for us? But now, their feare hath not left them so much reason, as to compare their adversaries with others, but only with themselves: Doubtlesse, these Gyants were mighty, but their feare hath stretched them out some Cubits, beyond their stature. Distrust makes our dangers greater, and our helps lesse than they are, and forecasts ever worse than shall be; and if evils be possible, it makes them certaine.

C Amongst those twelve Messengers, whom our second Moses sent thorow the Land of Promise, there was but one Iudas; but amongst those twelve, which the former Moses addressed thorow the same Land, there is but one Caleb: and yet those were chosen out of the meanest, these out of the heads of Israel. As there is no society free from some corruption: so it is hard, if in a community of men, there bee not some faithfulnesse.

Wee shall wrong God, if wee feare lest good courses shall bee quite forsaken; hee knowes how to serve himselfe of the best, if the fewest; and could as easily be attended with a multitude, if he did not seeke his owne glory, in unlikelihoods.

Ioshua was silent, and wisely spared his tongue for a further advantage; Only Caleb spake: I doe not heare him say, Who am I to strive with a multitude? What can Io-
D shua and I doe against ten Rulers? It is better to sit still, than to rise and fall: But he resolves to swimme against this streame, and will either draw friends to the truth, or enemies upon himselfe.

True Christian fortitude teaches us not to regard the number, or quality of the opponents, but the equity of the cause; and cares not to stand alone, and challenge all commers: & if it could be opposed by as many worlds, as men, it may be overborne, but it cannot be daunted: Wheras popularity carries weak minds, and teaches them the safety of erring with a multitude.

Caleb saw the Gyantly Anakims, and the walled Cities, as well as the rest; and yet he sayes, Let us goe up and possesse it: As if it were no more, but to goe, and see, and conquer. Faith is couragious, and makes nothing of those dangers, wherewith others
E are quailed.

It is very materiall with what eyes wee looke upon all subjects. Feare doth not more multiply evils, than faith diminisheth them; which is therefore bold, because either it sees not, or contemnes that terrour, which feare represents to the weake. There is none so valiant as the beleever.

It had beene happy for Israel, if Calebs counsell had beene as effectuall as good. But how easily have these Rulers discouraged a faint-hearted people! In stead of lifting up their ensignes, and marching towards Canaan; they sit them downe, and lift up their voyce and cry. The rods of their Ægyptian Taske-masters had never beene so fit for them, as now, for crying. They had cause indeed to weepe for the sinne of their infidelity: but now they weepe for feare of those enemies they saw not. I feare if there had beene ten Calebs to perswade, and but two faint spies to discourage them, those two cowards would have prevailed against those ten solicitors: How much more now ten oppose and but two incourage! An easie Rhetoricke drawes us to the worse part; yea, it is hard not to run downe the hill. The faction of evill is so much stronger in our nature, than that of Good, that every least motion prevailes for the one: scarce any suite for the other.

Now is Moses in danger of losing all the cost and care, that ever he bestowed upon Israel: His people are already gone backe to Ægypt, in their hearts; & their bodies are returning. Oh ye rebellious Hebrewes, where shall God have you at last! Did ever Moses promise to bring you to a fruitfull Land without Inhabitants? To give you a rich Country, without resistance? Are not the graves of Canaan as good, as those of Ægypt? What can ye but die at the hands of the Anakims? Can yee hope for lesse from the Ægyptians? What madnesse is this to wish to die, for feare of death? Is there lesse hope from your enemies, that shall be, when ye goe under strong and expert Leaders, than from the enemies that were, when ye shall returne masterlesse? Can those cruell Ægyptians so soone have forgotte the blood of their fathers, children, brothers, husbands, which perished in pursuing you? Had yee rather trust the mercy of knowne enemies, than the promise of a faithfull God? Which way wil ye returne? Who shall devide the Sea for you? Who shall fetch you water out of the Rocke? Or can ye hope that the Manna of God will follow you, while ye runne from him? Feeble mindes, when they meet with crosses they lookt not for, repent of their good beginnings, and wish any difficulty rather than that they finde. How many have pulled back their foot from the narrow way, for the troubles of a good profession!

It had been time for the Israelites to have fallen down on their faces before Moses and Aaron, and to have said, Yee led us thorow the Sea, make way for us into Canaan. Those Giants are strong, but not so strong as the Rock of Rephidim; ye stroke that and it yeelded; If they be tall, the Pillar of God is higher than they: when we look on our selves, we see cause of fear; but whē we cōsider the miraculous power of you our leaders, we cannot but cōtemn those men of measures. Leave us not therfore, but go before us in your directiōs, go to God for us in your praiers. But now cōtrarily Moses and Aaron fall on their faces to them, and sue to them, that they would be content to be conducted. Had they beene suffered to depart, they had perished; Moses and his few had been victorious: and yet, as if he could not be happy without them, he fals on his face to them, that they would stay. We have never so much need to be importuned as in those things whose benefit should make us most importunate. The sweetnesse of Gods Law, and our promised glory is such, as should draw all hearts after it; And yet if we did not sue to men (as for life) that they would bee reconciled to God, and be saved, I doubt whether they would obey, yea, it were well, if our sute were sufficient to prevaile.

Though Moses and Aaron intreat upon their faces, and Ioshua and Caleb perswade and rend their garments, yet they move nothing. The obstinate multitude, growne more violent with opposing, is ready to returne them stones for their prayers. Such hath beene ever the thankes of fidelity and truth; crossed wickednesse proves desperate, and in stead of yeelding, seekes for revenge. Nothing is so hatefull to a resolute sinner, as good counsell: Wee are become enemies to the world because wee tell them truth.

That God which was invisibly present whiles they sinned, when they have sinned shewes himselfe glorious. They might have seene him before, that they should not sinne; now they cannot choose but see him in the height of their sinne. They saw before, the Pillar of his ordinary presence: now they see him unusually terrible; that they may with shame and horror, confesse him able to defend, able to revenge. The helpe of God uses to shew it selfe in extremity. He that can prevent evils, conceales his ayde, till danger be ripe; and then he is fearefull, as before he seemed connivent.

Of CORAH'S Conſpiracy.

THe teares of Iſrael were ſcarce dry, ſince the ſmart of their laſt mutiny, and now they begin another. The multitude is like a raging Sea, full of unquiet billowes of diſcontentment, whereof one riſes in the fall of another. They ſaw God did but threaten, and therefore are they bold to ſinne: It was now high time they ſhould know what it is for God to be angry. There was never ſuch a revenge taken of Iſrael; never any better deſerved. When leſſer warnings will not ſerve, God looks into his Quiver for deadly arrows. In the meane time what a weary life did Moſes lead in theſe continuall ſucceſſions of conſpiracies? What did he gaine by his troubleſome government, but danger and deſpight? Who but he would not have wiſht himſelfe rather with the ſheepe of Iethro, thā with theſe Wolves of Iſrael? But, as he durſt not quit his hook, without the calling of God; ſo now he dare not his Scepter, except hee bee diſmiſſed of him that called him; no troubles, no oppoſitions can drive him from his place: wee are too weake, if we ſuffer men to chaſe us from that ſtation where God hath ſet us.

I ſee the Levites, not long ſince, drawing their ſwords for God and Moſes, againſt the reſt of Iſrael; and that fact wins them both praiſe and bleſſing: Now they are the forwardeſt in the rebellion againſt Moſes and Aaron, men of their owne Tribe. There is no aſſurance of a man for one act: whom one ſinne cannot faſten upon, another may. Yea, the ſame ſinne may finde a repulſe one while from the ſame hand, which another time gives it entertainment: and that yeeldance loſes the thanke of all the former reſiſtance. It is no praiſe to have done once well, unleſſe we continue.

Outward priviledges of blood can availe nothing, againſt a particular calling of God. Theſe Reubenites had the right of the naturall primogeniture; yet doe they vainly challenge preeminence, where God hath ſubjected thē. If all civill honor flow from the King, how much more from the God of Kings? his hand exalts the poore, & caſts downe the mighty from their throne. The man that will be lifting up himſelfe, in the pride of his heart, from under the foot of God, is juſtly trodden in the duſt.

Moſes is the Prince of Iſrael, Aaron the Prieſt; Moſes was milde, Aaron popular; yet both are conſpired againſt: their places are no leſſe brothers, than their perſons. Both are oppoſed at once; he that is a traitor to the Church, is a traitor to the King. Any ſuperiority is a marke of Envy. Had Moſes and Aaron beene but fellowes with the Iſraelites, none had beene better beloved; their diſpoſitions were ſuch, as muſt needs have forced favour from the indifferent; now they were advāced, their malice is not inferiour to their honour. High towers muſt look for lightnings; we offer not to undermine but thoſe wals, which we cannot ſcale. Nature in every man is both envious, and diſdainfull; and never loves to honour another, but where it may be an honour to it ſelfe.

There cannot be conceived an honor leſſe worth emulation, than this principality of Iſrael; a people that could give nothing; a people that had nothing, but in hope; a people whom their leader was faine to feed with bread and water; which paid him no tribute, but of ill words; whoſe command was nothing but a burden: and yet this dignity was an eye-ſore to theſe Levites and theſe Reubenites, Yee take too much upon you, ye ſonnes of Levi.

And this challenge (though thus unſeaſonable) hath drawne in two hundred and fifty Captaines of Iſrael. What wonder is it, that the tenne Rulers prevailed ſo much with the multitude to diſſwade them from Canaan; when three traytors prevailed thus with 250 Rulers, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne? one man may kindle ſuch a fire, as all the world cannot quench. One plague-ſore may infect a whole Kingdome: The infection of evill is much worſe than the act.

It is not like, thoſe Leaders of Iſrael could erre without followers; Hee is a meane man that draws not ſome Clients after him. It hath been ever a dangerous policy of Satan, to aſſault the beſt: he knowes, that the multitude (as we ſay of Bees) will follow their Maſter.

Nothing can be more pleasing to the vulgar sort, than to heare their Governours taxed, and themselves flattered. All the Congregation is holy; Every one of them; Wherefore lift ye up your selves? Every word is a falshood. For Moses dejected himselfe (Who am I?) God lifted him up, over Israel: And so was Israel holy, as Moses was ambitious. What holinesse was there in so much infidelity, feare, Idolatry, mutiny, disobedience? What could make them uncleane, if this were holinesse? They had scarce wip't their mouthes, or washt their hands, since their last obstinacy: and yet these pick-thankes say, All Israel is holy. A

I would never desire a better proofe of a false teacher, than flattery: true meaning need not uphold it selfe by soothing. There is nothing easier than to perswade men well of themselves; when a mans selfe-love meets with anothers flattery, it is an high praise that will not be beleeved. It was more out of opposition, than beleefe, that these men plead the holinesse of Israel. Violent adversaries, to uphold a side, will maintaine those things they beleeve not. B

Moses argues not for himselfe, but appeales to God; neither speakes for his owne right, but his brother Aarons; He knew that Gods immediate service was worthy to be more precious, than his government: That, his Princedome served but to the glory of his Master. Good Magistrates are more tender over Gods honor than their owne; and more sensible of the wrongs offered to Religion, than to themselves.

It is safest to trust God with his owne causes. If Aaron had beene chosen by Israel, Moses would have sheltred him under their authority: Now that God did immediately appoint him, his patronage is sought, whose the election was. We may easily fault in the managing of divine affaires; and so our want of successe cannot want sin; He knowes how to use, how to blesse his owne meanes. C

As there was a difference betwixt the people and Levites, so betwixt the Levites and Priests. The God of order loves to have our degrees kept. Whiles the Levites would be looking up to the Priests, Moses sends downe their eyes to the people. The way not to repine at those above us, is to look at those below us. There is no better remedy for ambition, than to cast up our former receits, and to compare them with our deservings, and to confer our owne estate with inferiors; So shall we finde cause to be thankfull that we are above any, rather than of envy that any is above us.

Moses hath chid the sonnes of Levi, for mutining against Aaron; and so much the more, because they were of his owne Tribe: now he sends for the Reubenites, which rose against himselfe. They come not, and their message is worse than their absence. Moses is accused of injustice, cruelty, falshood, trechery, usurpation; and Ægypt it self must be cõmended, rather than Moses shal want reproach. Innocency is no shelter from ill tongues; malice never regards how true any accusation is, but how spightful. D

Now it was time for Moses to be angry. They durst not have been thus bold, if they had not seene his mildnesse. Lenity is ill bestowed upon stubborne natures; It is an injurious senslesnesse, not to feele the wounds of our reputation. It well appeares he is angry, when he prayes against them. He was displeased before; but when he was most bitter against them, he still prayed for them: but now hee bends his very prayers against them. Looke not to their offering. There can be no greater revenge, than the imprecation of the righteous; there can bee no greater judgement than Gods rejection of their services. With us men, what more argues dislike of the person, than the turning backe of his present? What will God accept from us, if not prayers? E

The innocence of Moses cals for revenge on his Adversaries. If hee had wronged them in his government, in vaine should he have looked to Gods hand for right. Our sinnes exclude us from Gods protection; whereas uprightnesse challenges, and findes his patronage. An Asse taken had made him uncapable of favour. Corrupt Governours lose the comfort of their owne brest, and the tuition of God.

The same tongue that prayed against the Conspiratours, prayes for the people. As lewd men thinke to carry it with number; Corah had so farre prevailed, that he had drawn the multitude to his side. God, the avenger of treasons, would have consumed them all at once; Moses and Aaron pray for their Rebels. Although they were worthy of death, & nothing but death could stop their mouthes; yet their mercifull Leaders will

A will not buy their owne peace, with the loſſe of ſuch enemies. Oh rare and imitable mercy! The people riſe up againſt their Governours; Their Governours fall on their faces to God for the people; ſo farre are they from plotting revenge, that they will not endure God ſhould revenge for them.

Moſes knew well enough that all thoſe Iſraelites muſt periſh in the Wilderneſſe; God had vowed it for their former inſurrection; yet how earneſtly doth hee ſue to God, not to conſume them at once! The very reſpit of evils is a favour next to the removall.

Corah kindled the fire; the two hundred and fifty Captaines brought ſticks to it; All Iſrael warmed themſelves by it; onely the incendiaries periſh. Now doe the Iſraelites owe their life to them, whoſe death they intended. God and Moſes knew to
B diſtinguiſh betwixt the heads of a faction & the traine; though neither be faultleſſe, yet the one is plagued, the other forgiven. Gods vengeance, when it is at the hotteſt, makes differences of men: Get you away from about the Tabernacles of Corah. Ever before common judgements there is a ſeparation. In the univerſall judgment of all the earth, the Judge himſelf wil ſeparate; in theſe particular executiõs, we muſt ſeparate our ſelves. The ſociety of wicked men, eſpecially in their ſinnes, is mortally dangerous: whiles we will not be parted, how can we complaine, if wee bee enwrapped in their condemnation? our very company ſinnes with them, why ſhould we not ſmart with them alſo?

Moſes had well hoped, that when theſe Rebels ſhould ſee all the Iſraelites run frõ them, as from Monſters, and looking affrightedly upon their Tents, and ſhould heare
C that fearfull Proclamation of vengeance, againſt them, (how ſoever they did before ſet a face on their conſpiracy; yet now) their hearts would have miſgivẽ. But lo, theſe bold Traytors ſtand impudently ſtaring in the doore of their Tents, as if they would out-face the revenge of God; as if Moſes had never wrought miracle before them; as if no one Iſraelite had ever bled for rebelling. Thoſe that ſhall periſh are blinded. Pride and infidelity obdures the heart, and makes even cowards fearleſſe.

So ſoone as the innocent are ſevered, the guilty periſh: the earth cleaves and ſwallowes up the Rebels. This element was not uſed for ſuch morſels. It devours the carkaſſes of men; but bodies informed with living ſoules, never before. To have ſeene them ſtruck dead upon the earth had been fearfull; but to ſee the earth at once their executioner and grave, was more horrible. Neither the Sea, nor the earth are fit to
D give paſſage; The Sea is moiſt and flowing, and will not be divided, for the continuity of it; The earth is dry and maſſie, and wil neither yeeld naturally, nor meet again, when it hath yeelded; yet the waters did cleave to give way unto Iſrael, for their preſervation; the earth did cleave, to give way to the Conſpirators, in judgment: Both Sea and earth did ſhut their Jawes againe upon the adverſaries of God.

There was more wonder in this latter. It was a marvell that the waters opened: it was no wonder that they ſhut againe; for, the retyring and flowing, was naturall. It was no leſſe marvel, that the earth opened; but more marvell that it did ſhut againe, becauſe it had no naturall diſpoſition to meet, when it was divided. Now might Iſrael ſee, they had to doe with a God that could revenge with eaſe.

There were two ſorts of Traitors; the Earth ſwallowed up the one, the Fire the E other. All the Elements agree to ſerve the vengeance of their Maker. Nádab and Abihu brought fit perſons, but unfit fire to God; theſe Levites bring the right fire, but unwarranted perſons before him; Fire from God conſumes both. It is a dangerous thing to uſurpe ſacred functions. The Miniſtery will not grace the man; The man may diſgrace the Miniſtery.

The common people were not ſo faſt gathered to Corahs flattering perſwaſion before, as now they ranne from the ſight and feare of his iudgement.
I marvell not if they could not truſt that earth whereon they ſtood, whiles they knew their hearts had been falſe. It is a madneſſe to run away from puniſhment, and not from ſinne.

Aarons Censer and Rod.

When ſhall we ſee an end of theſe murmurings, and theſe judgments? Becauſe theſe men roſe up againſt Moſes and Aaron, therefore God conſumed them; and becauſe God conſumed them, therefore the people riſe up againſt Moſes and Aaron: and now becauſe the people thus murmure, God hath againe begun to conſume them. What a circle is here of ſinnes, and judgements? wrath is gone out from God; Moſes is quick-ſighted, & ſpies it at the ſetting out. By how much more faithfull and familiar we are with God, ſo much earlier doe wee diſcerne his judgments; as thoſe which are well acquainted with men, know by their lookes and geſtures that which ſtrangers underſtand but by their actions; As finer tempers are more ſenſible of the changes of weather. Hence the Seers of God have ever frō their Watch-tower deſcried the judgements of God a farre off. If another man had ſeene from Carmel a Cloud of a hand-breadth, he could not have told Ahab he ſhould be wet. It is enough for Gods Meſſengers, out of their acquaintance with their Maſters proceedings, to foreſee puniſhment: no marvell if thoſe ſee it not, which are wilfully ſinfull: we men reveale not our ſecret purpoſes either to enemies or ſtrangers; all their favour is to feele the plague, ere they can eſpie it.

Moſes, though he were great with God, yet he takes not upon him this reconciliation; he may adviſe Aaron what to do, himſelf undertakes not to act it: It is the work of the Prieſthood to make an atonemēt for the people; Aaron was firſt his brothers tongue to Paraoh, now he is the peoples tongue to God: he only muſt offer up the Incenſe of the publike prayers to God. Who would not think it a ſmal thing to hold a Cenſer in his hand? yet if any other had done it, he had falne with the dead, & not ſtood betwixt the living and dead; in ſtead of the ſmoak aſcending, the fire had deſcended upon him; and ſhall there be leſſe uſe, or leſſe regard of the Evangelicall miniſtery, than the Legall? When the world hath poured out all his contempt, wee are they that muſt reconcile men to God, and without us they periſh.

I know not whether more to marvell at the courage or mercy of Aaron: his mercy, that he would yet ſave ſo rebellious a people; his courage, that he would ſave them, with ſo great a danger of himſelfe. For, as one that would part a fray, hee thruſts himſelfe under the ſtrokes of God; and puts it to the choice of the revenger, whether he will ſmite him, or forbeare the reſt; He ſtands boldly betwixt the living and the dead, as one that wil either dye with them, or have them live with him; the ſight of fourteene hundred carcaſes diſmaid him not: hee that before feared the threats of the people, now feares not the ſtrokes of God. It is not for Gods Miniſters to ſtand upon their own perils in the common cauſes of the Church: their prayers muſt oppoſe the judgements of the Almighty; when the fire of Gods anger is kindled, their Cenſers muſt ſmoake with fire from the Altar. Every Chriſtian muſt pray the removall of vengeance; how much more they whom God hath appointed to mediate for his people? every mans mouth is his own; but they are the mouths of al.

Had Aaron thruſt in himſelf with empty hands, I doubt whether he had prevailed; now his Cenſer was his protection: when we come with ſupplications in our hands we need not feare the ſtrokes of God. We have leave to reſiſt the divine judgments by by our prayers, with favour and ſucceſſe. So ſoone as the incenſe of Aaron aſcended up unto God, he ſmelt a ſavour of reſt; he will rather ſpare the offenders, than ſtrike their interceſſor. How hardly can any people miſcarry; that have faithfull Miniſters to ſue for their ſafety: Nothing but the ſmoke of hearty prayers can cleanſe the ayre from the plagues of God.

If Aarons ſacrifice were thus accepted; how much more ſhall the High-Prieſt of the New Teſtament, by interpoſing himſelfe to the wrath of his Father, deliver the offenders from death? The plague was entred upon all the ſons of men: O Saviour, thou ſtood'ſt betwixt the living and the dead, that all which beleeve in thee, ſhould not periſh. Aaron offered and was not ſtricken; but thou O Redeemer, wouldeſt offer and be ſtrucke, that by thy ſtripes we might be healed: So ſtood'ſt thou betwixt the dead and living, that thou wert both alive and dead, and all this that wee, when wee were dead, might live for ever.

Nothing more troubled Iſrael, than a feare leſt the two brethren ſhould cunningly ingroſſe the government to themſelves. If they had done ſo, what wiſe man would have envied them an office ſo little worth, ſo dearely purchaſed? But becauſe this conceit was ever apt to ſtir them to rebellion, and to hinder the benefit of this holy ſoveraignty; therefore God hath endeavoured nothing more, than to let them ſee that theſe officers, whom they ſo much envied, were of his own proper inſtitution: They had ſcarce ſhut their eyes, ſince they ſaw the confuſion of thoſe two hundred and fifty uſurping ſacrificers; and Aarons effectual interceſſion for ſtaying the plague of Iſrael. In the one, the execution of Gods vengeance upon the competitors of Aaron for his ſake; In the other, the forbearance of vengeance upon the people for Aarons mediation, might have challenged their voluntary acknowledgment of his juſt calling from God; If there had beene in them either awe, or thankfulneſſe, they could not have doubted of his lawfull ſupremacy. How could they chooſe but argue thus: Why would God ſo fearefully have deſtroyed the rivals that durſt conteſt with Aaron, if he would have allowed him any equall? Wherefore ſerve thoſe plates of the Altar, which we ſee made of thoſe uſurped Cenſers, but to warne all poſterity of ſuch preſumption? Why ſhould God ceaſe ſtriking, whiles Aaron interpoſed betwixt the living and the dead, if he were but as one of us? Which of us if wee had ſtood in the plague, had not added to the heape? Incredulous minds will not be perſwaded with any evidence. Theſe two brothers had lived aſunder forty yeares, God makes them both meet in one office of delivering Iſrael. One halfe of the miracles were wrought by Aaron; he ſtrooke with the Rod, whiles it brought thoſe plagues on Ægypt. The Iſraelites heard God call him up by name to mount Sinai; they ſaw him anointed from God: and (leſt the ſhould thinke this a ſet match betwixt the brethren) they ſaw the earth opening, the fire iſſuing from God upon their emulous oppoſites: they ſaw his ſmoake a ſufficient antidote for the plague of God; and yet ſtill Aarons calling is queſtioned. Nothing is more naturall to every man, than unbeliefe: but the earth never yeilded a people ſo ſtrongly incredulous, as theſe; and after ſo many thouſand generations, their children do inherit their obſtinacie; ſtill do they oppoſe the true High Prieſt, the Anointed of God: ſixteene hundred yeares deſolation hath not drawne from them to confeſſe him whom God hath choſen.

How deſirous was God to give ſatisfaction even to the obſtinate! There is nothing more materiall, than that men ſhould be aſſured their ſpirituall guides have their Commiſſion and Calling from God: The want whereof is a prejudice to our ſucceſſe. It ſhould not be ſo: but the corruption of men will not receive good, but from due meſſengers.

Before, God wrought miracles in the Rod of Moſes; now, in the Rod of Aaron. As Pharaoh might ſee himſelf in Moſes his Rod; who, of a rod of defence and protection, was turned into a venemous Serpent: So Iſrael might ſee themſelves in the Rod of Aaron. Every Tribe and every Iſraelite was, of himſelfe, as a ſere-ſticke, without life, without ſap; and if any one of them had power to live, and flouriſh, hee muſt acknowledge it from the immediate power, and gift of God.

Before

A Before Gods calling, all men are alike: Every name is alike written in their Rod; there is no difference in the letters, in the wood; neither the characters of Aaron are fairer, nor the ſtaffe more precious; It is the choice of God that makes the diſtinctiō: So is it in our calling of Chriſtianity; All are equally devoid of poſſibility of grace: All equally liveleſſe; by nature we are all ſonnes of wrath: If we be now better than others, who ſeparated us? We are all Crabſtockes in this Orchard of God, hee may graffe what fruit he pleaſes upon us, onely the grace and effectuall calling of God makes the difference.

These twelve heads of Iſrael would never have written their names in their rods, but in hope they might be choſen to this dignity. What an honour was this Prieſthood, whereof all the Princes of Iſrael are ambitious? If they had not thought it an B high preferment, they had never ſo much envied the office of Aaron. What ſhall wee thinke of this change? Is the Euangelicall miniſtration of leſſe worth than the Leviticall? Whiles the Teſtament is better, is the ſervice worſe? How is it that the great thinke themſelves too good for this imployment? How is it, that under the Goſpell men are diſparaged with that which honoured them under the Law; that their ambition and ſcorne meet in one ſubject?

These twelve rods are not laid up in ſeverall cabinets of their Owners; but are brought forth and laid before the Lord. It is fit God ſhould make choice of his own attendants. Even we men hold it injurious to have ſervants obtruded upon us by others: never ſhall that man have comfort in his Miniſtery whom God hath not choſen. The great Commander of the world hath ſet every man in his ſtation; To one he C hath ſaid, Stand thou in this Tower and watch; To another, Make thou good theſe Trenches; To a third, Digge thou in this Mine. Hee that gives and knowes our abilities, can beſt ſet us on worke.

This Rod was the paſtorall ſtaffe of Aaron, the great Shepheard of Iſrael. God teſtifies his approbation of his charge, by the fruit. That a rod cut off from the tree, ſhould bloſſome, it was ſtrange; but that in one night it ſhould beare buds, bloſſoms, fruit, and that both ripe and hard, it was highly miraculous. The ſame power that revives the dead plants of winter, in the Spring, doth it here without earth, without time, without Sunne; that Iſrael might ſee and grant, it was no reaſon his choyce ſhould be limited, whoſe power is unlimited.

Fruitfulneſſe is the beſt argument of the calling of God: Not only all the plants of D his ſetting, but the very boughs cut off from the body of them, will flouriſh. And that there may not want a ſucceſſion of increaſe, here are fruit, bloſſomes, buds; both proofe and hope inſeparably mixed.

It could not but be a great comfort unto Aaron, to ſee his rod thus miraculouſly flouriſhing; to ſee this wonderfull Teſtimony of Gods favour and Election: Sure he could not but thinke, Who am I, O God, that thou ſhouldeſt thus chooſe me out of all the Tribes of Iſrael? My weakneſſe hath been more worthy of thy rod of correction, than my rod hath been worthy of theſe bloſſomes. How haſt thou magnified me in the ſight of all thy people? How able art thou to uphold my imbecility with the rod of thy ſupport? how able to defend me with the rod of thy power, who haſt thus brought fruit out of the ſapleſſe rod of my profeſſion? That ſervant of God is E worthy to faint, that holds it not a ſufficient incouragement to ſee the evident proofes of his Maſters favour.

Commonly, thoſe fruits which are ſoone ripe, ſoone wither, but theſe Almonds of Aarons rod are not more early, than laſting: the ſame hand which brought them out before their time, preſerved them beyond their time; and for perpetuall memory, both rod and fruit muſt be kept in the Arke of God. The Tables of Moſes, the Rod of Aaron, the Manna of God, are monuments fit for ſo holy a ſhrine. The Doctrine, Sacraments and government of Gods people, are precious to him, and muſt be ſo to men. All times ſhall ſee and wonder, how his ancient Church was fed, taught, ruled. Moſes his rod did great miracles, yet I finde it not in the Arke. The Rod of Aaron hath this priviledge, becauſe it caried the miracle ſtill in it ſelfe; wheras the wonders of that other Rod were paſſed. Thoſe monuments would God have continued in his Church, which carry in them the most manifest evidences of that which they import.

The same God, which by many transient demonstrations had approved the calling of Aaron to Israel, will now have a permanent memorial of their conjunction, that whensoever they should see this relike, they should be ashamed of their presumptiō and infidelity. The name of Aaron was not more plainly written in that rod, than the sinne of Israel was in the fruit of it; and how much Israel findes their rebellion beaten with this rod, appeares in their present relenting and complaint; Behold, we are dead, we perish. God knowes how to pull downe the biggest stomack, and can extort glory to his owne Name from the most obstinate gainsayers.

Of the Brazen Serpent.

SEven times already hath Israel mutined against Moses, & seven times hath either beene threatned, or punished; yet now they fall to it afresh. As a teastie man findes occasion to chafe at every trifle; so this discontented people either finde or make all things troublesome. One while they have no water; then bitter; One while no God; then one too many; One while no bread; then bread enough, but too light; One while they will not abide their Governours; then they cannot abide their losse. Aaron and Miriam were never so grudged alive, as they are bewayled dead. Before, they wanted Onions, Garlike, Flesh-pots; now they want Figs, Vines, Pomegranates, Corne. And as crabid children that cry for every thing they can thinke of, are whipped by their wise mother: So God justly serves these fond Israelites.

It was first their way that makes them repine; They were faine to goe round about Idumea, the journey was long and troublesome. They had sent intreaties to Edom for licence of passage the next way, reasonably, submissely; It was churlishly denied them. Esau lives still in his posterity; Iacob in Israel; The combate which they began in Rebeccaes belly, is not yet ended. Amalec, which was one limme of Esau, followed them at the heeles; The Edomite, which was another, meets them in the face: So long as there is a world there will be opposition to the chosen of God. They may come at their perill; the way had beene nearer, but bloody; they dare not goe it, and yet complaine of length.

If they were afraid to purchase their resting place with warre, how much lesse would they their passage? What should God doe with impatient men? They will not goe the neareſt way, and yet complaine to goe about. He that will passe to the promised land, must neither stand upon length of way, or difficulty. Every way hath his inconveniencies; the neareſt hath more danger, the farthest hath more paine; either, or both must be overcome, if ever we will enter the rest of God.

Aaron and Miriam were now past the danger of their mutinies; for want of another match, they joyne God with Moses, in their murmurings: Though they had not mentioned him, they could not sever him in their insurrection; For, in the causes of his owne servants, he challenges even when he is not challenged. What will become of thee, O Israel, when thou makest thy Maker thine enemy? Impatience is the cousin to frensie; this causes men not to care upon whom they run, so they may breathe out some revenge. How oft have we heard men that have been displeased by others, teare the Name of their Maker in pieces? He that will judge, and can confound, is fetcht into the quarrell without cause. But if to strive with a mighty man bee unwise and unsafe, what shall it be to strive with the mighty God?

As an angry childe casts away that which is given him, because he hath not that he would; so doe these foolish Israelites; their bread is light, and their water unsatisfying, because their way displeased them. Was ever people fed with such bread or water? Twice hath the very Rock yeelded them water, and every day the heavē affords them bread. Did any one soule amongst them miscarry, either for hunger or thirst? But no bread will downe with them, save that which the earth yeelds; no water but from the naturall Wels or Rivers. Vnlesse nature may bee allowed to bee her owne carver, she is never contented.

Manna

A Manna had no fault, but that it was too good, & too frequent; the pulse of Ægypt had beene fitter for these coorse mouthes: This heavenly bread was unspeakeably delicious, it tasted like wafers of honey; & yet even this Angels food is contemned. He that is full despiseth an honey-combe. How sweet & delicate is the Gospel! Not onely the fathers of the Old Testament, but the Angels desired to look into the glorious mysteries of it, and yet we are cloyed. This supernaturall food is too light: the bread-corne of our humane reason, and profound discourse, would better content us.

Moses will not revenge this wrong, God will; yet will he not deale with them himselfe, but he sends the fiery Serpents to answer for him: How fitly! They had carried themselves like serpents to their governors; how oft had they stung Moses & Aaron, neare to death? If the Serpent bite when he is not charmed, no better is a slanderer.

B Now these venemous Adders revenge it, which are therefore called fiery; because their poyson scalded to death; God hath an hand in the annoyance and hurt of the baseſt creature; how much lesse can the sting of an ill tongue, or the malice of an ill spirit, strike us without him? Whiles they were in Goshen, the Frogs, Lice, Caterpillers spared them, and plagued the Ægyptians; now they are rebellious in the desart, the serpents find them out and sting them to death. He that brought the Quailes thither to feed them, fetches these serpents thither to punish them. While we are at warres with God, we can looke for no peace with his creatures: Every thing rejoyces to execute the vengeance of his Maker. The stones of the field will not bee in league with us, while we are not in league with God.

C These men, when the Spies had told them newes of the Gyants of Canaan, a little before had wisht, Would God we were dead in this wildernesse: Now God hath heard their prayers, what with the plague, what with the serpents, many thousands of them dyed. The ill wishes of our impatience are many times heard. As those good things are not granted us which wee pray for without care, so those evills which wee pray for and would not have, are oft granted. The eares of God are not onely open to the praiers of faith, but to the imprecations of infidelity. It is dangerous wishing evill to our selves or ours; it is just with God to take us at our word, and to effect that which our lips speake against our heart.

Before, God hath ever consulted with Moses, and threatned ere he punisht; now he strikes and sayes nothing. The anger is so much more, by how much lesse notified. When God is not heard before he is felt, (as in the hewing of wood, the blow is not

D heard till the axe be seen to have strooke) it is a fearful signe of displeasure: it is with God as with us men, that still revenges are ever most dangerous. Till now all was well enough with Israel, and yet they grudged; Those that will complaine without a cause, shall have cause to complaine for something. Discontented humours seldome scape unpunished, but receive that most justly whereat they repined unjustly.

Now the people are glad to seeke to Moses unbidden. Ever heretofore they have beene wont to be sued to, and intreated for without their owne intreaty; now their misery makes them importunate; There needs no sollicitor where there is sense of smart. It were pitty men should want affliction, since it sends them to their prayers and confessions. All the perswasions of Moses could not doe that which the Serpents have done for him. O God, thou seest how necessary it is wee should be stung some-

E times, else we should runne wilde, and never come to a sound humiliation; we should never seek thee if thy hand did not finde us out.

They had spoken against God and Moses, and now they humbly speake to Moses that he would pray to God for them. He that so oft prayed for thē unbidden, cannot but much more doe it requested, and now obtaines the meanes of their cure. It was equally in the power of God to remove the serpents, and to heale their stinging; to have cured the Israelites by his word, and by his signe: But hee findes it best for his people (to exercise their faith) that the Serpents may bite, and their bitings may invenome, and that this venome may indāger the Israelites; & that they, thus affected, may seek to him for remedy, and seeking may find it from such means as should have no power but in signification; that while their bodies were cured by the signe, their soules might be cōfirmed by the matter signified. A serpent of Brasse could no more heale, than ſting them. What remedy could their eyes give to their legges? Or what could a Serpent of cold braſſe prevaile againſt a living and fiery Serpent? In this troubleſome Deſart we are al ſtung by that fiery and old Serpent; O Saviour, it is to thee we muſt look, and be cured; It is thou that wert their Paſchal Lamb, their Manna, their Rocke, their Serpent. To all purpoſes doſt thou vary thy ſelf to thy Church, that we may finde thee every where: Thou art for our nouriſhing, refreſhing, cure; as hereafter, ſo even now, all in all. A

This Serpent which was appointed for cure to Iſrael, at laſt ſtings them to death, by Idolatrous abuſe. What poyſon there is in Idolatry, that makes even Antidotes deadly! As Moſes therefore raiſed this Serpent, ſo Ezekias pulled it downe: God commanded the raiſing of it, God approved the demoliſhing of it. Superſtitious uſe can marre the very inſtitutions of God: how much more the moſt wiſe and well-grounded devices of men? B

Of Balaam.

Moab and Midian had been all this while ſtanders by, and lookers on; If they had not ſeene the patterne of their owne ruine in theſe neighbours; it had never troubled them, to ſee the kings of the Amorites and Baſhan to fall before Iſrael. Had not the Iſraelites camped in the plaines of Moab, their victories had beene no eye-ſore to Balac. Wicked men never care to obſerve Gods judgements till themſelves be touched; The fire of a neighbours houſe would not ſo affect us, if it were not with the danger of our owne: Secure mindes never ſtartle till God come home to their very ſenſes. C

Balac and his Moabites had wit enough to feare, not wit enough to prevent judgement: They ſee an enemy in their borders, and yet take no right courſe for their ſafety. Who would not have looked, that they ſhould have come to Iſrael with conditions of peace? Or why did they not thinke, Either Iſraels God is ſtronger than ours, or he is not? If he be not, Why are we afraid of him? If hee bee, Why doe wee not ſerve him? The ſame hand which gives them victory, can give us protection. Carnall men that are ſecure of the vengeance of God, ere it doe come, are maſtered with it, when it doth come; & not knowing wch way to turn thē, run forth at the wrong door.

The Midianites joyne with the Moabites in conſultation, in action againſt Iſrael: One would have thought, they ſhould have looked for favour from Moſes for Iethro's ſake, which was both a Prince of their countrey, & father in law to Moſes; and either now, or not long before was with Iſrael in the Wilderneſſe. Neither is it like, but that Moſes having found forty yeares harbour amongſt them, would have been (what he might) inclinable to favourable treaties with them; but now they are ſo faſt linked to Moab, that they will either ſinke or ſwim together. Intireneſſe with wicked conſorts is one of the ſtongeſt chaines of Hell, and bindes us to a participation both of ſinne, and puniſhment: An eaſie occaſion will knit wicked hearts together in conſpiracy againſt the Church of God. D

Their errand is devilliſh (Come curſe Iſrael:) That which Satan could not do by the ſwords of Og and Sehon, he will now try to effect by the tongue of Balaam. If either ſtrength or policy would prevaile againſt Gods Church, it could not ſtand. And why ſhould not we be as induſtrious to promote the glory of God, and bend both our hands and heads to the cauſes of the Almighty? When all helps faile Moab, the Magician is ſought to. It is a ſigne of a deſperate cauſe, to make Satan either our Counſellor, or our refuge. E

Why did they not ſend to Balaam to bleſſe themſelves, rather than to curſe Iſrael? It had beene more eaſie to be defended from the hurt of their enemies, than to have their enemies laid open to be hurt by them. Pride & malice did not care ſo much for ſafety, as for conqueſt; it would not contēt them to eſcape Iſrael, if Iſrael may eſcape them; it was not thank-worthy to ſave their own blood, if they did not ſpil the blood of others; As if their owne proſperity had beene nothing, if Iſrael alſo proſpered. If there

A there be one project worse than another, a wicked heart will finde it out: Nothing but destruction will content the malicious.

I know not whether Balaam were more famous, or Balac more confident. If the King had not been perswaded of the strength of his charme, he had not sent so far, & paid so deare for it; now he trusts more to his inchantment, than to the forces of Moab and Midian; & (as if heaven and earth were in the power of the charmers tongue) he saith, He that thou blessest, is blessed; and hee whom thou curset, is cursed. Magicke, through the permission of God, is powerfull; for whatsoever the Devill can doe, the Magician may doe; but it is madnesse to thinke either of them omnipotent. If either the curses of men, or the indeavours of the powers of darknesse, should be effectuall, all would be Hell. No, Balac: So short is the power of thy Balaam, that neither thou,
B nor thy prophet himselfe can avoid that curse, which thou wouldst have brought upon Israel. Had Balaam beene a true Prophet of God, this bold assurance had been but just. Both those ancient Seers, and the Prophets of the Gospell have the ratification of God in heaven, to their sentences on earth. Why have we lesse care of the blessings, and lesse feare of the curses and censures of Gods Ministers? Who would not rather have Elisha's guard, than both the Kings of Israel and Assyria? Hee himselfe as he had the Angelicall chariots and horsemen about him, so was hee the chariots and horsemen of Israel. Why should our faith be lesse strong than superstition? Or why should Gods agents have lesse vertue than Satans?

I should wonder to heare God speak with a false prophet, if I did not know, it hath beene no rare thing with him (as with men) to bestow words, even where he will not
C bestow favour. Pharaoh, Abimelec, Nebuchadnezzar, receive visions from God: neither can I thinke this strange, when I heare God speaking to Satan in a question no lesse familiar than this of Balaam, Whence com'st thou, Satan? Not the sound of the voice of God, but the matter which he speakes argues love: He may speake to an enemy; hee speakes peace to none but his owne. It is a vaine bragge, God hath spoken to me. So may he doe to reprobates or devils. But what said he? Did he say to my soule, I am thy salvation? Hath he indented with me that he will be my God, and I shall be his? I cannot heare this voyce and not live.

God heard all the consultation and message of these Moabites; these messengers could not have moved their foot or their tongue but in him; and yet he which asked Adam where he was, askes Balaam, What men are these? I have ever seene, that God
D loves to take occasion of proceeding with us from our selves, rather than from his owne immediate prescience. Hence it is, that we lay open our wants, and confesse our sinnes to him that knowes both, better than our owne hearts, because hee will deale with us from our owne mouthes.

The prevention of God forbids both his journey and his curse: And what if hee had beene suffered to goe and curse? What corne had this winde shaken, when God meant to blesse them? How many Buls have bellowed out execrations against this Church of God? what are we the worse? Yea I doubt, if we had been so much blessed, had not those Balaamitish curses beene spent upon us. Hee that knowes what waste winde the causelesse curses of wicked men are, yet will not have Balaam curse Israel; because he wil not allow Balac so much incouragement, in his oppositiõ, as the E conceit of this helpe. Or perhaps, if Balac thought this Sorcerer a true Propher, God would not have his Name, so much, as in the opinion of the Heathen, scandalized, in usurping it to a purpose, which he meant not should succeed.

The hand of God is in the restraint of many evils, which we never knew to be towards us. The Israelites sate still in their Tents, they little thought what mischiefe was brewing against them: without ever making them of counsell, God crosses the designes of their enemies. Hee that keepeth Israel is both a sure and a secret friend.

The reward of the divination had easily commanded the journey, and curse of the covetous prophet if God had not stayed him. How oft are wicked men cursed by a divine hand; even in those sinnes which their hearts stand to? It is no thank to lewd men that their wickednesse is not prosperous. Whence it is that the world is not over-runne with evill, but from this; that men cannot be so ill as they would?

The first entertainment of this message would make a stranger thinke Balaams wife and honest; he will not give a sudden answer, but craves leasure to consult with God, and promises to returne the answer he shall receive. Who would not say; This man is free from rashnesse, from partiality? Dissimulation is crafty, and able to deceive thousands. The words are good: when he comes to action the fraud bewrayes it self; For, both he insinuates his owne forwardnesse, & casts the blame of the prohibition, upon God, and (which is worse) delivers but halfe his answer: he sayes indeed, God refuses to give me leave to goe: he saies not, as it was, He charges me not to curse them, for they are blessed. So did Balaam deny, as one that wisht to be sent for againe. Perhaps a peremptory refusall had hindred his further solicitation. Concealement of some truths is sometimes as faulty as a deniall. True fidelity is not niggardly in her relations. A

Where wickednesse meets with power, it thinkes to command all the world, and takes great scorne of any repulse. So little is Balac discouraged with one refusal, that he sends so much the stronger message; Mo Princes, and more honourable. Oh that wee could be so importunate for our good, as wicked men are for the compassing of their owne designes! A deniall doth but whet the desires of vehement suitors. Why are we faint in spirituall things, when we are not denied but delayed? B

Those which are themselves transported with vanity, and ambition, think that no heart hath power to resist these offers. Balacs Princes thought they had strook it dead, when they had once mentioned promotion to great honour. Selfe-love makes them thinke they cannot be slaves, whiles others may be free; and that all the world would be glad to run on madding after their bait. Nature thinks it impossible to contemne honour and wealth; and because too many soules are thus taken, cannot beleeve that any would escape. But let carnall hearts know, there are those can spit the world in the face, and say, Thy gold and silver perish with thee: and that in comparison of a good conscience, can tread under foot his best proffers, like shadowes, as they are; and that can doe as Balaam said. C

How neere truth and falshood can lodge together! Here was piety in the lips, & covetousnesse in the heart. Who can any more regard good words, that heares Balaam speak so like a Saint? An houseful of gold & silver may not pervert his tongue, his heart is won with lesse; for if he had not already swallowed the reward, & found it sweet, why did he againe solicit God, in that which was peremptorily denied him? If his minde had not been bribed already, why did he stay the messenger? why did he expect a change in God? why was he willing to feed thē with hope of successe, which had fed him with hope of recompence? One prohibition is enough for a good man. Whiles the delay of God doth but hold us in suspence, importunity is holy and seasonable; but when once he gives a resolute deniall, it is prophane saucinesse to solicite him. When we aske what we are bidden, our suites are not more vehement than welcome; but when we begge prohibited favours, our presumption is troublesome, and abominable: No good heart will endure to be twice forbidden. D

Yet this importunity had obtained a permission; but a permission worse than a deniall. I heard God say before, Goe not, nor curse them; Now he sayes, Goe, but curse not; Anon, he is angry that he did goe. Why did he permit that which he forbade, if he be angry for doing that which he permitted? Some things God permits with an indignation; not for that he gives leave to the act, but that he gives a man over to his sinne in the act; this sufferance implies not favour, but judgement: so did God bid Balaam to goe, as Salomon bids the young man follow the wayes of his owne heart. It is one thing to like, another thing to suffer; Moses never approved those legall divorces, yet he tolerated them: God never liked Balaams journey, yet he displeasedly gives way to it: as if he said; Well, since thou art so hot, set on this journey, be gone. And thus Balaam tooke it: else, when God after professed his displeasure for the journey, it had beene a ready answer, Thou commandedst me; but herein his confession argues his guilt. Balaams suite and Israels Quailes had both one fashion of grant; in anger. How much better is it, to have gratious denials, than angry yeeldings? E

A small perswasion hartens the willing: It booted not to bid the covetous Prophet hasten to his way. Now he makes himself sure of successe; His corrupt heart tels him, that

A that as God had relented in his licence to goe, ſo he might perhaps in his licence to curſe; and he ſaw how this curſe might bleſſe him with abūdance of wealth: he roſe up early therefore and ſadled his Aſſe. The night ſeemed long to his forwardneſſe. Covetous men need neither clock nor bell to awaken them; their deſires make them reſtleſſe. Oh that we could with as much eagerneſſe ſeeke the true riches, which onely can make us happy!

We that ſee only the out-ſide of Balaam, may marvell, why he that permitted him to goe, afterward oppoſes his going; but God that ſaw his heart, perceived what corrupt affectiōs carried him: he ſaw, that his covetous deſires & wicked hopes, grew the ſtronger, the nearer he came to his end: An Angell is therefore ſent to with-hold the haſty Sorcerer. Our inward diſpoſition is the life of our actions, according to that
B doth the God of ſpirits judge us, whiles men cenſure according to our externall motions. To goe at all when God had commanded to ſtay, was preſumptuous: but to goe with a deſire to curſe, made the act doubly ſinfull, and fetcht an Angel to reſiſt it. It is one of the worthy imployments of good Angels, to make ſecret oppoſition to evill deſignes: Many a wicked act have they hindered, without the knowledge of the agent. It is all one with the Almighty to worke by Spirits and men; It is therefore our glory to be thus ſet on worke: To ſtop the courſe of evill, either by diſſwaſion or violence, is an Angelicall ſervice.

In what danger are wicked men that have Gods Angels their oppoſites? The devil moved him to goe, a good Angell reſiſts him. If an heavenly Spirit ſtand in the way of a Sorcerers ſin, how much more ready are all thoſe ſpirituall powers, to ſtop the
C miſcarriages of Gods deare children? how oft had we falne yet more, if theſe Guardians had not upheld us, whether by removing occaſions, or by caſting in good inſtincts? as our good indeavors are oft hindred by Satā, ſo are our evil by good angels; elſe were not our protection equal to our danger; & we could neither ſtand nor riſe.

It had beene as eaſie for the Angel to ſtrike Balaam, as to ſtand in his way; and to have followed him in his ſtarting aſide, as to ſtop him in a narrow path: But even the good Angels have their ſtints in their executions. God had ſomewhat more to doe with the tongue of Balaam, and therefore he will not have him ſlaine, but withſtood; and ſo withſtood, that he ſhall paſſe. It is not ſo much glory to God, to take away wicked men, as to uſe their evill to his owne holy purpoſes. How ſoone could the Commander of heaven and earth rid the world of bad members? But ſo ſhould hee
D loſe the praiſe of working good by evill inſtruments. It ſufficeth that the angels of God reſiſt their actions, while their perſons continue.

That no man may marvell to ſee Balaam have viſions from God, and utter prophecies from him; his very Aſſe hath his eyes opened to ſee the Angell, which his Maſter could not; & his mouth opened to ſpeak more reaſonably than his Maſter. There is no beaſt deſerves ſo much wonder, as this of Balaam, whoſe common ſenſe is advanced above the reaſon of his Rider; ſo as for the time the Prophet is bruitiſh, and the beaſt propheticall. Who can but ſtand amazed at the eye, at the tongue of this ſilly creature? For ſo dull a ſight, it was much to ſee a bodily object, that were not too apparent; but to ſee that ſpirit which his rider diſcerned not, was far beyond nature. To heare a voyce come from that mouth, which was uſed onely to bray, it was
E ſtrange and uncouth; but to heare a beaſt, whoſe nature is noted for incapacity, to out-reaſon his Maſter, a profeſſed Prophet, is in the very height of miracles: Yet can no heart ſticke at theſe, that conſiders the diſpenſation of the Almighty, in both. Our eye could no more ſee a beaſt, than a beaſt can ſee an Angell, if he had not given this power to it. How eaſie is it for him that made the eye of man and beaſt to dimme or inlighten it at his pleaſure! and if his power can make the very ſtones to ſpeake, how much more a creature of ſenſe? That evill ſpirit ſpake in the Serpent to our firſt Parents; Why is it more that a ſpirit ſhould ſpeake in the mouth of a beaſt? how ordinarily did the heathen receive their Oracles out of ſtones and trees? do not we our ſelves teach birds to ſpeak thoſe ſentences they underſtand not? we may wōder, we cannot diſtruſt, when we compare the act with the Author; which can as eaſily create a voyce without a body, as a body without a voice. Who now can hereafter plead his ſimplicity and dulneſſe of apprehending ſpirituall things, when he ſees how God exalts the eyes of a beaſt, to ſee a ſpirit? who can be proud of ſeeing viſions, ſince an Angell appeared to a beaſt? neither was his ſkin better after it than others of his kinde. Who can complaine of his owne rudeneſſe and inability to reply in a good cauſe, when the very beaſt is inabled by God to convince his Maſter? There is no mouth into which God cannot put words: and how oft doth he chooſe the weake, and unwiſe, to confound the learned and mighty!

What had it beene better for the Aſſe to ſee the Angell, if he had ruſhed ſtill upon his ſword? Evils were as good not ſeen, as not avoided; but now he declines the way and ſaves his burthen. It were happy for perverſe ſinners, if they could learne of this beaſt, to runne away from fore-ſeene judgements. The revenging Angell ſtands before us; and though we know we ſhall as ſure die, as ſinne, yet we have not the wit or grace to give backe; though it be with the hurt of a foot to ſave the body; with the paine of the body to ſave the ſoule.

I ſee, what fury and ſtripes the impatient Prophet beſtowes upon this poore beaſt, becauſe he will not goe on; yet if he had gone on, himſelfe had periſhed. How oft doe we wiſh thoſe things, the not obtaining whereof is mercy? We grudge to be ſtaid in the way to death, and flie upon thoſe which oppoſe our perdition.

I doe not (as who would not expect) ſee Balaams haire ſtand upright, nor himſelfe alighting, and appaled at this monſter of miracles: But, as if no new thing had happened, he returnes words to the beaſt, full of anger, void of admiration; Whether his trade of ſorcering had ſo inured him to receive voyces frō his Familiars, in ſhape of beaſts, that this event ſeemed not ſtrange to him; Or, whether his rage, and covetouſneſſe had ſo tranſported him, that he had no leaſure to obſerve the unnaturall unuſualneſſe of the event. Some men make nothing of theſe things, which overcome others with horrour and aſtoniſhment.

I heare the Angell of God taking notice of the cruelty of Balaam to his beaſt: his firſt words to the unmercifull Prophet, are in expoſtulating of his wrong. Wee little thinke it, but God ſhall call us to an account for the unkinde and cruell uſages of his poore mute creatures: He hath made us Lords, not tyrants; owners, not tormentors; he that hath given us leave to kill them, for our uſe, hath not given us leave to abuſe them at our pleaſure; they are ſo our drudges, that they are our fellowes by creation. It was a ſigne the Magician would eaſily wiſh to ſtrike Iſrael with a curſe, when hee wiſhed a ſword to ſtrike his harmleſſe beaſt. It is ill falling into thoſe hands, whom beaſts finde unmercifull.

Notwithſtanding theſe rubs Balaam goes on, & is not afraid to ride on that beaſt, whoſe voyce hee had heard: And now, Poſts are ſped to Balac with the newes of ſo welcome a gueſt: He that ſent Princes to fetch him, comes himſelfe on the way to meet him; Although he can ſay (Am not I able to promote thee?) yet he gives this high reſpect to him as his better, from whom he expected the promotion of himſelfe, and his people. Oh the honour that hath been formerly done by heathens, to them that have borne but the face of Prophets! I ſhame, and grieve to compare the times and men: Onely, O God, be thou mercifull to the contempt of thy ſervants.

As if nothing needed but the preſence of Balaam, the ſuperſtitious King (out of the joy of his hope) feaſts his gods, his Prophet, his Princes; and on the morrow carries him up to the high places of his Idol. Who can doubt whether Balaam were a falſe prophet, that ſees him ſacrificing in the mount of Baal? Had he beene from the true God, he would rather have ſaid, Pull me downe theſe altars of Baal, than, Build me here ſeven others. The very place convinces him of falſhood and Idolatry; And why ſeven Altars? What needs all this pompe? When the true God never required but one at once, as himſelfe is one; why doth the falſe prophet call for no leſſe than ſeaven? as if God ſtood upon numbers? as if the Almighty would have his power either divided or limited? Here is nothing but a glorious and magnificent pretence of devotion. It hath beene ever ſeene, that the falſe worſhippers of God have made more pompous ſhewes, and fairer flouriſhes of their peity, and religion, than the true.

Now when Balaam ſees his ſeven bullocks and ſeavē rams ſmoking upon his ſeven Altars,

A Altars, he goes up higher into the mount (as ſome counterfeit Moſes) to receive the anſwer of God. But will God meet with a Sorcerer? Will he make a Prophet of a Magician? O man, who ſhall preſcribe God what inſtruments to uſe: he knows how to imploy, not only Saints, & Angels, but wicked men, Beaſts, devils, to his own glory: He that put words into the mouth of the Aſſe, puts words into the mouth of Balaã; the words do but paſſe from him; they are not polluted, becauſe they are not his; as the Trunke, thorow which a man ſpeaks, is not more eloquent for the ſpeech that is uttered thorow it. What a notable proclamation had the Infidels wanted of Gods favour to his people, if Balaams tongue had not bin uſed? How many ſhall once ſay, Lord, we have propheſied in thy name, that ſhall heare, Verely I know you not.

What madneſſe is this in Balaam? He that found himſelfe conſtant in ſolliciting, B thinkes to finde God not conſtant in denying; and, as if that infinite Deity were not the ſame every where, hopes to change ſucceſſe with places. Neither is that bold forehead aſhamed to importune God againe in that, wherein his own mouth had teſtified an aſſurance of deniall. The reward was in one of his eyes, the revenging Angell in the other: I know not whether (for the time) hee more loved the bribe, or feared the Angell. And whiles he is in this diſtraction, his tongue bleſſes againſt his heart, and his heart curſes againſt his tongue. It angers him that he dare not ſpeake what he would; and now at laſt rather than loſe his hopes, he reſolves to ſpeak worſe than curſes. The feare of Gods judgements in a worldly heart is at length overcome with the love of gaine.

Of PHINEAS.

BAlaam pretended an haſt homeward; but he lingred ſolong that he left his bones in Midian. How juſtly did he periſh with the ſword of Iſrael, whoſe tongue had inſenſibly ſlaine ſo many thouſands of them? As it is uſually ſaid of the devill, that he goes away in a ſtench, ſo may it bee truly ſaid of this Prophet of his; according to the faſhion of all hypocrites, his words were good, his actions abominable; he would not curſe, but he would adviſe, and his counſell is worſe than a curſe; for his curſe had hurt none but himſelfe, his counſell coſt the blood of 24000 Iſraelites. He that had heard God ſpeak by Balaam, would not look D for the devill in the ſame mouth: and if God himſelf had not witneſſed againſt him, who could beleeve that the ſame tongue which uttered ſo divine prophecies, ſhould utter ſo villanous and curſed advice? Hypocriſie gaines this of men, that it may doe evill unſuſpected: But now he that heard what he ſpake in Balac's eare, hath bewrayed, and condemned his counſell, and himſelfe.

This policy was fetcht from the bottome of hell. It is not for lacke of deſire that I curſe not Iſrael; thou doeſt not more wiſh their deſtruction, than I doe thy wealth, and honour: But ſo long as they hold firme with God, there is no ſorcery againſt Iacob; withdraw God from them, and they ſhall fall alone, and curſe themſelves; draw them into ſinne, and thou ſhalt withdraw God from them. There is no ſinne more plauſible than wantonneſſe; One fornication ſhall draw in another, and both ſhall E fetch the anger of God after them; ſend your faireſt womẽ into their tents, their ſight ſhall draw them to luſt, their luſt to folly, their folly to Idolatry; and now God ſhal curſe them for thee, unaſked. Where Balaam did ſpeak wel, there was never any Prophet ſpake more divinely; where he ſpake ill, there was never any devill ſpake more deſperately: Ill counſell ſeldome ſuccedeth not: Gods ſeed fals often out of the way, and rootes not, but the tares never lightly amiſſe. This project of the wicked Magiciã was too proſperous. The daughters of Moab come into the tents of Iſrael, and have captived thoſe whom the Amorites & Amalekites could not reſiſt. Our firſt mother Eve bequeathed this dowry to her daughters, that they ſhould be our helpers to ſin; the weaker ſexe is the ſtronger in this conqueſt: had the Moabites ſent their ſubtilleſt Counſellors, to perſwade the Iſraelites to their Idol-ſacrifices, they had beene repelled with ſcorne; but now the beauty of their women is over-eloquent and ſucceſſfull.

full. That which in the first world betrayed the sonnes of God, hath now insnared Gods people; It had been happy for Israel if Balaam had used any charmes but these. As it is the use of God to fetch glory to himselfe out of the worst actions of Satan, so it is the guise of that evill one (through the just permission of the Almighty) to raise advantage to himselfe from the faireſt peeces of the workmanship of God: No one meanes hath so inriched hell, as beautifull faces. A

All Idols are abominable; but this of Baal-Peor was, besides the superstition of it, beastly; Neither did Baal ever put on a forme of so much shame, as this; yet very Israelites are drawne to adore it. When lust hath blinded the eyes, it carries a man whither it lists; even beyond all differences of sinne. A man besotted with filthy desires, is fit for any villany.

Sinne is no lesse crafty than Satan himselfe; but give him but roome in the eye, & he will soone be possessed of body and soule. These Israelites first saw the faces of these Moabites and Midianites, then they grew to like their presence, from thence to take pleasure in their feasts: From their boords they are drawne to their beds, from their beds to their Idols, and now they are joyned to Baal-Peor, and separated from God. Bodily fornication is the way to spirituall: If we have made Idols of flesh, it is just to be given up to Idols of wood and stones. If we have not grace to resist the beginnings of sinne, where shall we stay? If our foot slip into the mouth of hell, it is a miracle to stop ere we come to the bottome. B

Well might God be angry, to see his people goe a whoring in this double fornication; neither doth he smother his wrath, but himselfe strikes with his plague, and bids Moses strike with the sword. He strikes the body, and bids Moses strike the head. It had bin as easie for him to plague the Rulers, as the vulgar: and one would thinke these should be more properly reserved for his immediate hand; and these he leaves to the sword of humane authority, that he might winne awe to his own ordinances. As the sins of great men are exemplary, so are their punishments. Nothing procures so much credit to government, as strict and impartiall executions of great and noble offenders. Those whom their sins have imbased, deserve no favour in the punishment. As God knowes no honor, no royalty in matter of sinne, no more may his Deputies. Contrarily, connivence at the outrages of the mighty, cuts the sinewes of any State; neither doth any thing make good lawes more contemptible, than the making difference of offenders; that small sacriledges should be punished, when great ones ride in triumph. If good ordinations turne once to Spiders webs, which are broken thorow by the bigger Flies, no hand will feare to sweepe them downe. C D

God was angry; Moses and all good Israelites grieved; the heads hanged up; the people plagued: yet behold, one of the Princes of Israel feares not to brave God & his Ministers, in that sinne which he sees so grievously revenged in others. I can never wonder enough at the impudence of this Israelite. Here is fornication, an odious crime, and that of an Israelite, whose name challenges holinesse; yea, of a Prince of Israel, whose practice is a rule to inferiors; & that with a woman of Midian, with whō even a chaste contract had bin unlawfull; and that with contempt of all government; and that in the face of Moses and all Israel; and that in a time of mourning, and judgment for that same offence. Those that have once passed the bounds of modesty, soone grow shameleſſe in their sinnes. Whiles sinne hides it selfe in corners, there is yet hope; for, where there is shame, there is possibility of grace; but whē once it dare looke upon the Sunne, and sends challenges to authority, the case is desperate, and ripe for judgement. This great Simeonite thought he might sinne by priviledge; He goes, as if he said, Who dares controll me? His nobility hath raised him above the reach of correction. Commonly, the sins of the mighty are not without presumption, and therefore their vengeance is no lesse than their security; and their punishment is so much greater, as their cōceit of impunity is greater. All Israel saw this bold lewdnesse of Zimri, but their hearts & eyes were so full of griefe, that they had not roome enough for indignation. Phineas lookt on with the rest, but with other affections. When he saw this defiance bidden to God, and this insultation upon the sorrow of his people, that whiles they were wringing their hands, a proud miscreant durst out- E

face their humiliation with his wicked dalliance; his heart boyles with a desire of an holy revenge; and now that hand which was used to a Censer, and sacrificing knife, takes up his Javelin, & with one stroke joynes these two bodies in their death, which were joyned in their sin; and in the very flagrance of their lust, makes a new way for their soules to their owne place. O noble and heroicall courage of Phineas! which as it was rewarded of God, so is worthy to bee admired of men. Hee doth not stand casting of scruples; who am I to doe this? the son of the high Priest; My place is all for peace and mercy; It is for me to sacrifice, & pray for the sin of the people, not to sacrifice any of the people for their sin. My duty cals me to appease the anger of God, what I may, not to revenge the sins of men; to pray for their conversion, not to work the confusion of any sinner; and who are these? Is not the one a great Prince in Israel, the other a Princesse of Midian? Can the death of two so famous persons goe unrevenged? Or if it be safe, and fit, why doth my uncle Moses rather shed his owne teares, than their blood? I will mourne with the rest; let them revenge whom it concerneth. But the zeale of God hath barred out all weake deliberations; & he holds it now both his duty & his glory to be an executioner of so shamelesse a pair of offeders.

God loves this heat of zeale, in all the cariages of his servants; and if it transport us too far, he pardoneth the errors of our fervency, rather thā the indifferences of lukewarmnesse. As these two were more beasts, than any that ever he sacrificed, so the shedding of their blood was the acceptablest sacrifice, that ever he offered unto God, for both all Israel is freed from the plague, and all his posterity have the Priesthood entailed to them, so long as the Jewes were a people. Next to our prayers, there is no better sacrifice thā the blood of malefactors; not as it is theirs; but as it is shed by authority. Governors are faulty of those sins they punish not. There can bee no better sight in any state, thā to see a malefactor at the gallows. It is not enough for us to stād gazing upon the wickednes of the times (yea although w^th^ tears) unless we endeavor to redresse it; especially publike persōs cary not their Javelin in their hād for nought.

Every one is ready to aske Phineas for his commission; and those that are willing to salve up the act, plead extraordinary instinct from God, who (no doubt) would not have accepted that which himself wrought not. But what need I run so farre for his warrant? when I heare God say to Moses, Hang up all the heads of Israel; and Moses say to the Vnder-Rulers, Every one slay his men that are joyned to Baal-Peor. Every Israelite is now made a Magistrate for this execution; and why not Phineas amongst the rest? Doth his Priesthood exempt him from the blood of sinners? How then doth Samuel hew Agag in pieces? Even those may make a carkasse, which may not touch it. And if Levi got the Priesthood, by shedding the blood of Idolaters; why may it not stand with that Priesthood, to spill the blood of a fornicator and Idolater? Ordinary justice will beare out Phineas in this act: It is not for every man to challenge this office, this which double proclamation allowed to Phineas. All that private persons can doe, it is either to lift up their hands to heaven for redresse of sinne, or to lift up their hands against the sinne, not against the person. Who made thee a Iudge, is a lawfull question, if it meet with a person unwarranted.

Now the sinne is punished, the plague ceaseth. The revenge of God sets out ever after the sin; but if the revenge of men (which commonly comes later) can overtake it, God gives over the chase. How oft hath the infliction of a lesse punishment, avoyded a greater. There are none so good friends to the State, as couragious and impartiall Ministers of justice. These are the reconcilers of God and the people, more than the prayers of them that sit still, and doe nothing.

Of the death of MOSES.

AFter many painfull and perillous enterprises, now is Moses drawing to his rest. He hath brought his Israelites from Ægypt, thorow the Sea and wilderneſſe, within the sight of their promised Land; and now himselfe must take possession of that Land whereof Canaan was but a type. When wee have haye done that we came for, it is time for us to be gone; This earth is made only for action, not for fruition: the services of Gods children should be ill rewarded, if they must stay here alwayes. Let no man think much that those are fetcht away which are faithfull to God; they should not change, if it were not to their preferment. It is our folly that we would have good men live for ever, and account it a hard measure, that they were. He that lends them to the world, owes them a better turne than this earth can pay them. It were injurious to wish, that goodnesse should hinder any man from glory. So is the death of Gods Saints precious, that it is certaine.

Moses must goe up to mount Nebo, and die. The time, the place, and every circumstance of his dissolution is determined. That one dies in the field, another in his bed, another in the water: one in a forraine Nation, another in his own, is fore-decreed in heaven. And, though we heare it not vocally, yet God hath called every man by his name, and saith, Die thou there. One man seemes to die casually, another by an inexpected violence: both fal by a destiny; & all is set down to us by an eternal decree. He that brought us into the world, will carry us out according to his own purposes.

Moses must ascend up to the hill to die. He received his charge for Israel upon the hill of Sinai; and now he delivers up his charge upon the hill of Nebo: His brother Aaron dyed on one hill, he on another. As Christ was transfigured on an hill, so was this excellent type of his; neither doubt I, but that these hils were types to thē of that heaven wither they were aspiring. It is the goodnesse of our God, that hee will not have his children dye any where, but where they may see the Land of Promise before them; neither can they depart without much comfort, to have seene it: Contrarily, a wicked man that lookes downe, and sees hell before him, how can he choose but finde more horror in the end of death, than in the way?

How familiarly doth Moses heare of his end! It is no more betwixt God and Moses, but, Goe up and dye. If he had invited him to a meale, it could not have been in a more sociable compellation; no otherwise than he said to his other Prophet, Vp and eate. It is neither harsh, nor newes to Gods children, to heare or thinke of their departure; To them death hath lost his horror, through acquaintance: Those faces which at first sight seemed ill-favoured, by oft viewing, grow out of dislike: They have so oft thought and resolved of the necessity, and of the issue of their dissolution, that they cannot hold it either strange or unwelcome: He that hath had such entire conversation with God, cannot feare to goe to him. Those that know him not, or know that he will not know them, no marvell if they tremble.

This is no small favour, that God warnes Moses of his end; he that had so oft made Moses of his counsell, what hee meant to doe with Israel, would not now doe ought with himselfe, without his knowledge. Expectation of any maine event, is a great advantage to a wise heart; If the fiery chariot had fetcht away Elias unlookt for, wee should have doubted of the favour of his transportation: It is a token of judgment, to come as a theefe in the night. God forewarnes one by sickneſſe, another by age, another by his secret instincts, to prepare for their end: If our hearts be not now in readinesse, we are worthy to be surprized.

But what is this I heare? Displeasure mixed with love? and that to so faithfull a servant as Moses? he must but see the Land of Promise, he shall not tread upon it; because he once, long agoe, sinned in distrusting. Death, though it were to him an entrance into glory, yet shall be also a chastisement of his infidelity. How many noble prooses had Moses given of his courage and strength of faith? How many gracious services had he done to his Master? Yet for one act of distrust, he must bee gathered to his Fathers. All our obediences cannot beare out one sinne against God; How vainly shall we hope to make amends to God for our former trespasses, by our better behaviour, when Moses hath this sinne laid in his dish, after so many and worthy testimonies of his fidelity? When we have forgotten our sinnes, yet God remembers them, and (although not in anger, yet) he cals for our arrerages. Alas, what shall become of them with whom God hath tenne thousand greater quarrels; that amongst many millions of sinnes, have scattered some few acts of formall services? If Moses must die the first death for one fault, how shall they escape the second for sinning alwayes?

A wayes? Even where God loves, he will not winke at ſinne; and if he doe not punish, yet he will chaſtiſe: How much leſſe can it ſtand with that eternall Juſtice, to let wilfull ſinners eſcape judgement?

It might have beene juſt with God, to have reſerved the cauſe to himſelfe; and in a generalitie, to have told Moſes, that his ſinne muſt ſhorten his journey: but it is more of mercy, than juſtice, that his children ſhall know why they ſmart; That God may at once both juſtifie himſelfe, and humble them for their particular offences: Thoſe to whom he meanes vengeance, have not the ſight of their ſinnes till they bee paſt repentance. Complaine not that God upbraids thee with thy old ſinnes, whoſoever thou art: but know it is an argument of love; whereas concealement is a fearefull ſigne of a ſecret diſlike from God.

B But what was that noted ſinne which deſerves this late exprobation, and ſhall cary ſo ſharpe a chaſtiſement? Iſrael murmured for water; God bids Moſes, take the rod in his hand, and ſpeake to the rock to give water; Moſes in ſtead of ſpeaking, and ſtriking the rock with his voice, ſtrikes it with the rod: Here was his ſinne; An overreaching of his commiſſion; a fearefulnes and diſtruſt of the effect. The rod, he knew, was approved for miracles; he knew not how powerfull his voice might be; therefore he did not ſpeake, but ſtrike, and he ſtroke twice for failing; And now, after theſe many yeares, he is ſtriken for it of God. It is a dangerous thing in divine matters, to goe beyond our warrant: Thoſe ſinnes which ſeeme triviall to men, are hainous in the account of God; Any thing that ſavours of infidelity, diſpleaſes him more than ſome other crimes of morality. Yet the moving of the Rod was but a diverſe C thing from the moving of the tongue, it was not contrary; Hee did not forbid the one, but he commanded the other: This was but acroſſe the ſtreame, not againſt it; where ſhall they appeare, whoſe whole courſes are quite contrary to the Commandements of God?

Upon the act done, God paſſeth the ſentence of reſtraining Moſes with the reſt, from the promiſed Land: Now he performes it: Since that time, Moſes had many favours from God; all which could not reverſe this decreed caſtigation; That everlaſting rule is grounded upon the very eſſence of God, I am Iehovah, I change not. Our purpoſes are as our ſelves, fickle and incertaine; His are certaine, and immutable: ſome things which he reveales, he alters; nothing that he hath decreed. Beſides the ſoule of Moſes (to the glory whereof God principally intended this change) I D finde him carefull of two things: His Succeſſor, and his Body: Moſes moves for the one: the other God doth unasked: He that was ſo tender over the welfare of Iſrael, in his life, would not ſlacken his care in death: He takes no thought for himſelfe (for he knew how gainfull an exchange he muſt make.) All his care is for his charge. Some enviouſ natures deſire to be miſſed, when they muſt goe; and wiſh that the weakneſſe, or want of a Succeſſor, may be the foile of their memory, and honour: Moſes is in a contrary diſpoſition; It ſufficeth him not, to finde contentment in his owne happineſſe, unleſſe he may have an aſſurance, that Iſrael ſhall proſper after him. Carnall mindes are all for themſelves, and make uſe of government, onely for their owne advantages; But good hearts looke ever to the future good of the Church, above their owne, againſt their owne. Moſes did well, to ſhew his good af- E fection to his people; but in his ſilence God would have provided for his owne: He that called him from the ſheepe of Ietbro, will not want a governeur for his choſen, to ſucceed him; God hath fitted him, whom he will chooſe. Who can be more meet, than he whoſe name, whoſe experience, whoſe graces might ſupply, yea revive Moſes to the people? He that ſearched the Land before, was fitteſt to guide Iſrael into it; He that was indued with the Spirit of God, was the fitteſt deputy for God: He that abode ſtill in the Tabernacle of Ohel-moed, as Gods attendant, was fitteſt to be ſent forth from him, as his Lieutenant: But, oh the unſearchable counſell of the Almighty! Aged Caleb, and all the Princes of Iſrael are paſt over; and Ioſhua the ſervant of Moſes, is choſen to ſucced his maſter; The eye of God is not blinded either with gifts, or with blood, or with beauty, or with ſtrength: but as in his eternall elections, ſo in his temporary, he will have mercy on whom he will.

And well doth Ioshua succeed Moses; The very acts of God of old were allegories: where the Law ends, there the Saviour begins; we may see the Land of Promise in the Law; Onely Jesvs the mediator of the new Testament can bring us into it. So was he a servant of the Law, that he supplies all the defects of the Law to us: Hee hath taken possession of the promised Land for us, he shall carry us from this wilderneſſe, to our rest.

It is no small happineſſe to any State, when their Governours are chosen by worthineſſe; and such elections are ever from God; whereas the intrusions of bribery and injust favour or violence, as they make the common-wealth miserable, so they come from him which is the author of confusion: Woe be to that State that suffers it; woe be to that person that workes it; for both of them have sold themselves; the one to servitude, the other to sinne.

I doe not heare Moses repine at Gods choyce, and grudge that this Scepter of his is not hereditary; but he willingly laies hands upon his servant, to consecrate him for his succeſſor. Ioshua was a good man, yet he had some sparkes of envy; for when Eldad and Medad propheſied, he stomackt it; (My Lord Moses, forbid them.) Hee that would not abide two of the Elders of Israel to propheſie, how would hee have allowed his servant to sit in his throne? What an example of meekneſs (beſides all the reſt) doth he here see in this last act of his master, who without all murmuring assignes his chair of State to his Page? It is all one to a gracious heart, whom God will please to advance: Emulation and discontentment are the affections of carnall mindes. Humility goes ever with regeneration; which teaches a man to thinke (what ever honour be put upon others) I have more than I am worthy of.

The same God that by the hands of his Angels caried up the soule of Moses to his glory, doth also by the hand of his Angels cary his body downe into the valley of Moab, to his sepulture. Those hands which had taken the Law from him, those eyes that had seene his presence, those lips that had conferred so oft with him, that face that did so shine with the beames of his glory, may not be neglected when the soule is gone: He that tooke charge of his birth & preservation in the Reeds, takes charge of his cariage out of the world: The care of God ceaseth not over his owne, either in death or after it. How justly doe we take care of the comely burials of our friends, when God himselfe gives us this example!

If the ministery of man had beene used in this grave of Moses, the place might have beene knowne to the Israelites; but God purposely conceales this treasure, both from men and Devils; that so he might both crosse their curiosity, and prevent their superstition. If God had loved the adoration of his servants relikes; he could never have had a fitter oportunity for this devotiō, than in the body of Moses. It is folly to place Religion in those things, which God hides on purpose from us; It is not the property of the Almighty, to restraine us from good.

Yet that divine hand which lockt up this treasure, and kept the key of it, brought it forth afterwards, glorious. In the transfiguration, this body which was hid in the valley of Moab, appeared in the hill of Tabor; that wee may know, these bodies of ours are not lost, but laid up; and shall as as sure bee raised in glory, as they are layd downe in corruption. We know that when hee shall appeare, we shall also appeare with him in Glory.

THE EIGHTH BOOKE.

Of RAHAB.

IOSHVA was one of those twelve searchers which were sent to view the Land of Canaan; yet now he addresses two Spies, for a more particular Survey: Those twelve were only to enquire of the generall condition of the people, and Land; these two finde out the best entrance into the next part of the Countrey, and into their greatest City. Ioshua himselfe was full of Gods Spirit, and had the Oracle of God ready for his direction: yet now he goes not to the Propitiatory for consultation, but to the Spies. Except where ordiary meanes faile us, it is no appealing to the immediate help of God; we may not seek to the posterne, but where the common gate is shut. It was promised Ioshua, that he should lead Israel into the promised Land; yet he knew it was unsafe to presume. The condition of his provident care was included in that assurance of successe. Heaven is promised to us, but not to our carelesnesse, infidelity, disobedience. He that hath set this blessed Inheritance before us, presupposes our wisedome, faith, holinesse.

Either force or policy are fit to be used unto Canaanites. He that would be happy in this spirituall warfarre, must know where the strength of his enemy lyeth, and must frame his guard according to the others assault. It is a great advantage to a Christian, to know the fashion of Satans onsets, that he may the more easily compose himselfe to resist. Many a soule hath miscaried, through the ignorance of his enemy, which had not perished, if it had well knowne that the weaknesse of Satan stands in our faith.

The Spies can finde no other lodging, but Rahabs house. Shee was a victualler by profession, and (as those persons and trades, by reason of the commonnesse of entertainment, were amongst the Jewes infamous by name, and note) shee was Rahab the Harlot, I will not thinke she professed filthinesse: onely her publike trade (through the corruption of those times) hath cast upon her this name of reproach; yea, rather will I admire her faith, than make excuses for her calling. How many wome in Israel (now Miriam was dead) have given such prooses of their knowledge and faith? How noble is that confeſſion, which ſhe makes of the power and truth of God? Yea, I ſee here, not only a Diſciple of God, but a Propheteſſe. Or if ſhe had once been publike, as her houſe was; now ſhe is a chaſte and worthy Convert; and ſo approved her ſelfe for honeſt and wiſe behaviour, that ſhe is thought worthy to be the great Grandmother of Davids Father; and the holy Line of the Meſſias, is not aſhamed to admit her into that happy Pedigree. The mercy of our God doth not meaſure us by what we were; It would be wide with the beſt of us, if the eye of God ſhould looke backward to our former eſtate: there he ſhould ſee Abraham an Idolater, Paul a Perſecutor, Manaſſes a Necromancer, Mary Magdalen a Curtizan; and the beſt vile enough to be aſhamed of himſelfe. Who can deſpaire of mercy that ſees even Rahab fetcht into the blood of Iſrael, and Line of Chriſt? A

If Rahab had not received theſe Spies, but as unknowne paſſengers, with reſpect to their money, and not to their errand, it had been no praiſe; for in ſuch caſes the thank is rather to the gueſt, than to the Oaſt; but now ſhee knew their purpoſe; ſhee knew that the harbour of them was the danger of her owne life; and yet ſhe hazzards this entertainment. Either faith or friendſhip are never tried, but in extremities. To ſhew countenance to the meſſengers of God, whiles the publike face of the State ſmiles upon them, is but a curteſie of courſe; but to hide our owne lives in theirs, when they are perſecuted, is an act that lookes for a reward. Theſe times need not favour; we know not what may come: Alas! how likely is it that they would ſhelter them in danger, which reſpect them not in proſperity? B

All intelligences of State come firſt to the Court; It moſt concerns Princes to harken after the affaires of each other. If this poore Inholder knew of the Sea dryed up before Iſrael, and of the diſcomfiture of Og and Sehon; Surely this rumour was ſtale with the King of Iericho; he had heard it and feared; and yet in ſtead of ſending Ambaſſadours for peace, he ſends Purſuivants for the Spies. The ſpirit of Rahab melted with that ſame report, wherewith the King of Iericho was hardened: All make not one uſe of the meſſages of the proceedings of God. C

The King ſends to tell her what ſhe knew; ſhee had not hid them, if ſhee had not known their errand. I know not whether firſt to wonder at the gracious proviſion of God for the Spies, or at the ſtrong faith which hee hath wrought in the heart of a weake woman; two ſtrangers, Iſraelites, Spies (and noted for theſe) in a forraine, in an hoſtile Land, have a ſafe harbour provided them, even amongſt their enemies; In Iericho, at the very Court-gate, againſt the Proclamation of a King, againſt the indeavours of the people. Where cannot the God of heaven either find or raiſe up friends to his owne cauſe and ſervants? D

Who could have hoped for ſuch faith in Rahab? which contemned her life for the preſent, that ſhe might ſave it for the future; neglected her own King and Countrey, for ſtrangers which ſhe never ſaw; and more feared the deſtruction of that City, before it knew that it had an adverſary, than the diſpleaſure of her King, in the mortall revenge of that, which he would have accounted trechery. She brings them up to the rooſe of her houſe, and hides them with ſtalkes of flaxe: That plant which was made to hide the body from nakedneſſe and ſhame, now is uſed to hide the Spies from death. Never could theſe ſtalkes have beene improved ſo well with all her houſewifry, after they were bruiſed, as now before they were fitted to her wheele: Of theſe ſhe hath woven an everlaſting webbe, both of life and propagation. And now her tongue hides them no leſſe than her hand: her charity was good, her excuſe was not good. Evill may not be done, that good may come of it; we may doe any thing but ſinne, for promoting a good cauſe: And if not in ſome maine occaſions; how ſhall God take it, that we are not dainty of falſhoods in trifles? E

No man will looke that theſe Spies could take any ſound ſleepe in theſe beds of ſtalkes; it is enough for them that they live, though they reſt not. And now when they heard Rahab comming up the ſtaires, doubtleſſe they looked for an executioner: but behold, ſhe comes up with a meſſage better than their ſleepe, adding to their protection, advice for their future ſafety; whereto ſhe makes way by a faithfull report of Gods former wonders, and the preſent diſpoſition of her people; and by wiſe capitulations

A lations for the life and ſecurity of her Family. The newes of Gods miraculous proceedings for Iſrael, have made her reſolve of their ſucceſſe, and the ruines of Jericho. Then onely doe we make a right uſe of the works of God, when by his judgements upon others, we are warned to avoid our owne. He intends his acts for preſidents of juſtice.

The parents and brethren of Rahab take their reſt; They are not troubled with the feare & care of the ſucceſſe of Iſrael, but ſecurely goe with the current of the preſent condition: She watches for them all, and breakes her mid-night ſleepe to prevent their laſt. One wiſe and faithfull perſon does well in an houſe; where all are careleſſe there is no comfort, but in periſhing together. It had been an ill nature in Rahab, if ſhe had been content to be ſaved alone: that her love might be a match to her faith, ſhe
B covenants for all her Family; and ſo returnes life to thoſe, of whom ſhee received it. But the bond of nature, and of grace, will draw all ours to the participation of the ſame good, with our ſelves.

It had been never the better for the Spies, if after this nights lodging they had been turned out of doores to the hazard of the way; for ſo the purſuers had light upon them, and prevented their returne with their death. Rahabs counſell therefore was better than her harbour; which ſent them (no doubt, with victuals in their hands) to ſeek ſafety in the mountains, till the heat of that ſearch were paſt. He that hath giv̄ us charge of our lives, will not ſuffer us to caſt them upon wilfull adventures: Had not theſe Spies hid themſelves in thoſe Deſart hils, Iſrael had wanted directors for their enterpriſes. There is nothing more expedient for the Church, than that ſome of
C Gods faithfull meſſengers ſhould withdraw themſelves, and give way to perſecutions. Courage in thoſe that muſt die, is not a greater advantage to the Goſpell, than a prudent retiring of thoſe, which may ſurvive, to maintaine and propagate it.

It was a juſt and reaſonable tranſaction betwixt them, that her life ſhould be ſaved by them, which had ſaved theirs; They owe no leſſe to her, to whom they were not ſo much gueſts as priſoners: and now they paſſe not their promiſe onely, but their oath. They were ſtrangers to Rahab, and for ought ſhe knew, might have been godleſſe: yet ſhe dares truſt her life upon their oath. So ſacred and inviolable hath this bond ever beene, that an heathen woman thought her ſelfe ſecure upon the oath of an Iſraelite.

Neither is ſhe more confident of their oath taken, than they are careful both of ta-
D king and performing it. So farre are they from deſiring to ſalve up any breach of promiſe, by equivocation, that they explaine all conditions; and would prevent all poſſibilities of violation. All Rahabs Family muſt be gathered into her houſe; and that red cord, which was an inſtrument of their delivery, muſt be a ſigne of hers. Behold, this is the ſaving colour: The deſtroying Angell ſees the doore-cheekes of the Iſraelites ſprinkled with red, and paſſes them over. The Warriours of Iſrael ſee the window of Rahab died with red, and ſave her family from the common deſtruction. If our ſoules have this tincture of the precious blood of our Saviour, upon our doores or windowes, we are ſafe.

But if any one of the brethren of Rahab ſhall fly from this red flag, and rove about the City, and not containe himſelfe under that roofe, which hid the Spies, it is vaine
E for him to tell the avengers, that he is Rahabs brother: That title will not ſave him in the ſtreet, within doores it will. If we will wander out of the limits that God hath ſet us, we caſt our ſelves out of his protection; we cannot challenge the benefit of his gracious Preſervation, and our moſt precious Redemption, when we fly out into the by-wayes of our owne hearts; not for innocence, but for ſafety and harbour: The Church is that houſe of Rahab, which is ſaved when all Jericho ſhall periſh. Whiles we keepe us in the liſts thereof, we cannot miſ-cary, through miſ-opinion; but when once we runne out of it, let us looke for judgement from God, and errour in our own judgement.

Of Iordan divided.

THe two Spies returned with newes of the victory that ſhould be. I doe not heare them ſay, The Land is unpeopled, or the people are unfurniſhed with armes; unſkilfull in the diſcipline of warre; but (They faint becauſe of us; therefore their Land is ours.) Either ſucceſſe or diſcomfiture begins ever at the heart. A mans inward diſpoſition doth more than preſage the event. As a man raiſes up his owne heart before his fall, and depreſſes it before his glory; ſo God raiſes it up before his exaltation, and caſts it downe before his ruine. It is no otherwiſe in our ſpirituall conflicts; If Satan ſee us once faint, he gives himſelfe the day. There is no way to ſafty, but that our hearts be the laſt that ſhall yeeld. That which the Heathens attributed to Fortune, we may juſtly to the hand of God; that he ſpeedeth thoſe that are forward. All the ground that wee looſe, is given to our adverſaries.

This newes is brought but over-night; Ioſhua is on his way by morning, and prevents the Sunne for haſt. Delayes, whether in the buſineſſe of God or our owne, are hatefull and prejudiciall. Many a one looſes the Land of Promiſe by lingring; if wee neglect Gods time, it is juſt with him to croſſe us in ours.

Ioſhua haſtens till he have brought Iſrael to the verge of the promiſed Land: Nothing parts them now but the river of Jordan. There he ſtayes a time; that the Iſraelites might feed themſelves a while with the ſight of that, which they ſhould afterwards enjoy. That which they had beene forty yeares in ſeeking, may not bee ſeized upon too ſuddenly: God loves to give us cooles and heats in our deſires; and will ſo allay our joyes, that their fruition hurt us not. He knowes, that as it is in meates, the long forbearance whereof cauſes a ſurfet, when we come to full feed: ſo it fares in the contentments of the minde; therefore he feeds us not with the diſh, but with the ſpoone; and will have us neither cloyed nor famiſhed. If the mercy of God have brought us within ſight of heaven, let us be content to pauſe a while, and upon the bankes of Jordan, fit our ſelves for our entrance.

Now that Iſrael is brought to the brim of Canaan, the cloud is vaniſhed which led them all the way: and as ſoone as they have but croſſed Jordan, the Manna ceaſeth, which nouriſht them all the way. The cloud and Manna were for their paſſage, not for their reſt; for the wilderneſs, not for Canaã. It were as eaſie for God to work miracles alwayes; but he knows, that cuſtome were the way to make them no miracles. He goes by-wayes but till hee have brought us into the Roade, and then hee refers us to his ordinary proceedings. That Iſraelite ſhould have beene very fooliſh, that would ſtill have ſaid, I will not ſtir till I ſee the cloud, I will not eate unleſſe I may have that food of Angels. Wherefore ſerves the Arke but for their direction? wherefore ſerves the Wheat of Canaan but for bread? So, fond is that Chriſtian, that will ſtill depend upon expectation of miracles, after the fulneſſe of Gods Kingdome. If God beare us in his armes when we are children, yet when we are well growne hee lookes we ſhould goe on our owne feet; it is enough that he upholds us, though hee carry us not.

He that hitherto had gone before them in the cloud, doth now goe before them in the Arke; the ſame guide, in two divers ſignes of his preſence. The cloud was for Moſes, the Ark for Ioſhua's time: the cloud was fit for Moſes; the Law offered us Chriſt, but enwrapped in many obſcurities. If he were ſeene in the cloud, he was heard from the cover of the Ark. Why was it the Arke of the Teſtimony, but becauſe it witneſſed both his preſence and love? And within it, were his Word, the Law; and his Sament, the Manna. Who can wiſh a better Guide, than the God of Heaven, in his Word, and Sacraments? Who can know the way into the Land of Promiſe, ſo well as he that ownes it? And what meanes can better direct us thither, than thoſe of his Inſtitution?

That Ark which before was as the heart, is now as the head; It was in the middeſt of Iſrael, whiles they camped in the Deſart; now when the cloud is removed, it is in the

A the front of the Army; That as before they depended upon it for life, ſo now they ſhould for direction. It muſt goe before them on the ſhoulders of the ſons of Levi; they muſt follow it, but within ſight, not within breathing. The Levites may not touch the Arke, but onely the barres: The Iſraelites may not approach nearer than a thouſand paces to it. What awfull reſpects doth God require to bee given unto the teſtimony of his preſence? Vzzah paid deare for touching it; the men of Bethſhemeſh for looking into it. It is a dangerous thing to be too bold with the Ordinances of God. Though the Iſraelites were ſanctified, yet they might not come neare either the mount Sinai, when the Law was delivered, or the Arke of the Covenant, wherein the Law was writtē. How fearfull ſhal their eſtate be, that come with unhallowed hearts and hands to the Word of the Goſpell, and the true Manna of the Euangeli-
B call Sacrament? As we uſe to ſay of the Court and of fire, ſo may we of theſe Divine Inſtitutions, We freeze if we be far off from them; and if we be more neare than befits us, we burne. Vnder the Law we might looke at Chriſt aloofe, now under the Goſpell we may come neare him: He cals us to him; yea, he enters into us.

Neither was it onely for reverence that the Arke muſt be, not ſtumbled at, but waited on, a farre; but alſo for convenience, both of ſight and paſſage: Thoſe things that are neare us, though they be leſſe, fill our eye; Neither could ſo many thouſand eyes ſee the ſame object upon a level, but by diſtance; It would not content God, that one Iſraelite ſhould tell another, Now the Arke goes, now it turnes, now it ſtands; but he would have every one his owne witneſſe. What can bee ſo comfortable to a good heart, as to ſee the pledges of Gods preſence and favour? To heare the loving
C kindneſſes of God is pleaſant, but to behold and feele the evidences of his mercy, is unſpeakeably delectable: Hence the Saints of God, not contenting themſelves with faith have ſtill praied for ſight and fruition, and mourned when they have wanted it. What an happy proſpect hath God ſet before us, of Chriſt Jeſus crucified for us, and offered unto us?

Ere God will worke a miracle before Iſrael, they have charge to bee ſanctified. There is an holineſſe required to make us either patients or beholders of the great workes of God; how much more when wee ſhould bee actors in his ſacred ſervices? There is more uſe of ſanctification, when we muſt preſent ſomething to God, than when he muſt doe ought to us.

The ſame power that divided the Red-ſea before Moſes, divides Jordan before Io-
D ſhua; that they might ſee the Arke no leſſe effectuall than the cloud, and the hand of God as preſent with Ioſhua, to bring them into Canaan, as it was with Moſes to bring them out of Ægypt: The bearers of the Arke had need bee faithfull; they muſt firſt ſet their foot into the ſtreams of Jordan, and beleeve that it will give way; The ſame faith that led Peter upon the water, muſt carry them into it. There can be no Chriſtian without beliefe in God; but thoſe that are neare to God in his immediate ſervices, muſt goe before us no leſſe in beleeving, than they doe in example.

The waters know their Maker: That Jordan that flowed with full ſtreams when Chriſt went into it to bee baptized, now gives way when the ſame God muſt paſſe thorow it in ſtate: then there was uſe of his water, now of his ſand: I heare no news of any Rod to ſtrike the waters; the preſence of the Arke of the Lord God, the Lord
E of all the World, is ſigne enough to theſe Waves; which now, as if a ſinew were broken, run backe to their Iſſues, and dare not ſo much as wet the feet of the Prieſts that bore it; What ayled thee, O Sea, that thou fleddeſt, and thou Iordan, that thou wert driven back? Ye mountaines, that ye leaped like Rammes, and ye little hils, like Lambes? The earth trembled at the preſence of the Lord; at the preſence of the God of Iacob. How obſervant are all the Creatures to the God that made them? How glorious a God doe we ſerve? whom all the powers of the Heavens and Elements are willingly ſubject unto; and gladly take that nature which he pleaſes to give them. He could have made Jordan like ſome ſolid pavement of Chryſtall for the Iſraelites feet to have trod upon, but this worke had not been ſo magnificent. Every ſtrong Froſt congeales the water in a naturall courſe; but for the River to ſtand ſtill, and runne on heapes, and to bee made a liquid wall for the paſſage of Gods people, is, for Nature to runne out of it ſelfe, to doe

doe homage to her Creator: Now muſt the Iſralites needs think; How can the Canaanites ſtand out againſt us when the Seas and Rivers give us way? With what joy did they now trample upon the dry channell of Jordan, whiles they might ſee the dry Deſarts overcome; the promiſed Land before them; the very waters ſo glad of them that they ranne backe to welcome them into Canaan? The paſſages into our promiſed Land are troubleſome and perillous; and even at laſt, offer themſelves to us the main hindrances of our ſalvation; which after al our hopes threaten to defeat us: for what will it availe us to have paſſed a Wilderneſſe, if the waves of Jordan ſhould ſwallow us up? But the ſame hand that hath made the way hard, hath made it ſure: He that made the Wilderneſſe comfortable, will make Jordan dry; he will maſter all difficulties for us; and thoſe things which we moſt feared, will he make moſt ſoveraigne and beneficiall to us. O God, as we have truſted thee with the beginning, ſo will we with the finiſhing of our glory. Faithfull art thou that haſt promiſed, which wilt alſo doe it.

He that led them about, in forty yeares journey, thorow the wilderneſſe, yet now leads them the neareſt cut to Jericho; Hee will not ſo much as ſeeke for a Foord for their paſſage; but divides the waters. What a ſight was this to their heathen adverſaries, to ſee the waters make both a lane, and a wall for Iſrael? their hearts could not chooſe but be broken, to ſee the ſtreames broken off for a way to their enemies. I do not ſee Ioſhua haſting thorow this channell, as if hee feared leſt the Tide of Jordan ſhould returne; but as knowing that watery wall ſtronger than the walls of Jericho, he paces ſlowly: And leſt this miracle ſhould paſſe away with themſelves, he commands twelve ſtones to be taken out of the channell of Jordan, by twelve ſelected men from every Tribe, which ſhall be pitched in Gilgal; and twelve other ſtones to be ſet in the midſt of Jordan, where the feet of the Prieſts had ſtood with the Arke; That ſo both land and water might teſtifie the miraculous way of Iſrael, whiles it ſhould be ſaid of the one, Theſe ſtones were fetcht out of the pavement of Jordan; of the other, There did the Arke reſt whiles we walked dry-ſhod thorow the deepes of Jordan: of the one, Jordan was once as dry as this Gilgal; of the other; Thoſe waves which drowne theſe ſtones, had ſo drowned us, if the power of the Almighty had not reſtrained them. Many a great worke had God done for Iſrael, which was now forgotten: Ioſhua therefore will have monuments of Gods mercy, that future Ages might be both witneſſes, and applauders of the great workes of their God.

Of the ſiege of Jericho.

Ioſhua begins his warres with the Circumciſion and Paſſeover; Hee knew that the way to keepe the blood of his people from ſhedding, was to let out the Paganiſh blood of their uncircumciſion. The perſon muſt bee in favour, ere the worke can hope to proſper: His predeceſſor Moſes had like to have beene ſlaine for neglect of this Sacrament, when he went to call the people out of Ægypt: hee juſtly feares his owne ſafty, if now hee omit it, when they are brought into Canaan: wee have no right of inheritance in the ſpirituall Canaan, the Church of God, till we have received the Sacrament of our matriculation: So ſoon as our covenants are renued with our Creator, wee may well looke for the viſion of God for the aſſurance of victory.

What ſure work did the King of Jericho thinke he had made! he blocked up the paſſages, barred up the gates, defended the wals, and did enough to keepe out a common enemy: If we could doe but this to our ſpirituall adverſaries, it were as impoſſible for us to be ſurpriſed, as for Jericho to be ſafe. Me thinkes I ſee how they called their councel of warre, debated of all meanes of defence, gathered their forces, trained their ſouldiers, ſet ſtrong guards to the gates and wals; & now would perſwade one another, that unleſſe Iſrael could fly into their City, the ſiege was vaine. Vaine worldlings thinke their Rampiers and Barricadoes can keepe out the vengeance of God; their blindneſſe ſuffers them to looke no further than the means: The ſupreme hand

A hand of the Almighty comes not within the compaſſe of their feares. Every carnall heart is a Jericho ſhut up; God ſets downe before it, and diſplayes mercy and judgment in ſight of the wals thereof; it hardens it ſelfe in a wilfull ſecurity, and ſaith, Tuſh, I ſhall never be moved.

Yet their courage and feare fight together within their wals, within their boſomes, Their courage tels them of their owne ſtrength; their feare ſuggeſts the miraculous ſucceſſe of this (as they could not but thinke) inchanted generation; and now whiles they have ſhut out their enemy, they have ſhut in their own terror. The moſt ſecure heart in the world hath ſome flaſhes of feare; for it cannot but ſometimes looke out of it ſelfe, and ſee what it would not. Rahab had notified that their hearts fainted: & yet now their faces bewray nothing but reſolution. I know not whether the heart
B or the face of an hypocrite be more falſe; and as each of them ſeeks to beguile the other, ſo both of them agree to deceive the beholders: In the midſt of laughter their heart is heavy; who would not thinke him merry that laughes? yet their rejoycing is but in the face: who would not think a blaſphemer or prophane man reſolutely careleſſe? If thou hadſt a window into his heart, thou ſhouldeſt ſee him tormented with horrors of conſcience.

Now the Iſraelites ſee thoſe walled cities and towers, whoſe height was reported to reach to heaven; the fame whereof had ſo affrighted them ere they ſaw them, and were ready doubtleſſe to ſay in their diſtruſt, Which way ſhall we ſcale theſe invincible fortifications? what ladders, what Engines ſhall we uſe to ſo great a work? God prevents their infidelity; Behold, I have given Iericho into thine hand. If their wals had
C their foundations laid in the center of the earth; If the battlements had been ſo high built that an Eagle could not ſoare over them; this is enough, I have given it thee. For on whoſe earth have they raiſed theſe caſtles? Out of whoſe treaſure did they digge thoſe piles of ſtone? whence had they their ſtrength and time to build? Cannot hee that gave recall his owne? O ye fooles of Jericho, what if your wals be ſtrong, your men valiant, your leaders skilfull, your King wiſe, when God hath ſaid, I have given thee the Citie: What can ſwords or ſpeares doe againſt the Lord of Hoſts? Without him meanes can doe nothing; how much leſſe againſt him? How vaine & idle is that reckoning, wherein God is left out? Had the Captaine of the Lords hoſt drawn his ſword for Jericho, the gates might have been opened; Iſrael could no more have entred, than they can now be kept from entring, whē the wals were falne. What courſes
D ſo ever we take for our ſafety, it is good making God of our ſide: Neither men nor devils can hurt us againſt him; neither men nor Angels can ſecure us from him. There was never ſo ſtrange a ſiege as this of Jericho: Here was no mount raiſed, no ſword drawne, no Engine planted, no Pioners undermining; Here were trumpets ſounded, but no enemy ſeene; here were armed men, but no ſtroke given: They muſt walk and not fight, ſeven ſeverall dayes muſt they pace about the wals, which they may not once looke over to ſee what was within. Doubtleſſe, the inhabitants of Jericho made thēſelves merry with this ſight; when they had ſtood ſix dayes upon their wals & beheld none but a walking enemy; What (ſay they) could Iſrael find no walk to breathe them with, but about our wals? Have they not travelled enough in their forty years Pilgrimage, but they muſt ſtretch their limmes in this circle? Surely if their eyes
E were engines our wals could not ſtand: wee ſee they are good footmen, but when ſhall we try their hands? What, doe theſe vaine men thinke Jericho will bee wonne with looking at? Or, doe they onely come to count how many paces it is about our City? If this be their manner of ſiege we ſhall have no great cauſe to feare the ſword of Iſrael. Wicked men thinke God in jeſt, when hee is preparing for their judgement. The Almighty hath wayes and counſels of his owne, utterly unlike to ours: which becauſe our reaſon cannot reach, weare ready to condemne of fooliſhneſſe and impoſſibility. With us there is no way to victory but fighting, and the ſtrongeſt carries the ſpoile: God can give victory to the feet as well as to the hands, and when he will, makes weaknes no diſadvantage. What ſhould we doe but follow God thorow by-wayes, and know, that he will in ſpight of nature lead us to our end:

All the men of warre muſt compaſſe the City, yet it was not the preſence of the great great warriors of Israel that threw downe the wals of Jericho. Those foundations were not so slightly laid, as that they could not indure either a look, or a march, or a battery: It was the Arke of God, whose presence demolished the wals of that wicked City. The same power that drave backe the waters of Jordan before, and afterwards laid Dagon on the floore, cast down all those forts. The Priests beare on their shoulders that mighty engine of God, before which those wals, if they had beene of molten brasse, could not stand. Those spirituall wickednesses, yea, those gates of hell, which to nature are utterly invincible, by the power of the Word of God (which he hath committed to the carriage of his weake servants) are overthrowne and triumphed over. Thy Arke, O God, hath beene long amongst us; how is it that the wals of our corruptiõs still stand unruined? It hath gone before us; his Priests have caried it, we have not followed it, our hearts have not attended upon it; and therefore how mighty soever it is in it selfe, yet to us it hath not beene so powerfull, as it should.

Seven dayes together they walke this round; They made this therfore their Sabbaths dayes journey; and who knowes whether the last and longest walke, which brought victory to Israel, were not on this day? Not long before, an Israelite is stoned to death for but gathering a few sticks that day: Now all the host of Israel must walke about the wals of a large and populous City, and yet doe not violate the day. Gods precept is the rule of the justice & holines of all our actions: Or was it for that revenge upon Gods enemies is an holy worke, and such as God vouchsafes to priviledge with his own day? or, because when we have undertaken the exploits of God, he will abide no intermission till we have fulfilled them? He allowes us to breathe, not to breake off till we have finished.

It had beene as easie for God to have given this successe to their first dayes walke, yea to their first pace, or their first sight of Iericho; yet he will not give it untill the end of the seven dayes toyle: It is the pleasure of God to hold us both in worke and in expectation; and though he require our continuall indeavours for the subduing of our corruptions, during the sixe dayes of our life, yet we shall never finde it perfectly effected till the very evening of our last day: In the meane time it must content us that we are in our walk, and that these wals cannot stand, when we come to the measure and number of our perfection. A good heart groanes under the sense of his infirmities, faine would be rid of them, and strives and prayes; but when hee hath all done, untill the end of the seventh day, it cannot bee: If a stone or two moulder off from these wals in the meane time, that is all; but the foundations will not be removed till then,

When we heare of so great a designe as the miraculous winning of a mighty City, who would not looke for some glorious meanes to worke it? when we heare that the Arke of God must besiege Iericho, who would not look for some royall equipage? But behold; here seven Priests must goe before it, with seven Trũpets of Rams horns. The Israelites had trumpets of silver, which God had appointed for the use of assembling and dissolving the Congregation, for warre, and for peace. Now I doe not heare them called for; but in stead thereof Trumpets of Rams hornes; base for the matter, and not loud for sound; the shortnesse and equall measure of those instruments could not afford, either shrilnesse of noyse, or variety. How meane and homely are those meanes which God commonly uses in the most glorious workes! No doubt, the Citizens of Jericho answered this dull alarum of theirs, from their wals, with other instruments of louder report, and more martiall ostentation: and the vulgar Israelites thought, We have as cleare and as costly trumpets as theirs; yet no man dares offer to sound the better, when the worse are commanded. If we finde the ordinances of God poore and weake, let it content us that they are of his own choosing, and such as whereby he will so much more honour himselfe, as they in themselves are more inglorious. Not the outside, but the efficacie, is it that God cares for.

No Ram of iron could have been so forcible for battery as these Rammes hornes: For when they sounded long, and were seconded with the shout of the Israelites, all the wals of Jericho fell downe at once: They made the heaven ring with their shout; but the ruine of those wals drowned their voyce, and gave a pleasant kinde of horror to

A to the Iſraelites: The earth ſhooke under them with the fall; but the hearts of the Inhabitants ſhooke yet more: many of thē doubtleſſe were ſlaine with thoſe walles, wherein they had truſted. A man might ſee death in the faces of al the reſt that remained; who now being halfe dead with aſtoniſhment, expected the other halfe frō the ſword of their enemies; They had now, neither meanes, nor will to reſiſt; for if onely one breach had beene made (as it uſes in other ſieges) for the entrance of the enemy; perhaps new ſupplyes of defendants might have made it up with their carkaſſes: but now, that at once Jericho is turned to a plaine field, every Iſraelite, without reſiſtance, might runne to the next booty, and the throats of their enemies ſeemed to invite their ſwords to a diſpatch.

If but one Iſraelite had knockt at the gates of Jericho, it might have been thought, B their hand had helped to the victory: Now, that God may have all the glory, without the ſhow of any rivall, yea of any meanes, they doe but walke and ſhout, and the walls give way. He cannot abide to part with any honour, from himſelfe: As hee doth all things, ſo he would be acknowledged.

They ſhout all at once. It is the preſence of Gods Arke & our conjoyned prayers, that are effectuall to the beating downe of wickedneſſe. They may not ſhout, till they be bidden. If we will be unſeaſonable in our good actions, we may hurt, and not benefit our ſelves.

Every living thing in Jericho, man, woman, child, cattell, muſt die: our folly would thinke this mercileſſe: but there can be no mercy in injuſtice, and nothing but injuſtice in not fulfilling the charge of God: The death of Malefactors, the condemna- C tion of wicked men, ſeeme harſh to us; but we muſt learne of God, that there is a puniſhing mercy. Curſed be that mercy, that oppoſes the God of mercy.

Yet was not Ioſhua ſo intent upon the ſlaughter, as not to be mindful of Gods part; and Rahabs: Firſt, he gives charge (under a curſe) of reſerving al the treaſure for God; Then of preſerving the Family of Rahab. Thoſe two Spyes, that received life from her, now returne it to her, & hers: They call at the window with the red cord; and ſend up newes of life to her, the ſame way which they received theirs: Her houſe is no part of Jericho; neither may fire be ſet to any building of that City, till Rahab & her family be ſet ſafe without the hoſt. The actions of our faith and charity will be ſure to pay us; if late, yet ſurely. Now Rahab findes what it is to beleeve God; whiles out of an impure idolatrous Citie, ſhe is tranſplanted into the Church of God; and D made a mother of a Royall and holy poſteritie.

Of ACHAN.

HEn the wals of Jericho were falne, Ioſhua charged the Iſraelites but with two precepts; Of ſparing Rahabs houſe, & of abſtaining from that treaſure, which was anathematized to God; and one of them is broken: As in the entrance to Paradiſe, but one tree was forbidden; and that was eaten of. God hath provided for our weakneſſe in the paucity of commands: but our innocency ſtands not ſo much in ha- E ving few precepts as in keeping thoſe we have. So much more guilty are wee in the breach of one, as wee are more favoured in the number.

They needed no command to ſpare no living thing in Jericho: but to ſpare the treaſure, no command was enough. Impartialitie of execution is eaſier to performe, then contempt of theſe worldly things; becauſe we are more prone to covet for our ſelves, then to pity others. Had Ioſhuah bidden ſave the men and divide the treaſure; his charge had been more plauſible, then now to kill the men, & ſave the treaſure; or, if they muſt kill, earthly minds would more gladly ſhead their enemies blood, for a bootie, thē out of obedience, for the glory of their Maker. But now, it is good reaſon, ſince God threw downe thoſe wals, & not they; that both the blood of that wicked Citie ſhould be ſpilt to him, not to their owne revenge; & that the treaſure ſhould bee reſerved for his uſe, not for theirs. Who but a miſcreant can grudge, that God ſhould ſerve himſelfe of his own? I cannot blame the reſt of Iſrael, if they were well pleaſed with their conditions; onely one Achan troubles the peace, and his ſinne is imputed to Iſrael: the innocence of ſo many thouſand Iſraelites, is not ſo forcible to excuſe his one ſinne, as his one ſinne is to taint all Iſrael. A

A lewd man is a pernicious creature: That hee damnes his owne ſoule, is the leaſt part of his miſchiefe; he cõmonly drawes vengeance upon a thouſand, either by the deſert of his ſinne, or by the infection. Who would not have hoped that the ſame God, which for ten righteous men would have ſpared the five wicked Cities, ſhould not have been content to drowne one ſinne, in the obedience of ſo many righteous? But ſo venemous is ſinne, (eſpecially, when it lights among Gods people) that one dram of it is able to infect the whole maſſe of Iſrael.

Oh righteous people of Iſrael, that had but one Achan! How had their late circumciſion cut away the uncleane foreſkin of their diſobedience? How had the blood of their Paſchal Lambe ſcoured their ſoules frõ covetous deſires? The world was well mended with thẽ, ſince their ſtubborne murmurings in the Deſart. Since the death of Moſes, & the government of Ioſhua, I doe not find them in any diſorder. After that the Law hath brought us under the conduct of the true Ieſus, our ſins are more rare & our lives are more cõſcionable. Whiles we are under the Law, we do not ſo keepe it, as when we are delivered from it: our Chriſtian freedome is more holy than our ſervitude. Then have the Sacraments of God their due effect, when their receit purgeth us from our old ſinnes; and makes our converſation cleane and ſpirituall. B

Little did Ioſhua know, that there was any ſacriledge cõmitted by Iſrael: that ſinne is not halfe cunning enough, that hath not learned ſecrecie: Ioſhua was a vigilãt Leader, yet ſome ſinnes will eſcape him: Onely that eye which is every where, findes us out in our cloſe wickedneſſe. It is no blame to authority, that ſome ſinnes are ſecretly committed: The holieſt congregation, or family, may be blemiſht with ſome malefactors: it is juſt blame, that open ſinnes are not puniſhed; wee ſhall wrong government, if wee ſhall expect, the reach of it ſhould be infinite. Hee therefore, which if he had known the offence, would have ſent up prayers & teares to God, now ſends Spyes for a further diſcovery of Ai; They returne, with newes of the weaknes of their adverſaries: & (as contemning their paucity) perſwades Ioſhua, that a wing of Iſrael is enough to overſhadow this citie of Ai. The Iſraelites were ſo fleſhed with their former victorie, that now they thinke no wals or men can ſtand before them. Good ſucceſſe lifts up the heart with too much confidence; and whiles it diſſwades men from doing their beſt, oft-times diſappoints them. With God, the meanes can never bee too weake; without him, never ſtrong enough. C D

It is not good to contemne an impotent enemy. In this ſecond battell the Iſraelites are beaten: it was not the fewneſſe of their aſſailants that overthrew them, but the ſin that lay lurking at home. If all the hoſt of Iſrael had ſet upon this poore village of Ai, they had beene all equally diſcomfited: the wedge of Achan did more fight againſt them, than all the ſwords of the Cananites. The victories of God goe not by ſtrength, but by innocence.

Doubtleſſe, theſe men of Ai inſulted in this foyle of Iſrael, and ſaid; Loe, theſe are the men, frõ whoſe preſence the waters of Jordan ran backe; now they runne as faſt away from ours: Theſe are they, before whom the wals of Jericho fell downe; now they are falne as faſt before us; & all their neighbours tooke heart from this victory. Wherein I doubt not, but beſides the puniſhment of Iſraels ſinne, God intended the further obduration of the Cananites: Like as ſome ſkilfull player loſes on purpoſe at the beginning of the game, to draw on the more abetments. The newes of their overthrow ſpred as farre as the fame of their ſpeed; & every City of Canaan could ſay, Why not we as well as Ai? E

But good Ioſhua that ſucceeded Moſes, no leſſe in the care of Gods glory than in his government, is much dejected with this event. Hee rends his clothes, fals on his face, caſts duſt upon his head, and (as if he had learned of his Maſter, how to expoſtulate with God) ſayes, What wilt thou doe to thy mighty Name?

That Ioſhua might ſee, God tooke no pleaſure to let the Iſraelites lye dead upõ the earth, earth, before their enemies; himselfe is taxed for but lying all day, upon his face, before the Arke. All his expostulations are answered in one word, Get thee up, Israel hath sinned. I doe not heare God say, Lye still, & mourne for the sin of Israel. It is to no purpose to pray against punishment, while the sinne continues. And though God loves to be sued to; yet he holds our requests unseasonable, till there bee care had of satisfactiō. When we have risen, & redressed sin, then may we fall downe for pardon.

Victory is in the free hand of God, to dispose were he will; & no man can marvell that the dice of Warre run ever with hazard, on both sides: so as God needed not to have given any other reason of this discomfiture of Israel, but his owne pleasure: yet Ioshua must now know, that Israel which before prevailed for their faith, is beaten for their sin. When we are crossed in just and holy quarrels, we may well thinke there
B is some secret evil unrepented of, which God would punish in us; which though we see not, yet he so hates, that he wil rather be wanting to his owne cause, than not revenge it. When we goe about any enterprise of God, it is good to see that our hearts be cleere from any pollution of sin; and when we are thwarted in our hopes, it is our best course to ransack our selves, & to search for some sin hid from us in our bosome but open to the view of God.

The Oracle of God, which told him, a great offence was cōmitted, yet reveales not the person: It had been as easie for him, to have named the man, as the crime. Neither doth Ioshua request it; but refers that discovery to such a meanes, as whereby the offender (finding himselfe singled out by the lot) might bee most convinced. Achan thought he might have lyen as close in al that throng of Israel, as the wedge of gold
C lay in his Tent. The same hope of secresie which moved him to sinne, moved him to confidence in his sinne: but now, when hee saw the lot fall upon his Tribe, hee began to start a little; when upon his Family, he began to change countenance: when upon his household, to tremble & feare; when upon his person, to be utterly confounded in himselfe. Foolish men thinke to runne away with their privie sinnes; and say, Tush, no eye shal see me: but when they thinke themselves safest, God puls them out with shame. The man that hath escaped justice, and now is lying downe in death, would thinke; My shame shall never be disclosed: but before men and Angels shall he be brought on the scaffold, and finde confusion, as sure as late.

What needed any other evidence, when God had accused Achan? Yet Ioshua will have the sinne out of his mouth, in whose heart it was hatched; My son, I beseech thee
D give glory to God. Whō God had convinced as a malefactor, Ioshua beseeches as a son. Some hot spirit would have said; Thou wretched traitor, how hast thou pilfred from thy God, and shed the blood of so many Israelites, and caused the Host of Israel to shew their backes, with dishonour, to the Heathen? now shall we fetch this sin out of thee with tortures; and plague thee with a condigne death. But like the Disciple of him whose servāt he was, he meekely intreats that, which he might have extorted by violence, (My sonne, I beseech thee.) Sweetnes of compellation, is a great help towards the good entertainment of an admonition: roughnesse & rigor, many times hardens those hearts, which meeknesse would have melted to repentance: whether we sue, or convince, or reprove, little good is gotten by bitternesse. Detestatiō of the sinne, may well stand with favour to the person: and these two not distinguished, cause great
E wrong either in our charity, or justice; for, either we uncharitably hate the creature of God, or unjustly affect the evill of men. Subjects are, as they are called, sonnes to the Magistrate: All Israel was not onely of the family, but as of the loynes of Ioshua; such must be the corrections, such the provisions of Governours, as for their children; as againe, the obedience and love of Subjects must be filiall.

God had glorified himselfe sufficiently, in finding out the wickednesse of Achan; neither need he honour from men, much lesse from sinners; They can dishonour him by their iniquities: but what recompence can they give him for their wrongs? yet Ioshua sayes, My sonne, give glory to God. Israel should now see, that the tongue of Achan did justifie God in his lot. The confession of our sins doth no lesse honour God, than his glory is blemished by their commission. Who would not be glad to redeeme the honour of his Redeemer, with his owne shame?

The lot of God, and the mild words of Ioshua, wonne Achan to accuse himselfe, ingenuously, impartially: a storme perhaps would not have done that, which a Sunshine had done. If Achan had come in unealled; and before any question made, out of an honest remorse, had brought in his sacrilegious booty, and cast himselfe and it at the foot of Ioshua; doubtlesse, Israel had prospered, and his sinne had caried away pardon: now he hath gotten thus much thanke, that he is not a desperate sinner. God will once wring from the conscience of wicked men their owne inditements; They have not more carefully hid their sinne, then they shall one day freely proclaime their owne shame. A

Achans confession, though it were late, yet was it free & ful: For he doth not onely acknowledge the act, but the ground of his sinne; I saw, and coveted, and tooke. The eye betrayed the heart; and that, the hand; & now all conspire in the offence. If we list not to flatter our selves, this hath beene the order of our crimes. Evill is uniforme; & beginning at the senses, takes the inmost fort of the soule, and then armes our own outward forces against us; This shall once be the lascivious mans song, I saw, and coveted, and tooke: This the theeves; this the Idolaters; this the gluttons & drunkards: All these receive their death by the eye. But, oh foolish Achan! with what eyes didst thou looke upon that spoile, which thy fellowes saw and contemned? Why couldest thou not before, as well as now, see shame hid under that gay Babylonish garment? and an heape of stones covered with those shekles of silver? The over-prizing, and over-desiring of these earthly things, caries us into all mischiefe; and hides from us the sight of Gods judgements: whosoever desires the glory of metals, or of gay cloathes, or honour, cannot be innocent. B

Well might Ioshua have proceeded to the execution of him, whom God and his owne mouth accused: but as one that thought no evidence could be too strong, in a case that was capital; he sends to see, whether there was as much truth in the confession, as there was falshood in the stealth. Magistrates & Judges must pace slowly, & sure, in the punishment of offenders. Presumptions are not ground enough for the sentence of death; no, not in some cases the confessions of the guilty: It is no warrant for the Law to wrong a man, that he hath before wronged himselfe. There is lesse ill in sparing an offender, then in punishing the innocent. C

Who would not have expected, since the confession of Achan was ingenuous, and his pillage still found entire, that his life should have beene pardoned? But here was, Confesse and die; he had beene too long sicke of this disease, to be recovered. Had his confession beene speedy and free, it had saved him. How dangerous it is, to suffer sin to lye fretting into the soule! which if it were washt off betimes with our repentāce, could not kill us. In mortall offences, the course of humane justice is not stayd by our penitence: It is wel for our soules that we have repented; but the lawes of men take not notice of our sorrow. I know not whether the death, or the teares of a malefactor, be a better sight: The censures of the Church are wip't off with weeping, not the penalties of Lawes. D

Neither is Achan alone called forth to death, but all his family, all his substance. The actor alone doth not smart with sacriledge; al that concernes him, is enwrapped in the judgment. Those that defile their hands with holy goods, are enemies to their owne flesh and blood. Gods first revenges are so much the more fearefull, because they must be exemplary. E

Of the Gibeonites.

THe newes of Israels victory had flowne over all the Mountaines & Valleys of Canaan; and yet those Heathenish Kings and people, are mustered together against them. They might have seene themselves in Jericho & Ai; and have well perceived, it was not an arme of flesh, that they must resist, yet they gather their forces, and say, Tush, we shall speed better. It is madnes in a man, not to be warned, but to run upon the point of those judgments, where-

A wherewith he ſees others miſcary, and not to beleeve, till he cannot recover. Our aſſent is purchaſed too late, when we have overſtayed prevention; and truſt to that experience which we cannot live to redeeme.

Onely the Hivites are wiſer then their fellowes, & will rather yeeld & live. Their intelligence was not diverſe from the reſt; all had equally heard of the miraculous conduct, and ſucceſſe of Iſrael: but their reſolution was diverſe. As Rahab ſaved her Family, in the midſt of Jericho: ſo theſe foure cities preſerved themſelves, in the midſt of Canaan; and both of them by beleeving what God would doe. The efficacy of Gods marvellous workes, is not in the acts themſelves, but in our apprehenſion; ſome are overcome with thoſe motives, which others have contemned for weake.

Had theſe Gibeonites joyned with the forces of all their neighbours, they had periſhed in their common ſlaughter; If they had not gone away by themſelves, death B had met them; It may have more pleaſure, it cannot have ſo much ſafety to follow the multitude. If examples may lead us, the greateſt part ſhuts out God upon earth, & is excluded from God elſewhere. Some few poore Hivites yeeld to the Church of God, & eſcape the condemnation of the world. It is very like, their neighbours flouted at this baſe ſubmiſſion of the Gibeonites, and out of their termes of honour, ſcorned to beg life of an enemy, whiles they were out of the compaſſe of mercy: but when the bodies of theſe proud Jebuſites and Perizzites lay ſtrewed upon the earth, and the Gibeonites ſurvived; whether was more worthy of ſcorne and inſultation?

If the Gibeonites had ſtayed till Iſrael had beſieged their Cities, their yeeldance had beene fruitleſſe; now they make an early peace, and are preſerved. There C is no wiſdome in ſtaying till a judgement come home to us; the onely way to avoid it, is to meet it halfe way. There is the ſame remedy of warre and of danger: To provoke an enemy in his owne borders, is the beſt ſtay of invaſion; and to ſollicit God betimes in a manifeſt danger, is the beſt antidote for death.

I commend their wiſedome in ſeeking peace; I doe not commend their falſhood, in the manner of ſeeking it: who can looke for any better of Pagans? But as the faith of Rahab is ſo rewarded, that her lye is not puniſhed: ſo the fraud of theſe Gibeonites is not an equall match of their beleefe, ſince the name of the Lord God of Iſrael brought them to this ſuit of peace.

Nothing is found fitter to deceive Gods people, then a counterfait copy of age: Here are old ſacks, old bottles, old ſhooes, old garments, old bread. The Iſraelites that D had worne one ſuit forty yeares, ſeemed new clad in compariſon of them. It is no new policy, that Satan would beguile us with a vaine colour of antiquity, clothing falſhood in rags. Errors are never the elder for their patching: Corruption can doe the ſame that time would doe: we may make age as well as ſuffer it. Theſe Gibeonites did teare their bottles, and ſhooes and clothes, & made them naught, that they might ſeeme old: ſo doe the falſe patrons of new errours. If we be caught with this Gibeonitiſh ſtratagem, it is a ſigne we have not conſulted with God.

The ſentence of death was gone out againſt all the inhabitants of Canaan. Theſe Hivites acknowledge the truth, and judgements of God, and yet ſeeke to eſcape by a league with Iſrael. The generall denunciations of the vengeance of God, enwrap all ſinners; Yet may we not deſpaire of mercy. If the ſecret counſell of the Almighty E had not deſigned theſe men to life, Ioſhua could not have beene deceived with their league In the generality there is no hope: Let us come in old rags of our vileneſſe, to the true Ioſhua, and make our truce with him; we may live, yea, we ſhall live. Some of the Iſraelites ſuſpect the fraud; and notwithſtanding all their old garments, & proviſions can ſay, It may be thou dwelleſt amongſt us. If Ioſhua had continued this doubt, the Gibeonites had torne their bottles in vaine. In caſes and perſons unknowne, it is ſafe not to be too credulous: Charity it ſelfe will allow ſuſpition, where wee have ſeene no cauſe to truſt.

If theſe Hivites had not put on new faces, with their old cloathes, they had ſurely changed countenance, when they heard this argument of the Iſraelites, (It may bee thou dwelleſt amongſt us; how then can I make a league with thee?) They had (perhaps) hoped, their ſubmiſſion would not have been refuſed, whereſoever they had dwelt:

but leſt their neighbourhood might be a prejudice, they come diſguiſed; and now heare, that their neereneſſe of abode was an unremoveable barre of peace. It was quarrell enough, that they were Cananites; God had forbidden both the league, and the life of the native inhabitants. He that cals himſelf the God of peace, proclaimes himſelfe the God of Hoſts: and not to fight where he hath commanded, is to breake the peace with God, whiles wee nouriſh it with men. Contention with brethren is not more hatefull to him than leagues with Idolaters. The condition that hee hath ſet to our peace is our poſſibility and power. That fals not within the poſſibility of our power which we cannot doe lawfully.

What a ſmooth tale did theſe Gibeonites tell for themſelves? of the remoteneſſe of their Countrey; the motives of their journey, the conſultation of their Elders; the ageing of their proviſions in the way: that it might ſeeme not onely ſafe, but deſerved on their parts, that they ſhould be admitted to a peace, ſo farre ſought and purchaſed with ſo much toyle, and importunity. Their cloathes & their tongues agreed together; and both diſagree from the truth. Deceit is ever lightly wrapped up in plauſibility of words; as faire faces oft-times hide much unchaſtity. But this guile ſped the better, becauſe it was clad with much plainneſſe: For who would have ſuſpected, that clouted ſhooes, and ragged coats could have covered ſo much ſubtilty? The caſe ſeemed ſo cleare, that the Iſraelites thought it needleſſe to conſult with the mouth of the Lord. Their owne eyes and eares were called onely to counſell; and now their credulity hath drawne them into inconvenience.

There is no way to convince the Gibeonitiſh pretences of antiquity, but to have recourſe to the Oracle of God. Had this beene adviſed with, none of theſe falſe rags had ſhamed the Church of God: whether in our practice, or judgement, this direction cannot faile us, whereas what wee take upon the words of men, proves ever either light, or falſe wares.

The facility of Iſrael had led them into a league, to an oath, for the ſafety of the Gibeonites: and now within three dayes they finde both their neighbourhood and deceit. Thoſe old ſhooes of theirs would eaſily hold to cary them backe to their home. The march of a great Army is eaſie: yet within three dayes the Iſraelites were before their Cities. Ioſhua might now have taken advantage of their owne words, to diſſolve his league, and have ſaid; Ye are come from a farre Country, theſe Cities are neere; Theſe are not therefore the people, to whom wee are ingaged by our promiſe, and oath: And if theſe Cities be yours, yet yee are not your ſelves. Erewhile, ye were ſtrangers, now ye are Hivites borne, and dwelling in the midſt of Canaan: we will therfore deſtroy theſe Cities neere hand, and doe you ſave your people afarre off. It would ſeeme very queſtionable, Whether Ioſhua needed to hold himſelfe bound to this oath; for fraudulent conventions oblige not; and Iſrael had put in a direct caveat of their vicinity: yet dare not Ioſhua and the Princes truſt to ſhifts, for the eluding their oath; but muſt faithfully performe, what they have raſhly promiſed.

Ioſhuaes heart was cleare from any intention of a league with a Canaanite, when hee gave his oath to theſe diſguiſed ſtrangers: yet he durſt neither repeale it himſelfe, neither doe I heare him ſue to Eleazar the High-Prieſt, to diſpence with it; but takes himſelfe tied to the very ſtrict words of his oath, not to his owne purpoſe. His tongue had bound his heart and hands, ſo as neither might ſtirre; leſt while he was curious of fulfilling the will of God, he ſhould violate the oath of God. And if the Gibeonites had not knowne theſe holy bonds indiſſoluble, they neither had beene ſo importunate to obtaine their vow, nor durſt they have truſted it being obtained. If either diſpenſation with oathes, or equivocation in oathes, had beene knowne in the world, or at leaſt approved, theſe Gibeonites had not lived, & Iſrael had ſlaine them without ſinne: Either Iſrael wanted ſkill; or our reſervers, honeſty.

The multitude of Iſrael, when they came to the walls of theſe foure exempted Cities, itched to be at the ſpoile: Not out of a deſire to fulfill Gods cõmandement, but to enrich themſelves, would they have falne upon theſe Hivites; They thought all loſt that fell beſides their fingers. The wealthy City of Jericho was firſt altogether interdicted them; the wals and houſes either fell, or muſt be burnt; the men & cattell killed:

killed; the goods and treasure confiscate to God. Achans booty shewes, that City was both rich and proud: yet Israel might be no whit the better for them, carying away nothing but empty victory: and now foure other Cities must be exempted from their pillage. Many an envious looke did Israel therefore cast upon these wals; and many bitter words did they cast out against their Princes, the enemies of their gaine; whether for swearing, or for that they would not forsweare: But howsoever, the Princes might have said in a returne to their fraud, We swore indeed to you, but not the people: yet, if any Israelite had but pulled downe one stone from their wals, or shed one drop of Gibeonitish blood; he had no lesse plagued all Israel for perjury, than Achan had before plagued them for sacriledge. The sequell shewes how God would have taken it: For, when three hundred yeares after, Saul (perhaps forgetting the vow of his fore-fathers) slew some of these Gibeonites, although out of a well-meant zeale; all Israel smarted for the fact, with a three yeares famine, and that in Davids reigne, who received this Oracle from God; It is for Saul, and for his bloody house; because he slue the Gibeonites. Neither could this wrong be expiated, but by the blood of Sauls seven sonnes, hanged up at the very Court-gates of their father.

Ioshua and the Princes had promised them life, they promised them not liberty: no Covenant was past against their servitude. It was just therefore with the Rulers of Israel; to make slavery the price both of their lives, and their deceit. The Israelites had themselves beene drudges, if the Gibeonites had not beguiled them, and lived. The old rags therefore wherwith they came disguised, must now be their best suits, and their life must be toilesomely spent in hewing of wood, and drawing of water for all Israel. How deare is life to our nature, that men can be content to purchase it with servitude? It is the wisedome of Gods children to make good use of their over-sights. The rash oath of Israel proves their advantage: Even wicked men gaine by the outside of good actions: Good men make a benefit of their sinnes.

The Reſcue of GIBEON.

THe life of the Gibeonites muſt coſt them ſeruitude from Iſrael, and dangers from their neighbors: if Ioſhua will but ſit ſtill, the deceit of the Gibeonites ſhall be reuenged by his enemies. Fiue Kings are vp in Armes againſt them, and are ready to pay their fraud and violence. What ſhould theſe poore men do? If they make not their peace, they die by ſtrangers; if they doe make their peace with Forrainers, they muſt die by neighbors. There is no courſe that threatens not ſome danger: We haue ſped well, if our choice hath light vpon the eaſieſt inconuenience.

If theſe Hiuites haue ſinned againſt God, againſt Iſrael; yet what haue they done to their neighbours? I heare of no trechery, no ſecret information, no attempt. I ſee no ſinne but their league with Iſrael, and their life: yet (for ought we finde) they were freemen; no way either obliged, or obnoxious. As Satan, ſo wicked men cannot abide to loſe any of their community: If a Conuert come home, the Angels welcome him with ſongs, the Deuils follow him with vprore and fury, his old Partners, with ſcornes and obloquie.

I find theſe neighbour Princes halfe dead with feare, and yet they can find time to be ſicke of enuy. Malice in a wicked heart, is the King of paſſions: all other vaile and bow when it comes in place; euen their owne life was not ſo deare to them as reuenge. Who would not rather haue lookt, that theſe Kings ſhould haue tried to haue followed the coppie of this League? Or if their fingers did itch to fight, why did they not rather thinke of a defenſiue warre againſt Iſrael, than an offenſiue againſt the Gibeonites? Gibeon was ſtrong, and would not be wonne without bloud; yet theſe Amorites, which at their beſt were too weak for Iſrael, would ſpend their forces before hand on their Neighbors. Here was a ſtrong hatred in weake breſts: they feared, and yet began to fight; they feared Iſrael, yet began to fight with Gibeon. If they had ſate ſtill, their deſtruction had not been ſo ſudden: the malice of the wicked, haſtens the pace of their owne Iudgement. No rod is ſo fit for a miſchieuous man as his owne.

Gibeon, and theſe other Cities of the Hiuites, had no King: and none yeelded and eſcaped but they. Their elders conſulted before for their league; neither is there any challenge ſent to the King, but to the city: And now theſe fiue Kings of the Amorites haue vniuſtly compacted againſt them. Soueraignty abuſed, is a great ſpur to courage: the conceit of authority in great perſons, many times lies in the way of their own ſafety, whiles it wil not let them ſtoope to the ordinary courſes of inferiours. Hence it is, that heauen is peopled with ſo few Great ones: hence it is, that true contentment ſeldome dwels high; whiles meaner men of humble ſpirits, enioy both earth and heauen.

The Gibeonites had well proued, that though they wanted an Head, yet they wanted not wit; and now the same wit that wonne Ioshua and Israel to their friendship and protection, teacheth them to make vse of those they had wonne. If they had not more trusted Ioshua, than their wals, they had neuer stolne that League; and when should they haue vse of their new protectors, but now that they were assailed? Whither should we flie, but to our Ioshua, when the powers of darknes (like mighty Amorites) haue besieged vs? If euer we will send vp our prayers to him, it will be when we are beleagured with euils. If we trust to our owne resistance, wee cannot stand, we cannot miscarry, if we trust to his: in vaine shall wee send to our Ioshua in these straits, if we haue not before come to him in our freedome.

Which of vs would not haue thought Ioshua had a good pretence for his forbearance, and haue said, You haue stolne your League with me; why do you expect helpe from him whom ye haue deceiued? All that we promised you, was a sufferance to liue: enioy what we promised, we will not take your life from you. Hath your faithfulnesse deserued to expect more than our couenant? We neuer promised to hazard our liues for you, to giue you life with the losse of our owne. But that good man durst not construe his owne couenant to such an aduantage: he knew little difference betwixt killing them with his owne sword, and the sword of an Amorite: whosoeuer should giue the blow, the murder would be his. Euen permission in those things we may remedy, makes vs no lesse Actors than consent: some men kill as much by looking on, as others by smiting: We are guilty of all the euill we might haue hindred.

The noble disposition of Ioshua, besides his ingagement, will not let him forsake his new vassals: Their confidence in him, is argument enough to draw him into the Field. The greatest obligation to a good mind is anothers trust; which to disappoint, were mercilesly perfidious. How much lesse shall our true Ioshua faile the confidence of our faith? Oh, my Sauiour, if we send the messengers of our praiers to thee into thy Gilgal, thy mercy bindes thee to relieue: neuer any soule miscarried that trusted thee; wee may be wanting in our trust, our trust can neuer want successe.

Speed in bestowing, doubles a gift; a benefit deferred, loses the thankes, and proues vnprofitable. Ioshua matches all night and fights all day for the Gibeonites: They tooke not so much paines in comming to deceiue him, as hee in going to deliuer them. It is the noblest victory to ouercome euill with God: If his very Israelites had been in danger, he could haue done no more: God, and his Ioshua, make no difference betwixt Gibeonites, Israelites, and his owne naturall people. All are Israelites whom he hath taken to league: we strangers of the Gentiles, are now the true Iewes; God neuer did more for the naturall Oliue, than for that wild Impe which he hath grafted in. And as these Hiuites could neuer be thankfull enough to such a Ioshua; no more can we to so gracious a Redeemer, who forgetting our vnworthinesse, descended to our Gibeon, and rescued vs from the powers of hell and death.

Ioshua fought, but God discomfited the Amorites. The praise is to the workeman, not the instrument: Neither did God slay them onely with Ioshuas sword, but with his owne haile-stones; that now the Amorites may see both these reuenges come from one hand. These bullets of God doe not wound, but kill: It is no wonder that these fiue Kings fly; they may soone run away from their hope, neuer from their horror. If they looke behind, there is the sword of Israel, which they dare not turne vpon because God had their heart from them, before their life: If they looked vpwards there is the haile-shot of God fighting against them out of heauen; which they can neither resist, nor auoid.

If they had no enemy but Israel, they might hope to run away from death, sith feare is a better foorman, than desire of reuenge; but now whither-soeuer they run heauen will be about their heads: And now, al the reason that is left them in this confusion of their thoughts, is to wish themselues well dead; there is no euasion, where God intends a reuenge. We men haue deuised to imitate these instruments of death, and send forth dedly bullets out of a cloud of smoke, wherin yet as there is much danger;

so

so much vncertainty: but this God, that discharges his Ordnance from heauen, directs euery shot to an head, and can as easily kill as shoot. It is a fearefull thing to fall into the hands of the liuing God: he hath moe wayes of vengeance, than he hath creatures. The same heauen that sent foorth water to the old world, fire to the Sodomites, lightning and Thunder-bolts to the Egyptians, sends out haile-stones to the Amorites. It is a good care how we may not anger God; it is a vaine study how we may flie from his Iudgements, when we haue angred him; if we could run out of the world, euen there shall find his reuenges far greater.

Was it not miracle enough that God did braine their Aduersaries from heauen, but that the Sun and Moone must stand still in heauen? Is is not enough that the Amorites flie, but that the greatest Planets of heauen must stay their owne course, to witnes and wonder at the discomfiture? For him which gaue them both being and motion, to bid them stand still, it seemes no difficulty, although the rarenesse would deserue admiration: but for a man to command the chiefe stars of heauen (by whose influence he liueth) as the Centurian would do his seruant; Sun, stay in Gibeon and Moone stand still in Aialon, it is more than wonder. It was not Ioshua, but his faith that did this; not by way of precept but of prayer; If I may not say, that the request of a faithfull man (as we say of the great) commands. Gods glory was that which Ioshua aimed at: he knew that all the world must needs be witnesses of that, which the Eye of the world stood still to see. Had he respected but the slaughter of the Amorites, he knew the Haile-stones could doe that alone; the Sun needed not stand still to direct that cloud to persecute them; but the glory of the slaughter was sought by Ioshua, that he might send that vp, whence those Haile-stones and that victory came: All the earth might see the Sun and Moone; al could not see the Cloud of Haile, which because of that heauy burthen flew but low. That al Nations might know, the same hand commands both in Earth, in the Clouds in heauen, Ioshua now praies, that he which disheartned his enemies vpon earth, and smote them from the cloud, would stay the Sun and Moone in heauen. God neuer got himselfe so much honour by one dayes worke amongst the Heathen, and when was it more fit than now, when fiue Heathen Kings are banded against him.

The Sun and the Moone were the ordinary gods of the world: and who would not but thinke that their standing still but one houre, should be the ruine of nature? And now all Nations shall well see, that there is an higher than their highest, that their gods are but seruants to the God whom themselues should serue, at whose pleasure both they and nature shall stand at once. If that God which meant to worke this miracle, had not raised vp his thoughts to desire it, it had beene a blameable presumption, which now is a faith worthy of admiration. To desire a miracle without a cause, is a tempting of God. O powerfull God that can effect this! O power of faith that can obtaine it! What is there that God cannot doe? and what is there which God can doe, that faith cannot doe?

The Altar of the Reubenites.

Reuben and Gad were the first that had an inheritance assigned them; yet they must enioy it last: So it fals out oft in the heauenly Canaan, the first in Title are last in possession. They had their lot assigned them beyond Iordan; which though it were them in peace, must bee purchased with their war: that must bee done for their brethren, which needed not bee done for themselues: they must yet still fight, and fight for most, that as they had the first patrimonie, they might endure the first encounter. I doe not heare them say, This is our share, let vs sit downe, and inioy it quietly, fight who will for the rest: but when they knew their owne portion, they leaue wiues and children to take possession, seſſion, and march armed before their brethren; till they haue conquered all Canaan. Whether ſhould wee more commend their courage, or their charity? Others were moued to fight with hope; they only with loue: they could not win more, they might loſe themſelues; yet they will fight, both for that they had ſomething, and that their brethren might haue. Thankfulneſſe and loue can doe more with Gods children, than deſire to merit, or neceſſity: No true Iſraelite can (if hee might chuſe) abide to ſit ſtill beyond Iordan, when all his brethren are in the field. Now when all this warre of God was ended, and all Canaan is both won and diuided, they returne to their owne; yet not till they were diſmiſſed by Ioſhua: all the ſweet attractiues of their priuate loue cannot haſten their pace. If heauen be neuer ſo ſweet to vs, yet may we not runne from this earthen warfare, till our great captaine ſhall pleaſe to diſcharge vs. If theſe Reubenites had departed ſooner, they had been recalled, if not as cowards, ſurely as fugitiues; now they are ſent backe with victory and bleſſing. How ſafe and happy it is to attend both the call and the diſpatch of God!

Being returned in peace to their home, their firſt care is, not for Trophees, nor for houſes, but for an Altar to God; an Altar, not for ſacrifice, which had been abominable, but for a memoriall what God they ſerue. The firſt care of true Iſraelites, muſt be the ſafety of Religion; the world, as it is inferiour in worth, ſo muſt it be in reſpect: hee neuer knew God aright, that can abide any competition with his Maker.

The reſt of the Tribes no ſooner heare newes of their new Altar, but they gather to Shiloh, to fight againſt them: they had ſcarce breathed from the Canaanitiſh warre, and now they will goe fight with their brethren: if their brethren will (as they ſuſpected) turne Idolaters, they cannot hold them any other than Canaanites. The Reubenites and their fellowes had newly ſetled the reſt of Iſrael in their poſſeſſions, and now ere they can be warme in their ſeates, Iſrael is vp in Armes to thruſt them out of their owne. The hatred of their ſuſpected Idolatry, makes them forget either their bloud, or their benefits. Iſrael ſayes, Theſe men were the firſt in our battels, and ſhall be the firſt in our reuenge: they fought well for vs; we will try how they can fight for themſelues. What if they were our champions? Their reuolt from God hath loſt them the thanke of their former labours; their Idolatry ſhall make them of brethren, aduerſaries; their owne bloud ſhall giue hand ſell to their new Altar. O noble and religious zeale of Iſrael! Who would thinke theſe men the ſonnes of them that danced about the molten Calfe? That conſecrated an Altar to that Idoll? Now they are ready to die or kill, rather than endure an Altar without an Idoll? Euery ouerture in matter of Religion, is worthy of ſuſpition, worthy of our ſpeedy oppoſition: God lookes for an early redreſſe of the firſt beginnings of impiety. As in treaſons or mutinies, wiſe Stateſ-men find it ſafeſt to kill the ſerpent in the egge; ſo in motions of ſpirituall alterations, one ſpoonfull of water will quench that fire at the firſt, which afterwards whole buckets cannot abate.

Yet doe not theſe zealous Iſraelites run raſhly and furiouſly vpon their brethren, nor ſay, What need we expoſtulate? The fact is cleere: what care wee for words, when we ſee their Altar? What can this meane, but either ſeruice to a falſe god, or diuiſion in the ſeruice of the true? There can be no excuſe for ſo manifeſt a crime: why doe wee not rather thinke of puniſhment, than ſatisfaction? But they ſend ere they goe, & conſult ere they execute. Phineas the ſon of Elieazar the Prieſt, and ten Princes (for euery Tribe one) are addreſſed both to inquire and diſſwade; to inquire of the purpoſe of the fact; to diſſwade from that which they imagined was purpoſed. Wiſdome is a good guide to zeale, and onely can keepe it from running out into fury: If diſcretion doe not hold in the reines, good intentions will both breake their owne necks, and the riders: yea, which is ſtrange, without this, the zeale of God may lead vs from God.

Not onely wiſedome, but charity moued them to this meſſage. For, grant they had had been guilty, must they perish vnwarned? Peaceable meanes must first be vsed to recall them, ere violence be sent to persecute them. The old rule of Israel hath been still to inquire of Abel; No good shepheard sends his dog to pull out the throat of his straied sheepe, but rather fetches it on his shoulders to the fold. Sudden cruelty stands not with Religion: He which wil not himselfe break the bruised reed, how will he allow vs, either to bruise the whole, or to breake the bruised, or to burne the broken?

Neither yet was here more charity in sending, than vncharitableness in the misconstruction. They begin with a challenge, and charge their brethren deepely with transgression, apostasie, rebellion. I know not how two contrary qualities fall into loue; it is not naturally suspicious, and yet many times suggests iealous feares of those we affect. If these Israelites had not loued their brethren, they would neuer haue sent so farre to restraine them; they had neuer offered them part of their owne patrimony: if they had not been excessiuely iealous, they had not censured a doubtfull action so sharpely. They met at Shilo, where the Tabernacle was; but if they had consulted with the Arke of God, they had saued both this labour, and this challenge: This case seemed so plaine, that they thought aduice needlesse: Their inconsiderateness therefore brands their brethren with crimes whereof they were innocent; and makes themselues the onely offenders. In cases which are doubtfull and vncertaine, it is safe either to suspend the iudgement, or to passe it in fauour; otherwise, a plaine breach of charity in vs, shall be worse than a questionable breach of iustice in another.

Yet this little gleame of their vncharitable loue began at themselues; if they had not feared their owne iudgements in the offence of Reuben, I know not whether they had been so vehement: The fearefull reuenges of their brethrens sin are still in their eye. The wickednesse of Peor stretched not so farre as the plague; Achan sinned, and Israel was beaten: therefore by iust induction, they argue (Yee rebell to day against the Lord; to morrow will the Lord bee wroth with all the Congregation.) They still tremble at the vengeance passed; and finde it time to preuent their owne punishment in punishing their brethren. Gods proceedings haue then their right vse, when they are both carefully remembred, and made patterns of what he may doe.

Had these Reubenites been as hot in their answere, as the Israelites were in their charge, here had growne a bloudy warre out of mis-prision: But now their answer is mild and moderate, and such as well shewed, that though they were further from the Arke, yet no lesse neere to God. They thought in themselues, This act of ours, though it were well meant by vs, yet might well bee by interpretation scandalous; it is reason our mildnesse should giue satisfaction for that offence, which we haue not preuented. Hereupon their answer was as pleasing, as their act was dangerous. Euen in those actions whereby an offence may bee occasioned (though not giuen) charity bindes vs to cleare both our owne name, and the conscience of others.

Little did the Israelites looke for so good a ground of an action so suspicious; An Altar without a sacrifice? An Altar and no Tabernacle? An Altar without a precept, and yet not against God? It is not safe to measure all mens actions by our owne conceit, but rather to thinke there may be a further drift and warrant of their act, than we can attaine to see.

By that time the Reubenites haue commented vpon their owne worke, it appears as iustifiable, as before offensiue. What wisdome and religion is found in that Altar, which before shewed nothing but Idolatry? This discourse of theirs is full both of reason and piety; Wee are seuered by the riuer Iordan from their Tribes; perhaps hereafter, our choice may exclude vs from Israel: Posterity may peraduenture say, Iordan is the bounds of al natural Israelites; the streams wherof neuer gaue way to those beyond the riuer: If they had been ours, either in blood or religion, they would not haue been sequestred in habitation. Doubtlesse therefore these men are the theoff-ſpring of ſome ſtrangers, which by vicinity of abode, haue gotten ſome tincture of our language, manners, religion; What haue we to doe with them, what haue they to do with the Tabernacle of God? Sith therefore we may not either remoue Gods Altar to vs, or remoue our Patrimony to the altar; The Pattern of the Altar ſhall goe with vs, not for ſacrifice, but for memoriall; that both the poſterity of the other Iſralites may know, wee are no leſſe deriued from them, than this Altar from theirs; and that our poſterity may know, they pertaine to that Altar, whereof this is the reſemblance. There was no danger of the preſent; but poſterity might both offer and receiue preiudice, if this Monument were not. It is a wiſe and holy care to preuent the dangers of enſuing times, and to ſettle Religion vpon the ſucceeding generations. As we affect to leaue a perpetuity of our bodily iſſue, ſo much more to traduce piety with them. Do we not ſee good husbands ſet and plant thoſe trees, whereof their grand-children ſhall receiue the firſt fruit, and ſhade? Why are we leſſe thrifty in leauing true religion intire to our childrens children.

EHVD and EGLON.

AS euery man is guilty of his owne ſorrow, the Iſraelites bred miſchiefe to themſelues: It was their mercy that plagued them with thoſe Canaanites, which their obedience ſhould haue rooted out. If fooliſh pitty be a more humane ſinne, yet it is no leſſe dangerous than cruelty: Cruelty kils others, vniuſt pitty kills our ſelues. They had bin Lords alone of the promiſed land if their cõmiſeration had not ouer-ſwaied their iuſtice; and now their enemies are too cruell to them (in the iuſt reuenge of God) becauſe they were too mercifull. That God, which in his reuealed will had commanded all the Canaanites to the ſlaughter, yet ſecretly giues ouer Iſrael to a toleration of ſome Canaanites for their owne puniſhment. He hath bidden vs cleanſe our hearts of all our corruptions: yet he will permit ſome of theſe thornes ſtill in our ſides, for exerciſe, for humiliation. If wee could lay violent hands vpon our ſins, our ſoules ſhould haue peace; now our indulgence coſts vs many ſtripes: and many teares, what a continued circle is here of ſins, iudgements, repentance, deliuerances? The conuerſation with Idolaters, taints them with ſin, their ſin draws on iudgements, the ſmart of the iudgement moues them to repentance, vpon their repentance followes ſpeedy deliuerance, vpon their peace and deliuerance, they ſinne againe.

Othniel, Calebs nephew, had reſcued them from Idolatry and ſeruitude: his life and their innocence and peace ended together. How powerful the preſence of one good man is in a Church or State, is beſt found in his loſſe.

A man that is at once eminent in place and goodnes, is like a ſtake in a hedge; pull that vp, and all the reſt are but looſe and rotten ſticks, eaſily remoued: or like the piller of a vaulted roofe, which either ſupports, or ruines the building. Who would not think Idolatry an abſurd and vnnatural ſin? which as it hath the feweſt inducements, ſo had alſo the moſt direct inhibitions from God; and yet after all theſe warnings, Iſrael falls into it againe: neither affliction nor repentance can ſecure an Iſraelite, from redoubling the worſt ſinne, if hee be left to his owne frailty. It is no cenſuring of the truth of our preſent ſorrow, by the euent of a following miſ-carriage; The former cries of Iſrael to God were vnfained, yet their preſent wickedneſſe is abominable: Let him that thinks he ſtands, take heed leſt he fall.

No ſooner had he ſaid (Iſrael had reſt) but he ads, They committed wickednes: The ſecurity of any people is the cauſe of their corruption; ſtanding waters ſoone grow noiſome. Whiles they were exerciſed with war, how ſcrupulous were they of the leaſt intimation of Idolatry? the newes of a bare Altar beyond Iordan, drew them together for a reuenge; now they are at peace with their enemies, they are at variance with

A with God. It is both hard and happy not to be the worse with liberty; The sedentary life is most subiect to diseases.

Rather than Israel shall want a scourge for their sinne, God himselfe shall raise them vp an enemy: Moab had no quarrell but his owne ambition: but God meant by the ambition of the one part, to punish the Idolatry of the other; his iustice can make one sinne the executioner of another, whilest neither shall looke for any other measure from him, but Iudgement: The euil of the city is so his, that the instrument is not guiltles. Before, God had stirred vp the King of Syria against Israel; now, the King of Moab; afterwards, the King of Canaan: Hee hath more variety of Iudgements, than there can be offences; if we haue once made him our aduersary, hee
B shall bee sure to make vs aduersaries enough; which shall reuenge his quarrell, whilest they prosecute their owne.

Euen those were Idolaters, by whose hands God plagued the Idolatries of Israel. In Moab, the same wickednesse prospers, which in Gods owne people is punished: the Iustice of the Almighty can least brook euil in his own: the same heathen which prouoked Israel to sinne, shall scourge them for sinning. Our very profession hurts vs, if we be not innocent.

No lesse than eighteene yeeres did the rod of Moab rest vpon the inheritance of God: Israel seemes as borne to seruitude; they came from their bondage in the Land of Egypt, to serue in the Land of Promise: They had neglected God, now they are neglected of God; their sinnes haue made them seruants, whom the choice
C of God had made free, yea, his first borne. Worthy are they to serue those men, whose false gods they had serued; and to serue them alwaies in thraldome, whom they haue once serued in Idolatry. Wee may not measure the continuance of punishment, by the time of the commission of sinne; one minutes sin deserues a torment beyond all time.

Doubtlesse, Israel was not so insensible of their owne misery, as not to complaine sooner than the end of eighteene yeeres: The first houre they sighed for themselues, but now they cried vnto God. The very purpose of affliction is to make vs importunate: He that heares the secret murmurs of our griefe, yet will not seeme to heare vs, till our cries be loud and strong. God sees it best to let the penitent dwell for the time vnder their sorrowes; he sees vs sinking all the while,
D yet hee lets vs alone, till we be at the bottome: and when once wee can say, Out of the depths haue I cried to thee; instantly followes, The Lord heard me. A vehement suter cannot but bee heard of God, whatsoeuer he askes. If our prayers want successe, they want heart; their blessing is according to their vigour. Wee liue in bondage to these Spirituall Moabites, our owne corruptions. It discontents vs: but where are our strong cries vnto the God of Heauen? Where are our teares? If we could passionately bemoane our selues to him, how soone should wee be more than Conquerours? Some good motions wee haue to send vp to him, but they faint in the way. We may call long enough, if we cry not to him.

The same hand that raised vp Eglon against Israel, raised vp also Ehud for Israel, a-
E gainst Eglon: When that Tyrant hath reuenged God of his people, God will reuenge his people of him. It is no priuiledge to be an instrument of Gods vengeance by euill meanes. Though Eglon were an Vsurper, yet had Ehud been a Traitor, if God had not sent him: it is onely in the power of him that makes Kings, when they are once settled, to depose them. It is no more possible for our moderne butchers of Princes, to shew they are imployed by God, than to escape the reuenge of God in offering to doe this violence, not being imploied.

What a strange choice doth God make of an Executioner? A man shut of his right hand; either he had but one hand, or vsed but one, and that the worse, and the more vnready. Who would not haue thought both hands too little for such a worke, or, if either might haue beene spared, how much rather the left? God seeth not as man seeth: It is the ordinary wont of the Almighty, to make choice of the vnlikelieſt meanes.

The inſtruments of God muſt not be meaſured by their owne power, or aptitude; but by the will of the Agent. Though Ehud had no hands, he that imploied him, had enabled him to this ſlaughter. In humane things, it is good to looke to the means; in diuine, to the worker; No meanes are to be contemned that God will vſe, no meanes to be truſted that man will vſe without him.

It is good to be ſuſpicious where is leaſt ſhew of danger, and moſt appearance of fauour. This left-handed man comes with a preſent in his hand, but a dagger vnder his skirt. The Tyrant, beſides ſeruice, lookt for gifts; and now receiues death in his bribe: Neither God nor men doe alwaies giue where they loue. How oft doth God giue extraordinary illumination, power of miracles, beſides wealth and honor, where hee hates? So do men too oft accompany their curſes with preſents; either leaſt an enemy ſhould hurt vs, or that we may hurt them. The intention is the ſauour in gifts, and not the ſubſtance.

Ehuds faith ſupplies the want of his hand: Where God intends ſucceſſe, he lifts vp the heart with reſolutions of courage and contempt of danger. What indifferent beholder of this proiect would not haue condemned it, as vnlikely to ſpeed; To ſee a maimed man goe alone to a great King, in the middeſt of all this troopes; to ſingle him out from all witneſſes; to ſet vpon him with one hand in his owne parlor, where his Courtiers might haue heard the leaſt exclamation, and haue come in, if not to the reſcue, yet to the reuenge? Euery circumſtance is full of improbabilities; Faith euermore ouer-lookes the difficulties of the way, and bends her eyes onely to the certainty of the end. In this inteſtine ſlaughter of our tyrannicall corruptions, when we caſt our eyes vpon our ſelues, we might well deſpaire: Alaſſe, what can our left hands doe againſt theſe ſpirituall wickednesſes? But when wee ſee who hath both commanded, and vndertaken to proſper theſe Holy deſignes, how can we miſ-doubt the ſucceſſe? I can doe all things through him that ſtrengthens me.

When Ehud had obtained the conuenient ſecrecy both of the weapon and place; now with a confident forehead he approaches the Tyrant, and ſalutes him, with a true and awefull preface to ſo important an act: I haue a meſſage to thee from God. Euen Ehuds poynard was Gods meſſage; not onely the vocall admonitions, but alſo the reall Iudgements of God, are his errands to the world. He ſpeaks to vs in raine and waters, in ſickneſſes and famin, in vnſeaſonable times and inundations: Theſe are the ſecondary meſſages of God; if wee will not heare the firſt, we muſt heare theſe to our coſt.

I cannot but wonder at the deuout reuerence of this Heathen Prince: he ſate in his Chaire of State; the vnweildineſſe of his fat body was ſuch, that he could not riſe with readines and eaſe: yet no ſooner doth he heare newes of a meſſage from God, but hee riſes vp from his throne, and reuerently attends the tenor thereof: Though he had no ſuperiour to controll him, yet he cannot abide to be vnmannerly in the buſineſſe of God.

This man was an Idolater, a Tyrant: yet what outward reſpects doth he giue to the true God? Externall ceremonies of piety, and complements of deuotion, may well be found with falſhood in Religion. They are a good ſhaddow of truth where it is: but where it is not, they are the very body of hypocriſie. He that had riſen vp in Armes againſt Gods people, and the true worſhip of God, now riſes vp in reuerence to his Name. God would haue liked well to haue had leſſe of his courteſie, more of his obedience.

He lookt to haue heard the meſſage with his eares, and he feeles it in his guts; ſo ſharpe a meſſage, that it pierced the body, and let out the ſoule through that vncleane paſſage: neither did it admit of any anſwer, but ſilence and death. In that part had hee offended by pampering it, and making it his god; and now his bane findes the ſame way with his ſin.

This one hard and cold morſell, which hee cannot digeſt, paies for all thoſe glut-

A gluttonous delicates, whereof he had formerly surfetted. It is the manner of God, to take fearefull reuenges of the professed enemies of his Church.

It is a maruell, that neither any noyse in his dying, nor the fall of so grosse a body, called in some of his attendants: But that God, which hath intended to bring about any designe, disposes of all circumstances to his owne purpose. If Ehud had not come forth with a calme and setled countenance, and shut the doores after him, all his proiect had beene in the dust. What had it beene better that the King of Moab was slaine, If Israel had neither had a messenger to informe, nor a Captaine to guide them? Now he departs peaceably, and blowes a Trumpet in mount Ephraim; gathers Israel, and falls vpon the body of Moab, as well as hee had done vpon the head, and procures freedome to his
B people. He that would vndertake great enterprises, had need of wisdome, and courage; wisedome to contriue, and courage to execute; wisedome to guide his courage, and courage to second his wisedome: both which, if they meet with a good cause, cannot but succeed.

IAEL and SISERA.

IT is no wonder if they who ere foure-score daies after the Law deliuered, fell to Idolatry alone, now after foure-score yeeres since the Law restored, fell to Idolatry among the Canaanites. Peace could in a shorter time worke looseneſſe in any people. And if forty yeeres after
C Othniels deliuerance, they relapsed, what maruell is it that in twice forty after Ehud, they thus miscarried? What are they the better to haue killed Eglon, the King of Moab, if the Idolatry of Moab haue killed them? The sinne of Moab shall be found a worse Tyrant than their Eglon. Israel is for euery market; they sold themselues to Idolatry, God sells them to the Canaanites; it is no maruell they are slaues, if they will be Idolaters. After their longest intermission, they haue now the sorest bondage. None of their Tyrants were so potent, as Iabin with his nine hundred Chariots of yron. The longer the reckoning is deferred, the greater is the summe: God prouides on purpose mighty Aduersaries for his Church, that their humiliation may be the greater in sustaining, and his glory may be grea-
D ter in deliuerance.

I doe not finde any Prophet in Israel during their sinne; but so soone as I heare newes of their repentance, mention is made of a Propheteſſe, and Iudge of Israel. There is no better signe of Gods reconciliation, than the sending of his holy messengers to any people: He is not vtterly falne out with those whom he blesses with prophecy. Whom yet doe I see raised to this honour? Not any of the Princes of Israel; not Barac the Captaine; not Lapidoth the husband; but a woman for the honour of her sex; a wife for the honour of wedlocke: Deborah the wife of Lapidoth.

Hee that had choice of all the millions of Israel; culls out two weake women, to deliuer his people, Deborah shall iudge, Iael shall execute. All the Palaces of Israel must yeeld to the Palme-tree of Deborah; The weakneſſe of the instruments, re-
E dounds to the greater honour of the Workeman. Who shall aske God any reason of his elections, but his owne pleasure? Deborah was to sentence, not to strike; to command, not to execute: this act is masculine, fit for some Captaine of Israel; Shee was the Head of Israel, it was meet some other should be the hand: It is an imperfect and titular gouernment, where there is a commanding power, without correction, without execution. The message of Deborah finds out Barac the son of Abinoam, in his obscure secrecy, and calls him from a corner of Nepthali, to the honour of this exploit. He is sent for, not to get the victory, but to take it; not to ouercome, but to kill; to pursue, and not to beat Sisera. Who could not haue done this worke, whereto not much courage, no skill belonged? Yet euen for this, will God haue an instrument of his owne choice: It is most fit that God should serue himselfe where hee liſt, of his owne, neither is it to be inquired, whom wee thinke meet for any imployment; but whom God hath called. A

Deborah had beene no Propheteſſe, if ſhe durſt haue ſent in her owne name; Her meſſage is from him that ſent her ſelfe, Hath not the Lord God of Iſrael commanded? Baracs anſwer is faithfull, though conditionate; and doth not ſo much intend a refuſall to goe without her, as a neceſſary bond of her preſence with him. Who can blame him that hee would haue a Propheteſſe in his company? If the man had not beene as holy as valiant, he would not haue wiſhed ſuch ſociety. How many thinke it a perpetuall bondage to haue a Prophet of God at their elbow? God had neuer ſent for him ſo farre, if he could haue been content to goe vp without Deborah; He knew that there was both a bleſſing, and incouragement in that preſence. It is not putting any truſt in the ſucceſſe of thoſe men, that neglect the meſſengers of God. B

To preſcribe that to others, which we draw backe from doing our ſelues, is an argument of hollowneſſe and falſity: Barac ſhall ſee that Deborah doth not offer him that cup whereof ſhe dare not begin; without regard of her ſex, ſhe marches with him to Mount Tabor, and reioyces to be ſeene of the ten thouſand of Iſrael. With what ſcorne did Siſera looke at the gleanings of Iſrael? How vnequall did this match ſeeme of ten thouſand Iſraelites againſt his three hundred thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, nine hundred chariots of yron? And now in breuity, hee calls for his troops, and meanes to kill this handfull of Iſrael with the very ſight of his piked chariots; and only feared, it would be no victory to cut the throats of ſo few. The faith of Deborah and Barac was not appalled with this world of Aduerſaries, which from Mount Tabor they ſaw hiding all the valley below them; they knew whom they had beleeued, and how little an army of fleſh could doe againſt the God of Hoſts. C

Barac went downe againſt Siſera, but it was God that deſtroyed him. The Iſraelites did not this day weild their owne ſwords, leſt they ſhould arrogate any thing; God told them before-hand, it ſhould be his owne act. I heare not of one ſtroke that any Canaanite gaue in this fight; as if they were called hither only to ſuffer. And now proud Siſera, after many curſes of the heauineſſe of that yron carriage, is glad to quit his Chariot, and betake himſelfe to his heeles. Who euer yet knew any earthly thing truſted in, without diſappointment? It is wonder if God make vs not at laſt as weary of whatſoeuer hath ſtolne our hearts from him, as euer we were fond.

Yet Siſera hopes to haue ſped better than his followers, in ſo ſeaſonable an harbour of Iael. If Heber and Iael had not beene great perſons, there had beene no note taken of their Tents; there had beene no league betwixt King Iabin and them: Now, their greatneſſe makes them knowne, their league makes them truſted. The diſtreſſe of Siſera might haue made him importunate, but Iael begins the courteſie, and exceeds the deſire of her gueſt: He askes water to drinke, ſhe giues him milke; he wiſhes but ſhelter, ſhe makes him a bed; he deſires the protection of her Tent, ſhe couers him with a mantle. And now Siſera pleaſes himſelfe with this happy change, and thinkes how much better it is to be here, than in that whirling of chariots, in that horrour of flight, amongſt thoſe ſhrikes, thoſe wounds, thoſe carcaſſes. Whiles he is in theſe thoughts, his wearineſſe and eaſie repoſall hath brought him aſleepe. Who would haue looked that in this tumult and danger, euen betwixt the very iawes of death, Siſera ſhould find time to ſleepe? how many worldly hearts doe ſo in the middeſt of their ſpirituall perills? D E

Now, whiles he was dreaming, doubtleſſe, of the claſhing of armors, ratling of chariots, neighing of horſes, the clamor of the conquerd, the furious purſuit of Iſrael, Iael ſeeing his temples lie ſo faire, as if they inuited the naile & hammer, entred into the thought of this noble execution, certainly not without ſome checks of doubt, and pleas of feare: What if I ſtrike him? And yet who am I, that I ſhould dare to thinke of ſuch an act? Is not this Siſera, the famouſeſt Captaine of the world, whoſe name hath wont to be fearefull to whole Nations? What if my hand ſhould ſwarue in the ſtroke? What if he ſhould awake, whiles I am lifting vp this inſtrument of death: What if I ſhould be ſurpriſed by ſome of his followers whiles the fact is greene,

and

A and yet bleeding? Can the murther of ſo great a Leader be hid, or vnreuenged? Or if I might hope ſo, yet can my heart allow mee to be ſecretly treacherous? Is there not peace betwixt my ſoule and him? Did not I inuite him to my Tent? Doth hee not truſt to my friendſhip and hoſpitality? But what doe theſe weake feares, theſe idle fancies of ciuility? If Siſera be in league with vs, yet is hee not at defiance with God? Is hee not a Tyrant to Iſrael? Is it for nothing that God hath brought him into my Tent? May I not now finde meanes to repay vnto Iſrael all their kindneſſe to my Grand-father, Iethro? Doth not God offer mee this day, the honour to be the reſcuer of his people? Hath God bidden me ſtrike, and ſhall I hold my hand? No, Siſera, ſleepe now thy laſt, and take here this fatall reward of all thy cruelty and oppreſſion.

B Hee that put this inſtinct into her heart, did put alſo ſtrength into her hand; Hee that guided Siſera to her Tent, guided the nayle thorow his temples; which hath made a ſpeedy way for his ſoule thorow thoſe parts, and now hath faſtened his eare ſo cloſe to the earth, as if the body had beene liſtening what was become of the ſoule. There lies now the great terrour of Iſrael at the foot of a woman: Hee that brought ſo many hundred thouſands into the field, hath not now one Page left, either to auert his death, or to accompany it, or bewaile it: Hee that had vaunted of his yron chariots, is ſlaine by one nayle of yron, wanting onely this one point of his infelicity, that hee knowes not by whoſe hand hee periſhed.

GIDEONS calling.

THe iudgements of God, ſtill the further they goe, the ſorer they are; the bondage of Iſrael vnder Iabin was great, but it was freedome in compariſon of the yoke of the Midianites. During the former tyranny, Deborah was permitted to iudge Iſrael vnder a Palme-tree; Vnder this, not ſo much as priuate habitations will be allowed to Iſrael. Then the ſeat of iudgement was in ſight of the Sunne; now, their very dwellings muſt be ſecret vnder the earth. They that reiect the protection of God, are glad to ſeeke to the mountaines for ſhelter; and as they had ſauagely abuſed themD ſelues, ſo they are faine to creepe into dens and caues of the rocks, like wilde creatures for ſafegard: God had ſowne ſpirituall ſeede amongſt them, and they ſuffered their heatheniſh neighbours to pull it vp by the roots; and now, no ſooner can they ſowe their materiall ſeed, but Midianites and Amalekites are ready by force to deſtroy it. As they inwardly dealt with God, ſo God deales outwardly by them; Their eyes may tell them what their ſoules haue done: yet that God, whoſe mercy is aboue the worſt of our ſinnes, ſends forth his Prophet with a meſſage of reproofe, and then his Angell with a meſſage of deliuerance. The Iſraelites had ſmarted enough with their ſeruitude, yet God ſends them a ſharpe rebuke: It is a good ſigne when God chides vs, his round reprehenſions are euer gracious forerunners of mercy: whereas his ſilent conniuence at the wicked, argues deepe and ſeE cret diſpleaſure: the Prophet made way for the Angell, reproofe for deliuerance, humiliation for comfort.

Gideon was threſhing Wheat by the Wine-preſſe. Yet Iſrael hath both Wheat and Wine, for all the incurſions of their enemies. The worſt eſtate out of hell, hath either ſome comfort, or at leaſt, ſome mitigation; in ſpight of the malice of the world, God makes ſecret prouiſion for his owne. How ſhould it be, but he that ownes the earth, and all creatures, ſhould reſerue euer a ſufficiency from forrainers (ſuch the wicked are) for his houſhold? In the worſt of the Midianatiſh tyranny, Gideons field and barne are priuiledged, as his fleece was afterwards from the ſhowre.

Why did Gideon threſh out his corne? To hide it; Not from his neighbours, but his enemies: his granary might eaſily be more cloſe than his barne. As then, Iſraelites threshed out their corne, to hide it from the Midianites: but now, Midianites thresh out corne, to hide it from the Israelites. The rurall Tyrants of our time, doe not more lay vp corne than curses. hee that with-draweth corne, the people will curse him; yea, God will curse him, with them, and for them.

What shifts nature will make to liue! Oh that wee could be so carefull to lay vp spirituall food for our soules, out of the reach of those spirituall Midianites, wee could not but liue in despight of all aduersaries.

The Angells, that haue euer God in their face, and in their thoughts, haue him also in their mouthes: The Lord is with thee. But this which appeareth vnto Gideon, was the Angell of the Couenant, the Lord of Angells. Whiles he was with Gideon, hee might well say, The Lord is with thee. Hee that sent the Comforter, was also the true Comforter of the Church: He well knew how to lay a sure ground of consolation, and that the onely remedy of sorrow, and beginning of true ioy, is, The presence of God. The greife of the Apostles for the expected losse of their Master, could neuer be cured by any receit but this, of the same Angell, Behold, I am with you to the end of the world. What is our glory, but the fruition of Gods presence: The punishment of the Damned, is a separation from the beatificall face of God; needes must therefore his abscence in this life be a great torment to a good heart: and no crosse can be equiualent to this beginning of heauen in the Elect, The Lord is with thee.

Who can complaine either of solitarinesse or of opposition, that hath God with him? With him, not only as a witnesse, but as a party: Euen wicked men and diuells cannot exclude God, not the barres of hell can shut him out: he is with them perforce, but to iudge, to punish them: yea, God will be euer with them to their cost; but to protect, comfort, saue, hee is with none but his.

Whiles he calls Gideon valiant, he make him so. How could he be but valiant, that had God with him? The godlesse man may be careless, but cannot be other than cowardly. It pleases God to acknowledge his owne graces in men, that he may interchange his owne glory, with their comfort; how much more should we confesse the graces of one another? An enuious nature is preiudiciall to God; hee is a strange man in whom there is not some visible good; yea, in the Diuells themselues we may easily note some commendable parts, of knowledge, strength, agility: Let God haue his owne in the worst creature; yea, let the worst creature haue that praise which God would put vpon it.

Gideon cannot passe ouer this salutation, as some fashionable complement, but laies hold on that part, which was most important; the tennure of all his comfort; and (as not regarding the praise of his valour) inquires after that which should be the ground of his valour, the presence of God: God had spoken particularly to him; he expostulates for all. It had been possible God should be present with him, not with the rest; as he promised to haue been with Moses, not Israel: and yet when God saies, The Lord is with thee, he answers, Alas Lord, if the Lord be with vs. Gideon cannot conceiue of himselfe as an exempt person; but puts himselfe among the throng of Israel, as one that could not be sensible of any particular comfort, while the common case of Israel laboured. The maine care of a good heart is still for the publike, neither can it inioy it selfe, while the Church of God is distressed. As faith drawes home generalities, so charity diffuses generalities from it selfe to all.

Yet the valiant man was here weake, weake in faith, weake in discourse; whiles he argues Gods abscence by affliction, his presence by deliuerances, and the vnlikelihood of successe by his owne disability; all grosse inconsequences: rather should he haue inferred Gods presence vpon their correction; for whersoeuer God chastises, there he is, yea, there he is in mercy. Nothing more proues vs his, than his stripes; he will not bestow whipping where he loues not. Fond nature thinkes God should not suffer the wind to blow vpon his deare ones, because her selfe makes this vse of her owne indulgence; but none out of the place of torment, haue suffered so much as his deerest children. He saies not we are Idolaters; therefore the Lord hath forsaken

A saken vs, becauſe wee haue forſaken him : This ſequell had beene as good, as the other was faulty ; (The Lord hath deliuered vs vnto the Midianites, therefore hee hath forſaken vs :) Sinnes, not afflictions, argue God abſent.

Whiles Gideon bewrayeth weakneſſe, God both giues him might, and imploies it; (Goe in this thy might, and ſaue Iſrael.) Who would not haue looked that God ſhould haue looked angerly on him, and chid him for his vnbeleefe? but hee whoſe mercy will not quench the weakeſt fire of grace, though it be but in flax, lookes vpon him with compaſſionate eyes; and to make good his owne Word, giues him that valour hee had acknowledged.

Gideon had not yet ſaid, Lord, deliuer Iſrael: much leſſe had he ſaid, Lord, deliuer Iſrael by my hand. The mercy of God preuents the deſire of Gideon: If God ſhould not
B begin with vs, wee ſhould be euer miſerable; If he ſhould not giue vs till we aske, yet who ſhould giue vs to aske; If his Spirit did not worke thoſe holy grones and ſighes in vs, we ſhould neuer make ſuite to God. He that cõmonly giues vs power to craue, ſometimes giues vs without crauing, that the benefit might be ſo much more welcome, by how much leſſe it was expected, and we ſo much more thankfull, as he is more forward. When he bids vs aske, it is not for that he needs to be intreated; but that he may make vs more capable of bleſſings by deſiring him: And where he ſees feruent deſires, he ſtaies not for words; and hee that giues ere wee aske, how much more will hee giue when wee aske?

He that hath might enough to deliuer Iſrael, yet hath not might enough to keepe himſelfe from doubting. The ſtrongeſt faith will euer haue ſome touch of infidelic
C ty. And yet this was not ſo much a diſtruſt of the poſſibility of deliuering Iſrael, as an inquiry after the meanes; Whereby ſhall I ſaue Iſrael? The ſalutation of the Angel to Gideon, was as like Gabriels ſalutation of the bleſſed Virgin, as their anſwers were like: Both Angells brought newes of deliuerance, both were anſwered with a queſtion of the meanes of performance; with a report of the difficulties in performing: Ah my Lord, whereby ſhall I ſaue Iſrael! How the good man diſparages himſelfe! It is a great matter (O Lord) that thou ſpeakeſt of, and great actions require mighty Agents: As for me, who am I? My Tribe is none of the greateſt in Iſrael; My fathers family is one of the meaneſt in his Tribe, and I the meaneſt in his family; Pouerty is a ſufficient barre to great enterpriſes.

Whereby ſhall I? Humility is both a ſigne of following glory, and a way to it, and an D occaſion of it: Bragging and height of ſpirit will not carry it with God: None haue euer been raiſed by him, but thoſe which haue formerly deiected themſelues: None haue been confounded by him, that haue been abaſed in themſelues. Thereupon it is that he addes; I will therefore be with thee; as if he had anſwered, Hadſt thou not been ſo poore in thy ſelfe, I would not haue wrought by thee. How ſhould God be magnified in his mercies, if wee were not vnworthy? How ſhould hee be ſtrong, if not in our weakneſſe?

All this while, Gideon knew not it was an Angell that ſpake with him; He ſaw a man ſtand before him like a Traueller, with a ſtaffe in his hand. The vnuſualneſſe of thoſe reuelations in thoſe corrupted times was ſuch, that Gideon might thinke of any thing rather than an Angell: No maruell if ſo ſtrange a promiſe from an vnknowne
E meſſenger found not a perfect aſſent; Faine would he beleeue, but faine would hee haue good warrant for his faith. In matters of faith, wee cannot goe vpon ſo ſure grounds. As Moſes therefore being ſent vpon the ſame errand, deſired a ſigne whereby Iſrael might know that God ſent him: So Gideon deſires a ſigne from the Bearer, to know that his newes is from God.

Yet the very hope of ſo happy newes, not yet ratified, ſtirres vp in Gideon both ioy and thankfulneſſe. After all the iniury of the Midianites, hee was not ſo poore, but hee could beſtow a Kid and cakes vpon the Reporter of ſuch tidings. Thoſe which are rightly affected with the glad newes of our ſpirituall deliuerance, ſtudy to ſhew their louing reſpects to the meſſengers.

The Angell ſtaies for the preparing of Gideons feaſt. Such pleaſure doth God take in the thankfull indeauours of his seruants, that he patiently waites vpon the leisure of our performances. Gideon intended a dinner, the Angell turned it into a sacrifice. Hee, whose meat and drinke it was to doe his Fathers will, calls for the broth and flesh to be powred out vpon the stone; And when Gideon look'd he should haue blessed, and eaten, he touches the feast with his staffe, and consumes it with fire from the stone, and departed. Hee did not strike the stone with his staffe (for the attrition of two hard bodies would naturally beget fire) but he touched the meat, and brought fire from the stone: And now, whiles Gideon saw and wondered at the spirituall act; he lost the sight of the Agent.

Hee that came without intreating, would not haue departed without taking leaue; but that he might increase Gideons wonder, and that his wonder might increase his faith. His salutation therefore was not so strange, as his farewell. Moses touched the rocke with his staffe, and brough forth water, and yet a man, and yet continued with the Israelites. This messenger touched the stone with his staffe, and brings forth fire, and presently vanishes, that hee may approue himselfe a spirit. And now Gideon, when he had gathered vp himselfe, must needs thinke, Hee that can raise fire out of a stone, can raise courage and power out of my dead brest; He that by this fire hath consumed the broth and flesh, can by the feeble flame of my fortitude consume Midian.

Gideon did not so much doubt before, as now he feared. Wee that shall once liue with, and be like the Angells, in the estate of our impotency thinke, wee cannot see an Angell, and liue. Gideon was acknowledged for mighty in valour, yet hee trembles at the sight of an Angell. Peter, that durst draw his sword vpon Malchus, and all the traine of Iudas, yet feares when hee thought hee had seene a spirit. Our naturall courage cannot beare vs out against spirituall obiects. This Angell was homely and familiar, taking vpon him for the time, a resemblance of that flesh whereof he would afterwards take the substance; yet euen the valiant Gideon quakes to haue seene him: How awefull and glorious is the God of Angells, when hee will be seene in the state of Heauen!

The Angell that departed for the wonder, yet returnes for the comfort of Gideon; It is not the wont of God to leaue his children in a maze, but hee brings them out in the same mercy which led them in, and will magnifie his grace in the one, no lesse than his power in the other.

Now Gideon growes acquainted with God, and enterchanges pledges of familiarity; Hee builds an Altar to God, and God conferres with him; and (as hee vses where hee loues) imployes him. His first taske must be to destroy the god of the Midianites, then the Idolaters themselues. Whiles Baals Altar and groue stood in the hill of Ophrah, Israel should in vaine hope to preuaile: It is most iust with God, that iudgement should continue with the sinne, and no lesse mercy, if it may remoue after it. Wouldest thou faine be rid of any iudgement? Inquire what false Altars and groues thou hast in thy heart! downe with them first.

First must Baals altar be ruined, ere Gods be built, both may not stand together; The true God will haue no society with Idolls, neither will allow it vs. I doe not heare him say, That Altar and groue which were abused to Baal, consecrate now to mee; but as one whose holy iealousie will abide no worship till there be no Idolatry, he first commands down the monuments of superstition, and then inioines his owne seruice; yet the wood of Baals groue must be vsed to burne a sacrifice vnto God: When it was once cut downe, Gods detestation and their danger ceased. The good creatures of God that haue beene profaned to Idolatry, may, in a change of their vse, be imploied to the holy seruice of their Maker.

Though some Israelites were penitent vnder this humiliation, yet still many of them persisted in their wonted idolatry. The very household of Gideons father were stil Baalites, and his neighbours of Ophrah were in the same sin: yea, if his father had bin free, what did he with Baals groue and Altar? He dares not therefore take his fathers seruants, though hee tooke his Bullocks, but commands his owne. The Master is best beſt ſeene in the ſeruants: Gideons ſeruants (amongſt the Idolatrous retinue of Ioaſh) are religious, like their Maſter; yet the miſ-deuotion of Ioaſh, and the Ophrathites was not obſtinate. Ioaſh is eaſily perſwaded by his ſonnes, and eaſily perſwades his neighbours how vnreaſonable it is to plead for ſuch a god as cannot ſpeake for him ſelfe; to reuenge his cauſe, that could not defend himſelfe. Let Baal plead for himſelfe. One example of a reſolute on-ſet in a noted perſon, may doe more good than a thouſand ſeconds in the proceeding of an action.

Soone are all the Midianites in an vprore to loſe their god; They need not now be bidden to muſter themſelues for reuenge. Hee hath no Religion that can ſuffer an indignity offered to his God.

GIDEONS Preparation and Victory.

OF all the inſtruments that God did vſe in ſo great a worke, I find none ſo weake as Gideon, who yet (of all others) was ſtiled valiant: naturall valour may well ſtand with ſpirituall cowardiſe. Before he knew that he ſpake with a God, he might haue iuſt colours for his diſtruſt; but after God had approued his preſence, and Almighty power, by fetching fire out of the ſtone, then, to call for a watery ſigne of his promiſed deliuerance, was no other, than to power water vpon the fire of the Spirit. The former triall God gaue vnwiſhed; this, vpon Gideons choice and intreaty: The former miracle was ſtrong enough to carry Gideon thorow his firſt exploit of ruinating the Idolatrous Groue, and Altar; but now when he ſaw the ſwarme of the Midianites and Amalekites about his eares, he calls for new aid, and now truſting to his Abiezrites, and his other thouſands of Iſrael, hee runnes to God for a further aſſurance of victory.

The refuge was good, but the manner of ſeeking it, ſauours of diſtruſt. There is nothing more eaſie than to be valiant when no perill appeareth; but when euills aſſaile vs vpon equall termes, it is hard, and commendable, not to be diſmayed. If God had made that proclamation now, which afterwards was commanded, to be made by Gideon, Let the timerous depart; I doubt whether Iſrael had not wanted a Guide: yet how willing is the Almighty to ſatisfie our weake deſires!

What tasks is He content to be ſet by our infirmity? The fleece muſt be wet, and the ground dry; the ground muſt be wet, and the fleece dry: Both are done; that now Gideon may ſee whether he would make himſelfe hard earth, or yeelding wooll. God could at pleaſure diſtinguiſh betwixt him, and the Midianites, and powre downe either mercies or iudgement where he liſts, and that hee was ſet on worke by that God which can command all the Elements, and they obey him. Fire, water, earth, ſerue both him (and when he will) his.

And now, when Gideon had his reciprocall proofe of his inſuing ſucceſſe, he goes on (as hee well may) harneſſed with reſolution, and is ſeene in the head of his troopes, and in the face of the Midianites. If we cannot make vp the match with God, when wee haue our owne asking, wee are worthy to ſit out.

Gideon had but thirty two thouſand ſouldiers at his heeles; the Midianites couered all the valley, like Graſhoppers: and now, whiles the Iſraelites thinke, Wee are too few; God ſayes, The people are too many. If the Iſraelites muſt haue looked for victory from their fingers, they might well haue ſaid, The Midianites are too many for vs: but that God whoſe thoughts and words are vnlike to mens, ſayes, They are too many for mee to giue the Midianites into their hands. If humane ſtrength were to be oppoſed, there ſhould haue needed an equality; but now, God meant to giue the victory, his care is not how to get it, but how to loſe or blemiſh the glory of it gotten. How ielous God is of his honour! Hee is willing to giue deliuerance to Iſrael, but the praiſe of the deliuerance hee will keepe to himſelfe, and will ſhorten the meanes, that he may haue the full meaſure of the glory. And if hee will not allow lawfull meanes to ſtand in the light of his honour, how will he indure it to be croſſed ſo much as indirectly: It is leſſe danger to ſteale any thing from God, than his glory.

As a Prince, which if wee ſteale, or clip his coyne, may pardon it; but if wee goe about to rob him of his Crowne, will not be appeaſed. There is nothing that wee can giue to God, of whom wee receiue all things; that which hee is content to part with, hee giues vs; but hee will not abide we ſhould take ought from him which hee would reſerue for himſelfe. It is all one with him to ſaue with many, as with few; but hee rather chuſes to ſaue by few, that all the victory may redound to himſelfe. O God, what art thou the better for our praiſes, to whom, becauſe thou art infinite, nothing can be added? It is for our good that thou wouldeſt be magnified of vs; Oh teach vs to receiue the benefit of thy mercifull fauours, and to returne thee the thankes.

Gideons Army muſt be leſſened, Who are ſo fit to be caſhiered as the fearefull? God bids him therefore proclaime licence for all faint hearts to leaue the field. An ill inſtrument may ſhame a good worke: God will not glorifie himſelfe by cowards. As the timorous ſhall be without the gates of heauen, ſo ſhall they be without the liſts of Gods field. Although it was not their courage that ſhould ſaue Iſrael, yet without their courage, God would not ſerue himſelfe of them. Chriſtianity requires men, for if our ſpirituall difficulties meet not with high ſpirits, in ſteed of whetting our fortitude, they quaile it. Dauids royall Band of Worthies, was the type of the forces of the Church, all valiant men, and able to incounter with thouſands.

Neither muſt we be ſtrong onely, but acquainted with our owne reſolutions, not out of any carnall preſumption, but out of a faithfull reliance vpon the ſtrength of God, in whom when we are weake, then we are ſtrong. Oh thou white-liuer! doth but a foule word or a frowne ſcare thee from Chriſt? Doth the loſſe of a little land, or ſiluer diſquiet thee? Doth but the ſight of the Midianites in the valley ſtrike thee? Home then, home to the world; thou art not then for the conquering Band of Chriſt: If thou canſt not reſolue to follow him through infamy, priſons, racks, iybbets, flames; depart to thine houſe, and ſaue thy life to thy loſſe.

Me thinks now, Iſrael ſhould haue complained of indignity, and haue ſaid, Why ſhouldſt thou thinke, O Gideon, that there can be a cowardly Iſraelite? And if the experience of the power and mercy of God, be not enough to make vs feareleſſe, yet the ſenſe of ſeruitude muſt needs haue made vs reſolute; for who had not rather to be buried dead, than quick? Are we not faine to hide our heads in the caues of the earth, and to make our graues our houſes? Not ſo much as the very light that we can freely inioy; the tyranny of death is but ſhort and eaſie, to this of Midian: and yet what danger can there be of that, ſith thou haſt ſo certainly aſſured vs of Gods promiſe of victory, and his miraculous confirmation? No, Gideon, thoſe hearts that haue brought vs hither after thy colours, can as well keepe vs from retiring.

But now, who can but bleſſe himſelfe, to find of two and thirty thouſand Iſraelites, two and twenty thouſand cowards? Yet all theſe in Gideons march, made as faire a flouriſh of courage as the boldeſt. Who can truſt the faces of men, that ſees in the Army of Iſrael, aboue two for one timorous? How many make a glorious ſhew in the warfaring Church, which, when they ſhall ſee danger of perſecution, ſhall ſhrink from the Standard of God? Hope of ſafety, examples of neighbours, deſire of praiſe, feare of cenſures, coaction of lawes, fellowſhip of friends, draw many into the field; which ſo ſoone as euer they ſee the Aduerſary, repent of their conditions: and if they may cleanly eſcape, will be gone early from Mount Gilead. Can any man be offended at the number of theſe ſhrinkers, when he ſees but ten thouſand Iſraelites left of two and thirty thouſand in a morning?

Theſe men that would haue beene aſhamed to goe away by day, now drop away by night: And if Gideon ſhould haue called any one of them backe, and ſaid, Wilt thou flie? would haue made an excuſe; The darkneſſe is a fit vaile for their paleneſſe,

or

A or blushing; fearefulnes cannot abide the light: None of these thousands of Israel but would haue bin loth Gideon should haue seen his face, whiles he said, I am fearefull. Very shame hold some in their station, whose hearts are already fled. And if we cánot endure that men should be witnesses of that feare which we might liue to correct, how shall we abide once to shew our fearefull heads before that terrible Iudge, when he cals vs forth to the punishment of our feare? Oh the vanity of foolish hypocrites, that run vpon the terrors of God, whiles they would auoid the shame of men!

How doe we thinke the small remainder of Israel looked, when in the next morning-muster they found themselues but ten thousand left? How did they accuse their timorous Countrimen, that had left but this handfull to encounter the mil-
B lions of Midian? and yet still, God complaines of too many; and vpon his triall, dismisses nine thousand seuen hundred more. His first triall was of the valour of their mindes: his next is of the ability of their bodies. Those, which besides boldnes, are not strong, patient of labour and thirst, willing to stoope, content with a little (such were those that tooke vp water with their hands) are not for the select Band of God. The Lord of Hosts will serue himselfe of none but able Champions: If he haue therfore singled vs into his combate, this very choice argues that he finds that strength in vs, which we cannot confesse in our selues. How can it but comfort vs in our great trials, that if the searcher of hearts did not find vs fit, he would neuer honour vs with so hard an imploiment?

Now, when there is not scarce left one Israelite to euery thousand of the Midia-
C nites, it is seasonable with God to ioyne battell. When God hath stripped vs of all our earthly confidence, then doth he find time to giue vs victory; and not till then, lest he should bee a loser in our gaine: like as at last he vnclothes vs of our body, that he may cloath vs vpon with glory.

If Gideon feared when he had two and thirty thousand Israelites at his heeles, is it any wonder if he feared, when all these were shrunk into three hundred? Though his confirmation were more, yet his meanes were abated Why was not Gideon rather the Leader of these two and twenty thousand run awayes, than of these three hundred souldiers? Oh infinite mercy and forbearance of God, that takes not vantage of so strong an infirmity, but in stead of casting, encourages him! That wise prouidence hath prepared a dreame in the head of one Midianite, an interpretation
D in the mouth of another, and hath brought Gideon to be an auditor of both; and hath made his enemies Prophets of his victory, incouragers of the attempt, proclaimers of their owne confusion. A Midianite dreames, a Midianite interprets. Our very dreames many times are not without God; there is a prouidence in our sleeping fancies: euen the enemies of God may haue visions, and power to construe them aright. How vsually are wicked men forewarned of their owne destruction? To foreknow and not auoid, is but an aggration of iudgement.

When Gideon heard good newes (though from an enemie) hee fell downe and worshipped. To heare himselfe but a Barly-cake, troubled him not, when he heard withall, that his rolling downe the hill should breake the Tents of Midi-
E an. It matters not how base wee be thought, so we may be victorious. The soule that hath receiued full confirmation from God in the assurance of his saluation, cannot but bow the knee, and by all gestures of body tell how it is rauished. I would haue thought, Gideon should rather haue found full confirmation in the promise and act of God, than in the dreame of the Midianite. Dreames may bee full of vncertaintie; Gods vndertakings are infallible: well therefore might the Miracle of God giue strength to the dreame of a Midianite; but what strength could a Pagans dreame giue to the miraculous Act of God? yet by this is Gideon throughly settled. When we are going, a little thing driues vs on; when we are come neere to the shore, the very tide without fails is enough to put vs into the harbour. We shall now heare no more of Gideons doubts, but of his atchieuements. And though God had promised by these three hundred to chase the Midianites, yet he neglects not wise stratagems to effect it. To wait for Gods performance formance in doing nothing, is to abuſe that diuine prouidence, which will ſo worke, that will not allow vs idle. A

Now, when wee would looke that Gideon ſhould giue charge of whetting their ſwords, and ſharpening their ſpeares, and fitting their Armour, he onely giues order for empty Pitchers and Lights, and Trumpets. The cracking of theſe pitchers ſhall breake in peices this Midianitiſh clay: the kindling of theſe lights ſhall extinguiſh the light of Midian: theſe Trumpets ſound no other than a ſoule-peale to all the Hoaſt of Midian: there ſhall need nothing but noiſe and light to confound this innumerable Army.

And if the pitchers, and brands, and trumpets of Gideon, did ſo daunt and diſmay the proud troopes of Midian and Amaleck, who can we thinke ſhall be able to ſtand before the laſt terror, wherein the Trumpet of the Archangell ſhall ſound, and the Heauens ſhall paſſe away with a noiſe, and the Elements ſhall bee on a flame about our eares? B

Any of the weakeſt Iſraelites would haue ſerued to haue broken an empty pitcher, to haue carried a light, and to haue ſounded a Trumpet, and to ſtrike a flying aduerſary. Not to the baſeſt vſe will God employ an vnworthy Agent; he will not allow ſo much as a cowardly Torch-bearer.

Thoſe two and twenty thouſand Iſraelites that ſlipt away for feare, when the feareful Midianites fled, can purſue and kill them, and can follow them at the heels, whom they durſt not looke in the face. Our flight giues aduantage to the feebleſt aduerſary, whereas our reſiſtance foileth the greateſt: How much more, if we haue once turned our backes vpon a tentation, ſhall our ſpirituall enemies (which are euer ſtrong) trample vs in the duſt? Reſiſt, and they ſhall flee: ſtand ſtill, and we ſhal ſee the ſaluation of the Lord. C

The reuenge of Svccoth and Penvel.

Gideon was of Manaſſeh: Ephraim and he were brothers, ſonnes of Ioſeph: None of all the Tribes of Iſrael fall out with their victorious Leader, but he. The agreement of brothers is rare; by how much nature hath more endeared them, by ſo much are their quarrels more frequent and dangerous. I did not heare the Ephramites offering themſelues into the front of the Army, before they fight, and now they are ready to fight with Gideon, becauſe they were not called to fight with Midian: I heare them expoſtulating after it; After the exploit done, cowards are valiant. Their quarrell was, that they were not called: It had beene a greater praiſe of their valour to haue gone vnbidden. What need was there to call them, when God complained of multitude, and ſent away thoſe which were called? None ſpake ſo bigge in the end of the fray, as the fearefulleſt. D

Ephraim flies vpon Gideon, whileſt the Midianites flie from him; when Gideon ſhould be purſuing his enemies, he is purſued by brethren, and now is glad to ſpend that wind in pacifying of his own, which ſhould haue been beſtowed in the ſlaughter of a common Aduerſary. It is wonder, if Satan ſuffer vs to bee quiet at home, whiles we are exerciſed with wars abroad. Had not Gideon learned to ſpeake faire, as well as to ſmite, he had found worke enough from the ſwords of Ioſephs ſons: his good words are as victorious as his ſword; his pacification of friends, better than his execution of enemies. E

For ought I ſee, the enuy of Iſraelites was not more troubleſome to Gideon, than the oppoſition of Midian: He hath left the enuy of Ephraim behind him, before him, he finds the enuy of Succoth and Penuel: The one enuies that he ſhould ouercome without them; the other, that he ſhould ſay, He had ouercome. His purſuit leades him to Succoth, there he craues reliefe, and is repelled. Had he ſaid, Come forth and draw your ſword with me againſt Zeba and Zalmunna, the motion had beene but equall:

A quall: A common intereſt challenges an vniuerſall aid: Now he ſayes but, Giue morſels of bread to my followers; He is turned off with a ſcorne; He askes bread, and they giue him a ſtone. Could he aske a more ſlender recompence of their deliuerance, or a leſſe reward of his victory? Giue morſels of bread. Before this act, all their ſubſtance had been too ſmall an hire for their freedome from Midian; now when it is done, a morſel of bread is too much: Well might he challenge bread, where he gaue liberty and life. It is hard, if thoſe which fight the warres of God, may not haue neceſſary reliefe; that whiles the enemie dies by them, they ſhould die by famine. If they had laboured for God at home in peace, they had bin worthy of maintenance; how much more now, that danger is added to their toile? Euen very executioners looke for fees: but here were no malefactors, but aduerſaries to be ſlaine; the ſword of power and
B reuenge was now to be weilded, not of quiet iuſtice. Thoſe that fight for our ſoules againſt ſpirituall powers, challenge bread from vs; and it is ſhamelſſe vnthankefulneſſe to deny it. When Abraham had vanquiſhed the fiue Kings, and deliuered Lot and his family, the King of Salem met him with bread and wine; and now the ſons of Abraham, after an equall victory, aske dry bread, and are denied by their brethren: Craftily yet, and vnder pretence of a falſe title, had they acknowledged the victory of Gideon, with what forehead could they haue denied him bread?

Now, I know not whether their faithleſneſſe, or enuy lie in their way; Are the hands of Zeba and Zalmunna in thy hands? There were none of theſe Princes of Succoth and Penuel, but thought themſelues better men than Gideon; That he therefore alone ſhould doe that, which all the Princes of Iſrael durſt not attempt, they hated
C and ſcorned to heare. It is neuer ſafe to meaſure euents by the power of the inſtrument; nor in the cauſes of God (whoſe calling makes the difference) to meaſure others by themſelues: There is nothing more dangerous, than in holy buſineſſes to ſtand vpon compariſons, and our owne reputation; ſith it is reaſon God ſhould both chuſe, and bleſſe where he liſts.

To haue queſtioned ſo ſudden a victory, had been pardonable: but to deny it ſcornefully, was vnworthy of Iſraelites. Carnall men thinke that impoſſible to others, which themſelues cannot doe: From hence are their cenſures, hence their exclamations.

Gideon hath vowed a fearefull reuenge, and now performes it; the taunts of his brethren may not ſtay him from the purſuit of the Midianites, Common enmities
D muſt firſt be oppoſed, domeſticall, at more leiſure. The Princes of Succoth feared the tyranny of the Midianitiſh Kings, but they more feared Gideons victory. What a condition hath their enuy drawne to them into? that they are ſorrie to ſee Gods enemies captiue; that Iſraels freedome muſt bee their death, that the Midianites and they muſt tremble at one and the ſame Reuenger. To ſee themſelues priſoners to Zeba and Zalmunna, had not beene ſo fearfull, as to ſee Zeba and Zalmunna priſoners to Gideon. Nothing is more terrible to euill mindes, than to reade their owne condemnation in the happy ſucceſſe of others: Hell it ſelfe would want one piece of his torment, if the wicked did not know thoſe whom they contemned, glorious.

I know not whether more to commend Gideons wiſedome and moderation in the E proceedings, than his reſolution and iuſtice in the execution of this buſineſſe. I doe not ſee him run furiouſly into the City, and kill the next; His ſword had not been ſo drunken with bloud, that it ſhould know no difference: But he writes downe the names of the Princes, and ſingles them forth for reuenge.

When the Leaders of God come to a Iericho, or Ai, their ſlaughter was vnpartiall; not a woman or childe might liue to tell newes; but now that Gideon comes to a Succoth, a City of Iſraelites, the Rulers are called forth to death, the people are frighted with the example, not hurt with the iudgement. To enwrappe the innocent in a y vengeance, is a murderous iniuſtice: Indeed where all ioyne in the ſinne, all are worthy to meet in the puniſhment. It is like, the Citizens of Succoth could haue beene glad to ſuccor Gideon, if their Rulers had not forbidden: they must therefore escape, whiles their Princes perish.

I cannot thinke of Gideons reuenge, without horror; That the Rulers of Succoth should haue their flesh torne from their backes with thornes and briers, that they should bee at once beaten and scratcht to death. What a spectacle it was to see their bare bones looking some-where thorow the bloudy ragges of their flesh and skinne, and euery stroke worse than the last, death multiplied by torment! Iustice is sometimes so seuere, that a tender beholder can scarce discerne it from cruelty.

I see the Midianites fare lesse ill; the edge of the sword makes a speedy and easy passage for their liues, whiles these rebellious Israelites dye lingring vnder thornes and briers, enuying those in their death, whom their life abhorred. Howsoeuer men liue or dye without the pale of the Church, a wicked Israelite shall be sure of plagues. How many shall vnwish themselues Christians, when Gods reuenge haue found them out?

The place where Iacob wrestled with God and preuailed, now hath wrestled against God, and takes a fall; they see God auenged, which would not beleeue him deliuering.

It was now time for Zeba and Zalmunna to follow those their troops to the graue, whom they had led in the field: Those which the day before were attended with an hundred thirty fiue thousand followers, haue not so much as a Page now left to weepe for their death, and haue liued onely to see all their friends, and some enemies dye for their sakes.

Who can regard earthly greatnesse, that sees one night change two of the greatest Kings of the World into captiues? It had been both pitty and sinne, that the Heads of that Midianitish tyranny, into which they had drawn so many thousands, should haue escaped that death.

And yet, if priuate reuenge had not made Gideon iust, I doubt whether they had died; The bloud of his brothers calls for theirs, and awakes his sword to their execution, He both knew and complained of the Midianitish oppression, vnder which Israel groned: yet the cruelty offered to all the thousands of his Fathers sonnes, had not drawne the bloud of Zeba and Zalmunna, if his owne mothers sons had not bled by their hands.

He that slew the Rulers of Succoth and Pennel, and spared the people, now hath slaine the people of Midian, and would haue spared their Rulers: but that God which will finde occasions to winde wicked men into iudgement, will haue them slaine in a priuate quarrell, which had more deserued it for the publike; If we may not rather say, that Gideon reuenged these as a Magistrate, not as a brother: For Gouernours, to respect their owne ends in publike actions, and to weare the sword of iustice in their owne sheath, it is a wrongfull abuse of authority. The slaughter of Gideons brethren, was not the greatest sin of the Midianitish Kings; this alone shall kill them, when the rest expected an vniust remission. How many lewd men hath God paid him some one sin for all the rest.

Some that haue gone away with vnnaturally filthinesse, and capitall thefts, haue clipped off their owne dayes with their coine; Others, whose bloudy murders haue been punished in a mutinous word; Others, whose suspected felony hath payd the price of their vnknowne rape. O God, thy iudgements are iust, euen when mens are vniust!

Gideons young son is bidden to reuenge the death of his vncles; His sword had not yet learned the way to bloud, especially of Kings, though in yrons: Deadly executions require strength both of heart and face. How are those aged in euil, that can draw their swords vpon the lawfully Anointed of God? These Tirants plead not now for continuance of life, but for the haste of their death; Fall thou vpon vs. Death is euer accompanied with paine, which it is no maruell if we wish short: We doe not more affect protraction of an easeful life; than speed in our dissolution; for here euery pang that tends towards death, renues it: To lie an houre vnder death, is tedious, but to be dying

A dying a whole day, we thinke aboue the ſtrength of humane patience. Oh, what ſhall we then conceiue of that death, which knowes no end? As this life is no leſſe fraile then the body which it animates; ſo that death is no leſſe eternall, then the ſoule which muſt endure it.

For vs to bee dying ſo long as we now haue leaue to to liue, is intolerable; and yet one onely minute of that other tormenting death, is worſe than an age of this. Oh the deſperate infidelitie of careleſſe men, that ſhrinke at the thought of a momentany death, and feare not eternall! This is but a killing of the body; that is a deſtruction of body and ſoule.

Who is ſo worthy to weare the Crowne of Iſrael, as hee that wonne the Crowne from Midian? Their vſurpers were gone, now they are headleſſe; It is a doubt B whether they were better to haue had no Kings, or Tyrants: They ſue to Gideon to accept of the Kingdome, and are repulſed: There is no greater example of modeſty than Gideon. When the Angell ſpake to him, he abaſed himſelfe below all Iſrael; when the Ephraimites contended with him, he prefers his gleanings to his vintage, and caſts his honour at their feet: and now when Iſrael proffers him that Kingdome which he had merited, he refuſes it. Hee that in ouercomming would allow them to cry, The ſword of the Lord, and of Gideon, in gouerning, will haue none but The ſword of the Lord.

That which others plot, and ſue, and ſweare, and bribe for, Dignity and ſuperiority he ſeriouſly reiects; whether it were, for that he knew God had not yet called them to a Monarchy; or rather, for that he ſaw the Crowne among thornes? What C doe we ambitiouſly affect the command of theſe mole-hils of earth, when wiſe men haue refuſed the proffers of Kingdomes? Why doe not wee rather labour for that Kingdome which is free from all cares, from all vncertainty?

Yet he that refuſes their Crowne calls for their eare-rings, although not to enrich himſelfe, but religion. So long had God been a ſtranger to Iſrael, that now ſuperſtition goes currant for deuout worſhip. It were pitty that good intentions ſhould make any man wicked; here they did ſo. Neuer man meant better than Gideon in his rich Ephod; yet this very act ſet all Iſrael on whoring: God had choſen a place and a ſeruice of his owne. When the wit of man will bee ouer-pleaſing with better deuices than his owne, it turnes to madneſſe, and ends in miſchiefe. D

ABIMELECS Vsurpation.

Gideon refuſed the Kingdome of Iſrael when it was offered; his ſeuenty ſonnes offered not to obtaine that Scepter, which their Fathers victory had deſerued to make hereditary: onely Abimelec, the concubines ſonne, ſues and ambitiouſly plots for it. What could Abimelec ſee in himſelfe, that hee ſhould ouer-looke all his brethren? If hee looke to his Father, they were his equals; E if to his mother, they were his betters. Thoſe that are moſt vnworthy of honour, are hotteſt in the chaſe of it, whilſt the conſcience of better deſerts bids men ſit ſtill, and ſtay to bee either importuned, or neglected. There can bee no greater ſigne of vnfitneſſe, than vehement ſute. It is hard to ſay, whether there be more pride, or ignorance in Ambition. I haue noted this difference betwixt Spirituall and earthly honour, and the Clients of both; wee cannot be worthy of the one without earneſt proſecution; nor with earneſt proſecution worthy of the other: The violent obtaine heauen, onely the meeke are worthy to inherit the earth.

That which an aſpiring heart hath proiected, it wil find both argument and means to effect. If either bribes or fauour will carry it, the proud man will not ſit out. The Shechemites are fit brokers for Abimelec; That City which once betraied it ſelfe to vtter depopulation in yeelding to the ſut of Hamor, now betraies it ſelfe, and all Iſrael, in yeelding to the requeſt of Abimelec. By them hath this Vſurper made himſelfe a faire way to the Throne: It was an eaſie queſtion, Whether will ye admit of the ſons of Gideon for your Rulers, or of ſtrangers? If of the ſons of Gideon, whether of all, or one? If of one, whether of your own fleſh and blood, or of others vnknowne? To caſt off the ſons of Gideon for ſtrangers, were vnthankfull: To admit of ſeuenty Kings in one ſmall Countrey, were vnreaſonable; To admit of any other rather than their owne kinſman, were vnnaturall. Gideons ſons therefore muſt rule amongſt all Iſrael; One of his ſonnes amongſt thoſe ſeuenty: and who ſhould bee that one but Abimelec? Naturall reſpects are the moſt dangerous corrupters of all elections; What hope can there be of worthy Superiours in any free people, where neereneſſe of blood carries it from fitneſſe of diſpoſition? Whileſt they ſay, Hee is our brother, they are enemies to themſelues, and Iſrael. A B

Faire words haue won his brethren; they the Shechemites; the Shechemites furniſh him with money, money with men; His men begin with murder, and now Abimelec raignes alone; Flattery, bribes and blood, are the vſuall ſtaires of the Ambitious: The money of Baal is a fit hire for murderers; that which Idolatry hath gathered, is fitly ſpent vpon Treaſon: One Deuill is ready to helpe another in miſchiefe; ſeldome euer is ill gotten riches better imployed. It is no wonder if he that hath Baal his Idoll, now make an Idoll of Honour. There was neuer any man that worſhipped but one Idoll; Woe be to them that lie in the way of the Aſpiring: Though they be brothers, they ſhall bleed; yea, the neerer they are, the more ſure is their ruine. Who would not now thinke that Abimelec ſhould finde an hell in his breſt, after ſo barbarous and vnnaturall a maſſacre? and yet behold, he is as ſenſleſſe as the ſtone, vpon which the blood of his ſeuenty brethren was ſpilt. Where Ambiton hath poſſeſt it ſelfe throughly of the ſoule, it turnes the heart into ſteele, and makes it vncapable of a conſcience; All ſins will eaſily downe with the man that is reſolued to riſe. C

Onely Iotham fell not at that fatall ſtone with his brethren: It is an hard battell where none eſcapes. Hee eſcapes, not to raigne, nor to reuenge; but to be a Propher, and a witneſſe of the vengeance of God vpon the Vſurper, vpon the Abettors; Hee liues to tell Abimelec that he was but a bramble, a weed rather than a tree. A right bramble indeed, that grew but out of the baſe hedge-row of a Concubine, that could not lift vp his head from the earth, vnleſſe hee were ſupported by ſome buſh or pale of Shechem, that had laid hold of the fleece of Iſrael, and had drawne blood of all his brethren; and laſtly, that had no ſubſtance in him, but the ſap of vaine-glory, and the pricks of cruelty. It was better than a Kingdome to him, out of his obſcure Beere, to ſee the fire out of his bramble to conſume thoſe trees; The view of Gods reuenge, is ſo much more pleaſing to a good heart, than his owne glory, by how much it is more iuſt and full. D

There was neuer ſuch a patterne of vnthankfulneſſe, as theſe Iſraelites: They which lately thought a Kingdome too ſmall recompence for Gideon and his ſonnes, now thinke it too much for his ſeed to liue; and take life away from the ſonnes of him, that gaue them both life and liberty. Yet if this had beene ſome hundred of yeeres after, when time had worne out the memory of Ierub baal, it might haue borne a better excuſe. No man can hope to hold pace with Time; The beſt names may not thinke ſcorne to bee vnknowne to following generations: but ere their Deliuerer was cold in his coffin, to pay his benefits (which deſerue to be euerlaſting:) with the extirpation of his Poſterity, it was more than ſauage. What can bee looked for from Idolaters? If a man haue caſt off his God, hee will eaſily caſt off his friends: When religion is once gone, humanity will not ſtay long after. E

That which the people were puniſhed afterwards for but deſiring, he enioies. Now is Abimelec ſeated in the Throne which his father refuſed, and no riuall is ſeen to enuy his peace. But how long will this glory laſt? Stay but three yeers, and ye ſhall ſee this

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, SIR HENRY DANVERS KNIGHT, BARON OF DANTESEY, A VVORTHY PATTERNE OF ALL TRVE NOBILITIE, ACCOMPLISHED BOTH FOR WARRE AND PEACE; A MVNIFICENT FAVOVRER OF ALL LEARNING AND VERTVE:

I. H.

VVITH HVMBLE APPRECATION OF ALL TRVE HAPPINESSE, DEDICATES THIS PART OF HIS POORE LABOVRS

A this bramble withered, and burnt. The prosperity of the wicked is short and fickle; a stolne Crowne (though it may looke faire) cannot bee made of any but brittle stuffe. All life is vncertaine; but wickednesse ouer-runnes natures.

The euill spirit thurst himselfe into the pilot of Abimelechs vsurpation and murder, and wrought with the Shechemites for both: and now God sends the euill spirit betwixt Abimelec and the Shechemites, to worke the ruine of each other. The first could not haue beene without God; but in the second, God challenges a part: Reuenge is his, where the sinne is ours. It had beene pitty that the Shechemites should haue been plagued by any other hand than Abimelechs: They raised him vniustly to the Throne, they are the first that feele the weight of his Scepter. The foolish bird limes her selfe with that which grew from her owne excretion: Who
B wonders to see the kinde Peasant stung with his owne snake?

The breach beginnes at Shechem: his owne Countrey-men flie off from their promised allegeance: Though all Israel should haue falne off from Abimelech, yet they of Shechem should haue stuck close: It was their act, they ought to haue made it good. How should good Princes be honoured, when euen Abimelecs once settled, cannot be opposed with safety? Now they begiune to reuolt to the rest of Israel. Yet, if this had been done out of repentance, it had been praise-worthy; but to be done out of a treacherous inconstancy, was vnworthy of Israelites. How could Abimelec hope for fidelity of them, whom he had made and found Traitors to his fathers bloud? No man knowes how to be sure of him that is vnconscionable: He that hath beene vnfaithfull to one, knowes the way to bee perfidious, and is onely fit for his
C trust, that is worthy to bee deceiued, whereas faithfulnesse, besides the present good, layes a ground of further assurance. The friendship that is begun in euill, cannot stand; wickednesse, both of it owne nature, and through the curse of God, is euer vnsteady: and though there be not a disagreement in hell (being but the place of retribution, not of action) yet on earth there is no peace among the wicked; whereas that affection which is knit in God is indissoluble.

If the men of Shechem had abandoned their false god, with their false King, and out of a serious remorse, and desire of satisfaction for their idolatry and bloud, had opposed this Tirant, and preferred Iotham to his Throne, there might haue both warrant for their quarrell, and hope of succesſe: but now, if Abimelec bee a wicked vsurper, yet the Shechemites are idolatrous Traitors. How could they thinke,
D that God would rather reuenge Abimelecs bloudy intrusion by them, than their treachery and idolatry by Abimelec? When the quarrell is betwixt God and Satan, there is no doubt of the issue; but when one diuell fights with another, what certaintie is there of the victory? Though the cause of God had been good, yet it had been safe for them to looke to themselues: The vnworthinesse of the agent many times curses a good enterprize.

No sooner is a secret dislike kindled in any people against their Gouernours, than there is a Gaal ready to blow the coales; It were a wonder if euer any faction should want an Head; As contrarily, neuer any man was so ill, as not to haue some fauourers: Abimelec hath a Zebul in the midst of Shechem; Lightly, all treasons are betraied euen with some of their owne; His intelligence brings the sword of Abime-
E lec vpon Shechem, who now hath demolished the City, and sowne it with Salt. Oh the iust successions of the reuenges of God! Gideons Ephod is punished with the bloud of his sons; the bloud of his sons is shed by the procurement of the Shechemites: the bloud of the Shechemites is shed by Abimelec: the bloud of Abimelec is spilt by a woman. The retaliations of God are sure and iust, and make a more due pedigree, than descent of nature.

The pursued Shechemites flie to the house of their god Berith; now they are safe: that place is at once a fort, and a sanctuary. Whither should wee flie in our distresse but to our God? And now this refuge shall teach them what a God they haue serued: The iealous God whom they had forsaken, hath them now where he would, and reioyces at once to bee auenged of their god, and them: Had they not made the house of Baal their shelter, they had not died so fearefully. Now, according to the prophecy of Iotham, a fire goes out of the bramble, and consumes these Cedars, and their eternall flames begin in the house of their Berith : the confusion of wicked men, rises out of the false Deities which they haue doted on.

Of all the Conspiratours against Gideons sonnes, onely Abimelec yet suruiues, and his day is now comming. His successe against Shechem, hath filled his heart with thoughts of victory; He hath caged vp the inhabitants of Tabez within their tower also; and what remaines for them, but the same end with their neighbours? And behold, while his hand is busie in putting fire to the dore of their tower, which yet was not high (for then he could not haue discerned a woman to be his Executioner) a stone from a womans hand strikes his head; His paine in dying, was not so much as his indignation to know by whom he died: and rather will he die twice than a woman shall kill him. If God had not knowne his stomacke so big, he had not vexed him with impotency of his victor: God findes a time to reckon with wicked men for all the arrerages of their sinnes. Our sinnes are not more our debts to God, than his Iudgements are his debts to our sinnes, which at last he will be sure to pay home. There now lies the greatnesse of Abimelec; vpon one stone had he slaine his seuenty brethren, and now a stone slaies him; His head had stolne the crowne of Israel, and now his head is smitten: And what is Abimelec better that he was a King? What difference is there betweene him and any of his seuenty brethren whom he murthered, saue only in guiltinesse? They beare but their owne bloud; he, the weight of all theirs. How happy a thing it is to liue well! that our death, as it is certaine, so may be comfortable: What a vanity is it to insult in the death of them, whom we must follow the same way?

The Tirant hath his paiment, and that time which he should haue bestowed in calling for mercy to God, and washing his soule with the last teares of contrition, he vainely spends in deprecating an idle reproch; Kill me, that it may not be said, He died by a woman: A fit conclusion for such a life. The expectation of true and endlesse torment, doth not so much vex him, as the friuolous report of a dishonor: neither is he so much troubled with, Abimelec is frying in hell, as, Abimelec is slaine by a woman. So vaine fooles are niggardly of their reputation, and prodigall of their soules; Doe we not see them runne wilfully into the field; into the graue, into hell? and all, lest it should be said, They haue but as much feare as wit.

CONTEMPLATIONS.
THE TENTH BOOKE.

IEPTHA.

ISrael, that had now long gone a whoring from God, hath beene punished by the regiment of the concubines sonne, and at last seekes protection from the son of an harlot: It is no small misery to be obliged vnto the vnworthy. The Concubines son, made sute to them; They make sute to the son of the harlot. It was no fault of Ieptha that he had an ill mother, yet is he branded with the indignity of his bastardy; neither would God conceale this blemish of nature, which Ieptha could neither auoide nor remedy. God, to shew his detestation of whordome, reuenges it not onely vpon the actors, but vpon their issue: Hence hee hath shut out the base sonne from the Congregation of Israel, to the tenth generation, that a transient euill might haue a durable reproach attending it; and that after the death of the Adulterer, yet his shame might liue. But, that God, who iustly ties men to his lawes, will not abide that we should tie him to our lawes, or his owne; He can both rectifie and ennoble the blood of Ieptha. That no man should be too much discouraged with the errors of propagation, euen the base son of man may be the lawfully begotten of God; and though he be cast out from the inheritance of his brethren vpon earth, may bee admitted to the Kingdome of Israel.

I heare no praise of the lawfull issue of Gilead; onely this mis-begotten son is commended for his valour, and set at the sterne of Israel: The common gifts of God respect not the parentage or blood, but are indifferently scattered where hee pleases to let them fall. The choice of the Almighty is not guided by our rules; As in spirituall, so in earthly things, it is not in him that willeth: If God would haue men glory in these outward priuileges, he would bestow them vpon none but the worthy.

Now, who can be proud of strength or greatnesse, when he sees him that is not so honest, yet is more valiant, and more aduanced? Had not Ieptha been base, he had not been thrust out; and if hee had not been thrust out from his brethren, hee had neuer beene the Captaine of Israel. By contrary paces to ours, it pleaseth God to come to his owne ends: and how vnusually doth he looke the contrary way, to that he moues? No man can measure the conclusion of Gods act by his beginning: He that fetches good out of euill, raises the glory of men out of their ruine. Men loue to goe the neerest way, and often faile: God commonly goes about, and in his owne time comes surely home.

The Gileadites were not so forward to expell Ieptha, as glad to recall him: No Ammonite threatned them when they parted with such an helper: Now whom they cast out in their peace, they fetch home in their danger and misery. That God, who neuer gaue ought in vaine, will finde a time to make vse of any gift that hee hath bestowed vpon men: The valour of Ieptha shall not rust in his secrecy, but be imploied to the common preseruation of Israel. Necessity will driue vs to seek vp all our helps, euen those whom our wantonnesse hath despised.

How iustly are the suits of our need vpbraided with the errors of our prosperity! The Elders of Gilead now heare of their antient wrong, and dare not find fault with their exprobration; Did ye not hate mee, and expell me out of my Fathers house? How then come yee now to mee in time of tribulation? The same expostulation that Ieptha makes with Gilead, God also at the same time makes with Israel; Ye haue forsaken me, and serued other gods; wherefore should I deliuer you any more? Goe and cry vnto the gods whom ye haue serued. As wee, so God also findes it seasonable, to tell his children of their faults, whiles he is whipping them. It is a safe and wise course, to make much of those in our peace, whom we must make vse of in our extremity; else it is but iust, that we should be reiected of those, whom we haue reiected.

Can we looke for any other answer from God than this? Did ye not driue me out of your houses, out of your hearts, in the time of your health and iollity? Did ye not plead the strictnesse of my charge, and the weight of my yoke? Did not your wilfull sinnes expell me from your soules? What do you now crouching and creeping to me in the euill day? Surely, O God, it is but iustice, if thou be not found of those which were glad to lose thee; it is thy mercy, if after many checkes and delayes, thou wilt be found at last. Where an act cannot be reuersed, there is no amends, but confession; and if God himselfe take vp with this satisfaction, He that confesses, shall find mercy; how much more should men hold themselues well paid with words of humility and deprecation?

Iephthaes wisdome had not been answerable to his valour, if he had not made his match before-hand; Hee could not but know how treacherously Israel had dealt with Gideon. We cannot make too sure worke when we haue to doe with vnfaithfull men: It hath been an old policy to serue our selues of men, and after our aduantage, to turne them vp. Hee bargaines therefore for his Soueraignty ere he win it, Shall I be your Head? We are all naturally ambitious, and are ready to buy honor euen with hazard. And if the hope of a troublesome superiority incouraged Ieptha to fight against the forces of Ammon, what heart should we take in the battels of God against spirituall wickednesses, when the God of Heauen hath said, To him that ouercomes, will I giue power ouer nations, and to sit with me in my Throne? Oh that we could bend our eyes vpon the recompence of our reward; how willingly should we march forward against these mighty Ammonites? Ieptha is noted for his valor, and yet he intreats with Ammon, ere he fights. To make war any other than our last remedy, is not courage, but cruelty and rashnes: And now, when reason will not preuaile, he betakes himselfe to his sword.

As God began the warre with Ieptha, in raising vp his heart to that pitch of fortitude, so Ieptha beganne his warre at God, in crauing victory from him, and powring out his vow to him: His hand tooke hold of his sword, his heart of God: therefore he whom the old Testament stiles, valiant, the new, stiles faithfull; he who is commended for his strength, dares trust in none, but the arme of God: If thou wilt giue the Ammonites into my hand. If Ieptha had not lookt vpward for his victory, in vaine had the Gileadites lookt vp to him. This is the disposition of all good hearts; they looke to the sword or their bow, as seruants, not as Patrones; and whilst they vse them, trust to God. If we could doe so in all our businesses, wee should haue both more ioy in their successe, and lesse discomfort in their miscarriage. It was his zeale to vow: it was his sin to vow rashly. Iacob, his forefather, of whom he learned to vow, might haue taught him a better forme, If God will be with me, then shall the Lord be my God. It is well with vowes, when the thing promised makes the promise good: But when Ieptha sayes, Whatsoeuer thing commeth out of the doores of my house, shall be the Lords, or I will offer it for a burnt sacrifice; his deuotion is blind, and his good affection ouerruns his iudgement: For what if a dog, or a swine, or an asse had met him? where had been the promise of his consecration?

Vowes are as they are made, like vnto Seuts, if they be of ill composition, nothing offends more, if well tempered, nothing is more pleasant. Either certainty of euil, or vncer-

A vncertainty of good, or impossibility of performance, makes vows no seruice to God. When we vow what we cannot, or what we ought not doe, we mocke God, in stead of honouring him: It is a vaine thing for vs to goe about to catch God hood-winkt: To conscience shall neuer finde peace in any way, but that which we see before vs, and which we know safe, both in the kinde, and circumstances. There is no comfort in (Peraduenture I may please God;) What good childe will not take part of the Parents ioy? If Ieptha returnes with Trophees, it is no maruell if his daughter meet him with Timbrels: Oh that we could bee so affected with the glorious acts of our heauenly Father! Thou subdueſt thine enemies, and mightily deliuereſt thy people, O God; a song waiteth for thee in Sion.

B Who would haue suspected danger in a dutifull Triumph? Well might Iepthaes daughter haue thought; My sex forbade me to doe any thing towards the helpe of my Fathers victory; I can doe little, if I cannot applaud it: If nature haue made me weake, yet not vnthankful; nothing forbids my ioy to bee as strong as the victors: Though I might not go out with my father to fight, yet I may meet him with gratulations; A Timbrell may become these hands which were vnfit for a sword; This day hath made me the daughter of the Head of Israel; This day hath made both Israel free, my Father a Conquerer. and my selfe in him noble: and shall my affection make no difference? What must my Father needs thinke, if he shall finde me sitting sullenly at home, whiles all Israel striues who shall run first to blesse him with their acclamations? Should I onely be insensible of his and the common happines?

C And now, behold when she lookes for most thankes, her Father answers the measures of her feet, with the knockings of his breast, and weepes at her musicke, and teares his clothes, to looke vpon her whom he best loued, and giues no answere to her Timbrels, but Alasse, my daughter, thou art of them that trouble me: Her ioy alone hath changed the day, and lost the comfort of that victory, which she inioyed to see wonne. It fals out often, that those times and occasions which promise most contentment, proue most dolefull in the issue: The heart of this virgin was neuer lifted vp so high as now, neither did any day of her life seeme happy but this; and this onely proues the day of her solemne and perpetuall mourning: As contrarily the times and euents which we haue most distrusted, proue most beneficiall. It is good in a faire morning, to thinke of that storme that may rise ere night, and to inioy both good and euill fearefully.

D Miserable is that deuotion which troubles vs in the performance; Nothing is more pleasant than the acts of true piety: Ieptha might well see the wrong of this religion, in the distaste of it; yet whiles himselfe had troubled his daughter, hee sayes, Alasse, my daughter, thou art of them that trouble me: She did but her duty: hee did what he should not; yet he would be rid of the blame, though he cannot of the smart. No man is willing to own a sin; the first man shifted it from himselfe to his wife; this, from himselfe to his daughter: He was ready to accuse another, which onely committed himselfe. It were happy if we could be as loth to commit sin, as to acknowledge it.

The inconsideration of this vow was very tough, and setled; I haue opened my mouth, and cannot go backe. If there were iust cause to repent, it was the weakenesse E of his zeale, to thinke that a vow could binde him to euill; An vnlawfull vow is ill made, but worse performed. It were pitty this constancy should light vpon any, but an holy obiect; No loane can make a truer debt, than our vow; which if we pay not in our performance, God will pay vs with iudgement. We haue all opened our mouthes to God in that initiall and solemne vow of Christianity; Oh that wee could not goe backe! So much more is our vow obligatory, by how much the thing vowed is more necessary.

Why was the soule of Ieptha thus troubled, but because he saw the entaile of his new honor thus suddēly cut off? He saw the hope of posterity extinguished, in the virginity of his daughter. It is natural to vs, to affect that perpetuity in our succession, which is denied vs in our persons; Our very bodies would emulate the eternity of the soule.

And

And if God haue built any of vs an houſe on earth, as well as prepared vs an Houſe in Heauen, it muſt be confeſſed a fauour, worth our thankfulneſſe: but as the perpetuity of our earthly houſes is vncertain: ſo let vs not reſt our hearts vpon that, but make ſure of the Houſe which is eternall in the heauens.

Doubtleſſe the goodnes of the Daughter added to the Fathers ſorrow: She was not more louing, than religious; neither is ſhe leſſe willing to bee the Lords, than her fathers: and as prouoking her Father to that which he thought piety, though to her owne wrong, ſhee ſayes, If thou haſt opened thy mouth vnto the Lord, doe with me as thou haſt promiſed. Many a daughter would haue diſſwaded her Father with teares, and haue wiſht rather her fathers impiety, than her owne preiudice; She ſues for the ſmart of her fathers vow. How obſequious ſhould children bee to the will of their carefull Parents euen in their finall diſpoſition in the world, when they ſee this holy maid willing to abandon the world vpon the raſh vow of a Father! They are the liuing goods of their Parents, and muſt therfore wait vpon the beſtowing of their owners: They miſtake themſelues, which they thinke they are their owne; If this maid had vowed her ſelfe to God without her Father, it had been in his power to abrogate it; but now that hee vowed her to God without her ſelfe, it ſtands in force. But what ſhall we ſay to thoſe children, whom their Parents vow and care cannot make ſo much as honeſt; that will be no other than godleſſe, in ſpight of their Baptiſme and education? What, but that they are giuen their Parents for a curſe, and ſhall one day find what it is to be rebellious.

All her deſire is, that ſhe may haue leaue to bewaile that which ſhe muſt be forced to keep, virginity: If ſhe had not held it an affliction, there had been no cauſe to bewaile it; it had been no thanke to vndergoe it, if ſhe had not knowne it to be a croſſe. Teares are no argument of impatience; we may mourne for that we repine not to beare. How comes that to be a meritorious vertue vnder the Goſpell, which was but a puniſhment vnder the Law? The daughters of Iſrael had been too lauiſh of their teares, if virginity had been abſolutely good: What iniury ſhould it haue been to lament that ſpirituall preferment, which they ſhould rather haue emulated?

While Iephaes daughter was two moneths in the mountaines, ſhee might haue had good opportunity to eſcape her fathers vow; but as one, whom her obedience tied as cloſe to her father, as his vow tied him to God, ſhe returnes to take vp that burden, which ſhe had bewailed to fore-ſee: If we bee truly dutifull to our Father in heauen, we would not ſlip our necks out of the yoke though wee might, nor flie from his commands, though the dore were open.

Samson conceiued.

OF extraordinary perſons, the very birth and conception is extraordinary; God begins his wonders betimes, in thoſe whom he will make wonderfull: There was neuer any of thoſe which were miraculouſly conceiued, whoſe liues were not notable and ſingular. The preſages of the wombe, and the cradle, are commonly anſwered in the life: It is not the vſe of God to caſt away ſtrange beginnings. If Manoahs wife had not beene barren, the Angell had not been ſent to her: Afflictions haue this aduantage, that they occaſion God to ſhew that mercy to vs, whereof the proſperous are vncapable; It would not beſeeme a mother to bee ſo indulgent to an healthfull child, as to a ſicke. It was to the woman that the Angell appeared, not to the husband; whether for that the reproach of barrenneſſe lay vpon her more heanily, than on the Father, or for that the birth of the childe ſhould coſt her more deare than her husband; or laſtly, for that the difficulty of this newes was more in her conception, than in his generation: As Satan layes his batteries euer to the weakeſt; ſo contrarily, God addreſſeth his comforts to thoſe hearts that haue moſt

A most need; As at the first, because Eue had most reason to be deiected, for that her sinne had drawne man into the transgression, therefore the Cordiall of God most respecteth her; The seed of the woman shall breake the Serpents head.

As a Physician first tells the state of the disease with his symptomes, and then prescribes; so doth the Angell of God, first tell the wife of Manoah her complaint, then her remedy; Thou art barren: All our Afflictions are more noted of that God which sends them, than of the patient that suffers them: how can it be but lesse possible to indure any thing that he knowes not, than that inflicted it not? He saith to one, Thou art sicke; to another, Thou are poore; to a third, Thou art defamed; Thou art oppressed, to another: That All-seeing eye takes notice from heauen of euery mans condition, no lesse than if he should send an Angell to tell vs he knew it; His B knowledge compared with his mercy, is the iust comfort of all our sufferings. O God, we are many times miserable, and feele it not; Thou knowst euen those sorrows which we might haue; Thon knowest what thou hast done: doe what thou wilt.

Thou art barren. Not that the Angell would vpbraid the poore woman with her affliction; but therefore he names her paine, that the mention of her cure might be so much more welcome; Comfort shall come vnseasonably to that heart, which is not apprehensiue of his owne sorrow: Wee must first know our euills, ere wee can quit them. It is the iust method of euery true Angell of God, first, to let vs see that whereof either we doe, or should complaine, and then to apply comforts: Like as a good Physician first pulls downe the body, and then raises it with cordialls. If wee cannot abide to heare of our faults, we are not capable of amendment.

C If the Angell had first said, Thou shalt conceiue, and not premised, Thou art barren; I doubt whether she had conceiued faith in her soule, of that infant which her body should conceiue; Now, his knowledge of her present estate, makes way for the assurance of the future. Thus euer it pleases our good God, to leaue a pawne of his fidelity with vs; that we should not distrust him in what he will doe, when we finde him faithfull in that which we see done.

It is good reason, that he which giues the sonne to the barren mother, should dispose of him, and diet him both in the wombe first, and after in the world. The mother must first be a Nazarite, that her sonne may be so. Whiles she was barren, she might drinke what she would: but now, that she shall conceiue a Samson her choice must be limited; There is an holy austerity that euer followes the speciall calling D of God: The worldling may take his full scope, and deny his backe and belly nothing; but he that hath once conceiued that blessed burthen, whereof Samson was a type, must be strict and seuere to himselfe; neither his tongue, nor his pallat, nor his hand, may runne riot: Those pleasures which seemed not vnseemely for the multitude, are now debarred him. Wee borrow more names of our Sauiour than one; As we are Christians, so wee are Nazarites; The consecration of our God is vpon our heads, and therefore our very haire should be holy. Our appetite must be curbed, our passions moderated, and so estranged from the world, that in the losse of Parents, or children, nature may not make vs forget grace. What doth the looseneſſe of vaine man perswade them that God is not curious, when they see him thus precisely ordering the very diet of his Nazarites? Nature pleads for liberty; Reli- E gion for restraint: not that there is more vncleanneſſe in the grape, than in the fountaine; but that wine finds more vncleanneſſe in vs, than water; and that the high feed is not so fit for deuotion, as abstinence. Who sees not a ceremony in this command? which yet carries with it this substance of euerlasting vse, that God and the belly will not admit of one seruant; that quaffing and cramming is not the way to heauen: A drunken Nazarite is a monster among men. We haue now more scope than the ancient: not drinking of wine, but drunkenneſſe with wine is forbidden to the Euangelicall Nazarite; wine, wherein is excesse. Oh that euer Christians should quench the Spirit of God, with a liquor of Gods owne making! that they should suffer their hearts to be drowned with wine, and should so liue, as if the practice of the Gospell were quite contrary to the rule of the Law.

The mother must conceiue the onely Giant of Israel, and yet must drinke but water; neither must the child touch any other cup. Neuer wine made so strong a champion as water did here. The power of nourishment is not in the creatures, but in their Maker. Daniel and his three companions kept their complexion, with the same diet wherewith Samson got his strength; he that gaue that power to the grape, can giueit to the streame. O God, how iustly doe we raise our eyes from our tables vnto thee, which canst make water nourish, and wine enfeeble vs!

Samson had not a better mother, than Manoah had a wife; shee hides not the good newes in her owne bosome, but imparts it to her husband: That wife hath learned to make a true vse of her head, which is euer ready to consult with him about the messages of God. If shee were made for his helper, he is much more hers. Thus should good women make amends for their first offence; that as Eue no sooner had receiued an ill motion, but she deliuered it to her husband; so they should no sooner receiue good, then they should impart it.

Manoah (like one which in those lewd times had not lost his acquaintance with God) so soone as he heares the newes, fals downe vpon his knees. I doe not heare him call forth and addresse his seruants to all the coasts of heauen (as the children of the Prophets did in the search of Elias) to finde out a messenger; but I see him rather looke straight vp, to that God which sent him; My Lord, I pray thee let that man of God come againe. As a straight line is the shortest, the neerest cut to any blessing, is to go by heauen; As we may not sue to God, and neglect meanes, so we must sue to God for those meanes which we shall vse.

When I see the strength of Manoahs faith, I maruell not that he had a Sampson to his sonne; he saw not the messenger, hee heard not the errand, hee examined not the circumstances; yet now hee takes thought, not whether hee shall haue a son, but how he shall order the son which he must haue; and sues to God, not for the son which as yet he had not, but for the direction of gouerning him, when hee should be. Zachariah had the same message, and crauing a signe, lost that voyce wherewith he craued it: Manoah seekes no signe for the promise, but counsell for himselfe; and yet, that Angell spake to Zachary himselfe, this only to the wife of Manoah, that, in the Temple like a glorious spirit; this, in the house, or field, like some Prophet, or Traueller; that to a Priest, this to a Woman. All good men haue not equall measures of faith; The bodies of men haue no more differences of stature, than their graces: Credulity to men is faulty and dangerous; but in the matters of God, is the greatest vertue of a Christian; Happy are they that haue not seen, yet beleued: Truee faith takes all for granted, yea for performed, which is once promised.

He that before sent his Angell vnasked, will much more send him againe, vpon intreaty; those heauenly messengers are ready both to obey their Maker, and to relieue his children. Neuer any man prayed for direction in the duties of God, and was repulsed: rather will God send an Angell from Heauen to instruct vs, than our good desires shall be frustrate.

Manoah prayed, the Angell appeared againe; not to him, but to his wife. It had beene the shorter way to haue come first to the man, whose prayers procured his presence: But as Manoah went directly, and immediately to God, so God comes mediately and about to him; and will make her the meanes to beare the message to her husband, who must beare him the sonne: Both the blessing and the charge are chiefly meant to her. It was a good care of Manoah, when the Angell had giuen order to this wife alone, for the gouerning of the childs diet, to proffer himselfe to his charge; How shall wee order the childe? As both the Parents haue their part in the being of their children, so should they haue in their education; it is both vnreasonable and vnnatural! in husbands to cast this burden vpon the weaker vessell alone: it is no reason that she which alone hath had the paine of their birth, should haue the paine of their breeding. Though the charge be renued to the wife, yet the speech is directed to the husband, the act must be hers, his must be the ouer-sight; Let her obserue all I commanded her. The head must ouer-look the body;

A body; it is the duty of the husband, to be carefull that the wife doe her duty to God.

As yet, Manoah saw nothing but the out-side of a man, and therefore offers the Angell an answerable entertainment, wherein there is at once Hospitality and Thankfulnesse. No man shall bring him good newes from God, and goe away vnrecompenced; How forward he is to feast him, whom he tooke for a Prophet! their feet should be so much more beautifull, that brings vs newes of saluation, by how much their errand is better.

That Manoah might learne to acknowledge God in this man, he sets off the proffer of his thankfulnesse from himselfe, to God; and (as the same Angell which appeared to Gideon) turnes his feast into a sacrifice: And now hee is Manoahs sollicitor to
B better thankes than he offered. How forward the good Angells are to incite vnto piety! Either this was the Sonne himselfe, which said, it was his meat and drinke to doe his Fathers will, or else one of his spirituall attendance of the same diet. We can neuer feast the Angells better, than with our hearty sacrifices to God; Why doe not we learne this lesson of them, whom we propound to our selues as patterns of our obedience? We shall be once like the Angells in condition, why are we not in the meane time in our dispositions? If we doe not prouoke, and exhort one another to godlinesse, and doe care more for a feast than a sacrifice, our appetite is not Angelicall, but brutish.

It was an honest mind in Manoah, while he was addressing a sacrifice to God, yet
C not to neglect his messenger; faine would he know whom to honour; True piety is not vnciuill, but whiles it magnifies the Authour of all blessings, is thankfull to the meanes. Secondary causes are worthy of regard: neither need it detract any thing from the praise of the agent to honour the instrument. It is not only rudenesse, but iniustice in those, which can be content to heare good newes from God, with contempt of the bearers.

The Angell will neither take nor giue, but conceales his very name from Manoah. All honest motions are not fit to be yeelded to; good intentions are not alwaies sufficient grounds of condiscent. If we doe sometimes aske what we know not, it is no maruell if we receiue not what we aske. In some cases, the Angell of God tells his name vnasked, as Gabriel to the Virgin; here, not by intreaty: If it were the Angell
D of the couenant, he had as yet no name but Iehouah; if a created Angell, he had no commission to tell his name; and a faithfull messenger hath not a word beyond his charge: Besides that, he saw it would be of more vse for Manoah, to know him really, than by words. Oh the bold presumption of those men, which (as if they had long soiourned in heauen, and been acquainted with all the holy legions of spirits) discourse of their orders, of their titles, when this one Angell stops the mouth of a better man than they, with Why dost thou aske after my name, which is secret? Secret things to God, reuealed to vs and our children. No word can be so significant as actions; The act of the Angell tells best who hee was; Hee did wonderfully: wonderfull therefore was his name. So soone as euer the flame of the sacrifice ascended, hee
E mounted vp in the smoake of it; that Manoah might see the sacrifice, and the messenger belonged both to one God, and might know, both whence to acknowledge the message, and whence to expect the performance.

Gideons Angell vanished at his sacrifice, but this in the sacrifice; that Manoah might at once see both the confirmation of his promise, and the acceptation of his obedience, whiles the Angell of God vouchsafed to perfume himselfe with that holy smoake, and carry the scent of it vp into heauen. Manoah beleeued before, and craued no signe to assure him; God voluntarily confirmes it to him aboue his desire: To him that hath shall be giuen: Where there are beginnings of faith, the mercy of God will adde perfection.

How doe we thinke Manoah and his wife looked to see this spectacle? They had not spirit enough left to looke one vpon another: but in stead of looking vp cheerefully to heauen, they fall downe to the earth vpon their faces; as weake eyes are dazeled with that which ſhould comfort them. This is the infirmity of our nature, A to be afflicted with the cauſes of our ioy; to be aſtoniſhed with our confirmations; to conceiue death in that viſion of God, wherein our life and happineſſe conſiſts. If this homely ſight of the Angell did ſo confound good Manoah, what ſhall become of the enemies of God, when they ſhall be brought before the glorious Tribunall of the God of Angells?

I maruell not now, that the Angell appeared both times rather to the wife of Ma- noah; her faith was the ſtronger of the two. It falls out ſometimes, that the weaker veſſell is fuller; and that of more precious liquor: that wife is no helper, which is not ready to giue ſpirituall comfort to her husband; The reaſon was good, and irrefragable, If the Lord were pleaſed to kill vs, hee would not haue receiued a burnt offering from vs.
God will not accept gifts, where he intends puniſhment, and profeſſes hatred. The B ſacrifice of the wicked, is abomination to the Lord: If we can find aſſurance of Gods acceptation of our ſacrifices, we may be ſure he loues our perſons. If I incline to wic-kedneſſe in my heart, the Lord will not heare me; but the Lord hath heard me.

SAMSONS Marriage.

OF all the Deliuerers of Iſrael, there is none of whom are reported ſo many weakneſſes, or ſo many miracles, as of Sampſon. The newes which the Angell told of his conception and education, was not more ſtrange, C than the newes of his owne choyce; he but ſees a daughter of the Philiſtims, and falls in loue; All this ſtrength begins in infirmity; One maid of the Philiſtims ouercomes that Champion, which was giuen to ouercome the Philiſtims: Euen he that was dieted with water, found heat of vnfit deſires: As his body was ſtrong, notwithſtanding that fare, ſo were his paſſions; without the gift of continency, a low ſeed may impaire nature, but not inordination. To follow nothing but the eye in the choice of his wife, was a luſt vnworthy of a Nazarite;
This is to make the ſenſe not a Counſeller, but a Tyran.

Yet was Samſon in this very impotency, dutifull; He did not in the preſumption of his ſtrength rauiſh her forcibly; He did not make vp a clandeſtine match without conſulting with his parents, but he makes ſute to them for conſent; Giue mee her to D wife: As one that could be maſter of his owne act, though not of his paſſion; and as one that had learned to be a ſutor, as not to forget himſelfe to be a ſonne. Euen in this deplored ſtate of Iſrael, children durſt not preſume to be their owne caruers;
how much leſſe is this tolerable in a wel-guided and Chriſtian Common-wealth?
Whoſoeuer now diſpoſe of themſelues without their Parents, they doe wilfully vnchild themſelues, and change naturall affection for violent.

It is no maruell if Manoah and his wife were aſtoniſhed at this vnequall motion of their ſonne; Did not the Angel (thought they) tell vs that this child ſhould be conſecrated to God; and muſt he begin his youth in vnholy wedlocke? Did not the Angell ſay, that our ſon ſhould begin to ſaue Iſrael from the Philiſtims; and is he now captiued in his affections by a daughter of the Philiſtims? Shall our deliuerance from the E Philiſtims begin in an alliance? Haue we bin ſo ſcrupulouſly carefull, that he ſhould eate no vncleane thing, and ſhall we now conſent to an heatheniſh match? Now therefore, they grauely indeauour to coole this intemperate heat of his paſſion, with good counſell; as thoſe which well knew the inconueniences of an vnequall yoke; corruption in Religion, alienation of affections, diſtraction of thoughts, conniuence at Idolatry, death of zeale, dangerous vnderminings, and laſtly, an vnholy ſeed:
Who can blame them, if they were vnwilling to call a Philiſtim daughter?

I wiſh Manoah could ſpeake ſo loud, that all our Iſraelites might heare him; Is there neuer a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all Gods people, that thou goeſt to take a wife of the vncircumciſed Philiſtims? If Religion be any other than a cypher,

how

A how dare we not regard it in our moſt important choice? Is ſhe a faire Philiſtim? Why is not this deformity of the ſoule more powerfull to diſſwade vs, then the beauty of the face, or of metall to allure vs? To dote vpon a faire skin, when we ſee a Philiſtim vnder it, is ſenſuall and brutiſh.

Affection is not more blinde, then deafe. In vaine doe the parents ſeeke to alter a young man, not more ſtrong in body, then in will; Though he cannot defend his deſires, yet he purſues them; Get her, for ſhe pleaſes me. And although it muſt needes be a weake motion that can plead no reaſon, but appetite; yet the good Parents, ſith they cannot bow the affection of their ſonne with perſwaſion, dare not breake it with violence. As it becomes not children to bee forward in their choice; ſo parents may not be too peremptory in their deniall: It is not ſafe for children to ouer-
B run parents in ſetling their affections; nor for parents (where the impediments are not very materiall) to come ſhort of their children, when the affections are once ſetled: The one is diſobedience; the other may be tyranny.

I know not whether I may excuſe either Samſon in making this ſute, or his parents in yeelding to it, but a diuine diſpenſation in both: For on the one ſide, whiles the Spirit of God notes, that as yet his parents knew not this was of the Lord, it may ſeeme that he knew it; and is it likely he would know and not impart it? This alone was enough to win, yea to command his parents; It is not mine eye onely, but the counſell of God that leads me to his choice: The way to quarrell with the Philiſtims, is to match with them; If I follow mine affection, mine affection followes God, in this proiect. Surely, he that commanded his Prophet afterwards to marry
C an harlot, may haue appointed his Nazarite to marry with a Philiſtim: On the other ſide, whether it were of Gods permitting, or allowing, I find not: It might ſo be of God, as all the euill in the City; and then the interpoſition of Gods decree, ſhal be no excuſe of Samſon infirmity. I would rather thinke, that God meant onely to make a Treacle of a Viper; and rather appointed to fetch good out of Samſons euill, then to approue that for good in Samſon, which in it ſelfe was euill.

When Samſon went on wooing, he might haue made the ſluggards excuſe, There is a Lion in the way: but he that could not be ſtaid by perſwaſion, will not by feare. A Lion, young, wilde, fierce, hungry, comes roaring vpon him, when he had no weapon but his hand, no fence but his ſtrength: the ſame prouidence that carried him to Timnah, brought the Lion to him. It hath been euer the faſhion of God, to ex-
D erciſe his Champions with ſome initiatory incounters: Both Samſon and Dauid muſt firſt fight with Lions, then with Philiſtims; and he whoſe type they bore, meetes with that roaring Lion of the wilderneſſe, in the very threſhold of his publike charge. The ſame hand that prepared a Lion for Samſon, hath proportionable matches for euery Chriſtian; God neuer giues ſtrength, but he imployes it: Pouerty meetes one like an armed man; Infamy, like ſome furious Maſtiue, comes flying in the face of another: the wild Bore our of the foreſt, or the bloudy Tiger of perſecution ſets vpon one; the brawling curs of hereticall prauity or contentious neighbourhood, are ready to bait another: and by all theſe meaner and brutiſh aduerſaries, will God fit vs for greater conflicts: It is a pledge of our future victory ouer the ſpirituall Philiſtims, if we can ſay, My ſoule hath been among Lions. Come
E forth now, thou weak Chriſtian, and behold this preparatory battell of Samſon; Doſt thou thinke God deals hardly with thee in matching thee ſo hard, and calling thee forth to ſo many fraies? What dooſt thou but repine at thine owne glory? How ſhouldſt thou be victorious without reſiſtance?

If the parents of Samſon had now ſtood behind the hedge and ſeene this incounter, they would haue taken no further care of matching their ſonne with a Philiſtim; For who that ſhould ſee a ſtrong Lion ramping vpon an vnarmed man, would hope for his life and victory? The beaſt came briſtling vp his fearefull mane, waſting his raiſed ſterne; his eyes ſparkling with fury, his mouth roaring out knels of his laſt paſſage, and breathing death from his noſtrils, & now reioiced at ſo faire a prey. Surely, if the Lion had had no other aduerſary then him whom he ſaw, he had not loſt his hope; but now he could not ſee that his Maker was his enemy; The Spirit of the Lord came vpon Samſon; What is a beaſt in the hand of the Creator? He that ſtroke the Lyons with the awe of Adam, Noah, and Daniel, ſubdued this rebellious beaſt to Samſon; What maruell is it, if Samſon now tore him, as if it had beene a young Kid? If his bones had beene braſſe, and his skinne plates of yron, all had beene one: The right hand of the Lord bringeth mighty things to paſſe. A

If that roaring Lyon that goes about continually ſeeking whom he may deuoure, find vs alone among the vineyards of the Philiſtims, where is our hope? Not in our heeles; he is ſwifter than we: not in our weapons; we are naturally vnarmed: not in our hands, which are weake and languiſhing; but in the Spirit of that God, by whom wee can doe all things: If God fight in vs, who can reſiſt him? There is a ſtronger Lyon in vs, than that againſt vs. B

Samſon was not more valiant than modeſt; hee made no words of this great exployt: the greateſt performers euer make the leaſt noyſe; He that works wonders alone, could ſay, See thou tell no man; whereas thoſe, whoſe hands are moſt impotent, are buſieſt of their tongues. Great talkers ſhew, that they deſire only to be thought eminent, whereas the deepeſt waters are leaſt heard.

But whiles he concealed this euent from others, he pondered it in himſelfe; and when he returned to Timnath, went out of the way to ſee his dead Aduerſary, and could not but recall to himſelfe his danger, and deliuerance; Here the beaſt met mee, thus hee fought, thus I ſlew him. The very dead Lyon taught Samſon thankfulneſſe: there was more honey in this thought, than in the carkaſſe. The mercies of God are ill beſtowed vpon vs, if wee cannot ſtep aſide to view the monuments of his deliuerances; Dangers may be at once paſt, and forgotten. As Samſon had not found his hony-combe, if he had not turned aſide to ſee his Lyon; ſo wee ſhall loſe the comfort of Gods benefits, if we doe not renew our perills by meditation. C

Leſt any thing ſhould befall Samſon, wherein is not ſome wonder, his Lyon doth more amaze him dead than aliue; For loe, that carcaſſe is made an Hiue; and the bitterneſſe of death is turned into the ſweetneſſe of honey. The Bee a nice and dainty creature, builds her cells in an vnſauory carkaſſe; the carkaſſe that promiſed nothing but ſtrength, and annoyance, now offers comfort and refreſhing; and in a ſort, payes Samſon for the wrong offered. Oh the wonderfull goodneſſe of our God, that can change our terrour into pleaſure, and can make the greateſt euills beneficiall! Is any man by his humiliation vnder the hand of God, growne more faithfull and conſcionable? there is honey out of the Lyon. Is any man by his temptation or fall, become more circumſpect? there is alſo honey out of the Lyon: there is no Samſon, to whom euery Lyon doth not yeeld honey: Euery Chriſtian is the better for his euills; yea, Satan himſelfe, in his exerciſe of Gods children, aduantageth them. D

Samſon doth not diſdaine theſe ſweets, becauſe he finds them vncleanly laid; His diet was ſtrict, and forbad him any thing that ſauoured of legall impurity; yet hee eates the hony-combe out of the belly of a dead beaſt; good may not be refuſed, becauſe the meanes are accidentally euill; Hony is hony ſtill, though in a dead Lyon. Thoſe are leſſe wiſe, and more ſcrupulous than Samſon, which abhorre the graces of God, becauſe they finde them in ill veſſells: One cares not for the Preachers true Doctrine, becauſe his life is euill; Another will not take a good receit from the hand of a Phyſician, becauſe he is giuen to vnlawfull ſtudies; A third will not receiue a deſerued contribution from the hands of a Vſurer. It is a weake neglect, not to take the hony, becauſe we hate the Lyon: Gods children haue right to their fathers bleſſings where ſoeuer they finde them. E

The match is now made; Samſon (though a Nazarite) hath both a wedding, and a feaſt; God neuer miſliked moderate ſolemnities in the ſeuereſt life; and yet this Bridall-feaſt was long, the ſpace of ſeuen daies. If Samſon had matched with the beſt Iſraelite, this celebration had beene no greater; neither had this, perhaps, beene ſo long, if the cuſtome of the place had not required it. Now I doe not heare

A him plead his Nazaritiſme, for a colour of ſingularity: It is both lawfull and fit, in things not prohibited, to conforme our ſelues to the manners and rites of thoſe with whom wee liue.

That Samſon might thinke it an honour to match with the Philiſtims, he whom before the Lyon found alone, is now accompanied with thirty attendants; They called them companions, but they meant them for ſpies. The courteſies of the world are hollow and thankleſſe; neither doth it euer purpoſe ſo ill, as when it ſhews faireſt. None are ſo neer to danger: as thoſe whom it entertaines with ſmiles; whiles it frownes, wee know what to truſt to; but the fauours of it are worthy of nothing but feares and ſuſpicion: Open defiance is better than falſe loue.

Auſterity had not made Samſon vnciuill; he knowes how to entertaine Philiſtims
B with a formall familiarity: And that his intellectuall parts might be approued anſwerable to his armes, he will firſt try maſteries of wit, and ſet their braines on worke with harmleſſe thoughts; His riddle ſhall oppoſe them, and a deepe wager ſhall binde the ſolution; Thirty ſhirts, and thirty ſuits of raiment; neither their loſſe nor their gaine could be much, beſides the victory, being diuided into thirty parners: but Samſon muſt needs be both waies very large, who muſt giue or receiue thirty alone. The ſeuen daies of the feaſt are expiring, and yet they which had been all this while deuouring of Samſons meat, cannot tell who that eater ſhould be from whence meat ſhould come. In courſe of nature, the ſtrong feeder takes in meat, and ſends out filthineſſe; but, that meate and ſweetneſſe ſhould come from a deououring ſtomacke, was beyond their apprehenſion.

C And as fooles and dogs vſe to begin in ieſt, and end in earneſt, ſo did theſe Philiſtims; and therefore they force the Bride to intice her husband to betray himſelfe. Couetouſneſſe and Pride, haue made them impatient of loſſe: and now they threat to fire her, and her fathers houſe, for recompence of their entertainment, rather than they will loſe a ſmall wager to an Iſraelite. Somewhat of kinne to theſe ſauage Philiſtims, are thoſe cholericke Gameſter, which if the Dice be not their friend, fall out with God, curſe (that which is not) Fortune; ſtrike their fellowes, and are ready to take vengeance vpon themſelues: Thoſe men are vnfit for ſport, that loſe their patience together with their wager.

I doe not wonder, that a Philiſtim woman loued herſelfe and her Fathers family, more than an Iſraelitiſh Bride-grome; and if ſhe beſtowed teares vpon her husband,
D for the ranſome of them. Samſon himſelfe taught her this difference, I haue not told it my Father or my Mother, and ſhould I tell it thee? If ſhe had not beene as ſhee was, ſhe had neither done this to Samſon, nor heard this from him; Matrimoniall reſpects are dearer than naturall; It was the law of him that ordained marriage (before euer Parents were) that Parents ſhould be forſaken, for the husband or wife: But now, Iſraelitiſh Parents are worthy of more entireneſſe, than a wife of the Philiſtims: And yet whom the Lyon could not conquer, the teares of a woman haue conquered. Samſon neuer bewrayed infirmity but in vxorioufneſſe: What aſſurance can there be of him that hath a Philiſtim in his boſome? Adam, the perfecteſt man, Samſon, the ſtrongeſt man, Salomon, the wiſeſt man, were betraye with the flattery of their helpers. As there is no comfort comparable to a faithfull yoke-fellow: ſo woe be
E to him that is matched with a Philiſtim.

It could not but much diſcontent Samſon, to ſee that his aduerſaries had plowed with his Heifer, and that vpon his owne backe; now therefore he paies his wager to their coſt. Aſcalon, the City of the Philiſtims, is his wardrobe, hee fetches thence thirty ſuits, lined with the liues of the owners: He might with as much eaſe haue ſlaine theſe thirty companions, which were the authours of this euill; but his promiſe forbade him, whiles hee was to clothe their bodies, to vnclothe their ſoules; and that Spirit of God, which ſtirr'd him vp to reuenge, directed him in the choice of the ſubiects. If we wonder to ſee thirty throats cut for their ſuits, we may eaſily know, that this was but the occaſion of that ſlaughter, whereof the cauſe was their oppreſſion and tyranny. Dauid ſlew two hundred Philiſtims for their fore-skins:

but

but the ground of this act was their hostility. It is iust with God to destine what enemies he pleases, to execution: It is not to be expostulated why this man is stricken rather than another, when both are Philistims.

Samsons Victory.

I Can no more iustifie Samson in the leauing of his wife, then in the chusing her: He chose her, because she pleased him, and because she despised him, he left her. Though her feare made her false to him in his Riddle, yet shee was true to his bed: That weake treachery was worthy of a checke, not a desertion. All the passions of Samson were strong, like himselfe: but (as vehement motions are not lasting) this vehement winde is soone allaid; and he is now returning with a Kid, to winne her that had offended him, and to renue that feast which ended in her vnkindnesse. Slight occasions may not breake the knot of matrimoniall loue; and if any iust offence haue slackned it on either part, it must be fastned againe by speedy reconciliation.

Now Samsons father in law shewes himselfe a Philistim, the true parent of her that betraied her husband; for no sooner is the Bride-groome departed, then he changes his son: What pretence of friendship soeuer he made, a true Philistim will soone be weary of an Israelite. Samson hath not so many daies liberty to enioy his wedding as he spent in celebrating it: Marriage hath bin euer a sacred Institution, and who but a Philistim would so easily violate it? One of his thirty companions enioies his wife, together with his sute; and now laughs to be a partner of that bed, wheron he was an attendant. The good nature of Samson, hauing forgotten the first wrong, carried him to a proffer of familiarity, & is repulsed; but with a gentle violence, I had thought thou hadst hated her. Lawful wedlock may not be dissolued by imaginations, but by proofs.

Who shall stay Samson from his owne wife? He that slew the Lion in the way of his wooing, and before whom thousands of the Philistims could not stand, yet suffers himselfe to be resisted by him that was once his father in Law, without any returne of priuate violence.

Great is the force of duty once conceiued, euen to the most vnworthy: This thought I was his son, bindes the hands of Samson; else how easily might he, that slew those thirty Philistims for their sutes, haue destroied this family of his wife? How vnnaturall are those mouths, that can curse the loines from which they are proceeded; and those hands that dare lift vp themselues against the meanes of their life and being?

I neuer read that Samson slew any but by the motion and assistance of the Spirit of God: and the diuine wisedome hath reserued these offenders to another reuenge. Iudgement must descend from others to them, sith the wrong proceeded from others, by them. In the very marriage, God fore-saw and intended this parting, and in the parting, this punishment vpon the Philistims. If the Philistims had not been as much enemies to God, as to Samson; enemies to Israel in their oppression, no lesse then to Samson in this particular iniury, that purpose and execution of reuenge had been no better than wicked: Now he to whom vengeance belongs, sets him on work, and makes the act iustice: when he commands, euen very cruelty is obedience.

It was a busie and troublesome proiect of Samson, to vse the foxes for his reuenge: for not without great labor and many hands could so many wild creatures be got together, neither could the wit of Samson want other deuices of hostility: but hee meant to find out such a punishment, as might in some sort answer the offence, and might imply as much contempt, as trespasse. By wiles, seconded with violence, had they wronged Samson, in extorting his secret, and taking away his wife: and what other Embleme could these foxes tied together present vnto them, then wilinesse combined by force to worke mischiefe?

These foxes destroy their corn, before he which sent thē destroy the persons. Those iudge-

A iugdements which begin in outward things, end in the owners: A ſtranger that had been of neither ſide, would haue ſaid, What pity is it, to ſee good corne thus ſpoiled? If the creature be conſidered apart from the owners, it is good; and therefore if it be miſ-ſpent, the abuſe reflects vpon the maker of it; but if it be looked vpon with reſpect to an ill Maſter, the beſt vſe of it is to periſh. He therefore that ſlew the Egyptian cattell with murraine, and ſmote their fruit with haileſtones, he that conſumed the vines of Iſrael with the Palmer-worme, and Caterpiller, and Canker-worme, ſent alſo Foxes by the hand of Samſon, into the fields of the Philiſtims. Their corne was too good for them to inioy, not too good for the Foxes to burne vp: God had rather his creatures ſhould periſh any way, than ſerue for the luſt of the wicked.

There could not be ſuch ſecrecy in the catching of three hundred Foxes, but it
B might well be knowne who had procured them: Rumour will ſwiftly flie of things not done: but of a thing ſo notoriouſly executed, it is no maruell if Fame be a blab. The mention of the offence drawes in the prouocation: and now the wrong to Samſon is ſcanned and reuenged; Becauſe the fields of the Philiſtims are burned for the wrong done to Samſon by the Timnite in his daughter, therefore the Philſtims burne the Timnite and his daughter. The tying of the fire-brand betweene two Foxes, was not ſo witty a policy, as the ſetting of a fire of diſſention betwixt the Philiſtims. What need Samſon be his owne executioner, when his enemies will vndertake that charge? There can be no more pleaſing proſpect to an Iſraelite, than to ſee the Philiſtims together by the eares.

If the wife of Samſon had not feared the fire for her ſelfe, and her fathers houſe, ſhe
C had not betrayed her husband, her husband had not thus plagued the Philiſtims, the Philiſtims had not conſumed her and her father with fire: now ſhe leaps into that flame which ſhe meant to auoid. That euill which the wicked feared, meets them in their flight: How many in a feare of pouerty, ſeeke to gaine vnconſcionably, and die beggers? How many to ſhunne paine and danger, haue yeelded to euill, and in the long runne, haue beene met in the teeth with that miſchiefe, which they had hoped to haue left behind them? How many in a deſire to eſchew the ſhame of men, haue falne into the confuſion of God? Both good and euill are ſure paimaſters at the laſt.

He that was ſo ſoone pacified towards his wife, could not but haue thought this reuenge more than enough, if he had not rather weilded Gods quarrell than his own;
D He knew that God had raiſed him vp on purpoſe, to be a ſcourge to the Philiſtims, whom as yet he had angred more than puniſhed: As if theſe therefore had been but flouriſhes before the fray, he ſtirres vp his courage, and ſtrikes them both hip and thigh, with a mighty plague. The God which can doe nothing imperfectly, where he begins either mercy or iudgement, will not leaue till he haue happily finiſhed: As it is in his fauours, ſo in his puniſhments; One ſtroke drawes on another.

The Iſraelites were but ſlaues, and the Philiſtims were their Maſters: ſo much more indignely therefore muſt they needs take it, to be thus affronted by one of their owne vaſſalls, yet ſhall we commend the moderation of theſe Pagans. Samſon, being not mortally wronged by one Philiſtim, falls foule vpon the whole Nation; the Philiſtims hainouſly offended by Samſon, doe not fall vpon the whole Tribe of
E Iudah, but being muſtered together, call to them for ſatisfaction from the perſon offending: The ſame hand of God which wrought Samſon to reuenge, reſtrained them from it; It is no thanke to themſelues, that ſometimes wicked men cannot be cruell.

The men of Iudah are by their feare made friends to their Tyrants, and traytors to their friends; It was in their cauſe that Samſon had ſhed blood, and yet they conſpire with the Philiſtims to deſtroy their owne fleſh and blood. So ſhall the Philiſtims be quit with Iſrael, that as Samſon by Philiſtims reuenged himſelfe of Philiſtims; ſo they of an Iſraelite, by the hand of Iſraelites. That which open enemies dare not attempt, they worke by falſe brethren; and theſe are ſo much more perilous, as they are more entire.

It

It had beene no lesse easie for Samson to haue slaine those thousands of Iudah that came to binde him, than those other of the Philistims that meant to kill him bound: And what if hee had said; Are yee turned traytors to your Deliuerer? your blood be vpon your owne heads: but the Spirit of God (without whom he could not kill either beast or man) would neuer stirre him vp to kill his brethren, though degenerated into Philistims; they haue more power to binde him, than he to kill them: Israelitish blood was precious to him, that made no more scruple of killing a Philistim, than a Lyon. That bondage and vsury that was allowed to a Iew from a Pagan, might not be exacted from a Iew. A

The Philistims that had before plowed with Samsons Heifer in the case of the Riddle, are now plowing a worse furrow with an Heifer more his owne. I am ashamed to heare these cowardly Iewes say, Knowest thou not that the Philistims are Lords ouer vs? Why hast thou done thus vnto vs? Wee are therefore come to binde thee. Whereas they should haue said; Wee finde these tyrannicall Philistims to vsurp dominion ouer vs; thou hast happily begun to shake off their yoke, and now we are come to second thee with our seruice; the valour of such a Captaine shall easily lead vs forth to liberty; wee are ready either to die with thee, or be freed by thee: A fearefull man can neuer be a true friend; rather than incurre any danger, he will be false to his owne soule. O cruell mercy of these men of Iudah! Wee will not kill thee, but wee will binde thee, and deliuer thee to the hands of the Philistims, that they may kill thee. As if it had not beene much worse to die an ignominious and tormenting death, by the hands of the Philistims, than to be at once dispatch'd by them, which wish'd either his life safe, or his death easie. B

When Saul was pursued by the Philistims vpon the mountaines of Gilboa, hee could say to his Armour-bearer, Draw forth thy sword and kill me, lest the vncircumcised come and thrust me thorow, and mocke mee; and at last, would rather fall vpon his owne sword, than theirs: And yet these cousins of Samson can say, We will not kill thee, but wee will binde thee and deliuer thee. It was no excuse to these Israelites, that Samsons binding had more hope, than his death; It was more in the extraordinary mercy of God, than their will, that he was not tyed with his last bonds: Such is the goodnesse of the Almighty, that hee turnes the cruell intentions of wicked men to an aduantage. C

Now these Iewes that might haue let themselues loose from their owne bondage, are binding their Deliuerer, whom yet they knew able to haue resisted. In the greatest strength, there is vse of patience; There was more fortitude in this suffering, than in his former actions; Samson abides to be tyed by his owne countrymen, that he may haue the glory of freeing himselfe victoriously. Euen so, O Sauiour our better Nazarite, thou which couldst haue called to thy Father, and haue had twelue Legions of Angells for thy rescue, wouldst be bound voluntarily, that thou mightst rriumph; So the blessed Martyrs were racked, and would not be loosed, because they expected a better resurrection. If we be not as well ready to suffer ill, as to doe good, we are not fit for the consecration of God. D

To see Samson thus strongly manicled, and exposed to their full reuenge, could not but be a glad spectacle to these Philistims; and their ioy was so full, that it could not but flie out of their mouthes in shouting and laughter; Whom they saw loose with terror, it is pleasure to see bound. It is the sport of the spirituall Philistims, to see any of Gods Nazarites fettered with the cords of iniquity; & their Imps are ready to say, Aha; so would we haue it. But the euent answers their false ioy, with the clause of triumph, Reioyce not ouer me, O mine enemy: though I fall, yet I shall rise againe. How soone was the countenance of these Philistims changed, & their shouts turned into shriekings? The Spirit of the Lord came vpon Samson: and then, what are cords to the Almighty? His new bonds are as flaxe burnt with fire; and he rouzes vp himselfe like that yong Lyon whom he first incountred, and flies vpon those cowardly aduersaries, who if they had not seene his cords, durst not haue seene his face. If they had been so many diuells as men, they could not haue stood before the Spirit, which lifted vp the E

heart

A heart and hand of Samſon. Wicked men neuer ſee fairer proſpect, than when they are vpon the very threſhold of deſtruction; Security and Ruine are ſo cloſe bordring vpon each other, that where we ſee the face of the one, we may be ſure the other is at his backe. Thus didſt thou, O bleſſed Sauiour, when thou wert faſtened to the Croſſe, when thou layeſt bound in the graue with the cords of death; thus didſt thou miraculouſly raiſe vp thy ſelfe, vanquiſh thine enemies, and lead captiuitie captiue; Thus doe all thy holy ones, when they ſeeme moſt forſaken, and laid open to the inſultation of the world, finde thy Spirit mighty to their deliuerance, and the diſcomfiture of their malicious aduerſaries.

Thoſe three thouſand Iſraelites were not ſo ill aduiſed, as to come vp into the Rocke vnweaponed, to apprehend Samſon; Samſon therefore might haue had his B choyce of ſwords, or ſpeares, for his skirmiſh with the Philſtims; yet he leaues all the munition of Iſrael, and finding the new iaw-bone of an Aſſe, takes that vpon his hand, and with that baſe inſtrument of death, ſends a thouſand Philiſtims to their place. All the ſwords and ſhields of the armed Philiſtims, cannot reſiſt that contemptible Engine, which hath now left a thouſand bodies, as dead as the carkaſſe of that beaſt, whoſe bone it was. This victory was not in the weapon, was not in the arme: it was the Spirit of God, which moued the weapon in the arme. O God, if the meanes be weake, yet thou art ſtrong: Through God wee ſhall doe great acts; Yea, I can doe all things through him that ſtrengtheneth mee. Seeſt thou a poore Chriſtian, which by weake counſell hath obtained to ouercome a tentation? there is the Philiſtim vanquiſh'd with a ſorry iaw-bone.

C It is no maruell if hee were thus admirably ſtrong and victorious, whoſe bodily ſtrength God meant to make a Type of the ſpirituall power of Chriſt: And behold, as the three thouſands of Iudah ſtood ſtill, gazing with their weapons in their hand whiles Samſon alone ſubdued the Philiſtims; ſo did men and Angells ſtand looking vpon the glorious atchieuements of the Sonne of God, who might iuſtly ſay, I haue trod the wine-preſſe alone.

Both the Samſons complained of thirſt; The ſame God which gaue this Champion victory, gaue him alſo refreſhing; and by the ſame meanes; The ſame bone yeelds him both conqueſt, and life; and is of a weapon of offence, turned into a Well of water: He that fetch'd water out of the flint for Iſrael, fetches it out of a bone for Samſon. What is not poſſible to the infinite power of that Almighty Creator, that D made all things of nothing? He can giue Samſon hony from the mouth of the Lyon, and water from the mouth of the Aſſe. Who would not cheerefully depend vpon that God, which can fetch moyſture out of drineſſe, and life out of death?

SAMSONS end.

E Cannot wonder more at Samſons ſtrength, than his weakneſſe; Hee that beganne to caſt away his loue vpon a wife of the Philiſtims, goes on to miſ-ſpend himſelfe vpon the harlots of the Philiſtims: He that did not ſo much ouercome the men, as the women ouercome him. His affections blinded him firſt, ere the Philiſtims could doe it: Would hee elſe, after the effuſion of ſo much of their blood, haue ſuffered his luſt to carry him within their walls, as one that cared more for his pleaſure, than his life? Oh ſtrange debauchednеſſe, and preſumption of a Nazarite! The Philiſtims are vp in Armes to kill him; he offers himſelfe to their City, to their ſtewes, and dare expoſe his life to one of their harlots, whom hee had ſlaughtered. I would haue looked to haue ſeene him betake himſelfe to his ſtronger Rocke, than that of Etam, and by his auſtere deuotion, to ſeeke protection of him, of whom he receiued ſtrength: but now, as if he had forgotten his conſecration, I finde him turned Philiſtim for his bed, and of a Nazarite, ſcarce a man. In vaine doth he

nouriſh

nouriſh his haire, whiles he feeds theſe paſſions. How eaſily do vigor of body, and infirmity of mind lodge vnder one roofe? On the contrary, a weariſh outſide is a ſtrong motiue to mortification: Samſons victories haue ſubdued him, and haue made him firſt a ſlaue to lewd deſires, and then to the Philſtims. I may ſafely ſay, that more veſſells miſcarry with a faire gale, than with a tempeſt. A

Yet was not Samſon ſo blinded with luſt, as not at all to looke before him; hee fore-ſaw, the morning would be dangerous, the bed of his fornication therefore could hold him no longer than midnight? then he riſes, and in a mocke of thoſe ambuſhes which the Azzahites layd for him, he carries away the gates wherein they thought to haue encaged him. If a temptation haue drawne vs aſide, to lie downe to ſinne, it is happy for vs, if we can riſe ere we be ſurprized with iudgement. Samſon had not left his ſtrength in the bed of an harlot; neither had that God which gaue it him, ſtript him of it with his clothes, when he laid him downe in vncleanneſſe: His mercy vſes not to take vantage of our vnworthineſſe, but euen when wee caſt him off, holds vs faſt. That bountifull hand leaues vs rich of common graces, when we haue miſ-ſpent our better ſtore: Like as our firſt Parents, when they had ſpoyled themſelues of the Image of their Creator, yet were left wealthy of noble faculties of the ſoule. B

I find Samſon come off from his ſinne with ſafety, he runnes away lightly with an heauier weight than the gates of Azzah, the burthen of an ill act. Preſent impunity argues not an abatement of the wickedneſſe of his ſinne, or of the diſlike of God: nothing is ſo worthy of pitty, as ſinners peace: Good is not therefore good, becauſe it proſpers, but becauſe it is commanded: Euill is not euill becauſe it is puniſhed, but becauſe it is forbidden. C

If the holy Parents of Samſon liued to ſee theſe outrages of their Nazarite, I doubt whether they did not repent of their ioy, to heare the newes of a ſonne. It is a ſhame to ſee how he that might not drinke wine, is drunke with the cup of fornications; His luſt carries him from Azzah, to the plaine of Sorek, and now hath found a Dalilah, that ſhall pay him for all his former vncleanneſſe. Sinne is ſteepe and ſlippery, and if after one fall, we haue found where to ſtand, it is the praiſe, not of our footing, but of the hand of God.

The Princes of the Philiſtims knew already where Samſons weakneſſe lay, though not his ſtrength; and therefore they would intice his harlot by gifts, to intice him by her dalliance to betray himſelfe. It is no maruell, if ſhe that would be filthy, would be alſo perfidious. How could Samſon chuſe but thinke, if luſt had not bewitched him, She, whoſe body is mercenary to me, will eaſily ſell me to others; She will be falſe, if ſhe will be an harlot. A wide conſcience will ſwallow any ſinne? Thoſe that haue once thralled themſelues to a known euill, can make no other difference of ſins, but their owne loſſe, or aduantage: A lyer can ſteale, a theefe can kill; a cruell man can be a Traytor; a drunkard can falſifie; wickedneſſe once entertained, can put on any ſhape. Truſt him in nothing, that makes not a conſcience of euery thing. D

Was there euer ſuch another motion made to a reaſonable man? Tell mee wherein thy great ſtrength lyeth, and wherewith thou mayeſt be bound to doe thee hurt. Who would not haue ſpurned ſuch a ſutor out of doores? What will not impudency aske, or ſtupiditie receiue? Hee that killed the thouſand Philiſtims for comming to binde him, indures this harlot of the Philiſtims to conſult with himſelfe of binding him; and when vpon the triall of a falſe anſwer, hee ſaw ſo apparant trechery, yet wilfully betrayes his life by her, to his enemies: All ſinnes, all paſſions haue power to infatuate a man, but luſt moſt of all. Neuer man that had drunke flagons of wine, had leſſe reaſon than this Nazarite; Many a one loſes his life; but this caſts it away; not in hatred of himſelfe, but in loue to a ſtrumpet. We wonder that a man could poſſibly be ſo ſottiſh, and yet we our ſelues by tentation become no leſſe inſenſate; Sinfull pleaſures, like a common Dalilah, lodge in our boſomes: we know they aime at nothing but the death of our ſoule, we will yeeld to them, and die: Euery willing ſinner is a Samſon, let vs not inueigh a- E

gainſt

A gainſt his ſenſleſneſſe, but our own: Nothing is ſo groſſe and vnreaſonable to a wel diſpoſed minde, which tentation will not repreſent fit, and plauſible: No ſoule can out of his owne ſtrength ſecure himſelfe from that ſinne which hee moſt deteſteth.

As an hood-winck'd man ſees ſome little glimmering of light, but not enough to guide him; ſo did Samſon, who had reaſon enough left him to make triall of Dalilah, by a crafty miſ-information; but not enough vpon that triall, to diſtruſt and hate her; hee had not wit enough to deceiue her thrice, not enough to keepe himſelfe from being deceiued by her. It is not ſo great wiſedome to proue them whom wee diſtruſt, as it is folly to truſt them whom we haue found trecherous: Thrice had he ſeene the Philiſtims in her chamber, ready to ſurprize him, vpon her bonds; and yet will needs be a ſlaue to his Traytor. Warning not taken, is a certaine preſage of de-
B druction; and if once neglected it receiue pardon, yet thrice is deſperate.

What man would euer play thus with his owne ruine? His harlot bindes him, and calls in her executioners to cut his throat; he riſes to ſaue his owne life, and ſuffers them to carry away theirs in peace. Where is the courage of Samſon? Where his zeale? He that killed the Philiſtims for their clothes; Hee that ſlew a thouſand of them in the field at once; in this quarrell, now ſuffers them in his chamber vnreuenged. Whence is this? His hands were ſtrong, but his heart was effeminate; his harlot had deliuered his affection. Whoſoeuer ſlackens the reignes to his ſenſuall appetite, ſhall ſoone grow vnfit for the calling of God. Samſon hath broke the greene withies, the new ropes, the wooſe of his haire, and yet ſtill ſuffers himſelfe fettered with thoſe inuiſible bonds of an harlots loue, and can indure her to ſay, How canſt thou
C ſay I loue thee, when thy heart is not with me? thou haſt mocked me theſe three times: Whereas he ſhould rather haue ſaid vnto her, How canſt thou challenge any loue from me, that haſt thus thrice ſought my life? Oh canſt thou thinke my mocks a ſufficient reuenge of this trechery; but contrarily, he melts at this fire; and by her importunate inſinuations, is wrought againſt himſelfe. Wearineſſe of ſollicitation hath won ſome to thoſe actions, which at the firſt motion they deſpiſed; like as we ſee ſome ſutors are diſpatcht, not for the equity of the cauſe, but the trouble of the proſecution; becauſe it is more eaſie to yeeld, not more reaſonable. It is more ſafe to keepe our ſelues out of the noyſe of ſuggeſtions, than to ſtand vpon our power of deniall.

Who can pitty the loſſe of that ſtrength which was ſo abuſed? Who can pitty him the loſſe of his locks, which after ſo many warnings can ſleepe in the lap of Da-
D lilah? It is but iuſt, that he ſhould riſe vp from thence ſhauen and feeble; not a Nazarite, ſcarce a man. If his ſtrength had line in his haire, it had been out of himſelfe; it was not therefore in his locks, it was in his conſecration, whereof that haire was a ſigne. If the razor had come ſooner vpon his head, he had ceaſed to be a Nazarite; and the gift of God had at once ceaſed, with the calling of God: not for the want of that excretion, but for want of obedience. If God withdraw his graces, when he is too much prouoked, who can complaine of his mercy? He that ſleeps in ſinne, muſt looke to wake in loſſe and weakneſſe. Could Samſon thinke, Though I tell her, my ſtrength lies in my haire, yet ſhe will not cut it, or though ſhe doe cut my haire, yet ſhall I not loſe my ſtrength: that now hee riſes and ſhakes himſelfe in hope of his former vigour? Cuſtome of ſucceſſe makes men confident in their ſinnes, and cauſes
E them to miſtake an arbitrary tenure for a perpetuity.

His eyes were the firſt offenders, which betrayed him to luſt: and now they are firſt pulled out, and he is led a blinde captiue to Azzah, where he was firſt captiued to his luſt. The Azzahites, which lately ſaw him not without terror, running lightly away with their gates at midnight, ſee him now in his owne perpetuall night ſtrugling with his chaines: and that hee may not want paine; together with his bondage, he muſt grind in his priſon.

As hee paſſed the ſtreet, euery boy among the Philiſtims could throw ſtones at him, euery woman could laugh and ſhout at him; and what one Philiſtim doth not ſay, whiles he laſhes him vntill blood, there is for my brothers, or my kinſman whom thou ſleweſt: Who can looke to runne away with a ſinne, when Samſon a Nazarite is thus plagued? This great heart could not but haue broken with indignation, if it had not pacified it ſelfe with the conſcience of the iuſt deſert of all this vengeance. A

It is better for Samſon to be blinde in priſon, than to abuſe his eyes in Sorek: yea, I may ſafely ſay, he was more blinde when he ſaw licentiouſly, than now that he ſees not. He was a greater ſlaue when he ſerued his affections, than now in grinding for the Philiſtims. The loſſe of his eyes ſhewes him his ſinne; neither could hee ſee how ill he had done, till he ſaw not.

Euen yet, ſtill the God of mercy look'd vpon the blindneſſe of Samſon, and in theſe fetters inlargeth his heart from the worſe priſon of his ſinne; his haire grew together with his repentance, and his ſtrength with his haire. Gods mercifull humiliations of his owne, are ſometimes ſo ſeuere, that they ſeeme to differ little from deſertions, yet at the worſt, hee loues vs bleeding: and when wee haue ſmarted enough, wee ſhall feele it. B

What thankfull Idolaters were theſe Philiſtims? They could not but know, that their bribes, and their Delilah, had deliuered Samſon to them; and yet they ſacrifice to their Dagon; and, as thoſe that would be liberall in caſting fauors vpon a ſenſeleſſe Idoll (of whom they could receiue none) they cry out, Our god hath deliuered our enemy into our hands. Where was their Dagon, when a thouſand of his clients were ſlaine with an Aſſes iaw? there was more ſtrength in that bone, than in all the makers of this god; and yet theſe vaine Pagans ſay, Our god. It is the quality of ſuperſtition to miſ-interpret all euents, and to feed it ſelfe with the conceit of thoſe fauours which are ſo farre from being done, that their authors neuer were. Why doe not we learne zeale of Idolaters? And if they be ſo forward in acknowledgment of their deliuerances to a falſe deity; how cheerfully ſhould we aſcribe ours to the true? O God, whatſoeuer be the meanes, thou art the Authour of all our ſucceſſe: O that man would praiſe the Lord for his goodneſſe, and tell the wonders that he hath done for the ſonnes of men! C

No Muſician would ſerue for this feaſt, but Samſon; he muſt now be their ſport, which was once their terror, that he might want no ſorrow; ſcorne is added to his miſery: Euery wit and hand plaies vpon him; Who is not ready to caſt his bone and his ieſt at ſuch a captiue? So as doubtleſſe he wiſh'd himſelfe no leſſe deafe, than blind, and that his ſoule might haue gone out with his eyes. Oppreſſion is able to make a wiſe man mad; & the greater the courage is, the more painful the inſultation.

Now Samſon is puniſhed, ſhall the Philiſtims eſcape? If the iudgement of God beginne at his owne, what ſhall become of his enemies? This aduantage ſhall Samſon make of their tyranny, that now death is no puniſhment to him, his ſoule ſhall flie forth in this bitterneſſe, without paine; and that his dying reuenge ſhall be no leſſe ſweet to him than the liberty of his former life. Hee could not but feele God mock'd through him; and therefore whiles they are ſcoffing, he prayes, his ſeriouſneſſe hopes to pay them; for all thoſe ieſts. If hee could haue beene thus earneſt with God in his proſperity, the Philiſtims had wanted this laughing ſtocke. No deuotion is ſo feruent, as that which ariſes from extremity; O Lord God, I pray thee thinke vpon mee; O God, I beſeech thee ſtrengthen mee at this time onely. Though Samſons haire were ſhorter, yet he knew, Gods hand was not; as one therefore that had yet eyes enow to ſee him that was inuiſible, and whoſe faith was recouered before his ſtrength, he ſues to that God, which was a party in this indignity, for power to reuenge his wrongs more than his owne: It is zeale that moues him, and not malice; his reuiued faith tells him, that hee was deſtined to plague the Philiſtims, and reaſon tells him, that his blindneſſe puts him out of the hope of ſuch another opportunity. Knowing therefore, that this play of the Philiſtims muſt end in his death, he collects all the forces of his ſoule and body, that his death may be a puniſhment in ſtead of a diſport; and that his ſoule may be more victorious in the parting, than in the animation: and ſo addreſſes himſelfe both to die, and kill; as one whoſe ſoule ſhall not feele his owne diſſolution, whiles it ſhall carry ſo many thouſand Philiſtims with it to the pit. All the acts of Samſon are for wonder not for imitation: D E tion: So diddest thou, O blessed Sauiour, our better Samson, conquer in dying, and triumphing vpon the chariot of the Crosse, diddest lead captiuity captiue: The law, sinne, death, hell, had neuer beene vanquish'd but by thy death: All our life, liberty and glory, springs ont of thy most precious blood.

MICHAES Idolatry.

THe mother of Micha hath lost her siluer, and now she falls to cursing: she did afterwards but change the forme of her god; her siluer was her god, ere it did put on the fashion of an image: else she had not so much cursed to lose it, if it had not too much possessed her in the keeping. A carnall heart cannot forgoe that wherein it delights, without impatience; canot be impatient, without curses: whereas the man that hath learned to inioy God, and vse the world, smiles at a shipwracke, and pitties a thiefe, and cannot curse, but pray.

Micha had so little grace, as to steale from his mother; and that out of wantonnesse, not out of necessity, for if shee had not beene rich, so much could not haue beene stolne from her; and now, he hath so much grace as to restore it; her curses haue fetcht againe her treasure: He cannot so much loue the money, as hee feares her imprecations: Wealth seemes too deare, bought with a curse: Though his fingers were false, yet his heart was tender. Many that make not conscience of committing sinne, yet make conscience of facing it: It is well for them, that they are but nouices in euill. Those whom custome hath fleshed in sinne, can either deny and forsweare, or excuse and defend it: their seared hearts cannot feele the gnawing of any remorse; and their forehead hath learned to be as impudent, as their heart is senslesse.

I see no argument of any holinesse in the mother of Micha: her curses were sinne to her selfe, yet Micha dares not but feare them. I know not whether the causlesse curse be more worthy of pitty, or derision; it hurts the Authour, not his aduersary: but the deserued curses that fall euen from vnholy mouthes, are worthy to be feared: How much more should a man hold himselfe blasted with the iust imprecations of the godly? What mettall are those made of, that can applaud themselues in the bitter curses which their oppressions haue wrung from the poore, and reioyce in these signes of their prosperity?

Neither yet was Micha more stricken with his mothers curses, than with the conscience of sacriledge: so soone as he findes there was a purpose of deuotion in this treasure, he dares not conceale it, to the preiudice (as he thought) of God, more than of his mother. What shall we say to the palate of those men, which as they finde no good relish but in stolne waters; so best in those, which are stolne from the fountaine of God? How soone hath the old woman changed her note? Euen now shee passed an indefinite curse upon her sonne for stealing; and now shee blesses him absolutely, for restoring; Blessed be my sonne of the Lord. She hath forgotten the theft, when shee sees the restitution: How much more shall the God of mercies be more pleased with our confession, than prouoked with our sinne?

I doubt not but this siluer, and this superstition came out of Egypt, together with the mother of Micha. This history is not so late in time, as in place, for the Tribe of Dan was not yet setled in that first diuision of the promised land; so as this old woman had seene both the Idolatry of Egypt, and the golden Calfe in the wildernesse; and no doubt contributed some of her earerings to that Deity; and after all the plagues which she saw inflicted vpon her brethren, for that Idoll of Horeb, and Baal-Peor, she still reserues a secret loue to superstition, and now shewes it. Where mis-religion hath once possessed it selfe of the heart, it is very hardly cleansed out; but (like the plague) will hang in the very cloathes, and after long lurking, breake forth in an vnexpected infection; and old wood is the apteſt to take this fire: After all the airing in the deſart, Michaes mother will ſmell of Egypt. A

It had beene better the ſiluer had beene ſtolne than thus beſtowed, for now they haue ſo imploied it, that it hath ſtolne away their hearts from God; and yet while it is molten into an image, they thinke it dedicated to the Lord. If Religion might be iudged according to the intention, there ſhould ſcarce be any Idolatry in the world. This woman loued her ſiluer enough; and if ſhe had not thought this coſtly piety, worth thanks, ſhe knew which way to haue imploied her ſtocke to aduantage: Euen euill actions, haue oft times good meanings, and thoſe good meanings are anſwered with euill recompences. Many a one beſtowes their coſt, their labour, their blood, and receiues torment in ſtead of thanks.

Behold a ſuperſtitious ſonne of a ſuperſtitious mother; She makes a god, and he harbours it; yea, (as the ſtreame is commonly broader than the head) he exceeds his mother in euill: He hath an houſe of gods, an Ephod, Teraphin; and that he might be complete in his deuotion, he makes his ſonne his Prieſt, and feoffes that ſinne vpon his ſonne, which he receiued from his mother. Thoſe ſinnes which nature conuayes not to vs, we haue by imitation. Euery action and geſture of the Parents, is an example to the childe; and the mother, as ſhee is more tender ouer her ſonne, ſo by the power of a reciprocall loue, ſhee can worke moſt vpon his inclination. Whence it is, that in the hiſtory of the Iſraelitiſh Kings, the mothers name is commonly noted: and as ciuilly, ſo alſo morally, The birth followes the belly. Thoſe ſonnes may bleſſe their ſecond birth, that are deliuered from the ſinnes of their education. B C

Who cannot but thinke how farre Micha ouer-look'd all his fellow Iſraelites, and thought them profane and godleſſe in compariſon of himſelfe? How did he ſecretly clap himſelfe on the breſt, as the man, whoſe happineſſe it was to ingroſſe Religion from all the Tribes of Iſrael, and little can imagine, that the further he runs, the more out of the way. Can an Iſraelite be thus paganiſh? O Micha! how hath ſuperſtition bewitched thee, that thou canſt not ſee rebellion in euery of theſe actions, yea, in euery circumſtance, rebellion? What more gods than one? An houſe of gods, beſide Gods houſe? An Image of ſiluer to the inuiſible God? An Ephod, and no Prieſt? A Prieſt, beſides the family of Leui? A Prieſt of thine owne begetting, of thine owne conſecration? What monſters doth mans imagination produce, when it is forſaken of God? It is well ſeene there is no King in Iſrael. If God had been their King, his lawes had ruled them. If Moſes or Ioſhua had been their King, their ſword had awed them. If any other, the courſes of Iſrael could not haue been ſo headleſſe. We are beholden to Gouernment for order, for peace, for Religion. Where there is no King, euery one will be a King, yea, a God to himſelfe. We are worthy of nothing but confuſion, if we bleſſe not God for authority. D

It is no maruell if Leuites wandred for maintenance, while there was no King in Iſrael. The tithes and offrings were their due: if theſe had bin paid, none of the holy Tribe needed to ſhift his ſtation. Euen where Royall power ſeconds the claime of the Leuite, the iniuſtice of men ſhortens his right. What ſhould become of the Leuites, if there were no King? And what of the Church, if no Leuites? No King, therefore no Church. How could the impotent child liue without a Nurſe? Kings ſhall be thy nurſing fathers, and Queens thy nurſes, ſaith God. Nothing more argues the diſorder of any Church, or the decay of Religion, than the forced ſtragling of the Leuites. There is hope of growth, when Micha rides to ſeeke a Leuite; but when the Leuite comes to ſeeke a ſeruice of Micha, it is a ſigne of a gaſping deuotion. E

Micha was no obſcure man; all Mount Ephraim could not but take notice of his domeſticall gods. This Leuite could not but heare of his diſpoſition, of his miſ-deuotion; yet want of maintenance, no leſſe than conſcience drawes him on, to the danger of Idolatrous patronage. Holineſſe is not tied to any profeſſion. Happy were it for the Church, if the Clergy could be a priuilege from lewdnes. When need meets with vnconſcionablenes, all conditions are eaſily ſwallowed of vnlawful entrances, of wicked

A wicked executions: Ten ſhekells and a ſute of apparell, and his diet, are good wages for a needy Leuite. He that could beſtow 11000. ſhekells vpon his puppets, can afford but ten to his Prieſt: ſo hath he at once a rich Idoll, and a beggerly Prieſt. Whoſoeuer affects to ſerue God good cheape, ſhewes, that hee makes God but a ſtale to Mammon.

Yet was Micha a kinde patron, though not liberall. He calls the young Leuite his father, and vſes him as his ſonne; and what he wants in meanes, ſupplies in affection. It were happy, if Chriſtians could imitate the loue of Idolaters, towards them which ſerue at the Altar. Micha made a ſhift with the Prieſthood of his owne ſonne; yet that his heart checks him in it, appeares both by the change, and his contentment in the change: Now I know that the Lord will be good to mee, ſeeing I haue a Leuite to my
B Prieſt: Therefore, whiles his Prieſt was no Leuite, he ſees there was cauſe why God ſhould not be good to him. If the Leuite had not come to offer his ſeruice, Michaes ſonne had beene a lawfull Prieſt. Many times the conſcience runnes away ſmoothly with an vnwarrantable action, and reſts it ſelfe vpon thoſe grounds, which afterward it ſees cauſe to condemne. It is a ſure way therefore to informe our ſelues throughly ere we ſettle our choice, that we be not driuen to reuerſe our acts with late ſhame, and vnprofitable repentance.

Now did Micha begin to ſee ſome little glimpſe of his owne Errour: He ſaw his Prieſthood faulty; he ſaw not the faults of his Ephod, of his Images, of his gods: and yet (as if he thought all had been well, when he had amended one) he ſaies, Now
C I know, the Lord will be good to me. The carnall heart pleaſes it ſelfe with an outward formality; and ſo delights to flatter it ſelfe, as that it thinks, if one circumſtance be right, nothing can be amiſſe.

Iſrael was at this time extremely corrupted; yet the ſpies of the Danites had taken notice enen of this young Leuite, and are glad to make vſe of his Prieſthood. If they had but gone vp to Shilo, they might haue conſulted with the Arke of God: but worldly minds are not curious in their holy ſeruices: If they haue a god, an Ephod, a Prieſt, it ſuffices them: They had rather inioy a falſe worſhip with eaſe, than to take paines for the true: Thoſe that are curious in their diet, in their purchaſes, in their attire, in their contracts, yet in Gods buſineſſe are very indifferent.

The auhour of lies ſometimes ſpeaks truth for an aduantage: and from his mouth, this flattering Leuite ſpeakes what he knew would pleaſe, not what he knew would
D fall out: The euent anſwers his prediction, and now the ſpies magnifie him to their fellowes: Micha's Idoll is a god, and the Leuite is his Oracle. In matter of iudgement, to be guided only by the euent, is the way to errour; falſhood ſhall be truth, and Satan an angell of light, if we follow this rule: Euen very coniectures ſometimes happen right; A Prophet, or a Dreamer, may giue a true ſigne or wonder, and yet himſelfe ſay, Let vs goe after other gods. A ſmall thing can winne credit with weake minds, which, where they haue once ſped, cannot diſtruſt.

The Idolatrous Danites are ſo beſotted with this ſucceſſe, that they will rather ſteale, than want the gods of Micha; and becauſe the gods without the Prieſts can doe them leſſe ſeruice, than the Prieſt without the gods, therefore they ſteale the Prieſt with the gods. O miſerable Iſraelites! that could thinke that a god, which
E could be ſtolne; that could looke for protection from that, which could not keepe it ſelfe from ſtealing; which was won by their theft, not their deuotion! Could they worſhip thoſe Idolls more deuoutly then Micha that made them? And if they could not protect their maker from robbery, how ſhall they protect their theeues? If it had been the holy Arke of the true God, how could they thinke it would bleſſe their violence, or that it would abide to be tranſlated by rapine and extortion? Now their ſuperſtition hath made them mad vpon a god, they muſt haue him; by what meanes they care not, though they offend the true God, by ſtealing a falſe. Sacriledge is fit to be the firſt ſeruice of an Idoll. The ſpies of Dan had been courteouſly entertained by Micha: thus they rewarded his hoſpitality. It is no truſting the honeſty of Idolaters: if they haue once caſt off the true God, whom will they reſpect?

It seemes Leuites did not more want maintenance, than Israel wanted Leuites: Here was a Tribe of Israel without a spirituall guide. The with-drawing of due meanes, is the way to the vtter desolation of the Church; Rare offerings make cold Altars. There needed smal force to draw this Leuite change to his charge; Hold thy peace, and come, and be our father and Priest; Whether is it better, &c. Here is no patience, but ioy: He that was won with ten shekells, may be lost with eleuen: When maintenance and honour calls him, hee goes vndriuen; and rather steales himselfe away, than is stolne. The Leuite had too many gods, to make conscience of pleasing one: There is nothing more inconstant, than a Leuite that seekes nothing but himselfe. A

Thus the wilde fire of Idolatry, which lay before couched in the priuate hall of Micha, now flies furiously thorow all the Tribe of Dan; who (like to theeues that haue carried away plaguie clothes) haue insensibly infected themselues, and their posterity to death. Heresie and superstition haue small beginnings, dangerous proceedings, pernicious conclusions. This contagion is like a canker, which at the first, is scarce visible, afterwards it eates away the flesh, and consumes the body. B

The Leuites Concubine.

THere is no complaint of a publikely disordered State, where a Leuite is not at one end of it; either as an agent, or a patient. In the Idolatry of Micha, and the Danites, a Leuite was an actor: In the violent vncleannes of Gibeah, a Leuite suffers. No Tribe shall sooner feele the want of gouernment, than that of Leui.

The Law of God allowed the Leuite a wife; humane conniuence, a Concubine; neither did the Iewish concubine differ from a wife, but in some outward complements; Both might challenge all the true Essence of marriage; so little was the difference, that the father of the concubine is called the father in law to the Leuite. She whom ill custome had of a wife made a concubine, is now by her lust, of a concubine made an harlot: Her fornication, together with the charge of her bed, hath changed her abode. Perhaps her owne conscience thrust her out of doores, perhaps the iust seuerity of her husband. Dismission was too easie a penalty for that which God had sentenced with death. She that had deserued to be abhorred of her husband, seekes shelter from her father. Why would her Father suffer his house to be defiled with an adultresse, tho out of his own loines? Why did he not rather say, What? Doost thou thinke to finde my house an harbor for thy sinne? Whiles thou wert a wife to thine husband, thou wert a daughter to me; Now, thou art neither; Thou art not mine; I gaue thee to thy husband; Thou art not thy husbands, thou hast betraied his bed; Thy filthinesse hath made thee thine owne, and thine adulterers; Go seeke thine entertainment, where thou hast lost thine honesty; Thy lewdnes hath brought a necessity of shame vpon thine abettors; How can I countenance thy person, and abandon thy sin? I had rather be a iust man, than a kind Father; Get thee home therefore to thy husband, craue his forgiuenesse vpon thy knees, redeeme his loue with thy modesty and obedience; when his heart is once open to thee, my doores shall not be shut: In the meane time, know, I can be no Father to an harlot. Iudulgence of Parents is the refuge of vanity, the bawd of wickednesse, the bane of children. How easily is that Theise induced to steale, that knowes his Receiuer! When the lawlesnes of youth knowes where to find pitty and toleration, what mischiefe can it forbeare?

By how much better this Leuite was, so much more iniurious was the Concubines sin. What husband would not haue said; She is gone, let shame and griefe goe with her; I shall find one no lesse pleasing, and more faithfull: Or if it be not too much mercy in me to yeeld to a returne, let her that hath offended seeke me: What more direct way is there to a resolued loosenesse, than to let her see I cannot want her? The good nature of this Leuite cast off all these tearmes; and now, after foure moneths absence, sends him to seeke for her, that had run away from her fidelity:

And now he thinkes, She ſinned againſt me; perhaps ſhe hath repented; perhaps, ſhame and feare haue with-held her from returning; perhaps ſhe will bee more loyall, for her ſin: If her importunity ſhould win me, halfe the thankes were loſt; but now, my voluntary offer of fauour ſhall oblige her for euer. Loue procures truer ſeruitude than neceſſity: Mercy becomes well the heart of any man, but moſt of a Leuite. He that had helped to offer ſo many ſacrifices to God for the multitude of euery Iſraelites ſins, ſaw how proportionable it was, that man ſhould not hold one ſinne vnpardonable: He had ſerued at the Altar to no purpoſe, if he (whoſe trade was to ſue for mercy) had not at all learned to practiſe it. A

And if the reflexion of mercy wrought this in a ſeruant, what ſhal we expect from him, whoſe eſſence is mercy? O God, we doe euery day breake the holy couenant of our loue; We proſtitue our ſelues to euery filthy tentation, and then run, and hide our ſelues in our fathers houſe, the world. If thou didſt not ſeeke vs vp, we ſhould neuer returne; if thy gracious proffer did not preuent vs, we ſhould bee vncapable of forgiueneſſe. It were abundant goodnes in thee to receiue vs, when we ſhould intreat thee: but lo, thou intreateſt vs that wee would receiue thee. How ſhould we now adore, and imitate thy mercy, ſith there is more reaſon, we ſhould ſue to each other, than that thou ſhouldſt ſue to vs; becauſe we may as wel offend, as be offended! B

I doe not ſee the womans father make any meanes for reconciliation: but when remiſſion came home to his dores, no man could entertaine it more thankfully. The nature of many men is forward to accept, and negligent to ſue for; they can ſpend ſecret wiſhes vpon that, which ſhall coſt them no indeuour.

Great is the power of loue, which can in a ſort vndoe euils paſt, if not for the act, yet for the remembrance. Where true affection was once conceiued, it is eaſily pieced againe, after the ſtrongeſt interruption. Heere needes no tedious recapitulation of wrongs, no importunity of ſute. The vnkindneſſes are forgotten, their loue is renued; and now the Leuite is not a ſtranger, but a ſon; By how much more willingly he came, by ſo much more vnwillingly he is diſmiſſed. The foure months abſence of his daughter is anſwered with foure dayes feaſting; Neither was there ſo much ioy in the former wedding feaſt, as in this; becauſe then hee deliuered his daughter intire; now, deſperate: then he found a ſonne; but now, that ſon hath found his loſt daughter, and he found both. The recouery of any good, is far more pleaſant than the continuance. C

Little doe we know what euill is towards vs. Now did this old man, and this reſtored couple promiſe themſelues all ioy and contentment, after this vnkind ſtorme; and ſaid in themſelues, Now we begin to liue. And now this feaſt, which was meant for their new nuptials, proues her funerall. Euen when wee let our ſelues looſeſt to our pleaſures, the hand of God (though inuiſibly) is writing bitter things againſt vs. Sith we are not worthy to know; it is wiſedome to ſuſpect the worſt, while it is leaſt ſeene. D

Sometimes it falls out, that nothing is more iniurious than curteſie. If this old man had thruſt his ſon and daughter early out of dores, they had auoided this miſchiefe; now, his louing importunity detaines them to their hurt, and his owne repentance. Such contentment doth ſincere affection find in the preſence of thoſe we loue, that death it ſelfe hath no other name, but departing. The greateſt comfort of our life, is the fruition of friendſhip, the diſſolution whereof, is the greateſt paine of death: As all earthly pleaſures, ſo this of loue, is diſtaſted with a neceſſity of leauing. How worthy is that onely loue to take vp our hearts, which is not open to any danger of interruption; which ſhall out-liue the date euen of faith and hope, and is as eternall, as that God, and thoſe bleſſed ſpirits whom we loue? If we hang neuer ſo importunately vpon one anothers ſleeues, and ſhead flouds of teares to ſtop their way, yet we muſt be gone hence; no occaſion, no force, ſhall then remoue vs from our fathers houſe. E

The Leuite is ſtayed beyond his time by importunity; the motions whereof are boundleſſe and infinite; one day draws on another; neither is there any reaſon of this dayes

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, SIR FVLKE GREVILL, KNIGHT, CHANCELOVR OF THE EXCHEQVER, ONE OF HIS MAIESTIES MOST HONOVRABLE PRIVIE COVNCELLORS; A MOST WISE, LEARNED, IVDICIOVS, INGENVOVS CENSOR OF SCHOLLERSHIP; A WORTHY EXAMPLE OF BENEFACTORS TO LEARNING.

I. H.

VVITH HIS VNFAINED PRAYERS FOR THE HAPPY SVCCESSE OF ALL HIS HONOVRABLE DESIGNEMENTS, HVMBLY DEDICATES THIS MEANE PIECE OF HIS STVDIES.

A daies ſtay, which may not ſerue ſtill for to morrow. His reſolution at laſt breakes thorow all thoſe kind hinderances; rather will he venture a benighting, than an vnneceſſary delay. It is a good hearing, that the Leuite makes haſte home: An honeſt mans heart is where his calling is; ſuch a one, when he is abroad, is like a fiſh in the aire; whereinto if it leape for recreation, or neceſſity, yet it ſoone returnes to his owne element. This charge, by how much more ſacred it is, ſo much more attendance it expecteth: Euen a day breakes ſquare with the conſcionable.

The Sunne is ready to lodge before them. His ſeruant aduiſes him to ſhorten his iourney, holding it more fit to truſt an early Inne of the Iebuſites, than to the mercy of the night. And if that counſell had been followed, perhaps, they which found
B Iebuſites in Iſrael, might haue found Iſraelites in Iebus. No wiſe man can hold good counſell diſparaged, by the meanneſſe of the Authour: If we be glad to receiue any treaſure from our ſeruant, why not precious admonitions?

It was the zeale of this Leuite, that ſhut him out of Iebus; Wee will not lodge in the City of ſtrangers. The Iebuſites were ſtrangers in Religion, not ſtrangers enough in their habitation: The Leuite will not receiue common courteſie from thoſe which were aliens from God, though home-borne in the heart of Iſrael. It is lawfull enough in termes of ciuility to deale with Infidells; the earth is the Lords, and we may inioy it in the right of the owner, while wee proteſt againſt the wrong of the vſurper; yet the leſſe communion with Gods enemies, the more ſafety. If there were another aire to breathe in from theirs, another earth to tread vpon, they ſhould
C haue their owne. Thoſe that affect a familiar intireneſſe with Iebuſites, in conuerſation, in leagues of amity, in matrimoniall contracts, bewray either too much boldneſſe, or too little conſcience.

He hath no blood of an Iſraelite, that delights to lodge in Iebus: It was the fault of Iſrael, that an heatheniſh Towne ſtood yet in the nauell of the tribes, and that Iebus was no ſooner turned to Ieruſalem: Their lenity and neglect were guilty of this neighbour-hood, that now no man can paſſe from Bethleem Iuda, to Mount Ephraim, but by the City of the Iebuſites. Seaſonable iuſtice might preuent a thouſand euills which afterwards know no remedy but patience.

The way was not long betwixt Iebus and Gibeah: for the Sunne was ſtooping when the Leuite was ouer againſt the firſt, and is but now declined when he comes
D to the other. How his heart was lightened, when he entred into an Iſraelitiſh City! and can thinke of nothing but hoſpitality, reſt, ſecurity. There is no perfume ſo ſweet to a Traueller as his owne ſmoake. Both expectation and feare doe commonly diſappoint vs; for ſeldome euer doe wee inioy the good wee looke for, or ſmart with a feared euill. The poore Leuite could haue found but ſuch entertainment with the Iebuſites. Whither are the poſterity of Beniamin degenerated, that their Gibeah ſhould be no leſſe wicked than populous? The firſt ſigne of a ſettled godlineſſe, is, that a Leuite is ſuffered to lie without doores. If God had beene in any of their houſes, his ſeruant had not beene excluded. Where no reſpect is giuen to Gods meſſengers, there can be no Religion.

Gibeah was a ſecond Sodome; euen there alſo is another Lot: which is therefore
E ſo much more hoſpitall to ſtrangers, becauſe himſelfe was a ſtranger. The Oaſt as well as the Leuite is of Mount Ephraim: Each man knowes beſt to commiſerate that euill in others, which himſelfe hath paſſed thorow. All that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt, are Country-men, and yet ſtrangers here below. How cheerefully ſhould we entertaine each other, when we meet in this Gibeah of this inhoſpitall world?

This good old man of Gibeah came home late from his worke in the fields: The Sunne was ſet ere he gaue ouer; and now, ſeeing this man a ſtranger, an Iſraelite, a Leuite, an Ephraimite, and that in his way to the houſe of God, to take vp his lodging in the ſtreet, he proffers him the kindneſſe of his houſe-roome. Induſtrious ſpirits are the fitteſt receptacles of all good motions; whereas thoſe which giue themſelues to idle and looſe courſes; doe not care ſo much as for themſelues. I

heare

heare of but one man at his work in all Gibeah: the reſt were quaffing and reuelling. That one man ends his worke with a charitable entertainment; the other end their play in a bruitiſh beaſtlineſſe and violence. Theſe villanies had learned both the actions and the language of the Sodomites: One vncleane diuell was the prompter to both: and this honeſt Ephraimite, had learn'd of righteous Lot, both to intreat, and to proffer. As a perplexed Mariner, that in a ſtorme muſt caſt away ſomething, although precious; ſo this good Oaſt, rather will proſtitute his daughter a virgin, together with the concubine, than this prodigious villany ſhould be offered to a man, much more to a man of God.

The deteſtation of a fouler ſinne drew him to ouer-reach in the motion of a leſſer; which if it had been accepted, how could he haue eſcaped the partnerſhip of their vncleanneſſe, and the guilt of his daughters rauiſhment? No man can waſh his hands of that ſinne, to which his will hath yeelded. Bodily violence may be inoffenſiue in the patient; voluntary inclination to euill (though out of feare) can neuer be excuſable: yet, behold, this wickedneſſe is too little to ſatisfie theſe monſters.

Who would haue looked for ſo extreme abomination from the loines of Iacob, the wombe of Rachel, the ſonnes of Beniamin? Could the very Iebuſites their neighbours be euer accuſed of ſuch vnnaturall outrage? I am aſhamed to ſay it, Euen the worſt Pagans were Saints to Iſrael. What auailes it that they haue the Arke of God in Shilo, while they haue Sodom in their ſtreets? that the Law of God is in thier fringes, whiles the Diuell is in their hearts? Nothing but hell it ſelfe can yeeld a worſe creature, than a depraued Iſraelite; the very meanes of his reformation, are the fuell of his wickedneſſe.

Yet Lot ſped ſo much better in Sodome, than this Ephraimite did in Gibeah, by how much more holy gueſts he entertained. There the gueſts were Angells; here a ſinfull man. There the gueſts ſaued the Oaſt; here the Oaſt could not ſaue the gueſt from brutiſh violence. Thoſe Sodomites were ſtricken with outwards blindneſſe, and defeated: Theſe Beniamites are only blinded with luſt, and preuaile. The Leuite comes forth, perhaps, his coat ſaued his perſon from this villany; who now thinkes himſelfe well, that he may haue leaue to redeeme his owne diſhonour with his concubines. If he had not loued her dearely, he had neuer ſought her ſo farre, after ſo foule a ſinne: Yet now his hate of that vnnaturall wickedneſſe ouercame his loue to her; She is expoſed to the furious luſt of Ruffians, and (which he miſ-doubteth) abuſeth to death.

Oh the iuſt and euen courſe which the Almighty Iudge of the world holds in all his retributions! This woman had ſhamed the bed of a Leuite, by her former wantonneſſe; ſhe had thus farre gone ſmoothly away with her ſinne, her father harboured her, her husband forgaue her, her owne heart found no cauſe to complaine, becauſe ſhe ſmarted not: now, when the world had forgotten her offence, God calls her to reckoning, and puniſhes her with her owne ſinne. She had voluntarily expoſed her ſelfe to luſt; now is expoſed forcibly. Adultery was her ſinne, adultery was her Death. What ſmiles ſoeuer wickedneſſe caſts vpon her heart, whiles it ſollicits; it will owe vs a diſpleaſure, and proue it ſelfe a faithfull Debter.

The Leuite looked to find her humbled with this violence, not murthered; and now, indignation moues him to adde horror to the fact: Had not his heart been raiſed vp with an exceſſe of deſire, to make the crime as odious as it was ſinfull, his action could not be excuſed. Thoſe hands that might not touch a carkas, now carue the corps of his owne dead wife into morſells, and ſend theſe tokens to all the Tribes of Iſrael; that when they ſhould ſee theſe gobbets of the body murthered, the more they might deteſt the murtherers. Himſelfe puts one cruelty to the dead, that he might draw them to a iuſt reuenge of her death. Actions notoriouſly villanous, may iuſtly countenance to extraordinary meaues of proſecution. Euery Iſraelite hath a part in a Leuites wrong; No Tribe hath not his ſhare in the carkaſſe and the reuenge.

The

The desolation of BENIAMIN.

THese morsells could not chuse but cut the hearts of Israel with horrour and compassion; horrour of the act, and compassion of the sufferer: and now their zeale drawes them together, either for satisfaction, or reuenge. Who would not haue looked that the hands of Beniamin should haue beene first vpon Gibeah; and that they should haue readily sent the heads of the offenders, for a second seruice after the gobbets of the concubine? But now, in stead of punishing the sinne, they patronize the actors; and will rather die in resisting iustice, than liue and prosper in furthering it.

Surely, Israel had one Tribe too many: all Beniamin is turned into Gibeah, the sonnes not of Beniamin, but of Belial. The abetting of euill, is worse than the commission; This may be vpon infirmity, but that must be vpon resolution: Easie punishment is too much fauour to sinne: conniuence is much worse: but the defence of it (and that vnto blood) is intolerable. Had not these men been both wicked and quarrellous, they had not drawne their swords in so foule a cause. Peaceable dispositions are hardly drawne to fight for innocence, yet these Beniaminites (as if they were in loue with villany, and out of charity with God) will be the wilfull Champions of lewdnesse. How can Gibeah repent them of that wickednesse, which all Beniamin will make good, in spight of their consciences? Euen where sinne is suppressed, it will arise; but where it is encouraged, it insults and tyrannizes.

It was more iust that Israel should rise against Beniamin, than Beniamin should rise for Gibeah, by how much it is better to punish offenders, than to shelter the offenders from punishing. And yet the wickednesse of Beniamin sped better for the time, than the honesty of Israel. Twise was the better part foyled by the lesse, and worse; The good cause was sent backe with shame: the euill returned with victory and triumph. O God! their hand was for thee in the fight, and thy hand was with them in the fall; They had not fought for thee, but by thee; neither could they haue miscarried in the fight, if thou hadst not fought against them; Thou art iust and holy in both. The cause was thine: the sinne in managing of it was their owne. They fought in an holy quarrell, but with confidence in themselues: for, as presuming of victory, they aske of God, not what should be their successe, but who should be their Captaine. Number and innocence made them too secure: It was iust therefore with God to let them feele, that euen good zeale cannot beare out presumption; and that victory lies not in the cause, but in the God that owns it.

Who can imagine how much the Beniaminites insulted in their double field, and day? And now beganne to thinke, God was on their side: these swords which had been taught the way into forty thousand bodies of their brethren, cannot feare a new encounter. Wicked men cannot see their prosperity a piece of their course, neither can examine their actions, but the euents. Soone after, they shall finde what it was, to adde blood vnto filthinesse, and that the victory of an euill cause, is the way to ruine and confusion.

I should haue feared, lest this double discomfiture should haue made Israel either distrustfull, or weary of a good cause: but still I finde them no lesse courageous, with more humility. Now, they fast, and weepe, and sacrifice: These weapons had beene victorious in their first assault; Beniamin had neuer beene in danger of pride for ouercomming, if this humiliation of Israel had preuented the fight. It is seldome seene, but that which we doe with feare, prospereth; whereas confidence in vndertaking, laies euen good endeauours in the dust.

Wickednesse could neuer bragge of any long prosperity, nor complaine of the lacke lacke of payment: Still God is euen with it at laſt: Now he paies the Beniaminites both that death which they had lent to the Iſraelites, and that wherin they ſtood indebted to their brother-hood of Gibeah: And now, that both are met in death, there is as much difference betwixt thoſe Iſraelites, and theſe Beniaminites, as betwixt Martyrs and Malefactors. To die in a ſinne, is a fearefull reuenge of giuing patronage to ſinne: The ſword conſumes their bodies, another fire their Cities, whatſoeuer became of their ſoules.

Now might Rachel haue iuſtly wept for her children, becauſe they were not; for, behold, the men, women, and children of her wicked Tribe, are cut off; onely ſome few ſcattered remainders, ran away from this vengeance, and lurked in caues and rockes, both for feare and ſhame: There was no difference, but life, betwixt their brethren and them; the earth couered them both: yet vnto them doth the reuenge of Iſrael ſtretch it ſelfe, and vowes to deſtroy, if not their perſons, yet their ſucceſſion; as holding them vnworthy to receiue any comfort by that ſex, to which they had been ſo cruell, both in act and maintenance. If the Iſraelites had not held marriage and iſſue a very great bleſſing, they had not thus reuenged themſelues of Beniamin: Now, they accounted the with-holding of their wiues, a puniſhment ſecond vnto death. The hope of life in our poſterity, is the next contentment to an enioying of life in our ſelues.

They haue ſworne, and now vpon cold blood repent them. If the oath were not iuſt, why would they take it? And if it were iuſt, why did they recant it? If the act were iuſtifiable, what needed theſe teares? Euen a iuſt oath may be raſhly taken: not only iniuſtice, but timerity of ſwearing ends in lamentation. In our very ciuill actions, it is a weakneſſe to doe that which wee would after reuerſe; but in our affaires with God, to checke our ſelues too late, and to ſteepe our oathes in teares, is a dangerous folly. Hee doth not command vs to take voluntary oathes; Hee commands vs to keepe them. If wee binde our ſelues to inconuenience, wee may iuſtly complaine of our owne fetters: Oathes doe not only require iuſtice, but iudgement; wiſe deliberation, no leſſe than equity.

Not conſcience of their fact, but commiſeration of their brethren, led them to this publike repentance. O God, why is this come to paſſe, that this day one Tribe of Iſrael ſhall want? Euen the iuſteſt reuenge of men is capable of pity. Inſultation in the rigour of Iuſtice, argues cruelty; Charitable mindes are grieued to ſee that done, which they would not wiſh vndone; the ſmart of the offender doth not pleaſe them, which yet are throughly diſpleaſed with the ſinne, and haue giuen their hands to puniſh it. God himſelfe takes no pleaſure in the death of a ſinner, yet loues the puniſhment of ſinne: As a good parent whips his childe, yet whips himſelfe. There is a meaſure in victory and reuenge, if neuer ſo iuſt; which to exceed, leeſes mercy in the ſuit of Iuſtice.

If there were no fault in their ſeuerity, it needed no excuſe; and if there were a fault, it will admit of no excuſe: yet, as if they meant to ſhift off the ſinne, they expoſtulate with God; O Lord God of Iſrael, why is this come to paſſe this day? God gaue them no command of this rigour; yea, he twice croſt them in the execution, and now, in that which they intreated God with teares, they challenge him. It is a dangerous iniuſtice, to lay the burthen of our ſinnes vpon him which tempteth no man, nor can be tempted with euill; whiles we ſhould ſo remoue our ſinne, we double it.

A man that knew not the power of an oath, would wonder at this contrariety in the affection of Iſrael: they are ſory for the ſlaughter of Beniamin; and yet they ſlay thoſe that did not help them in the ſlaughter. Their oath calls them to more blood: The exceſſe of their reuenge vpon Beniamin, may not excuſe the men of Gilead: If euer oath might look for a diſpenſation, this might plead it; now, they dare not but kil the men of Iabeſh Gilead, leſt they ſhould haue left vpon themſelues a greater ſin of ſparing than puniſhing. Iabeſh Gilead came not vp to aid Iſrael, therfore al the inhabitāts muſt die. To exempt our ſelues (whether out of ſingularity, or ſtubbornes) from the common actions of the Church, when we are lawfully call'd to them, is an offence worthy

A of iudgement: In the maine quarrells of the Church, neutralls are punished. This execution shall make amends for the former, of the spoile of Iabesh-Gilead, shall the Beniaminites be stored with wiues: that no man may think these men slain for their daughters, they plainly die for their sinne; and these Gileadites might not haue liued, without the periury of Israel: and now, sith they must die, it is good to make benefit of necessity. I inquire not into the rigour of the oath: If their solemne vow did not bind them to kill all of both sexes in Beniamin, why did they not spare their Virgins? And if it so bind them, why did they spare the Virgins of Gilead? Fauours must be inlarged in all these religious restrictions; Where breath may be taken in them, it is not fit nor safe they should be straitned.

Foure hundred Virgins of Gilead haue lost parents and brethren, and kindred, and
B now finde husbands in lieu of them. An inforced marriage was but a miserable comfort for such a losse: like Wards, or captiues, they are taken and chuse not. These suffice not; their friendly aduersaries consult for more vpon worse conditions. Into what troublesome and dangerous straits doe men thrust themselues, by either vniust, or inconsiderate vowes?

In the midst of all this common lawlesnesse of Israel, here was conscience made on both sides, of matching with Infidells: The Israelites can rather be content their daughters should be stolne by their owne, than that the daughters of aliens should be giuen them. These men which had not grace enough to detest and punish the beastlinesse of their Gileadites, yet are not so gracelesse, as to chuse them wiues of the Heathen. All but Atheists (howsoeuer they let themselues loose) yet in some
C things finde themselues restrained, and shew to others that they haue a conscience. If there were not much danger and much sinne in this vnequall yoke, they would neuer haue perswaded to so heauy an inconuenience: Disparity of Religion in matrimoniall contracts, hath so many mischiefes, that it is worthy to be redeemed with much preiudice.

They which might not giue their owne daughters to Beniamin, yet giue others whiles they giue leaue to steale them Stolne marriages are both vnnaturall, and full of hazard; for loue (whereof marriage is the knot) cannot be forced: this was rather rape than wedlocke. What vnlikenesse (perhaps contrariety) of disposition, what auersenesse of affection, may there be in not only a sudden, but a forceable meeting? If these Beniaminites had not taken liberty of giuing themselues ease by
D diuorcement, they would often haue found leisure to rue this stolne booty: This act may not be drawne to example; and yet here was a kind of indefinite consent: both deliberation, and good liking, are little enough for a during estate, and that which is once done for euer.

These Virgins come vp to the feast of the Lord, and now, out of the midst of their dances are carried to a double captiuity. How many Virgins haue lost themselues in dances? and yet this sport was not immodest, These Virgins danced by themselues, without the company of those which might moue towards vnchastity; for, if any men had been with them, they had found so many rescuers, as they had assaulters; now, the exposing of their weake sexe to this iniury, proues their innocence. Our vsuall dances are guilty of more sinne; Wanton gestures, and vnchast touches,
E lookes, motions, draw the heart to folly: The ambushes of euill spirits carry away many soules from daunces, to a fearefull desolation.

It is supposed, that the parents thus robb'd of their daughters, will take it heauily. There cannot be a greater crosse than the miscarriage of children: They are not onely the liuing goods, but pieces of their parents; that they should therefore be torne from them by violence, is no lesse iniury, than the dismembring of their owne bodies.

NAOMI

Naomi and Ruth.

BEtwixt the raigne of the Iudges, Israel was plagued with tyranny, and whiles some of them raigned, with famine. Seldome did that rebellious people want somewhat to humble them. One rod is not enough for a stubborne childe: The famine must needes be great, that makes the inhabitants to runne their countrey. The name of home is so sweet, that wee cannot leaue it for a little. Behold, that land which had wont to flow with milke and honey, now abounds with want and penury, and Bethleem in stead of an house of bread, is an house of famine. A fruitfull land doth God make barren, for the wickednesse of them that dwell therein. The earth beares not for it selfe, but for vs; God is not angry with it, but with men. For our sakes, it was first cursed to thornes and thistles, after that to moysture, and since that (not seldome) to drought; and by all these to barrennesse. Wee may not looke alwaies for plenty. It is a wonder, whiles there is such superfluity of wickednesse, that our earth is no more sparing of her fruits.

The whole earth is the Lords, and in him ours. It is lawfull for the owners to change their houses at pleasure. Why should wee not make free vse of any part of our owne possessions? Elimelech and his family moue from Bethleem Iuda vnto Moab. Nothing but necessity can dispense with a locall relinquishing of Gods Church; Not pleasure, nor profit, not curiosity. Those which are famished out, God calls, yea, driues from thence. The Creator and possessour of the earth, hath not confined any man to his necessary destruction.

It was lawfull for Elimelech to make vse of Pagans, and Idolaters, for the supply of all needfull helps. There cannot be a better imployment of Moabites, than to be the treasurers and purueyors of Gods children: Wherefore serue they, but to gather for the true owners? It is too much niceneſſe in them, which forbeare the benefit they might make of the faculties of profane, or hereticall persons; They consider not that they haue more right to the good such men can doe, than they that doe it, and challenge that good for their owne.

But I cannot see, how it could be lawfull for his sonnes to match with the daughters of Moab. Had these men heard how farre, and vnder how solemne an oath their father Abraham sent for a wife of his owne Tribe, for his sonne Isaac? Had they heard the earnest charge of holy Isaac, to the sonne hee blessed, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan? Had they forgotten the plagues of Israel for but a short conuersion with the Moabitish women? If they plead remotenesse from their owne people; Did they not remember how farre Iacob walked to Padan-Aram? Was it further from Moab to Bethleem, than from Bethleem to Moab? and if the care of themselues led them from Bethleem to Moab; should not their care of obedience to God, haue as well carried them backe from Moab to Bethleem? Yet if their wiues would haue left their Idolatry with their maiden-head; the match had beene more safe; but now, euen at the last farewell. Naomi can say of Orpah; that shee is returned to her gods. These men haue sinned in their choyce, and it speedes with them accordingly. Where did euer one of these vnequall matches prosper? The two sonnes of Elimelech are swept away childlesse in the prime of their age, and in stead of their seed, they leaue their carkasses in Moab, their wiues widdowes, their mother childlesse, and helplesse amongst Infidells, in that age which most needed comfort. How miserable doe we now finde poore Naomi? which is left destitute of her country, her husband, her children, her friends; and turned loose, and solitary to the mercy of the world: yet euen out of these hopelesse ruines will God raise comfort to his seruant. The first good newes is, that God hath visited his people with bread; now therefore, since her husband and sonnes were vnrecouerable, ſhe will try to recouer her country, and kindred. If we can haue the ſame conditions in Iudah, that we haue in Moab, we are no Iſraelites if we returne not. Whiles her husband and ſonnes liued, I heare no motion of retiring home; now theſe her earthly ſtayes are remoued, ſhee thinkes preſently of remouing to her country; Neither can wee ſo heartily thinke of our home aboue, whiles wee are furniſhed with theſe worldly contentments; when God ſtrips vs of them, ſtraight waies our minde is homeward.

She that came from Bethleem, vnder the protection of an husband, attended with her ſonnes, ſtored with ſubſtance; reſolues now to meaſure all that way alone. Her aduerſity had ſtript her of all, but a good heart; that remaines with her, and beares vp her head in the deepeſt of her extremity. True Chriſtian fortitude wades thorow all euills; and though wee be vp to the chin, yet keepes firme footing againſt the ſtreame: where this is, the ſex is not diſcerned; neither is the quantity of the euill read in the face. How well doth this courage become Iſraelites, when wee are left comfortleſſe in the midſt of the Moab of this world, to reſolue the contempt of all dangers, in the way to our home? As contrarily, nothing doth more miſ-beſeeme a Chriſtian, than that his ſpirits ſhould flag with his eſtate, and that any difficulty ſhould make him deſpaire of attaining his beſt ends.

Goodneſſe is of a winning quality wherſoeuer it is; and euen amongſt infidels, will make it ſelfe friends. The good diſpoſition of Naomi carries away the hearts of her daughters in law with her; ſo as they are ready to forſake their kindred, their country, yea, their owne mother, for a ſtranger, whoſe affinity died with her ſonnes. Thoſe men are worſe than Infidells, and next to Diuells, that hate the vertues of Gods Saints; and could loue their perſons well, if they were not conſcionable.

How earneſtly doe theſe two daughters of Moab plead for their continuance with Naomi; and how hardly is either of them diſſwaded from partaking of the miſery of her ſociety! There are good natures euen among Infidells, and ſuch as for morall diſpoſition, and ciuill reſpects, cannot be exceeded by the beſt profeſſours. Who can ſuffer his heart to reſt in thoſe qualities, which are common to them that are without God.

Naomi could not be ſo inſenſible of her owne good, as not to know how much comfort ſhee might reape to the ſolitarineſſe, both of her voyage, and her widdowhood, by the ſociety of theſe two younger widdows, whoſe affections ſhee had ſo well tried; euen very partnerſhip is a mitigation of euills, yet ſo earneſtly doth ſhee diſſwade them from accompanying her, as that ſhee could not haue ſaid more, if ſhee had thought their preſence irkeſome, and burdenous: Good diſpoſitions loue not to pleaſure themſelues with the diſaduantage of others; and had rather be miſerable alone, than to draw in partners to their ſorrow; for the ſight of anothers calamity, doth rather double their owne; and if themſelues were free, would affect them with compaſſion: As contrarily, ill mindes care not how many companions they haue in miſery, nor how few conſorts in good; If themſelues miſcarry, they could be content all the world were inwrapped with them in the ſame diſtreſſe.

I maruell not that Orpah is by this ſeaſonable importunity perſwaded to returne; from a mother in law, to a mother in nature; from a toyleſome iourney, to reſt; from ſtrangers, to her kinred; from an hopeleſſe condition, to likelihoods of contentment. A little intreaty will ſerue to moue nature to be good vnto it ſelfe: Euery one is rather a Naomi to his owne ſoule, to perſwade it to ſtay ſtill, and inioy the delights of Moab, rather than to hazard our entertainment in Bethleem. Will Religion allow mee this wild liberty of my actions, this looſe mirth, theſe carnall pleaſures? Can I be a Chriſtian, and not liue ſullenly? None but a regenerate heart can chuſe rather to ſuffer aduerſity with Gods people, than to inioy the pleaſures of ſinne for a ſeaſon.

The one ſiſter takes an vnwilling farewell, and moiſtens her laſt kiſſes with many teares: the one cannot be driuen backe, but repells one intreaty with another; Intreat mee not to leaue thee; for whither thou goest, I will goe, where thou dwellest, I will dwell, thy people shall be my people, thy God my God, where thou diest, I will die, and there will I be buried. Ruth saw so much vpon ten yeeres triall, in Naomi, as was more worth than all Moab; and in comparison whereof, all worldly respects deserued nothing but contempt: The next degree vnto godlinesse is the loue of goodnesse: Hee is in a faire way to grace, that can value it; If shee had not beene already a proselyte, she could not haue set this price vpon Naomies vertue. Loue cannot be separated from a desire of fruition; In vaine had Ruth protested her affection to Naomi, if shee could haue turned her out to her iourney alone; loue to the Saints doth not more argue our interest in God, than society argues the truth of our loue.

As some tight vessell that holds out against wind and water, so did Ruth against all the powers of a mothers perswasions; The impossibility of the comfort of marriage in following her (which drew backe her sister in law) cannot moue her. Shee heares her mother, like a modest matron (contrary to the fashion of these times) say, I am too old to haue an husband, and yet shee thinkes not on the contrary, I am too young to want an Husband: It should seeme, the Moabites had learned this fashion of Israel, to expect the brothers raising of seed to the deceased; The widow-hood and age of Naomi cuts off that hope; neither could Ruth then, dreame of a Boaz that might aduance her; It is no loue that cannot make vs willing to be miserable for those wee affect: The holloweſt heart can be content to follow one that prospereth: Aduersity is the onely fornace of friendship: If loue will not abide both fire and anuile, it is but counterfeit; so in our loue to God, wee doe but crake, and vaunt in vaine, if wee cannot be willing to suffer for him.

But if any motiue might hope to speed, that which was drawne from example, was most likely; Behold, thy sister in law is gone backe vnto her people, and to her gods; returne thou after her. This one art-lesse perswasion hath preuailed more with the world, than all the places of reason: How many millions miscarry vpon this ground; thus did my fore-fathers; Thus doe the most; I am neither the first, nor the last! Doe any of the rulers? We straight thinke that, either safe or pardonable, for which we can pleade a precedent. This good woman hath more warrant for her resolution, than anothers practice: The minde can neuer be steady, whiles it stands vpon others feet, and till it be setled vpon such grounds of assurance, that it will rather lead than follow; and can say with Ioshua, whatsoeuer become of the world, I and my house will serue the Lord.

If Naomi had not beene a person of eminent note, no knowledge had beene taken at Bethleem of her returne. Pouerty is euer obscure; and those that haue little, may go and come without noise. If the streets of Bethleem had not before vsed to say, There goes Naomi; they had not now asked, is not this Naomi? She that had lost all things, but her name, is willing to part with that also; Call me not Naomi, but call me Marah. Her humility cares little for a glorious name, in a deiected estate. Many a one would haue set faces vpon their want, and in the bitternesse of their condition, haue affected the name of beauty. In all formes of good, there are more that care to seeme, then to be: Naomi hates this hypocrisie, and since God hath humbled her, desires not to be respected of men. Those which are truely brought downe, make it not dainty that the world should thinke them so; but are ready to be the first proclaimers of their owne vilenesse.

Naomi went full out of Bethleem to preuent want; and now shee brings that want home with her, which she desired to auoid. Our blindnesse oft-times carries vs into the perills wee seeke to eschew: God findes it best many times, to crosse the likely proiects of his deerest children; and to multiply those afflictions, which they feared single.

Ten yeeres haue turned Naomi into Marah: What assurance is there of these earthly earthly things, whereof one houre may ſtrip vs? What man can ſay of the yeeres to come, Thus I will be? How iuſtly doe we contemne this vncertainty, and looke vp to thoſe riches that cannot but indure, when heauen and earth are diſſolued?

BOAZ and RVTH.

WHiles Elimelech ſhifted to Moab to auoid the famine, Boaz abod ſtill at Bethleem, and continued rich and powerfull: He ſtaid at home, and found that which Elimelech went to ſeeke, and miſſed. The iudgement of famine doth not lightly extend it ſelfe to all: Peſtilence and the ſword ſpare none; but death commonly plagueth the meaner ſort, and balketh the mighty. When Boaz his ſtore-houſe was empty, his fields were full, and maintained the name of Bethleem. I do not heare Ruth ſtand vpon the termes of her better education, or wealthy Parentage; but now, that God hath called her to want, ſhe ſcornes not to lay her hand vnto all homely ſeruices; and thinks it no diſparagement to finde her bread in other mens fields: there is no harder leſſon to a generous minde, nor that more beſeemes it, than either to beare want, or to preuent it; Baſe ſpirits giue themſelues ouer to idleneſſe, and miſery, and becauſe they are croſſed, will ſullenly periſh.

That good woman hath not been for nothing in the ſchoole of patience; ſhe hath learned obedience to a poore ſtep-mother; ſhe was now a widow, paſt reach of any danger of correction; beſides, that penury might ſeeme to diſpenſe with awe; Euen children doe eaſily learne to contemne the pouerty of their owne parents; Yet hath ſhe inured her ſelfe to obedience, that ſhe will not ſo much as goe forth into the field to gleane, without the leaue of her mother in law, and is no leſſe obſequious to Marah,, than ſhe was to Naomi. What ſhall we ſay to thoſe children, that in the maine actions of their life, forget they haue naturall Parents? It is a ſhame to ſee, that in meane families, want of ſubſtance cauſeth want of duty; and that children ſhould thinke themſelues priuiledged for vnreuerence, becauſe the Parent is poore. Little do we know when we goe forth in the morning, what God meanes to do with vs ere night: There is a prouidence that attends on vs in all our waies, and guides vs inſenſibly to his owne ends; That diuine hand leads Ruth blind-fold to the field of Boaz: That ſhe meets with his reapers, and falls vpon his land amongſt all the fields of Bethleem, it was no praiſe to her election, but the gracious diſpoſition of him, in whom we moue; His thoughts are aboue ours, and doe ſo order our actions, as we, if we had knowne, ſhould haue wiſhed. No ſooner is ſhe come into the field, but the reapers are friendly to her; no ſooner is Boaz come into his field, but he inuites her to more bounty than ſhee could haue deſired; now, God begins to repay into her boſome, her loue and duty to her mother in law. Reuerence and louing reſpects to Parents, neuer yet went away vnrecompenced; God will ſurely raiſe vp friends amongſt ſtrangers to thoſe that haue beene officious at home.

It was worth Ruth's iourney from Moab, to meet with ſuch a man as Boaz, whom we finde thrifty, religious, charitable,; Though he were rich, yet he was not careleſſe; he comes into the field to ouer-ſee his reapers. Euen the beſt eſtate requires carefull managing of the owner; Hee wanted no officers to take charge of his huſbandry, yet he had rather be his owne witneſſe: After all the truſt of others, the Maſters eye feeds the horſe.

The Maſter of the great houſhold of the world, giues vs an example of this care, whoſe eye is in euery corner of his large poſſeſſion; Not ciuility onely, but Religion bindes vs to good husbandry; We are all ſtewards; and what account can wee giue to our Maſter, if wee neuer looke after our eſtate? I doubt vvhether Boaz had beene ſo rich, if he had not been ſo frugall: yet vvas hee not more thirfty than religious: He comes not to his reapers, but vvith a bleſſing in his mouth: The Lord be with with you, as one that knew, if hee were with them, and not the Lord; his presence could auaile nothing. All the businesse of the family speeds the better, for the Masters benediction; Those affaires are likely to succeed, that take their beginning at God. A

Charity was well matched with his Religion; without which, good workes are but hypocrites: no sooner doth he heare the name of the Moabitesse, but he seconds the kindnesse of his reapers; and still he rises in his fauours: First, she may gleane in his field; then she may drinke of his vessells; then she shall take her meale with his reapers; and part of it, from his owne hand: Lastly, his work-men must let fall sheaues for her gathering. A small thing helpes the needy: an handfull of gleanings, a lap-full of parched corne, a draught of the seruants bottles, a loose sheafe was such a fauour to Ruth, as shee thought was aboue all recompence: B
This was not seene in the estate of Boaz, which yet makes her for the time happy. If wee may refresh the soule of the poore with the very offalls of our estate, and not hurt our selues, woe be to vs if wee doe it not. Our barnes shall be as full of curses as of corne, if wee grudge the scattered eares of our field to the hands of the needy.

How thankefull doth Ruth take these small fauours from Boaz? Perhaps, some rich Iewell in Moab would not haue beene so welcome. Euen this was a presage of her better estate. Those which shall receiue great blessings, are euer thankefull for little; and if poore soules be so thankfull to vs, for but an handfull, or a sheafe; how should wee be affected to our God for whole fields full, for full barnes, full garners? C

Doubtlesse, Boaz, hauing taken notice of the good nature, dutifull carriage, and the neere affinity of Ruth, could not but purchase some greater beneficence, and higher respects to her: yet now onwards he fits his kindnesse to her condition, and giues her that, which to her meannesse seemed much, though hee thought it little. Thus doth the bounty of our God deale with vs: It is not for want of loue, that hee giues vs no greater measure of grace, but for want of our fitnesse and capacity: He hath reserued greater preferments for vs, when it shall be seasonable for vs to receiue them.

Ruth returnes home wealthy with her Ephah of Barley, and thankfully magnifies the liberality of Boaz, her new benefactor: Naomi repayes his beneficence with her blessing; Blessed be he of the Lord. If the rich can exchange their almes with the poore D for blessings, they haue no cause to complaine of an ill bargaine. Our gifts cannot be worth their faithfull prayers; therefore it is better to giue than to receiue; because hee that receiues hath but a worthlesse almes; hee that giues, receiues an vnualuable blessing.

I cannot but admire the modesty and silence of these two women: Naomi had not so much as talked of her kindred in Bethleem, nor till now, had she told Ruth that she had a wealthy kinsman; neither had Ruth inquired of her husbands great alliance; but both sate downe meekly with their own wants, and cared not to know any thing else, saue that themselues were poore. Humility is euer the way to honour.

It is a discourtesie where we are beholden, to alter our dependancy. Like as men of trade take it ill, if customers which are in their bookes, goe for their wares to E another shop. Wisely doth Naomi aduise Ruth, not to be seene in any other field, while the harueſt lasted. The very taking of their fauours, is a contentment to those that haue already well deserued; and it is quarrell enough that their courtesie is not receiued. How shall the God of Heauen take it, that whiles hee giues and proffers large, wee runne to the world, that can afford vs nothing but vanity and vexation?

Those that can least act, are oft times the best to aduise. Good old Naomi sits still at home, and by her counsell payes Ruth all the loue she owes her. The face of that action to which she directs her, is the worst piece of it; the heart was sound. Perhaps, the assurance, which long triall had giuen her of the good gouernment, and firme

A firme chaſtity of her daughter in law, together with her perſwaſion of the religious grauity of Boaz, made her thinke that deſigne ſafe, which to others had beene perilous, if not deſperate. But beſides that, holding Boaz next of blood to Elimilech, ſhee made account of him as the lawfull husband of Ruth; ſo as there wanted nothing but a challenge, and conſummation. Nothing was abated, but ſome outward ſolemnities which (though expedient for the ſatisfaction of others; yet were not eſſentiall to marriage: And if there were not theſe colours for a proiect ſo ſuſpitious, it would not follow, that the action were warrantable, becauſe Naomies. Why ſhould her example be more ſafe in this, than in matching her ſonnes with Infidells; than in ſending backe Orpah to her fathers gods? If euery act of an holy perſon ſhould be our rule, we ſhould haue crooked liues: Euery action that is reported, is not ſtraight
B waies allowed. Our courſes were very vncertaine, if God had not giuen vs rules, whereby we may examine the examples of the beſt Saints, and as well cenſure, as follow them. Let them that ſtumble at the boldneſſe of Ruth, imitate the continence of Boaz.

Theſe times were not delicate. This man (though great in Bethleem) laies him downe to reſt vpon a pallat, in the floore of his barne; when he awakes at midnight; no maruell if he were amazed to finde himſelfe accompanied; yet, though his heart were cheered with wine, the place ſolitary, the night ſilent, the perſon comely, the inuitation plauſible, could he not be drawne to a raſh act of luſt; His appetite could not get the victory of reaſon, though it had wine and opportunity to helpe it. Herein Boaz ſhewed himſelfe a great Maſter of his affections, that hee was able to reſiſt a
C fit tentation. It is no thanke to many, that they are free of ſome euills; perhaps, they wanted not will, but conuenience. But if a man, when hee is fitted with all helpes to his ſinne, can repell the pleaſure of ſinne, out of conſcience; this is true fortitude.

In ſtead of touching her as a wanton, he bleſſes her as a father, incourageth her as a friend, promiſeth her as a kinſman, rewards her as a patrone, and ſends her away laden with hopes and gifts; no leſſe chaſte, more happy than ſhe came. Oh admirable temperance worthy the progenitor of him, in whoſe lips and heart was no guile.

If Boaz had beene the next kinſman, the marriage had needed no protraction but now, that his conſcience told him that Ruth was the right of another, it had not been more ſenſuality, than iniuſtice, to haue touched his kinſwoman. It was not any
D bodily impotency, but honeſty and conſcience that reſtrained Boaz, for the very next night ſhee conceiued by him; that good man wiſhed his marriage bed holy, and durſt not lie downe in the doubt of a ſinne. Many a man is honeſt out of neceſſity, and affects the praiſe of that, which he could not auoid; but that mans minde is ſtill an adulterer, in the forced continence of his body. No action can giue vs true comfort, but that which we doe out of the grounds of obedience.

Thoſe which are fearefull of ſinning, are carefull not to be thought to ſinne. Boaz, though he knew himſelfe to be cleare, would not haue occaſion of ſuſpition giuen to others; (Let no man know that a woman came into the floore:) A good heart is no leſſe afraid of a ſcandall, than of a ſinne; whereas thoſe that are reſolued not to make any ſcruple of ſinne, deſpiſe others conſtructions, not caring whom they offend, ſo
E that they may pleaſe themſelues. That Naomi might ſee, her daughter in law not ſent backe in diſlike, ſhe comes home laden with corne; Ruth hath gleaned more this night, than in halfe the harueſt. The care of Boaz, was, that ſhe ſhould not returne to her mother empty: Loue, whereſoeuer it is, cannot be niggardly. Wee meaſure the loue of God by his gifts; How ſhall hee abid to ſend vs away empty from thoſe treaſures of goodneſſe!

Boaz is reſtleſſe in the proſecution of his ſuit; and hies him from his threſhing-floore to the gate, and there conuents the neerer kinſman before the Elders of the City: what was it that made Boaz ſo ready to entertaine, ſo forward to vrge this match? Wealth ſhe had none, not ſo much as bread, but what ſhe gleaned out of the field? Friends ſhe had none, and thoſe ſhe had elſewhere, Moabites: Beauty ſhee could not haue much after that ſcorching in her trauell, in her gleanings; Himſelfe tells her, what drew his heart to her, (All the City of my people doth know that thou art a vertuous woman:) Vertue in whomſoeuer it is found, is a great dowry; and where it meets with a heart that knowes how to value it, is accounted greater riches than all that is hid in the bowells of the earth. The corne heape of Boaz was but chaffe to this, and his money droſſe. A

As a man teat had learned to ſquare his actions to the law of God, Boaz proceeds legally with his riuall, and tells him of a parcell of Elimelechs land (which, it is like, vpon his remouall to Moab, he had alienated:) which he (as the next kinſman) might haue power to redeeme; yet, ſo as he muſt purchaſe the wife of the deceaſed with the land. Euery kinſman is not a Boaz, the man could liſten to the land, if it had beene free from the clog of a neceſſary marriage; but now he will rather leaue the land, than take the wife, leſt whiles hee ſhould preſerue Elimelechs inheritance, he ſhould deſtroy his owne; for the next ſeed, which he ſhould haue by Ruth, ſhould not be his heire, but his deceaſed kinſmans; How knew he whether God might not by that wife, ſend heires enough for both their eſtates? rather had he therefore incurre a manifeſt iniuſtice, than hazard the danger of his inheritance. The Law of God bound him to raiſe vp ſeed to the next in blood; the care of his inheritance drawes him to an neglect of his duty, though with infamy and reproach, and now he had rather his face ſhould be ſpit vpon, and his name ſhould be called, The houſe of him whoſe ſhoo was pulled off, than to reſerue the honour of him, that did his brother right, to his owne preiudice. B

How many are there, that doe ſo ouer-loue their iſſue, as that they regard neither ſinne nor ſhame in aduancing it? and that will rather indanger their ſoule, than leeſe their name? It is a wofull inheritance that makes men heires of the vengeance of God. Boaz is glad to take the aduantage of his refuſall; and holds that ſhoo (which was the ſigne of his tenure) more worth than all the land of Elimelech. And whereas other wiues purchaſe their husbands with a large dowry, this man purchaſeth his wife at a deare rate, and thinks his bargaine happy. All the ſubſtance of the earth, is not worth a vertuous and prudent wife, which Boaz doth now ſo reioyce in, as if he this day only began to be wealthy. C

Now is Ruth taken into the houſe of Boaz; ſhe that before had ſaide, ſhe was not like one of his maidens, is now become their Miſtreſſe. This day ſhe hath gleaned all the fields and barnes of a rich husband; and (that there might be no want in her happineſſe) by a gracious husband ſhe hath gained an happy ſeed; and hath the honour, aboue all the Dames of Iſrael, to be the great grand-mother of a King, of David, of the Meſsiah. D

Now is Marah turned backe againe to Naomi; and Orpah, if ſhee heare of this in Moab, cannot but enuy at her ſiſters happineſſe. Oh the ſure and bountifull paiments of the Almighty! Who euer came vnder his wing in vaine? Who euer loſt by truſting him? Who euer forſooke the Moab of this world for the true Iſrael, and did not at laſt reioyce in the change?

Anna and Peninna.

ILL cuſtomes, where they are once entertained, are not eaſily diſcharged; Polygamy, beſides carnall delight, might now plead age and example: ſo as euen Elkanah (though a Leuite) is tainted with the ſinne of Lamech; Like as faſhions of attire, which at the firſt were diſliked as vncomely, yet when they are once growne common, are taken vp of the graueſt. Yet this ſinne (as then currant with the time) could not make Elkanah not religious. The Houſe of God in Shilo was duly frequented of him; often times, alone, in his ordinary courſe of attendance; with all his males, thrice

A thrice a yeere; and once a yeere with all his family. The continuance of an vnknowne ſinne cannot hinder the vprightneſſe of a mans heart with God; as a man may haue a mole vpon his backe, and yet thinke his skinne cleare; the leaſt touch of knowledge or wilfulneſſe marres his ſincerity.

He that by vertue of his place was imployed about the ſacrifices of others, would much leſſe neglect his owne. It is a ſhame for him that teaches Gods people that they ſhould not appeare before the Lord empty, to bring no ſacrifice for himſelfe. If Leuites be profane, who ſhould be religious?

It was the faſhion, when they ſacrificed, to feaſt; ſo did Elkanah; the day of his deuotion is the day of his triumph; he makes great cheere for his whole family, euen for that wife which he loued leſſe. There is nothing more comely than cheerfulneſſe
B in the ſeruices of God. What is there in all the world, wherewith the heart of man ſhould be ſo lift v p, as with the conſcience of his duty done to his Maker? Whiles we doe ſo, God doth to vs, as our glaſſe, ſmile vpon vs, while we ſmile on him.

Loue will be ſeene by entertainment; Peninna and her children ſhall not complaine of want, but Anna ſhall finde her husbands affection in her portion: as his loue to her was double, ſo was her part: She fared not the worſe, becauſe ſhee was childleſſe: no good husband will diſlike his wife for a fault out of the power of her redneſſe: yea, rather, that which might ſeeme to loſe the loue of her husband, winnes it, her barrenneſſe. The good nature of Elkanah laboured by his deare reſpects to recompence is affliction, that ſo ſhe might find no leſſe diſcontentment in the fruit of his hearty loue, than ſhe had griefe from her owne fruitleſneſſe. It is the
C property of true mercy, to be moſt fauorable to the weakeſt: Thus doth the gracious ſpouſe of the Chriſtian ſoule pitty the barrenneſſe of his ſeruants. O Sauiour, we ſhould not find thee ſo indulgent to vs, if we did not complaine of our owne vnworthineſſe? Peninna may haue the more children, but barren Anna hath the moſt loue. How much rather could Elkanah haue wiſhed Peninna barren, and Anna fruitfull? but if ſhee ſhould haue had both iſſue and loue, ſhe had been proud, and her riuall deſpiſed. God knowes how to diſperſe his fauours ſo, that euery one may haue cauſe both of thankfulneſſe and humiliation; whiles there is no one that hath all, no one but hath ſome. If enuy and contempt were not thus equally tempered, ſome would be ouer hauty, and other too miſerable; But now, euery man ſees that in himſelfe which is worthy of contempt, and matter of emulation in others; and con-
D trarily, ſees what to pitty, and diſlike in the moſt eminent, and what to applaud in himſelfe, and out of this contrariety, ariſes a ſweet meane of contentation.

The loue of Elkanah is ſo vnable to free Anna from the wrongs of her riuall, that it procures them rather. The vnfruitfulneſſe of Anna had neuer with ſo much deſpight beene laid in her diſh, if her husbands heart had beene as barren of loue to her. Enuy, though it take aduantage of our weakneſſes, yet is euer raiſed vpon ſome grounds of happineſſe in them whom it emulates, it is euer an ill effect of a good cauſe: If Abels ſacrifice had not beene accepted, and if the acceptation of his ſacrifice had not beene a bleſſing, no enuy had followed vpon it.

There is no euill of another, wherein it is fit to reioyce, but his enuy, and this is worthy of our ioy and thankfulneſſe, becauſe it ſhewes vs the price of that good,
E which wee had, and valued not. The malignity of enuy is thus well anſwered, when it is made the euill cauſe of a good effect to vs, when God and our ſoules may gaine by anothers ſinne. I doe not finde that Anna inſulted vpon Peninna, for the greater meaſure of her husbands loue, as Peninna did vpon her, for her fruitleſneſſe. Thoſe that are truely gracious, know how to receiue the bleſſings of God without contempt of them that want; and haue learned to be thankefull, without ouerlineſſe.

Enuy, when it is once conceiued in a malicious heart, is like fire in billets of Iuniper, which (they ſay) continues more yeeres than one. Euery yeere was Anna thus vexed with her emulous partner, and troubled both in her prayers and meales: Amidſt all their feaſtings, ſhe fed on nothing but teares. Some diſpoſitions are leſſe ſenſible, and more careleſſe of the diſpight and iniuries of others, and can turne ouer vnkinde vſages, with contempt. By how much more tender the heart is, ſo much more deeply is it euer effected with diſcourteſies: As wax receiues & retaines that impreſſion, which in the hard clay cannot be ſeen; or as the eye feeles that moate, which the skin of the eye-lid could not complaine of. Yet the husband of Anna (as on that knew his duty) labours by his loue, to comfort her againſt theſe diſcontentments, Why weepeſt thou? Am not I better to thee than ten ſonnes? It is the weakneſſe of good natures, to giue ſo much aduantage to an enemy; what would malice rather haue, than the vaxation of them whom it perſecutes? We cannot better pleaſe an aduerſary, than by hurting our ſelues: This is no other than to humour enuy, to ſerue the turne of thoſe that maligne vs, and to draw on that malice whereof we are weary; whereas careleſneſſe puts ill will out of countenance, and makes it withdraw it ſelfe in a rage, as that which doth but ſhame the authour, without the hurt of the patient. In cauſeleſſe wrongs, the beſt remedy is contempt.

She that could not finde comfort in the louing perſwaſions of her husband, ſeekes it in her prayers, ſhe riſes vp hungry from the feaſt, and hies her to the Temple; there ſhee powres out her teares and ſupplications. Whatſoeuer the complaint be, here is the remedy. There is one vniuerſall receit for all euills, prayer: when all helpes failes vs, this remaines, and whiles we haue an heart, comforts it

Here was not more bitterneſſe in the ſoule of Anna, than feruency; ſhee did not only weepe and pray, but vow vnto God. If God will giue her a ſonne, ſhe will giue her ſonne to God backe againe: Euen nature it ſelfe had conſecrated her ſonne to God; for he could not but be borne a Leuite: But if his birth make him a Leuite, her vow ſhall make him a Nazerite, and dedicate his minority to the Tabernacle. The way to obtaine any benefit, is to deuote it in our hearts, to the glory of that God, of whom wee aske it: By this meanes ſhall God both pleaſure his ſeruant, and honour himſelfe; whereas, if the ſcope of our deſires be carnall, we may be ſure, either to faile of our ſuit, or of a bleſſing.

Eli and Anna.

Eli ſits on a ſtoole, by one of the poſts of the Tabernacle: Where ſhould the Prieſts of God be but in the Temple? Whether for action or ouer-ſight. Their very preſence keeps Gods Houſe in order, and the preſence of God keeps their hearts in order.

It is oft found, that thoſe which are themſelues conſcionable, are too forward to the cenſuring of others: Good Eli, becauſe he marks the lips of Anna to moue without noiſe, chides her as drunken, and vncharitably miſconſtrues her deuotion: It was a weake ground whereon to build ſo heauy a ſentence. If ſhe had ſpoken too loud, and incompoſedly, he might haue had ſome iuſt colour for his conceit; but now to accuſe her ſilence (notwithanding all her teares which he ſaw) of drunkenneſſe, it was a zealous breach of charity.

Some ſpirit would haue beene enraged with ſo raſh a cenſure: When anger meets with griefe, both turne into fury; But this good woman had beene inured to reproaches, and beſides, did well ſee the reproofe aroſe frome miſpriſion, and the miſpriſion from zeale; and therefore anſwers meekely, as one that had rather ſatiſfie, than expoſtulate; Nay, my Lord, but I am a woman troubled in ſpirit. Eli may now learne charity of Anna: If ſhee had beene in that diſtemper, whereof hee accuſed her, his iuſt reproofe had not beene ſo eaſily digeſted: Guiltineſſe is commonly clamorous and impatient, whereas innocence is ſilent, and careleſſe of miſ-reports. It is naturall to all men, to wipe off from their name, all aſperſions of euill, but none doe it with ſuch violence as they which are faulty. It is a ſigne the horſe is galled, that ſtirres too much when he is touched.

She

A She that was cenſured for drunken, cenſures drunkenneſſe more deeply than her reprouer; Count not thine hand-maid for a daughter of Belial. The drunkards ſtile begins in lawleſneſſe, proceeds in vnprofitableneſſe, ends in miſery; and all ſhut vp in the denomination of this pedegree. A ſonne of Belial.

If Anna had beene tainted with this ſinne, ſhee would haue denied it with more fauour, and haue diſclaimed it with extenuation; What if I ſhould haue beene merry with wine? yet I might be deuout: If I ſhould haue ouer-ioyed in my ſacrifice to God, one cup of exceſſe had not beene ſo hainous: now her freedome is ſeene in her ſeuerity. Thoſe which haue cleare hearts from any ſinne, proſecute it with rigour; whereas the guilty are euer partiall: their conſcience holds their hand, and tells them that they beat themſelues whiles they puniſh others.

B Now Eli ſees his error, and recants it; and to make amends for his raſh cenſure, prayes for her. Euen the beſt may erre, but not perſiſt in it: What good natures haue offended, they are vnquiet, till they haue haſtened ſatisfaction: This was within his office, to pray for the diſtreſſed: Wherefore ſerues the Prieſt, but to ſacrifice for the people? and the beſt ſacrifices are the prayers of faith.

She that began her prayers with faſting and heauineſſe, riſes vp from them with cheerefulneſſe and repaſt. It cannot be ſpoken, how much eaſe and ioy the heart of man findes in hauing vnloaded his cares, and powred out his ſupplications into the eares of God; ſince it is well aſſured, that the fruit which is faithfully asked, is already granted in heauen. The conſcience may well reſt, when it tells vs, that wee haue neglected no meanes of redreſſing our affliction; for then it may reſolue to
C looke either for amendment, or patience.

The ſacrifice is ended, and now Elkanah and his family riſe vp earely to returne vnto Ramah: but they dare not ſet forward till they haue worſhipped before the Lord. That iourney cannot hope to proſper, that takes not God with it. The way to receiue bleſſings at home, is to be deuout at the Temple.

She that before conceiued faith in her heart, now conceiues a ſonne in her womb: God will rather worke miracles than faithfull prayers ſhall returne empty: I do not find that Peninna asked any ſonne of God, yet ſhe had ſtore; Anna begged hard for this one, and could not till now obtaine him. They which are deareſt to God, doe oftimes with great difficulty worke out thoſe bleſings, which fall into the mouthes of the careleſſe. The wiſe diſpoſer of all things, knowes it fit to hold vs ſhort of thoſe
D fauours which we ſue for; whether for the triall of our patience, or the exerciſe of our faith, or the increaſe of our importunity, or the doubling of our obligation.

Thoſe children are moſt like to proue bleſſings, which the parents haue begged of God; and which are no leſſe the fruit of our ſupplications, than of our body. As this childe was the ſonne of his mothers prayers, and was conſecrated to God ere his poſſibility of being; ſo now himſelfe ſhall know, both how hee came, and whereto he was ordained; and leſt he ſhould forget it, his very name ſhall teach him both; (Shee called his name Samuel.) He cannot ſo much as heare himſelfe named, but he muſt needs remember both the extraordinary mercy of God, in giuing him to a barren mother; and the vow of his mother, in reſtoring him backe to God by her zealous dedication; and by both of them learne holineſſe and obedience. There
E is no neceſſity of ſignificant names; but we cannot haue too many monitors to put vs in minde of our duty.

It is wont to be the fathers priuiledge to name the childe; but becauſe this was his mothers ſonne, begotten more by her prayers, than the ſeed of Elkanah, it was but reaſon, that ſhe ſhould haue the chiefe hand, both in his name and diſpoſing. It had beene indeed the power of Elkanah, to haue changed both his name and profeſſion, and to abrogate the vow of his wife; that wiues might know, they were not their owne; and that the rib might learne to know the head: But husbands ſhall abuſe their authority, if they ſhall wilfully croſſe the holy purpoſes and religious indeauours of their yoke-fellowes. How much more fit is it for them to cheriſh all good deſires in the weaker veſſells? and as wee vſe, when we carry a

ſmall

ſmall light in a wind, to hide it with our lap, or hand, that it may not goe out. If the wife be a Vine, the husband ſhould be an Elme to vp-hold her in all worthy enterpriſes, elſe ſhe falls to the gronnd, and proues fruitleſſe.

The yeere is now come about; and Elkanah calls his family to their holy iourney, to goe vp to Ieruſalem, for the anniuerſary ſolemnity of their ſacrifice: Annaes heart is with them, but ſhe hath a good excuſe to ſtay at home, the charge of her Samuel: her ſucceſſe in the Temple, keeps her haply from the Temple; that her deuotion may be doubled, becauſe it was reſpited. God knowes how to diſpence with neceſſities; but if we ſuffer idle and needleſſe occaſions to hold vs from the Tabernacle of God, our hearts are but hollow to Religion.

Now, at laſt, when the child was weaned from her hand, ſhe goes vp and payes her vow, and with it, payes the intereſt of her intermiſſion. Neuer did Anna goe vp with ſo glad a heart to Shilo, as now, that ſhe carries God this reaſonable preſent, which himſelfe gaue to her, and ſhe vowed to him; accompanied with the bounty of other ſacrifices, more in number and meaſure, than the law of God required of her; and all this is too little for her God, that ſo mercifully remembred her affliction, and miraculouſly remedied it. Thoſe hearts which are truly thankfull, doe no leſſe reioyce in their repayment, than in their receit; and doe as much ſtudy, how to ſhew their humble and feruent affections, for what they haue, as how to compaſſe fauours when they want them; their debt is their burthen, which when they haue diſcharged, they are at eaſe.

If Anna had repented of her vow, and not preſented her ſonne to the Tabernacle, Eli could not haue challenged him; He had only ſeene her lips ſtirre, not hearing the promiſe of her heart. It was enough that her owne ſoule knew her vow, and God which was greater than it. The obligation of a ſecret vow, is no leſſe, then if it had ten thouſand witneſſes.

Old Eli could not chuſe but much reioyce, to ſee this fruit of thoſe lips, which he thought moued with wine; and this good proofe, both of the mercifull audience of God, and the thankfull fidelity of her hand-maid; this ſight calls him downe to his knees (Hee worſhipped the Lord.) We are vnprofitable witneſſes of the mercies of God, and the graces of men, if we doe not glorifie him for others ſakes, no leſſe than for our owne.

Eli and Anna grew no better acquainted; neither had he ſo much cauſe to praiſe God for her, as ſhee afterwards for him. For if her owne prayers obtained her firſt child; his bleſſing inriched her with fiue more. If ſhe had not giuen her firſt ſonne to God ere ſhe had him; I doubt whether ſhe had not beene euer barren; or if ſhe had kept her Samuel at home, whether euer ſhe had conceiued againe; now, that piety which ſtripped her of her only child for the ſeruice of her God, hath multiplied the fruit of her wombe, and gaue her fiue for that one, which was ſtill no leſſe hers, becauſe he was Gods. There is no ſo certaine way of increaſe, as to lend, or giue vnto the owner of all things.

ELI and his Sonnes.

IF the conueyance of Grace were naturall, holy Parents would not be ſo ill ſuted with children. What good man would not rather wiſh his loynes dry, than fruitfull of wickedneſſe? Now, we can neither traduce goodneſſe, not chuſe but traduce ſinne. If vertue were as well entailed vpon vs, as ſinne, one might ſerue to checke the other in our children; but now, ſince Grace is deriued from heauen, on whomſoeuer it pleaſes the Giuer, and that euill which ours receiue hereditary from vs, is multiplyed by their owne corruption, it can be no wonder, that good men haue ill children, it is rather a wonder that any children are not euill. The ſonnes of Eli are as

A as lewd, as himselfe was holy. If the Goodnesse of examples, precepts, education, profession, could haue beene preseruatiues from extremity of sinne, these sonnes of an holy Father had not beene wicked; now, neither parentage nor breeding, not Priest-hood can keepe the sonnes of Eli from the sonnes of Belial. If our children be good, let vs thanke God for it; this was more than we could giue them; if euill, they may thanke vs, and themselues: vs, for their birth-sinne; themselues for the improuement of it to that height of wickednesse.

If they had not beene sonnes of Eli, yet being Priests of God, who would not haue hoped their very calling should haue infused some holinesse into them? But now euen their white Ephod couers our foule sinnes; yea, rather, if they which
B serue at the Altar degenerate, their wickednesse is so much more aboue others, as their places is holier. A wicked Priest is the worst creature vpon earth. Who are Diuells, but they which were once Angells of light? Who can stumble at the sinnes of the Euangelicall Leuites, that sees such impurity before the Arke of God? That God which promised to be the Leuites portion, had set forth the portion of his Ministers; he will feast them at his owne Altar; the brest and the right shoulder of the peace-offering was their morsell: these bold and couetous Priests will rather haue the flesh-hooke their arbiter, than God; whatsoeuer those three teeth fasten vpon, shall be for their tooth; they were weary of one ioint, and now their delicacy affects variety; God is not worthy to carue for these men, but their own hands; And this they do not receiue, but take; and take violently, vnseasonably; It had been fit God should be first serued, their presumption will not stay his leisure;
C ere the fat be burned, ere the flesh be boiled, they snatch more than their share from the Altar, as if the God of Heauen should wait on their palate; as if the Israelites had come thither to sacrifice to their bellies; and (as commonly a wanton tooth is the harbinger to luxurious wantonnesse) they are no sonner fed, than they neigh after the Dames of Israel; holy women assemble to the doore of the Tabernacle; these varlets tempt them to lust, that came thither for deuotion; they had wiues of their owne, yet their vnbridled desires roue after strangers, and feare not to pollute euen that holy place with abominable filthinesse. O sinnes, too shamefull for men; much more for the spirituall giudes of Israel! He that makes himselfe a seruant to his tooth, shall easily become a slaue to all inordinate affections. That Arke which expiated other mens sinnes, added to the sinnes of the sacri-
D ficers; Doubtlesse, many a soule was the cleaner for the blood of the sacrifices, which they shed; while their owne were more impure: And as the Altar cannot sanctifie the Priest, so the vncleannesse of the Minister cannot pollute the offering; because the vertue thereof is not in the agent, but in the institution; in the representation his sinne is his owne, the comfort of the Sacrament is from God; Our Clergie is no charter for heauen; Euen those whose trade is deuotion, may at once shew the way to heauen by their tongue, and by their foot lead the way to hell. It is neither a coule, nor an Ephod that can priuiledge the soule.

The sinne of these men was worthy of contempt, yea, perhaps, their persons; but for the people therefore, to abhorre the offerings of the Lord, was, to adde their euill vnto the Priests, and to offend God, because he was offended; There can no offence
E be iusty taken, euen at men; much lesse at God for the sake of men: No mans sins should bring the seruice of God into dislike, this is to make holy things guilty of our profaneneſse. It is a dangerous ignorance, not to distinguish betwixt the worke, and the instrument; whereupon it oft comes to passe, that wee fall out with God, because we finde cause of offence from men, and giue God iust cause to abhorre vs, because we abhorre his seruice vniustly. Although it be true (of great men especially) that they are the last that know the euills of their owne house, yet either it could not be when all Israel ruug of the lewdnesse of Elies sonnes, that hee onely should not know it, or if hee knew it not, his ignorance cannot be excused; for a seasonable restraint might haue preuented this extremity of debauchednesse. Complaints are long muttered of the great, ere they dare breake forth to open contestation:

teſtation: publike acuſations of authority, argues intolerable extremities of euill; nothing but age can plead for Eli, that hee was not the firſt accuſer of his ſonnes: now, when their enormities came to be the voice of the multitude, he muſt heare it perforce; and doubtleſſe he heard it with grieſe enough, but not with anger enough: hee that was the Iudge of Iſrael, ſhoud haue vnpartially iudged his owne fleſh and blood; neuer could hee haue offered a more pleaſing ſacrifice, than the depraued blood of ſo wicked ſonnes. In vaine doe we rebuke thoſe ſinnes abroad, which we tolerate at home. That man makes himſelfe but ridiculous, that leauing his owne houſe on fire, runs to quench his neigbours. A

I heard Eli ſharpe enough to Anna, vpon but a ſuſpicion of ſinne; and now, how milde I find him to the notorious crimes of his owne? Why doe you ſo, my ſonnes? It is no good report; my ſonnes, doe no more ſo: The caſe is altered with the perſons. If nature may be allowed to ſpeake in iudgement, and to make difference, not of ſinnes, but offenders, the ſentence muſt needs ſauour of partiality. Had theſe men but ſome little ſlackened their duty, or heedleſly omitted ſome rite of the ſacrifice, this cenſure had not beene vnfit; but to puniſh the thefts, rapines, ſacriledges, adulteries, inceſts of his ſonnes, with Why doe yee ſo, was no other, than to ſhaue that head, which had deſerued cutting off. As it is with ill humours, that a weake doſe doth but ſtirre and anger them, not purge them out; ſo it fareth with ſinnes: An eaſie reproofe doth but incourage wickedneſſe, and makes it thinke it ſelfe ſo ſlight, as that cenſure importeth: A vehement rebuke to a capitall euill, is but like a ſtrong ſhowre to a ripe field, which laies that corne which were worhy of a ſickle. It is a breach of iuſtice, not to proportionate the puniſhment to the offence: To whip a man for a murther, or to puniſh the purſe for inceſt, or to burne treaſon in the hand, or award the ſtockes to buglary, is to patronize euill in ſtead of reuenging it: Of the two extremes, rigour is more ſafe for the publike weale, becauſe the ouer-puniſhing of one offender frights many from ſinning. It is better to liue in a common-wealth where nothing is lawfull, than where euery thing. B C

Indulgent parents are cruell to themſelues, and their poſterity. Eli could not haue deuiſed which way to haue plagued himſelfe, and his houſe ſo much, as by his kindneſſe to his childrens ſinnes: What variety of iudgements doth hee now heare of from the meſſenger of God? Firſt, becauſe his old age (which vſes to be ſubiect to choller) inclined now to miſ-fauour his ſonnes; therefore there ſhall not be an old man left of his houſe for euer: and becauſe it vexed him not enough to ſee his ſonnes enemies to God in their profeſſion, therefore he ſhall ſee his enemy in the habitation of the Lord, and becauſe himſelfe forbore to take vengeance of his ſonnes, and eſteemed their life aboue the glory of his Maſter, therefore God will reuenge himſelfe, by killing them both in one day; and becauſe he abuſed his ſoueraignty by conniuence at ſinne, therefore ſhall his houſe be ſtripped of his honour, and ſee it tranſtated to another: And laſtly, becauſe hee ſuffered his ſonnes to pleaſe their owne wanton apperite, in taking meat off from Gods trencher, therefore, thoſe which remaine of his houſe, ſhall come to his ſucceſſours, to beg a piece of ſiluer, and a morſell of bread: In a word, becauſe hee was partiall to his ſonnes, God ſhall execute all this ſeuerely vpon him and them. I doe not read of any fault Eli had, but indulgence; and which of the notorious offenders were plagued more. Parents neede no other meanes to make them miſerable, than ſparing the rod. D E

Who ſhould be the bearer of theſe feareſull tidings to Eli, but young Samuel, whom himſelfe had trained vp? He was now growne paſt his mothers coats, fit for the meſſage of God. Old Eli rebuked not his young ſonnes, therefore young Samuel is ſent to rebuke him. I maruell not whiles the Prieſt-hood was ſo corrupted, if the Word of God were precious, if there were no publike viſion; It is not the manner of God to grace the vnworthy; The ordinary miniſtration in the Temple, was too much honour for thoſe that robbed the Altar, though they had no extraordinary reuelations. Hereupon it was, that God lets old Eli ſleepe (who ſlept in his ſinne) and awakes

A makes Samuel, to tell him what he would doe with his Maſter. He which was wont to be the mouth of God to the people, muſt now receiue the meſſage of God, from the mouth of another: As great perſons will not ſpeake to thoſe, with whom they are highly offended, but ſends them their checks by others.

The lights of the Temple were now dim, and almoſt ready to giue place to the morning, when God called Samuel; to ſignifie, perhaps, that thoſe which ſhould haue beene the lights of Iſrael, burned no leſſe dimly, and were neere their going out, and ſhould be ſucceeded with one, ſo much more lightſome than they, as the Sunne was more bright than the Lampes: God had good leiſure to haue deliuered this meſſage by day, but hee meant to make vſe of Samuels miſ-taking; and therefore ſo ſpeakes, that Eli may be asked for an anſwer, and perceiue himſelfe both omit-
B ted, and cenſured. He that meant to vſe Samuels voyce to Eli, imitates the voyce of Eli to Samuel; Samuel had ſo accuſtomed himſelfe to obedience, and to anſwer the call of Eli, that lying in the further cells of the Leuites, he is eaſily raiſed from his ſleepe; and euen in the night runnes for his meſſage to him, who was rather to receiue it from him: Thrice is the old man diſquieted with the diligence of his ſeruant; and, though viſions were rare in his daies, yet is he not ſo vnacquainted with God, as not to attribute that voice to him, which himſelfe heard not. Wherefore, like a better Tutor than a Parent, hee teaches Samuel what hee ſhall anſwer, Speake Lord, for thy ſeruant heareth.

It might haue pleaſed God at the firſt call, to haue deliuered his meſſage to Samuel, not expecting the anſwer of a nouice vnſeene in the viſions of a God, yet doth
C he rather deferre it till the fourth ſummons, and will not ſpeake till Samuel confeſſed his audience. God loues euer to prepare his ſeruants for his imployments, and will not commit his errands, but to thoſe, whom he addreſſed both by wonder, and attention, and humility.

Eli knew well the gracious faſhion of God, that where he tended a fauour, prorogation could be no hinderance, and therefore after the call of God thrice anſwered with ſilence, he inſtructs Samuel to be ready for the fourth: If Samuels ſilence had been wilfull, I doubt whether he had been againe ſollicited; Now God doth both pitty his error, and requite his diligence by redoubling his name at laſt.

Samuel had now many yeeres miniſtred before the Lord, but neuer till now heard his voyce; and now heares it with much terrour; for, the firſt word that hee heares
D God ſpeake, is threatning, and that of vengeance to his Maſter. What were theſe menaces, but ſo many premonitions to himſelfe that ſhould ſucceed Eli? God begins early to ſeaſon their hearts with feare, whom he meanes to make eminent inſtruments of his glory. It is his mercy to make vs witneſſes of the iudgements of others; that we may be forewarned, ere we haue the occaſions of ſinning.

I doe not heare God bid Samuel deliuer his meſſage to Eli; He that was but now made a Prophet, knowes that the errands of God intend not ſilence; and that God would not haue ſpoken to him of another, if he had meant the newes ſhould be reſerued to himſelfe: Neither yet did he runne with open mouth vnto Eli, to tell him this viſion vnasked. No wiſe man will be haſty to bring ill tidings to the great; rather doth he ſtay till the importunity of his Maſter ſhould wring it from his vnwil-
E lingneſſe; and then as his concealment ſhewed his loue, ſo his full relation ſhall approue his fidelity. If the heart of Eli had not told him this newes, before God told it Samuel, hee had neuer beene ſo inſtant with Samuel, not to conceale it; His conſcience did well preſage that it concerned himſelfe; guiltineſſe needs no Prophet to aſſure it of puniſhment. The minde that is troubled, proiecteth terrible things: and though it cannot ſingle out the iudgement allotted to it, yet it is in a confuſed expectation of ſome grieuous euill. Surely, Eli could not thinke it worſe than it was; The ſentence was fearefull, and ſuch, as I wonder, the necke, or the heart of old Eli could hold out the report of; That God ſweares he will iudge Elies houſe, and that with beggery, with death, with deſolation, and that the wickedneſſe of his houſe ſhall not be purged with ſacrifice, or offrings for euer: and yet this which euery

Iſraelites

Israelites eare should tingle to heare of, when it should be done; old Eli heares with an vnmoued patience, and humble submission, It is the Lord, let him doe what seemeth him good. Oh admirable faith, and more than humane constancy and resolution, worthy of the aged president of Shiloh, worthy of an heart sacrificed to that God, whose iustice had refused to expiate his sinne by sacrifice! If Eli haue beene an ill father to his sonnes, yet he is a good sonne to God, and is ready to kisse the very rod he shall smart withall; It is the Lord whom I haue euer found holy, and iust, and religious, and he cannnot but be himselfe; Let him doe what seemeth him good; for whatsoeuer seemeth good to him, cannot but be good; howsoeuer it seemes to me: Euery man can open his hand to God while he blesses; but to expose our selues willingly to the afflicting hand of our Maker, and to kneele to him while he scourges vs, is peculiar onely to the faithfull. A B

If euer a good heart could haue freed a man from temporall punishments, Eli must needs haue escaped: Gods anger was appeased by his humble repentance, but his iustice must be satisfied: Elies sin and his sonnes, was in the eye and mouth of all Israel; his therefore should haue beene much wronged by their impunity. Who would not haue made these spirituall guides an example of lawlesnesse, and haue said, What care I how I liue, if Elies sonnes goe away vnpunished? As not the teares of Eli, so not the words of Samuel may fall to the ground: Wee may not measure the displeasure of God by his stripes; many times, after the remission of the sinne; the very chastisements of the Almighty are deadly: No repentance can assure vs that wee shall not smart with outward afflictions; That can preuent the eternall displeasure of God, but still it may be necessary and good we should be corrected: Our care and suit must be, that the euills which shall not be auerted, may be sanctified. B C C

If the prediction of these euills were fearefull, what shall the execution be? The presumption of the ill-taught Israelites shall giue occasion to this iudgement; for being smitten before the Philistims, they send for the Arke into the field. Who gaue them authority to command the arke of God at their pleasure? Here was no consulting with the Arke which they would fetch; no inquiry of Samuel, whether they should fetch it; but an heady resolution of presumptuous Elders to force God into the field, and to challenge successe. If God were not with the Arke, why did they send for it, and reioyce in the comming of it? If God were with it, why was not his allowance asked, that it should come? How can the people be good, where the Priests are wicked? When the Arke of the Couenant of the Lord of Hosts that dwells betweene the Cherubins, was brought into the Host (though with meane and wicked attendance) Israel doth (as it were) fill the heauen, and shake the earth with shouts; As if the Arke and victory were no lesse vnseparable, than they and their sins. Euen the lewdest men will be looking for fauour from that God, whom they cared not to displease, contrary to the conscience of their deseruings. Presumption doth the same in wicked men, which Faith doth in the holiest. Those that regarded not the God of the Arke, thinke themselues safe and happy in the Arke of God: Vaine men are transported with a confidence in the out-side of Religion, not regarding the substance and soule of it, which onely can giue them true peace. But rather than God will humor superstition in Israelites, he will suffer his owne Arke to fall into the hands of Philistims: Rather will he seeme to slacken his hand of protection, than he will be thought to haue his hands bound by a formall misconfidence. The slaughter of the Israelites was no plague to this. It was a greater plague rather to them that should suruiue, and behold it. The two sonnes of Eli, which had helped to corrupt their brethren, die by the hands of the vncircumcised, and are now too late separated from the Arke of God by Philistims, which should haue beene before separated by their Father: They had liued formerly to bring Gods Altar into contempt, and now liue to carry his Arke into captiuity: and at last, as those that had made vp the measure of their wickednesse, are slaine in their sinne. D E

A Ill newes doth euer either runne, or flie: The man of Beniamin, which ranne from the Hoſt, hath ſoone filled the City with out-cries; and Elies eares with the cry of the City. The good old man, after ninety and eight yeeres, ſits in the gate, as one that neuer thought himſelfe too aged to doe God ſeruice; and heares the newes of Iſraels diſcomfiture, and his ſonnes death, though with ſorrow, yet with patience; but when the meſſenger tells him of the Arke of God taken, he can liue no longer; that word ſtrikes him downe backeward from his throne, and kills him in the fall: no ſword of a Philiſtim could haue ſlaine him more painfully, neither know I whether his necke or his heart were firſt broken. Oh fearefull iudgement, that euer any Iſraelites eare could tingle withall! The Arke loſt: what good man would wiſh to liue without God: Who can chuſe but thinke he hath liued too long, that hath
B ouer-liued the Teſtimonies of Gods preſence with his Church? Yea, the very daughter in law of Ely, a woman, the wife of a lewd husband; when ſhee was at once trauelling (vpon that tidings) and in that trauell, dying (to make vp the full ſumme of Gods iudgement vpon that wicked houſe) as one inſenſible of the death of her father, of her husband, of her ſelfe, in compariſon of this loſſe, calls her (then vnſeaſonable) ſonne Ichabod, and with her laſt breath, ſaies, The glory is departed from Iſrael, the Arke is taken. What cares ſhee for a poſterity, which ſhould want the Arke? What cares ſhee for a ſonne come into the world of Iſrael, when God was gone from it? And how willingly doth ſhee depart from them, from whom God was departed? Not outward magnificence, not ſtate, not wealth, not fauour of the mighty, but the preſence of God in his Ordinances, are the glory of Iſrael: the
C ſubducing whereof is a greater iudgement than deſtruction.

Oh Iſrael, worſe now than no people! a thouſand times more miſerable than Philiſtims: Thoſe Pagans went away triumphing with the Arke of God, and victory; and leaue the remnants of the choſen people to lament, that they once had a God.

Oh cruell and wicked indulgence, that is now found guilty of the death, not onely of the Prieſts, and people, but of Religion! Vniuſt mercy can neuer end in leſſe than blood; and it were well, if onely the body ſhould haue cauſe to complaine of that kinde cruelty.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGULAR GOOD LORD the Lord Hay, Baron of Saley,

One of his Majesties most Honourable Privie Councell.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

VPon how just reason these my Contemplations goe forth so late after their Fellowes, it were needlesse to give account to your Lordship, in whose traine I had the honour (since my last) to passe both the Sea and the Twede. All my private studies have gladly vayled to the publike services of my Soveraigne Master: No sooner could I recover the happinesse of my quiet thoughts, then I renued this my divine taske: Wherein I cannot but professe to place so much contentment, as that I wish not any other measure of my life, then it; What is this, other then the exaltation of ISAACS delight, to walk forth into the pleasant fields of the Scriptures, and to meditate of nothing under heaven? Yea; what oher then JACOBS sweet vision of Angels, climbing up and downe that sacred Ladder, which God hath set between heaven and earth? Yea, (to rise yet higher) what other then an imita- tion of holy Moſes, in this converſing with God himſelfe, on the Horeb of both Teſtaments? And if I may call your Lo. forth a little from your great affaires of Court and State, to bleſſe your eyes with this proſpect, how happy ſhall you confeſſe this change of objects? and how unwillingly ſhal you obtaine leave of your thoughts to returne unto theſe ſublunary imployments? Our laſt Diſcourſe left Gods Arke amongſt the Philiſtims; now we returne to ſee what it doth there, and to fetch it thence: Wherein your Lo. ſhall finde the revenges of God never ſo deadly, as when he gives moſt way unto men; The vaine confidence of wickedneſſe ending in a late repentance: The fearefull plagues of a preſumptuous ſawcines with God, not prevented with the honeſty of good intentions; The mercy of God accepting the ſervices of an humble Faithfulneſſe in a meaner dreſſe. From thence you ſhall ſee the dangerous iſſue of an effected innovation, although to the better; The errors of credulitie, and blinde affection in the holieſt Governours, guilty of the peoples diſcontentment; The ſtubborne headdineſſe of a multitude that once findes the reynes ſlacke in their necks, not capable of any pauſe, but their owne fall; The untruſty promiſes of a faire outſide, and a plauſible entrance, ſhutting up in a wofull diſappointment. What do I foreſtall a diſcourſe ſo full of choyce, your Lo. ſhall finde every line uſefull, and ſhall willingly confeſſe that the Story of God can make a man not leſſe wiſe, than good.

Mine humble thankefulneſſe knowes not how to expreſſe it ſelfe otherwiſe, than in theſe kinde of preſents, and in my heartie prayers for the increaſe of your honour, and happineſſe, which ſhall never be wanting from

THE TVVELFTH BOOKE.

The Arke and Dagon.

IF men did not miſtake God, they could not ariſe to ſuch height of impiety: The acts of his juſt judgement are imputed toimpotence; that God would ſend his Arke captive to the Philiſtims, is ſo conſtrued by them, as if hee could not keepe it: the wife of Pinehas cryed out, that glory was departed from Iſrael; The Philiſtims dare ſay in triumph, that glory is departed from the God of Iſrael: The Arke was not Iſraels, but Gods, this victory reaches higher then to men. Dagon had never ſo great a day, ſo many ſacrifices, as now that he ſeemes to take the God of Iſrael priſoner: Where ſhould the captive be beſtowed, but in cuſtody of the victor? It is not love, but inſultation, that lodges the Arke cloſe beſide Dagon. What a ſpectacle was this, to ſee uncircumciſed Philiſtims laying their prophane hands upon the Teſtimony of Gods preſence? to ſee the glorious Mercy-ſeat under the roofe of an Idol? to ſee the two Cherubins ſpreading their wings under a falſe god?

Oh the deepe and holy wiſedome of the Almighty, which over-reaches all the finite conceits of his creatures, who whiles he ſeemes moſt to neglect himſelfe, fetches about moſt glory to his owne name; He winkes and ſits ſtill on purpoſe, to ſee what men would doe, and is content to ſuffer indignity from his creature, for a time, that he may be everlaſtingly magnified in his juſtice, and power: That honour pleaſeth God and men beſt, which is raiſed out of contempt.

The Arke of God was not uſed to ſuch Porters; The Philiſtims carrie it unto Aſhdod, that the victorie of Dagon may bee more glorious: What paines Superſtition puts men unto, for the triumph of a falſe cauſe? And if prophane Philiſtims can think it no toile to carrie the Arke where they ſhould not, what a ſhame is it for us, if wee doe not gladly attend it where we ſhould? How juſtly may Gods truth ſcorne the imparitie of our zeale?

If the Iſraelites did put confidence in the Arke, can wee marvell that the Philiſtims did put confidence in that power which (as they thought) had conquered the Arke? The leſſe is ever ſubject unto the grtater; What could they now thinke but that heaven and earth were theirs? Who ſhall ſtand out againſt them, when the God of Iſrael hath yeelded? Securitie & preſumptiõ attend ever at the threſhold of ruine.

God will let them ſleepe in this confidence; in the morning they ſhall find how vainly they have dreamed. Now they begin to find they have but gloried in their owne plague, and overthrown nothing but their own peace. Dagon hath an houſe, when God hath but a Tabernacle; It is no meaſuring of Religion by outward glory: Into this houſe the proud Philiſtims come, the next morning, to congratulate unto their god, ſo great a captive, ſuch divine ſpoiles, and in their early devotions to fall downe before him, under whom the God of Iſrael was fallen: and loe, where they find their god, fallen downe on the ground upon his face, before him whom they thought both his priſoner and theirs: Their God is forced to doe that, which they ſhould have done voluntarily; although God caſt downe that dumbe rivall of his for ſcorne, not for adoration. Oh ye fooliſh Philiſtims, could yee thinke that the ſame houſe will hold God and Dagon? could ye thinke a ſenſeleſſe ſtone, a fit companion and guardian for the living God? Had ye laid your Dagon upon his face, proſtrate before the Arke, yet would not God have endured the indignity of ſuch a lodging; but now that ye preſume to ſet up your carved ſtone, equall to his Cherubins, goe reade your folly in the floore of your Temple, and know that hee which caſt your god ſo low, can caſt you lower.

The true God owes a ſhame to thoſe which will be making matches betwixt himſelfe and Belial.

But this perhaps was onely a miſchance, or a neglect of attendance, lay to your hands, O ye Philiſtims, and raiſe up Dagon into his place: It is a miſerable god that needs helping up; Had ye not beene more ſenſeleſſe then that ſtone, how could you chooſe but thinke, How ſhall he raiſe us above our enemies, that cannot riſe alone? How ſhall he eſtabliſh us in the ſtation of our peace, that cannot hold his owne foot? If Dagon did give the foile unto the God of Iſrael, what power is it, that hath caſt him upon his face, in his owne Temple? It is juſt with God, that thoſe which want grace, ſhall want wit too; it is the power of ſuperſtition, to turne men into thoſe ſtocks and ſtones which they worſhip: They that make them are like unto them: Doubtleſſe, this firſt fall of Dagon was kept as ſecret, & excuſed as well as it might, and ſerved rather for aſtoniſhment, then conviction; there was more ſtrangeneſſe then horrour in that accident: That whereas Dagon had wont to ſtand, and the Philiſtims fall downe, now Dagon fell downe, and the Philiſtims ſtood, and muſt become the patrons of their owne god; their god worſhips them upon his face, and craves more helpe from them, then ever hee could give: But if their ſottiſhneſſe can digeſt this, all is well.

Dagon is ſet in his place, and now thoſe hands are lift up to him, which helped to lift him up; & thoſe faces are proſtrate unto him, before whom he lay proſtrate. Idolatry and ſuperſtition are not eaſily put out of countenance; but will the jealouſie of the true God put it up thus? Shall Dagon eſcape with an harmleſſe fall? Surely, if they had let him lye ſtill upon the pavement, perhaps that inſenſible ſtatue had found no other revenge; but now, they will be advancing it to the rood-loft againe, and affront Gods Arke with it, the event will ſhame them, and let them know, how much God ſcornes a partner either of his owne making, or theirs.

The morning is fitteſt for devotion, then doe the Philiſtims flocke to the Temple of their god. What a ſhame is it for us to come late to ours? Although not ſo much pietie as curioſitie did now haſten their ſpeed, to ſee what reſt their Dagon was allowed to get in his owne roofe; and now behold their kind god is come to meete them in the way: ſome pieces of him ſalute their eyes upon the threſhold. Dagons head and hands are over-runne their fellowes, to tell the Philiſtims how much they were miſtaken in a god.

This ſecond fall breakes the Idol in pieces, and threats the ſame confuſion to the worſhippers of it. Eaſie warnings neglected end ever in deſtruction. The head is for deviſing, the hand for execution: In theſe two powers of their god, did the Philiſtims chiefly truſt; theſe are therefore laid under their feet, upon the threſhold, that they might afarre off ſee their vanity, and that (if they would) they might ſet their foot on that beſt peece of their god, wherein their heart was ſet.

There

A There was nothing wherein that Idoll reſembled a man, but in his head, and hands the reſt was but a ſcaly portraiture of a fiſh; God would therefore ſeparate from this ſtone, that part which had mocked man, with the counterfeit of himſelfe, that man might ſee what an unworthy lumpe he had matched with himſelfe, and ſet up above himſelfe: The juſt quarrell of God is bent upon thoſe meanes, and that parcell which have dared to rob him of his glory.

How can the Philiſtims now miſſe the ſight of their owne folly? how can they bee but enough convicted of their mad idolatry, to ſee their god lye broken to morſels, under their feet? every peece whereof proclaimes the power of him that brake it, & the ſtupidity of thoſe that adored it? Who would expect any other iſſue of this act, but to heare the Philiſtims ſay, Wee now ſee how ſuperſtition hath blinded us? Dagon is no god for us, our hearts ſhall never more reſt upon a broken ſtatue: That one-
B ly true God, which hath beaten ours, ſhall challenge us by the right of conqueſt: but here was none of this; rather a further degree of their dotage followes upō this palpable conviction: They cannot yet ſuſpect that god, whoſe head they may trample upon, but in ſtead of hating their Dagon, that lay broken upon their threſhold, they honour the threſhold, on which Dagon lay; and dare not ſet their foot on that place which was hallowed by the broken head and hands of their Deitie. Oh the obſtinacie of Idolatry, which where it hath got hold of the heart, knowes neither to bluſh, nor yeeld, but rather gathers ſtrength from that which might juſtly confound it. The hand of the Almighty, which moved them not in falling upon their god, fals now neerer them upon their perſons, and ſtrikes them in their bodies, which would not
C feele themſelves ſtricken in their Idoll: Paine ſhall humble them whom ſhame cannot. Thoſe which had entertained the ſecret thoughts of abominable idolatrie within them, are now plagued in the inwardeſt and moſt ſecret part of their bodies, with a loathſome diſeaſe; and now grow weary of themſelves, in ſtead of their idolatry. I doe not heare them acknowledge it was GODS hand, which had ſtricken Dagon their god, till now, they finde themſelves ſtricken: GODS judgements are the racke of godleſſe men; If one ſtraine make them not confeſſe, let them bee ſtretched but one wrench higher, and they cannot be ſilent. The juſt avenger of ſinne will not loſe the glory of his executions, but will have men know from whom they ſmart.

The Emerods were not a diſeaſe beyond the compaſſe of naturall cauſes, neither
D was it hard for the wiſer ſort, to give a reaſon of their complaint, yet they aſcribe it to the hand of God: The knowledge and operation of ſecondary cauſes ſhould be no prejudice to the firſt; They are worſe then the Philiſtims, who when they ſee the meanes, doe not acknowledge the firſt Mover; whoſe active and juſt power is no leſſe ſeene in imploying ordinary agents, then in raiſing up extraordinarie: neither doth he leſſe ſmite by a common fever, then a revenging Angell.

They judge right of the cauſe, what doe they reſolve for the cure? (Let not the Arke of the God of Iſrael abide with us) where they ſhould have ſaid, Let us caſt out Dagon, that we may pacifie and retaine the God of Iſrael, they determine to thruſt out the Arke of God, that they might peaceably enjoy themſelves, and Dagon. Wicked men are upon all occaſions glad to be rid of God, but they can with no patience,
E endure to part with their ſinnes, and whiles they are wearie of the hand that puniſheth them, they hold faſt the cauſe of their puniſhment.

Their firſt and onely care is to put away him, who as he hath corrected, ſo can eaſe them. Folly is never ſeparated from wickedneſſe.

Their heart told them that they had no right to the Arke. A Councell is called of their Princes & Prieſts. If they had reſolved to ſend it home, they had done wiſely; Now they doe not carry it away, but they carry it about from Ebenezer to Aſhdod, from Aſhdod to Gath, from Gath to Ekron: Their ſtomacke was greater then their conſcience; The Arke was too ſore for them, yet it was too good for Iſrael; and they will rather dye then make Iſrael happie. Their conceit, that the change of ayre could appeaſe the Arke, God uſeth to his owne advantage; for by this meanes his power is knowne, and his judgement ſpred over all the country of the Philiſtims.

ſtims: What doe theſe men now, but ſend the plague of God to their fellowes? The juſtice of God can make the ſinnes of men their mutuall executioners; It is the faſhion of wicked men to draw their neighbours into the partnerſhip of their condemnation.

Whereſoever the Arke goes, there is deſtruction; The beſt of Gods Ordinances, if they bee not proper to us, are deadly. The Iſraelites did not more ſhout for joy, when they ſaw the Arke come to them, than the Ekronites cry out for griefe to ſee it brought amongſt them: Spirituall things are either ſoveraigne, or hurtfull, according to the diſpoſition of the recivers. The Arke doth either ſave, or kill, as it is entertained.

At laſt, when the Philiſtims are well wearie of paine and death, they are glad to bee quit of their ſinne? The voyce of the Princes and people is changed to the better (Send away the Arke of the God of Iſrael, and let it returne to his owne place.) God knowes how to bring the ſtubborneſt enemy upon his knees, and makes him doe that out of feare, which his beſt child would doe out of love and duty. How miſerable was the eſtate of theſe Philiſtims? Every man was either dead, or ſicke: thoſe that were left living (through their extremitie of paine) envied the dead, and the cry of their whole Cities went up to heaven. It is happy that God hath ſuch ſtore of plagues and thunderbolts for the wicked: If he had not a fire of judgement, wherewith the yron hearts of men might bee made flexible, he would want obedience, and the world peace.

The Arkes revenge and returne.

IT had wont to bee a ſure rule, Whereſoever God is among men, there is the Church: Here onely it failed: The teſtimony of Gods preſence was many moneths amongſt the Philiſtims, for a puniſhment to his owne people, whom hee left; for a curſe to thoſe forrainers which entertained it; Iſrael was ſeven moneths without GOD: How doe wee thinke faithfull Samuel tooke this abſence? How deſolate and forlorne did the Tabernacle of GOD looke, without the Arke? There were ſtill the Altars of GOD; his Prieſts, Levites, Tables, Veiles, Cenſers, with all their legall accouſtrements: Theſe without the Arke, were as the Sunne without light, in the midſt of an Eclypſe: If all theſe had beene taken away, and onely the Arke had beene remaining, the loſſe had beene nothing to this, that the Arke ſhould be gone, and they left: For what are all theſe without God, and how all-ſufficient is GOD without theſe? There are times, wherein GOD withdrawes himſelfe from his Church, and ſeemes to leave her without comfort, without protection: Sometimes wee ſhall finde Iſrael taken from the Arke, otherwhiles the Arke is taken from Iſrael: In either, there is a ſeparation betwixt the Arke and Iſrael: Heavy times to every true Iſraelite, yet ſuch as whoſe example may relieve us in our deſertions: Still was this people, Iſrael; the ſeed of him, that would not bee left of God without a bleſſing; and therefore without the teſtimony of his preſence, was God preſent with them: It were wide with the faithfull, if God were not oftentimes with them, when there is no witneſſe of his preſence.

One act was a mutuall penance to the Iſraelites and Philiſtims, I know not to whether more: Iſrael grieved for the loſſe of that, whoſe preſence grieved the Philiſtims, their paine was therefore no other then voluntary: It is ſtrange, that the Philiſtims would endure ſeven moneths ſmart with the Arke, ſince they ſaw, that the preſence of the Priſoner would not requite; no nor mitigate to them, one houres miſery: Fooliſh men will be ſtruggling with God, till they be utterly either breathleſſe or impotent. Their hope was, that time might abate diſpleaſure, even whiles they perſiſted to offend: The falſe hopes of wordly men coſt them deare; they could not be ſo miſerable, if their owne hearts did not deceive them with miſ-expectations of impoſſible favour.

In

In matters that concerne a God, who is so fit to be consulted with, as the priests? The Princes of the Philistims had before given their voyces, yet nothing is determined, nothing is done without the direction and assent of those whom they accounted sacred: Nature it selfe sends us in divine things, to those persons, whose calling is divine: It is either distrust, or presumption, or contempt, that caries us our owne waies in spirituall matters, without advising with them, whose lips God hath appointed to preserve knowledge: There cannot but arise many difficulties in us about the Arke of God; whom should wee consult with but those which have the Tongue of the Learned.

Doubtlesse, this question of the Arke did abide much debating: There wanted not faire probabilities on both sides: A wise Philistim might well plead, If God had either so great care of the Arke, or power to retaine it, how is it become ours? A wiser then he would reply? If the God of Israel had wanted either care or power, Dagon, and we had beene still whole: why doe we thus grone, and dye, all that are but within the Aire of the Arke, if a divine hand doe not attend it? Their smart pleads enough for the dismission of the Arke: The next demand of their Priests and Soothsayers, is, how it should be sent home: Affliction had made them so wise, as to know, that every fashion of parting with the Arke would not satisfie the owner: oftentimes the circumstance of an action marres the substance: In divine matters wee must not onely looke, that the body of our service be sound, but that the clothes be fit: Nothing hinders, but that sometimes good advice may fall from the mouth of wicked men. These superstitious Priests can counsell them, not to send away the Arke of God emptie, but to give it a sinne-offering: They had not lived so farre from the smoake of the Jewish Altars, but that they knew, God was accustomed to manifold oblations, and chiefly to those of expiation. No Israelite could have said better: Superstition is the Ape of true devotion, and if we looke not to the ground of both, many times it is hard by the very outward acts to distinguish them: Nature it selfe teacheth us, that God loves a full hand: He that hath beene so bountifull to us, as to give us all, lookes for a returne of some offering from us; If we present him with nothing but our sins, how can wee looke to be accepted? The sacrifices under the Gospell are spirituall, with these must we come into the presence of God, if we desire to carie away remission and favour.

The Philistims knew well, that it were bootlesse for them to offer, what they listed; their next suit is to be directed in the matter of their oblation: Pagans can teach us, how unsafe it is to walke in the wayes of Religion without a guide, yet here their best teachers can but guesse at their duty, and must devise for the people, that, which the people durst not impose upon themselves: The golden Emerods, and Mise, were but conjecturall prescripts: With what security may we consult with them which have their directions from the mouth and hand of the Almighty?

God strucke the Philistims at once in their god, in their bodies, in their land: In their god, by his ruine and dismembering: In their bodies, by the Emerods: In their land, by the Mise: That base vermine did God send among them on purpose to shame their Dagon and them, that they might see, how unable their god was (which they thought the Victor of the Arke) to subdue the least Mouse, which the true God did create, and command to plague them. This plague upon the fields, beganne together with that upon their bodies: it was mentioned, not complained of, till they think of dismissing the Arke: Greater crosses doe commonly swallow up the lesse: At least, lesser evils are either silent, or unheard while the eare is filled with the clamor of the greater. Their very Princes were punished with the Mise, as well as with the Emerods; God knowes no persons in the execution of judgments; The least and meanest of all Gods creatures is sufficient to be the revenger of his Creator.

GOD sent them Mise, and Emerods of flesh and blood: they returne him both these of gold, to imply, both, that these judgements came out from God, and that they did gladly give him the glory of that, whereof hee gave them paine and sorrow row; and that they would willingly buy off their paine with the beſt of their ſubſtance: The proportion betwixt the complaint and ſatisfaction is more precious to him, then the Metall. There was a publike confeſſion in this reſemblance, which is ſo pleaſing unto God, that he rewards it, even in wicked men, with a relaxation of outward puniſhment. The number was no leſſe ſignificant, then the forme: Five golden Emerods, and Miſe, for the five Princes and diviſions of Philiſtims. As God made no difference in puniſhing, ſo they make none in their oblation: The people are compriſed in them, in whom they are united, their ſeverall Princes. They were one with their Prince, their Offering is one with his; as they were Ring-leaders in the ſinne, ſo they muſt be in the ſatisfaction: In a multitude it is ever ſeene, as in a beaſt, that the body followes the head, Of all others, great men had need to looke to their wayes, it is in them, as in figures, one ſtands for a thouſand. One Offering ſerves not al, there muſt bee five, according to the five heads of the offence. Generalities wil not content God; every man muſt make his ſeverall peace, if not in himſelfe, yet in his head: Nature taught them a ſhadow of that, the ſubſtance and perfection whereof is taught us by the grace of the Goſpell; every ſoule muſt ſatisfie God, if not in it ſelfe, yet in him, in whom we are both one, and abſolute: we are the body, whereof Chriſt is the head, our ſinne is in our ſelves, our ſatisfaction muſt be in him.

Samuel himſelfe could not have ſpoken more divinely, then theſe Prieſts of Dagon; they doe not onely talke of giving glory to the God of Iſrael, but fall into an holy & grave expoſtulation (wherefore then ſhould ye harden your hearts, as the Ægyptians, and Pharaoh hardned their hearts, when hee wrought wonderfully amongſt them? &c.) They confeſſe a ſupereminent and revenging hand of God over their gods, they parallell their plagues with the Ægyptian, they make uſe of Pharaohs ſin, and judgement; What could be better ſaid? All Religions have afforded them, that could ſpeake well: Theſe good words left them ſtill both Philiſtims, and ſuperſtitious: How ſhould men be hypocrites, if they had not good tongues? yet (as wickednes can hardly hide it ſelf) theſe holy ſpeeches are not without a tincture of that Idolatry, wherewith the heart was infected: For they profeſſe care not onely of the perſons, and lands of the Philiſtims, but of their gods; (that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods.) Who would thinke that wiſedome and folly could lodge ſo neere together? that the ſame men ſhould have care both of the glory of the true God, and preſervation of the falſe? That they ſhould bee ſo vaine, as to take thought for thoſe gods which they granted to be obnoxious unto an higher Deitie? Oft times even one word bewrayeth a whole pack of falſhood, and though Superſtition be a cleanly counterfeit, yet ſome one ſlip of the tongue diſcovers it, as we ſay of devils, which though they put on faire formes, yet are they knowne by their cloven feet.

What other warrant theſe ſuperſtitious Prieſts had for the maine ſubſtance of their advice, I know not; ſure I am, the probability of the event was faire; that two Kine never uſed to any yoake, ſhould runne from their Calves (which were newly ſhut up from them) to draw the Arke home into a cõtrary way, muſt needs argue an hand above Nature: What elſe ſhould over-rule bruite creatures to preferre a forced cariage unto a naturall burden? What ſhould cary them from their owne home, towards the home of the Arke? What elſe ſhould guide an untamed and untaught Teame, in as right a path toward Iſrael, as their Teachers could have gone? What elſe could make very beaſts more wiſe, then their Maſters? There is a ſpeciall providence of God, in the very motions of bruit creatures; Neither Philiſtims nor Iſraelites ſaw ought that drove them, yet they ſaw them ſo runne, as thoſe that were led by the Divine Conduct. The reaſonleſſe creatures alſo doe the will of their Maker; every act that is done either by them, or to them, makes up the decree of the Almighty; and if in extraordinary actions and events his hand is more viſible, yet it is no leſſe certainly preſent in the common.

Little did the Iſraelites of Bethſhemeſh looke for ſuch a ſight whiles they were reaping their Wheat in the Valley, as to ſee the Arke of God come running to them without a Convoy; neither can it be ſaid, whether they were more affected with joy, or with astonishment; with joy at the presence of the Arke, with astonishment at the Miracle of the transportation: Downe went their Sickles, and now every man runs to reape the comfort of this better harvest, to meet that Bread of Angels, to salute those Cherubims, to welcome that God, whose absence had been their death: But as it is hard not to over-joy in a sudden prosperity, and, to use happinesse is no lesse difficult, then to forbeare it; These glad Israelites cannot see but they must gaze; they cannot gaze on the glorious outside, but they must be (whether out of rude jollity, or curiositie, or suspition of the purloining some of those sacred implements) prying into the secrets of Gods Arke: Nature is too subject to extremities, and is ever either too dull in want, or wanton in fruition: It is no easie matter to keepe a meane, whether in good or evill.

or

Bethshemesh was a City of Priests, they should have knowne better how to demeane themselves towards the Arke; this priviledge doubled their offence. There was no malice in this curious inquisition, the same eyes that lookt into the Arke, lookt also up to heaven in their Offerings, and the same hands that touched it, offered sacrifice to the God that brought it. Who could expect any thing now but acceptation? who would suspect any danger? It is not a following act of devotion that can make amends for a former sinne: There was a death owing them, immediately upon their offence, God will take his owne time for the execution; In the meane while, they may sacrifice, but they cannot satisfie, they cannot escape. The Kine are sacrificed, the Cart burnes them that drew it: Here was an offering of praise, when they had more need of a trespasse offering; many an heart is lifted up in a conceit of joy, when it hath just cause of humiliation: God lets them alone with their Sacrifice, but when that is done, he comes over them with a back-reckoning for their sinne: Fifty thousand and seventy Israelites are strucke dead for this unreverence to the Arke: A wofull welcome for the Arke of God into the borders of Israel. It killed them for looking into it, who thought it their life to see it; It dealt blowes, and death on both hands; to Philistims, to Israelites; to both of them for prophaning it: The one with their Idol, the other with their eyes. It is a feareful thing to use the holy Ordinances of God with an unreverent boldnesse. Feare and trembling become us in our accesse to the Majesty of the Almighty: Neither was there more state, then secresie in Gods Arke; some things the wisdome of God desires to conceale: The unreverence of the Israelites was no more faulty, than their curiosity; secret things to God, things revealed to us and to our children.

The remove of the Arke.

HEare of the Bethshemites lamentation, I heare not of their repentance, they complaine of their smart, they complaine not of their sin; and for ought I can perceive, speake, as if God were curious, rather than they faulty: (Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God, and to whom shall he go from us?) As if none could please that God which misliked them: It is the fashion of naturall men to justifie themselves in their owne courses; if they cannot charge any earthly thing with the blame of their suffering, they will cast it upon Heaven: That a man pleads himselfe guilty of his owne wrong, is no common worke of Gods Spirit. Bethshemesh bordered too neere upon the Philistims; If these men thought the very presence of the Arke hurtfull, why do they send to their neighbours of Kiriath-jearim, that they might make themselves miserable? Where there is a misconceit of God, it is no marvell if there be a defect of Charity: How cunningly do they send their message to their neighbours? They do not say, the Arke of God is come to us of it owne accord, lest the men of Kiriath-jearim should reply, It is come to you, let it stay with you: They say only, The Philistims have brought it; they tell of the presence of the Arke, they do not tell of the successe, lest the example of their judgment should have discouraged the forwardnesse of their reliefe: And after all, the offer was plausible; Come ye downe and take it up to you; as if the honour had beene too great for themselves, as if their modestie had had been such, that they would not forestall and engrosse happinesse from the rest of Israel. A

It is no boot to teach Nature how to tel her own tale, smart and danger will make a man witty: He is rarely constant, that will not dissemble for ease. It is good to be suspicious of the evasions of those which would put off miserie. Those of Bethshemesh were not more craftie then these of Kiriath-jearim (which was the ground of their boldnesse) faithfull: So many thousand Bethshemites could not be dead, and no part of the rumour flie to them: they heard how thicke, not onely the Philistims, but the bordering Israelites fell downe dead before the Arke; yet they durst adventure to come, and fetch it, even from amongst the carcasses of their brethren: They had beene formerly acquainted with the Arke, they knew it was holy, it could not be changeable, and therefore they well conceived this slaughter to arise from the unholinesse of men, not from the rigour of God, and thereupon can seeke comfort in that, which others found deadly: Gods children cannot by any meanes bee discouraged from their honour, and love to his Ordinances: If they see thousands strucke down to Hell by the Scepter of Gods Kingdome, yet they will kisse it upon their knees, and if their Saviour be a Rocke of offence, and the occasion of the fal of millions in Israel, they can feed temperately of that, wherof others have surfeited to death, &c. B

Bethshemesh was a Citie of Priests and Levites: Kiriath-jearim a City of Juda, where wee heare but of one Levite, Abinadab; yet this City was more zealous for God, more reverent and conscionable in the entertainment of the Arke, then the other. Wee heard of the taking downe of the Arke by the Bethshemites, when it came miraculously to them; wee do not heare of any man sanctified for the attendance of it, as was done in this second lodging of the Arke: Grace is not tyed either to number, or meanes. It is in spirituall matters, as in the estate: Small helpes with good thrift enrich us, when great patrimonies lose themselves in the neglect. Shiloh was wont to be the place which was honored with the presence of the Arke; Ever since the wickednesse of Elies Sonnes, that was forlorne, and desolate, and now Kiriath-jearim succeeds into this priviledge: It did not stand with the royall liberty of God, no not under the Law, to tie himselfe unto places and persons: Unworthinesse was ever a sufficient cause of exchange. It was not yet his time to stir from the Jews, yet he removed from one Province to another: Lesse reason have we to think, that so God will reside amongst us, that none of our provocations can drive him from us, &c. C D

Israel, which had found the miserie of Gods absence, is now resolved into teares of contrition, and thankfulnesse upon his returne: There is no mention of their lamenting after the Lord, while he was gone, but when he was returned, and setled in Kiriath-jearim: The mercies of God draw more teares from his children, then his judgements do from his enemies: There is no better signe of good nature and grace, then to be wonne to repentance with kindnesse: Not to thinke of God, except we be beaten unto it, is servile: Because God was come againe to Israel, therefore Israel is returned to God; If God had not come first, they had never come: If he, that came to them, had not made them come to him, they had beene ever parted. They were cloyed with God, while he was perpetually resident with them, now that his absence had made him dainty, they cleave to him fervently, and penitently in his returne: This was it, that God meant in his departure, a better welcome at his comming backe. E

I heard no newes of Samuel all this while the Arke was gone: Now when the Arke is returned and placed in Kiriath-jearim, I heare him treat with the people. It is not like, he was silent in this sad desertion of God; but now he takes full advantage of the professed contrition of Israel, to deale with them effectually, for their perfect conversion unto God. It is great wisdome in spirituall matters, to take occasion by the fore-locke, and to strike whiles the iron is hot: We may beat long enough at the doore, but till God have opened, it is no going in, and when he hath opened, it is no delaying to enter. The triall of sincerity is the abandoning of our wonted sinnes.

A sinnes. This Samuel urgeth (If ye be come againe unto the Lord with all your heart, put away the ſtrange Gods from among you, and Aſhtaroth:) In vaine had it beene to profeſſe repentance, whilſt they continued in Idolatry; God will never acknowledge any convert that ſtaies in a knowne ſinne: Graces and Vertues are ſo linckt together, that he, which hath one, hath all: The partiall converſion of men unto God is but hatefull hypocriſie. How happily effectuall is a word ſpoken in ſeaſon? Samuels exhortation wrought upon the hearts of Iſrael, and fetcht water out of their eyes; ſuits, and confeſſions, and vowes out of their lips, and their falſe gods out of their hands: yet it was not meerely remorſe but feare alſo, that moved Iſrael to this humble ſubmiſſion.

The Philiſtims ſtood over them ſtill, and threatned them with new aſſaults, the B memory of their late ſlaughter, and ſpoile, was yet freſh in their minds, ſorrow for the evils paſt, and feare of the future fetcht them downe upon their knees: It is not more neceſſary for men to be cheared with hopes, then to be awed with dangers: where God intends the humiliation of his ſervants, there ſhall not want meanes of their dejection: It was happy for Iſrael that they had an enemy. Is it poſſible that the Philiſtims after thoſe deadly plagues, which they ſuſtained from the God of Iſrael, ſhould think of invading Iſrael? thoſe that were ſo mated with the preſence of the Arke, that they never thought themſelves ſafe, till it was out of ſight, do they now dare to thruſt themſelves upon the new revenge of the Arke? It ſlue them whiles they thought to honour it, and do they thinke to eſcape, whiles they reſiſt it? It ſlue them in their own Coaſts, and do they come to it to ſeeke death? yet behold no ſoo- C ner do the Philiſtims heare, that the Iſraelites are gathered to Mizpeh, but the Princes of the Philiſtims gather themſelves againſt them: No warnings will ſerve obdurate hearts, wicked men are even ambitious of deſtruction; Judgments need not to go find them out, they run to meet their bane.

The Philiſtims come up, and the Iſraelites feare; they that had not the wit to feare, whilſt they were not friends with God, have not now the grace of feareleſſeneſſe, when they were reconciled to God: Boldneſſe and Feare are commonly miſplaced in the beſt hearts; When we ſhould tremble, we are confident, and when we ſhould be aſſured, we tremble: Why ſhould Iſrael have feared, ſince they had made their peace with the God of Hoſts? Nothing ſhould affright thoſe, which are upright with God. The peace, which Iſrael had made with God, was true, but ten- D der. They durſt not truſt their owne innocency, ſo much as the prayers of Samuel; Ceaſe not to cry to the Lord our God for us. In temporall things nothing hinders, but wee may fare better for other mens faith, then for our owne: It is no ſmall happineſſe to be intereſſed in them which are Favourites in the Court of Heaven; one faithfull man in theſe occaſions is more worth then millions of the wavering and uncertaine.

A good heart is eaſily wonne to devotion: Samuel cries, and ſacrificeth to God; he had done ſo, though they had intreated his ſilence, yea his forbearance. Whiles he is offering, the Philiſtims fight with Iſrael, and God fights with the Philiſtims. (The Lord thundred with a great thunder that day upon the Philiſtims, and ſcattered them:) Samuel fought more upon his knees, then all Iſrael beſides: The voice of God anſwered E the voice of Samuel, and ſpeakes confuſion and death to the Philiſtims: How were the proud Philiſtims dead with feare, ere they dyed, to heare the fearefull thunderclaps of an angry God againſt them? to ſee, that Heaven it ſelfe fought againſt them? He that ſlew them ſecretly in the revenges of his Arke, now kils them with open horrour in the fields: If preſumption did not make wicked men mad, they would never lift their hand againſt the Almighty; what are they in his hands, when he is diſpoſed to vengeance?

The meeting of Saul and Samuel.

SAMUEL began his acquaintance with God early, and continued it long: He began it in his long Coats, and continued to his gray haires: (Hee judged Israel all the dayes of his life.) God doth not use to put off his old Servants; their age indeareth them to him the more; If we be not unfaithfull to him, he cannot be unconstant to us. At last his decayed age met with ill partners, his Sonnes for Deputies, and Saul for a King; The wickednesse of his Sonnes gave the occasion of a change: Perhaps Israel had never thought of a King, if Samuels Sonnes had not beene unlike their Father: Who can promise himselfe holy children, when the loynes of a Samuel, and the education in the Temple, yeelded monsters? It is not likely, that good Samuel was faulty in that indulgence for which his owne mouth had denounced Gods judgements against Hely: yet this holy man succeeds Hely in his crosse, as well as his place, though not in his sin; and is afflicted with a wicked succession: God will let us find that grace is by gift, not by inheritance.

I feare Samuel was too partiall to nature in the surrogation of his Sonnes, I do not heare of Gods allowance to this act: If this had beene Gods choice, as well as his, it had beene like to have received more blessing. Now all Israel have cause to rue, that these were the Sons of Samuel, for now the question was not of their vertues, but of their blood; not of their worthinesse, but their birth; even the best heart may be blinded with affection. Who can marvell at these errors of Parents love, when he that so holily judged Israel all his life, mis-judged of his own Sons.

It was Gods ancient purpose to raise up a King to his people: How doth he take occasiō to performe it, but by the unruly desires of Israel? even as we say of humane proceedings, that ill manners beget good lawes. That, Monarchy is the best forme of government, there is no question. Good things may be ill desired, so was this of Israel; If an itching desire of alteration had not possessed them, why did they not rather sue for a reformation of their Governours, then for a change of government? Were Samuels sons so desperately evill, that there was no possibility of amendment? Or if they were past hope, were there not some others to have succeeded the justice of Samuel, no lesse then these did his person? What needed Samuel to be thrust out of place? what needed the ancient forme of administration to be altered? He that raised up their Judges, would have found time to raise them up Kings: Their curious, and inconstant new fanglenes, wil not abide to stay it, but with an heady importunity labours to over-hasten the pace of God. Where there is a setled course of good government (howsoever blemished with some weakenesses) it is not safe to be over-forward to a change, though it should be to the better. Hee, by whom Kings reigne, sayes, They have cast him away that he should not reigne over them because they desire a King to reigne over them: Judges were his owne institution to his people, as yet Kings were not; after that Kings were setled, to desire the government of Judges, had bin a more seditious inconstancy: God hath not appointed to every time and place those formes, which are simply best in themselves, but those, which are best to them, unto whom they are appointed; which we may neither alter, till he begin, nor recall, till he hath altered.

This businesse seemed personally to concerne Samuel, yet he so deales in it not as a party, not as a Judge of his own Case, but as a Prophet of God, as a friend of his opposite; He prayes to God for advice, he foretels the state and courses of their future King. Wilfull men are blind to all dangers, are deafe to all good counsells. Israel must have a King though they pay never so deare for their longing: The vaine affection of conformity to other Nations overcomes all discouragements; there is no readier way to error, then to make others examples the rule of our desires, or actions. If every man have not grounds of his own, whereon to stand, there can be no stabilitie in his resolutions or proceedings.

Since

A Since then they chooſe to have a King, God himſelfe will chooſe and appoint the King which they ſhall have. The Kingdome ſhall begin in Benjamin, which was to endure in Iuda: It was no probability or reaſon, this firſt King ſhould prove well, becauſe he was abortive; their humor of innovation deſerved to be puniſhed with their owne choyce: Kiſh the father of Saul was mighty in eſtate, Saul was mighty in perſon, over looking the reſt of the people in ſtature, no leſſe than he ſhould do in dignitie. The ſenſes of the Iſraelites could not but be well pleaſed for the time, howſoever their hearts were afterwards; when men are carried with outward ſhewes, it is a ſigne that God meanes them a deluſion.

How farre God fetches his purpoſes about! The Aſſes of Kiſh, Sauls father, are ſtrayed away: What is that to the newes of a Kingdome? God layes theſe ſmall accidents for the ground of greater deſignes: The Aſſes muſt be loſt, none but Saul muſt B go with his fathers ſervant to ſeeke them: Samuel ſhall meet them in the ſearch: Saul ſhall be premoniſhed of his inſuing Royalty; Little can we by the beginning of any action, gueſſe at Gods intention in the concluſion.

Obedience was a fit entrance into Soveraignty: The ſervice was homely for the ſonne of a great man, yet he refuſeth not to goe, as a fellow to his fathers ſervant, upon ſo meane a ſearch: The diſobedient and ſcornefull are good for nothing, they are neither fit to be ſubjects nor governours. Kiſh was a great man in his country, yet he diſdaineth not to ſend his ſonne Saul upon a thrifty errand, neither doth Saul plead his diſparagement for a refuſal. Pride and wantonneſſe have marred our times: Great parents count it a diſreputation to imploy their ſonnes in courſes of frugality; and their pampered children thinke it a ſhame to do any thing: and ſo beare C themſelves, as thoſe that hold it the onely glory to be either idle or wicked.

Neither doth Saul goe faſhionably to worke, but does this ſervice heartily and painfully, as a man, that deſires rather to effect the command, than pleaſe the Commander: He paſſed from Ephraim to the Land of Shaliſha, from Shaliſha to Salim, from Salim to Jemini, whence his Houſe came; from Jemini to Zuph, not ſo much as ſtaying with any of his kinred ſo long as to vittaile himſelfe: He that was afterward an ill King, approved himſelfe a good Sonne. As there are diverſities of relations and offices, ſo there is of diſpoſitions; thoſe, which are excellent in ſome, attaine not to a mediocrity in other: It is no arguing from private vertues to publike; from dexterity in one ſtation, to the reſt: A ſeverall grace belongs to the particular D carriage of every place whereto we are called, which if we want, the place may well want us.

There was more praiſe of his obedience in ceaſing to ſeeke, than in ſeeking: he takes care, leſt his father ſhould take care for him, that whilſt he ſhould ſeeme officious in the leſſe, he might not neglect the greateſt. A blind obedience in ſome caſes doth well, but it doth far better, when it is led with the eyes of diſcretion; otherwiſe we may more offend in pleaſing, than in diſobeying.

Great is the benefit of a wiſe and religious attendant, ſuch an one puts us into thoſe duties and actions which are moſt expedient, and leaſt thought of. If Saul had not had a diſcreet Servant, he had returned but as wiſe as he came; now he is drawn in to conſult with the man of God, and heares more than he hoped for. Saul was E now a ſufficient journey from his fathers houſe, yet his religious ſervant in this remoteneſſe, takes knowledge of the place, where the Prophet dwels, and how honourably doth he mention him to his maſter: Behold, in this City is a man of God, and he is an honourable man, all that he ſaith commeth to paſſe: Gods Prophets are publique perſons, as their function, ſo their notice concernes every man: There is no reaſon God ſhould abate any of the reſpect due to his Miniſters under the Goſpell: Saint Pauls ſuit is both univerſall and everlaſting; I beſeech you, Brethren, know them that labour amongſt you.

The chiefe praiſe is to be able to give good advice; the next is to take it. Saul is eaſily induced to condeſcend: He whoſe curioſity led him voluntarily at laſt, to the Witch of Endor, is now led at firſt by good counſell to the man of God; neither is his care in going, leſſe commendable, than his will to goe. For as a man, that had bin catechized not to goe unto God empty-handed,he aſkes, What ſhall we bring unto the man? What have we? The caſe is well altered in our times: Every man thinks, what may I keep back? There is no gaine ſo ſweet, as of a robbed Altar; yet Gods charge is no leſſe under the Goſpel, Let him that is taught, make his Teacher partaker of all. As this faithfull care of Saul was a juſt preſage of ſucceſſe, more then he looked for, or could expect; ſo the ſacrilegious unthankfulneſſe of many, bodes that ruine to their ſoule and eſtate, which they could not have grace to feare. A

He that knew the Prophets abode, knew alſo the honor of his place, he could not but know that Samuel was a mixt perſon, The Judge of Iſrael, and the Seer: yet both Saul and his Servant purpoſe to preſent him the fourth part of a ſhekell, to the value of about our five pence. They had learned, that thankfulneſſe was not to be meaſured of good men by the weight, but by the will of the Retributor: How much more will God accept the ſmall offerings of his weak Servants, when he ſees them proceed from great love? B

The very maids of the Citie can give direction to the Prophet, they had liſtened after the holy affaires, they had heard of the Sacrifice, and could tell of the neceſſity of Samuels preſence: Thoſe that live within the Sun-ſhine of Religion, cannot but be ſomewhat coloured with thoſe beames: Where there is practice & example of piety in the better ſort, there will be a reflection of it upon the meaneſt: it is no ſmall benefit to live in religious and holy places, we ſhall be much too blame, if all goodneſſe fall beſide us: Yea ſo ſkilfull were theſe Damzels in the faſhions of their publike Sacrifices, that they could inſtruct Saul and his Servant, unaſked, how the people would not eat, till Samuel came to bleſſe the Sacrifice. This meeting was not more a Sacrifice, then it was a Feaſt, theſe two agree well, we have never ſo much cauſe to rejoyce in feaſting, as when we have duely ſerved our God: The Sacrifice was a feaſt to God, the other to men; The body may eat and drink with contentment, when the ſoule hath beene firſt fed, and hath firſt feaſted the Maker of both: Go eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy drink with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works. The Sacrifice was before conſecrated, when it was offered to God; but it was not conſecrated to them, till Samuel bleſſed it, his bleſſing made that meate holy to the gueſts, which was formerly hallowed to God: All creatures were made good, and took holineſſe from him, which gave them being: Our ſin brought that curſe upon them, which (unleſſe our prayers remove it) cleaves to them ſtill, ſo as we receive the not without a curſe. We are not our owne friends except our Prayers helpe to take that away, which our ſin hath brought, that ſo to the cleane all may be cleane: It is an unmannerly godleſneſſe, to take Gods creatures without the leave of their Maker, and well may God withhold his bleſſing from them, which have not the grace to aſke it. C D

Thoſe gueſts which were ſo religious, that they would not eat their Sacrifice unbleſſed, might have bleſſed it themſelves; Every man might pray, though every man might not ſacrifice; yet would they not either eat, or bleſſe, whiles they looked for the preſence of a Prophet. Every Chriſtian may ſanctifie his owne meat, but where thoſe are preſent, that are peculiarly ſanctified to God, this ſervice is fitteſt for them: It is commendable to teach Children the practice of Thankſgiving, but the beſt is ever moſt meet to bleſſe our tables, and thoſe eſpecially, whoſe office it is to offer our prayers to God. E

Little did Saul think, that his comming and his errand was ſo noted of God, as that it was fore-ſignified unto the Prophet, and now, behold Samuel is told a day before of the man, time, and place of his meeting. The eye of Gods providence is no leſſe over all our actions, all our motions. We cannot go any whither without him, he tels all our ſteps; ſince it pleaſeth God therefore to take notice of us, much more ſhould we take notice of him, and walk with him, in whom we move. Saul came beſide his expectation to the Prophet, he had no thought of any ſuch purpoſe, till his Servant made this ſudden motion unto him of viſiting Samuel, and yet God ſaies to his Prophet, I will ſend thee a man out of the Land of Benjamin. The over-ruling hand of the Almighty works us inſenſibly, and all our affaires to his owne ſecret determinations;

A nations; ſo as whiles we thinke to do our owne wills, we do his. Our owne intentions we may know, Gods purpoſes we know not; we muſt go the way that we are called, let him lead us to what end he pleaſeth; it is our duty to deſigne our ſelves and our wayes to the diſpoſition of God, and patiently and thankfully to await the iſſue of his decrees. The ſame God that fore-ſhewed Saul to Samuel, now points to him (See, this is the man,) and commands the Prophet to anoint him Governour over Iſrael: He, that told of Saul before he came, knew before he came into the world, what a man, what a King he would be; yet he chooſeth him out, and injoynes his inunction. It is one of the greateſt praiſes of Gods wiſdome, that he can turne the evill of men to his own glory. Advancement is not ever a ſigne of love either to the man, or to the place. It had been better for Saul, that his head had beene ever dry: ſome God B raiſeth up in judgment, that they may fall the more uneaſily; there are no men ſo miſerable, as thoſe that are great and evill.

It ſeemes that Samuel bore no great port in his outſide, for that Saul not diſcerning him, either by his habit, or attendants, comes to him, and aſkes him for the Seer; yet was Samuel as yet the Judge of Iſrael, the ſubſtitution of his Sonnes had not diſplaced himſelfe: There is an affable familiarity that becommeth Greatneſſe; It is not good for eminent perſons to ſtand alwaies upon the height of their ſtate, but ſo to behave themſelves, that as their ſociable cariage may not breed contempt, ſo their over-highneſſe may not breed a ſervile fearefulnes in their people.

How kindly doth Samuel entertaine and invite Saul, yet it was he only that ſhould C receive wrong by the future royalty of Saul? Who would not have looked that aged Samuel ſhould have emulated rather the glory of his young rivall, and have looked churliſhly upon the man that ſhould rob him of his authority? yet now, as if he came on pupoſe to gratifie him, he bids him to the feaſt, he honours him with the chiefe ſeat, he reſerves a ſelect morſell for him, he tels him ingenuouſly the newes of his inſuing Soveraignty, (On whom is ſet the deſire of all Iſrael, is it not upon thee and thy fathers houſe?) Wiſe and holy men, as they are not ambitious of their owne burden, ſo they are not unwilling to be eaſed, when God pleaſeth to diſcharge them; neither can they envy thoſe whom God lifteth above their heads: They make an Idoll of honor, that are troubled with their owne freedome, or grudge at the promotion of others.

D Doubtleſſe Saul was much amazed with this ſtrange ſalutation, and newes of the Prophet, and how modeſtly doth he put it off, as that, which was neither fit, nor likely; diſparaging his Tribe in reſpect of the reſt of Iſrael, his Fathers Family, in reſpect of the Tribe, and himſelfe in reſpect of his Fathers Family; neither did his humility ſtoope below the truth: For, as Benjamin was the youngeſt ſonne of Iſraell, ſo he was now by much, the leaſt Tribe of Iſrael; They had nor yet recovered that univerſall ſlaughter which they had received frō the hands of their brethren, whereby a Tribe was almoſt loſt to Iſrael; yet even out of the remainder of Benjamin doth God chooſe the man, that ſhall command Iſrael; out of the rubbiſh of Benjamin doth God raiſe the Throne. That is not ever the beſt and fatteſt which God chooſeth, but that which God chooſeth is ever the fitteſt; the ſtrength or weakeneſſe of meanes is E neither ſpur nor bridle to the determinate choyces of God, yea rather he holds it the greateſt proofe of his freedome, and omnipotency, to advance the unlikelieſt. It was no hollow and fained excuſe, that Saul makes to put off that, which he would faine injoy, and to cauſe honour to follow him the more eagerly: It was the ſincere truth of his humility, that ſo dejected him under the hand of Gods Prophet. Faire beginnings are no ſound proofe of our proceedings and ending well: How often hath a baſhfull childehood ended in an impudencie of youth, a ſtrict entrance in licenciouſneſſe, early forwardneſſe in Atheiſme? There might bee a civill meekneſſe in Saul, true grace there was not in him; they that be good, beare more fruit in their age.

Saul had but five pence in his purſe to give the Prophet: The Prophet after much good cheere gives him the Kingdome, he beſtowes the oyle of royall conſecration on on his head, the Kiſſes of homage upō his face, and ſends him away rich in thoughts, & expectation; & now leſt his aſtoniſhment ſhould end in diſtruſt, he ſetles his aſſurance, by forewarnings of thoſe events, which he ſhould find in his way: He tels him whom he ſhall meet, what they ſhall ſay, how himſelfe ſhall be affected; that all theſe, and himſelfe might be ſo many witneſſes of his following Coronation; every word confirmed him. For well might he thinke, He that can foretell me the motions and words of others, cannot faile in mine; eſpecially when (as Samuel had propheſied to him) he found himſelfe to propheſie; his propheſying did enough foretell his Kingdome. No ſooner did Samuel turne his backe from Saul, but God gave him another heart, lifting up his thoughts and diſpoſition to the pitch of a King: the calling of God never leaves a man unchanged, neither did God ever imploy any man in his ſervice, whom he did not enable to the worke he ſet him; eſpecially thoſe whom he raiſeth up to the ſupply of his owne place, and the repreſentation of himſelfe. It is no marvell if Princes excell the vulgar in gifts, no leſſe than in dignity: Their Crownes and their hearts are both in one and the ſame hand; If God did not adde to their powers, as well as their honours, there would be no equality.

The Inauguration of Saul.

GOD hath ſecretly deſtined Saul to the Kingdome; it could not content Iſrael, that Samuel knew this, the lots muſt ſo decide the choyce, as if it had not beene predetermined; That God, which is ever conſtant to his owne decrees, makes the lots to finde him out, whom Samuel had anointed: If once wee have notice of the will of God, wee may be confident of the iſſue: There is no chance to the Almighty; even caſuall things are no leſſe neceſſary in their firſt cauſe, than the naturall. So farre did Saul truſt the prediction, and oyle of Samuel, that he hides him among the ſtuffe: He knew where the lots would light before they were caſt: This was but a modeſt declination of that honour which he ſaw muſt come; His very withdrawing ſhewed ſome expectation, why elſe ſhould he have hid himſelfe, rather than the other Iſraelites? yet could he not hope his ſubducing himſelfe, could diſappoint the purpoſe of God: Hee well knew, that he, which found out and deſigned his name amongſt the thouſands of Iſrael, would eaſily finde out his perſon in a Tent: When once we know Gods decree, in vaine ſhall we ſtrive againſt it: Before we know it, it is indifferent for us to worke to the likelieſt.

I cannot blame Saul for hiding himſelfe from a Kingdome, eſpecially of Iſrael: Honor is heavy; when it comes upon the beſt tearmes: How ſhould it be otherwiſe when all mens cares are caſt upon one? but moſt of all in a troubled eſtate? No man can put to Sea without danger, but he that lancheth forth in a tempeſt, can expect nothing but the hardeſt event; ſuch was the condition of Iſrael: Their old enemy the Philiſtims were ſtilled with that fearfull thunder of God, as finding what it was to war againſt the Almighty. There were adverſaries enough beſides in their borders: It was but an hollow truce, that was betwixt Iſrael and their Heatheniſh neighbors; and Nahaſh was now at their gates. Well did Saul know the difference betweene a peacefull government, and the perillous and weariſome tumults of war. The quieteſt Throne is full of cares, but the perplexed, of dangers. Cares and dangers drove Saul into this corner to hide his head from a Crowne: Theſe made him chuſe rather to lye obſcurely among the baggage of his Tent, than to ſit glorioufly in the Throne of State. This hiding could doe nothing but ſhew, that both he ſuſpected leſt hee ſhould be choſen, and deſired he ſhould not be choſen: That God from whom the hils and the rockes could not conceale him, brings him forth to the light, ſo much more longed for, as he was more unwilling to be ſeene, and more applauded, as he was more longed for.

Now then when Saul is drawne forth in the middeſt of the eager expectation of Iſrael, modeſty and godlineſſe ſhewed themſelves in his face: The preaſe cannot hide

A hide him, whom the ſtuffe had hid; As if he had beene made to be ſeene, he overlookes all Iſrael in height of ſtature, for preſage of the eminence of his eſtate (from the ſhoulders upward was he higher then any of the people.) Iſrael ſees their lots are falne upon a noted man; one, whoſe perſon ſhewed, he was borne to be a King, and now all the people ſhout for joy, they have their longing, and applaud their owne happineſſe, and their Kings honor: How eaſie is it for us to miſtake our owne eſtates? to rejoyce in that which we ſhal find the juſt cauſe of our juſt humiliatiō? The end of a thing is better then the beginning; the ſafeſt way is to reſerve our joy, till we have good proofe of the worthineſſe and fitneſſe of the object. What are we the better for having a bleſſing, if we know not how to uſe it? The office and obſervance of a King was uncowth to Iſrael: Samuel therefore informes the people of their mutuall
B duties, and writes them in a booke, and layes it up before the Lord; otherwiſe, noveltie might have beene a warrant for their ignorance, and ignorance for neglect: there are reciprocall reſpects of Princes and people, which if they be not obſerved, government languiſheth into confuſion; theſe Samuel faithfully teacheth them. Though he may not be their Judge, yet he will be their Prophet; he will inſtruct, if he may not rule; yea he will inſtruct him that ſhall rule; there is no King abſolute, but he, that is the King of all gods: Earthly Monarchs muſt walk by a rule, which if they tranſgreſſe, they ſhall be accountable to him, that is higher thē the higheſt, who hath deputed them. Not out of care of civility, ſo much as conſcience, muſt every Samuel labour to keep eeven terms betwixt Kings and Subjects, preſcribing iuſt moderation to the one, to the other obedience and loyalty, which who ever endeavours
C to trouble, is none of the friends of God, or his Church.

The moſt and beſt applaud their new King, ſome wicked ones deſpiſed him, and ſaid, How ſhall he ſave us? It was not the might of his Parents, the goodlineſſe of his perſon, the priviledge of his lot, the fame of his propheſying, the panegyricke of Samuel, that could ſhield him from contempt, or winne him the hearts of all: There was never yet any man, to whom ſome tooke not exceptions; It is not poſſible either to pleaſe or diſpleaſe all men, while ſome men are in love with vice, as deeply, as others with vertue, and ſome (as ill) diſlike vertue, if not for it ſelfe, yet for
D contradiction. They well ſaw, Saul choſe not himſelfe, they ſaw him worthy to have beene choſen, if the Election ſhould have beene carried by voyces, and thoſe voyces by their eyes; they ſaw him unwilling to hold, or yeeld, when he was choſen; yet they will envy him: What fault could they finde in him whom God had choſen? His parentage was equall, his perſon above them, his inward parts more above then the outward; Malecontents will rather deviſe then want cauſes of flying out, and rather then faile, the univerſall approbation of others is ground enough of their diſlike. It is a vaine ambition of thoſe, that would be loved of all: The ſpirit of God when he enioynes us peace, withal he addes, [if it be poſſible] and favour is more than peace; A mans comfort muſt be in himſelf, the conſcience of deſerving well.

The neighbouring Ammonites could not but have heard of GODS fearefull vengeance upon the Philiſtims, and yet they will bee taking up the quarrell againſt Iſrael: Nahaſh comes up againſt Jabeſh Gilead: Nothing but grace can
E teach us to make uſe of others Judgements; Wicked men are not moved with ought, that falls beſide them; they truſt nothing but their own ſmart: What fearefull Judgements doth GOD execute every day? reſolute ſinners take no notice of them, and are growne ſo peremptory, as if God had never ſhewed diſlike of their wayes.

The Gileadites were not more baſe, then Nahaſh the Ammonite was cruell: The Gileadites would buy their peace with ſervility, Nahaſh would ſell them a ſervile peace for their right eyes. Iephtha the Gileadite did yet ſticke in the ſtomacke of Ammon, and now they thinke their revenge cannot be too bloody: It is a wonder that he, which would offer ſo mercileſſe a condition to Iſrael, would yeild to the motion of any delay; He meant nothing but ſhame and death to the Iſraelites, yet he condeſcends to a ſeven dayes reſpit: Perhaps his confidence made him thus careleſſe leſſe. Howſoever it was the reſtraint of God that gave this breath to Iſrael, and this opportunity to Sauls courage and victory : The enemies of Gods Church cannot be ſo malicious as they would, cannot approve themſelves ſo malicious, as they are; God ſo holds them in ſometimes, that a ſtander-by would thinke them favourable. The newes of Gileads diſtreſſe had ſoone filled and afflicted Iſrael, the people think of no remedy but their pitty and teares: Evills are eaſily grieved for, not eaſily redreſſed : Onely Saul is more ſtirred with indignation then ſorrow; That God which put into him a ſpirit of prophecie, now puts into him a ſpirit of fortitude: He was before appointed to the Throne, not ſetled in the Throne; he followed the beaſts in the field, when he ſhould have commanded men.

Now as one that would be a King no leſſe by merit, then election, he takes upon him, and performes the reſcue of Gilead; he aſſembles Iſraell, he leads them, he raiſeth the ſiege, breakes the troopes, cuts the throats of the Ammonites. When God hath any exploit to performe, he raiſeth up the heart of ſome choſen Inſtrument with heroical motions for the atchievment: When all hearts are cold and dead, it is a ſigne of intended deſtruction.

This day hath made Saul a compleat King, and now the thankfull Iſraelites begin to enquire after thoſe diſcontented Mutiners, which had refuſed allegiance unto ſo worthy a Commander (Bring thoſe men, that we may ſlay them :) This ſedition had deſerved death, though Saul had beene foiled at Gilead; but now his happy victory whets the people much more to a deſire of this juſt execution. Saul, to whom the injurie was done, hinders the revenge, (There ſhall no man die this day, for to day the Lord hath ſaved Iſrael) that his fortitude might not go beyond his mercy. How noble were theſe beginnings of Saul? His prophecie ſhewed him miraculouſly wiſe, his Battell and victory no leſſe valiant, the pardon of his Rebels, as mercifull : There was not more power ſhewed in overcomming the Ammonites, then in overcomming himſelfe, and the impotent malice of theſe mutinous Iſraelites. Now Iſrael ſees they have a King, that can both ſhed blood, and ſpare it; that can ſhed the Ammonites blood, and ſpare theirs : His mercy winnes thoſe hearts, whom his valour could not. As in God, ſo in his Deputies, Mercy and Juſtice ſhould be inſeparable: whereſoever theſe two go aſunder, government follows them into diſtraction, and ends in ruine. If it had been a wronge offered to Samuel, the forbearance of the revenge had not beene ſo commendable; although upon the day of ſo happy a deliverance, perhaps it had not beene ſeaſonable: A man hath reaſon to be moſt bold with himſelfe; It is no praiſe of mercy (ſince it is a fault in Juſtice) to remit another mans ſatisfaction, his owne he may.

EVery one can be a friend to him that proſpereth : By this victory hath Saul as well conquered the obſtinacy of his owne people: Now there is no Iſraelite that rejoyceth not in Sauls Kingdome. No ſooner have they done objecting to Saul, then Samuel begins to expoſtulate with them: The ſame day wherein they began to be pleaſed, God ſhewes himſelfe angry: All the paſſages of their proceedings offended him, he deferred to let them know it till now, that the Kingdome was ſetled, and their hearts lifted up : Now doth God coole their courage and joy, with a backe-reckoning for their forwardneſſe, God will not let his people runne away with the arrerages of their ſinnes, but when they leaſt thinke of it, calls them to an account: All this while was God angry with their rejection of Samuel; yet (as if there had beene nothing but peace) he gives them a victory over their enemies, he gives way to their joy in their election; now he lets them know, that after their peace-offerings, he hath a quarrell with them. God may be angry enough with us, whiles we outwardly proſper: It is the wiſdome of God to take his beſt advantages; He ſuffers us to go on, till we ſhould come to enjoy joy the fruit of our ſinne, till we ſeeme paſt the danger, either of conſcience or punithment; then (even when we begin to be paſt the feeling of our ſinne) we ſhall begin to feele his diſpleaſure for our ſinnes: This is onely where he loves, where he would both forgive and reclaime; he hath now to do with his Iſrael: But where he meanes utter vengeance, he lets men harden themſelves to a reprobate ſenſleſneſſe, and make up their own meaſure without contradiction, as purpoſing to reckon with them but once for ever.

Samuel had diſſwaded them before, he reproves them not, untill now: If he had thus bent himſelfe againſt them, ere the ſetling of the election, he had troubled Iſrael in that, which God took occaſion by their ſinne to eſtabliſh; His oppoſition would have ſavoured of reſpects to himſelfe, whom the wrong of this innovation chiefly concerned: Now therefore when they are ſure of their King, and their King of thē, when he hath ſet eaven termes betwixt them mutually, he lets them ſee, how they were at odds with God: Wee muſt ever diſlike ſinnes, wee may not ever ſhew it: Diſcretion in the choice of ſeaſons for reproving, is no leſſe commendable and neceſſary, then zeale and faithfulneſſe in reproving; Good Phyſitians uſe not to evacuate the body in extremities of heat or cold; wiſe Mariners do not hoiſe ſayles in every winde.

Firſt doth Samuel beginne to cleare his own innocence, ere he dare charge them with their ſinne: He that will caſt a ſtone at an offender, muſt be free himſelfe, otherwiſe he condemnes, and executes himſelfe in another perſon: The conſcience ſtops the mouth of the guilty man, and chokes him with that ſinne, which lyes in his own breſt, and having not come forth by a penitent confeſſiō, cannot find the way out in a reproofe, or if he doe reprove, he doth more ſhame himſelfe, then reforme another. He that was the judge of Iſrael, would not now judge himſelfe, but would be judged by Iſrael; Whoſe Oxe have I taken? whoſe Aſſe have I taken? or to whom have I done wrong? No doubt, Samuel found himſelfe guilty before God of many private infirmities, but for his publique carriage he appeales to men: A mans heart can beſt judge of himſelfe; others can beſt iudge of his actions. As another mans conſcience and approbation cannot beare us out before God; ſo cannot our owne before men: For oft times that action is cenſured by the beholders, as wrongfull, wherein we applaud our owne juſtice. Happy is that man, that can be acquitted by himſelfe in private, in publike by others, by God in both; ſtanders by may ſee more: It is very ſafe for a man to looke into himſelfe by others eyes; in vaine ſhall a mans heart abſolve him, that is condemned by his actions.

It was not ſo much the tryall of his cariage, that Samuel appealed for, as his iuſtification; not for his owne comfort, ſo much as their conviction: His innocence hath not done him ſervice enough, unleſſe it ſhame them, and make them confeſſe themſelves faulty. In ſo many yeares wherein Samuel judged Iſrael, it cannot be, but many thouſand cauſes paſſed his hands, wherein both parties could not poſſibly be pleaſed; yet ſo cleere doth he find his heart, & hands, that he dare make the grieved part judges of his judgment: A good conſcience will make a man undauntedly confident, and dare put him upon any tryal, where his owne heart ſtrikes him not, it bids him challenge all the world, and take up all commers. How happy a thing is it for a man to be his owne friend, and patron? He needs not to feare forraine broyles, that is at peace at home: Contrarily, he that hath a falſe and foule heart, lyes at every mans mercy; lives ſlaviſhly, and is faine to dawbe up a rotten peace with the baſeſt conditions. Truth is not afraid of any light, and therfore dare ſuffer her wares to be caryed from a dim ſhop-board unto the ſtreet doore: Perfect gold will be but the purer with trying, whereas falſhood being a worke of darkeneſſe, loves darkeneſſe, and therefore ſeeks where it may work cloſeſt.

This very appellatiō cleared Samuel, but the peoples atteſtatiō cleared him more: Innocence and uprightneſſe becomes every man well, but moſt publike perſons, who ſhall be elſe obnoxious to every offender. The Throne and the Pulpit (of all places) call for holineſſe, no more for example of good, then for liberty of controlling evill: All Magiſtrates ſweare to doe that, which Samuel proteſted he hath done; if their oath oath were ſo verified, as Samuels proteſtation, it were a ſhame for the State not to be happy: The ſinnes of our Teachers are the teachers of ſinne; the ſinnes of Governors doe both command, and countenance evill. This very acquiting of Samuel was the accuſation of themſelves: For how could it bee but faulty to caſt off a faultleſſe Governour? If he had not taken away an Oxe, or an Aſſe from them, why do they take away his authority? They could not have thus cleared Saul at the end of his raigne; It was juſt with God, ſince they were weary of a juſt Ruler, to puniſh them with an unjuſt.

He that appealed to them for his own uprightneſſe, durſt not appeale to them for their owne wickedneſſe, but appeales to Heaven frō them. Men are commonly flatterers of their owne caſes: It muſt be a ſtrong evidence that will make a ſinner convicted in himſelfe: Nature hath ſo many ſhifts to coozen it ſelfe in this ſpiritual verdict, that unleſſe it be taken in the manner, it will hardly yeeld to a truth; either ſhee will denie the fact, or the fault, or the meaſure; And now in this caſe they might ſeeme to have ſome faire ptetences: For though Samuel was righteous, yet his ſonnes were corrupt. To cut off all excuſes therefore, Samuel appeales to God (the higheſt Judge) for his ſentence of their ſinne, and dares truſt to a miraculous conviction. It was now their Wheat-Harveſt: the hot and drie aire of their climate did not wont to afford in that ſeaſon ſo much moiſt vapour, as might raiſe a cloud either for raine, or thunder: He that knew God could, and would do both theſe, without the helpe of ſecond cauſes, puts the triall upon this iſſue. Had not Samuel before conſulted with his Maker, & received warrant for his act, it had been preſumption and tempting of God, which was now a noble improvement of faith: Rather then Iſrael ſhould goe cleare away with a ſin, God will accuſe and arraigne them from heaven. No ſooner hath Samuels voyce ceaſed, then Gods voyce begins: Every crack of thunder ſpake judgement againſt the rebellious Iſraelites, and every drop of raine, a witneſſe of their ſin; and now they found they had diſpleaſed him, which ruleth in the Heaven, by rejecting the man that ruled for him on Earth: The thundring voice of God, that had lately in their ſight confounded the Philiſtims, they now underſtood to ſpeake fearefull things againſt them. No marvell, if now they fell upon their knees, not to Saul whom they had choſen; but to Samuel, who being thus caſt off by them, is thus countenanced in Heaven.

Saul's Sacrifice.

GOD never meant the Kingdome ſhould either ſtay long in the Tribe of Benjamin; or remove ſuddenly from the perſon of Saul; Many yeares did Saul reigne over Iſrael; yet God computes him but two yeares a King: That is not accounted of God to be done, which is not lawfully done; when God, which choſe Saul, rejected him, he was no more a King, but a Tyrant: Iſrael obeyed him ſtill, but God makes no reckoning of him, as his Deputie, but as an Uſurper.

Saul was of good yeares, when he was advanced to the Kingdome: His Son Ionathan, the firſt yeare of his Fathers Raigne, could lead a thouſand Iſraelites into the field, and give a foyle to the Philiſtims: And now Iſrael could not thinke themſelves leſſe happy in their Prince, then in their King; Ionathan is the Heyre of his Fathers victory, as well as of his valour, and his eſtate. The Philiſtims were quiet after thoſe firſt thunder-claps, all the time of Samuels government, now they beginne to ſtirre under Saul.

How utterly is Iſrael diſappointed in their hopes? That ſecurity and protection, which they promiſed themſelves in the name of a King, they found in a Prophet, failed of in a Warrior; They were more ſafe under the mantle, then under armes: both enmitie and ſafeguard are from heaven, goodneſſe hath beene ever a ſtronger guard then valour: It is the ſureſt policy alwaies to have peace with God.

Wee

A We find by the ſpoiles, that the Philiſtims had ſome battels with Iſrael which are not recorded: After the thunder had ſcared them into a peace, and reſtitution of all the bordering Cities, from Ekron to Gath, they had taken new heart, and ſo beſlaved Iſrael, that they had neither weapon nor Smith left amongſt them, yet even in this miſerable nakednes of Iſrael, have they both fought, and overcome. Now might you have ſeen the unarmed Iſraelites marching with their Slings, and Plough-ſtaves and Hooks, and Forkes, and other inſtruments of their huſbandrie, againſt a mighty and well furniſhed enemy, and returning laded both with Armes and Victory. No Armour is of proofe againſt the Almighty, neither is he unweaponed, that caries the revenge of God: There is the ſame diſadvantage in our ſpirituall conflicts; we are turned naked to principalities and powers; whilſt we goe under the conduct of the
B Prince of our peace, we cannot but be bold and victorious.

Vaine men thinke to over-power God with munition and multitude: The Philiſtims are not any way more ſtrong, than in conceit: Thirty thouſand Chariots, ſixe thouſand Horſemen, Footmen like the ſand for number, makes them ſcorn Iſrael no leſſe, then Iſrael feares them. When I ſee the miraculous ſucceſſe, which had bleſſed the Iſraelites, in all their late conflicts with theſe very Philiſtims, with the Ammonites, I cannot but wonder, how they could feare: They, which in the time of their ſinne found God to raiſe ſuch Trophees over their enemies, runne now into Caves, and Rocks, and Pits, to hide them from the faces of men, when they found God reconciled, and themſelves penitent. No Iſraelite but hath ſome cowardly blood in him: If we had no feare, faith would have no maſtery, yet theſe fearefull Iſraelites
C ſhall cut the throats of thoſe confident Philiſtims: Doubt & reſolution are not meet meaſures of our ſucceſſe: A preſumptuous confidence goes commōly bleeding home, when an humble feare returnes in triumph. Feare drives thoſe Iſraelites, which dare ſhew their heads, out of the Caves unto Saul, and makes them cling unto their new King: How troubleſome were the beginnings of Sauls honour? Surely, if that man had not exceeded Iſrael no leſſe in courage, then in ſtature, he had now hid himſelfe in a Cave, which before hid himſelfe among the ſtuffe: But now, though the Iſraelites ran away from him, yet he ran not away from them: It was not any doubt of Sauls valour, that put his people to their heeles, it was the abſence of Samuel; If the Prophet had come up, Iſrael would never have run away from their King: Whiles they had a Samuel alone, they were never well till they had a Saul, now they have a
D Saul, they are as far from contentment, becauſe they want a Samuel; unleſſe both joyn together, they think there can be no ſafety. Where the Temporal and Spiritual State combine not together, there can follow nothing but diſtraction in the people: The Prophets receive and deliver the will of God, Kings execute it: The Prophets are directed by God, the people are directed by their Kings. Where men doe not ſee God before them in his Ordinances, their hearts cannot but faile them, both in their reſpects to their ſuperiours, and their courage in themſelues. Piety is the Mother of perfect ſubjection: As all authority is derived from heaven, ſo it is thence eſtabliſhed; Thoſe Governours that would command the hearts of men, muſt ſhew them God in their faces.

No Iſraelite can thinke himſelf ſafe without a Prophet: Saul had given them good
E proofe of his fortitude, in his late victorie over the Ammonites, but then Proclamation was made before the fight through all the Countrey, that every man ſhould come up after Saul and Samuel: If Samuel had not been with Saul, they would rather have ventured the loſſe of their oxen, than the hazard of thēſelves. How much leſſe ſhould we preſume of any ſafety in our ſpiritual combats, when we have not a Prophet to lead us? It is all one (ſaving that it ſavours of more contempt) not to have Gods Seers, and not to uſe them: Hee can be no true Iſraelite, that is not diſtreſſed with the want of a Samuel.

As one that had learned to begin his rule in obedience, Saul ſtayes ſeven dayes in Gilgal, according to the Prophets direction, and ſtill he lookes long for Samuel, which had promiſed his preſence; ſixe dayes he expects, & part of the ſeventh, yet Samuel is not come: The Philiſtims draw neere, the Iſraelites runne away, Samuel comes not,they muſt fight,God muſt bee ſupplicated, what ſhould Saul doe? rather than God ſhould want a ſacrifice,and the people ſatisfaction, Saul will command that, which he knew Samuel would,if he were preſent,both command, and execute: It is not poſſible(thinks he)that God ſhould be diſpleaſed with a ſacrifice, he cannot but be diſpleaſed with indevotion: Why doe the people run from me, but for want of meanes to make God ſure? What ſhould Samuel rather wiſh, than that we ſhould be godly? The act ſhall be the ſame,the onely difference ſhall be in the perſon: If Samuel be wanting to us,we will not be wanting to God; it is but an holy prevention to be devout unbidden: Upon this conceit he commands a ſacrifice; Sauls ſins make no great ſhew,yet are they ſtill hainouſly taken,the impiety of them was more hidden,and inward from all eyes,but Gods. If Saul were among the Prophets before, will he now be among the Prieſts? Can there be any devotion in diſobedience? O vaine man! What can it availe thee to ſacrifice to God againſt God? Hypocrites reſt only in formalities; If the outward act be done, it ſufficeth them,though the ground be diſtruſt, the manner unreverence, the cariage preſumption.

What then ſhould Saul have done? Upon the truſt of God and Samuel he ſhould have ſtaid out the laſt houre, and have ſecretly ſacrificed himſelfe, and his prayers unto that God, which loves Obedience above ſacrifice. Our faith is moſt commendable in the laſt act; It is no praiſe to hold out, untill we be hard driven: Then, when we are forſaken of meanes,to live by faith in our God,is worthy of a Crown: God will have no worſhip of our deviſing,we may only doe what he bids us,not bid what he commands not. Never did any true piety ariſe out of the corrupt puddle of mans braine; If it flow not from Heaven, it is odious to Heaven: What was it, that did thus taint the valour of Saul with this weakneſſe,but diſtruſt? He ſaw ſome Iſraelites goe,he thought all would goe; he ſaw the Philiſtims come, he ſaw Samuel came not,his diffidence was guilty of his miſdevotion: There is no ſinne,that hath not his ground from unbeleefe; This as it was the firſt infection of our pure nature, ſo is the true ſource of all corruption; man could not ſinne, if he diſtruſted not.

The ſacrifice is no ſooner ended, than Samuel is come: and why came he no ſooner? He could not be a Seer, and not know how much he was lookt for, how troubleſome and dangerous his abſence muſt needs be; He,that could tell Saul, that hee ſhould propheſie,could tell, that he would ſacrifice; yet hee purpoſely forbeares to come, for the tryall of him,that muſt bee the Champion of God. Samuel durſt not have done thus,but by direction from his Maſter: It is the ordinary courſe of God to prove us by delayes,and to drive to exigents,that we may ſhew what we are: Hee that anointed Saul,might lawfully from God controll him: There muſt be diſcretion there may not be partiality in our cenſures of the greateſt: God makes difference of ſins,none of perſons: if we make difference of ſins according to perſons, wee are unfaithfull both to God and man. Scarce is Saul warm in his Kingdome,when he hath even loſt it. Samuels firſt words after the inauguration,are of Sauls rejection,and the choice and eſtabliſhment of his Succeſſor: It was ever Gods purpoſe to ſettle the Kingdome in Judah: He that tooke occaſion by the peoples ſin to raiſe up Saul in Benjamin, takes occaſion by Sauls ſinne to eſtabliſh the Crowne upon David. In humane probability the Kingdome was fixed upon Saul, and his more worthy Sonne: In Gods Decree it did but paſſe through the hands of Benjamin to Iudah. Beſides trouble, how fickle are theſe earthly glories? Saul doubtleſſe lookt upon Ionathan, as the Inheritor of his Crowne; and behold, ere his peaceable Poſſeſſion,hee hath loſt it from himſelfe: Our ſinnes ſtrip us not of our hopes in heaven only,but of our earthly bleſſings; The way to entaile a comfortable proſperity upon our Seed after us, is our conſcionable obedience unto God.

Ionathans

JONATHANS Victory and SAULS Oath.

IT is no wonder if Sauls courage were much cooled with the heavy news of his rejection: After this he ſtayes under the Pomgranate tree in Gibeah: Hee ſtirres not towards the Gariſon of the Philiſtims: As Hope is the mother of Fortitude, ſo nothing doth more breed cowardlineſſe, than deſpaire: Every thing diſmayes that heart, which God hath put out of protection. Worthy Ionathan (which ſprung from Saul as ſome ſweet Impe growes out of a Crabſtocke) is therefore full of valour, becauſe full of faith: He well knew, that he ſhould have nothing, but diſcouragements from his fathers feare; as rather chooſing therefore, to avoide all the blockes that might lye in the way, then to leape over them, he departs ſecretly without the diſmiſſion of his Father, or notice of the people; onely God leads him, and his Armour-bearer followes him. O admirable faith of Ionathan, whom neither the ſteepneſſe of Rockes, nor the multitude of enemies can diſſwade from ſo unlikely an aſſault! Is it poſſible, that two men, whereof one was weaponleſſe, ſhould dare to think of incountring ſo many thouſands? O Divine Power of Faith, that in all difficulties and attempts, makes a man more than men, and regards no more armies of men, than ſwarmes of flyes! There is no reſtraint to the Lord (ſaith he) to ſave with many, or by few: It was not ſo great newes, that Saul ſhould be amongſt the Prophets, as that ſuch a word ſhould come from the Sonne of Saul.

If his Father had had but ſo much Divinity, he had not ſacrificed: The ſtrength of his God, is the ground of his ſtrength in God; The queſtion is not, what Ionathan can doe, but what God can doe, whoſe power is not in the meanes, but in himſelfe: That mans faith is well underlaid, that upholds it ſelfe by the Omnipotency of God; thus the Father of the faithfull built his aſſurance upon the power of the Almighty. But many things God can doe, which he will not doe; How knoweſt thou, Ionathan, that God will be as forward, as he is able, to give thee victory? For this (ſaith hee) I have a watch-word from God, out of the mouthes of the Philiſtims: If they ſay, Come up, we will goe up; for God hath delivered them into our hands: If they ſay, Tarry, till we come to you, we will ſtand ſtill: Ionathan was too wiſe to truſt unto a caſuall preſage: There might be ſome farre fetcht conjectures of the event from the word; We will come to you, was a threat of reſolution; Come you to us, was a challenge of feare; or perhaps, Come up to us, was a word of inſultation, from them, that truſted to the inacceſſibleneſſe of the place, & multitudes of men. Inſultation is from pride, pride argued a fall, but faith hath nothing to do with probabilities, as that, which acknowledgeth no Argument, but demonſtration; If there had not beene an inſtinct from God of this aſſured warrant of ſucceſſe, Ionathan had preſumed, in ſtead of beleeving, and had tempted that GOD, whom hee profeſſed to glorifie by his truſt.

There can be no faith, where there is no promiſe, and where there is a promiſe, there can be no preſumption: Words are voluntary; The tongues of the Philiſtims were as free to ſay, Tarry, as Come: That God, in whom our very tongues move, overruled them ſo, as now they ſhall ſpeak that word, which ſhall cut their owne throats: They knew no more harm in Come, than Tarry; both were alike ſafe for the ſound, for the ſenſe; but he, that put a ſignification of their ſlaughter in the one, not in the other did put that word into their mouth, whereby they might invite their owne deſtruction. The diſpoſition of our words are from the providence of the Almighty: God and our hearts have not alwayes the ſame meaning in our ſpeeches: In thoſe words, which we ſpeak at randome, or out of affectation, God hath a further drift of his own glory, and perhaps our judgement. If wicked men ſay, Our tongues are our owne, they could not say so, but from him, whom they defie in saying so, and who makes their tongue their executioner. A

No sooner doth Ionathan heare this invitation, then he answers it: Hee, whose hands had learned never to faile his heart, puts himselfe upon his hands and knees to climbe up into this danger: the exploit was not more difficult, than the way, the pain of the passage was equall to the perill of the enterprize; that his faith might equally triumph over both: he doth not say, how shall I get up, much lesse; which way shall I get downe againe? but as if the ground were levell, and the action dangerlesse, he puts himself into the view of the Philistims: Faith is never so glorious, as when it hath most opposition, and will not see it: Reason lookes ever to the meanes, Faith to the end; and instead of consulting, how to effect, resolves what shall be effected. The way to heaven is more steepe, more painfull: O God! how perilous a passage hast thou appointed for thy labouring Pilgrims? If difficulties will discourage us, we shall but climbe to fall: When we are lifting up our foot to the last step, there are the Philistims of death, of temptations, to grapple with; give us but faith, and turne us loose to the spight either of Earth or Hell. B

Ionathan is now on the top of the hill, and now, as if he had an army at his heeles, he flyes upon the host of the Philistims; his hands that might have been weary with climbing, are immediately commanded to fight, and deale as many deaths as blowes, to the amazed enemie: Hee needs not walke far for this execution; Himselfe, and his Armour-bearer in one halfe acres space have slaine twenty Philistims. It is not long since Ionathan smote their Garison in the hill of Geba, perhaps, from that time his name and presence carryed terror in it; but sure if the Philistims had not seene and felt more than a man in the face and hands of Ionathan, they had not so easily grovelled in death: The blowes and shriekes cannot but affect the next, who with a ghastly noise ranne away from death, and affright their fellowes no lesse then themselves are affrighted. The clamour and feare runs on like fire in a traine, to the very formost rankes; Every man would flye, and thinkes there is so much more cause of flight, for that his eares apprehend all, his eyes nothing: Each man thinks his fellow stands in his way, and therefore instead of turning upon him which was the cause of their flight, they bend their swords upon those who they imagine to be the hinderers of their flight; and now a miraculous astonishment hath made the Philistims, Ionathans Champions, and Executioners; Hee followes, and kills those which helped to kill others; and the more he killed, the more they feared, and fled, and the more they killed each other in the flight: and that feare it selfe might prevent Ionathan in killing them, the Earth it selfe trembles under them. Thus doth God at once strike them with his owne hand, with Ionathans, with theirs; and makes them runne away from life, whiles they would flye from an enemy: Where the Almighty purposes destruction to any people, he needs not call in forrain powers, he needs not any hands or weapons, but their owne; He can make vast bodies die no other death, then their owne waight: We cannot be sure to be friends among our selves, whiles God is our enemie. C D

The Philistims flye fast, but the newes of their flight over-runnes them even unto Sauls Pomegranate Tree: The Watchmen discerne afarre off, a flight & execution: search is made, Ionathan is found missing; Saul will consult with the Arke: Hypocrites while they have leisure, will perhaps be holy: For some fits of devotion they cannot be bettered. But when the tumult encreased, Sauls piety decreases: It is now no season to talke with a Priest; withdraw thine hand Ahaiah, the Ephod must give place to Armes: It is more time to fight than to pray; what needs he Gods guidance, when he sees his way before him? He that before would needs sacrifice ere he fought, will now in the other extreame, fight in a wilfull indevotion: Worldly minds regard holy duties no further, then may stand with their owne carnall purposes: Very easie occasions shall interupt them in their religious intentions; like unto children which if a Bird doe but flye in their way, cast their eye from their booke. E

But if Saul serve not God in one kind, he will serve him in another, if he honour him not by attending on the Arke, he will honour him by a vow: His negligence in the

A the one, is recompenced with the zeale in the other. All Israel is adjured not to eate any food untill the evening: Hypocrisie is ever masked with a blinde and thankleſſe zeale: To wait upon the Ark, and consult with Gods Priest in all cases of importance, was a direct cõmandement of God; To eate no food in the pursuit of their enemies was not commanded: Saul leaves that which he was bidden, and does that which he was not required: To eate no food all day was more difficult, than to attend an houre upon the Arke; The voluntary services of Hypocrites are many times more painefull, than the duties enjoyned by God.

In what awe did all Israel stand of the Oath even of Saul? It was not their owne vow, but Sauls for them; yet comming into the wood, where they saw the Honey dropping, and found the meat as ready as their appetite; they dare not touch that
B sustenance, & will rather endure famine, & fainting, than an indiscreet curse. Doubtleſſe God had brought those Bees thither on purpose to try the constancy of Israel; Israel could not but thinke (that which Ionathan said) that the vow was unadvised & injurious; yet they will rather die than violate it: How sacred should we hold the obligation of our owne vowes in things just and expedient, when the bond of anothers rash vow is thus indissoluble.

There was a double mischiefe followed upon Sauls oath, an abatement of the victory, and eating with the blood: For, on the one side, the people were so faint that they were more likely to die, than kill; they could neither run, nor strike in this emptineſſe; Neither hands nor feet can doe their office, when the stomack is neglected: On the other, an unmeet forbearance causes a ravenous repast: Hunger knowes neither choice, nor order, nor measure: The one of these was a wrong to Israel, the other
C was a wrong done by Israel to God: Sauls zeale was guilty of both: A rash vow is seldome ever free from inconvenience: The heart that hath unneceſſarily intangled it selfe, drawes mischiefe either upon it selfe or others.

Ionathan was ignorant of his fathers adjuration, he knew no reason why he should not refresh himselfe in so profitable a service, with a little taste of Honey upon his Speare: Full well had he deserved this unsought dainty; and now behold his Honey is turned into Gall: if it were sweet in the mouth, it was bitter in the soule; if the eyes of his body were enlightned, the light of Gods countenãce was clouded by this act. After he heard of the oath, he pleades justly against it, the losse of so faire an opportunity of revenge, and the trouble of Israel; yet neither his reasons against the D Oath, nor his ignorance of the Oath, can excuse him from a sinne of ignorance in violating that, which first he knew not, and then knew unreasonable. Now Sauls leisure would serve him to aske counsell of God; As before Saul would not enquire, so now God will not answer: Well might Saul have found sinnes enow of his owne, whereto to impute this silence: He hath grace enough to know that God was offended, and to gueſſe at the cause of his offence: Sooner will an Hypocrite finde out another mans sinne then his owne; & now he sweares more rashly to punish with death the breach of that, which he had sworne rashly. The lots were cast, and Saul prayes for the decision; Ionathan is taken: Even the prayers of wicked men are sometimes heard, although in justice, not in mercy: Saul himselfe was punished not a little, in the fall of this lot upon Ionathan; Surely Saul sinned more in making this vow, than Ionathan in E breaking it unwittingly, and now the father smarts for the rashneſſe of his double vow, by the unjust sentence of death upon so worthy a sonne: God had never singled out Ionathan by his lot, if he had not been displeased with his act: Vowes rashly made may not be rashly broken; If the thing we have vowed be not evill in it self, or in the effect, we cannot violate it without evill. Ignorance cannot acquit, if it can abate our sinne. It is like, if Ionathan had heard his fathers adjuration, he had not transgressed; his absence at the time of that Oath, cannot excuse him from displeasure: What shall become of those, which may know the charge of their heavenly Father, and wil not? which doe know his charge, and will not keepe it? Affectation of ignorance, and willing disobedience, is desperate.

Death was too hard a censure for such an unknowne offence: The cruell piety of Saul will revenge the breach of his own charge, so as he would be loath God should avenge on himſelf the breach of his divine command. If Ionathan had not found better friends than his father, ſo noble a victory had beene recompenced with death; He that ſaved Iſrael from the Philiſtims, is ſaved by Iſrael from the hand of his Father: Saul hath ſworn Ionathans death, the people contrarily ſwear his preſervatiõ; his Kingdome was not yet ſo abſolute; that he could runne away with ſo unmercifull a Juſtice; their Oath that ſavoured of diſobedience prevailed againſt his Oath that ſavoured too ſtrong of cruelty: Neither doubt I, but Saul was ſecretly not diſpleaſed with this loving reſiſtance: So long as his heart was not falſe to his Oath, he could not be ſory that Ionathan ſhould live. TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, SIR Thomas Edmonds

KNIGHT, TREASVRER OF HIS MAIESTIES HOVSHOLD, AND OF HIS MOST Honourable privy Councell.

RIGHT HONOURABLE:

After your long and happy acquaintance with other Courts, and Kingdoms, may it please you to compare with them the estate of old Israel; You shall find the same hand swaying all Scepters, and you shall meet with such a proportion of dispositions, and occurrences, that you will say, men are still the same, if their names and faces differ: You shall find Envy and Mutability ancient Courtiers: and shall confesse the Vices of men still alive, if themselves die; You shall see God still honouring those that honour him, and both rescuing Innocence, and crowning it. It is not for mee to anticipate your deeper and more more judicious Observations, I am bold to dedicate this piece of my Labour to your Honour, in a thankefull acknowledgment of those Noble respects, I have found from you, both in France, and at home. In lieu of all which, I can but pray for your happinesse, and vow my selfe

Yours Honours in all humble observance,

JOS: HALL.

Saul and Agag.

GOd holds it no derogation from his mercy to beare a quarrell long, where hee hates: Hee, whoſe anger to the veſſels of wrath, is everlaſting, even in temporall judgment revengeth late: The ſinnes of his owne children are no ſooner done, and repented of, then forgotten; but the malicious ſinnes of his enemies ſticke faſt in an infinite diſpleaſure. (I remember what Amalek did to Iſrael, how they laid wait for them by the way, as they came up from Ægypt:) Alas, Lord (might Amalek ſay) they were our forefathers, wee neuer knew their faces, no not their names, the fact was ſo farre from our conſent, that it is almoſt paſt the memory of our hiſtories. It is not in the power of time to raze out any of the arrerages of God: we may lay up wrath for our poſteritie: Happy is that childe, whoſe progenitors are in heaven, hee is left an inheritor of bleſſing together with eſtate, whereas wicked anceſtors loſe the thanke of a rich patrimony, by the curſe that attends it: Hee that thinkes becauſe puniſhment is deferd, that God hath forgiven, or forgot his offence, is unacquainted with juſtice, and knowes not, that time makes no difference in eternity.

The Amalekites were wicked Idolaters, and therefore could not want many preſent ſinnes, which deſerved their extirpation. That God, which had taken notice of all their offences, picks out this one noted ſinne of their forefathers, for revenge: Amongſt all their indignities, this ſhall beare the name of their judgement: As in legall proceedings with malefactors, one inditement found, gives the ſtile of their condemnation. In the lives of thoſe, which are notoriouſly wicked, God cannot looke beſides a ſinne, yet when he drawes to an execution, he faſtens his ſentence upon one evill as principall, others as acceſſaries, ſo as at the laſt, one ſinne which perhaps wee make no account of, ſhall pay for all.

The paganiſh Idolatries of the Amalekites could not but bee greater ſinnes to God, then their hard meaſure to Iſrael, yet God ſets this upon the file, whiles the reſt are not recorded; Their ſuperſtitions might bee of ignorance, this ſinne was of malice: Malicious wickedneſſes of all others, as they are in greateſt oppoſition to the goodneſſe and mercy of God, ſhall be ſure of the paiment of greateſt vengeance. The deteſtation of God may be meaſured by his revenge (ſlay both man, and woman, both infant, and ſuckling, both Oxe, and Sheepe, Camell, and Aſſe) not themſelves onely, but every thing that drew life either from them, or for their uſe, muſt dye: When the

the God of mercy ſpeakes ſuch bloody words, the provocation muſt needs be vehement: ſinnes of infirmitie doe but mutter; ſpightfull ſinnes cry loud for judgement in the eares of God: Prepenſed malice in courts of humane juſtice aggravates the murther, and ſharpens the ſentence of death. A

What then was this ſinne of Amalek, that is called unto this late reckoning? What? but their envious and unprovoked onſets upon the backe of Iſrael, this was it, that God tooke ſo to heart, as that hee not onely remembers it now by Samuel, but hee bids Iſrael ever to remember it, by Moſes: Remember how Amalek met thee by the way, and ſmote the hindmoſt of you, all that were feeble behind thee, when thou waſt faint and weary. Beſides this, did Amalek meet Iſrael in a pitcht battaile openly, in Rephidim; for that, God payed them in the preſent: The hand of Moſes lifted up on the Hill, ſlew them in the Valley: He therefore repeats not that quarrell; but the cowardly, and cruell attempts upon an impotent enemy, ſticke ſtill in the ſtomacke of the Almighty: Oppreſſion and wrong upon even termes, are not ſo hainous unto God, as thoſe, that are upon manifeſt diſadvantage: In the one, there is an hazard of returne: In the other, there is ever a tyrannous inſultation: God takes ſtill the weaker part, and will be ſure therefore to plague them, which ſeeke to put injuries on the unable to reſiſt. B

This ſinne of Amalek ſlept al the time of the Judges, thoſe governours were onely for reſcue and defence; now ſo ſoone as Iſrael hath a King, and that King is ſetled in peace, God gives charge to call them to account: It was that, which God had both threatned and ſworne, & now he chooſes out a fit ſeaſon for the execution; As wee uſe to ſay of winter, the judgements of God doe never rot in the Skie, but ſhall fall (if late, yet) ſurely, yet ſeaſonably: There is ſmall comfort in the delay of vengeance, whiles we are ſure it ſhall loſe nothing in the way, by length of protraction. C

The Kenites were the off-ſprings of Hobad, or Iethro, father in law to Moſes; the affinitie of him, to whō Iſrael owed their deliverance & being, was worthy of reſpect; but it was the mercy of that good & wiſe Midianite ſhewed unto Iſrael in the wildernes, by his grave advice, cheerfull gratulation, & aide, which wonne this gratefull forbearance of his poſteritie: He that is not leſſe in mercy, then in juſtice, as he challenged Amaleks ſinne of their ſucceeding generations, ſo he derives the recompence of Iethro's kindnes, unto his far-deſcended iſſue: Thoſe that were unborne many ages after Iethro's death, receive life from his duſt, and favour from his hoſpitalitie; The name of their dead grandfather ſaves them from the common deſtruction of their neighbours. The ſervices of our love to Gods children are never thankleſſe; when we are dead and rotten, they ſhall live and procure bleſſings to thoſe, which never knew perhaps, nor heard of their progenitors: If we ſow good workes, ſucceſſion ſhall reape them, and we ſhall be happy in making them ſo. D

The Kenites dwelt in the borders of Amalek, but in tents, (as did their iſſue the Rechabites) ſo as they might remove with eaſe: They are warned to ſhift their habitations, leſt they ſhould periſh with ill neighbours: It is the manner of God, firſt to ſeparate, before he judge, as a good huſband weeds his corne, ere it be ripe for the ſickle, & goes to the fanne, ere he goe to the fire. When the Kenites packe up their fardels, it is time to expect judgement. Why ſhould not wee imitate God, and ſeparate our ſelves that we may not be judged? ſeparate, not one Kenite from another, but every Kenite from among the Amalekites, elſe if we will needs live with Amalek, we cannot thinke much to dye with him. E

The Kenites are no ſooner removed, then Saul fals upon the Amalekites: Hee deſtroyes all the people, but ſpares their King: The charge of God was univerſall, for man and beaſt: In the corruption of partialitie, lightly the greateſt eſcape: Covetouſneſſe, or miſ-affection are commonly guilty of the impunity of thoſe, which are at once more eminent in dignity, and in offence: It is a ſhamefull hypocriſie to make our commoditie the meaſure and rule of our execution of Gods command, and under pretence of godlineſſe to pretend gaine: The unprofitable vulgar muſt dye; Agag may yeeld a rich ranſome: The leane and feeble cattle, that would but ſpend ſtover, and die alone, ſhall periſh by the ſword of Iſrael, the beſt may ſtocke the grounds,

A grounds, and furniſh the markets. O hypocrites, did God ſend you for gaine, or for revenge? Went you to be purveyours, or executioners? If you plead, that all thoſe wealthy herds had beene but loſt, in a ſpeedy death, thinke yee that he knew not this which commanded it? Can that be loſt, which is devoted to the will of the owner, and Creator? Or can yee thinke to gaine any thing by diſobedience? That man can never either do well, or fare well, which thinkes, there can be more profit in any thing, then in his obedience to his Maker: Becauſe Saul ſpared the beſt of the men, the people ſpared the beſt of the cattel, each is willing to favour other in the ſinne. The ſinnes of the great command imitation, and doe as ſeldome goe without attendants as their perſons.

B Saul knew well, how much he had done amiſſe, and yet dare meet Samuel, and can ſay, Bleſſed bee thou of the Lord, I have fulfilled the Commandement of the Lord: His heart knew, that his tongue was as falſe, as his hands had beene; and if his heart had not beene more falſe then either of them, neither of them had beene ſo groſſe in their falſhood: If hypocriſie were not either fooliſh, or impudēt, ſhee durſt not ſhew her head to a Seer of God. Could Saul thinke, that Samuel knew of the aſſes that were loſt, and did not know of the oxen and ſheepe, that were ſpared? Could he foretell his thoughts, when it was, and now not know of his open actions? Much leſſe when we have to doe with God himſelfe, ſhould diſſimulation preſume either of ſafety or ſecrecie. Can the God that made the heart not know it? Can hee, that comprehends all things, be ſhut out of our cloſe corners? Saul was otherwiſe crafty enough, yet herein his ſimplicitie is palpable: Sinne can beſot even the wiſeſt man, and there

C was never but folly in wickedneſſe.

No man brags ſo much of holineſſe, as hee that wants it: True obedience is joyned ever with humilitie, and feare of unknowne errours; Falſhood is bold, and can ſay, I have fulfilled the Commandement of the Lord: If Saul had beene truely obſequious and holy, he had made no noyſe of it: A gracious heart is not a blab of his tongue, but reſts and rejoyceth ſilently in the conſcience of a ſecret goodneſſe; thoſe veſſels yeeld moſt ſound, that have the leaſt liquor: Samuel had reaſon to beleeve the ſheepe, and oxen, above Saul; their bleating and lowing was a ſufficient conviction of a denied and out-faced diſobedience: God opened their mouths to accuſe Saul of their life, & his falſhood; but, as ſinne is crafty, and never wanted a cloake, wherewith both to hide and decke it ſelfe; even this very rebellion is holy: Firſt the

D act, if it were evill, was not mine but the peoples; and ſecondly, their intention makes it good; For theſe Flocks and Herds were preſerved, not for gaine, but for devotion: What needs this quarrell? If any gaine by this act, it is the Lord thy God: His Altars ſhall ſmoke with theſe ſacrifices; yee, that ſerve at them, ſhal fare ſo much the better; this godly thriftineſſe lookes for thankes rather then cenſure. If Saul had beene in Samuels cloathes, perhaps this anſwere would have ſatisfied him: Surely, himſelfe ſtands out in it, as that whereto hee dares truſt, and after hee heares of Gods angry reproofe; hee avowes, and doubles his hold of his innocency; as if the Commanders ſhould not anſwer for the knowne ſinnes of the people; as if our intentions could juſtifie us to God, againſt God. How much adoe is it to bring ſinners upon their knees, and to make their tongues accuſe their hands? But it is no halting

E with the maker of the heart: Hee knew it was covetouſneſſe, and not piety, which was acceſſary to this forbearance; and if it had beene as was pretended, hee knew it was an odious impietie to raiſe devotion out of diſobedience: Saul ſhall heare and finde, that he hath dealt no leſſe wickedly in ſparing an Agag, then in killing an innocent Iſraelite; in ſparing theſe beaſts for ſacrifice, then in ſacrificing beaſts that had beene uncleane. Why was ſacrifice it ſelfe good, but becauſe it was commanded? What difference was there betwixt ſlaughter and ſacrifice, but obedience; To ſacrifice diſobediently, is wilfully to mocke God in honouring him.

The rejection of Saul, and the choice of David.

EVen when Saul had abandoned God in disobedience, hee would not forgoe Samuel, yea though hee reprooved him; when he had forsaken the substance, yet hee would maintaine the formalitie; If hee cannot hold the man, he will keepe the pledge of his garment, such was the violence of Sauls desire, that he will rather rend Samuels coate, then part with his person. Little did Saul thinke, that he had in his hand the pawne of his owne rejection, that this act of kinde importunitie should carie in it a presage of his judgement, yet so it did: This very rending of the coate was a reall prophecie, & did bode no lesse then the rending of the Kingdome from him, and his posteritie: Wicked men, whiles they thinke by carnall meanes to make their peace, plunge themselves deeper into misery.

Any stander by would have said, what a good King is this? how deare is Gods Prophet unto him? how happy is Israel in such a Prince, as thus loves the messengers of God? Samuel, that saw the bottome of his hollow affection, rejects him, whom God had rejected; he was taught to looke upon Saul, not as a King, but as an offender, and therefore refuses with no lesse vehemency, then Saul intreated: It was one thing, what he might doe, as a subject, another what he must doe as a Prophet: Now he knowes not Saul any otherwise, then as so much the greater trespasser as his place was higher; and therefore he doth no more spare his greatnesse, then the God against whom hee sinned; Neither doth hee countenance that man with his presence, on whom he sees God to frowne.

There needs no other Character of hypocrisie, then Saul, in the carriage of this one businesse with Agag and Samuel: First he obeyes God where there is no gaine in disobedience; then he serves God by halves, and disobeyes, where the obedience might be losse: He gives God of the worst; he doth that in a colour, which might seeme answerable to the charge of God: He respects persons in the execution; He gives good words, when his deeds were evill; He protests his obedience against his conscience, He faces out his protestation against a reproofe; When hee sees no remedy, hee acknowledges the fact, denies the sinne, yea he justifies the act by a profitable intention; When he can no longer maintaine his innocence, hee casts the blame from himselfe upon the people; He confesseth not, till the sinne be wrung from his mouth; Hee seekes his peace out of himselfe, and relyes more upon anothers vertue, then his owne penitency; Hee would cloake his guiltinesse with the holinesse of anothers presence; He is more tormented with the danger and damage of his sinne, then with the offence; He cares to hold in with men, in what termes soever he stands with God; He fashionably serves that God, whom he hath not cared to reconcile by his repentance: No marvell if God cast him off, whose best was dissimulation.

Old Samuel is forced to doe a double execution, and that upon no lesse then two Kings: The one upon Saul, in dividing the Kingdome from him, who had divided himselfe from God; The other upon Agag, in dividing him in pieces, whom Saul should have divided. Those holy hands were not used to such sacrifices, yet did he never spill blood more acceptably: If Saul had beene truly penitent, hee had in a desire of satisfaction prevented the hand of Samuel in this slaughter; Now hee coldly stands still, and suffers the weake hands of an aged Prophet to bee imbrued with that blood, which he was commanded to shed. If Saul might not sacrifice in the absence of Samuel, yet Samuel might kill in the presence of Saul: He was yet a Judge of Israel although he suspended the execution: In Sauls neglect, this charge reverted to him; God loves just executions so well, that he will hardly take them ill at any hand.

I doe not find, that the slaughter of Agag troubled Samuel; that other act of his severitie

A veritie upon Saul, though it drew no blood, yet strucke him in the striking, & fetched teares from his eyes. Good Samuel mourned for him, that had not grace to mourne for himselfe: No man in all Israel might seeme to have so much reason to rejoyce in Sauls ruine, as Samuel, since that he knew him raised up in despight of his government; yet he mournes more for him, then hee did for his sons, for himselfe: It grieved him to see the plant, which he had set in the garden of Israel, thus soon withered: It is an unnaturall senseleſnesse not to be affected with the dangers, with the sinnes of our Governours: God did not blame this sorrow, but moderated it; How long wilt thou mourne for Saul? It was not the affection he forbad, but the measure: In this is the difference betwixt good men and evill, that evill men mourne not for their owne sinnes, good men doe so mourne for the sinnes of others, that they will
B hardly be taken off.

If Samuel mourne becauſe Saul hath cast away God by his sinne, hee must cease to mourne, becauſe God hath cast away Saul from raigning over Israel, in his just punishment: A good heart hath learned to rest it selfe upon the Justice of Gods Decree, & forgets all earthly respects, when it lookes up to heaven. So did God meane to shew his displeasure against the person of Saul, that he would shew favour to Israel, he will not therfore bereave them of a King, but change him for a better: Either Saul had slandred his people, or else they were partners with him in the disobedience: yet (becauſe it was their rulers fault, that they were not over-ruled) we doe not heare of their smarting, any otherwise, then in the subjection to such a King, as was not loyall to God: The losse of Saul is their gaine; the government of their first King
C was abortive, no marvell if it held not. Now was the maturitie of that State, & therfore God wil bring them forth a kindly Monarchy setled where it should: Kings are of Gods providing, it is good reason he should make choyce of his own deputies: but where goodnesse meets with soveraignety, both his right, & his gift are doubled: If Kings were meerely frō the earth, what needs a Prophet to be seene in the choice or inauguratiō? The hand of Samuel doth not now beare the Scepter to rule Israel, but it beares the horne for the anointing of him, that must rule: Saul was sent to him, when the time was, to be anointed, but now he is sent to anoint David: Then Israel sought a King for themselves, now God seekes a King for Israel: The Prophet is therefore directed to the house of Iſhai the Bethleemite, the grand-child of Ruth; now is the faithfull love of that good Moabitesse crowned with the honour of a Kingdome, in D the succeeding generation: God fetcht her out of Moab, to bring a King unto Israel: Whiles Orpah wants bread in her owne Countrey, Ruth is growne a great Lady in Bethleem, and is advanced to be great Grand-mother to the King of Israel. The retributions of God are bountifull; never any man forsooke ought for his sake, and complained of an hard bargaine.

Even the best of Gods Saints want not their infirmities: Hee that never replyed, when hee was sent to reprove the King, moveth doubts, when hee is bidden to goe, and anoint his successor. (How can I goe? If Saul heare it, he will kill mee.) Perhaps desire of full direction drew frō him this question, but not without a mixture of diffidence; For the manner of doing it, doth not so much trouble him, as the successe: It is not to be expected, that the most faithfull hearts should be alwayes in an equall height of E resolution. God doth not chide Samuel, but instruct him: Hee, which is Wisedome it selfe, teached him to hide his counsels in an honest policy: (Take an Heifar with thee and say I am come to doe sacrifice to the Lord.) This was to say true, not to say all: Truth may not be crossed by denials, or equivocations, it may bee concealed in a discreet silence: except in the case of an oath, no man is bound to speake all he knowes; we are not onely allowed, but commanded to be innocently Serpentine. There were doubtlesse Heifars enough in Bethleem, Iſhai had both wealth & devotion enough to have bestowed a Sacrifice upon God, and his Prophet: But to give a more perfect colour to his intention, Samuel must take an Heifar with him: The act it selfe was serious and necessary: There was no place, no time, wherein it was not fit for a Samuel to offer Peace-offerings unto God; but when a King should be anointed, there was no lesse then necessitie in this service. Those, which must represent God to the world, ought to be consecrated to that Majestie, whom they resemble, by publike devotions: Every important action requires a Sacrifice to blesse it, much more that act, which imports the whole Church, or Common-wealth. A

It was great newes to see Samuel at Bethleem, hee was no gadder abroad, none but necessary occasions could make him stir from Ramath: The Elders of the City therfore, welcome him with trembling, not for that they were afraid of him; but of themselves; they knew, that guest would not come to thē for familiarity, streight do they suspect, it was the purpose of some judgement, that drew him thither: Commest thou peaceably? It is a good thing to stand in awe of Gods Messengers, and to hold good termes with thē upon al occasions: The Bethlemites are glad to heare of no other errand, but a Sacrifice; and now must they sanctifie themselves for so sacred a businesse: We may not presume to sacrifice unto God unsanctified, this were to marre an holy act, and make our selves more prophane, by prophaning that, which should be holy. B

All the Citizens sanctifie themselves, but Ishai and his sonnes were in a special fashion sanctified by Samuel. This businesse was most theirs, and all Israel in them; the more God hath to doe with us, the more holy should we be. With what desire did Samuel look upon the sons of Ishai, that he might see the face of the man whō God had chosen? And now, when Eliab the eldest Son came forth, a man of a goodly presence, whose person seemed fit to succeed Saul, he thinks with himself; This choice is soon made, I have already espied the head, on which I must spend this holy Oile: This is the man, which hath both the priviledge of nature in his primogeniture, and of outward goodlines in proportion: Surely the Lords Anointed is before him. Even the holiest Prophet, when he goes without God, runnes into errour: The best judgment is subject to deceit: It is no trusting to any mortall man, when he speakes of himself: Our eyes can be led by nothing but signes and appearances, and those have commonly in them either a true falshood, or uncertaine truth. C

That which should have forewarned Samuel, deceived him; he had seene the proofe of a goodly stature unanswerable to their hopes, & yet his eye erres in the shape: He, that judgeth by the inside both of our hearts and actions, checks Samuel in this misconceit: (Looke not on his countenance, nor on the height of his stature, because I have refused him; for God seeth not as man seeth:) The King with whom God meant to satisfie the untimely desires of Israel, was chosen by his stature, but the King with whom God meant to please himself is chosen by the heart. All the seven sonnes of Ishai are presented to the Prophet, no one is omitted whō their father thought capable of any respect: If either Samuel or Ishai should have chosen, David should never have bin King: His father thought him fit to keepe sheepe, his brethren fit to rule men; yet even David (the yongest sonne) is fetcht from the fold, and by the choice of God destined to the Throne: Nature, which is commonly partiall to her owne, could not suggest ought to Ishai, to make him thinke David worthy to bee remembred in any competition of honour, yet him hath God singled out to rule. D

God will have his Wisedome magnified in the unlikelihoods of election: Davids countenance was ingenuous, and beautifull, but if it had promised so much as Eliabs, or Abinadabs, he had not bin in the fields, whiles his brethren were at the Sacrifice: If we doe altogether follow our eye, & suffer our selves to bee guided by outward respects in our choyce for God or our selves, we cannot but goe amisse. What doe wee thinke the brethren of David thought, when they saw the oyle powred upon his head? Surely (as they were envious enough) they had too much repined, if they had either fully apprehended the purpose of the Prophet, or else had not thought of some improbability in the successe: Either they understood not, or beleeved not, what God would doe with their brother; They saw him graced with Gods Spirit above his wont, but perhaps foresaw not, whither it tended: David (as no whit changed in his condition) returnes to his sheepe with an humble admiration of Gods gracious respect to him, casts himselfe upon the wise and holy Decree of the Almighty, resigning himselfe to the disposition of those hands, which had chosen him; when suddenly a Messenger is sent from Saul to call him in all haste, to that Court, whereof he shall once be Master: The occasion is no lesse from God, than the event. E

David called to the Court.

THat the Kingdome is (in the appointment of God) departed from Saul, it is his leaſt loſſe; Now the Spirit of God is alſo departed from him; One ſpirit is no ſooner gone, but another is come; both are from God: Even the worſt ſpirits have not onely permiſſion, but commiſſion from Heaven for the infliction of judgement. He that at firſt could hide himſelfe among the ſtuffe, that he might not be King, is now ſo tranſported with this glory, that he growes paſſionate with the thought of forgoing it: Satan takes vantage of his melancholicke dejection, and turnes this paſſion into frenzy. God will have even evill ſpirits worke by meanes; A diſtempered body, and an unquiet mind are fit grounds for Satans vexation. Sauls Courtiers, as men that were more witty, than religious, adviſe him to Muſicke: They knew the ſtrength of that ſkill in allaying the fury of paſſions, in cheering up the dejected ſpirits of their Maſter: This was done like ſome fond Chirurgian, that when the bone is out of joynt, layes ſome ſoupling Pulteſſes to the part, for the aſſwaging of the ach, in the meane time not caring to remedy the luxation.

If they had ſaid, Sir, you know this evill comes from that God whom you have offended, there can be no helpe but in reconcilement; how eaſie is it for the God of Spirits to take off Satan? Labour your peace with him by a ſerious humiliation; make meanes to Samuel to further the attonement; they had been wiſe Counſellors, divine Phyſitians; whereas now they doe but ſkin over the ſore, and leave it rankled at the bottome: The cure muſt ever proceed in the ſame ſteps with the diſeaſe, elſe in vain ſhall we ſeem to heale; There is no ſafety in the redreſſe of evills, but to ſtrik at the root. Yet ſince it is no better with Saul and his Courtiers, it is wel it is no worſe I doe not heare either the Maſter, or ſervants ſay, This is an ill ſpirit, ſend for ſome Magitian, that may countermand him: There are forcible Enchantments for theſe ſpirituall vexations; If Samuel will not, there are Witches, that may give eaſe: But as one, that would rather be ill, then doe worſe, he contents himſelfe to doe that, which was lawfull, if unſufficient. It is a ſhame to ſay, that he, whom God had rejected for his ſin, was yet a Saint to ſome that ſhould be Chriſtians, who care not how much they are beholding to the devil in their diſtreſſes, affecting to caſt out devils by Beelzebub: In caſes of loſſe, or ſickneſſe, they make Hell their refuge, and ſeeke for patronage, but of an enemie: Here is a fearefull agreement; Satan ſeekes to them in his temptations, they in their conſultations ſeeke to him, and now they have mutually found each other, if they ever part, it is a miracle.

David had lived obſcurely in his fathers houſe, his only care & ambition was the welfare of the flocke he tended, and now, whiles his father and his brothers neglected him as fit for nothing but the field, he is talked of at the Court: Some of Sauls followers had beene at Iſhai's houſe, and taken notice of Davids ſkill, and now that harp which he practiſed for his private recreation, ſhall make him of a Shepheard a Courtier: The Muſick, that he meant only to himſelfe and his ſheepe, brings him before Kings: The Wiſedome of God thought fit to take this occaſion of acquainting David with that Court, which he ſhall once governe. It is good, that our education ſhould perfect our children in all thoſe commendable qualities, whereto they are diſpoſed: Little doe we know, what uſe God meanes to make of thoſe faculties, which we know not how to imploy. Where the Almighty purpoſes an advancement, obſcurity can be no prejudice; ſmall meanes ſhall ſet forward that, which God hath decreed.

Doubtleſſe, old Iſhai noted (not without admiration) the wonderfull accordance of Gods proceedings, that hee, which was ſent for, out of the field to bee anointed; ſhould now be ſent for out of the Countrey into the Court, and now he perceived, God was making way for the execution of that which he purpoſed; hee attends the iſſue in ſilence, neither ſhall his hand faile to give furtherance to the project of God:

Hee therefore ſends his ſonne laden with a Preſent to Saul: The ſame God which called David to the Court, welcomes him thither; His comelineſſe, valour, and ſkill have ſoone wonne him favour in the eyes of Saul. The giver of all graces hath ſo placed his favours, that the greateſt enemies of goodneſſe ſhall ſee ſomewhat in the holieſt men, which they ſhall affect, and for which they ſhall honour the perſons of them, whoſe vertues they diſlike; as contrarily the Saints on earth ſee ſomewhat to love even in the worſt creatures. A

No doubt David ſung to his harpe; his harpe was not more ſweet than his ſong was holy: Thoſe Pſalms alone had been more powerful to chaſe the evill ſpirit, than the Muſicke was to calme paſſions; both together gave eaſe to Saul; and God gave this effect to both, becauſe he would have Saul traine up his Succeſſor: This ſacred Muſick did not more diſpel Satan, than wanton Muſick invites him: & more cheeres him, than us: Hee playes and danceth at a filthy ſong, he ſings at an obſcene dance: Our ſinne is his beſt paſtime, whereas Pſalmes, and Hymnes, and ſpiritual Songs are torment unto the Tempter, and Muſick to the Angells in Heaven, whoſe trade is to ſing Alleluiahs in the Chore of glory. B

David and Goliah.

AFter the newes of the Philiſtims Army, I heare no more mention of Sauls frenzy: Whether the noiſe of War diverted thoſe thoughtfull paſſions, whether God for his peoples ſake tooke off that evill ſpirit; leſt Iſrael might miſcary under a franticke Governour. Now David hath leiſure to returne to Bethleem: The glory of the Court cannot tranſport him to ambitious vanity; He had rather be his Fathers Shepheard, than Sauls Armour-bearer: All the magnificence and ſtate, which he ſaw, could not put his mouth out of the taſt of a retired ſimplicity; yea rather he loves his hooke the better, ſince hee ſaw the Court; and now his brethren ſerve Saul in his ſtead. A good heart hath learnt to frame it ſelfe unto al conditions, and can change eſtates without change of diſpoſition, riſing and falling according to occaſion: The worldly mind can riſe eaſily, but when it is once up, knowes not how to deſcend either with patience, or ſafety. C

Forty dayes together had the Philiſtims and Iſraelites faced each other, they pitched on two hills, one in the ſight of other, nothing but a Valley was betwixt them: Both ſtand upon defence and advantage; If they had not meant to fight, they had never drawne ſo neere; and if they had beene eager of fight, a Valley could not have parted them: Actions of hazard require deliberation; not fury but diſcretion muſt be the guide of Warre. D

So had Ioſhua deſtroyed the Giantly Anakims out of the Land of Iſrael, that yet ſome were left in Azzah, Gath, and Aſhdod, both to ſhew Iſrael, what Adverſaries their forefathers found in Canaan, and whom they maſtered; as alſo that God might winne glory to himſelfe by theſe obſequent executions: Of that race was Goliah, whoſe heart was as high as his head, his ſtrength was anſwerable to his ſtature, his weapons anſwerable to his ſtrength, his pride exceeded all: Becauſe he ſaw his head higher, his armes ſtronger, his ſword and ſpeare bigger, his ſhield heavier than any Iſraelite, he defies the whole hoſt, and walking betweene the two Armies, braves all Iſrael with a challenge; (Why are ye come out to ſet your battaile in aray? Am not I a Philiſtim? and you ſervants to Saul? Chooſe you a man for you, and let him come downe to me: give me a man that we may fight together.) Carnall hearts are caried away with preſumption of their owne abilities, and not finding matches to themſelves in outward appearance, inſult over the impotency of inferiors; and as thoſe that can ſee no inviſible oppoſition, promiſe themſelves certainty of ſucceſſe: Inſolence and ſelfe-confidence argues the heart to be nothing, but a lumpe of proud fleſh. E

The firſt challenge of Duell, that ever we finde, came out of the mouth of an uncircumciſed Philiſtim; yet was that in open warre, and tended to the ſaving of many lives, by adventuring one or two; and whoſoever imitateth, nay ſurpaſſeth him in challenge

A challenge to private Duels, in the attempt partaketh of his uncircumcision, though he should overcome; and of his manner of punishment, if in such private combates he cast away his life. For of all such desperate prodigals we may say, that their heads are cut off by their owne sword, if not by their owne hand. Wee cannot challenge men, and not challenge God, who justly challengeth to himselfe both to take vengeance, and to give successe. The more Goliah challenges, and is unanswered, the more is he puft up in the pride of his owne power: And is there none of all Israel, that will answer this champion otherwise than with his heeles? Where is the courage of him that was higher than all Israel from the shoulders upward? The time was, when Nahash the Ammonite had made that tyrannous demand of the right eyes of the Gileadites, that Saul could aske unasked, What aileth the people to weepe? and could
B hew his oxen in peeces to raise the spirits of Israel, and now he stands still, and sees the host turne their back, and never so much as askes, What aileth the people to fly? The time was, when Saul slue forty thousand Philistims in one day, and perhaps Goliah was in that discomfiture, and now one Philistim is suffered by him to brave all Israel forty dayes. Whence is this difference? The Spirit of God, (the spirit of fortitude) was now departed from him: Saul was not more above himselfe, when God was with him, then he is below others, now that he is left of God; Valour is not meerely of nature: Nature is ever like it selfe; by this rule, he that is once valiant, should never turne coward: But now we see the greatest spirits inconstant, and those, which have given good proofes of magnanimity, at other times, have bewrayed white livers unto their owne reproach; He that is the God of hosts, gives & takes
C away mens hearts at his pleasure: Neither is it otherwise in our spirituall combats, sometimes the same soule dare challenge all the powers of darkenesse, which otherwhiles gives ground to a temptation; We have no strength but what is given us, and if the author of all good gifts remit his hand for our humiliation, either we fight not or are foiled.

David hath now lien long enough close amongst his flock in the fields of Bethleem, God sees a time to send him to the pitcht field of Israel. Good old Ishai, that was doubtlesse joyfull to think, that he had afforded three sonnes to the wars of his King, is no lesse carefull of their welfare and provision; and who (amongst all the rest of his seven sonnes) shall be pickt out for this service, but his yongest sonne David, whose former and almost worne-out acquaintance in Court, and imployment under
D Saul seemed to fit him best for this errand. Earely in the morning is David upon his way, yet not so early, as to leave his flock unprovided. If his fathers cõmand dismisse him, yet will he stay, till he have trusted his sheepe with a carefull keeper; we cannot be faithfull shepheards, if our spiritual charge be lesse deare unto us; if when necessity cals us from our flocks, we depute not those, which are vigilant and conscionable.

Ere Davids speede can bring him to the valley of Elah, both the Armies are on foot ready to joyne: Hee takes not this excuse to stay without, as a man danted with the horror of warre, but leaving his present with his servant, he thrusts himself into the thickest of the host, & salutes his brethren which were now thinking of nothing but killing or dying, when the proud champion of the Philistims comes stalking forth before all the troupes, and renewes his insolent challenge against Israel:
E David sees the man, and heares his defiance, and looks about him, to see what answer would be given, and when hee espies nothing but pale faces and backes turned, hee wonders, not so much, that one man should dare all Israel, as that al Israel should run from one man: Even when they flie from Goliah, they talk of the reward, that should be given to that encounter & victory, which they dare not undertake, so those which have not grace to beleeve, yet can say, There is glory laid up for the faithfull. Ever since his anointing, was David possessed with Gods Spirit, and thereby filled both with courage, and wisedome: The more strange doth it seeme to him, that all Israel should bee thus dastardly: Those that are themselves eminent in any grace, cannot but wonder at the miserable defects of others, and the more shame they see in others imperfections, the more is their zeale in avoyding those errors in themselves.

Whiles baſe hearts are moved by example, the want of example is encouragement enough for an heroycall mind: Therefore is David ready to undertake the quarrell, becauſe no man elſe dare doe it: His eyes ſparkled with holy anger, and his heart roſe up to his mouth, when he heard this proud challenger: (Who is this uncircumciſed Philiſtim, that he ſhould revile the hoſt of the living God?) Even ſo, O Saviour, when all the generations of men ran away affrighted from the powers of death and darkneſſe, thou alone haſt undertaken, and confounded them.

Who ſhould offer to daunt the holy courage of David, but his owne brethren? The envious heart of Eliab conſtrues this forwardneſſe, as his owne diſgrace: Shall I (thinkes he) bee put downe by this puiſne? ſhall my fathers youngeſt ſonne dare to attempt that, which my ſtomach will not ſerve me to adventure? Now therefore he rates David for his preſumption; and inſtead of anſwering to the recompence of the victory, (which others were ready to give) he recompenceth the very inquiry of David with a checke: It was for his brethrens ſake, that David came thither, and yet his very journey is caſt upon him by them, for a reproach; Wherefore cam'ſt thou downe hither? and when their bitterneſſe can meet with nothing elſe to ſhame him, his ſheepe are caſt in his teeth: Is it for thee, an idle proud boy, to bee medling with our martiall matters? doth not yonder Champion looke, as if he were a fit match for thee? what makeſt thou of thy ſelfe, or what doeſt thou thinke of us? ywis it were fitter for thee to bee looking to thy ſheepe, than looking at Goliah; the Wilderneſſe would become thee better than the field: Wherein art thou equall to any man thou ſeeſt, but in arrogancy and preſumption? The paſtures of Bethleem could not hold thee, but thou thoughtſt it a goodly matter to ſee the warres: I know thee, as if I were in thy boſome; This was thy thought, There is no glory to be got among fleeces, I will goe ſeeke it in armes; Now are my brethren winning honour in the troupes of Iſrael, whiles I am baſely tending on ſheepe, why ſhould not I bee as forward as the beſt of them? This vanitie would make thee ſtraight of a ſhepheard, a ſoldier, and of a ſoldier, a champion; get thee home, fooliſh ſtripling to thy hooke, and thy harpe; let ſwords and ſpeares alone to thoſe, that know how to uſe them.

It is quarrell enough amongſt many to a good action, that it is not their owne; there is no enemy ſo ready, or ſo ſpightfull, as the domeſticall: The hatred of brethren is ſo much more, as their blood is neerer: The malice of ſtrangers is ſimple, but of a brother is mixt with envy: The more unnaturall any quality is, the more extreame it is; A cold winde from the South is intolerable: Davids firſt victory is of himſelfe, next of his brother; He overcomes himſelfe in a patient forbearance of his brother, he overcomes the malicious rage of his brother with the mildneſſe of his anſwer: If David had wanted ſpirit, hee had not beene troubled with the inſultation of a Philiſtim: If he had a ſpirit to match Goliah, how doth he ſo calmely receive the affront of a brother? What have I now done? Is there not a cauſe? That which would have ſtirred the choler of another, allayeth his: It was a brother, that wronged him, and that his eldeſt; neither was it time to quarrell with a brother, whiles the Philiſtims ſwords were drawne, and Goliah was challenging. O that theſe two motives could induce us to peace: If we have injury in our perſon, in our cauſe, it is from brethren, and the Philiſtims looke on: I am deceived, if this conqueſt were leſſe glorious, than the following: He is fit to be Gods Champion, that hath learned to be victor of himſelfe.

It is not this ſprinkling of cold water, that can quench the fire of Davids zeale, but ſtill his courage ſends up flames of deſire, ſtill he goes on to enquire, and to profer: Hee, whom the regard of others envy can diſmay, ſhall never doe ought worthy of envy: Never man undertooke any exploit of worth, and received not ſome diſcouragement in the way: This couragious motion of David, was not more ſcorned by his brother, then by the other Iſraelites applauded: The rumour flyes to the eares of the King, that there is a young man deſirous to encounter the Gyant: David is brought forth: Saul, when he heard of a Champion, that durſt go into the liſts with Goliah, looked for one as much higher than himſelfe, as hee was taller than the

A the reſt; he expected ſome ſterne face, and brawny arme; young and ruddy David is ſo farre below his thoughts, that he receives rather contempt, than thankes: His words were ſtout, his perſon was weake: Saul doth not more like his reſolution, than diſtruſt his ability: (Thou art not able to goe againſt this Philiſtim to fight with him; for thou art a boy, and he is a man of warre from his youth.) Even Saul ſeconds Eliab in the conceit of this diſparity, and if Eliab ſpeake out of envy, Saul ſpeakes out of judgement; both judge (as they were judged of) by the ſtature: All this cannot weaken that heart, which receives his ſtrength from faith: Davids greateſt conflict is with his friends: The overcomming of their diſſwaſions, that he might fight, was more worke, than to overcome his enemy in fighting: He muſt firſt juſtifie his ſtrength to Saul, ere he may prove it upon Goliah: Valour is never made good but by
B tryall: He pleads the tryall of his puiſſance upon the Beare and the Lyon, that hee may have leave to prove it upon a worſe beaſt then they; Thy ſervant ſlew both the Lyon and the Beare, therefore this uncircumciſed Philiſtim ſhall be as one of them. Experience of good ſucceſſe is no ſmall comfort to the heart, this gives poſſibility and hope, but no certainty: Two things there were on which David built his confidence, on Goliahs ſinne, and Gods deliverance, (Seeing hee hath rayled on the hoſt of the living God: The Lord that delivered me out of the pawes of the Lyon and the Beare, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philiſtim.) Well did David know, that if this Philiſtims ſkin had beene as hard as the braſſe of his ſhield, his ſin would make it penetrable by every ſtroke. After all brags of manhood he is impotent, that hath proveked God: Whiles other labour for outward fortification, happy and ſafe were we, if we could
C labour for innocence. He that hath found God preſent in one extremity, may truſt him in the next: Every ſenſible favour of the Almighty, invites both his gifts and our truſt.

Reſolution thus grounded, makes even Saul himſelfe confident; David ſhall have both his leave and his bleſſing: If David came to Saul, as a Shepheard, he ſhall goe toward Goliah as a Warriour: The attire of the King is not too rich for him, that ſhall fight for his King and Countrey: Little did Saul thinke, that his helmet was now on that head, which ſhould once weare his crowne: Now that David was arrayed in the warlike habit of a King, and girded with his ſword, he look t upon himſelfe, and thought this outſide glorious, but when he offred to walke, and found that the attire was not ſo ſtrong, as unweeldy, and that it might bee more for ſhew, than uſe, hee
D layes downe theſe accouſtrements of honor, and as caring rather to be an homely victor, than a glorious ſpoile, he craves pardon to goe in no clothes, but his owne; hee takes his ſtaffe inſtead of the ſpeare, his ſhepheards ſcrip inſtead of his brigandine, and inſtead of his ſword he takes his ſling, and inſtead of darts and javelins, he takes five ſmooth ſtones out of the brooke: Let Sauls coat be never ſo rich, and his armor never ſo ſtrong, what is David the better, if they fit him not? It is not to be enquired how excellent any thing is, but how proper: Thoſe things which are helpes to ſome may be encombrances to others: An unmeet good may be as inconvenient, as an accuſtomed evill: If we could wiſh another mans honour, when we feele the weight of his cares, we ſhould be glad to be in our owne coate.

Thoſe that depend upon the ſtrength of Faith, though they neglect not meanes,
E yet they are not curious in the proportion of outward meanes to the effect deſired: Where the heart is armed with an aſſured confidence, a ſling and a ſtone are weapons enow; to the unbeleeving no helps are ſufficient: Goliah, though he were preſumptuous enough, yet had one ſhield carried before him, another he caryed on his ſhoulder; neither will his ſword alone content him, but he takes his ſpeare too. Davids armour is his plaine ſhepheards ruſſet, and the brooke yeelds him his artillery, and he knowes, there is more ſafety in his cloth, than in the others braſſe; and more danger in his peebles, than the others ſpeare. Faith gives both heart and armes. The inward munition is ſo much more noble, becauſe it is of proofe for both ſoule and body: If we be furniſhed with this, how boldly ſhall wee meete with the powers of darkneſſe, and goe away more than conquerors?

Neither did the quality of Davids weapons bewray more confidence, than the number number: If he will put his life and victory upon the ſtones of the brooke, why doth he not fill his ſcrip full of them? why will he content himſelf with five? Had he been furniſhed with ſtore, the advantage of his nimbleneſſe might have given him hope; If one faile, that yet another might ſpeed: But now this paucity puts the diſpatch to a ſudden hazard, and he hath but five ſtones caſt either to death or victory; ſtill the fewer helpes, the ſtronger faith: David had an inſtinct from God, that he ſhould overcome, he had not a particular direction, how he ſhould overcome. For had hee beene at firſt reſolved upon the ſling and ſtone, he had ſaved the labour of girding his ſword: It ſeemes, whiles they were addreſſing him to the combat, he made account of hand-blowes, now he is purpoſed rather to ſend, than bring death to his adverſary: In either, or both, he durſt truſt God with the ſucceſſe, and before-hand (through the conflict) ſaw the victory: It is ſufficient, that wee know the iſſue of our fight: If our weapons and wards vary according to our occaſion given by God, that is nothing to the event; ſure we are, that if we reſiſt, we ſhall overcome, and if we overcome we ſhall be crowned. A B

When David appeared in the liſts to ſo unequall an adverſary, as many eyes were upon him, ſo in thoſe eyes, divers affections: The Iſraelites lookt upon him with pitty and feare, and each man thought, Alas, why is this comely ſtripling ſuffered to caſt away himſelfe upon ſuch a monſter? why will they let him goe unarmed to ſuch an affray? Why will Saul hazard the honour of Iſrael on ſo unlikely an head? The Philiſtims, eſpecially their great Champion, lookt upon him with ſcorne, diſdaining ſo baſe a combatant; (Am I a dog, that thou comeſt to me with ſtaves?) What could bee ſaid more fitly? Hadſt thou beene any other then a dog (O Goliah) thou hadſt never opened thy foule mouth to barke againſt the hoſt of God, and the God of hoſts: If David had thought thee any other then a very dog, he had never come to thee with a ſtaffe and a ſtone. C

The laſt words, that ever the Philiſtim ſhall ſpeake, are curſes, and brags; (Come to me and I will give thy fleſh unto the Fowles of the heaven, and the beaſts of the field) Seldome ever was there a good end of oſtentation: Preſumption is at once the preſage, and cauſe of ruine: He is a weake adverſary, that can bee killed with words: That man which could not feare the Gyants hand, cannot feare his tongue: If words ſhall firſt encounter, the Philiſtim receives the firſt foile, and ſhall firſt let in death into his eare, ere it enter into his forehead: (Thou comeſt to me with a ſword, & a ſpeare, & a ſhield but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hoſts, the God of the hoſt of Iſrael, whom thou haſt railed upon: This day ſhall the Lord cloſe thee in my hand, and I ſhall ſmite thee, and take thine head from thee.) Here is another ſtile, not of a boaſter, but of a Prophet: Now ſhall Goliah know, whence to expect his bane, even from the hands of a revenging God, that ſhall ſmite him by David, and now ſhall learne too late, what it is to meddle with an enemy, that goes under the inviſible protection of the Almighty. No ſooner hath David ſpoken, then his foot and hand ſecond his tongue: He runs to fight with the Philiſtim: It is a cold courage that ſtands onely upon defence: As a man, that ſaw no cauſe of feare, and was full of the ambition of victory, he flyes upon that monſter, and with a ſtone out of his bag ſmites him in the forehead: There was no part of Goliah, that was capable of that danger, but the face, and that piece of the face; the reſt was defenced with a brazen wall, which a weake ſling would have tryed to batter in vaine: what could Goliah feare to ſee an adverſary come to him without edge or point? And behold that one part hath God found out for the entrance of death: He that could have cauſed the ſtone to paſſe through the ſhield and breaſt-plate of Goliah, rather directs the ſtone to that part, whoſe nakedneſſe gave advantage: Where there is power or poſſibilitie of nature, God uſes not to work miracles, but chuſes the way that lyes moſt open to his purpoſes. D E

The vaſt forehead was a faire marke, but how eaſily might the ſling have miſſed it, if there had not beene another hand in this caſt beſides Davids? He that guided David into this field, and raiſed his courage to this combat, guides the ſtone to his end, and lodges it in that ſeate of impudence: There now lyeth the great defier of Iſrael, groveling and grinning in death, & is not ſuffered to deale one blow for his life,

and

A and bites the unwelcome earth for indignation, that hee dyes by the hand of a Shepheard: Earth and Hell ſhare him betwixt them; ſuch is the end of inſolence, and preſumption. O God, what is fleſh and blood to thee, which canſt make a little peeble-ſtone ſtronger then a Gyant, and when thou wilt, by the weakeſt meanes canſt ſtrew thine enemies in the duſt? Where now are the two ſhields of Goliah, that they did not beare off this ſtroke of death? or wherefore ſerves that Weavers beame, but to ſtrike the earth in falling? or that ſword, but to behead his Maſter? What needed David load himſelfe with an unneceſſary weapon? one ſword can ſerve both Goliah and him; If Goliah had a man to beare his ſhield, David had Goliah to beare his ſword, wherewith that proud blaſphemous head is ſevered from his ſhoulders: Nothing more honours God, then the turning of wicked mens forces againſt themſelves:
B There is none of his enemies, but caries with them their owne deſtruction. Thus didſt thou, O Sonne of David, foyle Sathan with his owne weapon; that, whereby he meant deſtruction to thee and us, vanquiſhed him through thy mighty power, and raiſed thee to that glorious triumph, and ſuperexaltation, wherein thou art, wherein we ſhal bee with thee.

JONATHANS Love, and SAULS Envy.

C REſides the diſcomfiture of the Philiſtims, Davids victorie had a double iſſue; Ionathans Love, and Sauls Envy, which God ſo mixed, that the one was a remedy of the other: A good ſonne makes amends for a wayward father: How precious was that ſtone that killed ſuch an enemy as Goliah, and purchaſed ſuch a friend as Ionathan? All Sauls Courtiers lookt upon David, none ſo affected him, none did match him but Ionathan: That true correſpondence, that was both in their faith and valour, hath knit their hearts: If David did ſet upon a Beare, a Lyon, a Gyant; Ionathan had ſet upon a whole Hoſt, and prevailed: The ſame Spirit animated both, the ſame Faith incited both, the ſame Hand proſpered both: All Iſrael was not worth this paire of friends, ſo zealouſly confident, ſo happily victorious: Similitude of diſpoſitions and eſtates tyes the ſafeſt knots of affection: A wiſe ſoule hath piercing eyes, and hath quickly
D diſcerned the likelineſſe of it ſelfe in another; as we doe no ſooner looke into the glaſſe or Water, but face anſwers to face; and where it ſees a perfect reſemblance of it ſelfe, cannot chooſe but love it with the ſame affection, that it reflects upon it ſelfe.

No man ſaw David that day, which had ſo much cauſe to diſ-affect him; none in all Iſrael ſhould be a looſer by Davids ſucceſſe, but Ionathan: Saul was ſure enough ſetled for his time, onely his Succeſſor ſhould forgoe all that, which David ſhould gaine; ſo as none but David ſtands in Ionathans light, and yet al this cannot abate one jot, or dram of his love: Where God uniteth hearts, carnall reſpects are too weake to diſſever them, ſince that, which breakes off affection, muſt needs be ſtronger then that which conjoyneth it.

E Ionathan doth not deſire to ſmother his love by concealment, but profeſſes it in his cariage & actions: He puts off the Robe, that was upon him, & all his garments even to his Sword, & bow, & Girdle, and gives them unto his new friend: It was perhaps not without a myſtery, that Sauls cloths fitted not David, but Ionathans fitted him, & theſe he is as glad to weare, as he was to be diſburthened of the other: that there might be a perfect reſemblāce, their bodies are ſuted, as wel as their hearts: Now the beholders can ſay, there goes Ionathans other ſelfe; If there bee another body under thoſe cloths, there is the ſame ſoule. Now David hath caſt off his ruſſet coate, and his ſcrip, and is a Shepheard no more; he is ſuddenly become both a Courtier, and a Captaine, and a Companion to the Prince; yet himſelfe is not changed with his habit, with his condition: yea rather (as if his wiſedome had reſerved it ſelfe for his exaltation) he ſo manageth a ſudden Greatneſſe, as that he winneth all hearts: Honour

shewes the man, and if there be any blemishes of imperfection, they will bee seene in the man, that is inexpectedly lifted above his fellowes: He is out of the danger of folly, whom a speedy advancement leaveth wise.

Ionathan loved David, the Souldiers honoured him, the Court favoured him, the people applauded him, onely Saul stomackt him, and therefore hated him, because hee was so happy in all besides himselfe: It had beene a shame for all Israel, if they had not magnified their Champion: Sauls owne heart could not but tell him, that they did owe the glory of that day, and the safety of himselfe and Israel, unto the sling of David, who in one man slue all those thousands at a blow. It was enough for the puissant King of Israel, to follow the chase, and to kill them, whom David had put to flight; yet he, that could lend his clothes and his armour to this exploit, cannot abide to part with the honour of it to him, that had earned it so dearely: The holy Songs of David had not more quieted his spirit before, then now the thankfull Song of the Israelitish women vexed him: One little Dittie (of Saul hath slaine his thousand, and David his ten thousand) sung unto the Timbrels of Israel, fetcht againe that evill spirit, which Davids Musicke had expelled: Saul needed not the torment of a worse spirit, then Envie. Oh the unreasonableness of this wicked passion! The women gave Saul more, and David lesse, then he deserved: For Saul alone could not kill a thousand, and David in that one act of killing Goliah, slue in effect, all the Philistims that were slaine that day; and yet becaus they give more to David then to himselfe, he that should have endited, and begun that Song of thankfulnesse, repines and growes now as mad with envy, as he was before with griefe: Truth and Justice are no protection against Malice; Envie is blind to all objects, save other mens happinesse: If the eyes of men could bee contained within their owne bounds, and not rove forth into comparisons, there could be no place for this vicious affection; but when they have once taken this lawlesse scope to themselves, they lose the knowledge of home, and care onely to be employed abroad in their owne torment.

Never was Sauls brest so fit a lodging for the evill spirit, as now, that it is dresst up with envy: It is as impossible that Hell should bee free from Devills, as a malicious heart: Now doth the frantike King of Israel renew his old fits, and walkes, and talkes distractedly; He was mad with David, and who but David must be called to alay his madnesse? Such was Davids wisedome, hee could not but know the termes, wherein he stood with Saul; yet in lieu of the harsh and discordous notes of his masters envy, he returnes pleasing Musicke unto him: He can never bee good Courtier, nor good man, that hath not learned to repay, if not injuries with thankes, yet evill with good. Whiles there was a Harpe in Davids hand, there was a Speare in Sauls, wherewith he threatens death as the recompence of that sweet melodie: He said (I will smite David through to the wall.) It is well for the innocent, that wicked men cannot keep their owne counsell: God fetcheth their thoughts out of their mouthes, or their countenance for a seasonable prevention, which else might proceed to secret execution: It was time for David to withdraw himselfe, his obedience did not tye him to bee the marke of a furious master; he might ease Saul with his musicke, with his blood he might not: Twice therefore doth he avoid the Presence, not the Court, not the Service of Saul.

One would have thought rather, that David should have beene affraid of Saul becaus the Devil was so strong with him, then that Saul should be affraid of David, becaus the Lord was with him; yet we finde all the feare in Saul of David, none in David of Saul: Hatred and feare are ordinary companions: David had wisedome and faith to dispell his feares, Saul had nothing but infidelitie, and dejected, selfe-condemned, distempred thoughts, which must needs nourish them; yet Saul could not feare any hurt from David, whom he found so loyall and serviceable: He feares onely too much good unto David; and the envious feare is much more then the distrustfull: now Davids presence begins to be more displeasing, then his musicke was sweet; Despight it selfe had rather preferre him to a remote dignity, then endure him a neerer attendant: This promotion

A tion encreaſeth Davids honour and love; and this love and honour aggravates Sauls hatred and feare.

Sauls madneſſe hath not bereaved him of his craft: for perceiving how great David was growne in the reputation of Iſrael, he dares not offer any perſonall, or direct violence to him, but hires him into the jawes of a ſuppoſed death, by no leſſe price, then his eldeſt Daughter, (Behold mine eldeſt daughter Merab: her will I give thee to wife, onely be a valiant Sonne to mee, and fight the Lords Battels.) Could ever man ſpeake more graciouſly, more holily? What could bee more graciouſly offered by a King, then his eldeſt Daughter? What care could be more holy then of the Lords battels? yet never did Saul intend ſo much miſchiefe to David, or ſo much unfaithfulneſſe to God, as when he ſpake thus: There is never ſo much danger of the falſe-
B hearted, as when they make the faireſt weather: Sauls Speare bade David be gone, but his plauſible words invite him to danger. This honour was due to David before, upon the compact of his victory: yet he, that twice enquired into the reward of that enterprize, before he undertooke it, never demanded it after that archievement; neither had Saul the juſtice to offer it, as a recompence of ſo noble an exploit, but as a ſnare to an envied victory. Charitie ſuſpects not: David conſtrues that, as an effect and argument of his Maſters love, which was no other but a child of Envy, but a plot of miſchiefe; and though he knew his owne deſert, & the juſtice of his claime to Merab; yet hee in a ſincere humilitie diſparageth himſelfe, and his Parentage with a who am I?

As it was not the purpoſe of this modeſty in David to reject, but to ſollicit the
C proffered favour of Saul; ſo was it not in the power of this baſhfull humiliation to turne backe the edge of ſo keene an envy: It helpes not that David makes himſelfe meane, whiles others magnifie his worth: Whatſoever the colour was, Saul meant nothing to David but danger and death; and ſince all thoſe Battels will not effect that which hee deſired, himſelfe will not effect that which he promiſed: If he cannot kill David, he will diſgrace him; Davids honour, was Sauls diſeaſe. It was not likely therefore, that Saul would adde unto that honour, whereof he was ſo ſicke already: Merab is given to another; neither doe I heare David complaine of ſo manifeſt an injuſtice: He knew, that the God whoſe battels he fought, had provided a due reward of his patience: If Merab faile, God hath a Michal in ſtore for him, ſhe is in love with David; his comlineſſe and valour have ſo wonne her heart, that ſhee
D now emulates the affection of her Brother Ionathan: If ſhe be the yonger Siſter, yet ſhe is more affectionate: Saul is glad of the newes, his Daughter could never live to doe him better ſervice, then to be a new ſnare to his Adverſarie: Shee ſhall bee therfore ſacrificed to his envie, and her honeſt and ſincere love ſhall bee made a bait for her worthy and innocent Huſband. (I will give him her, that ſhee may be a ſnare unto him, that the hand of the Philiſtims may be againſt him:) The purpoſe of any favour is more then the value of it: Even the greateſt honours may be given with an intent of deſtruction. Many a man is raiſed up for a fall. So forward is Saul in the match, that hee ſends ſpokes-men to ſollicit David to that honour, which hee hopes will proove the high way to death: The dowry is ſet; An hundred fore-ſkins of the Philiſtims; not their heads, but their fore-ſkins, that this victorie might bee more ignominious;
E ſtill thinking, why may not one David miſcary, as well as hundred Philiſtims? And what doth Sauls envie all this while, but enhance Davids zeale, and valour, and glorie? That good Captaine ſittle imagining that himſelfe was the Philiſtim, whom Saul maligned, ſupererogates of his Maſter, and brings two hundred for one, and returnes home ſafe, and renowned, neither can Saul now fly for ſhame: There is no remedy but David muſt bee a ſonne, where he was a rivall; and Saul muſt feed upon his owne heart, ſince he cannot ſee Davids: Gods bleſſing graces equally together with mans malice, neither can they deviſe, which way to make us more happy, then by wiſhing us evill.

Michals wyle.

THis advantage can Saul yet make of Davids promotion; that as his Adversarie is raised higher, so hee is drawne nearer to the opportunity of death: Now hath his envie cast off all shame; since those craftie plots succeed not, hee directly subornes Murtherers of his rivall: There is none in all the Court that is not set on to be an Executioner: Ionathan himselfe is sollicited to imbrue his hand in the blood of his friend, of his Brother. Saul could not but see Ionathans cloathes on Davids backe; hee could not but know the league of their love; yet becausse he knew withall, how much the prosperitie of David would prejudice Ionathan, he hoped to have found him his son in malice: Those that have the Iaundis see all things yellow; those which are overgrowne with malicious passions, thinke all men like themselves.

I doe not heare of any reply that Ionathan made to his father when he gave him that bloody charge; but he waits for a fit time to dissuade him from so cruell an injustice: Wisedome had taught him to give way to rage, and in so hard an adventure to crave aid of opportunitie: If we be not carefull to observe good moodes when wee deale with the passionate, we may exasperate in stead of reforming: Thus did Ionathan, who knowing how much better it is to be a good friend, then an ill sonne, had not onely disclosed that ill counsell, but when he found his father in the fields in a calmer temper, laboured to divert it: And so farre doth the seasonable and pithy Oratory of Ionathan prevaile, that Saul is convinced of his wrong, and sweares, as God lives, David shall not die; Indeed how could it be otherwhise, upon the plea of Davids innocence, and well deservings? How could Saul say he should dye, whom hee could accuse of nothing but faithfulnesse? Why should he designe him to death, which had given life to all Israel? Oft-times wicked mens judgments are forced to yeeld unto that truth against which their affections maintaine a rebellion: Even the foulest hearts doe sometimes entertaine good motions; like as on the contrary, the holiest soules give way sometimes to the suggestions of evill: The flashes of lightning may be discerned in the darkest Prisons. But if good thoughts looke into a wicked heart, they stay not there as those that like not their lodging, they are soone gone; Hardly any thing distinguishes betwixt good & evill, but continuance: The light that shines into an holy heart is constant, like that of the Sunne, which keepes due times, and varies not his course for any of these sublunary occasions.

The Philistims Warres renue Davids victory, and Davids victory renues Sauls envy, and Sauls envy renues the plots of Davids death: Vowes and Oaths are forgotten: That evill spirit which vexes Saul hath found so much favour with him, as to winne him to these bloody machinations against an innocent; His owne hands shall first be employed in this execution; The speare, which had twice before threatned death to David, shall now once againe goe upon that message: Wise David that knew the danger of an hollow friend, and reconciled enemy, and that found more cause to minde Sauls earnest, then his owne play, gives way by his nimblenesse, to that deadly weapon, and resigning that strooke unto the wall, flies for his life. No man knowes how to be sure of an unconscionable man; If either goodnesse, or merit, or affinitie, or reasons, or oaths could secure a man, David had beene safe; now if his heeles doe not more befriend him then all these, hee is a dead man. No sooner is hee gone then the messengers are sped after him: It hath bin seldome seene that wickednesse wanted Executioners; Davids house is beset with Murderers, which watch at all his doores, for the opportunitie of blood: Who can but wonder to see how God hath fetcht from the loynes of Saul a remedy for the malice of Sauls heart? His owne children are the onely meanes to crosse him in the sinne, and to preserve his guiltlesse Adversarie; Michal hath more then notice of the plot, and with her subtill wit countermines her father, for the rescue of an Husband : She taking the benefit of the night lets David downe through a window; Hee is gone, and disappoints the ambushes of Saul. The messengers begin to bee impatient in this delay, and now thinke it time to inquire after their Prisoner; She whiles thē off, with the excuse of Davids sicknes, (so as now her Husband had good leisure for his escape) and layes a Statue in his bed; Saul likes the newes of any evill befalne to David, but fearing he is not sicke enough, sends to aide his disease: The messengers returne, and rushing into the house with their swords drawne, after some harsh words to their imagined charge, surprize a sicke Statue lying with a Pillow under his head; and now blush to see they have spent all their threats upon a senseless stocke; and made themselves ridiculous, whiles they would be serviceable.

But how shall Michal answer this mockage unto her furious father? Hitherto she hath done like Davids wife; now she begins to be Sauls Daughter; (He said to mee, Let me goe, or else I will kill thee.) She whose wit had delivered her Husband from the Sword of her Father, now turnes the edge of her Fathers wrath from her selfe to her Husband. His absence made her presume of his safety: If Michal had not bin of Sauls plot, he had never expostulated with her in those termes, Why hast thou let mine enemy escape? neither had she framed that answer, He said, Let me goe. I doe not find any great store of religion in Michal, for both she had an Image in the house, and afterward mocked David for his devotion: yet Nature hath taught her to prefer a Husband to a Father; to elude a Father from whom she could not fly, to save an husband, which durst not but fly from her: The bonds of matrimonial love are, and should bee stronger then those of nature; Those respects are mutuall which God appointed in the first institution of Wedlocke; That Husband and Wife should leave Father and Mother for each others sake. Treason is ever odious; but so much more in the Mariage-bed, by how much the obligations are deeper.

As she loved her Husband better then her Father, so she loved her selfe better then her husband; she saved her husband by a wyle, and now shee saves her selfe by a lye; and loses halfe the thanke of her deliverance, by an officious slander: Her act was good, but she wants courage to maintaine it; and therefore seekes to the weake shelter of untruth: Those that doe good offices, not out of conscience, but good nature or civilitie, if they meet an affront of danger, seldome come off cleanly, but are ready to catch at all excuses, though base, though injurious; becaus̄e their grounds are not strong enough to beare them out in suffering for that, which they have well done.

Whither doth David fly, but to the Sanctuary of Samuel? He doth not (though he knew himselfe gracious with the Souldiers) raise forces, or take some strong Fort, and there stand upon his owne defence; and at defiance with his King: but he gets him to the Colledge of the Prophets, as a man that would seeke the peaceable protection of the King of Heaven against the unjust fury of a King on earth: Onely the wing of God shall hide him from that violence.

God intended to make David not a Warriour, and a King onely, but a Prophet too; As the field fitted him for the first, and the Court for the second, so Najoth shall fit him for the third. Doubtlesse (such was Davids delight in holy meditations) he never spent his time so contentedly, as when hee was retired to that divine Academie, and so full freedome to enjoy God, and to satiate himselfe with heavenly exercises: The onely doubt is how Samuel can give harbour to a man fled from the anger of his Prince; wherein, the very persons of both give abundant satisfaction: for both Samuel knew the counsell of God, and durst doe nothing without it; and David was by Samuel anointed from God: This Unction was a mutuall Bond: Good reason had David to sue to him, which had powred the Oyle on his head, for the hiding of that head which he had anointed; and good reason had Samuel to hide him, whom God by his meanes had chosen; from him whom God had by his sentence rejected; besides, that the cause deserved commiseration: Here was not a Malefactor running away from Justice, but an innocent avoyding Murder: not a Traitor countenanced againſt his Soveraigne, but the Deliverer of Iſrael harboured in a Sanctuarie of Prophets till his peace might be made.

Even thither doth Saul ſend to apprehend David: All his rage did not incenſe him againſt Samuel as the Abettor of his Adverſarie; Such an impreſſion of reverence had the perſon, and calling of the Prophet left in the minde of Saul, that hee cannot thinke of lifting up his hand againſt him: The ſame God which did at the firſt put an awe of man in the fierceſt creatures, hath ſtamped in the cruelleſt hearts a reverent reſpect to his owne image in his Miniſters; ſo as even they that hate them, doe yet honour them.

Sauls meſſengers came to lay hold on David, God layes hold on them: No ſooner doe they ſee a company of Prophets buſie in thoſe divine Exerciſes, under the moderation of Samuel, then they are turned from Executioners to Prophets. It is good going up to Najoth, into the holy Aſſemblies; who knowes how we may be changed beſide our intention? Many one hath come into Gods Houſe to carpe, or ſcoffe, or ſleepe, or gaze, that hath returned a Convert.

The ſame heart that was thus diſquieted with Davids happy ſucceſſe, is now vexed with the holineſſe of his other Servants. It angers him that Gods Spirit could finde no other time to ſeize upon his Agents, than when he had ſent them to kill: And now out of an indignation at this diſappointment, himſelfe will goe and be his owne Servant; His guilty ſoule findes it ſelfe out of the danger of being thus ſurprized; And behold Saul is no ſooner come within the ſmell of the ſmoake of Najoth, then hee alſo propheſies; The ſame Spirit that, when he went firſt from Samuel, inabled him to propheſie, returnes in the ſame effect now that hee was going (his laſt) unto Samuel: This was ſuch a grace as might well ſtand with rejection; an extraordinary gift of the ſpirit, but not ſanctifying: Many men have had their mouthes opened to propheſie unto others, whoſe hearts have beene deafe to God; But this (ſuch as it was) was farre from Sauls purpoſe, who in ſtead of expoſtulating with Samuel, falls downe before him; and laying aſide his weapons, and his Robes, of a Tyrant proves (for the time) a Diſciple: All hearts are in the hand of their Maker; how eaſie is it for him that gave them their being, to frame them to his owne bent? Who can bee affraid of malice, that knowes what hookes God hath in the noſtrils of men and Devils? What charmes hee hath for the moſt Serpentine hearts?

David and Ahimelech.

WHo can ever judge of the Children by the Parents, that knowes Ionathan was the ſon of Saul? There was never a falſer heart then Sauls; there was never a truer friend then Ionathan; Neither the hope of a Kingdome, nor the frownes of a Father, nor the feare of death can remove him from his vowed amity: No ſonne could be more officious, and dutifull to a good father; yet he layes downe nature at the foot of grace; and for the preſervation of his innocent Rivall for the Kingdome, croſſes the bloody deſignes of his owne Parent: David needs no other Counſellor, no other Advocate, no other Intelligencer then he: It is not in the power of Sauls unnaturall reproaches, or of his Speare, to make Ionathan any other then a friend, and patron of innocence: Even after all theſe difficulties, doth Ionathan ſhoot beyond David, that Saul may ſhoot ſhort of him, in vaine are thoſe profeſſions of love, which are not anſwered with action; He is no true friend that (beſides talke) is not ready both to doe and ſuffer.

Saul is no whit the better for his propheſying; he no ſooner riſes up from before Samuel, then he purſues David. Wicked men are rather the worſe for thoſe tranſitory good motions they have received. If the ſwine be never ſo cleane waſhed, ſhee will

wallow

A wallow againe: That we have good thoughts, it is no thanke to us; that we answer them not, it is both our sinne and judgement.

David hath learned not to trust these fits of devotion, but flyes from Samuel to Ionathan, from Ionathan to Ahimelech; when he was hunted from the Prophet, he flyes to the Priest, as one that knew justice and compassion should dwell in those breasts which are consecrated unto God.

The Arke and the Tabernacle were then separated; The Ark was at Kiriathjearim the Tabernacle at Nob; God was present with both: Whither should David flye for succour but to the House of that God, which had anointed him?

Ahimelech was wont to see David attended with the troupes of Israel, or with the Gallants of the Court; it seemes strange therefore to him, to see so great a Peere and
B Champion of Israel come alone; These are the alterations to which earthly Greatnesse is subject; Not many dayes are past, since no man was honoured at Court but Ionathan and David; now they are both for the time in disgrace; Now dare not the Kings Sonne in Law, Brother to the Prince both in Love and Mariage, shew his head at the Court; nor any of those that bowed to him, dare stir a foot with him; Princes are as the Sunne, and great Subjects are like to Dials, if the Sun shine not on the Dial no man will looke at it.

Even he that overcame the Beare, the Lyon, the Gyant, is overcome with feare: He that had cut off two hundred fore-skins of the Philistims, had not circumcised his owne heart of the weake passions that follow Distrust; Now that he is hard driven, he practises to helpe himselfe with an unwarrantable shift: Who can looke to passe
C this Pilgrimage without infirmities when David dissembleth to Ahimelech? A weake mans rules may be better than the best mans actions; God lets us see some blemishes in his holiest Servants, that wee may bee neither too highly conceited of flesh and blood, nor too much dejected when we have beene miscarryed into sinne. Hitherto hath David gone upright, now he begins to halt with the Priest of God; and under pretence of Sauls imployment, drawes that favour from Ahimelech, which shall afterwards cost him his head.

What could Ahimelech have thought too deare for Gods Anointed, for Gods Champion? It is not like but that if David had sincerely opened himselfe to the Priest as he hath done to the Prophet, Ahimelech would have seconded Samuel in some secret and safe succour of so unjust a distresse, wheras he is now by a false colour
D led to that kindnesse which shall be prejudiciall to his life: Extremities of evill are commonly inconsiderate; either for that we have not leisure to our thoughts, or perhaps (so as we may be perplexed) not thoughts to our leisure: What would David have given afterwards to have redeemed this over-sight?

Under this pretence he craves a double favour of Ahimelech; The one of bread for his sustenance, the other of a Sword for his defence: There was no bread under the hands of the Priest but that which was consecrated to God; and whereof none might taste but the devoted Servants of the Altar; Even that which was with solemn dedication set upon the holy Table before the face of God; a Sacramentall Bread presented to God with Incense, figuring that true Bread that came downe frō Heaven; yet even this Bread might in case of necessity become common, and be given
E by Ahimelech, and received by David and his followers: Our Saviour himself justifies the act of both; Ceremonies must give place to substance; God will have Mercy and not Sacrifice; Charity is the summe and the end of the Law; That must be aimed at in all our actions; wherein it may fall out, that the way to keepe the Law may bee to breake it; the intention may be kept, and the Letter violated; and it may be a dangerous transgression of the Law to observe the words, and neglect the scope of God; That which would have dispensed with David for the substance of the act, would have much more dispensed with him for the circumstance; The touch of their lawfull Wives had contracted a legall impurity, not a morall; That could have beene no sufficient reason why in an urgent necessity they might not have partaked of the holy Bread: Ahimelech was no perfect Casuist; these men might not famish, if they were ceremonially impure. But this question bewrayed the care of Ahimelech in diſtributing the holy Bread; There might be in theſe men a double incapacity, the one as they were Seculars, the other, as uncleane; he ſaw the one muſt be, he feared leſt the other ſhould be; as one that wiſhed as little indiſpoſition (as poſſible might be) in thoſe which ſhould be fed from Gods Table. A

It is ſtrange that David ſhould come to the Prieſt of God for a Sword; Who in all Iſrael was ſo unlikely to furniſh him with weapons, as a man of Peace, whoſe armour was onely ſpirituall? Doubtleſſe David knew well where Goliahs Sword lay; as the noble relique of Gods victorious deliverance, dedicated to the ſame God, which won it; at this did that ſuit ayme? None could be ſo fit for David, none could be ſo fit for it as David: Who could have ſo much right to that Sword, as he againſt whom it was drawne, and by whom it was taken? There was more in that Sword, than Metall, & form; David could never caſt his eye upon it, but he ſaw an undoubted monument of the mercifull protection of the Almighty; there was therefore more ſtrength in that Sword, than ſharpneſſe; neither was Davids arme ſo much ſtrengthened by it as his faith; nothing can overcome him, whiles hee caries with him that aſſured ſigne of victory: It is good to take all occaſions of renuing the remembrance of Gods mercies to us, and our obligations to him. B

Doeg the Maſter of Sauls Herdmen (for he that went to ſeek his Fathers Aſſes before he was King, hath herds and droves now that he is a King) was now in the Court of the Tabernacle, upon ſome occaſion of devotion; Though an Iſraelite in profeſſion, he was an Edomite no leſſe in heart than in blood; yet hee hath ſome vow upon him, and not onely comes up to Gods Houſe, but abides before the Lord: Hypocrites have equall acceſſe to the publike places, and meanes of Gods ſervice: Even he that knowes the heart, yet ſhuts his doores upon none, how much leſſe ſhould we dare to exclude any, which can onely judge of the heart by the face. C

Doeg may ſet his foot as far within the Tabernacle, as David; he ſees the paſſages betwixt him, and Ahimelech, and layes them up for an advantage; Whiles hee ſhould have edified himſelfe by thoſe holy ſervices, he carpes at the Prieſt of God, and (after a lewd miſ-interpretation of his actions) of an attendant, proves an accuſer; To incur favour with an unjuſt Maſter, he informes againſt innocent Ahimelech; & makes that his act which was drawne from him by a cunning circumvention: When we ſee our Auditors before us, little do we know with what hearts they are there; nor, what uſe they will make of their pretended devotion: If many come in ſimplicitie of heart to ſerve their God, ſome others may perhaps come to obſerve their Teachers, and to picke quarrels where none are; Onely God and the iſſue can diſtinguiſh betwixt a David, and a Doeg, when they are both in the Tabernacle. Honeſt Ahimelech could little ſuſpect that he now offered a Sacrifice for his Executioner; yea, for the Murtherer of all his Family: Oh the wiſe and deepe judgements of the Almighty! God owed a revenge to the Houſe of Eli, and now by the delation of Doeg, he takes occaſion to pay it: It was juſt in God, which in Doeg was moſt unjuſt: Sauls cruelty and the treachery of Doeg doe not loſe one dram of their guilt by the Counſell of God; neither doth the holy Counſell of God gather any blemiſh by their wickedneſſe; If it had pleaſed God to inflict death upon them ſooner without any pretence of occaſion, his Juſtice had beene cleere from all imputations; now if Saul and Doeg bee inſtead of a peſtilence or fever, who can cavill? The judgements of God are not open, but are alwayes juſt; He knowes how by one mans ſinne to puniſh the ſinne of another, and by both their ſinnes and puniſhments to glorifie himſelfe. If his word ſleepe, it ſhall not die; but after long intermiſſions breakes forth in thoſe effects which we had forgotten to looke for, and ceaſed to feare. O Lord, thou art ſure when thou threatneſt, and juſt when thou iudgeſt; Keep thou us from the ſentence of death, elſe in vaine ſhall we labour to keepe our ſelves from the execution. D E

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE AND MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD,

PHILIP

EARLE OF MONGOMERY, ONE OF THE GENTLEMEN OF HIS MAIESTIES Bed-chamber, and Knight of the moſt Honourable Order of the GARTER.

Right Honourable,

After ſome unpleaſing intermiſſions, I returne to that taske of Contemplation, wherein onely my Soule findeth reſt. If in other imployments I have indeavoured to ſerve God and his Church, yet in none (I muſt confeſſe) with equall contentment. Mee thinkes Controverſie is not right in my way to heaven; however the importunitie of an Adverſary may force me to fetch it in: If Truth oppreſſed by an erroneous Teacher cry (like a raviſht Virgin) for my aid, I betray it, if I releeve it not; when I have done, I returne gladly to theſe paths of Peace. The favour which my late Polemicall labour hath found (beyond merit) from the Learned, cannot divert my love to

thoſe

those wrangling Studies. How earnestly doth my heart rather wish an universall cessation of these Armes; that all the Professors of the deare Name of Christ might bee taken up with nothing but holy and peaceable thoughts of Devotion; the sweetnesse whereof hath so farre affected mee, that (if I might doe it without danger of mis-construction) I could beg even of an Enemie this leave to be happy. I have already given account to the World, of some expences of my houres this way, and here I bring more; which if some Reader may censure as poore, none can censure as unprofitable. I am bold to write them under your Honourable Name, whereto I am deepely obliged; that I may leave behind mee this meane, but faithfull Testimony, of mine humble thankfulnesse to your Lordship, and your most honoured and vertuous Ladie. The noble respects I have had from you both, deserve my Prayers, and best services, which shall never be wanting to you and yours.

From your Honours sincerely devoted in all true dutie

JOS: HALL.

Contemplations.

SAUL in DAVIDS Cave.

IT was the ſtrange lot of David, that thoſe whom he purſued, preſerved him from thoſe whom he had preſerved; The Philiſtims whom David had newly ſmitten in Keilah, call off Saul from ſmiting David in the Wilderneſſe, when there was but an hillocke betwixt him and death: Wicked purpoſes are eaſily checked, not eaſily brokē off. Sauls Sword is ſcarce dry from the blood of the Philiſtims, when it thirſts anew for the blood of David; and now in a renewed chaſe, hunts him dry-foot through every wilderneſſe: The very deſart is too faire a refuge for innocence; The hils and rockes are ſearched in an angry jealouſie; the very wilde Goats of the mountains were not allowed to be companions for him, which had no fault but his vertue. Oh the ſeemingly-unequall diſtribution of theſe earthly things! Cruelty and oppreſſion raignes in a Palace, whiles goodnes lurkes among the Rocks and Caves, and thinkes it happineſſe enough to ſteale a life.

Like a dead man, David is faine to be hid under the earth, and ſeekes the comfort of protection in darkneſſe: and now the wiſe providence of God leads Saul to his enemy without blood; He which before brought them within an hils diſtance without interview, brings them now both within one roofe; ſo as that whiles Saul ſeeks David and finds him not, he is found of David unſought. If Saul had knowne his owne opportunities, how David and his men had interred themſelves, he had ſaved a treble labour, of chaſe, of execution, and buriall; for had he but ſtopt the mouth of that Cave, his enemies had laid themſelves downe in their owne Graves: The Wiſdome of God thinkes fit to hide from evill men, and ſpirits, thoſe meanes and ſeaſons, which might be (if they had been taken) moſt prejudiciall to his owne: wee had been oft foiled if Satan could but have knowne our hearts: ſometimes we lie open to evils, and happy it is for us that he onely knowes it, which pitties in ſtead of tempting us.

It is not long ſince Saul ſaid of David (lodged then in Keilah) God hath delivered him into mine hands, for he is ſhut in, ſeeing he is come into a citie that hath gates, and bars; but now contrarily God delivers Saul (ere he was aware) into the hands of David, and without the helpe of gates and bars, hath incloſed him within the Valley of of death: How just is it with God, that those who seeke mischiefe to others, finde it to themselves; and even whiles they are spreading nets are ensnared; Their deliberate plotting of evill, is surprized with a sudden judgement.

How amazedly must David needs looke, when he saw Saul enter into the Cave, where himselfe was? what is this (thinks he) which God hath done? Is this presence purposed, or casuall; is Saul here to pursue, or to tept me? Where suddenly the action bewrayes the intent, & tels David that Saul sought secrecy and not him. The superfluity of his maliciousnesse brought him into the Wildernes, the necessity of nature led him into the Cave: Even those actions wherein wee place shame, are not exempted from a providence. The fingers of Davids followers itched to seaze upon their Masters enemy; & that they might not seem led so much by faction, as by faith, they urge David with a promise from God; The day is come whereof the Lord said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, & thou shalt doe to him, as it shall seem good to thee. This argument seemed to carry such command with it, as that David not only may, but must embrew his hands in blood, unlesse hee will bee found wanting to God & himselfe; Those temptations are most powerfull, which fetch their force from the pretence of a religious obedience: Whereas those which are raised from arbitrary and private respects, admit of an easie dispensation.

If there were such a prediction, one clause of it was ambiguous; and they take it at the worst. Thou shalt doe to him as shall seeme good to thee: That might not seeme good to him, which seemed evill to God. There is nothing more dangerous than to make construction of Gods purposes out of eventuall appearances. If carnall probabilities might be the rule of our judgement, what could God seeme to intend other then Sauls death in offering him naked into the hands of those whom he unjustly persecuted? how could Davids soldiers thinke that God had sent Saul thither on any other errand, then to fetch his bane? & if Saul could have seen his owne danger, he had given himselfe for dead; for his heart guilty to his owne bloody desires, could not but have expected the same measure w^ch^ it meant: But wise & holy David not transported either with misconceit of the event, or fury of passion, or solicitatiō of his followers, dares make no other use of this accident then the tryall of his loyalty, and the inducement of his peace; It had beene as easie for him to cut the throat of Saul as his garment; but now his coat only shall be the worse, not his person; neither doth he in this maiming of a cloake seek his owne revenge, but a monument of his innocence. Before Saul rent Samuels garment, now David cutteth Sauls; both were significant; The rending of the one, signified the Kingdome torne out of those unworthy hands; the cutting of the other, that the life of Saul might have been as easily cut off.

Saul needs no other Monitor of his owne danger, then what hee weares. The garment of Saul was laid aside, while he went to cover his feet; so as the cut of the garment did not threaten any touch of the body; yet even the violence offered to a remote garment strikes the heart of David, which finds a present remorse for harmfully touching that which did once touch the person of his Master: Tender consciences are moved to regret at those actions, which strong hearts passe over with a careless ease. It troubled not Saul to seek after the blood of a righteous servāt; there is no lesse differences of consciences than stomacks; some stomacks will digest the hardest meats, & turn over substances, not in their nature edible, whiles others surfet of the lightest food, & complaine even of dainties: Every gracious heart is in some measure scrupulous, & finds more safety in feare, than in presumption: And if it be so strait as to curb it self in from the liberty which it might take in things which are not unlawful, how much lesse wil it dare to take scope unto evill? By how much that state is better, where nothing is allowed, then where all things; by so much is the strict and timorous conscience better than the lawlesse. There is good likelihood of that man which is any way scrupulous of his wayes; but he which makes no bones of his actions, is apparently hopelesse.

Since Davids followers pleaded Gods testimony to him as a motive to blood, David appeales the same God for his preservation from blood: The Lord keep me from

A from doing that thing to my Maſter the Lords Anointed; and nów the good man hath worke enough to defend both himſelfe and his perſecuter; himſelfe, from the importunate neceſſity of doing violence, and his Maſter from ſuffering it. It was not more eaſie to rule his owne hands, than difficult to rule a multitude; Davids troope conſiſted of Male contents, all that were in diſtreſſe, in debt, in bitterneſſe of ſoule, were gathered to him: Many if never ſo well ordered are hard to command; a few if diſorderly, more hard; many and diſorderly, muſt needs be ſo much the hardeſt of all, that David never atchieved any victory like unto this, wherein he firſt overcame himſelfe, then his ſoldiers.

And what was the charme, wherewith David allayed thoſe raging ſpirits of his followers? No other but this; He is the Anointed of the Lord. That holy Oyle was
B the Antidote for his blood; Saul did not lend David ſo impearceable an Armour, when he ſhould encounter Goliah, as David now lent him in this plea of his unction. Which of all the diſcontented Out-lawes that lurked in that Cave, durſt put forth his hand againſt Saul, when they once heard, He is the Lords anointed? Such an impreſſion of awe hath the Divine Providence cauſed his Image to make in the hearts of men, as that it makes Traitors cowards; ſo as inſtead of ſtriking, they tremble; How much more lawleſſe than the Out-lawes of Iſrael, are thoſe profeſſed Ring-leaders of Chriſtianity; which teach and practiſe, and incourage, and reward, and canonize the violation of Majeſty? It is not enough for thoſe who are commanders of others to refraine their owne hands from doing evill, but they muſt carefully
C prevent the iniquity of their heeles, elſe they ſhall be juſtly reputed to doe that by others, which in their owne perſons they avoided; The lawes both of God and man preſuppoſe us in ſome ſort anſwerable for our charge: as taking it for granted, that we ſhould not undertake thoſe reynes, which we cannot mannage.

There was no reaſon David ſhould loſe the thankes of ſo noble a demonſtration of his loyalty; whereto he truſts ſo much, that he dares call back the man by whom he was purſued; and make him judge whether that fact had not deſerved a life. As his act, ſo his word and geſture imported nothing but humble obedience, neither was there more meekneſſe than force in that ſeaſonable perſwaſion. Wherein he lets Saul ſee the error of his credulity, the unjuſt ſlanders of malicioufneſſe, the opportunity of his revenge, the proofe of his forbearance, the undeniable evidence of his innocence; and after a lowly diſparagement of himſelfe, appeales to God for judge-
D ment, for protection.

So lively and feeling Oratory did Saul find in the lap of his garment, and the lips of David, that it is not in the power of his envy, or ill nature to hold out any longer: Is this thy voice my ſon David, and Saul lift up his voice and wept, and ſaid; Thou art more righteous than I. He, whoſe Harp was wont to quiet the frenzy of Saul, hath now by his words calmed his fury; ſo that now he ſheds teares inſtead of blood; and confeſſes his owne wrong & Davids integrity; And (as if he were new againe entred into the bounds of Najoth in Ramath) he prayes, and propheſies good to him, whō he maliced for good; The Lord render thee good for that thou haſt done to mee this day, for now behold, I know that thou ſhalt be King.

There is no heart made of fleſh, that ſometime or other relents not; even flint and
E marble, will in ſome weather ſtand on drops. I cannot thinke theſe teares and proteſtations fained. Doubtleſſe Saul meant as he ſaid, and paſſed through ſenſible fits of good and evill: Let no man thinke himſelfe the better for good motions; the praiſe and benefit of thoſe guſts is not in the receit, but the retention.

Who, that had ſeene this meeting, could but have thought that all had beene ſure on Davids ſide? What can ſecure us if not Teares, and Prayers, and Oathes? Doubtleſſe Davids men which knew themſelves obnoxious to Lawes & Creditors, beganne to thinke of ſome new refuge, as making account this new peeced league would be everlaſting, they looked when Saul would take David home to the Court, and diſſolve his Army, and recompence that unjuſt perſecution with juſt honour; when behold in the looſe, Saul goes home, but David and his men goe up unto the hold. Wiſe David knowes Saul not to be more kinde, than untruſty; & therefore had rather ſeek ſafety in his hold, than in the hold of a hollow and unſteddy friendſhip. Here are good words, but no ſecurity, which therefore an experienced man gives the hearing, but ſtands the while upon his owne guard. No Charity bindes us to a truſt of thoſe, whom we have found faithleſſe; Credulity upon weak grounds after palpable diſappointments, is the Daughter of Folly: A man that is Weather-wiſe, though he find an abatement of the ſtorme, yet will not ſtirre from under his ſhelter whiles he ſees it thicke in the winde. Diſtruſt is the juſt gaine of unfaithfulneſſe.

Nabal and Abigail.

If innocency could have ſecured from Sauls malice, David had not been perſecuted; and yet under that wicked King, aged Samuel dyes in his bed. That there might be no place for Envy, the good Prophet had retired himſelf to the Schools. Yet he that hated David, for what he ſhould be, did no leſſe hate Samuel for what he had been. Even in the midſt of Sauls malignity, there remained in his heart impreſſions of awfulneſſe unto Samuel: he feared, where hee loved not. The reſtraint of God curbeth the rage of his moſt violent enemies ſo as they cannot doe their worſt. As good huſbands doe not put all their Corne to the Oven, but ſave ſome for ſeed, ſo doth God ever in the worſt of perſecutions.

Samuel is dead, David baniſhed, Saul tyrannizeth, Iſrael hath good cauſe to mourn; it is no marvell if this lamentation be univerſall. There is no Iſraelite that feeleth not the loſſe of a Samuel. A good Prophet is the common Treaſure, wherein every gracious ſoule hath a ſhare. That man hath a dry heart, which can part with Gods Prophet without teares.

Nabal was according to his name, fooliſh; yet rich and mighty. Earthly poſſeſſions are not alwayes accompanied with wit and grace. Even the Line of faithfull Caleb will afford an ill-conditioned Nabal. Vertue is not like unto Lands, inheritable. All that is traduced with the ſeed, is either evil, or not good. Let no man brag with the Jews that he hath Abram to his father; God hath raiſed up of this ſtone a ſon to Caleb.

Abigail (which ſignifieth her fathers joy) had ſorrow enough to be matched with ſo unworthy an huſband; If her father had meant ſhe ſhould have had joy in her ſelf, or in her life, he had not diſpoſed her to an huſband (though rich yet) fond and wicked; It is like he maried her to the wealth, not to the man. Many a child is caſt away upō riches. Wealth in our matches ſhould be as ſome grains or ſcruples in the ballāce ſuperadded to the gold of vertuous qualities, to weigh downe the ſcales: when it is made the ſubſtance of the weight, and good qualities the appendance, there is but one earth poyſed with another; which, whereſoever it is done, it is a wonder, if either the children prove not the Parents ſorrow, or the Parents, theirs.

Nabals ſheep-ſhearing was famous; Three thouſand fleeces muſt needs require many hands; neither is any thing more plentifull commonly than a Churles Feaſt: What a world was this, that the noble Champion and Reſcuer of Iſrael, Gods Anointed, is driven to ſend to a baſe Carle for victuals? It is no meaſuring of men by the depth of the purſe, by outward proſperity. Servants are oftentimes ſet on horſe-back, whiles Princes goe on foot. Our eſtimation muſt be led by their inward worth, which is not alterable by time, nor diminiſhed with externall conditions.

One ragge of a David is more worth, than the Ward-robes of a thouſand Nabals. Even the beſt deſervings may want. No man may be contemned for his neceſſity; perhaps he may be ſo much richer in grace, as he is poorer in eſtate, neither hath violence or caſualty more impoveriſhed a David, than his poverty hath enriched him. He, whoſe folly hath made himſelfe miſerable, is juſtly rewarded with neglect; but he that ſuffers for good, deſerves ſo much more honour from others, as his diſtreſſe is more. Our compaſſion or reſpect muſt be ruled, according to the cauſe of anothers miſery.

One

A One good turne requires another; in ſome caſes not hurting is meritorious: Hee that ſhould examine the qualities of Davids followers, muſt needs grant it worthy of a fee, that Nabals flockes lay untouched in Carmell; but more, that Davids Souldiers were Nabals Shepheards, yea the keepers of his Shepheards, gave them a juſt intereſt in that Sheep-ſhearing Feaſt, juſtly ſhould they have beene ſet at the upper end of the Table. That Nabals Sheepe were ſafe, hee might thanke his Shepheards; that his Shepheards were ſafe, he might thanke Davids Souldiers: It is no ſmall benefit that wee receive in a ſafe protection; well may wee thinke our ſubſtance due, where we owe our ſelves. Yet this churliſh Nabal doth not onely give nothing to Davids Meſſengers, but which is worſe then nothing, ill words; Who is David, or who is the ſonne of Iſhai? There bee many ſervants now
B adayes that breake away from their Maſters. David aſked him bread, hee giveth him ſtones. All Iſrael knew and honoured their Deliverer: yet this Clowne, to ſave his victuals, will needs make him a man, either of no merits or ill, either an obſcure man or a fugitive. Nothing is more cheape then good words; theſe Nabal might have given, and beene never the poorer: If he had beene reſoved to ſhut his hands in a feare of Sauls revenge, he might have ſo tempered his deniall, that the repulſe might have bin free from offence: But now his foule-mouth doth not onely deny, but revile. It ſhould have bin Nabals glory, that his Tribe yeelded ſuch a Succeſſor to the Throne of Iſrael; now in all likelihood, his envy ſtirs him up to diſgrace that man, who ſurpaſſed him in honour and vertue, more then he was ſurpaſſed by him in wealth and eaſe; Many a one ſpeaks faire, that meanes ill, but when the
C mouth ſpeakes foule, it argues a corrupt heart; If with Saint Iames his verball benefactors, we ſay onely, Depart in peace, warme your ſelves, fill your bellies, we ſhall anſwer for hypocriticall uncharitableneſſe; but if we rate and curſe thoſe needy ſoules, whom we ought to relieve, we ſhall give a more fearefull account of a ſavage cruelty in trampling on thoſe whom God hath humbled. If healing with good words be juſtly puniſhable, what torment is there for thoſe that wound with evill.

David, which had all this while beene in the Schoole of patience, hath now his leſſon to ſeeke: He, who hath happily digeſted all the railing and perſecutions of a wicked Maſter, cannot put off this affront of a Nabal; Nothing can aſſwage his choler, but blood: How ſubject are the beſt of Gods Saints to weake paſſions, and if
D we have the grace to ward an expected blow of temptation, how eaſily are we ſurprized with a ſudden foile!

Wherefore ſerve theſe recorded weakeneſſes of holy men, but to ſtrengthen us againſt the conſcience of our infirmities: Not that we ſhould take courage to imitate them in the evill, whereunto they have beene miſcaried; But we ſhould take heart to our ſelves, againſt the diſcouragement of our owne evils.

The wiſedome of God hath ſo contrived it, that commonly (in Societies) good is mixed with evill, wicked Nabal hath in his houſe a wiſe and good Servant, a prudent and worthy Wife; That wiſe ſervant is carefull to advertiſe his Miſtreſſe of the danger; his prudent Miſtreſſe is carefull to prevent it.

The lives of all his family were now in hazard: ſhee dares not commit this
E buſineſſe to the fidelity of a meſſenger, but forgetting her ſexe, puts her ſelfe into the errand; Her foot is not ſlow, her hand is not empty; According to the offence ſhee frames her ſatisfaction; Her Huſband refuſed to give, ſhee brings a bountifull gift; Her Huſband gave ill words, ſhee ſweetens them with a meeke and humble deprecation; Her Huſband could ſay, Who is David, ſhee fals at his feet; her Huſband diſmiſſes Davids men empty, ſhee brings her Servants laden with proviſion; as if it had beene onely meant to eaſe the repelled Meſſengers of the cariage not to ſcant them of the required benevolence; No wit, no art could deviſe a more pithy and powerfull Oratory: As all ſatisfaction, ſo hers begins with a confeſſion; wherein ſhee deeply blameth the folly of her Huſband: She could not have beene a good Wife, if ſhe had not honoured her unworthy head; If a ſtranger ſhould have termed him foole in her hearing, he could not have gone away in peace: Now to ſave his life, ſhee is bold to acknowledge his folly : It is a good diſparagement that preſerveth. There is the ſame way to our peace in Heaven ; the onely meanes to eſcape judgement, is to complaine of our owne vilenes; ſhee pleadeth her ignorance of the fact, and therein, her freedome from the offence : ſhee humbly craveth acceptation of her preſent, with pardon of the fault ; ſhee profeſſeth Davids honourable acts and merits ; ſhe foretels his future ſucceſſe and glory; ſhe layes before him the happy peace of his ſoule, in refraining from innocent blood. Davids breſt which could not, through the ſeeds of grace, grow to a ſtubborneſſe in ill reſolutions, cannot but relent with theſe powerfull and ſeaſonable perſwaſions; and now in ſtead of revenge, hee bleſſeth God for ſending Abigail to meet him ; hee bleſſeth Abigail for her counſell, hee bleſſeth the counſell for ſo wholſome efficacy, & now rejoyceth more in being overcome with a wiſe and gracious advice, than he would have rejoyced in a revengefull victory. A

A good heart is eaſily ſtayed from ſinning, and is glad when it findes occaſion to bee croſſed in ill purpoſes ; Thoſe ſecret checkes which are raiſed within it ſelfe, doe readily conſpire with all outward retentives; It never yeelded to a wicked motion, without much reluctation, and when it is overcome, it is but with halfe a conſent; whereas perverſe and obdurate Sinners, by reaſon they take full delight in evill, and have already in their conceit ſwallowed the pleaſure of ſinne, abide not to bee reſiſted, running on headdily, in thoſe wicked courſes they have propounded in ſpight of oppoſition ; and if they bee forcibly ſtopped in their way, they grow ſullen and mutinous. David had not onely vowed, but deeply ſworne the death of Nabal, and all his Family, to the very Dogge that lay at his doore ; yet now hee praiſeth God, that hath given the occaſion and grace to violate it. Wicked Vowes are ill made, but worſe kept. Our tongue cannot tye us to commit ſin. Good men thinke themſelves happy, that ſince they had not the grace to deny ſinne, yet they had not the opportunity to accompliſh it. If Abigail had ſitt ſtill at home, David had ſinned, and ſhee had dyed : Now her diſcreet admonition hath preſerved her from the ſword, and diverted him from blood-ſhed. And now, what thankes, what benedictions hath ſhee for this ſeaſonable counſell ? How ſhould it encourage us to admoniſh our brethren ; to ſee that if wee prevaile, we have bleſſings from them; if we prevaile not, we have yet bleſſings from God, and thankes of our owne hearts. B

How neare was Nabal to a miſchiefe, and perceives it not ? David was comming to the foot of the hill to cut his throat, while hee was feaſting in his houſe without feare ; Little doe ſinners know, how neare their jollity is to perdition. Many times judgement is at the threſhold, whiles drunkenneſſe and ſurfet are at the boord. Had he beene any other then a Nabal, he had not ſate downe to feaſt till hee had beene ſure of his peace with David; either not to expect danger, or not to cleare it, was ſottiſh; So fooliſh are carnall men, that give themſelves over to their pleaſures, whiles there are deadly quarrels depending againſt them in Heaven. There is nothing wherein wiſedome is more ſeene, then in the temperate uſe of proſperitie. A Nabal cannot abound, but he muſt be drunke and ſurfet; Exceſſe is a true argument of folly : We uſe to ſay, that when drinke is in, wit is out, but if wit were not out drinke would not be in. C D E

It was no time to adviſe Nabal, while his reaſon was drowned in a deluge of wine. A beaſt or a ſtone is as capable of good counſell as a Drunkard. Oh that the nobleſt Creature ſhould ſo farre abaſe himſelfe, as for a little liquor to loſe the uſe of thoſe faculties, whereby he is a Man. Thoſe that have to doe with drinke or phrenzy muſt be glad to watch times; So did Abigail, who the next morning preſents to her Huſband, the view of his faults, of his danger ; Hee then ſees how neere hee was to death, and felt it not. That worldly minde is ſo apprehenſive of the death that ſhould have beene, as that he dyes, to thinke that he had like to have dyed ; Who would thinke a man could be ſo affected with a danger paſt, and yet ſo ſenſeleſſe of a future, yea imminent? He that was yeſter-night as a beaſt, is now as a ſtone ; he was then over-merry, now dead and lumpiſh; Carnall hearts are ever in extremities. If they be once downe, their dejection is desperate, because they have no inward comfort to mitigate their sorrow. What difference there was betwixt the disposition of David and Nabal? How oft had David beene in the Valley of the shadow of death, and feared no evill? Nabal is but once put in mind of a death that might have been, and is striken dead.

It is just with God, that they who live without grace, should die without comfort; neither can we expect better, while we goe on in our sinnes. The speech of Abigail smote Nabal into a qualme; that tongue had doubtlesse oft advised him well, & prevailed not; now, occasions his death, whose reformation it could not effect; shee meant nothing but his amendment: God meant to make that loving instrument the meanes of his revenge: shee speakes, and God strikes; and within tenne dayes, that swound ends in death. And now Nabal payes deare for his uncharitable reproach: for his riotous excesse: That God, which would not suffer David to right himselfe by his owne Sword, takes the quarrell of his Servant into his owne hand. David hath now his ends without sin; rejoycing in the just executions of God, who would neither suffer him to sinne in revenging, nor suffer his Adversaries to sinne unrevenged.

Our loving God is more angry with the wrongs done to his servants, than themselves can be, and knowes how to punish that justly, which we could not undertake without wronging God, more than men have wronged us. He that saith, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, repayes oft times when we have forgiven, when we have forgotten, and cals to reckoning after our discharges: It is dangerous offending any Favorite of him, whose displeasure and revenge is everlasting.

How far God lookes beyond our purposes? Abigail came onely to plead for an ill Husband; & now God makes this journey a preparation for a better: So that in one act, shee preserved an ill Husband, and wonne a good one for the future: David well remembers her comely person, her wise speeches, her gracefull carriage; and now, when modestie found it seasonable, hee sends to sue her which had beene his Suppliant: she intreated for her Husband, David treats with her for his Wife; her request was to escape his Sword, hee wisheth her to his bed; It was a faire suite to change a David for a Nabal; to become Davids Queene, in stead of Nabals Drudge; shee that learned humilitie under so hard a Tutor, abaseth her selfe no lesse when David offers to advance her; (Let thine hand-maid be a Servant to wash the feet of the Servants of my Lord.) None are so fit to be great, as those that can stoop lowest: How could David be more happy in a Wife; he findes at once Pietie, Wisedome, Humilitie, Faithfulnesse, Wealth, Beauty? How cou'd Abigail bee more happy in an Husband, than in the Prophet, the Champion, the Anointed of God? Those Marriages are well made, wherein Vertues are matched, and Happinesse is mutuall.

DAVID and ACHISH.

GOod motions that fall into wicked hearts are like some sparkes that fall from the flint and steele, into wet tinder; lightsome for the time, but soone out. After Sauls teares and protestations, yet he is now againe, in the wildernesse with three thousand men to hunt after innocent David: How invincible is the charity and loyalty of an honest heart? The same hand that spared Saul in the Cave, spares him sleeping in the field; The same hand that cut away the lap of his Masters garment, carryed away his Speare; that Speare, which might as well have carryed away the life of the owner, is onely borne away for a proofe of the fidelitie of the bearer. Still Saul is strong, but David victorious, and triumphs over the malice of his persecutor; Yet still the victor flyeth from him whom he hath overcome. A man that sees how far Saul was transported with his rancorous envy, cannot but say, that hee was never more mad than when he was ſober; For even after he had ſaid (Bleſſed art thou my ſonne David, thou ſhalt doe great things and alſo prevaile;) yet ſtill he purſues him, whom he grants aſſured to prevaile; what is this but to reſolve to loſe his labour in ſinning, and in ſpight of himſelfe to offend? How ſhamefull is our inequalitie of diſpoſition to good? We know we cannot miſſe of the reward of wel-doing, and yet doe it not; whiles wicked men caſt away their endeavours upon thoſe evill projects, whereof they are ſure to faile, ſinne blindes the eyes and hardens the heart, and thruſts men into wilfull miſchiefes, how ever dangerous, how ever impoſſible; and never leaves them till it have brought them to utter confuſion. A

The overlong continuance of a tentation, may eaſily weary the beſt patience: and may attaine that by protraction, which it could never doe by violence; David himſelfe at laſt beginnes to bend under this triall; and reſolves ſo to fly from Saul, as he runnes from the Church of God; and whiles he will avoide the malice of his Maſter, joynes himſelfe with Gods enemies. The greateſt Saints upon earth, are not alwayes upon the ſame pitch of ſpirituall ſtrength; He that ſometimes ſaid (I will not be afraid of ten thouſands, now ſayes, I ſhall one day periſh by the hand of Saul.) Hee had wont to conſult with God, now hee ſayes thus in his owne heart. How many evident experiments had David of Gods deliverances; how certaine & cleere predictions of his future Kingdome; how infallible an earneſt was the holy Oyle, wherewith he was anointed, of the Crowne of Iſrael? And yet (David ſaid in his heart, I ſhall now periſh one day by the hand of Saul:) The beſt faith is but like the twy-light, mixed with ſome degrees of darkneſſe, and infidelity; We doe utterly miſreckon the greateſt earthly holineſſe, if we exempt it from infirmities; It is not long, ſince David told Saul, that thoſe wicked enemies of his, which caſt him out from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, did as good as bid him, Goe ſerve other gods; yet now is he gone from the inheritance of God, into the Land of the Philiſtims; That Saul might ſeeke him no more, he hides himſelfe out of the liſts of the Church, where a good man would not looke for him: Once before had David fled to this Achiſh, when he was glad to ſcrabble on the doores, & let his ſpittle fall upon his beard, in a ſemblance of madneſſe, that he might eſcape; yet now in a ſemblance of friendſhip, is he returned to ſave that life, which he was in danger to have loſt in Iſrael. Goliah the Champion of the Philiſtims, whom David ſlew, was of Gath; yet David dwels with Achiſh King of the Philiſtims in Gath; even amongſt them whoſe fore-ſkins he had preſented to Saul, by two hundreds at once, doth David chuſe to reſide for ſafety: Howſoever it was a weakneſſe in David, thus by his league of amity to ſtrengthen the enemies of God, yet doth not God take advantage of it for his overthrow, but gives him protection, even where his preſence offended; and gives him favour where himſelfe bore juſt hatred; Oh the infinite patience and mercy of our God, who doth good to us for our evill, and in the very act of our provocation upholdeth, yea, bleſſeth us with preſervation! B C D

Could Saul have rightly conſidered it, he had found it no ſmall loſſe and impayring to his Kingdome, that ſo valiant a Captaine, attended with ſixe hundred able Soldiers, and their Families, ſhould forſake his Land, and joyne with his enemies; yet he is not quiet till he have abandoned his owne ſtrength: The world hath none ſo great enemy to a wicked man, as himſelfe; his hands cannot be held from his own miſchiefe; hee will needs make his friends, enemies; his enemies, victors; himſelfe, miſerable. E

David was too wiſe, to caſt himſelfe into the hand of a Philiſtim King without aſſurance; What aſſurance could hee have but promiſes? Thoſe, David had from Saul abundantly, and truſted them not; He dares truſt the fidelity of a Pagan; hee dares not truſt the vowes of a King of Iſrael: There may bee fidelitie without the Church, and falſhood within: It needs not be any newes to finde ſome Turkes true, and ſome Chriſtians faithleſſe.

Even unwiſe men are taught by experience, how much more they who have wit to learne without it? David had well found, what it was to live in a Court; Hee therefore, whom envie drove from the Court of Iſrael, voluntarily declines the Philiſtim

A Philiſtim-Court; and ſues for a Countrey-habitation; It had not beene poſſible for ſo noted a ſtranger, after ſo much Philiſtim-blood ſhed, to live long in ſuch an eminency, amongſt the preaſe of thoſe, whoſe ſonnes, or brothers, or fathers, or allies, he had ſlaughtered, without ſome perillous machination of his ruine: therefore hee makes ſuite for an early remove: (For why ſhould thy ſervant dwell in the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome with thee?) Thoſe that would ſtand ſure, muſt not affect too much height, or conſpicuitie: The tall Cedars are moſt ſubject to windes and lightnings, whiles the ſhrubs of the Valleyes ſtand unmooved; Much greatneſſe doth but make a fairer marke for evill: There is true firmeneſſe and ſafety in mediocritie.

How rarely is it ſeene, that a man loſeth by his modeſty? The change fell out well
B to David of Ziklag, for Gath; Now he hath a Citie of his owne; All Iſrael, where he was anointed, afforded him not ſo much poſſeſſion: Now the Citie which was anciently aſſigned to Iudah, returnes to the juſt Owner: and is by this meanes entailed to the Crowne of Davids Succeſſors. Beſides that, now might David live out of the ſight, and hearing of the Philiſtim-Idolatries, and enioy God no leſſe in the wals of a Philiſtim-City, than in an Iſraelitiſh wildernes; withal, an happy opportunity was now opened to his friends of Iſrael, to reſort unto his aid; the heads of the thouſands that were of Manaſſeh, and many valiant Captaines of the other Tribes, fell daily to him, and raiſed his ſixe hundred followers to an armie, like the hoſt of God. The deſarts of Iſrael could never have yeelded David ſo great an advantage: That God whoſe the earth is, makes roome for his owne every where; & oft-times provideth
C them a forraine home, more kindly than the native: It is no matter for change of our ſoyle, ſo we change not our God; If we can every where acknowledge him, hee will no where be wanting to us.

It was not for Gods Champion to be idle; no ſooner is he free from Sauls ſword, than he beginnes an offenſive warre againſt the Amalekites, Girzites, Geſhurites: He knew theſe Nations branded by God to deſtruction: neither could his encreaſing Army bee maintained with a little: By one act therefore, he both revenges for God, and provides for his Hoſt. Had it not beene for that old quarrell, which God had with his people, David could not be excuſed from a bloody cruelty, in killing whole Countries, onely for the benefit of the ſpoile: now his Soldiers were at once, Gods Executioners, and their owne Forragers. The intervention of a command from the D Almighty, alters the ſtate of any act; & makes that worthy of praiſe, which elſe were no better than damnable. It is now Juſtice, which were otherwiſe Murder; The will of God is the rule of good; what need we inquire into other reaſons, of any act or determination, when we heare it comes from Heaven?

How many hundred yeares, had this brood of Canaanites lived ſecurely in their Countrey, ſince God commanded them to be rooted out, and now promiſed themſelves the certaineſt peace? The Philiſtims were their friends if not their Lords; The Iſraelites had their hands full, neither did they know any grudge betwixt them and their Neighbours, when ſuddenly the Sword of David cuts them off, and leaves none alive to tell the newes.

There is no ſafety in protraction; with men, delay cauſeth forgetfulneſſe, or abates
E the force of anger; as all violent motions are weakeſt at the furtheſt; but with him, to whom all times are preſent, what can be gained by prorogation? Alas, what can it availe any of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, that they have made a truce with Heaven and a league with Hell? Their day is comming, and is not the further off, becauſe they expect it not.

Miſerable were the ſtraites of David; while he was driven, not only to maintaine his Army by ſpoile, but to colour his ſpoile by a ſinfull diſſimulation; He tels Achiſh that he had beene roving againſt the South of Judah, and the South of the Jerahmelites, and the South of the Kenites, either falſly, or doubtfully, ſo as he meant to deceive him, under whom he lived, and by whom he was truſted: If Achiſh were a Philiſtim, yet he was Davids friend, yea his Patron; and if he had beene neither, it had not becomne David to be falſe. The infirmities of Gods children never appeare, but in their extremities. It is hard for the beſt man, to ſay, how farre he will bee tempted. If a man will put himſelfe among Philiſtims, he cannot promiſe to come forth innocent.

How eaſily doe we beleeve that which we wiſh? The more credit Achiſh gives unto David, the more ſin it was to deceive him; and now the conceit of this ingagement, procures him a further ſervice. The Philiſtims are aſſembled to fight with Iſrael; Achiſh dares truſt David on his ſide; yea to keepe his head for ever; neither can David doe any leſſe than promiſe his aid againſt his owne fleſh: Never was David, in all his life, driven to ſo hard an exigent: never was he ſo extreamely perplexed; For what ſhould he doe now? To fight with Achiſh, he was tyed by promiſe, by merit; Not to fight againſt Iſrael, he was tyed by his calling, by his unction: Not to fight for Achiſh, were to be unthankfull; To fight againſt Iſrael, were to be unnaturall; Oh what an inward battle muſt David needs have in his breaſt, when he thinks of this battle of Iſrael, and the Philiſtims! How doth he wiſh now that he had rather ſtood to the hazard of Sauls perſecution, than to have put himſelfe upon the favour of Achiſh; He muſt fight on one ſide, and on whether ſide ſoever he ſhould fight, he could not avoid to be treacherous; a condition worſe than death, to an honeſt heart; which way he would have reſolved, if it had come to the execution, who can know ſince himſelfe was doubtfull? either courſe had been no better than deſperate. How could the Iſraelites ever have received him for their King, who in the open field, had fought againſt them? And contrarily, if he would have fought againſt his friend, for his enemy; againſt Achiſh for Saul; he was now invironed with jealous Philiſtims; and might rather looke for the puniſhment of his Treaſon, than the glory of a Victory.

His heart had led him into theſe ſtraits; the Lord findes way to lead him out: The ſuggeſtions of his enemies doe herein befriend him: The Princes of the Philiſtims (whether of envy, or ſuſpition) plead for Davids diſmiſſion, (Send this fellow backe, that he may goe againe to his place, which thou haſt appointed him: and let him not goe down to the battle, leſt he be an adverſary to us.) No Advocate could have ſaid more, himſelfe durſt not have ſaid ſo much. Oh the wiſedome and goodneſſe of our God, that can raiſe up an Adverſary to deliver out of thoſe evills, which our friends cannot; That by the Sword of an enemy, can let out that Apoſtume, which no Phyſitian could tell how to cure: It would be wide with us ſometimes, if it were not for others malice.

There could not be a more juſt queſtion, than this of the Philiſtim Princes, What doe theſe Hebrewes here? An Iſraelite is out of his element, when he is in an Army of Philiſtims: The true ſervants of God are in their due places, when they are in oppoſition to his enemies. Profeſſion of hoſtilitie becomes them better than leagues of amity.

Yet Achiſh likes Davids converſation and preſence ſo well, that he profeſſeth himſelfe pleaſed with him, as with an Angell of God; How ſtrange is it to heare, that a Philiſtim ſhould delight in that holy man, whom an Iſraelite abhorres, and ſhould bee loath to bee quit of David, whom Saul hath expelled? Termes of civilitie bee equally open to all religions, to all profeſſions: The common graces of Gods children, are able to attract love from the moſt obſtinate enemies of goodneſſe; If wee affect them for by-reſpects of Valour, Wiſedome, Diſcourſe, Wit, it is their praiſe, not ours; But if for divine Grace and Religion, it is our praiſe with theirs.

Such now was Davids condition, that he muſt plead for that he feared, and argue againſt that which he deſired: (What have I done? and what haſt thou found in thy ſervant that I may not goe, and fight againſt the enemies of my Lord the King?) Never any newes could be more cordiall to him than this, of his diſmiſſion; yet muſt he ſeem to ſtrive againſt it, with an importunate profeſſion of his forwardneſſe to that act, which he moſt deteſted.

One degree of Diſſimulation drawes on another; thoſe which have once given way to a faulty courſe, cannot eaſily, either ſtop or turne back; but are in a ſort forced to

A to second their ill beginnings, with worse proceedings. It is a dangerous and miserable thing, to cast our selves into those actions, which draw with them a necessity, either of offending, or miscarriage.

Saul and the Witch of Endor.

B Even the worst men may sometimes make head against some sinnes. Saul hath expelled the Sorcerers out of the Land of Israel; and hath forbidden Magick upon paine of death. He that had no care to expell Satan out of his owne heart, yet will seeme to drive him out of his Kingdome. That we see wicked men oppose themselves to some sinnes, there is neither marvell, nor comfort in it: No doubt Satan made sport at this Edict of Saul; what cares he to be banished in Sorcery, whiles hee is entertained in malice? Hee knew and found Saul his, whiles he resisted; & smiled to yeeld thus far unto his Vassall: If we quit not all sinnes, he will be content we should either abandon or persecute some.

Where is no place for holy feare, there will bee place for the servile; The graceless heart of Saul was astonied at the Philistims, yet was never moved at the frownes of that God whose anger sent them, nor of those sinnes of his which procured them. Those that cannot feare for love, shall tremble for feare: and how much better is C awe than terror? prevention than confusion? There is nothing more lamentable than to see a man laugh when he should feare; God shall laugh, when such an ones feare commeth.

Extremitie of distresse, will send even the prophanest man to God; like as the drowning man, reacheth out his hand to that bough, which hee contemned whiles he stood safe on the banke: Saul now asketh counsell of the Lord; whose Prophet he hated, whose Priests he slue, whose Anointed he persecutes; Had Saul consulted with God when he should, this evill had not beene; but now, if this evill had not beene, hee had not consulted with God; The thanke of this Act is due, not to him, but to his affliction; A forced piety is thankelesse, unprofitable; God will not answer him neither by Dreames, nor by Urim, nor by Prophets. Why should God answer D that man by Dreames, who had resisted him waking? Why should hee answer him by Urim, that had slaine his Priests? Why should hee answere him by Prophets, who hated the Father of the Prophets, rebelled against the word of the Prophets?

It is an unreasonable unequality to hope to finde God at our command when we would not be at his; To looke that God should regard our voice in trouble, when we would not regard his in peace.

Unto what mad shifts are men driven by despaire? If God will not answer, Satan shall; (Saul said to his servants, Seeke me a man that hath a familiar spirit) If Saul had not knowne this course Deviliſh, why did he decree to banish it, to mulct it with death? yet now against the streame of his conscience, he will seeke to those E whom he had condemned; There needs no other judge of Sauls act than himselfe; had he not before opposed this sinne, he had not so hainously sinned in committing it; There cannot be a more fearefull signe of an heart given up to a reprobate sense, than to cast it selfe wilfully into those sinnes, which it hath proclaimed to detest. The declinations to evill are many times insensible, but when it breakes forth into such apparent effects, even others eyes may discerne it; What was Saul the better to fore-know the issue of his approaching battell? If this consultation could have strengthned him against his enemies, or promoted his victory, there might have beene some colour for so foule an act; Now, what could he gaine, but the satisfying of his bootlesse curiosity, in foreseeing that, which hee should not bee able to avoide?

Foolish men give away their soules for nothing; The itch of impertinent and unprofitable profitable knowledge, hath beene the hereditary diſeaſe of the ſons of Adam & Eve; How many have periſhed to know that which hath procured their periſhing? How ambitious ſhould we be to know thoſe things, the knowledge whereof is eternall Life!

Many a lewd office are they put to, which ſerve wicked maſters; One while Sauls ſervants are ſet to kill innocent David; another while to ſhed the blood of Gods Prieſts; and now they muſt goe ſeek for a Witch: It is no ſmall happineſſe to attend them, from whom we may receive precepts and examples of vertue.

Had Saul been good he had needed no diſguiſe; Honeſt actions never ſhame the doers; Now that hee goeth about a ſinfull buſineſſe, hee changeth himſelfe; hee ſeekes the ſhelter of the night, hee takes but two followers with him; It is true, that if Saul had come in the port of a King, the Witch had as much diſſembled her condition, as now he diſſembleth his; yet it was not onely deſire to ſpeed, but guiltineſſe that thus altered his habit; ſuch is the power of conſcience, that even thoſe who are moſt affected to evill, yet are aſhamed to bee thought ſuch as they deſire to be.

Saul needed another face to fit that tongue, which ſhould ſay, (Conjecture to me by the familiar ſpirit, and bring me up whom I ſhall name unto thee;) An obdurate heart can give way to any thing.

Notwithſtanding the peremptory edict of Saul, there are ſtill Witches in Iſrael; neither good Lawes, nor careful executions can purge the Church from Malefactors; There will ſtill be ſome that will jeopard their heads upon the groſſeſt ſinnes; No Garden can be ſo curiouſly tended, that there ſhould not bee one Weed left in it; Yet ſo farre can good Statutes, and due inflictions of puniſhments upon offenders, prevaile, that miſchievous perſons are glad to pull in their heads, and dare not do ill, but in diſguiſe and darkneſſe. It is no ſmall advantage of juſtice, that it affrights ſin, if it cannot be expelled; As contrarily wofull is the condition of that place, where is a publike profeſſion of wickedneſſe.

The Witch was no leſſe crafty than wicked; ſhe had before (as is like) bribed Officers to eſcape enditement, lurke in ſecrecy; and now ſhe will not worke her feates without ſecurity; her ſuſpition projects the worſt; (Wherefore ſeekeſt thou to take mee in a ſnare, to cauſe me to die?) Oh vaine Sorcereſſe, that could bee wary to avoid the puniſhment of Saul, careleſſe to avoid the judgement of God; Could we fore-think what our ſinne would coſt us, we durſt not, but be innocent: This is a good and ſeaſonable anſwer for us, to make unto Satan, when he ſollicites us to evill (Wherefore ſeekeſt thou to take me in a ſnare, to cauſe me to die?) Nothing is more ſure than this intention in the tempter, than this event in the iſſue; Oh that we could but ſo much feare the eternall paines, as we doe the temporary, and bee but ſo carefull to ſave our ſoules from torment, as our bodies.

No ſooner hath Saul ſworne her ſafety, than ſhee addreſſeth her to her Sorcery; Hope of impunity drawes on ſinne with boldneſſe; were it not for the deluſions of falſe promiſes, Satan ſhould have no Clients. Could Saul be ſo ignorant, as to think that Magick had power over Gods deceaſed Saints to raiſe them up; yea, to call them down from their reſt? Time was, when Saul was among the Prophets; And yet now, that he is in the impure lodge of Divels, how ſenſeleſſe he is, to ſay, Bring me up Samuel? It is no rare thing, to loſe even our wit and judgement together with graces; How juſtly are they given to ſottiſhneſſe, that have given themſelves over to ſin?

The Sorcereſſe (it ſeemes) exerciſing her conjurations in a roome apart, is informed by her Familiar, who it was that ſet her on worke; ſhee can therefore finde time, in the midſt of her Exorciſmes, to binde the aſſurance of her owne ſafety, by expoſtulation, (She cryed with a loud voice, why haſt thou deceived me, for thou art Saul?) The very name of Saul was an accuſation; Yet is he ſo farre from ſtriking his breaſt, that doubting leſt this feare of the Witch, ſhould interrupt the deſired worke, hee encourages her, whom hee ſhould have condemned; (Be not affraid;) Hee that had more cauſe to feare, for his owne ſake, in an expectation of juſt iudgement, cheeres up her, that feared nothing but himſelfe: How ill doth it become us to give that

counſell to others, whereof we have more need and uſe in our owne perſons!

As one that had more care to ſatisfie his own curioſity, than her ſuſpition, he aſkes, (What ſaweſt thou?) Who would not have looked, that Sauls haire ſhould have ſtared on his head, to heare of a ſpirit raiſed? His ſinne hath ſo hardened him, that hee rather pleaſes himſelfe in it, which hath nothing in it but horror; So farre is Satan content to deſcend to the ſervice of his ſervants, that he will approve his fained obedience to their very outward ſenſes; What forme is ſo glorious, that he either cannot or dare not undertake? Here Gods aſcend out of the Earth; Elſe-where Satan transformes him into an Angell of light; What wonder is it, that his wicked Inſtruments appeare like Saints in their hypocriticall diſſimulation? if we will be judging by the appearance, wee ſhall be ſure to erre: No eye could diſtinguiſh betwixt the true Samuel, and a falſe ſpirit; Saul, who was well worthy to be deceived, ſeeing thoſe gray haires, and that Mantle, inclines himſelf to the ground, and bowes himſelfe; He that would not worſhip God in Samuel alive, now worſhips Samuel in Satan; and no marvell; Satan was now become his refuge in ſtead of God; his urim was darkneſſe, his Prophet a Ghoſt: Every one that conſults with Satan, worſhips him, though hee bow not, neither doth that evill ſpirit deſire any other reverence, than to be ſought unto.

How cunningly doth Satan reſemble, not onely the habit and geſture, but the language of Samuel, Wherefore haſt thou diſquieted me? and wherefore doſt thou ask of me, ſeeing the Lord is gone from thee, & is thine enemy? Nothing is more pleaſing to that evill one, than to be ſolicited, yet in the perſon of Samuel, he can ſay, Why haſt thou diſquieted me? Had not the Lord been gone from Saul, he had never comne to the Deviliſh Oracle of Endor, and yet the counterfeiting ſpirit can ſay, Why doeſt thou ask of me, ſeeing the Lord is gone from thee? Satan cares not how little he is known to be himſelfe; he loves to paſſe under any forme, rather than his owne.

The more holy the perſon is, the more carefully doth Satan act him, that by his ſtale he may enſnare us. In every motion it is good to try the ſpirits, whether they be of God; Good words are no meanes to diſtinguiſh a Prophet from a Devill; Samuel himſelfe, whiles he was alive, could not have ſpoken more gravely, more ſeverely, more divinely, than this evill ghoſt, For the Lord will rent thy Kingdome out of thy hand, and give it thy neighbour David, becauſe thou obeyedſt not the voice of the Lord, nor executedſt his fierce wrath upon the Amalekites, therefore hath the Lord done this unto thee this day: When the Devill himſelfe puts on gravity and religion, who can marvell at the hypocriſie of men? Well may lewd men bee good Preachers, when Satan himſelfe can play the Prophet; Where are thoſe ignorants that can think charitably of charmes and ſpells, becauſe they finde nothing in them, but good words? What Prophet could ſpeake better words, than this Devill in Samuels Mantle? Neither is there at any time ſo much danger of that evill ſpirit, as when he ſpeakes beſt.

I could wonder to heare Satan preach thus prophetically, if I did not know, that as he was once a good Angell, ſo he can ſtill act what he was; Whiles Saul was in conſultation of ſparing Agag, we ſhall never finde that Satan would lay any blocke in his way? Yea then he was a prompt Orator, to induce him into that ſinne; now that it is paſt and gone, he can lade Saul with fearefull denunciations of judgement; Till we have ſinned, Satan is a paraſite; when we have ſinned, he is a Tyrant: What cares he to flatter any more, when he hath what he would? Now his onely worke is to terrifie, and confound, that he may enjoy what he hath wonne; How much better is it ſerving that Maſter, who when we are moſt dejected with the conſcience of evill, heartens us with inward comfort, and ſpeakes peace to the ſoule in the midſt of tumult.

Ziklag

Ziklag ſpoiled and revenged.

HAd not the King of the Philiſtims ſent David away early, his Wives and his people and ſubſtance, which he left at Ziklag, had beene utterly loſt; Now Achiſh did not more pleaſure David in his entertainment, than in his diſmiſſion. Saul was not Davids enemy more in the perſecution of his perſon, than in the forbearance of Gods enemies; Behold, thus late doth David feele the ſmart of Sauls ſinne, in ſparing the Amalekites: who, if Gods ſentence had been duely executed, had not now ſurvived, to annoy this parcell of Iſrael.

As in ſpirituall reſpects our ſinnes are alwayes hurtfull to our ſelves, ſo in temporall oft-times prejudiciall to poſterity; A wicked man deſerves ill of thoſe, he never lived to ſee.

I cannot marvell at the Amalekites aſſault made upon the Iſraelites of Ziklag: I cannot but marvell at their clemency: how juſt was it, that while David would give aid to the enemies of the Church, againſt Iſrael, the enemies of the Church ſhould riſe againſt David, in his peculiar charge of Iſrael: But whiles David roving againſt the Amalekites, not many dayes before, left neither man nor woman alive, how ſtrange is it, that the Amalekites invading and ſurprizing Ziklag, (in revenge) kill neither man nor woman? Shall we ſay that mercy is fled from the breaſts of Iſraelites, and reſts in Heathens? Or ſhall we rather aſcribe this to the gracious reſtraint of God, who having deſigned Amalek to the ſlaughter of Iſrael, and not Iſrael to the ſlaughter of Amalek, moved the hands of Iſrael, and held the hands of Amalek; This was that alone, that made the Heathens take up with an un bloody revenge; burning only the walls, and leading away the perſons. Iſrael croſſed the revealed will of God in ſparing Amalek; Amalek fulfils the ſecret will of God in ſparing Iſrael.

It was ſtill the lot of Amalek, to take Iſrael at all advantages; upon their firſt comming out of Egypt, when they were weary, weake, and unarmed, then did Amalek aſſault them; And now, when one part of Iſrael was in the field againſt the Philiſtims, another was gone with the Philiſtims againſt Iſrael; the Amalekites ſet upon the Coaſts of both; and goe away laded with the ſpoile: No other is to be expected of our ſpirituall Adverſaries, who are ever readyeſt to aſſaile, when wee are the unreadyeſt to defend.

It was a wofull ſpectacle for David and his Soldiers, upon their returne to finde ruines and aſhes inſtead of houſes; and inſtead of their Families, ſolitude; Their City was vaniſhed into ſmoke, their houſholds into captivity; neither could they know whō to accuſe, or where to enquire for redreſſe; whiles they made account that their home ſhould recompence their tedious journey with comfort, the miſerable deſolation of their home doubles the diſcomfort of their journey; what remained there but teares and lamentations? They lifted up their voices, and wept, till they could weep no more. Here was plenty of nothing but miſery and ſorrow. The heart of every Iſraelite was brim-full of griefe; Davids ran over; for beſides that his croſſe was the ſame with theirs, al theirs was his alone; each man lookt on his fellow as a partner of affliction, but every one lookt upon David as the cauſe of all their affliction; and (as common diſpleaſure is never but fruitfull of revenge) they all agree to ſtone him as the Author of their undoing, whom they followed al this while, as the hopefull meanes of their advancements.

Now Davids loſſe is his leaſt griefe; neither (as if every thing had conſpired to torment him) can he looke beſides the aggravation of his ſorrow and danger; Saul and his Soldiers had hunted him out of Iſrael; the Philiſtim-Courtiers had hunted him from the favour of Achiſh; the Amalekites ſpoiled him in Ziklag; yet all theſe are eaſie Adverſaries in compariſon of his owne; his owne followers are ſo far from pittying his participation of the loſſe, that they are ready to kill him, becauſe they are

A are miſerable with him. Oh the many and grievous perplexities of the man after Gods owne heart! If all his traine had joyned their beſt helpes for the mitigation of his griefe, their Cordials had beene too weak, but now the vexation that ariſes from their fury and malice, drowneth the ſenſe of their loſſe, and were enough to diſtract the moſt reſolute heart; Why ſhould it be ſtrange to us, that we meet with hard trialls, when we ſee the deare Anointed of God thus plunged in evils?

What ſhould the diſtreſſed ſonne of Iſhai now doe? Whither ſhould he thinke to turne him? to goe backe to Iſrael he durſt not; to goe to Achiſh he might not; to abide amongſt thoſe waſte heaps he could not; or if there might have been harbour in thoſe burnt walls, yet there could be no ſafety to remaine with thoſe mutinous ſpirits. (But David comforted himſelfe in the Lord his God;) oh happy and ſure refuge
B of a faithfull ſoule! The earth yeelded him nothing, but matter of diſconſolation and heavineſſe; he lifts his eyes above the hils, whence commeth his ſalvation; It is no marvell that God remembreth David in all his troubles, ſince David in all his troubles did thus remember his God; he knew that though no mortal eye of reaſon, or ſenſe could diſcerne any evaſion from theſe intricate evils, yet that the eye of divine Providence had deſcryed it long before; and that though no humane power could make way for his ſafety, yet that the over-ruling hand of his God, could doe it with eaſe; His experience had aſſured him of the fidelity of his Guardian in Heaven; and therefore he comforted himſelfe in the Lord his God.

In vaine is comfort expected from God, if we conſult not with him: Abiathar the Prieſt is called for; David was not in the Court of Achiſh, without the Prieſt by his
C ſide; nor the Prieſt without the Ephod: Had theſe been left behinde in Ziklag, they had been miſcaried with the reſt, and David had now been hopeleſſe. How well it ſucceeds to the Great, when they take God with them in his Miniſters, in his Ordinances? As contrarily, when theſe are laid by, as ſuperfluous, there can bee nothing but uncertainty of ſucceſſe, or certainty of miſchiefe. The preſence of the Prieſt and Ephod, would have little availed him without their uſe; by them he aſkes counſell of the Lord in theſe ſtraits. The mouth and eares of God, which were ſhut unto Saul, are open unto David; no ſooner can he aſke, than he receives anſwer; and the anſwer that he receives is full of courage and comfort: (Follow, for thou ſhalt ſurely overtake them, and recover all.) That God of truth never diſapointed any mans truſt. David now findes, that the eye which waited upon God was not ſent away weeping.

D David therefore, & his men, are now upon their march after the Amalekites: It is no lingring when God bids us goe: They which had promiſed reſt to their weary limbes, after their return frō Achiſh, in their harbor of Ziklag, are glad to forget their hopes, & to put their ſtiffe joynts unto a new taſk of motion: It is no marvell, if two hundred of thē were ſo over-tyred with their former toile, that they were not able to paſſe over the river Beſor. David was a true type of Chriſt. Wee follow him in theſe holy Wars, againſt the ſpiritual Amalekites; All of us are not of an equal ſtrēgth Some are caryed by the vigor of their faith, thorow all difficulties; Others, after long preſſure, are ready to languiſh in the way: Our Leader is not more ſtrong than pittifull; neither doth he ſcornefully caſheere thoſe, whoſe deſires are hearty, whiles their abilities are unanſwerable: How much more ſhould our charity pardon the in-
E firmities of our brethrē, & allow thē to ſit by the ſtuffe, who cānot endure the march?

The ſame Providence which appointed David to follow the Amalekites, had alſo ordered an Egyptian to be caſt behinde them. This caſt Servant, whom his cruel Maſter had left to faintneſſe and famine, ſhall bee uſed as the meanes of the recovery of the Iſraelites loſſe, and of the revenge of the Amalekites. Had not his Maſter neglected him, all theſe Rovers of Amalek had gone away with their life and booty: It is not ſafe to deſpiſe the meaneſt vaſſall upon earth. There is a mercy and care due to the moſt deſpicable peece of all humanity; wherein we cannot be wanting without the offence, without the puniſhment of God.

Charity diſtinguiſheth an Iſraelite from an Amalekite. Davids followers are ſtrangers to this Egyptian; an Amalekite was his Maſter; His Maſter leaves him to dy (in the field) of ſickneſſe & hunger, theſe ſtrangers releeved him: and ere they know whether they might by him receive any light in their purſuit, they refreſh his dying ſpirits with Bread and Water, with Figs and Raiſins; Neither can the haſte of their way be any hinderance to their compaſſion: Hee hath no Iſraelitiſh blood in him, that is utterly mercileſſe; Perhaps yet Davids followers might alſo, in the hope of ſome intelligence, ſhew kindneſſe to this forlorne Egyptian. Worldly wiſedome teacheth us, to ſow ſmall courteſies, where we may reape large Harveſts of recompence: No ſooner are his ſpirits recalled, than he requites his food with information. I cannot blame the Egyptian, that he was ſo eaſily induced to deſcry theſe unkinde Amalekites, to mercifull Iſraelites; thoſe that gave him over unto death, to the reſtorers of his life; much leſſe, that ere he would deſcry them, he requires an oath of ſecurity from ſo bad a maſter; Well doth he match death with ſuch a ſervitude: Wonderfull is the Providence of God, even over thoſe, that are not in the neereſt bonds, his owne. Three dayes, and three nights, had this poore Egyptian Slave lyen ſick and hunger-ſtarved in the fields, and lookes for nothing but death, when God ſends him ſuccour from the hands of thoſe Iſraelites, whom he had helped to ſpoile, though not ſo much for his ſake, as for Iſraels, is this heatheniſh Stragler preſerved.

It pleaſes God to extend his common favours to all his creatures; but in miraculous preſervations, he hath ſtill wont to have reſpect to his owne. By this meanes therefore, are the Iſraelites brought to the ſight of their late ſpoilers; whom they finde ſcattered abroad, upon all the earth, eating and drinking, and dancing in triumph, for the great prey they had taken.

It was three dayes at leaſt, ſince this gainfull forraging of Amalek; & now, ſeeing no feare of any purſuer, and promiſing themſelves ſafety, in ſo great and untraced a diſtance, they make themſelves merry with ſo rich and eaſie a victory; and now ſuddenly, when they began to thinke of enjoying the beauty and wealth they had gotten the ſword of David was upon their throats. Deſtruction is never neerer, than when ſecurity hath chaſed away feare. With how ſad faces and hearts, had the Wives of David, and the other Captives of Iſrael, looked upon the triumphall Revels of Amalek; and what a change, doe we think, appeared in them, when they ſaw their happy and valiant Reſcuers, flying in upon their inſolent Victors, and making the death of the Amalekites, the ranſome of their captivity: They mourned even now at the dances of Amalek; now in the ſhriekes and death of Amalek, they ſhout and rejoyce: The mercy of our God forgets not to enterchange our ſorrows with joy, and the joy of the wicked with ſorrow.

The Amalekites have paid a deare loane for the goods of Iſrael, which they now reſtore with their owne lives; and now their ſpoile hath made David richer then hee expected: that booty which they had ſwept from all other parts, accrewed to him.

Thoſe Iſraelites that could not goe on to fight for their ſhare, are comne to meet their brethren with gratulation. How partiall are we wont to be to our own cauſes? Even very Iſraelites will be ready to fall out for matter of profit: where ſelfe-love hath bred a quarrell, every man is ſubject to flatter his owne caſe. It ſeemed plauſible & but juſt to the actors in this reſcue, that thoſe which had taken no part in the paine and hazard of the journey, ſhould receive no part of the commodity. It was favour enough for them to recover their wives and children, though they ſhared not in the goods. Wiſe and holy David (whoſe praiſe was no leſſe, to overcome his owne in time of peace, then his enemies in war) cals his contending followers from Law to equity, and ſo orders the matter, that ſince the Plaintifes were detained not by will, but by neceſſity, and ſince their forced ſtay was uſefull in guarding the ſtuffe, they ſhould partake equally of the prey with their fellowes. A ſentence well beſeeming the juſtice of Gods Anointed. Thoſe that repreſent God upon earth, ſhould reſemble him in their proceedings. It is the juſt mercy of our God, to meaſure us by our wills, not by our abilities; to recompence us graciouſly, according to the truth of our deſires, and endeavours; and to account that performed by us, which he only letteth us from performing. It were wide with us, if ſometimes purpoſe did not ſupply actions. Whiles our heart faulteth not, we that through ſpirituall ſickneſſe are faine to abide by the ſtuffe, ſhall ſhare both in grace and glory with the Victors.

The

The death of SAUL.

THE Witch of Endor had halfe ſlaine Saul before the Battell: it is juſt that they who conſult with Devils, ſhould go away with diſcomfort: He hath eaten his laſt bread at the hād of a Sorcereſſe: & now neceſſity drawes him into that field, where hee ſees nothing but deſpaire. Had not Saul beleeved the ill newes of the counterfeit Samuel, he had not been ſtruck down on the ground with words: Now his beleefe made him deſperate; Thoſe actiōs which are not ſuſtained by hope, muſt needs languiſh: and are only promoted by outward cōpulſion: Whiles the minde is uncertaine of ſucceſſe, it releeves it ſelf with the poſſibilities of good: in doubts there is a cōfortable mixture: but when it is aſſured of the worſt event, it is utterly diſcouraged and dejected. It hath therefore pleaſed the wiſdome of God to hide from wicked men, his determination of their finall eſtate, that their remainders of hope, may hearten thē to good.

In all likelihood one ſelfe-ſame day, ſaw David a victor over the Amalekites, and Saul diſcomfited by the Philiſtims; How ſhould it bee otherwiſe? David conſulted with God, and prevailed; Saul with the Witch of Endor, & periſheth. The end is cōmonly anſwerable to the way; It is an idle injuſtice when we do il, to look to ſpeed well. The ſlaughter of Saul and his ſonnes, was not in the firſt Scene of this Tragical field; that was rather reſerved by God, for the laſt act, that Sauls meaſure might bee full: God is long ere he ſtrikes, but when he doth, it is to purpoſe; Firſt, Iſrael flees and falls downe wounded in Mount Gilboa; They had their part in Sauls ſinne; they were actors in Davids perſecution: Juſtly therefore doe they ſuffer with him, whom they had ſeconded in offence. As it is hard to be good under an evill Prince, ſo it is as rare not to be enwrapped in his judgements: It was no ſmall addition to the anguiſh of Sauls death, to ſee his ſonnes dead, to ſee his people fleeing, and ſlaine before him; They had ſinned in their King, and in them is their King puniſhed. The reſt were not ſo worthy of pitty; but whoſe heart would it not touch to ſee Ionathan, the good ſon of a wicked father, involved in the common deſtruction? Death is not partiall: All diſpoſitions, all merits are alike to it; if valour, if holineſſe, if ſincerity of heart could have beene any defence againſt mortality, Ionathan had ſurvived: Now by their wounds and death, no man can diſcerne which is Ionathan; The ſoule only findes the difference, which the body admitteth not; Death is the common gate both to Heaven and Hell; we all paſſe that, ere our turning to either hand: The ſword of the Philiſtims fetcheth Ionathan through it with his fellowes: no ſooner is his foot over that threſhold, than God conducteth him to glory: The beſt cannot be happy but through their diſſolution; Now therefore hath Ionathan no cauſe of complaint, hee is by the rude and cruell hand of a Philiſtim but removed to a better Kingdome than hee leaves to his brother; and at once is his death both a temporall affliction to the ſon of Saul, and an entrance of glory to the friend of David.

The Philiſtim-archers ſhot at randome: God directs their arrowes into the body of Saul: Leſt the diſcomfiture of his people, and the ſlaughter of his ſons ſhould not be griefe enough to him, he feeles himſelfe wounded, and ſees nothing before him but horror and death; and now as a man forſaken of all hopes, hee begges of his Armour-bearer that deaths-blow, which elſe he muſt (to the doubling of his indignation) receive from a Philiſtim. He begges this bloody favour of his ſervant, and is denyed: Such an awfulneſſe hath God placed in Soveraignty, that no entreaty, no extremity, can move the hand againſt it: What metall are thoſe men made of, that can ſuggeſt or reſolve, and attempt the violation of Majeſty? Wicked men care more for the ſhame of the World, than the danger of their ſoules: Deſperate Saul will now ſupply his Armour-bearer; and as a man that bore armes againſt himſelfe, he fals upon his own ſword. What if he had dyed by the weapon of a Philiſtim? So did his ſon Ionathan, and loſt no glory: Theſe conceits of diſreputation prevaile with carnall hearts above all ſpirituall reſpects: There is no greater muderer than vain-glory: Nothing more argues a heart voyd of grace, than, to be tranſported by idle popularity into actions prejudiciall to the Soule. A

Evill examples, eſpecially of the great, never eſcaped imitation; the Armor-bearer of Saul followes his maſter: and dares doe that to himſelfe, which to his King hee durſt not: as if their owne Swords had been more familiar executioners, they yeelded unto them, what they grudged to their purſuers. From the beginning was Saul ever his owne enemy, neither did any hands hurt him but his owne: and now his death is ſutable to his life: his owne hand payes him the reward of all his wickedneſſe. The end of hypocrites, and envious men is commonly fearefull: Now is the blood of Gods Prieſts, which Saul ſhed, and of David, which hee would have ſhed, required, and requited. The evill ſpirit had ſaid the evening before, To morrow thou ſhalt bee with mee: and now Saul haſteth to make the Devill no Lyer: rather than faile, he gives himſelfe his owne Mittimus. Oh the woful extremities of a deſpairing ſoule, plunging him ever into a greater miſchiefe to avoyd the leſſe! He might have beene a patient in anothers violence, and faultleſſe; now whiles hee will needs act the Philiſtims part upon himſelfe, he lived and dyed a Murderer; The caſe is deadly, when the Priſoner breakes the Jaile, and will not ſtay for his delivery: and though we may not paſſe ſentence upon ſuch a ſoule, yet upon the fact we may: the ſoule may poſſibly repent in the parting, the act is haynous, and ſuch as without repentance, kills the ſoule. B

It was the next day, ere the Philiſtims knew how much they were victors; then finding the dead corps of Saul and his ſons, they begin their triumphs: The head of King Saul is cut off in lieu of Goliahs, and now all their Idol temples ring of their ſucceſſe: Fooliſh Philiſtims, if they had not been more beholding to Sauls ſins, than their gods, they had never caryed away the honour of thoſe Trophees: Inſtead of magnifying the juſtice of the true God, who puniſhed Saul with deſerved death, they magnifie the power of the falſe: Superſtition is extremely injurious to God: It is no better than Theft, to aſcribe unto the ſecond cauſes that honour which is due unto the firſt: but to give Gods glory to thoſe things which neither act, nor are; it is the higheſt degree of ſpirituall robbery. C

Saul was none of the beſt Kings: yet ſo impatient are his ſubjects of the indignity offred to his dead corps, that they will rather leave their owne bones amongſt the Philiſtims, than the carcaſſe of Saul. Such a cloſe relation there is betwixt a Prince and Subject, that the diſhonour of either is inſeparable from both: How willing ſhould wee bee to hazard our bodies or Subſtance for the vindication either of the perſon, or name of a good King, whiles hee lives to the benefit of our protection: It is an unjuſt ingratitude in thoſe men, which can endure the diſgrace of them, under whoſe ſhelter they live; but how unnaturall is the villany of thoſe Miſcreants, that can bee content to bee actors in the capitall wrongs offered to Soveraigne authority? D

It were a wonder, if after the death of a Prince, there ſhould want ſome Pickethanke, to inſinuate himſelfe into his Succeſſor: An Amalekite youngman rides poſte to Ziklag to finde out David, whom even common rumour had notified for the anointed Heire to the Kingdome of Iſrael; to bee the firſt Meſſenger of that newes, which he thought could be no other then acceptable, the death of Saul: and that the tidings might bee ſo much more meritorious, hee addes to the report, what he thinkes might carry the greateſt retribution: In hope of reward, or honour, the man is content to bely himſelfe to David: It was not the Speare, but the Sword of Saul, that was the inſtrument of his death: neither could this ſtranger finde Saul, but dying, ſince the Armour-bearer of Saul ſaw him dead, ere he offered that violence to himſelfe: The hand of this Amalekite therefore was not guiltie, his tongue was: Had not this Meſſenger meaſured Davids foote by his owne Laſt, hee had forborne this peece of the newes; and not hoped to advantage himſelfe by this falſhood: Now hee thinkes, The tidings of a Kingdome cannot but pleaſe: None but Saul and Ionathan ſtood in Davids way: He cannot chuſe, but like to heare of E

their

A their removall: Especially, since Saul did so tyrannously persecute his innocence. If I shall onely report the fact done by another, I shall goe away but with the recompence of a luckie Post; whereas, if I take upon me the action, I am the man, to whom David is beholden for the Kingdome: he cannot but honour and requite me, as the Author of his deliverance and happinesse. Worldly mindes thinke no man can be of any other, then their owne dyet; and because they finde the respects of selfe-love, and private profit, so strongly prevailing with themselves, they cannot conceive, how these should be capable of a repulse from others.

How much was this Amalekite mocked of his hopes: whiles he imagined, that David would now triumph, and feast in the assured expectation of the Kingdome, and possession of the Crowne of Israel, he findes him renting his clothes, and wringB ing his hands, and weeping, and mourning: as if all his comfort had been dead with Saul and Ionathan: and yet perhaps he thought: This sorrow of David is but fashionable, such as great heires make shew of in the fatall day they have longed for; These teares will be soone dry; the sight of a Crowne will soone breed a succession of other passions: But this errour is soone corrected: For when David had entertained this Bearer, with a sad fast all the day, he cals him forth in the evening to execution. (How wast thou not affraid (saith he) to put forth thine hand to destroy the Anointed of the Lord?) Doubtlesse, the Amalekite made many faire pleas for himselfe, out of the grounds of his owne report: Alas, Saul was before falne upon his owne Speare; It was but mercy to kill him, that was halfe dead, that hee might dye the shorter: Besides, his intreaty and importunate prayers, moved me to hasten him C through those painefull gates of death: had I stricken him as an enemy, I had deserved the blow I had given; now I lent him the hand of a friend: why am I punished for obeying the voyce of a King? and for perfiting what himselfe begun, and could not finish: And if neither his owne wound, nor mine, had dispatched him, the Philistims were at his heeles, ready to doe this same act with insultation, which I did in favour: and if my hand had not prevented him, where had beene the Crowne of Israel, which I now have here presented to thee: I could have delivered that to King Achish, and have beene rewarded with honour: let mee not dye for an act well meant to thee, however construed by thee: But no pretence can make his own tale not deadly: (Thy blood be upon thine owne head, for thine owne mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slaine the Lords Anointed.) It is a just supposition, that eveD ry man is so great a Favourer of himselfe, that he will not mis-report his owne actions, nor say the worst of himselfe: In matter of confession, men may without injury be taken at their words: If he did it, his fact was capitall; If he did it not, his lye: It is pitty any other recompence should befall those false flatterers, that can be content to father a sinne, to get thankes. Every drop of royall blood is sacred: For a man to say that he hath shed it, is mortall. Of how farre different spirits from this of Davids, are those men, which suborne the death of Princes, and celebrate and canonize the Murtherers! Into their secret let not my soule come; my glory, bee thou not joyned to their Assembly.

Abner and Joab.

HOw mercifull & seasonable are the provisions of God? Ziklag was now nothing but ruines and ashes: David might returne to the soile where it stood, to the roofes and wals he could not: No sooner is he disappointed of that harbour, then God provides him Cities of Hebron: Saul shal die to give him elbow-room: Now doth David find the comfort that his extremity sought in the Lord his God: Now are his clouds for a time passed over: and the Sun breakes gloriously forth: David shall raigne after his sufferings. So shall we, if we endure to the end, finde a Crowne of Righteousnesse, which the Lord the Righteous Judge, shall give us at that day: But though David well knew that his head was long before anointed, & had heard Saul himselfe confidently avouching his Succeſſion: yet he will not ſtirre from the heaps of Ziklag till hee have conſulted with the Lord: It did not content him, that he had Gods warrant for the Kingdome; but he muſt have his inſtructions for the taking poſſeſſion of it: How ſafe and happy is the man that is reſolved to doe nothing without God? Neither wil generalities of direction be ſufficient; even particular circumſtances muſt looke for a word: ſtill is God a Pillar of fire, and cloud to the eye of every Iſraelite: neither may there be any motion or ſtay but from him; That action cannot but ſucceed, which proceeds upon ſo ſure a warrant. A

God ſends him to Hebron a City of Judah: Neither will David go up thither alone, but he takes with him all his men with their whole houſholds: they ſhall take ſuch part as himſelfe: As they had ſhared with him in his miſery, ſo they ſhall now in his proſperity: Neither doth he take advantage of their late mutiny (which was yet freſh and green) to caſheire thoſe unthankfull, & ungracious followers, but pardoning their ſecret rebellions, he makes them partakers of his good ſucceſſe. Thus doth our heavenly Leader (whom David prefigured) take us to raigne with him who have ſuffered with him: paſſing by our manifold infirmities, as if they had not been, hee removeth us from the Land of our baniſhment, and the aſhes of our forlorne Ziklag, to the Hebron of our Peace and glory: The expectation of this day muſt (as it did with Davids Soldiers) digeſt all our ſorrowes. B

Never any calling of God was ſo conſpicuous, as not to finde ſome Oppoſites: What Iſraelite did not know David appointed by God to the ſucceſſion of the Kingdome? Even the Amalekite, could carry the Crowne to him as the true Owner: yet there wants not, an Abner to reſiſt him, & the Title of an Iſhboſheth to colour his reſiſtance: If any of Sauls houſe could have made challenge to the Crown, it ſhould have been Mephiboſheth the ſonne of Ionathan: Who, it ſeemes had too much of his Fathers blood to be a Competitor with David: the queſtion is not, who may claime the moſt right, but who may beſt ſerve the faction; Neither was Iſhboſheth any other then Abners Stale. Saul could not have a fitter Courtier: whether in the imitation of his Maſters envy, or the ambition of ruling under a borrowed name, hee ſtrongly oppoſed David: there are thoſe who ſtrive againſt their owne hearts, to make a ſide, with whom conſcience is oppreſſed by affection: An ill quarrel once undertaken ſhall bee maintained although with blood: Now, not ſo much the blood of Saul, as the ingagement of Abner makes the Warre. The ſonnes of Zeruiah ſtand faſt to David: It is much, how a man placeth his firſt intereſt: If Abner had beene in Ioabs roome, when Sauls diſpleaſure drove David from the Court, or Ioab in Abners, theſe actions, theſe events had been changed with the perſons: It was the onely happineſſe of Ioab that he fell on the better ſide. C D

Both the Commanders under David and Iſhboſheth were equally cruell: both are ſo inured to blood, that they make but a ſport of killing. Cuſtome makes ſinne ſo familiar, that the horror of it, is to ſome turned into pleaſure. (Come let the young men play before us.) Abner is the Challenger, and ſpeeds thereafter: for though in the matches of Duell both ſides miſcarryed, yet in the following conflict, Abner and his men are beaten: By the ſucceſſe of thoſe ſingle Combats no man knowes the better of the cauſe: Both ſides periſh, to ſhew, how little God liked either the offer, or the acceptation of ſuch a tryall; but when both did their beſt, God puniſheth the wrong part with diſcomfiture. E

Oh, the miſery of civill diſſention! Iſrael and Judah were brethren. One carried the name of the Father, the other of the Sonne: Iudah was but a branch of Iſrael, Iſrael was the roote of Judah: yet Iſrael and Judah muſt fight, and kill each other; onely upon the quarrell of an ill Leaders ambition. The ſpeed of Aſahel was not greater than his courage: It was a minde fit for one of Davids worthies, to ſtrike at the head, to match himſelfe with the beſt: He was both ſwift and ſtrong: but the race is not to the ſwift, nor the battle to the ſtrong: If he had gone never ſo ſlowly, he might have overtaken death: now he runnes to fetch it. So little luſt had Abner to ſhed the blood of a ſonne of Zeruiah, that he twice adviſes him to retreate from purſuing his owne perill: Aſahels cauſe was ſo much better as Abners ſucceſſe: Many

A a one miſcarryes in the raſh proſecution of a good quarrell, when the Abettors of the worſt part goe away with victory. Heate of zeale, ſometimes in the undiſcreete purſuit of a juſt Adverſary, prooves mortall to the agent, prejudiciall to the ſervice.

Abner, whiles he kils, yet he flyes, and runnes away from his owne death, whiles he inflicts it upon another: Davids followers had the better of the field and day; The Sunne as unwilling to ſee any more Iſraelitiſh blood ſhed by brethren, hath withdrawne himſelfe: and now both parts having got the advantage of an hill under them, have ſafe convenience of parley: Abner beginnes, and perſwades Ioab to ſurceaſe the fight (Shall the ſword devoure for ever? knoweſt thou not, that it will be bitterneſſe in the end? How long ſhall it be, ere thou bid the people returne from following their
B brethren?) It was his fault that the ſword devoured at all: and why was not the beginning of a civill War, bitterneſſe? Why did he call forth the people to ſkirmiſh, and invite them to death? Had Abner been on the winning hand, this motion had been thank-worthy: It is a noble diſpoſition in a Victor, to call for a ceſſation of Armes: whereas neceſſity wrings this ſuit from the over-maſtered. There cannot be a greater praiſe, to a valiant and wiſe Commander, than a propenſion to all juſt termes of peace: For warre as it is ſomtimes neceſſary, ſo it is alwayes evill; and if fighting have any other end propoſed beſides peace, it proves murder. Abner ſhall finde himſelfe no leſſe overcome, by Ioab in clemencie, than power; He ſayes not, I will not ſo eaſily leave the advantage of my victory: ſince the Dice of warre runne on my ſide, I will follow the chance of my good ſucceſſe: Thou ſhouldeſt have con-
C ſidered of this before thy provocation: It is now too late, to move unto forbearance. But, as a man that meant to approve himſelfe equally free from cowardiſe, in the beginning of the conflict, and from cruelty in the end; he profeſſeth his forwardneſſe to entertaine any pretence of ſheathing up the ſwords of Iſrael; and ſweares to Abner, that if it had not beene for his proud irritation, the people had in the morning before ceaſed from that bloody purſuit of their brethren. As it becomes publike perſons to be lovers of peace, ſo they muſt ſhew it upon all good occaſions: letting paſſe no opportunity of making ſpare of blood.

Iſhboſheth was (it ſeemes) a man of no great ſpirits, for being no leſſe than forty yeares old, when his father went into his laſt field againſt the Philiſtims, hee was content to ſtay at home; Abner hath put ambition into him; and hath eaſily raiſed
D him to the head of a faction, againſt the anointed Prince of Gods people. If this uſurped Crowne of Sauls Sonne, had any worth or glory in it, he cannot but acknowledge to owe it all unto Abner; yet how forward is unthankfull Iſhboſheth to receive a falſe ſuggeſtion againſt his chiefe Abettor: (Wherefore haſt thou gone in to my fathers Concubine?) He that made no conſcience of an unjuſt claime to the Crowne, and a maintenance of it with blood, yet ſeemes ſcrupulous of a leſſe ſinne, that carryed in it the colour of a diſgrace; The touch of her, who had been honoured by his fathers bed, ſeemed an intolerable preſumption, and ſuch as could not be ſevered from his owne diſhonour: Selfe-love ſometimes borrowes the face of honeſt zeale. Thoſe, who out of true grounds diſlike ſinnes, doe hate them all indifferently, according to their hainouſneſſe; Hypocrites are partiall in their deteſtation, bewraying ever moſt
E bitterneſſe againſt thoſe offences, which may moſt prejudice their perſons and reputations.

It is as dangerous as unjuſt for Princes, to give both their eares and their heart to miſgrounded rumours of their innocent followers: This wrong hath ſtript Iſhboſheth of the Kingdome: Abner in the meane time cannot be excuſed from a trecherous inconſtancy: If Sauls ſon had no true Title to the Crowne, why did he maintaine it? If he had, why did he forſake the cauſe and perſon? Had Abner out of remorſe, for furthering a falſe claime, taken off his hand, I know not wherein he could be blamed except for not doing it ſooner: But now to withdraw his profeſſed allegeance, upon a private revenge, was to take a lewd leave of an ill action: If Iſhboſheth were his lawfull Prince, no injury could warrant a revolt: Even betwixt private perſons, a returne of wrongs is both uncharitable, & unjuſt, how ever this goe currant for the cõmon

juſtice

iuſtice of the World: how much more ſhould we learne from a ſupreme hand, to take hard meaſures with thankes? It had beene Abners duty, to have given his King a peaceable and humble ſatisfaction, and not to flye out in a ſnuffe. If the ſpirit of the Ruler riſe up againſt thee, leave not thy place; for yeelding pacifieth great offences: now, his impatient falling, although to the right ſide, makes him no better than traiterouſly honeſt. A

So ſoone as Abner had entertained a reſolution of his rebellion; he perſwades the Elders of Iſrael to accõpany him in the change: and whence doth he fetch his main motive but from the Oracle of God? (The Lord hath ſpoken of David ſaying, By the hand of my ſeruant David, will I ſaue my people Iſrael, out of the hand of the Philiſtims, & out of the hand of all their enemies;) Abner knew this ful wel before, yet then was wel content to ſmother a knowne truth for his owne turne, and now the publication of it may ſerve for his advantage, he wins the heart of Iſrael, by ſhewing Gods Charter for him, whom he had ſo long oppoſed: Hypocrites make uſe of God for their own purpoſes; and care only to make divine authority a colour for their owne deſignes; No man ever heard Abner godly till now: neither had he been ſo at this time, if hee had not intended a revengefull departure from Iſhboſheth: Nothing is more odious, than to make Religion a ſtalking horſe to Policy. B

Who can but glorifie God in his juſtice, when hee ſees the bitter end of this treacherous diſſimulation? David may upon conſiderations of State, entertaine his new Gueſt with a Feaſt; and well might he ſeeme to deſerve a welcome, that undertakes to bring all Iſrael to the league and homage of David: but God never meant to uſe ſo unworthy meanes, for ſo good a worke. Ioab returnes from purſuing a troupe, and finding Abner diſmiſſed in peace and expectation of beneficiall returne, followes him, and whether out of envy, at a new rivall of honour, or out of the revenge of Aſahel, he repayes him both diſſimulation & death. God doth moſt juſtly by Ioab, that which Ioab did for himſelfe moſt unjuſtly: I know not (ſetting the quarrell aſide) whether we can worthily blame Abner for the death of Aſahel, who would needs after faire warnings run himſelfe upon Abners Speare: yet this fact ſhall procure his paiment for worſe. Now is Iſhboſhethʒ wrong revenged by an enemy; we may not alwayes meaſure the Juſtice of Gods proceedings, by preſent occaſions: Hee needs not make us acquainted, or aſke us leave when hee will call for the arrerages of forgotten ſinnes. Contemplations.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY VERY GOOD LORD,

WILLIAM

LORD BVRLEIGH,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

THere are but two Bookes wherein wee can reade God; The one is his Word, his Works the other: This is the bigger Volume, that the more exquiſite. The Characters of this are more large, but dim; of that, ſmaller, but clearer. Philoſophers have turned over this and erred; That, Divines and ſtudious Chriſtians, not without full & certain information. In the Works of God we ſee the ſhadow, or footſteps of the Creator, in his Word we ſee the face of God in a glaſſe. Happineſſe conſiſts in the Viſion of that infinite Majeſtie: and if we be perfectly happy above in ſeeing him face to face, our happineſſe is well forward below, in ſeeing the lively repreſentatiõ of his face in the glaſſe of the Scriptures.

tures. We cannot ſpend our eyes too much upon this Object: For me, the more I ſee, the more I am amazed, the more I am raviſhed with this glorious beauty. With the honeſt Lepers I cannot be content to enjoy this happy ſight alone: there is but one way to every mans felicity. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip to take part with many your Peerès, in theſe my weake, but not unprofitable Contemplations; which ſhall hold themſelves not a little graced with your Honourable Name; Whereto, together with your right Noble and moſt Worthy Lady, I have gladly devoted my ſelfe, to be

Your Lordſhips in all

dutifull obſervance,

THE FIFTEENTH BOOKE.

Uzzah, and the Arke removed.

THe houſe of Saul is quiet, the Philiſtims beaten, victory cannot end better then in devotion; David is no ſooner ſetled in his houſe at Jeruſalem, then he fetcheth God to be his gueſt there; the thouſands of Iſrael go now in an holy march, to bring up the Ark of God, to the place of his reſt; The tumults of War offorded no opportunity of this ſervice; onely peace is a friend to Religion, neither is peace ever our friend, but when it is a ſervant of Piety: The uſe of Warre is not more pernicious to the body, then the abuſe of peace is to the ſoule; Alas, the Riot bred of our long eaſe, rather drives the Arke of God from us; ſo the ſtill ſedentary life, is ſubject to diſeaſes, and ſtanding waters putrifie. It may be juſt with God, to take away the bleſſing which we do ſo much abuſe; and to ſcoure off our ruſt with bloody Warre, &c.

The Arke of God had now many yeeres, reſted in the obſcure lodge of Abinadab, without the honour of a Tabernacle. David will not endure himſelfe glorious, and the Arke of God contemptible; his firſt care is to provide a fit roome for God in the head of the Tribes, in his owne City. The chiefe care of good Princes, muſt bee the advancement of Religion; What ſhould the Deputies of God rather doe than honor him whom they repreſent? It was no good that Iſrael could learn of Philiſtims; Thoſe Pagans had ſent the Arke back in a new Cart; the Iſraelites ſaw God bleſſed that conduct, and now they practiſe it at home: But that which God will take from Philiſtims, he will not brooke from Iſrael: Aliens from God are no fit patterns for children: Divine inſtitution had made this a cariage for the Levites, not for oxen: Neither ſhould thoſe ſons of Abinadab have driven the Cart, but caried that ſacred burden. Gods buſineſſes muſt be done after his owne formes, which if we do with the beſt intentions alter, we preſume.

It is long ſince Iſrael ſaw ſo fayre a day as this, wherein they went in this holy Triumph to fetch the Arke of God; Now their Warlike Trumpets are turned into Harps and Timbrels; and their hands in ſtead of weilding the Sword and Speare, ſtrike upon thoſe muſicall ſtrings whereby they might expreſſe the joy of their hearts: Here was no noyſe but of mirth, no motion but pleaſant: Oh happy Iſ-rael that had a God to rejoyce in, that had this occasion of rejoycing in their God, and an heart that embraced this occasion. There is nothing but this wherein wee may not joy immoderately, unseasonably; this spirituall joy can never be either out of time, or out of measure: Let him that rejoyceth, rejoyce in the Lord. But now when the Israelites were in the midst of this Angel-like jollity, their hearts lifted up, their hands playing, their feet moving, their tongues singing and shouting, God sees good to strike them into a sudden dumpe by the death of Vzzah: They are scarce set into the tune, when God marres their Musicke, by a fearefull judgment; and changes their mirth into astonishment, and confusion; There could not bee a more excellent work then this they were about; there could not be more chearefull hearts in the performing of it, yet will the most holy God rather dash all this solemne service, then endure an act of presumption or infidelitie. Abinadab had beene the faithfull Host of Gods Arke for the space of twenty yeeres: even in the midst of the terrors of Israel, who were justly affrighted with the vengeance inflicted upon Beth-shemesh, did he give harbor unto it; Yet even the son of Abinadab is stricken dead, in the first departing of that blessed guest: The Sanctity of the Parent cannot beare out the sin of his Son: The Holy one of Israel will be sanctified in all that come neere him: He will be served like himselfe.

What then was the sin of Vzzah? What was the capitall crime, for which he so fearefully perished? That the Arke of God was committed to the Cart, it was not his device only, but the common act of many; That it was not caried on the shoulders of Levites, was no lesse the fault of Abio, and the rest of their Brethren; only Vzzah is stricken: The rest sinned innegligence, he in presumption; the Arke of God shakes with the agitation of that carriage; he puts forth his hand to hold it steddy: Humane judgement would have found herein nothing haynous: God sees not with the eyes of men; None but the Priests should have dared to touch the Arke; It was enough for the Levites to touch the barres that carried it: An unwarranted hand cannot so lightly touch the Arke, but he strikes the God that dwels in it: No marvel if God strike that man with death, that strikes him with Presumption; There was wel-neere the same quarrell against the thousands of Bethshemesh, and against Vzzah; They dyed for looking into the Arke, he for touching it; lest Israel should grow into a contemptuous familiarity with this Testimony of Gods presence, he wil hold them in awe with Judgments. The revenging hand of the Almighty, that upon the returne of the Arke staied at the house of Abidnadab, upon the remove of the Arke begins there againe: Where are those that thinke God will take up with a careless and slubbred service? He whose infinite mercie uses to passe by our sins of infirmity, punisheth yet severely our bold faults: If we cannot do any thing in the degrees that he requireth; yet we must learne to do al things in the forme that he requireth; Doubtlesse Vzzah meant no otherwise then well, in putting forth his hand to stay the Arke; He knew the sacred Utensils that were in it, the Pott of Manna, the Tables of the Law, the Rod of Aaron, which might be wronged by that over-rough motion: to these he offers his aid, and is stricken dead: The best intention cannot excuse; much lesse warrant us in unlawfull actions: where we do ought in faith, it pleaseth our good God to winke at, and pitty our weakenesses; but if wee dare to present God with the wel-meant services of our owne making, we run into the indignation of God; There is nothing more dangerous than to be our owne carvers in matter of Devotion.

I marvell not if the countenance of David were suddenly changed, to see the pale face of death in one of the chiefe Actors in this holy Procession: He that had found God so favourable to him in actions of lesse worth, is troubled to see this successe of a businesse so heartily directed unto his God; and now he beginnes to looke thorow Vzzah at himselfe, and to say, (How shall the Arke of the Lord come to me?) Then onely shall we make a right use of the judgements of God upon others, when we shall feare them in our selves, and finding our sinnes at least equall, shall tremble at the expectation of the same deserved punishments. God intends not only revenge in his execution, but reformation; As good Princes regard not so much the smart of the

A the evill past, as the prevention of the future; which is never attained but when we make applications of Gods hand: and draw common causes out of Gods particular proceedings.

I do not heare David say; Surely, this man is guilty of some secret sinne, that the World knows not, God hath met with him, there is no danger to us, why should I be discouraged to see God just? we may go on safely & prosper: But here his foot staies, and his hand fals from his Instrument, & his tongue is ready to taxe his own unworthinesse, (How shall the Arke of the Lord come unto me?) That heart is carnal and proud, that thinks any man worse then himselfe; Davids feare stayes his progresse: Perhaps he might have proceeded with good successe, but he dares not venture, where he sees such a deadly check: It is better to be too feareful, then too forward in those affaires,
B which do immediately concerne God; As it is not good to refraine from holy businesses, so it is worse to do them ill; Awfulnesse is a safe Interpreter of Gods secret actions, and a wise guide of ours.

THIS event hath holpen Obed-Edom to a guest he lookt not for, God shall now sojourne in the house of him, in whose heart he dwelt before by a strong faith: else the man durst not have undertaken to receive that dreadfull Arke, which David himselfe feared to harbour; Oh the courage of an honest and faithfull heart! Obed-Edom knew wel enough what slaughter the Arke had made amongst the Philistims, and after that amongst the Bethshemites, and now he saw Vzzah lye dead before him, yet doth he not make any scruple of entertaining it, neither doth he say, My Neighbour Abinadab was a carefull and religious host to the Arke, and is now payed
C with the blood of his son: how shall I hope to speed better? but he opens his doores with a bold cheerefulnes, and notwithstanding all those terrors, bids God welcome: Nothing can make God not amiable to his own; Even his very justice is lovely: Holy men know how to rejoyce in the Lord with trembling, and can feare without discouragement.

The God of heaven will not receive any thing from men on free cost: hee will pay liberally for his lodging, a plentifull blessing upon Obed-Edom, and all his household. It was an honour to that zealous Gittite, that the Arke should come under his roofe; yet God rewards that honour with benediction; Never man was a loser by true godlinesse. The house of Obed-Edom cannot this while want observation: the eyes of David, and all Israel were never off from it, to see how it fared with this en-D tertainment. And now, when they finde nothing, but a gracious acceptation and sensible blessing, the good King of Israel takes new heart, and hastens to fetch the Arke into his royall City. The view of Gods favours upon the Godly, is no small encouragement to confidence and obedience: Doubtlesse, Obed-Edom was not free from some weakenesses; If the Lord should have taken the advantage of Judgement against him, what Israelites had not been disheartened from attending the Arke? Now David and Israel was not more affrighted with the vengeance upon Vzzah, then encouraged by the blessing of Obed-Edom: The wise God doth so order his just and mercifull proceedings, that the awfulnesse of men may be tempered with love. Now the sweet singer of Israel revives his holy Musicke; and addes both more spirit and more pompe to so devout a businesse: I did not before heare of Trum-
E pets, nor dancing, nor shouting, nor sacrifice, nor the linnen Ephod: The sense of Gods passed displeasure, doubles our care to please him, and our joy in his recovered approbation: wee never make so much of our health as after sickenesse, nor never are so officious to our friend, as after an unkindnesse. In the first setting out of the Arke, Davids feare was at least an equall match to his joy; therefore after the first sixe paces he offered a sacrifice, both to pacifie God, and thanke him: but now when they saw no signe of dislike, they did more freely let themselves loose to a feareless joy; and the body strove to expresse the holy affection of the soule; there was no limme, no part that did not professe their mirth by motion, no noise of voice, or instrument wanted to assist their spirituall jollity; David led the way, dancing with all his might in his linnen Ephod: Vzzah was still in his eye, he durst not usurpe upon a garment of Priests, but will borrow their colour to grace the solemnity, though hee dare not the fashion. White was ever the colour of joy,& Linnen was light for use, therefore he covers his Princely Robes with white linnen,& meanes to honor himselfe by his conformity to Gods Ministers. Those that think there is disgrace in the Ephod,are far from the spirit of the man after Gods owne heart. Neither can there be a greater argument of a foule soule,then a dislike of the glorious calling of God: Barren Mical hath too many sons that scorne the holy habit and exercises: she looks through her window,& seeing the attyre and gestures of her devout husband,despiseth him in her heart, neither can she cõceale her contempt,but like Sauls Daughter casts it proudly in his face(Oh how glorious was the King of Israel this day,which was uncovered this day in the eyes of the Maidens of his servants, as a foole uncovereth himselfe.) Worldly hearts can see nothing in actions of zeale but folly and madnes: Piety hath no relish to their palate but distastfull.

DAVIDS heart did never swell so much at any reproch, as this of his wife; his love was for the time lost in his anger;and as a man impatient of no affront so much as in the way of his devotion,he returnes a bitter checke to his Mical; (It was before the Lord, which chose me rather than thy Father, and all his house, &c.) Had not Mical twitted her Husband with the shame of his zeale,she had not heard of the shameful rejection of her father;now since she wil be forgetting whose Wife she was,she shal be put in minde whose Daughter she was. Contumelies that are cast upon us in the causes of God,may safely be repaied: If we be meale-mouthed in the scornes of Religion,we are not patient,but zealeless: Here we may not forbeare her,that lyes in our bosome. If David had not loved Mical dearely, he had never stood upon those points with Abner; He knew that if Abner came to him,the kingdome of Israel would accompany him, and yet he sends him the charge of not seeing his face, except he brought Mical,Sauls Daughter with him;as if he would not regard the Crown of Israel,whiles he wanted that Wife of his: Yet here he takes her up roundly, as if she had been an enemy,not a partner of his bed. All relations are aloofe off,in comparison of that betwixt God and the soule; He that loves Father, or Mother, or Wife, or Child,better then me (saith our Saviour) is not worthy of me. Even the highest delights of our hearts must be trampled upõ,whẽ they will stand out in rivality with God.Oh happy resolution of the royall Prophet, and Propheticall King of Israel,(I wil be yet more vile then thus,and will be low in mine own sight:)he knew this very abasement Heroicall; and that the onely way to true glory, is, not to be ashamed of our lowest humiliation unto God: Well might he promise himselfe honour from those,whose contempt she had threatned; The hearts of men are not their owne,he that made them over-rules them,and inclines them to an honorable conceit of those that honor their Maker;So as holy men have oft times inward reverence,evẽ where they have outward indignities. David came to blesse his house,Mical brings a curse upõ her selfe:Her scornes shall make her childless to the day of her death; Barrennesse was held in those times none of the least judgments;God doth so revenge Davids quarrell upon Mical,that her sudden disgrace,shal be recompenced with perpetuall:She shall not be held worthy to beare a son, to him whom she unjustly contemned;How just is it with God to provide whips for the backs of scorners?It is no marvell if those that mocke at goodnesse,be plagued with continuall fruitlesnesse.

Mephibosheth and Ziba.

SO soone as ever David can but breathe himselfe from the publike cares, he casts backe his thoughts to the deare remembrance of his Ionathan. Sauls servant is likely to give him the best intelligence of Sauls sonnes; The question is therefore moved to Ziba; Remaineth there none of the house of Saul?and lest suspition might cõceale the remainders of an emulous line,in feare of revenge intended,he adds:On whom I may shew the mercy of God for Ionathans sake?O friendship worthy of the Monumẽts of Eternity fit only to requite him, whose love was more than the love of women: He doth not say,

Is

A Is there any of the house of Ionathan, but, of Saul; that for his friends sake hee may shew favour to the Posterity of his Persecutor. Ionathans love could not be greater then Sauls malice, which also survived long in his issue; from whom David found a busie and stubborne rivalty for the Crowne of Israel: yet as one that gladly buried all the hostility of Sauls house in Ionathans grave, he askes, Is there any man left of Sauls house, that I may shew him mercy for Jonathans sake? It is true love, that over-living the person of a friend, will be inherited of his seed; but to love the posterity of an enemy in a friend, it is the miracle of friendship: The formall amity of the World is confined to a face: or to the possibility of recompence, languishing in the disability, and dying in the decease of the party affected: That love was ever false, that is not ever constant, and the most operative, when it cannot be either knowne
B or requited.

To cut off all unquiet competition for the Kingdome of Israel, the providence of God had so ordered, that there is none left of the house of Saul (besides the sons of his Concubines) save only young and lame Mephibosheth: so young, that he was but five yeares of age, when David entred upon the government of Israel; so lame, that if his age had fitted, his impotence had made him unfit for the Throne. Mephibosheth was not borne a Creeple; it was an heedlesse Nurse that made him so: She hearing of the death of Saul and Ionathan, made such haste to flee, that her young Master was lamed with the fall: Ywis, there needed no such speed to run away from David; whose love pursues the hidden son of his brother Ionathan: How often doth our ignorant mistaking, cause us to run from our best friends, and to catch knocks and maimes
C of them that professe our protection?

Mephibosheth could not come otherwise than fearefully, into the presence of David, whom he knew so long, so spitefully opposed by the house of Saul: he could not be ignorant, that the fashion of the World is to build their owne security upon the blood of the opposite faction; neither to think themselves safe, whiles any branch remaines springing out of that roote of their emulation: Seasonably doth David therfore first, expell all those unjust doubts, ere hee administer his further cordialls; (Feare not, for I will surely shew thee kindnesse, for Jonathan thy Fathers sake, and will restore thee all the fields of Saul thy Father, and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually.)

D David can see neither Sauls blood, nor lame legs in Mephibosheth, whiles he sees in him the features of his friend Ionathan; how much lesse shall the God of mercies regard our infirmities, or the corrupt blood of our sinfull Progenitors, whiles he beholds us in the face of his Son, in whom he is well pleased.

Favours are wont so much more to affect us, as they are lesse expected by us; Mephibosheth as over-joyed with so comfortable a word, and confounded in himselfe at the remembrance of the contrary deservings of his Family, bowes himselfe to the earth, and sayes (What is thy servant, that thou shouldst looke upon such a dead Dog as I am?) I finde no defect of wit (though of limmes) in Mephibosheth, he knew himselfe the Grand-child of the King of Israel, the Sonne of Ionathan, the lawfull heire of both, yet in regard of his owne impotency, and the trespasse and
E rejection of his house, he thus abaseth himselfe unto David; Humiliation is a right use of Gods affliction; What if hee were borne great? If the sinne of his Grand-father hath lost his estate, and the hand of his Nurse hath deformed and disabled his person, hee now fogets what hee was, and cals himselfe worse than hee is, A dogge: Yet a living Dogge is better than a dead Lyon; there is dignity and comfort in life, Mephibosheth is therefore a dead dogge unto David. It is not for us to nourish the same spirits in our adverse estate, that we found in our highest prosperity; What use have we made of Gods hand, if wee be not the lower with our fall? God intends we should carrie our crosse, not make a fire of it to warme us; It is no bearing up our sailes in a tempest. Good David cannot dis-esteeme Mephibosheth ever the more for disparaging himselfe: hee loves and honours this humility, in the Sonne of Ionathan; There is no more certaine way to glory and advancement, than a lowly dejection of our selves: He that made himselfe a Dogge, and therefore fit onely to lye under the table, yea a dead Dogge and therefore fit only for the ditch, is raiſed up to the table of a King; his ſeat ſhall be honourable, yea, royall; his fare delicious, his attendance noble. How much more will our gracious God lift up our heads, unto true honor before men and Angels, if wee can bee ſincerely humbled in his ſight? if wee miſcall our ſelves in the meanneſſe of our conceits to him, hee gives us a new name, and ſets us at the table of his glory; It is contrary with GOD and men; if they reckon of us as wee ſet our ſelves, hee values us according to our abaſements. Like a Prince truly munificent and faithfull, David promiſes and performes at once; Ziba, Sauls ſervant, hath the charge given him, of the execution of that royall word; Hee ſhall bee the Bayliffe of this great Husbandry of his Maſter Mephiboſheth; The Land of Saul, how ever forfeited, ſhall know no other Maſter then Sauls Grand-child. As yet, Sauls ſervant had ſped better than his Son: I read of twenty ſervants of Ziba, none of Mephiboſheth; Earthly poſſeſſions doe not alwayes admit of equall diviſions; The Wheele is now turned up; Mephiboſheth is a Prince, Ziba is his Officer; I cannot but pitty the condition of this good Son of Ionathan; Into ill hands did honeſt Mephiboſheth fall, firſt, of a careleſſe Nurſe, then of a trecherous ſervant; She maymed his body, he would have overthrowne his eſtate; After ſome yeares of eye-ſervice to Mephiboſheth, wicked Ziba intends to give him a worſe fall then his Nurſe. Never any Court was free from Detractors, from Delators; who if they ſee a man to be a Creeple, that he cannot goe to ſpeake for himſelfe, will be telling Tales of him in the eares of the Great; ſuch an one was this prefidious Ziba; who taking the opportunity of Davids flight from his Sonne Abſolom, followes him with a faire preſent, and a falſe Tale, accuſing his impotent Maſter of a foule and traiterous ingratitude; labouring to tread upon his lame Lord to raiſe himſelfe to honour: True-hearted Mephiboſheth had as good a will as the beſt; if he could have commanded legs, he had not beene left behind David: now that he cannot go with him, he will not be well without him, and therefore puts himſelfe to a wilfull and ſullen penance, for the abſence and danger of his King; he will not ſo much as put on cleane clothes for the time, as he that could not have any joy in himſelfe, for the want of his Lord David: Unconſcionable Miſcreants care not how they collogue, whom they ſlander for a private advantage; Lewd Ziba comes with a gift in his hand, and a ſmooth Tale in his mouth; Oh Sir, you thought you had a Ionathan at home, but you will find a Saul; It were pitty but he ſhould be ſet at your Table, that would ſit in your Throne; you thought Sauls Land would have contented Mephiboſheth, but he would have al yours; though he be lame, yet he would be climbing: would you have thought that this Creeple could bee plotting for your Kingdome, now that you are gone aſide? Iſhboſheth will never dye while Mephiboſheth lives: How did he now forget his impotence, and raiſed up his ſpirits in hope of a day; and durſt ſay, that now the time was come, wherein the Crowne ſhould revert to Sauls true heire. Oh Viper: if a Serpent bite in ſecret when he is not charmed, no better is a Slanderer; Honeſt Mephiboſheth in good manners made a dead dog of himſelfe, when David offered him the favour of his board; but Ziba would make him a very Dog indeed, an ill natur'd Cur, that when David did thus kindly feed him at his own table, would not only bite his fingers, but flye at his throat.

But what ſhall wee ſay to this? Neither earthly Soveraignty, nor holineſſe can exempt men from humane infirmity. Wiſe and good David hath now but one eare; and that miſ-led with credulity: His charity in beleeving Ziba, makes him uncharitable in diſtruſting, in cenſuring Mephiboſheth. The detractor hath not onely ſudden credit given him, but Sauls Land; Ionathans Son hath loſt (unheard) that inheritance which was given him unſought. Heare-ſay is no ſafe ground of any judgment; Ziba ſlaunders, David beleeves, Mephiboſheth ſuffers.

Lyes ſhall not alwaies proſper, God will not abide the truth to be ever oppreſſed; At laſt Ionathans lame Son ſhall be found as ſound in heart, as lame in his body; He whoſe ſoule was like his Father Ionathans ſoule, whoſe body was like to his Grandfather Sauls ſoule, meets David (as it is high time) upon his return; beſtirs his tongue to discharge himselfe of so foule a slaunder; The more horrible the crime had been, the more villanous was the unjust suggestion of it,& the more necessary was a just Apology; Sweetly therefore, and yet passionately doth he labour to greaten Davids favours to him; his owne obligations and vilenesse; shewing himselfe more affected with his wrong, then with his losse; welcomming David home with a thankfull neglect of himselfe, as not caring that Ziba had his substance, now that he had his King. David is satisfied, Mephibosheth restored to favour & lands; here are two kind hearts well met. David is full of satisfaction from Mephibosheth; Mephibosheth runnes over with joy in David: David, like a gracious King, gives Mephibosheth (as before) Sauls Lands to halves with Ziba; Mephibosheth, like a King, gives all to Ziba for joy that God had given him David: All had been well, if Ziba had fared worse: Pardon me O holy and glorious soule of a Prophet, of a King, after Gods owne heart; I must needs blame thee for mercy: A fault that the best & most generous natures are most subject to. It is pitty that so good a thing should doe hurt; yet we find that the best, misused is most dangerous: Who should be the patterne of Kings but the King of God? Mercy is the goodliest Flower in his Crowne, much more in theirs, but with a difference: Gods mercy is infinite, theirs limited: he sayes, I will have mercy on whom I will: they must say, I will have mercy on whom I should. And yet he, for all his infinite mercy, hath vessels of wrath, so must they; of whom his Justice hath said, Thine eye shall not spare them: A good man is pittifull to his beast, shall he therefore make much of Toades and Snakes? Oh that Ziba should go away with any possession, save of shame and sorrow, that he should be coupled with a Mephibosheth in a partnership of Estates. Oh that David had changed the word a little.

A division was due here indeed; but of Ziba's eares from his head, or his head from his shoulders, for going about so maliciously, to divide David from the Sonne of Jonathan: An Eye for an Eye, was Gods Rule; If that had beene true, which Ziba suggested against Mephibosheth, he had been worthy to lose his head with his Lands; being false, it had been but reason, Ziba should have changed heads with Mephibosheth: Had not holy David himselfe beene so stung with the venemous tongues, that he cryes out in the bitternesse of his soule, What reward shall bee given thee, O thou false tongue? Even sharpe arrowes with hot burning coales; He that was so sensible of himselfe in Doegs wrong, doth he feele so little of Mephibosheth in Zibaes? Are these the Arrowes of Davids Quiver; are these his hot burning coales (Thou and Ziba divide?) He that had said, their tongue is a sharpe sword, now that the sword of just revenge is in his hand, is this the blow he gives, Divide the possession? I know not whether, excesse, or want of mercy may prove most dangerous in the Great; the one discourages good intentions with feare; the other may encourage wicked practices through presumption; Those that are in eminent place must learn the mid-way betwixt both; so pardoning faults that they may not provoke them; so punishing them, that they may not dishearten vertuous and well-meant actions; they must learne to sing that absolute Ditty (wherof David had here forgottten one part) of Mercy and Judgment.

Hanun and Davids Ambassadours.

IT is not the meaning of Religion, to make men uncivill: If the King of Ammon were heathenish, yet his kindnesse may be acknowledged, may be returned by the King of Israel. I say not, but that perhaps David might maintain too strait a league with that forbidden Nation; A little friendship is enough to an Idolater; but even the savage Canibals may receive an answer of outward courtesie: If a very dog fawne upon us we stroake him on the head, and clap him on the side; much lesse is the common band of humanity untyed by Grace: Disparity in spirituall Professions, is no warrant for Ingratitude: He therefore whose good nature proclaimed to shew mercy to any branch of Sauls House, Houſe, for Ionathans ſake, will now alſo ſhew kindneſſe to Hanun, for the ſake of Nahaſh his father.

It was the ſame Nahaſh that offered the cruell condition to the men of Jabeſh Gilead, of thruſting out their right eyes for the admiſſion into his covenant. Hee that was thus bloody in his Deſignes againſt Iſrael, yet was kinde to David; perhaps for no cauſe ſo much as Sauls oppoſition; And yet even this favour is held worthy both of memory and retribution: Where wee have the Acts of courteſie, it is not neceſſary wee ſhould enter into a ſtrict examination of the grounds of it; whiles the benefit is ours, let the intention be their owne; What ever the hearts of men are, wee muſt looke at their hands, and repay, not what they meant, but what they did.

Nahaſh is dead, David ſends Ambaſſadors to condole his loſſe, and to comfort his Son Hanun. No Ammonite but is ſadly affected with the death of a Father, though it gaine him a Kingdome: Even Eſau could ſay, the dayes of mourning for my Father will come; No earthly advantage can fill up the gap of nature: Thoſe children are worſe then Ammonites, that can thinke either gaine, or liberty, worthy to countervaile a parents loſſe.

Carnall men are wont to meaſure anothers foot by their owne Laſt; their owne falſhood makes them unjuſtly ſuſpicious of others. The Princes of Ammon, becauſe they are guilty to their owne hollowneſſe and doubleneſſe of heart, are ready ſo to judge of David and his Meſſengers, (Thinkeſt thou that David doth honor thy Father, that he hath ſent comforters unto thee? Hath not David rather ſent his owne ſervants to thee, to ſearch the City, and to ſpye it out, to overthrow it? It is hard for a wicked heart to think well of any other; becauſe it can thinke none better than it ſelfe, and knows it ſelfe evill: The freer a man is from vice himſelf, the more charitable he uſes to be unto others.

Whatſoever David was particularly in his own perſon, it was ground enough of prejudice, that he was an Iſraelite; It was an hereditary and deepe ſetled hatred, that the Ammonites had conceived againſt their brethren of Iſrael: neither can they forget that ſhameful and fearefull foyle, which they received from the reſcuers of Iabeſh Gilead; and now ſtill do they ſtomach at the name of Iſrael; Malice once conceived in worldly hearts, is not eaſily extinguiſhed, but upon all occaſions, is ready to break forth into a flame of revengfull actions.

Nothing can bee more dangerous, than for young Princes to meet with ill Counſell in the entrance of their Government; for both then are they moſt prone to take it, and moſt difficultly recovered from it; if we be ſet out of our way in the beginning of our journey, we wander all the day; How happy is that State, where both the Counſellours are faithfull, to give only good advice; and the King wiſe to diſcerne good advice from evill: the young King of Ammon is eaſily drawne to beleeve his Peeres, and to miſtruſt the meſſengers; and having now in his conceit turned them into ſpyes, entertaines them with a ſcornefull diſgrace; hee ſhaves off one halfe of their beards, and cuts off one halfe of their garments; expoſing them to the deriſion of all the beholders. The Iſraelites were forbidden either a ſhaven beard; or a ſhort garment; in deſpight, perhaps, of their Law theſe Embaſſadours are ſent away with both, certainly in a deſpight of their Maſter, and a ſcorn of their perſons.

King David is not a little ſenſible of the abuſe of his Meſſengers, and of himſelfe in them; Firſt, therefore he deſires to hide their ſhame, then to revenge it. Man hath but a double ornament of body, the one of nature, the other of Art; The naturall ornament is the haire, the artificiall is apparell; Davids Meſſengers are deformed in both; The one is eaſily ſupplied by a new ſuite, the other can onely be ſupplied out of the Ward-robe of time, Tarrie at Iericho till your beards bee growne. How eaſily had this deformity beene removed, if as Hanun had ſhaven one ſide of their faces, ſo they had ſhaven the other; what had this beene but to reſemble their yonger age, or that other ſexe, in neither of which, doe we uſe to place any imagination of unbeſeeming; neither did there want ſome of their neighbour Nations, whoſe whose faces age it selfe had not wont to cover with this shade of hayre: But so respective is good David, and his wise Senatours, of their Countrie-formes; that they shall by appointment rather tary abroad, till time have wrought their conformity, then vary from the received fashions of their owne people. Alas, into what a licentious variety of strange disguises are we falne? The glory of Attire is sought in novelty, in mishapennesse, in monstrousnesse: There is much latitude, much liberty in the use of these indifferent things; but because wee are free, wee may not runne wilde: and never thinke wee have scope enough, unlesse wee out-runne modestie.

It is lawfull for publike persons, to feele their own indignities, and to endeavour their revenge. Now David sends all the host of the mighty men to punish Ammon, for so foule an abuse; Those that received the Messengers of his love with scorne and insolency, shall now be severely saluted with the Messengers of his wrath. It is just both with God and men, that they, who know not how to take favours aright, should smart with judgments. Kindnesse repulsed, breaks forth into indignation, how much more when it is repayed with an injurious affront?

David cannot but feele his owne cheekes shaven, and his owne Coat cut, in his Embassadours; they did but cary his person to Hanun; neither can hee therefore but appropriate to himselfe the kindnesse, or injurie offered unto them: He that did so take to heart the cutting off but the lap of King Sauls Garment, when it was layd aside from him, how must he needs be affected with this disdainfull halving of his haire and Robes, in the person of his deputies? The name of Embassadours hath been ever sacred, and by the universall Law of Nations, hath carried in it sufficient protection, from all publike wrongs, neither hath it beene ever violated, without a revenge. Oh God, what shall we say to those notorious contempts which are dayly cast upon thy spirituall Messengers? Is it possible thou shouldst not feele them, thou shouldst not avenge them? We are made a gazing stock to the world, to Angels and to men, we are despised and trodden downe in the dust; who hath beleeved our report, and to whom is the Arme of the Lord revealed?

How obstinate are wicked men in their perverse resolutions. These foolish Ammonites had rather hire Syrians to maintaine a War against Israel in so foule a quarrell, besides the hazard of their owne lives, than confesse the errour of their jealous misconstruction.

It is one of the mad principles of wickednes, that it is a weakenesse to relent, and rather to Dye then yeeld; Even ill causes once undertaken, must be upheld although with blood; whereas the gracious heart finding his owne mistaking, doth not onely remit of an ungrounded displeasure, but studies to be revenged of it selfe, and to give satisfaction to the offended.

The mercenarie Syrians are drawn to venture their lives for a fee; twenty thousand of them are hyred into the field against Israel; Fond Pagans that know not the value of a man; their blood cost them nothing, & they care not to sell it good cheap; How can we think those men have Soules, that esteeme a little white earth above themselves? That never inquire into the Justice of the quarrell, but the rate of the pay; that can rifle for drams of silver, in the bowels of their owne flesh, and either kill or die for a dayes wages.

Ioab the wise Generall of Israel soone findes, where the strength of the battle lay, & so marshals his troups, that the choyce of his men should encounter the vantgard of the Syrians. His brother Abishai leads the rest against the children of Ammon; with this covenant of mutuall assistance, (If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt helpe me; but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then will I come and helpe thee;) It is an happy thing, when the Captaines of Gods people joyne together as brethren, and lend their hand to the ayde of each other against the common adversarie. Concord in defence, or assault, is the way to victory; as contrarily the division of the Leaders is the overthrow of the Armie.

Set aside some particular actions, Ioab was a worthy Captaine, both for wisdome and valour. Who could either exhort or resolve better then he, (Be of good courage and and let us play the men, for our people, and for the Cities of our God; and the Lord doe that which seemeth him good?) It is not either private glory or profit that whets his fortitude, but the respect to the cause of God and his people; that Souldier can never answer it to God, that strikes not more as a Justicer, than as an enemy; Neither doth he content himselfe with his owne courage, but hee animates others. The tongue of a Commander fights more than his hand; it is enough for private men to exercise what life and limmes they have; a good Leader must out of his own abundance, put life and spirits into all others; If a Lyon leade sheepe into the field, there is hope of victory: Lastly, when he hath done his best, he resolves to depend upon God for the issue: not trusting to his sword, or his bow, but to the providence of the Almighty for successe; as a man religiously awfull, and awfully confident, whiles there should be no want in their owne endeavours: he knew well that the race was not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, therefore he lookes up above the hils whence commeth his salvation. All valour is cowardise to that which is built upon Religion.

I marvell not to see Ioab victorious, while he is thus godly; The Syrians flee before him like flockes of sheep, the Ammonites follow them; The two sonnes of Zeruiah have nothing to doe but to pursue and execute; The throates of the Ammonites are cut, for cutting the Beards and Coates of the Israelitish messengers; Neither doth this revenge end in the field; Rabba the royall City of Ammon is strongly beleagured by Ioab; The City of waters (after wel-neere a yeares siege) yeeldeth: the rest can no longer hold; Now Ioab, as one that desireth more to approve himselfe, a loyall and a carefull subject, than a happy Generall, sends to his Master David that hee should come personally, and encampe against the City, and take it; Lest (saith he) I take it, and it be called after my name. Oh noble and imitable fidelity of a dutifull Servant, that prefers his Lord to himselfe, and is so farre from stealing honour from his Masters deserts, that he willingly remits of his owne, to adde unto his. The Warre was not his; he was onely imployed by his Soveraigne; The same person that was wronged in the Ambassadors, revengeth by his Souldiers; The praise of the act shall (like Fountaine-water) returne to the Sea, whence it originally came; To seeke a mans owne glory is not glory. Alas, how many are there, who being sent to sue for God, wooe for themselves. Oh God, it is a fearefull thing to robbe thee of that which is deerest to thee, Glory; which as thou wilt not give to any Creature, so much lesse wilt thou endure that any Creature should filtch it from thee, and give it to himselfe: Have thou the honour of all our actions, who giveſt a being to our actions and us, and in both hast most justly regarded thine owne prayse.

David with Bathsheba and Uriah.

With what unwillingnesse, with what feare, do I still looke upon the miscariage of the man after Gods owne heart? O holy Prophet, who can promise himselfe alwayes to stand, when he sees thee falne, and maymed with the fall? Who can assure himselfe of an immunity from the foulest sinnes, when he sees thee offending so haynously, so bloodily? Let prophane eyes behold thee contentedly, as a paterne, as an excuse of sinning; I shall never looke upon thee but through teares, as a wofull spectacle of humane infirmitie.

Whiles Ioab and all Israel were busie in the Warre against Ammon, in the siege of Rabbath, Satan finds time to lay siege to the secure heart of David. Who ever found David thus tempted, thus foyled in the dayes of his busie Warres? Now onely doe I see the King of Israel, rising frō his bed in the evening; The time was, when he rose up in the morning to his early devotion; when he brake his nightly rest with publik cares, with the businesse of the State; all that while he was innocent, he was holy; but now that he wallowes in the bed of idlenesse, he is fit to invite tentation. The industrious man hath no leisure to sin. The idle hath neither leisure nor power to avoid sinne; Exercise is not more wholesome for the body, then for the Soule; the remission whereof breeds matter of disease in both: The water that hath beene heated, soonest freezeth; the most active spirit soonest tyreth with slacking; The Earth stands still, and is all dregges; the Heavens ever move, and are pure. We have no reason to complaine of the assiduity of work; the toyle of action is answered by the benefit; If we did lesse, we should suffer more; Satan like an idle companion, if he find us busie, flyes backe and sees it no time to entertaine vayne purposes with us; Wee cannot please him better then by casting away our worke, to hold chat with him; wee cannot yeeld so farre, and be guiltlesse.

B Even Davids eyes have no sooner the sleepe rubbed out of them, then they rove to wanton prospects; He walks upon his roofe, and sees Bathsheba washing her selfe; inquires after her, sends for her, sollicits her to uncleannesse. The same spirit that shut up his eyes in an unseasonable sleep, opens them upon an intising object; whiles sin hath such a Solliciter, it cannot want either meanes, or opportunity: I cannot thinke Bathsheba could be so immodest, as to wash her selfe openly, especially from her naturall uncleannesse; Lust is quick-sighted; David hath espied her, where she could espie no beholder: His eyes recoyle upon his heart, and have smitten him with sinfull desire.

There can be no safety to that Soule, where the senses are let loose. He can never keep his covenant with God, that makes not a covenant with his eyes: It is an idle C presumption to thinke the outward man may be free, whiles the inward is safe. He is more than a man, whose heart is not led by his eyes; he is no regenerate man, whose eyes are not restrained by his heart.

Oh Bathsheba, how wert thou washed from thine uncleannesse, when thou yeeldedst to goe into an adulterous bed? never wert thou so foule, as now when thou wert new washed; The worst of Nature is cleanlinesse, to the best of sin: thou hadst been cleane if thou hadst not washed; yet for thee, I know how to plead infirmity of sexe, and the importunity of a King; But what shall I say for thee, O thou royall Prophet, and Propheticall King of Israel; where shall I find ought to extenuate that crime, for which God himselfe hath noted thee? Did not thine holy Profession teach thee to abhorre such a sinne more than death? Was not thy Justice wont to D punish this sinne with no lesse than death? Did not thy very calling call thee to a protection and preservation of Justice, of Chastity in thy subjects? Didst thou want store of Wives of thine owne? Wert thou restrayned from taking more? Was there no beauty in Israel, but in a Subjects Marriage-bed? Wert thou over-come by the vehement solicitations of an Adultresse? Wert thou not the Tempter, the Prosecutor of this uncleannesse? I should accuse thee deeply, if thou hadst not accused thy selfe; Nothing wanted to greaten thy sinne, or our wonder, and feare. O God, whither do we goe if thou stay us not? Who ever amongst the millions of thy Servants could find himselfe furnished with stronger preservatives against sinne? Against whom could such a sinne find lesse pretence of prevailing? Oh keepe thou us that presumptuous sinnes prevayle not over us; So onely shall we be free from E great offences.

The suits of Kings are Imperative; Ambition did now prove a Bawd to Lust. Bathsheba yeeldeth to offend God, to dishonour her Husband, to clog and wound her owne Soule, to abuse her body: Dishonesty grows bold, when it is countenanced with greatnesse. Eminent persons had need be carefull of their demaunds; they sinne by authority, that are sollicited by the mighty.

Had Bathsheba beene mindfull of her Matrimoniall fidelity, perhaps, David had beene soone checked in his inordinate desire; her facility furthers the sinne. The first motioner of evill is most faulty; but as in quarrels, so in offences, the second blow (which is the consent) makes the fray. Good Ioseph was moved to folly by his great and beautifull Mistris, this fire fell upon wet Tinder, and therefore soone went out.

Sinne

Sin is not acted alone; if but one party be wise, both escape. It is no excuse to say I was tempted, though by the great, though by the holy and learned; Almost all sinners are misse-led by that transformed Angell of light; The action is that we must regard, not the person; Let the mover be never so glorious, if he stirre us to evill, he must be entertained with defiance. A

The GOD that knows how to raise good out of evill, blesses an adulterous copulation with that encrease, which he denyes to the chaste imbracements of honest Wedlocke: Bathsheba hath conceived by David; and now at once conceives a sorrow and care how to smother the shame of her Conception; He that did the fact, must hide it.

Oh David, where is thy Repentance? Where is thy tenderness and compunction of heart? Where are those holy Meditations, which had woont to take up thy Soule? Alas, in stead of clearing thy sinne, thou labourest to cloke it; and spendest those thoughts in the concealing of thy wickedness, which thou shouldest rather have bestowed in preventing it: The best of Gods Children may not only be drenched in the waves of sin, but lye in them for the time, and perhaps sinke twice to the bottome; What hypocrite could have done worse, then study how to cover the face of his sin from the eyes of men, whiles he regarded not the sting of sin in his Soule? B

As there are some acts, wherein the Hypocrite is a Saint, so there are some, wherein the greatest Saint upon Earth may be an Hypocrite; Saul did thus go about to colour his sin, and is curst; The vessels of Mercy and Wrath, are not ever distinguishable by their actions. He makes the difference that will have mercy on whom he will, and whom he will, he hardeneth. C

It is rare and hard to commit a single sinne; David hath abused the Wife of Vriah, now he would abuse his person in causing him to father a false seed: That worthy Hittite is sent for from the Wars; and now after some cunning, and farre fetcht Questions, is dismissed to his house, not without a present of favour; David could not but imagine, that the beauty of his Bathsheba, must needs bee attractive enough to an Husband, whom long absence in Warres, had with-held all that while from so pleasing a Bed; neither could hee thinke, that since that face, and those brests had power to allure himselfe to an unlawfull lust, it could be possible, that Vriah should not be invited by them, to an allowed and warrantable fruition.

That Davids heart might now the rather strike him, in comparing the chaste resolutions of his Servant, with his owne light incontinence; good Vriah sleepes at the doore of the Kings Palace, making choyce of a stonie Pillow, under the Canopie of Heaven, rather than the delicate Bed of her, whom he thought as honest, as he knew faire. The Arke (saith he) and Israel, and Iudah, dwell in Tents, and my Lord Ioab; and the Servants of my Lord, abide in the open Fields; shall I then go into my house to eat, and drinke, and lye with my Wife? by thy life, and by the life of thy soule, I will not doe this thing. D

Who can but be astonished at this change, to see a Souldier austere, and a Prophet wanton? And how doth that Souldiers austerity, shame the Prophets wantonnesse? Oh zealous and mortified Soule, worthy of a more faithfull Wife, of a more just Master, how didst thou over-looke all base sensuality, and hatedst to be happy alone? Warre and Lust had wont to be reputed friends; thy brest is not more full of courage then chastity, and is so far from wandring after forbidden pleasures, that it refuseth lawfull. E

There is a time to laugh and a time to mourne; a time to embrace, and a time to bee farre from embracing; even the best actions are not alwaies seasonable, much lesse the indifferent: Hee that ever takes libertie to doe what hee may, shall offend no lesse, than hee that sometimes takes liberty to doe what hee may not.

If any thing, the Arke of GOD is fittest to leade our times; according as that is eyther distressed, or prospereth, should wee frame our mirth or mourning. To

dwe\

A dwell in seeled Houses, whiles the Temple lyes waste, is the ground of Gods just quarrell.

How shall we sing a Song of the Lord in a strange Land; If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth; yea, if I preferre not Hierusalem to my chiefe joy.

As every man is a limme of the Communitie, so must he bee affected with the estate of the universall bodie, whether healthfull, or languishing; It did not more aggravate Davids sinne, that whiles the Arke and Israel was in hazard and distresse, he could find time to loose the reines to wanton desires, and actions, than it magnifies the religious zeale of Vriah, that he abandons comfort, till he see the Arke and Israel victorious.

B Common dangers, or calamities must (like the rapt motion) carrie our hearts contrarie to the wayes of our private occasions. Hee that cannot bee moved with words, shall bee tried with Wine: Vriah had equally protested against feasting at home, and society with his Wife; To the one, the authority of a King forceth him abroad, in hope that the excesse thereof shall force him to the other: It is like, that holy Captaine intended onely to yeeld so much obedience, as might consist with his course of austerity. But Wine is a mocker, when it goes plausibly in, no man can imagine how it will rage and tyrannize; hee that receives that Traytor within his gates, shall too late complaine of surprizall. Like unto that ill spirit, it insinuates sweetly, but in the end it bites like a Serpent, and hurts like a Cockatrice. Even
C good Vriah is made drunk; the holyest soule may be overtaken; it is hard gainesaying, where a King beginnes an health to a subject; Where, oh where, will this wickednesse end? David will now procure the sinne of another, to hide his owne; Vriahs drunkennesse is more Davids offence, than his. It is weakely yeelded to of the one, which was wilfully intended of the other. The one was as the Sinner, the other as the Tempter.

Had not David knowne, that Wine was an inducement to Lust, hee had spared those superfluous Cups. Experience had taught him, that the eye debauched with Wine, will looke upon strange women: The Drunkard may be any thing, save good. Yet in this the ayme failed; Grace is stronger than Wine: Whiles that withholds, in vaine shall the fury of the Grape attempt to carry Vriah to his owne Bed. Sober David is now worse than drunken Vriah. Had not the King of Israel beene
D more intoxicate with sinne, than Vriah with drinke, hee had not in a sober intemperance climbed up into that Bed, which the drunken temperance of Vriah refused.

If David had beene but himselfe, how had he loved, how had he honoured this honest and religious zeale, in his so faithfull Servant; whom now hee cruelly seekes to reward with death? That fact which Wine cannot hide, the Sword shall; Vriah shall beare his owne Mittimus unto Ioab; Put ye Vriah in the fore-front of the strength of the Battell, and recule backe from him, that he may be smitten, and dye. What is becomne of thee, O thou good spirit, that hadst wont to guide thy chosen Servant in his former wayes? Is not this the man, whom we lately saw so heart-smitten, for but cutting off
E the lap of the Garment of a wicked Master, that is now thus lavish of the blood of a gracious and wel-deserving Servant? Could it bee likely, that so worthy a Captaine could fall alone? Could David have expiated this sinne with his owne blood, it had beene but well spent; but to cover his sinne with the innocent blood of others, was a crime above astonishment.

Oh the deepe deceitfulnesse of sinne! If the Devill should have comne to David in the most lovely forme of Bathsheba her selfe, & at the first should have directly & in plaine termes, solicited him to murder his best Servant; I doubt not but he would have spat scorne in that face, on which he should otherwise have doted; now, by many cunning windings, Satan rises up to that tentation, and prevailes: that shall be done for a colour of guiltinesse, whereof the soule would have hated to be immediately guilty: Even those, that finde a just horror, in leaping downe from some high Tower, yet may bee perſwaded to deſcend by ſtayres to the bottome. Hee knowes not where hee ſhall ſtay, that hath willingly ſlipt into a knowne wickedneſſe.

How many doth an eminent offender draw with him into evill? It could not be, but that divers of the Attendants both of David and Bathſheba muſt be conſcious to that adultery: Great mens ſins are ſeldome ſecret; And now Ioab muſt be fetcht in, as acceſſary to the murder: How muſt this example needs harden Ioab againſt the conſcience of Abners blood? whiles he cannot but thinke, David cannot avenge that in me, which he acteth himſelfe.

Honour is pretended to poore Vriah, death is meant. This man was one of the Worthies of David; their courage ſought glory in the difficulteſt exploits. That reputation had never beene purchaſed without attempts of equall danger; Had not the Leader and Followers of Vriah been more treacherous, than his Enemies were ſtrong, he had come off with Victory; Now he was not the firſt or laſt that periſhed by his friends. David hath forgotten, that himſelfe was in like ſort betrayed in his Maſters intention, upon the dowrie of the Philiſtims fore-ſkins. I feare to aſke, Who ever noted ſo foule a plot in Davids rejected Predeceſſor; Vriah muſt be the Meſſenger of his owne death, Ioab muſt be a Traytor to his friend, the hoſt of God muſt ſhamefully turne their backes upon the Ammonites; all that Iſraelitiſh blood muſt be ſhed, that murder muſt be ſeconded with diſſimulation, and all this to hide one adultery. O God, thou hadſt never ſuffered ſo deare a Favourite of thine to fall ſo fearefully, if thou hadſt not meant to make him an univerſall example to Mankinde of not preſuming, of not deſpairing: How can we preſume of not ſinning, or deſpaire for ſinning, when we finde ſo great a Saint thus fallen, thus riſen.

Nathan and David.

YEt Bathſheba mourned for the death of that Huſband, whom ſhe had been drawne to diſhonour: How could ſhe beſtow teares enough upon that Funerall, whereof her ſinne was the cauſe? If ſhe had but a ſuſpition of the plot of his death, the Fountaines of her eyes could not yeeld water enough to waſh off her Huſbands blood; Her ſinne was more worthy of ſorrow, than her loſſe. If this griefe had beene right placed, the hope of hiding her ſhame and the ambition to be a Queen had not ſo ſoone mitigated it; neither had ſhe upon any termes been drawn into the Bed of her huſbands murtherer. Every gleame of earthly comfort can dry up the teares of worldly ſorrow. Bathſheba hath ſoone loſt her griefe at the Court; The remembrance of an Huſband is buried in the joylitie and ſtate of a Princeſſe. David ſecurely enjoyes his ill-purchaſed love, and is content to exchange the conſcience of his ſinne, for the ſenſe of his pleaſure. But the juſt and holy God will not put it up ſo: he that hates ſinne ſo much the more, as the offender is more deare to him, will let David feele the bruiſe of his fall. If Gods beſt children have beene ſometimes ſuffered to ſleep in a ſinne, at laſt he hath awakened them in a fright.

David was a Prophet of God, and yet he hath not only ſtept into thoſe foule ſins, but ſojournes with them; If any profeſſion or ſtate of life could have priviledged from ſinne; the Angels had not ſinned in Heaven, nor man in Paradiſe. Nathan the Prophet is ſent to the Prophet David, for reproofe, for conviction; Had it been any other mans caſe, none could have beene more quick-ſighted than the Princely Prophet; in his owne he is ſo blinde, that God is faine to lend him others eyes. Even the Phyſitian himſelfe when hee is ſicke, ſends for the counſell of thoſe whom his health did mutually ayd with advice. Let no man think himſelfe too good to learn: Teachers themſelves may be taught that in their owne particular, which in a generalitie they have often taught others; It is not onely ignorance that is to be removed, but miſ-affection.

Who can preſcribe a juſt period to the beſt mans repentance? About tenne moneths

A neths are passed since Davids sinne: in all which time I finde no newes of any serious compunction; It could not be, but some glances of remorse must needs have passed through his Soule long ere this; but a due and solemne contrition was not heard of, till Nathans message; and perhaps had been further adjourned, if that Monitor had been longer deferred; Alas, what long and dead sleepes may the holyest Soule take in fearefull sinnes: Were it not for thy mercy, O God, the best of us should end our spirituall Lethargy in sleepe of death.

It might have pleased God as easily to have sent Nathan to checke David in his first purpose of sinning; So had his eyes beene restrained, Bathsheba honest, Vriah alive with honour; now the wisdome of the Almighty knew how to winne more glory by the permission of so foule an evill, than by the prevention; yea, he knew how B by the permission of one sinne, to prevent millions, how many thousand had sinned in a vaine presumption on their own strength, if David had not thus offended; how many thousand had despaired in the conscience of their owne weaknesses, if these horrible sinnes had not received forgivenesse? It is happy for all times, that we have so holy a Sinner, so sinfull a penitent. It matters not how bitter the Pill is, but how well wrapped; so cunningly hath Nathan conveyed this dose, that it begins to worke ere it be tasted: there is no one thing wherein is more use of wisdome, than the due contriving of reprehension, which in a discreet delivery helps the disease; in an unwise, destroyes Nature.

Had not Nathan beene used to the possession of Davids eare, this complaint had beene suspected. It well beseemes a King to take information by a Prophet. Whiles C wise Nathan was querulously discoursing of the cruell rich man, that had forceably taken away the only Lamb of his poore Neighbour, how willingly doth David listen to the Storie, and how sharply (even above Law) doth he censure the fact? (As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die.) Full little did hee thinke that he had pronounced sentence against himselfe; It had not beene so heavie if hee had knowne on whom it should have light; Wee have open eares and quick tongues to the vices of others; How severe Justicers wee can be to our very owne crimes in others persons? How flattering Parasites to anothers crime in our selves? The life of doctrine is in application; Nathan might have bin long enough in his narration, in his invective, ere David would have bin touched with his owne guiltinesse: but now that the Prophet brings the Word home to his bosome, he cannot but be affected. Wee D may take pleasure, to heare men speake in the Clouds, we never take profit till wee find a proprietie in the exhortation, or reproof; There was not more cunning in the Parable than courage in the application (Thou art the man.) If David be a King, he may not looke, not to heare of his faults; Gods messages may be no other then unpartiall. It is a treacherous flatterie in divine errands to regard greatnesse: If Prophets must be mannerly in the forme, yet in the matter of reproofe, resolute: The words are not their owne; They are but the Heralds of the King of Heaven, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.

How thunder-stricken doe we thiuk David did now stand? How did the change of his colour bewray the confusion in his Soule; whiles his conscience said the same within, which the Prophet sounded in his eare? And now lest ought should be wan- E ting to his humiliatiō, all Gods former favours shall be laid before his eyes, by way of exprobration: He is worthy to be upbrayded with mercies, that hath abused mercies unto wantonnesse; whiles we doe well, God gives and sayes nothing; when wee doe ill, hee layes his benefits in our dish, and casts them in our teeth, that our shame may be so much the more, by how much our obligations have beene greater. The blessings of God in our unworthy cariage prove but the aggravations of sin, and additions to judgement.

I see all Gods Children falling into sinne, some of them lying in sinne; none of them maintayning their sinne; David cannot have the heart, or the face to stand out against the message of God, but now as a man confounded, and condemned in himselfe, hee cryes out in the bitternesse of a wounded Soule, (I have sinned against the Lord.) It was a short word, but passionate; and such as came from the bottome of a contrite heart; The greateſt griefes are not moſt verball: Saul confeſſed his ſin more largely, leſſe effectually; God cares not for phraſes, but for affections. The firſt piece of our amends to God for ſinning, is the acknowledgement of ſinne; Hee can doe little that in a juſt offence cannot accuſe himſelfe. If wee cannot bee ſo good as we would, it is reaſon we ſhould doe God ſo much right, as to ſay, how evill wee are. And why was not this done ſooner? It is ſtrange to ſee how eaſily ſin gets into the heart, how hardly it gets out of the mouth; Is it becauſe ſinne, like unto Satan, where it hath got poſſeſſion is deſirous to hold it; and knowes that it is fully ejected by a free confeſſion? or, becauſe in a guiltineſſe of deformity, it hides it ſelfe in the breſt where it is once entertained, and hates the light? or, becauſe the tongue is ſo fee'd with ſelfe-love, that it is loath to be drawne unto any verdict againſt the heart or hands? or, is it out of an idle miſpriſion of ſhame, which whiles it ſhould be placed in offending, is miſplaced in diſcloſing of our offence? A B

However, ſure I am, that God hath need even of rackes to draw out confeſſions; and ſcarce in death it ſelfe, are we wrought to a diſcovery of our errors.

There is no one thing, wherein our folly ſhewes it ſelfe more than in theſe hurtfull concealements: Contrary to the proceedings of humane Juſtice, it is with God, Confeſſe and live; no ſooner can David ſay, I have ſinned, than Nathan inferres; The Lord alſo hath put away thy ſinne. He that hides his ſins ſhall not proſper, but he that confeſſeth and forſaketh them, ſhall finde mercy. Who would not accuſe himſelfe to be acquitted of God? O God, who would not tell his wickedneſſe to thee, that knoweſt it better than his owne heart, that his heart may bee eaſed of that wickedneſſe, which being not told, killeth? Since wee have ſinned, why ſhould wee bee niggardly of that action, wherein wee may at once give glory to thee, and reliefe to our ſoules? C

David had ſworne in a zeale of Juſtice, that the rich Oppreſſor, for but taking his poore Neighbours Lambe, ſhould dye the death: God, by Nathan is more favourable to David, than to take him at his word: Thou ſhalt not dye: O the marvellous power of repentance: Beſides adultery, David had ſhed the blood of innocent Vriah: The ſtrict Law was Eye for Eye, Tooth for Tooth, He that ſmiteth with the Sword, ſhall periſh with the Sword: Yet as if a penitent confeſſion had diſpenſed with the rigour of Juſtice, now God ſayes Thou ſhalt not dye. David was the voice of the Law, awarding death unto ſinne: Nathan was the voice of the Goſpell, awarding life unto the repentance for ſinne. Whatſoever the ſore be, never any ſoule applyed this remedie, and dyed; never any ſoule eſcaped death, that applyed it not. D

David himſelfe ſhall not dye for this fact: but his miſ-begotten childe ſhall die for him; He that ſaid, The Lord hath put away thy ſinne, yet ſaid alſo, The Sword ſhall not depart from thine houſe.

The ſame mouth, with one breath, pronounces the ſentence both of abſolution, and death; Abſolution to the Perſon, Death to the Iſſue. Pardon may well ſtand with temporall afflictions. Where God hath forgiven, though he doth not puniſh, yet he may chaſtiſe, and that unto blood; neither doth hee alwayes forbeare correction, where he remits revenge. So long as he ſmites us not as an angry Judge, we may endure to ſmart from him, as a loving Father.

Yet even this Rodded David deprecate with teares: How faine would he ſhake off ſo eaſie a loade? The Child is ſtricken; the Father faſts and prayes, and weepes, and lyes all night upon the earth, and abhorres the noiſe of comfort: That Childe, which was the fruit and monument of his odious adultery, whom hee could never have looked upon, without recognition of his ſinne: in whoſe face hee could not but have ſtill read the records of his owne ſhame, is thus mourned for, thus ſued for; It is eaſie to obſerve that good man over-paſſionately affected to his Children. Who would not have thought, that David might have held himſelfe well appayd, that his ſoule eſcaped an eternall death, his bodie a violent, though God ſhould puniſh his ſinne, in that Childe, in whom he ſinned: yet even againſt this croſſe hee bends his Prayers, as if nothing had beene forgiven him. There is no Childe that would be ſcourged if he might eſcape for crying: No affliction is for the time o- E ther than grievous; neither is therefore yeelded unto, without ſome kinde of reluctation. Farre yet was it from the heart of David, to make any oppoſition to the will of God; he ſued, he ſtruggled not; There is no impatience in intreaties; Hee well knew, that the threats of temporall evils, ran commonly with a ſecret condition, and therefore might perhaps be avoided by humble importunity: if any meanes under Heaven can avert judgements, it is our Prayers.

God could not chuſe but like well the boldneſſe of Davids faith, who after the apprehenſion of ſo heavy a diſpleaſure, is ſo far from doubting of the forgiveneſſe of his ſin, that he dares become a Sutor unto God for his ſick childe. Sin doth not make us more ſtrange, than Faith confident.

But, it is not in the power of the ſtrongeſt Faith, to preſerve us from all afflictions; After all Davids prayers and teares, the Childe muſt dye. The carefull ſervants dare but whiſper this ſad newes: They who had found their Maſter ſo averſe from the motion of comfort, in the ſickneſſe of the Childe, feared him uncapable of comfort in his death.

Suſpition is quick-witted; Every occaſion makes us miſdoubt that event, which we feare; This ſecrecie proclaimes, that which they were ſo loath to utter; David perceives his Childe dead, and now he riſes up from the Earth whereon he lay, and waſhes himſelfe, and changeth his apparell, and goes firſt into Gods Houſe to worſhip, and into his owne to eate; now he refuſes no comfort, who before would take none; The iſſue of things doth more fully ſhew the will of God, than the prediction; God never did any thing, but what he would; hee hath ſometimes foretold that for tryall, which his ſecret will intended not; he would foretell it, he would not effect it, becauſe he would therefore foretell it, that he might not effect it; His predictions of outward evils are not alwayes abſolute, his actions are; David well ſees by the event, what the Decree of God was, concerning his Childe; which now hee could not ſtrive againſt, without a vaine impatience; Till we know the determinations of the Almighty, it is free for us to ſtrive in our prayers, to ſtrive with him, not againſt him; when once we know them, it is our duty to ſit downe in a ſilent contentation.

(Whiles the Childe was yet alive, I faſted and wept, for I ſaid, who can tell whether the Lord will be gracious to me, that the Childe may live; but now he is dead, Wherefore ſhould I faſt? Can I bring him back againe?)

The griefe that goes before an evill for remedy, can hardly be too much, but that which followes an evill, paſt remedy, cannot be too little: Even in the ſaddeſt accident, Death, we may yeeld ſomething to nature, nothing to impatience: immoderation of ſorrow, for loſſes paſt hope of recovery, is more ſullen, than uſefull; our ſtomack may be bewrayed by it, not our wiſdome.

Amnon and Tamar.

IT is not poſſible, that any word of God ſhould fall to the ground: David is not more ſure of forgiveneſſe, than ſmart: Three maine ſins paſſed him in this buſineſſe of Vriah; Adultery, Murder, Diſſimulation: for all which he receives preſent payment; for Adultery, in the deflowring of his Daughter Tamar; for Murder in the killing of his Son Amnon; for Diſſimulatiō, in the contriving of both. Yet all this was but the beginning of evils. Where the Father of the Family brings ſin home to the houſe, it is not eaſily ſwept out: Unlawfull Luſt propagates it ſelfe by example; How juſtly is David ſcourged by the ſin of his Sons, whom his Act taught to offend?

Maacha was the Daughter of an Heatheniſh King; By her, had David that beautifull, but unhappy Iſſue, Abſalom, and his no leſſe faire Siſter, Tamar: Perhaps, thus late doth David feele the puniſhment of that unfit choyce: I ſhould have marvelled, if ſo holy a man had not found croſſes in ſo unequall a match, either in his perſon, or at leaſt in his ſeed. A Beauty, if it be not well diſciplined, proves not a Friend, but a Traytor; three of Davids Children are undone by it at once, What elſe was guilty of Amnons inceſtuous love, Tamars raviſhment, Abſaloms pride? It is a bleſſing to be faire, yet ſuch a bleſſing, as if the ſoule anſwer not to the face, may lead to a curſe; How commonly have we ſeene the fouleſt ſoule dwell faireſt? It was no fault of Tamars that ſhe was beautifull; the Candle offends not in burning, the fooliſh flye offends in ſcorching it ſelfe in the flame, yet it is no ſmall miſery to become a tentation unto another, and to be made but the occaſion of others ruine. Amnon is love-ſick of his ſiſter Tamar, and languiſhes of that unnaturall heat. Whither will not wanton luſt carry the inordinate minds of pampered and ungoverned youths? None but his halfe-ſiſter, will B pleaſe the eyes of the young Prince of Iſrael: Ordinary pleaſures will not content thoſe whom the conceit of greatneſſe, youth, and eaſe, have let looſe to their appetite.

Perhaps yet, this unkindly flame, might in time, have gone out alone, had not there been a Ionadab, to blow theſe coales with ill counſell. It were ſtrange if great Princes ſhould want ſome Paraſiticall Followers, that are ready to feed their ill humors. Why art thou, the Kings ſon, ſo leane from day to day? As if it were unworthy the Heire of a King, to ſuffer either Law, or Conſcience, to ſtand in the way of his deſires: Wheras wiſe Princes know well, that their places give them no priviledge of ſinning but call them in rather to ſo much more ſtrictneſſe, as their example may be more prejudiciall.

Ionadab was the Couſin German of Amnon: Ill advice is ſo much more dangerous as the intereſt of the giver is more; Had hee beene a true friend, hee had bent all the forces of his diſſwaſion, againſt the wicked motions of that ſinfull luſt; and had ſhewed the Prince of Iſrael how much thoſe lewd deſires provoked God, and blemiſhed himſelfe; and had lent his hand to ſtrangle them in their firſt conception. There cannot be a more worthy improvement of friendſhip, than in a fervent oppoſition to the ſinnes of them, whom we profeſſe to love: No enemy can be ſo mortall to great Princes, as thoſe officious Clients, whoſe flattery ſooths them up in wickedneſſe: Theſe are Traytors to the Soule, and by a pleaſing violence kill the beſt part eternally. C

How ready at hand is an evill ſuggeſtion? Good counſell is like unto Wel-water, that muſt be drawne up with a Pumpe, or Bucket; Ill counſell is like to Conduit-water; which if the cocke be but turned, runs out alone; Ionadab hath ſoone projected how Amnon ſhall accompliſh his lawleſſe purpoſe. The way muſt be to faine himſelfe ſicke in body, whoſe minde was ſicke of luſt; and under this pretence to procure the preſence of her, who had wounded, and only might cure him. D

The daily increaſing languor,, and leaneneſſe, and paleneſſe of love-ſick Amnon might well give colour to a Kerchiefe, and a pallet. Now is it ſoone told David that his eldeſt Sonne is caſt upon his ſicke bed; there needs no ſuit for his viſitation; The carefull Father haſtens to his Bed-ſide, not without doubts and feares: He that was lately ſo afflicted with the ſickneſſe of a Childe that ſcarce lived to ſee the light, how ſenſible muſt we needs thinke he would bee, of the indiſpoſition of his firſt-E borne Sonne, in the prime of his age and hopes? It is not given to any Prophet to fore-ſee all things, Happy had it beene for David, if Amnon had beene truely ſicke, and ſicke unto death; yet who could have perſwaded this paſſionate Father to have beene content with this ſucceſſion of loſſes, this earely loſſe of his Succeſſor: How glad is he to heare, that his Daughter Tamars ſkill might be likely to fit the dyet of ſo deare a patient. Conceit is wont to rule much both in ſickneſſe and in the cure. Tamar is ſent by her Father to the houſe of Amnon; Her hand onely muſt dreſſe that Diſh, which may pleaſe the nice Palate of her ſicke Brother. Even the Children of Kings, in thoſe homelyer Times, did not ſcorne to put their fingers, to ſome works of huſwifery: (Shee tooke floure and did kneade it, and did make Cakes in his ſight, and did bake the Cakes and tooke a Pan, and powred them out before him.) Had ſhee not

beene

A beene ſometimes uſed to ſuch domeſtique imployments, ſhee had beene now to ſeeke; neither had this beene required of her, but upon the knowledge of her ſkill: Shee doth not plead the impayring of her beauty by the ſcorching of the fire, nor thinkes her hand too daintie for ſuch meane ſervices, but ſettles to the worke, as one that had rather regard the neceſſities of her Brother, then her owne ſtate: Only pride and idleneſſe hath baniſht honeſt and thrifty diligence, out of the houſes of the great.

This was not yet the Diſh that Amnon longed for. It was the Cooke, and not the Cates which that wanton eye affected. Unlawfull Acts ſeeke for ſecrecie; The company is diſmiſſed, Tamar onely ſtayes; Good meaning ſuſpects nothing; Whiles ſhe preſents the meat ſhe had prepared, to her ſick Brother, her ſelfe is made a prey
B to his outragious Luſt. The modeſt Virgin intreates, and perſwades in vaine; ſhee layes before him the ſinne, the ſhame, the danger of the fact, and ſince none of theſe can prevaile, faine would winne time by the ſuggeſting of unpoſſible hopes; Nothing but violence can ſtay a reſolved ſinner; What hee cannot by intreaty, he will have by force. If the Devill were not more ſtrong in men, than nature, they would never ſeeke pleaſure in violence. Amnon hath no ſooner fulfilled his beaſtly deſires, then he hates Tamar more than he loved her. Inordinate luſt never ends but in diſcontentment; Loſſe of ſpirits, and remorſe of ſoule make the remembrance of that Act tedious, whoſe expectation promiſed delight. If we could ſee the back of ſinfull pleaſures, ere we behold their face, our hearts could not but bee fore-ſtalled with a juſt deteſtation. Brutiſh Amnon, it was thy ſelfe whom thou ſhouldeſt have hated
C for this villany; not thine innocent ſiſter; Both of you lay together, onely one committed inceſt: What was ſhe but a patient in that impotent fury of luſt? How unjuſtly doe carnall men miſ-place their affections? No man can ſay whether that love, or this hatred were more unreaſonable: Fraud drew Tamar into the houſe of Amnon, force entertained her within, and drove her out. Faine would ſhee have hid her ſhame where it was wrought, and may not be allowed it: That roofe under which ſhe came with honour, and in obedience and love, may not be lent her for the time as a ſhelter of her ignominy. Never any ſavage could be more barbarous: Sechem had raviſhed Dinah, his offence did not make her odious; his affection ſo continued, that he is willing rather to draw blood of himſelfe and his people, than forgoe her whom he had abuſed; Amnon in one houre is in the exceſſe of love and
D hate; and is ſicke of her, for whom he was ſicke: Shee that lately kept the keyes of his heart, is now lockt out of his doores. Unruly paſſions runne ever into extremities, and are then beſt appayed, when they are furtheſt off from reaſon and moderation.

What could Amnon thinke, would be the event of ſo foule a fact, which as hee had not the grace to prevent, ſo hee hath not the care to conceale? If hee lookt not ſo high as Heaven, what could he imagine would follow hereupon, but the diſpleaſure of a Father, the danger of Law, the indignation of a Brother, the ſhame and outcryes of the World; All which he might have hoped to avoid by ſecrecie, and plauſible courſes of ſatisfaction. It is the juſt judgement of God upon preſumptuous offenders, that they loſe their wit, together with their honeſtie; and are either ſo blin-
E ded, that they cannot fore-ſee the iſſue of their actions, or ſo beſotted that they doe not regard it.

Poore Tamar can but bewaile that which ſhe could not keepe, her Virginity, not loſt, but torne from her by a cruell violence: She rends her Princely robe, and layd aſhes on her head, and laments the ſhame of anothers ſinne; and lives more deſolate than a widdow, in the houſe of her brother Abſalom.

In the meane time, what a corroſive muſt this newes needs be to the heart of good David, whoſe fatherly command had out of love, caſt his Daughter into the jawes of this Lion? What an inſolent affront, muſt he needs conſtrue this, to be offered by a Sonne to a Father; that the Father ſhould be made the Pander of his own Daughter to his Son? He that lay upon the ground weeping for, but the ſickneſſe of an Infant; how vexed doe we think he was with the villany of his Heire, with the raviſhmēt of his

his Daughter, both of them worſe than many deaths? What revenge can he think of for ſo hainous a crime leſſe than death; & what leſſe than death is it to him, to think of a revenge? Rape was by the Law of God, capitall; how much more, when it is ſeconded with inceſt? Anger was not puniſhment enough for ſo high an offence; Yet this is all that I heare of, from ſo indulgent a Father, ſaving that he makes up the reſt with ſorrow, puniſhing his Sons out-rage in himſelfe; The better natured, and more gracious a man is, the more ſubject he is to the danger of an over-remiſſeneſſe, & the exceſſe of favour and mercy: The milde injuſtice is no leſſe perilous to the Common-wealth, than the cruell.

If David (perhaps out of the conſcience of his owne late offence) will not puniſh this fact, his ſon Abſalom ſhall: not out of any care of Juſtice, but in a deſire of revenge. Two whole yeares, hath this ſlye Courtier ſmothered his indignation, and fained kindneſſe; elſe his invitation of Amnon in ſpeciall, had been ſuſpected. Even gallant Abſalom was a great Sheep-maſter; The bravery and magnificence of a Courtier muſt be built upon the grounds of frugality; David himſelfe is bidden to this bloody Sheep-ſhearing; It was no otherwiſe meant, but that the Fathers eyes ſhould bee the witneſſes of the Tragicall execution of one Son by another; Onely Davids love kept him from that horrible ſpectacle. He is careful not to be chargeable to that Son who cares not to overcharge his Fathers ſtomack with a Feaſt of Blood.

Amnon hath ſo quite forgot his ſin, that he dares goe to feaſt in that Houſe where Tamar was mourning; and ſuſpects not the kindneſſe of him, whom he had deſerved, of a Brother to make an enemy; nothing is more unſafe to be truſted, than the faire lookes of a feſtred heart: Where true Charity or juſt ſatisfaction, have not wrought a ſound reconciliation, malice doth but lurk for the opportunity of an advantage.

It was not for nothing that Abſalom deferred his revenge; which is now ſo much more exquiſite, as it is longer protracted: What could be more fearefull, than when Amnons heart was merry with Wine, to be ſuddenly ſtricken with death? As if this execution had beene no leſſe intended to the Soule, than to the body; How wickedly ſoever this was done by Abſalom, yet how juſt was it with God, that he, who in two yeares impunity would finde no leiſure of repentance, ſhould now receive a puniſhment without poſſibility of Repentance?

O God, thou art righteous to reckon for thoſe ſinnes, which humane partiality or negligence hath omitted, and while thou puniſheſt ſinne with ſinne, to puniſh ſinne with death; If either David had called Amnon to account for this villany, or Amnon had called himſelfe, the revenge had not been ſo deſperate; Happy is the man that by an unfained Repentance acquits his ſoule from his knowne evils, and improoves the dayes of his peace to the preventiõ of future vengeance; which if it be not done, the hand of God ſhall as ſurely overtake us in judgement, as the hand of Satan hath overtaken us in miſcariage unto ſinne.

Abſaloms returne and conſpiracie.

ONE Act of injuſtice drawes on another; The injuſtice of David, in not puniſhing the rape of Amnon, procures the injuſtice of Abſalom in puniſhing Amnon with Murder: That which the Father ſhould have juſtly revenged, and did not; the Sonne revenges unjuſtly. The rape of a Siſter was no leſſe worthy of death than the Murder of a Brother; Yea, this latter ſinne was therefore the leſſe, becauſe that Brother was worthy of death, though by another hand; whereas that Siſter was guilty of nothing but modeſt beauty: yet hee that knew this Rape paſſed over (two whole yeares) with impunity, dares not truſt the mercy of a Father, in the pardon of his Murder; but for three yeares hides his head in the Court of his Grand-father, the King of Geſhur. Doubtleſſe, that Heatheniſh Prince gave him a kinde welcome, for ſo meritorious a revenge of the diſhonour done to his owne Loynes.

No

A No man can tell, how Absalom should have sped from the hands of his otherwise over-indulgent Father, if he had been apprehended in the heat of the fact. Even the largest love may be over-strained, & may give a fall in the breaking; These fearefull effects of lenity, might perhaps have whetted the severity of David to shut up these out-rages in blood; Now this displeasure was weakned with age: Time and thoughts have digested this hard morsell; Davids heart told him, that his hands had a share in this offence, that Absalom did but give that stroke, which himselfe had wtongfully forborn; that the unrecoverable losse of one Sonne, would be but wofully relieved with the losse of another; Hee therefore, that in the newes of the deceased Infant could change his clothes, and wash himselfe, and cheere up his spirits, with the resolution of, I shall goe to him, he shall not returne to me, comforts himselfe concerning Amnon; and begins to long for Absalom.

B Those three yeares banishment seemed not so much a punishment to the Son, as to the Father; Now David begins to forgive himselfe; yet out of his wisedome, so inclines to favour, that he conceales it; and yet so conceales it, that it may be descryed by a cunning eye; If he had cast out no glances of affection, there had bin no hopes for his Absalom: If he had made profession of love after so foule an Act, there had bin no safety for others; now he lets fall so much secret grace, as may both hold up Absalom in the life of his hopes; and not hearten the presumption of others.

Good eyes see light thorow the smallest chinke; The wit of Ioab hath soone discerned Davids reserved affection; and knowes how to serve him in that which hee would, and would not accomplish: and now devises how to bring into the light, that

C birth of Desire, whereof he knew David was both big, and ashamed. A woman of Tekoah, (that Sex hath been ever held more apt for wiles) is suborned to personate a mourner, and to say that, by way of Parable, which in plaine termes would haue sounded too harshly; and now whiles she lamentably layes forth the losse and danger of her Sonnes, she shewes David his owne; and whiles she moves compassion to her pretended Issue, she winnes David to a pitty of himselfe, and a favourable sentence for Absalom. We love our selves better than others, but we see others better than our selves; who so would perfectly know his own case, let him view it in anothers person.

Parables sped well with David; One drew him to repent of his owne sinne; another, to remit Absaloms punishment; And now, as glad to heare this Plea, and willing to be perswaded unto that, which if he durst, he would have sought for, he gratifies

D Ioab with the grant of that suit, which Ioab more gratified him in suing for; Goe bring againe the young man Absalom.

How glad is Ioab, that hee hath light upon one Act, for which the Sun, both setting and rising, should shine upon him? and now he speeds to Geshur, to fetch backe Absalom to Jerusalem: he may bring the long banished Prince to the Citie; but to the Court he may not bring him. (Let him turne to his owne house, and let him not see my face.)

The good King hath so smarted with mercy, that now he is resolved upon austerity; and will relent but by degrees; It is enough for Absalom that he lives, and may now breathe his native ayre; Davids face is no object for the eyes of Murtherers: What a Dearling this Son was to his Father, appeares in that, after an unnaturall &

E barbarous rebellion, passionate David wishes to have changed lives with him; yet now, whiles his bowels yearned, his brow frowned; The face may not be seene, where the heart is set.

The best of Gods Saints may be blinded with affection; but when they shall once see their errors, they are carefull to correct them. Wherefore serves the power of Grace, but to subdue the insolencies of nature? It is the wisedome of Parents, as to hide their hearts from their best children, so to hide their countenances from the ungracious: Fleshly respects may not abate their rigour to the ill deserving. For the Child to see all his Fathers love, it is enough to make him wanton, and of wanton wicked: For a wicked Child, to see any of his Fathers love, it emboldens him in evill, and drawes on others.

Absaloms house is made his Prison; Justly is he confined to the place which hee had had ſtained with blood. Two yeares doth he live in Jeruſalem, without the happineſſe of his Fathers ſight; It was enough for David and him, to ſee the ſmoke of each others Chimnies. In the meane time, how impatient is Abſalom of this abſence? He ſends for Ioab, the Soliciter of his returne; So hard an hand, doth wiſe and holy David carry over his reduced Sonne, that his friendly Interceſſor, Ioab, dares not viſit him.

He, that afterwards kindled that ſeditious fire over all Iſrael, ſets fire now on the field of Ioab; whom love cannot draw to him, feare and anger ſhall; Continued diſpleaſure hath made Abſalom deſperate; Five yeares are paſſed ſince he ſaw the face of his Father; and now is he no leſſe weary of his life, than of this delay; (Wherefore am I come downe from Geſhur? It had beene better for me, to have beene there ſtill: Now therefore let me ſee the Kings face, and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill mee.) Either baniſhment, or death, ſeemed as tolerable to him, as the debarring of his Fathers ſight.

What a torment ſhall it be to the wicked, to bee ſhut out for ever, from the preſence of a God, without all poſſible hopes of recovery? This was but a Father of the fleſh, by whom, if Abſalom lived at firſt, yet in him he lived not, yea, not without him onely, but againſt him that Son found he could live; God is the Father of Spirits, in whom we ſo live, that without him can be no life, no being; to be ever excluded from him, in whom we live and are, what can it be but an eternall dying, an eternall periſhing? If in thy preſence, O God, be the fulneſſe of joy, in thine abſence, muſt needs be the fulneſſe of horror and torment; Hide not thy face from us, O Lord, but ſhew us the light of thy countenance, that we may live, and praiſe thee.

Even the fire of Ioabs field, warmed the heart of David, whiles it gave him proof of the heate of Abſaloms filiall affection. As a man therefore inwardly weary of ſo long diſpleaſure, at laſt he receives Abſalom to his ſight, to his favour; and ſeales his pardon with a kiſſe: Naturall Parents, know not how to retaine an everlaſting anger towards the fruit of their loynes; How much leſſe ſhall the God of mercies, bee unreconcileably diſpleaſed with his owne; and ſuffer his wrath to burne like fire that cannot be quenched? He will not alwayes chide, neither will he keep his anger for ever; His wrath endureth but a moment, in his favour is life; weeping may endure for a Night, but joy commeth in the Morning.

Abſalom is now as great as faire; Beauty and Greatneſſe make him proud; Pride workes his ruine; Great ſpirits will not reſt content with a moderate proſperity: Ere two yeares be runne out, Abſalom runnes out into a deſperate plot of rebellion; None but his owne Father was above him in Iſrael; None was ſo likely, in humane expectation, to ſucceed his Father; If his ambition could but have contained it ſelfe for a few yeares, (as David was now neere his period) dutifull cariage might have procured that by ſucceſſion, which now he ſought by force. An aſpiring minde is ever impatient, and holds Time it ſelfe an enemy, if it thruſt it ſelfe importunately betwixt the hopes and fruition: Ambition is never but in travell, and can finde no intermiſſion of painefull throwes, till ſhe have brought forth her abortive Deſires: How happy were we, if our affectation could be ſo eager of ſpirituall and heavenly promotions; Oh that my Soule could finde it ſelfe ſo reſtleſſe, till it feele the weight of that Crowne of Glory.

Outward pompe, and unwonted ſhewes of Magnificence, are wont much to affect the light mindes of the vulgar. Abſalom therefore to the incomparable comelineſſe of his perſon, addes the unuſuall ſtate of a more than Princely Equipage. His Charets rattle, and his Horſes trample proudly in the Streetes; Fiftie Foot-men run before their glittering Maſter: Jeruſalem rings of their glorious Prince; and is ready to adore theſe continuall Triumphs of Peace. Exceſſe & Novelty of expenſive Bravery and Oſtentation in publike perſons, gives juſt cauſe to ſuſpect either vanity, or a plot; True-hearted David can miſdoubt nothing in him, to whom he had both given life, and forgiven this. Love conſtrued all this, as meant to the honour of a Fathers Court, to the expreſſion of joy and thankfulneſſe for his reconcilement: The eyes & tongues of men are thus taken up: Now hath Abſalom laid ſnares for their hearts alſo:

He

He riſes early, & ſtands beſide the way of the gate: Ambition is no niggard of her paines; ſeldome ever is good meaning ſo induſtrious; The more he ſhined in Beauty & Roiall Attendance, ſo much more glory it was to neglect himſelfe, and to prefer the care of Juſtice to his owne eaſe: Neither is Abſalom more painfull than plauſible; his eare is open to all Plaintives, all Petitioners: there is no cauſe which he flatters not, See, thy matters are good & right; his hand flatters every commer with a ſalutation, his lips with a kiſſe. All men, all matters are ſoothed ſaving the ſtate and government; the cenſure of that is no leſſe deep, than the applauſe of all others, (There is none deputed of the King to heare thee.) What inſinuations could be more powerfull, No Muſick can be ſo ſweet to the eares of the unſtable multitude, as to heare well of themſelves, ill of their Governours: Abſalom needs not to wiſh himſelfe upon the Bench: Every man ſayes, Oh, what a curious Prince is Abſalom: What a juſt and carefull Ruler would Abſalom be? How happy were we, if we might be judged by Abſalom? Thoſe qualities which are wont ſingle to grace others, have conſpired to meet in Abſalom Goodlineſſe of Perſon, Magnificence of State, gracious Affability, unwearied Diligence, Humility in Greatneſſe, feeling Pitty, love of Juſtice, care of the Commonwealth; The World hath not ſo compleat a Prince as Abſalom: Thus the hearts of the people are not won, but ſtolne by a cloſſe Traytor from their lawfully Anointed Soveraigne. Over-faire ſhewes are a juſt Argument of unſoundneſſe; no naturall Face hath ſo cleare a White and Red, as the painted: Nothing wants now but a cloake of Religion, to perfect the Treachery of that ungracious Son, who caried Peace in his Name, War in his heart: and how eaſily is that put on? Abſalom hath an holy Vow to be paid in Hebron! The devout man had made it long ſince, whiles he was exiled in Syria, and now he haſts to performe it, (If the Lord ſhall bring me back againe to Ieruſalem, then wil I ſerve the Lord;) wicked Hypocrites care not to play with God, that they may mock men. The more deformed any act is, the fairer Viſor it ſtill ſeeketh.

How glad is the good old King, that he is bleſſed with ſo godly a Sonne; whom he diſmiſſeth laden with his cauſeleſſe bleſſings: What truſt is there in fleſh and blood, when David is not ſafe from his owne Loynes? The Conſpiracy is now fully forged, there lacked nothing but this gilt of Piety to winne favour and value in all eyes; and now it is a wonder, that but two hundred honeſt Citizens go up with Abſalom from Jeruſalem: The true-hearted lye moſt open to Credulity: How eaſie it is to beguile harmeleſſe intentions? The name of Davids Sonne caries them againſt the Father of Abſalom, and now theſe ſimple Iſraelites, are unwittingly made loyall Rebels. Their hearts are free from a plot, and they meane nothing but fidelity in the attendance of a Traytor. How many thouſands are thus ignorantly miſled into the traine of Errour; Their ſimplicity is as worthy of pitty, as their miſguidance of indignation. Thoſe that will ſuffer themſelves to be caryed with ſemblances of truth and Faithfulneſſe, muſt needs bee as farre from ſafety, as innocence.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE AND TRULY NOBLE LORD,

FRANCIS Lord RUSSEL, Baron of Thornhaugh, all increase of Honour and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

YOu ſhall not need to impute it to any other reaſon beſides your vertues, that I have preſumed to ſhroud this peece of my Labours under your Noble Patronage. The world hath taken juſt notice how much the Goſpell is graced by your reall profeſſion; whom neither Honor hath made overlie, nor wealth laviſh, nor charge miſerable, nor greatneſſe licentious. Go on happily in theſe ſafe and gaineſull ſteps of goodneſſe; and ſtill honor the God that hath honoured you; In the meane time, accept from my unworthy hands theſe poore Meditations, more high for their ſubject, than meane for their Author: Wherein Shimeies curſes ſhall teach you how unable either greatneſſe, or innocence is to beare off the blowes of ill tongues; and how baſenes ever molds it ſelfe according to the advantage of times. Achitophels depth compared with his end ſhall ſhew how witleſſe and inſenſate craft is, when it ſtrives againſt honeſty; and how juſtly are they forſaken of their reaſon, that have abandoned God; The blood of Abſalom and Sheba proclaime the inevitable revenge of rebellion, which neither in woods nor walls can finde ſafetie. The late famine of Iſrael for the forgotten violence offered to the Gibeonites, ſhewes what note God takes of our oathes; and what ſure vengeance of their violation: Davids muſter ſeconded with the plague of Iſrael teaches, how highly God may be offended with ſinnes of the leaſt appearance, how ſevere to his owne, how merciſull in that ſeverity. If theſe my thoughts ſhall be approved beneficiall to any ſoule, I am rich. I ſhall vow my prayes to their ſucceſſe; and to the happineſſe of your honourable Family, both in the root and branches; Whereto I am in all A

WIth an heavy heart, and a covered head, and a weeping eye, and bare feet, is David gone away from Hieruſalem; never did hee with more joy come up to his City, than now hee left it with ſorrow: how could he do otherwiſe, whom the inſurrection of his owne Sonne drove out from his houſe, from his throne, from the Arke of God? and now, when the depth of this griefe deſerved nothing but compaſſion, the foule mouth of Shimei entertaines David with curſes: There is no ſmall cruelty in the picking out of a time for miſchiefe; That word would ſcarce gall at one ſeaſon, which at another killeth. The ſame ſhaft flying with the winde pierces deep, which againſt it, can hardly find ſtrength to ſtick upright. The valour, and juſtice of children condemns it for injuriouſly cowardly to ſtrike their adverſary whē he is once down. It is the murder of the tongue to inſult upon thoſe, whom God hath humbled, and to draw blood of that backe, which is yet blew from the hand of the Almighty. If Shimei had not preſumed upon Davids dejection, he durſt not have been thus bold; now he that perhaps durſt not have lookt at one of thoſe Worthies ſingle, defies them all at once, and doth both caſt, and ſpeak ſtones againſt David, and all his army. The malice of baſe ſpirits ſometimes caries them further, than the courage of the valiant.

In all the time of Davids proſperity, we heard no newes of Shimei; his ſilence and colourable obedience made him paſſe for a great ſubject; yet all that while was his heart unſound and trayterous. Peace and good ſucceſſe hides many a falſe heart; (like as the Snow-drift covers an heape of dung) which once melting away, deſcryes the rottennes that lay within: Honor and welfare are but flattering glaſſes of mens affections: adverſity will not deceive us, but wil make a true report as of our own powers, ſo of the diſpoſition of others.

He that ſmiled on David in his throne, curſeth him in his flight: if there be any quarrels, any exceptions to be taken againſt a man, let him look to have them layd in his diſh when he fares the hardeſt. This practiſe have wicked men learnt of their maſter, to take the utmoſt advantages of our afflictions; He that ſuffers had need to be double armed, both againſt paine, and cenſure.

Every word of Shimei was a ſlaunder; He that tooke Sauls ſpeare from his head, and and repented to have but cut the lap of his garment, is reproched as a man of blood. The man after Gods owne heart is branded for a man of Belial. He that was sent for out of the fields to be anointed, is taxed for an usurper: If Davids hands were stained with blood, yet not of Sauls House; It was his servant, not his master that bled by him; yet is the blood of the Lords anointed cast in Davids teeth, by the spight of a false tongue. Did we not see David (after all the proofs of his humble loyaltie) shedding the blood of that Amalekite, who did but say he shed Sauls? Did wee not heare him lament passionately for the death of so ill a master, chiding the mountaines of Gilboa on which he fel, & angerly wishing that no dew might fall where that blood was poured out; and charged the daughters of Israel to weepe over Saul, who had clothed them in scarlet? Did we not heare and see him inquiring for any remainder of the House of Saul, that he might shew him the kindnesse of God? Did we not see him honouring lame Mephibosheth with a princely seat at his owne table? Did we not see him revenging the blood of his rivall Ishbosheth, upon the heads of Rechab and Baanah? What could any living man have done more to wipe off these bloody aspersions? Yet is not a Shimei ashamed to charge innocent David with all the blood of the House of Saul.

How is it likely this clamorous wretch had secretly traduced the name of David, all the time of his government, that dares thus accuse him to his face, before all the mighty men of Israel, who were witnesses of the contrary? The greater the person is, the more open do his actions lie to mis-interpretation, and censure. Every tongue speakes partially according to the interest he hath in the cause, or the patient. It is not possible that eminent persons should be free from imputations; Innocence can no more protect them, than power.

If the patience of David can digest this indignity, his traine cannot; their fingers could not but itch to returne iron for stones. If Shimei raile on David, Abishai railes on Shimei, Shimei is of Sauls Family, Abishai of Davids; each speakes for his owne: Abishai most justly bends his tongue against Shimei, as Shimei against David most unjustly: Had Shimei been any other then a dog, he had never so rudely barked at an harmelesse passenger, neither could he deserve lesse than the losse of that head which had uttered such blasphemies against Gods anointed: The zeale of Abishai doth but plead for justice, and is checked; What have I to doe with you ye sonnes of Zerviah? David said not so much to his reviler, as to his abettor: He well saw that a revenge was just, but not seasonable; he found the present a fit time to suffer wrongs, not to right them: he therefore gives way rather meekly to his owne humiliation, then to the punishment of another: There are seasons wherein lawfull motions are not fit to be cherished; Anger doth not become a mourner; One passion at once is enough for the soule. Unadvised zeale may be more prejudiciall, than a cold remissnesse.

What if the Lord for the correction of his servant, have said unto Shimei, Curse David; yet is Shimeies curse no lesse worthy of Abishaies sword; the sinne of Shimeies curse was his owne, the smart of the curse was Gods; God wils that, as Davids chastisement, which he hates as Shimeies wickednesse; that lewd tongue moved from God, it moved lewdly from Satan. Wicked men are never the freer from guilt, or punishment, for that hand which the holy God hath in their offensive actions; Yet David can say, Let him alone, and let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him; as meaning to give a reason of his own patience, rather than Shimeies impunity: The issue shewed how well David could distinguish betwixt the act of God, and of a traitor; how hee could both kisse the rod, and burne it: There can bee none so strong motive of our meek submission to evils, as the acknowledgement of their orginall, He that can see the hand of God striking him by the hand or tongue of an enemy, shall more awe the first mover of his harme, than maligne the instrument. Even whiles David laments the rebellion of his son, he gaines by it; & makes that the argument of his patience, which was the exercise of it. Behold, my son which came forth of my bowels seeketh my life; how much more now may this Benjamite do it? The wickednesse of an Absalom may rob his father of comfort, but shall helpe to adde to his fathers goodnesse: It is the advantage of great crosses, that they swallow up the lesse; one mans sin cannot be excused by anothers,

A anothers,the leſſer by the greater;If Abſalom be a traytor,Shimei may not curſe and rebell: But the paſſion conceived from the indignity of a ſtranger may be abated by the harder meaſure of our owne;If we can therefore ſuffer becauſe we have ſuffered, we have profited by our affliction. A weake heart faints with every addition of ſucceeding trouble; the ſtrong recollects it ſelfe, and is growne ſo ſkilfull that it beares off one miſchiefe with another.

It is not either the unnaturall inſurrection of Abſalom,nor the unjuſt curſes of Shimei,that can put David quite out of heart; It may be that the Lord will looke on mine affliction,and will requite good for his curſing,this day. So well was David acquainted with the proceedings of God, that hee knew cheriſhing was ever wont to follow ſtripes; after vehement evacuation,cordials;after a darke night,the cleare light of the morning;Hope therefore doth not onely uphold,but cheare up his heart,in the midſt of B his ſorrow; If we can looke beyond the cloud of our affliction,and ſee the Sun-ſhine of comfort on the other ſide of it,we cannot be ſo diſcouraged with the preſence of evil,as heartned with the iſſue;As on the contrary,let a man be never ſo merry within, and ſee paine and miſery waiting for him at the doore, his expectation of evill ſhall eaſily daunt all the ſenſe of his pleaſure; the retributions of temporall favours go but by peradventures,(It may be the Lord will look on mine affliction;)of eternall,are certaine and infallible: If we ſuffer,we ſhall raigne;why ſhould not the aſſurance of raigning make us triumph in ſuffering?

Davids patience drawes on the inſolence of Shimei.Evill natures grow preſumptuous upon forbearance: In good diſpoſitions, injury unanſwered growes weary of it C ſelfe,and dyes in a voluntary remorſe;but in thoſe dogged ſtomacks,which are onely capable of the reſtraints of feare,the ſilent digeſtion of a former wrong provokes a ſecond;Mercy had need to be guided with wiſdome,leſt it prove cruell to it ſelfe.

Oh the baſe minds of inconſtant Time-ſervers! Stay but a while,till the wheel be a little turned,you ſhall ſee humble Shimei fall downe on his face before David,in his return over Jordan;now his ſubmiſſion ſhall equall his former rudeneſſe;his prayers ſhall requite his curſes;his teares make amends for his ſtones,Let not my Lord impute iniquitie unto mee; neither doe thou remember that which thy ſervant did perverſly, the day that my Lord the King went out of Ieruſalem, that the King ſhould take it to heart; for thy ſervant doth know that I have ſinned;Falſe-hearted Shimei,had Abſalom proſpered,thou hadſt not ſinned,thou hadſt not repented; then hadſt thou bragged of thine inſultation over his miſeries,whoſe pardon thou now beggeſt with teares. The changes of D worldly minds are thankleſſe, ſince they are neither wrought out of conſcience nor love,but onely by a ſlaviſh feare of a juſt puniſhment.

David could ſay no more to teſtifie his ſorrow (for his hainous ſins againſt God) to Nathan,than Shimei ſaies of himſelfe to David;whereto may be added the advantage of a voluntary confeſſion in this offender, which in David was extorted by the reproofe of a Prophet: yet is Davids confeſſion ſeriouſly penitent, Shimeis craftily hypocriticall: Thoſe alterations are juſtly ſuſpected,which are ſhaped according to the times and outward occaſions: the true penitent looks onely at God and his ſin, and is changed when all other things are themſelves.

Great offences had need of anſwerable ſatisfactions;As Shimei was the onely man E of the houſe of Benjamin that came forth and curſed David in his flight, ſo is hee the firſt man (even before thoſe of the Houſe of Ioſeph,though nearer in ſituation) that comes to meet David in his returne with prayers and gratulation:Notorious offenders may not think to ſit downe with the taſke of ordinary ſervices;The retributions of their obedience muſt be proportionable to their crimes.

ACHITOPHEL.

SO ſoone as David heard of Achitophels hand in that conſpiracie,he fals to his prayers,O Lord,I pray thee turne the counſell of Achitophel into fooliſhneſſe; The knowne wiſedome of his revolted counſellor made him a dangerous and dread-dreadfull adverſary: Great parts miſ-imployed cannot but prove moſt miſchievous: when wickedneſſe is armed with wit, and power, none but a God can defeat it; when we are matched with a ſtrong and ſubtile enemy, it is high time (if ever) to be devout; If the bounty of God have thought good to furniſh his creatures with powers to warre againſt himſelfe, his wiſedome knowes how to turne the abuſe of thoſe powers to the ſhame of the owners, and the glory of the giver.

Oh the policy of this Machiavell of Iſrael, no leſſe deep than hell it ſelfe: Go in to thy fathers concubines, which he hath left to keepe the houſe; and when all Iſrael ſhall heare that thou art abhorred of thy Father, the hands of all that are with thee ſhall be ſtrong. The firſt care muſt be to ſecure the factiõ: There can be no ſafety in ſiding with a doubtfull rebell: if Abſalom be a traytor, yet he is a Son, Nature may returne to it ſelfe; Abſalom may relent, David may remit; where then are we that have helpt to promote the conſpiracy? the danger is ours, whiles this breach may be peeced; There is no way but to ingage Abſalom in ſome further act, uncapable of forgiveneſſe; Beſides the throne, let him violate the bed of his Father; unto his treaſon let him adde an inceſt, no leſſe unnaturall; now ſhal the world ſee that Abſalom neither hopes nor cares for the reconciliation of a father; Our quarrel can never have any ſafe end but victory; the hope whereof depends upon the reſolutiõ of our followers; they cannot be reſolute, but upõ the unpardonable wickednes of their Leader: Neither can this villany be ſhamefull enough, if it be ſecret. The cloſeneſſe of evill argues feare, or modeſty; neither of which can beſeeme him that would be a ſucceſſefull traytor: Set up a Tent on the top of the houſe, and let all Iſrael be witneſſes of thy ſin, and thy Fathers ſhame: Ordinary crimes are for vulgar offenders; Let Abſalom ſin eminently; and do that which may make the world at once to bluſh, and wonder.

Who would ever have thought that Achitophel had lived at Court, at the Councel-table of a David? Who would thinke that mouth had ever ſpoken well? Yet had he been no other thẽ as the Oracle of God to the Religious Court of Iſrael; even whiles he was not wiſe enough to be good: Policy and grace are not alwaies lodged under one roofe: This man whiles he was one of Davids deep Counſellors, was one of Davids fooles that ſaid in their hearts, There is no God; elſe he could not have hoped to make good an evill with worſe, to build the ſucceſſe of treaſon upon inceſt.

Prophane hearts doe ſo contrive the plots of their wickedneſſe, as if there were no over-ruling power to croſſe their deſignes, or to revenge thẽ: He that ſits in heaven laughs them to ſcorne, and ſo far gives way to their ſins, as their ſins may prove plagues unto themſelves.

Theſe two Sons of David met with peſtilent counſell; Amnon is adviſed to inceſt with his Siſter; Abſalom is adviſed to inceſt with his Fathers Concubines: That by Ionadab, this by Achitophel: Both prevaile. It is as eaſie at leaſt to take ill counſell, as to give it: Proneneſſe to villany in the great, cannot want eyther projecters to deviſe or paraſites to execute the moſt odious ſins.

The Tent is ſpred (leſt it ſhould not bee conſpicuous enough) on the top of the houſe. The act is done, in the ſight of all Iſrael: The filthineſſe of the ſin was not ſo great, as the impudency of the manner. When the Prophet Nathan came with that heavy meſſage of reproofe, and menace to David, after his ſin with Bathſheba, hee could ſay from God, Behold I will raiſe up evill againſt thee, out of thine owne houſe, and will take thy Wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he ſhall lie with thy wives in the ſight of this Sunne: For thou didſt it ſecretly, but I will do this thing before all Iſrael, and before this Sunne. The counſell of Achitophel, and the luſt of Abſalom, have fulfilled the judgement of God. Oh the wiſedome of the Almightie, that can uſe the worſt of evils, well; and moſt juſtly make the ſins of men his executioners!

It was the ſin of Reuben that he defiled his Fathers bed; yet not in the ſame height of lewdneſſe: what Reuben did in a youthfull wantonneſſe, Abſalom did in a malicious deſpight: Reuben ſinned with one, Abſalom with ten; Reuben ſecretly, Abſalom in the open eyes of heaven and earth; yet old Iacob could ſay of Reuben, Thou ſhalt not excel; thy dignity is gone; whiles Achitophel ſayes to Abſalom, Thy dignity ſhall ariſe from inceſt; Climbe up to thy Fathers bed, if thou wilt ſit in his throne; If Achitophel were a politician, tician, Iacob was a Prophet; if the one ſpake from carnall ſenſe, the other from divine revelation. Certainly to ſin is not the way to proſper; what ever vaine fooles promiſe to themſelves, there is no wiſdome, nor underſtanding, nor counſell againſt the Lord.

After the rebellion is ſecured for continuance, the next care is that it may end in victory; this alſo hath the working head of Achitophel projected. Wit and experience told him, that in theſe caſes of aſſault, celerity uſes to bring forth the happieſt diſpatch: whereas protraction is no ſmall advantage to the defendant. Let me (ſaith he) chooſe out now twelve thouſand men, and I will up, and follow after David this night; and I will come upon him while he is weary and weake-handed. No advice could be more pernitious: For, beſides the wearineſſe and unreadineſſe of David, and his army, the ſpirits of that worthy Leader were daunted, and dejected with ſorrow, and offered way to the violence of a ſudden aſſault. The field had been halfe won ere any blow ſtricken. Achitophel could not have been reputed ſo wiſe, if he had not learnd the due proportion betwixt actions and times: He that obſerveth every wind ſhall never ſow; but he that obſerves no winde at all, ſhall never reape.

The likelieſt devices do not alwaies ſucceed; The God that had appointed to eſtabliſh Davids throne, and determined Salomon to his ſucceſſion, finds meanes to croſſe the plot of Achitophel by a leſſe probable advice: Huſhai was not ſent backe for nothing: where God hath in his ſecret will decreed any event, he inclines the wills of men to approve that which may promote his owne purpoſes: Neither had Huſhai ſo deep an head, neither was his counſell ſo ſure, as that of Achitophel, yet his tongue ſhal refell Achitophel, and divert Abſalom: The pretences were fayrer, though the grounds were unſound: Firſt, to ſweeten his oppoſition, he yeelds the praiſe of wiſdome to his adverſary in al other counſels, that he may have leave to deny it in this: His very cõtradictiõ in the preſent inſinuates a generall allowance. Then, he ſuggeſts certaine apparant truths concerning Davids valour, and ſkill, to give countenance to the inferences of his improbabilities. Laſtly, he cunningly feeds the proud humor of Abſalom, in magnifying the power and extent of his commands, and ends in the glorious boaſts of his fore-promiſed victory; As it is with faces, ſo with counſell, that is faire that pleaſeth. He that gives the uttrance to words, gives alſo their ſpeed: Favour both of ſpeech and men is not ever according to deſert, but according to fore-ordination: The tongue of Huſhai, and the heart of Abſalom is guided by a power above their owne; Huſhai ſhall therefore prevaile with Abſalom, that the treaſon of Abſalom may not prevaile; He that worketh all in all things, ſo diſpoſeth of wicked men and ſpirits, that whiles they doe moſt oppoſe his revealed will, they execute his ſecret, and whiles they thinke moſt to pleaſe, they overthrow themſelves.

When Abſalom firſt met Huſhai returned to Hieruſalem, he upbraided him pleaſantly with the ſcoffe of his profeſſed friendſhip to David; Is this thy kindneſſe to thy friend? Sometimes there is more truth in the mouth than in the heart, more in jeſt than in earneſt; Huſhai was a friend, his ſtay was his kindnes; and now he hath done that for which he was left at Hieruſalem, diſappointed Achitopel, preſerved David; Neither did his kindneſſe to his friend reſt here, but (as one that was juſtly jealous of him with whom he was allowed to temporize) he miſtruſts the approbation of Abſalom; and not daring to put the life of his Maſter upon ſuch an hazard, he gives charge to Zadok and Abiathar, of this intelligence unto David: we cannot bee too ſuſpicious when we have to doe with thoſe that are faithleſſe: We cannot be too curious of the ſafty of good Princes.

Huſhai feares not to deſcry the ſecrets of Abſaloms counſell; to betray a traytor is no other then a commendable work: Zadok and Abiathar are faſt within the gates of Jeruſalem; their Sons lay purpoſely abroad in the fields; this meſſage that concerned no leſſe than the life of David, and the whole kingdome of Iſrael, muſt be truſted with a Maid: Sometimes it pleaſeth the wiſdome of God, who hath the variety of heaven and earth before him, to ſingle out weak inſtruments for great ſervices: and they ſhall ſerve his turn, as wel as the beſt: No counſellor of State could have made this diſpatch more effectually: Ionathan and Ahimaaz are ſent, deſcried, purſued, preſerved:

ſerved: The fidelity of a Maid inſtructed them in their meſſage, the ſuttlety of a woman ſaved their lives. At the Well of Rogel they received their meſſage, in the Well of Bahurim was their life ſaved: The ſudde wit of a woman hath choked the mouth of her Well with dryed corne, that it might not bewray the meſſengers: & now David heares ſafely of his danger, and prevents it: and though weary with travell, and laden with ſorrow, he muſt ſpend the night in his remove. Gods promiſes of his deliverance, & the confirmation of his kingdom may not make him neglect the means of his ſafety: If he be faithfull, we may not be careleſſe; ſince our diligence and care are appointed for the factors of that divine providence; The acts of God muſt abate nothing of ours; rather muſt we labour, by doing that which he requireth, to further that which he decreeth. A

There are thoſe that have great wits for the publike, none for themſelves: Such was Achitopel, who whiles he had powers to governe a State, could not tell how to rule his owne paſſions: Never till now doe we find his counſell balked, neither was it now rejected as ill, only Huſhaies was allowed for better: he can live no longer now that he is beaten at his owne weapon: this alone is cauſe enough to ſaddle his Aſſe, and to go home and put the halter about his own necke. Pride cauſes men both to miſ-interpret diſgraces, and to over-rate them: Now is Davids prayer heard, Achitophels counſell is turned into fooliſhneſſe: Deſperate Achitophel, what if thou be not the wiſeſt man of al Iſrael? Even thoſe that have not attained to the higheſt pitch of wiſdome, have found contentment in a mediocrity: what if thy counſell were deſpiſed? A wiſe man knows to live happily in ſpight of an unjuſt contempt: what madnes is this, to revenge another mans reputation upon thy ſelf? And whiles thou ſtriveſt for the higheſt roome of wiſdome, to run into the groſſeſt extremity of folly? Worldly wiſdome is no protection from ſhame and ruine. How eaſily may a man, though naturally wiſe, be made weary of life? A little paine, a little ſhame, a little loſſe, a ſmal affront can ſoone rob a man of all comfort, and cauſe his owne hands to rob him of himſelfe: If there be not higher reſpects then the world can yeeld, to maintaine us in being, it ſhould be a miracle if indignation did not kil more then diſeaſe: now, that God, by whoſe appointment we live here, for his moſt wiſe and holy purpoſes, hath found meanes to make life ſweet, and death terrible. B C

What a mixture do we find here of wiſdome and madneſſe? Achitophel will needs hang himſelfe, there is madneſſe; He will yet ſet his houſe in order; there is an act of wiſdome: And could it be poſſible that he, who was ſo wiſe as to ſet his houſe in order, ſhould be ſo mad as to hang himſelfe? That he ſhould be carefull to order his houſe, who regarded not to order his impotent paſſions? That he ſhould care for his houſe, who cared not for either body or ſoule? How vaine it is for a man to be wiſe, if he be not wiſe in God? How prepoſterous are the cares of idle worldlings, that prefer all other things to themſelves, and whiles they looke at what they have in their cofers, forget what they have in their breaſts. D

The death of Abſalom.

THe ſame God that raiſed enmity to David from his owne loynes, procured him favour from forainers; Strangers ſhall relieve him, whom his own ſon perſecutes; Here is not a loſſe, but an exchange of love: Had Abſalom been a ſon of Ammon, and Shobi a ſon of David, David had found no cauſe of complaint: If God take with one hand, he gives with another: whiles that divine bounty ſerves us in, good meat, though not in our owne diſhes, we have good reaſon to be thankfull. No ſooner is David come to Mehanaim, then Barzillai, Machir, and Shobi refreſh him with proviſiõs. Who ever ſaw any child of God left utterly deſtitute? Whoſoever be the meſſenger of our aide, we know whence he comes; Heaven ſhall want power, and earth meanes, before any of the houſhold of faith ſhall want maintenance. E

He that formerly was forced to imploy his armes for his defence againſt a tyran-

nous father in law, muſt now buckle them on againſt an unnaturall ſon: Now therefore he muſters his men, and ordaines his Commanders, and marſhalls his troupes; and, ſince their loyall importunity will not allow the hazard of his perſon, he at once incourages them by his eye, and reſtraines them with his tongue, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake: How unreaſonably favourable are the wars of a father? O holy David, what meanes this il-placed love, this unjuſt mercy? Deale gently with a Traytor? but of all traytors with a ſon? of all Sons with an Abſalom, the graceleſſe darling of ſo good a father; and all this for my ſake, whoſe Crowne, whoſe blood he hunts after? For whoſe ſake ſhould Abſalom be purſued, if he muſt be forborne for thine? He was ſtill courteous to thy followers, affable to ſutors, plauſible to all Iſrael, only to thee he is cruell: Wherefore are thoſe armes if the cauſe of the quarrell muſt be a motive of mercy? Yet thou ſayeſt, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake: Even in the holieſt Parents, nature may be guilty of an injurious tenderneſſe, of a bloody indulgence.

Or, whether ſhall we not rather thinke this was done in type of that unmeaſurable mercy of the true King, and redeemer of Iſrael, who prayed for his perſecutors, for his murderers; and, even whiles they were at once ſcorning and killing him, could ſay, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do? If wee be ſonnes, wee are ungracious, we are rebellious, yet ſtill is our heavenly Father thus compaſſionately regardfull of us: David was not ſure of his ſucceſſe; there was great inequality in the number; Abſaloms forces were more then double to his; It might have come to the contrary iſſue, that David ſhould have beene forced to ſay, Deale gently with the Father of Abſalom; but, in a ſuppoſition of that victory, which onely the goodneſſe of his cauſe bade him hope for, hee ſaith, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom. As for us, we are never but under mercy; our God needs no advantages to ſweepe us from the earth, any moment; yet he continues that life, and thoſe powers to us, whereby wee provoke him, and bids his Angels deale kindely with us, and beare us in their armes, whiles wee lift up our hands, and bend our tongues againſt Heaven. O mercy, paſt the comprehenſion of all finite ſpirits, and onely to be conceived by him whoſe it is: never more reſembled by any earthly affection then by this of his Deputy and Type, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake.

The battle is joyned; Davids followers are but an handfull to Abſaloms. How eaſily may the fickle multitude be tranſported to the wrong ſide? What they wanted in abettors, is ſupplied in the cauſe. Unnaturall ambition drawes the ſword of Abſalom; Davids, a neceſſary and a juſt defence. They that in ſimplicity of heart followed Abſalom, cannot in malice of heart, perſecute the father of Abſalom: with what courage could any Iſraelite draw his ſword againſt a David? or on the other ſide, who can want courage to fight for a righteous Soveraigne, and father, againſt the conſpiracy of a wicked ſon? The God of Hoſts, with whom it is all one to ſave with many or with few, takes part with juſtice, and lets Iſrael feele what it is to beare armes for a traiterous Uſurper. The ſword devoures twenty thouſand of thē, and the wood devours more then the ſword; It muſt needs be a very univerſall rebellion, wherein ſo many periſhed. What vertue or merits can aſſure the hearts of the vulgar, when ſo gracious a Prince finds ſo many revolters? Let no man look to proſper by rebellion; the very thickets, and ſtakes, and pits, & wild beaſts of the wood ſhall conſpire to the puniſhment of traytors; Amongſt the reſt, ſee how a fatall Oke hath ſingled out the ringleader of this hatefull inſurrectiō; and will at once ſerve for his hangman & gallowes; by one of thoſe ſpreading armes ſnatching him away to ſpeedy executiō. Abſalom was comely, and he knew it well enough; His haire was no ſmall peece of his beauty, nor matter of his pride: It was his wont to cut it once a yeere; not for that it was too long, but too heavy; his heart could have borne it longer, if his neck had not complained; And now the juſtice of God hath platted an halter of thoſe locks: Thoſe treſſes had formerly hang'd looſely diſhelved on his ſhoulders, now he hangs by thē; He had wont to weigh his haire, & was proud to find it ſo heavy, now his haire poiſeth the weight of his body, and makes his burden his torment: It is no marvell if his owne haire turn'd traytor to him, who durſt riſe up againſt his father. That part which is miſ-uſed by man to ſin, is commonly imployed by God to revenge; The revenge that it worketh for God, makes amends for the offence, whereto it is drawne againſt God; The very beaſt whereon Abſalom ſat, as weary to beare ſo unnaturall a burden, reſignes over his load to the tree of Juſtice; There hangs Abſalom betweene heaven and earth, as one that was hated and abandoned both of earth and heaven: As if God meant to preſcribe this puniſhment for Traytors, Abſalom, Achitophel, and Iudas dye all one death. So let them periſh that dare lift up their hand againſt Gods Anointed.

The honeſt ſouldier ſees Abſalom hanging in the Oke, and dares not touch him; his hands were held with the charge of David, Beware that none touch the young man Abſalom; Ioab, upon that intelligence, ſees him, and ſmites him, with no leſſe then three darts. What the ſouldier forbore in obedience, the Captaine doth in zeale: not fearing to prefer his Soveraignes ſafety, to his command; and more tendring the life of a King, and peace of his Country, than the weake affection of a father. I dare not ſit Judge betwixt this zeale and that obedience, betwixt the Captaine & the Souldier; the one was a good ſubject, the other a good Patriot: the one loved the King, the other loved David; and out of love diſobeyed; the one meant as wel as the other ſped: As if God meant to fulfill the charge of his Anointed, without any blame of his ſubjects, it pleaſed him to execute that immediate revenge upō the rebell, which would have diſpatcht him without hand, or dart: only the Mule & the Oke cōſpired to this executiō; but that death would have required more leaſure, then it was ſafe for Iſrael to give; and ſtill life would give hope of reſcue: to cut off all feares, Ioab lends the Oke three darts to help forward ſo needfull a worke of Juſtice: All Iſrael did not afford ſo firme a friend to Abſalom, as Ioab had beene; who but Ioab had ſuborned the witty widdow of Tekoah, to ſue for the recalling of Abſalom, from his three yeeres exile? Who but he went to fetch him from Geſhur to Jeruſalem? Who but he fetcht him from his houſe at Jeruſalem (whereto he had beene two yeeres confined) to the face, to the lips of David: Yet now he that was his ſollicitor for the Kings favor, is his executioner againſt the Kings charge: With honeſt hearts all reſpects either of blood or friendſhip ceaſe in the caſe of Treaſon; well hath Ioab forgotten himſelfe to be a friend to him who had forgotten himſelfe to be a ſonne. Even civilly, the King is our common father, our Country our common mother; Nature hath no private relations which ſhould not gladly give place to theſe. He is neither father, nor ſon, nor brother, nor friend, that conſpires againſt the common parent: Well doth he who ſpake parables for his Maſters ſon, now ſpeake darts to his Kings enemy; and pierces that heart which was falſe to ſo great a father: Thoſe darts are ſeconded by Ioabs followers; each man tries his weapon upon ſo faire a marke. One death is not enough for Abſalom; he is at once hanged, ſhot, mangled, ſtoned: Juſtly was he lift up to the Oke, who had lift up himſelfe againſt his father, and Soveraigne; Juſtly is he pierced with darts, who had pierced his fathers heart with ſo many ſorrowes; Juſtly is he mangled, who hath diſmembred and divided all Iſrael; Juſtly is he ſtoned, who hath not only curſed, but purſued his owne parent.

Now Ioab ſounds the retrait; and cals off his eager troupes from execution; however he knew what his rebellious Country men had deſerved in following an Abſalō: Wiſe Cōmanders know how to put a difference betwixt the heads of a faction, and the miſ-guided multitude; & can pity the one, whiles they take revēge on the other.

So did Abſalom eſteeme himſelfe, that hee thought it would bee a wrong to the world to want the memoriall of ſo goodly a perſon. God had denied him ſons; How juſt it was that he ſhould want a ſon, who had robd his father of a ſon, who would have robd himſelfe of a father, his father of a Kingdome? It had been pity ſo poyſonous a plant ſhould have been fruitfull; His pride ſhall ſupply nature, he reares up a ſtately pillar in the Kings dale, and calls it by his owne name, that he might live in dead ſtones, who could not ſurvive in living iſſue: and now, behold this curious pile ends in a rude heap, which ſpeaks no language but the ſhame of that carcaſſe which it covers: Heare this ye glorious fooles, that care not to perpetuate any memory of your

A your selves to the world, but of ill deserving greatnesse, the best of this affectation is vanity; the worst, infamy and dishonour: whereas the memoriall of the just shall bee blessed; and if his humility shall refuse an Epitaph, and chuse to hide himselfe under the bare earth, God himselfe shall ingrave his name upon the pillar of eternity.

There now lyes Absalom in the pit, under a thousand grave-stones, in every of which is written his everlasting reproach: well might this heap over-live that pillar, for when that ceased to be a pillar it began to be an heap, neither will it cease to be a monument of Absaloms shame, whiles there are stones to be found upon earth: Even at this day very Pagans and Pilgrims that passe that way, cast each man a stone unto that heape, and are wont to say in a solemne execration, Cursed be the paricide Absalom, and cursed be all unjust persecutors of their parents, for ever: Fasten your eyes
B upon this wofull spectacle, O all yee rebellious and ungracious children, w^ch^ rise up against the loynes and thighs from which yee fell: and know that it is the least part of your punishment, that your carcasses rot in the earth, and your name in ignominy: these do but shaddow out those eternall sufferings, of your soules, for your foule and unnaturall disobedience.

Absalom is dead, who shall report it to his Father? Surely Ioab was not so much afraid of the fact, as of the message: There are busie spirits that love to carry newes, though thankelesse, though purposelesse: such as Ahimaaz, the son of Zadock, who importunately thrust himselfe into this service: wise Ioab, who well saw, how unwelcome tydings must be the burthen of the first post, disswades him in vaine: he knew
C David too well, to imploy a friend to that errand. An Ethiopian servant was a fitter bearer of such a message, then the son of the Priest. The entertainmēt of the person doth so follow the quality of the news, that David could argue a far off, He is a good man, he commeth with good tidings. Oh how welcome deserve those messengers to be that bring us the glad tydings of salvation, that assure us of the foyle of all spirituall enemies, and tell us of nothing but victories, and Crownes, and Kingdomes; If we thinke not their feet beautifull, our hearts are foule with infidelity, and secure worldlinesse.

So wise is Ahimaaz grown by Ioabs intimation, that though he out-went Cushi in his pace, he suffers Cushi to out-go him in his tale, cunningly suppressing that part, which he knew must be both necessarily delivered, and unpleasingly received.

As our care is wont to be where our love is; Davids first word is not, how fares the D Host, but how fares the young man Absalom: Like a wise and faithfull messenger, Cushi answers by an honest insinuatiō, The enemies of my Lord the King & all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is; implying both what was done, and, why David should approve it being done; How is the good King thunder-strooke, with that word of his Black-more? who, as if he were at once bereaved of all comfort, and cared not to live, but in the name of Absalom, goes and weepes and cryes out, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, Would God I had dyed for thee; O Absalom my son, my son. What is this we heare? that he whose life Israel valued at ten thousand of theirs, should be exchanged with a traytors? that a good King whose life was sought, should wish to lay it down for the preservation of his murtherer? The best men have not wont to bee the least passionate; But what shall we say to that love of thine, O
E Saviour, who hast said of us wretched traytors, not, Would God I had dyed for you; But I will dye, I doe dye, I have dyed for you; Oh love, like thy selfe, infinite, incomprehensible, whereat the Angels of Heaven stand yet amazed; wherewith thy Saints are ravished, Turne away thine eyes from me, for they overcome me; Oh thou that dwellest in the Gardens, the companions hearken to thy voyce: cause us to heare it; that wee may in our measure answer thy love, and enjoy it for ever.

Shebaes Rebellion.

IT was the doome which God paſſed upon the man after his owne heart by the mouth of Nathan; that the ſword ſhould never depart from his houſe, for the blood of Vriah: After that wound healed by remiſſion, yet this ſcarre remaines; Abſalom is no ſooner caſt down into the pit, then Sheba the ſon of Bichri is up in armes; If David be not plagued, yet he ſhall be corrected; Firſt by the rod of a Sonne, then of a ſubject: He had lift up his hand againſt a faithfull ſubject; now a faithleſſe dares to lift up his hand againſt him. Malice like ſome hereditary ſickneſſe runs in a blood: Saul and Shimei, and Sheba were all of an houſe: That ancient grudge was not yet dead: The fire of the houſe of Iemini was but raked up, never throughly out; and now, that which did but ſmoake in Shimei, flames in Sheba: Although even through this chaſtiſement it is not hard to diſcerne a Type of that perpetuall ſucceſſion of enmity, which ſhould be raiſed againſt the true King of Iſrael. O Son of David, when didſt thou ever want enemies? How wert thou deſigned by thine eternall Father, for a ſigne that ſhould be ſpoken againſt? How did the Gentiles rage, and the people imagine vain things? The Kings of the earth aſſembled, and the Rulers came together againſt thee? Yea, how do the ſubjects of thine owne kingdome daily conſpire againſt thee? Even now whiles thou enjoyeſt peace, and glory at thy fathers right hand, as ſoone ſhalt thou want friends, as enemies upon earth.

No eye of any traytor could eſpie a juſt quarrell in the government of David, yet Sheba blowes the trumpet of rebellion; and whiles Iſrael and Judah are ſtriving who ſhould have the greateſt part in their re-eſtabliſhed Soveraigne, he ſticks not to ſay, We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the ſon of Iſhai; and whiles he ſayes, Every man to his tents O Iſrael, hee cals every man to his owne; So in proclaiming a liberty from a juſt and loyall ſubjection, he invites Iſrael to the bondage of an Uſurper.

That a lewd Conſpirator ſhould breathe Treaſon it is no wonder; but is it not wonder and ſhame, that upon every mutinous blaſt, Iſrael ſhould turne Traytor to Gods anointed? It was their late expoſtulation with David, why their brethren the men of Judah ſhould have ſtolne him from them; now might David more juſtly expoſtulate, why a rebell of their brethren ſhould have ſtolne them from him: As nothing is more unſtable then the multitude, ſo nothing is more ſubject to diſtaſtes, then Soveraignty; for as weak minds ſeek pleaſure in change; ſo every light conceit of irritation ſeemes ſufficient colour of change: Such as the falſe diſpoſitions of the vulgar are, love cannot be ſecurity enough for Princes, without the awfulneſſe of power; What hold can there be of popularity, when the ſame hands that even now fought for David to be all theirs, now fight againſt him, under the ſon of Bichri, as none of theirs? As Bees whē they are once up in a ſwarme, are ready to light upon every bow, ſo the Iſraelites, being ſtirred by the late cōmotion of Abſalom, are apt to follow every Sheba: It is unſafe for any State, that the multitude ſhould once know the way to an inſurrection; the leaſt track in this kind is eaſily made a path. Yet, if Iſrael rebell, Judah continues faithful; neither ſhall the ſon of David ever be left deſtitute of ſome true ſubjects in the worſt of Apoſtaſies: He that could cōmand al hearts, will ever be followed by ſome; God had rather glorifie himſelfe by a remnant.

Great Commanders muſt have active thoughts: David is not ſo taken up with the embroiled affaires of his ſtate, as not to intend domeſtick juſtice: His ten concubines, which were ſhameleſly defiled by his inceſtuous ſon, are condemned to ward, and widowhood. Had not that conſtupration been partly violent, their puniſhment had not been ſo eaſie, had it not alſo been partly voluntary, they had not been ſo much puniſhed: But how much ſoever the act did partake of either force, or will, juſtly are they ſequeſtred from Davids bed: Abſalom was not more unnaturall in his rebelliō, then in his luſt: If now David ſhould have returned to his own bed, he had ſeconded the in-

ceſt: How much more worthy of ſeparation are they, who have ſtayned the marriage bed with their wilfull ſin?

Amaſa was one of the witneſſes, and abettors of Abſaloms filthineſſe, yet is he (out of policy) received to favour and imployment, whiles the concubines ſuffer: Great men yeeld many times to thoſe things, out of reaſõs of State, which if they were private perſons could not be eaſily put over: It is no ſmall wiſdome to ingage a new reconciled friend, that he may be confirmed by his owne act: Therefore is Amaſa cõmanded to leavie the forces of Judah: Ioab after many great merits and atchievements lies ruſting in neglect: he that was ſo intire with David as to be of his counſell for Vriahs blood; and ſo firme to David as to lead all his battels againſt the houſe of Saul, the Ammonites, the Aramites, Abſalom; is now caſhierd, & muſt yeeld his place to a ſtranger, late an enemy: Who knowes not that this ſon of Zerviah had ſhed the blood of war in peace? But if the blood of Abſalom had not bin louder then the blood of Abner, I feare this change had not been; Now Ioab ſmarteth for a loyall diſobedience; How ſlippery are the ſtations of earthly honors, and ſubiect to continual mutability? Happy are they who are in favour with him, in whom there is no ſhadow of change.

Where men are cõmonly moſt ambitious to pleaſe with their firſt imployments, Amaſa ſlackens his pace; The leaſt delay in matters of rebellion is perillous, may be irrecoverable; The ſons of Zerviah are not ſullen, Abiſhai is ſent, Ioab goes unſent to the purſuit of Sheba. Amaſa was in their way; whom no quarrell but their envy had made of a brother an enemy: Had the heart of Amaſa beene privy to any cauſe of grudg, he had ſuſpected the Kiſſe of Ioab; now his innocent eyes look to the lips, not to the hand of his ſecret enemy: The lips were ſmooth, Art thou in health my brother? the hand was bloody, which ſmote him under the fift rib; That unhappy hand knew wel this way unto death; which with one wound hath let out the ſoules of two great Captaines, Abner and Amaſa; both they were ſmitten by Ioab, both under the fift ribbe, both under a pretence of friendſhip. There is no enmity ſo dangerous as that which comes maſked with love; Open hoſtility cals us to our guard; but there is no fence againſt a truſted trecherie: Wee need not be bidden to avoid an enemy, but who would runne away from a friend? Thus ſpiritually deales the world with our ſoules; it kiſſes us, and ſtabs us at once: If it did not embrace us with one hand, it could not murther us with the other; Only, God, deliver us from the danger of our truſt; and we ſhall be ſafe.

Ioab is gone, and leaves Amaſa wallowing in blood; That ſpectacle cannot but ſtay all paſſengers: The death of great perſons drawes ever many eyes: Each man ſayes, Is not this my Lord Amaſa? Wherefore do we go to fight, whiles our Generall lyes in the duſt? What a ſad preſage is this of our own miſcariage; The wit of Ioabs followers hath therefore ſoone both removed Amaſa out of the way, and covered him, not regarding ſo much the loſſe, as the eye-ſore of Iſrael. Thus wicked Politicks care not ſo much for the commiſſion of villany, as for the notice: Smothered evils are as not done; If oppreſſions, if murder, if treaſons may be hid from view, the obdured heart of the offender complaines not of remorſe.

Bloody Ioab, with what face, with what heart canſt thou purſue a Traytor to thy King, whiles thy ſelfe art ſo foule a Traytor to thy friend, to thy cozen german, and (in ſo unſeaſonable a ſlaughter) to thy Soveraigne, whoſe cauſe thou profeſſeſt to revenge? If Amaſa were now, in an act of loyalty, juſtly (on Gods part) payd for the arerages of his late rebellion, yet that it ſhould be done by thy hand, then and thus, it was flagitiouſly cruell: Yet, behold Ioab runs away ſecurely with the fact, haſting to plague that in another, whereof himſelfe was no leſſe guilty; So vaſt are the gorges of ſome conſciences; that they can ſwallow the greateſt crimes, and finde no ſtraine in the paſſage.

It is poſſible for a man to be faithful to ſome one perſon, & perfidious to al others; I do not find Ioab other then firme and loyal to David, in the midſt of al his private falſhoods, whoſe juſt quarrel he purſues againſt Sheba, through al the Tribes of Iſrael. None of all the ſtrong Forts of revolted Iſrael can hide the Rebell from the zeale of his revenge: The City of Abel lends harbour to that conspirator: whom all Israel would, and cannot protect. Ioab casts up a Mount against it, and having invironed it with a siege begins to worke upon the wall; and now, after long chase, is in hand to dig out that Vermine, which had earthed himselfe in this borough of Bethmaacha. Had not the City been strong and populous, Sheba had not cast himselfe for succour within those wals; yet of al the inhabitants, I see not any one man move for the preservation of their whole body: Only a woman undertakes to treat with Ioab, for their safety: These men whose spirits were great enough to maintaine a Traytor against a mighty King, scorne not to give way to the wisdome of a Matron; There is no reason that sexe should disparage, where the vertue & merit is no lesse than masculine: Surely the soule acknowledgeth no sexe, neither is varied according to the outward frame; How oft have we known female hearts in the breasts of Men, and contrarily manly powers in the weaker vessels? It is injurious to measure the act by the person, and not rather to esteeme the person for the act.

She, with no lesse prudence than courage challengeth Ioab for the violence of his assault; and layes to him that law which he could not be an Israelite & disavow; the Law of the God of peace, whose charge it was, that when they should come neere to a City to fight against it, they should offer it peace; & if this tender must be made to forainers, how much more to brethrē? So as they must inquire of Abel, ere they battered it: War is the extreame act of vindicative justice; neither doth God ever approve it for any other then a disperate remedy, and if it have any other end then peace, it turnes into publike murder. It is therefore an inhumane cruelty to shed blood, where we have not profered faire conditions of peace: The refusall whereof is justly punished with the sword of revenge.

Ioab was a man of blood, yet when the wise woman of Abel charged him with going about to destroy a mother in Israel; and swallowing up the inheritance of the Lord, with what vehemency doth he deprecate that challenge, God forbid, God forbid it me, that I should devoure, or destroy it; Although that City with the rest had ingaged it selfe in Shebaes sedition, yet how zealously doth Ioab remove from himselfe the suspition of an intended vastation? How fearefull shall their answer be, who upon the quarrell of their own ambition have not spared to waste whole Tribes of the Israel of God? It was not the fashiō of Davids Captaines to assault any City ere they summond it; here they did: There be some things that in the very fact cary their own conviction. So did Abel in the entertaining, and abetting a known conspirator; Ioab challenges them for the offence, & requires no other satisfaction then the head of Sheba: This Matron had not deserved the name of Wise, and faithfull in Israel, if she had not both apprehended the justice of the condition, and commended it to her Citizens, whom she hath easily perswaded to spare their own heads, in not sparing a Traytors: It had been pity those wals should have stood if they had been too hye to throw a Traytors head over.

Spiritually, the case is ours: Every mans brest is as a City inclosed: Every sin is a Traitor, that lurks within those wals; God cals to us for Shebaes head; neither hath he any quarrell to our person, but for our sin: If we love the head of our Traytor, above the life of our Soule, we shal justly perish in the vengeance: we cānot be more willing to part with our sin, than our mercifull God is to withdraw his judgements.

Now is Ioab returned with succesſe, and hopes by Shebaes head to pay the price of Amasaes blood: David hates the murder, entertains the man, defers the revenge; Ioab had made himselfe so great, so necessary, that David may neither misse nor punish him: Policy led the King to connive at that which his heart abhorred; I dare not cōmend that wisdom which holds the hands of Princes from doing Justice. Great men have ever held it a point of worldly state, not alwaies to pay where they have been conscious to a debt of either favour, or punishment; but to make Time their servant for both: Salomon shal once defray the arrerages of his father: In the meane time Ioab commands and prospers; and David is faine to smile on that face, whereon he hath in his secret destination written the characters of Death.

The

The Gibeonites revenged.

THE raigne of David was moſt troubleſome towards the ſhutting up; wherein both warre and famine conſpire to afflict him: Almoſt forty yeares had he ſate in the throne of Iſrael, with cõpetency, if not abundance of al things; now at laſt are his people viſited with a long dearth; we are not at firſt ſenſible of common evils: Three yeeres drought and ſcarcity are gone over ere David conſults with God, concerning the occaſion of the judgment, now he found it high time to ſeek the face of the Lord; The continuance of an affliction ſends us to God, & cals upon us to aſk for a reckoning; whereas like men ſtrucken in their ſleepe, a ſudden blow cannot make us to finde our ſelves; but rather aſtoniſheth, then teacheth us.

David was himſelf a Prophet of God, yet had not the Lord all this while acquainted him with the grounds of his proceedings againſt Iſrael; this ſecret was hid from him, till he conſulted with the Urim; Ordinary meanes ſhall reveale that to him, which no viſion had deſcried: And if God will have Prophets to have recourſe unto the Prieſts, for the notice of his will; how much more muſt the people? Even thoſe that are inwardeſt with God muſt have uſe of the Ephod.

Juſtly it is preſuppoſed by David that there was never judgment from God, where hath not been a provocation frõ men; therefore when he ſees the plague, he inquires for the ſin. Never man ſmarted cauſeleſly from the hand of divine juſtice; Oh that when we ſuffer, we could aſke what we have done, and could guide our repentance to the roote of our evils.

That God whoſe counſels are ſecret, even where his actions are open, will not be cloſe to his Prophet, to his Prieſt: without inquiry we ſhall know nothing; upon inquiry nothing ſhall be concealed from us that is fit for us to know.

Who can chooſe but wonder at once, both at Davids ſlackneſſe in conſulting with God, and Gods ſpeed in anſwering ſo ſlow a demand? He that ſo well knew the way to Gods Oracle, ſuffers Iſrael to be three yeares pinched with famine, ere hee aſkes why they ſuffer; Even the beſt hearts may be overtakẽ with dulneſſe in holy duties; But oh the marvellous mercy of God, that takes not the advãtage of our weakneſſes. Davids queſtion is not more ſlow, then his anſwer is ſpeedy, It is for Saul, and for his bloody houſe, becauſe he ſlew the Gibeonites. Iſrael was full of ſins, beſides thoſe of Sauls houſe; Sauls houſe was full of ſins, beſides thoſe of blood: Much blood was ſhed by them, beſides that of the Gibeonites; yet the juſtice of God ſingles out this one ſin of violence offered to the Gibeonites (contrary to the league made by Ioſhua, ſome foure hundred yeeres before) for the occaſion of this late vengeance. Where the cauſes of offence are infinite, it is juſt with God to pitch upon ſome; it is mercifull not to puniſh for all: Welneer forty yeares are paſt betwixt the commiſſion of the ſin, and the reckoning for it. It is a vaine hope that is raiſed from the delay of judgment: No time can be any prejudice to the Ancient of dayes: When we have forgotten our ſins, when the world hath forgotten us, he ſues us afreſh for our arerages. The ſlaughter of the Gibeonites was the ſin not of the preſent, but rather the former generation; and now poſterity payes for their forefathers: Even we men hold it not unjuſt to ſue the heires and executors of our debtors; Eternall payments God uſes only to require of the perſon, temporary oft-times of ſucceſſion.

As Saul was higher by the head and ſhoulders then the reſt of Iſrael, both in ſtature and dignity, ſo were his ſins more conſpicuous then thoſe of the vulgar. The eminence of the perſon makes the offence more remarkable to the eyes both of God and men.

Neither Saul nor Iſrael were faultleſſe in other kinds, yet God fixes the eye of his revenge upon the maſſacre of the Gibeonites. Every ſin hath a tongue, but that of blood over-cryes and drownes the reſt. He who is mercy it ſelf abhorres cruelty in his creature above al other inordinateneſſe; That holy ſoule which was heavy preſſed with the weight of an hainous adultery, yet cries out, Deliver me from blood, O God,

God, the God of my ſalvation, and my tongue ſhall ſing joyfully of thy righteouſneſſe.

If God would take account of blood, hee might have entred the action upon the blood of Vriah ſpilt by David; or (if he would rather inſiſt in Sauls houſe) upon the blood of Abimelech the Prieſt, and foureſcore & five perſons that did weare a linnen Ephod; but it pleaſed the wiſdome and juſtice of the Almighty rather to call for the blood of the Gibeonites, though drudges of Iſrael, and a remnant of Amorites. Why this? There was a perjury attending upon this ſlaughter; It was an ancient Oath wherein the Princes of the congregation had bound themſelves (upon Ioſhua's league) to the Gibeonites, that they would ſuffer them to live; an oath extorted by fraud, but ſolemne, by no leſſe name, then the Lord God of Iſrael; Saul wil now thus late, either not acknowledge it, or not keep it: out of his zeale therfore to the children of Iſrael, & Judah, he roots out ſome of the Gibeonites, whether in a zeale of revenge of their firſt impoſture, or in a zeale of inlarging the poſſeſſions of Iſrael, or in a zeale of executing Gods charge upon the brood of Canaanites, he that ſpared Agag whom he ſhould have ſmitten, ſmites the Gibeonites whom he ſhould have ſpared: Zeale and good intention is no excuſe, much leſſe a warrant for evill: God holds it an high indignity that his name ſhould be ſworne by, and violated. Length of time cannot diſpenſe with our oathes, with our vowes: The vowes and oathes of others may bind us, how much more our owne.

There was a famine in Iſrael; a natural man would have aſcribed it unto the drought; & that drought perhaps to ſome conſtellations; David knows to look higher; and ſees a divine hand ſcourging Iſrael for ſome great offence, and over-ruling thoſe ſecond cauſes to his moſt juſt executions. Even the moſt quick-ſighted worldling is pore-blind to ſpirituall objects, and the weakeſt eyes of the regenerate pierce the heavens and eſpie God in all earthly occurrences.

So well was David acquainted with Gods proceedings, that he knew the removal of the judgement muſt begin at the ſatisfaction of the wronged. At once therefore doth he pray unto God, and treat with the Gibeonites; What ſhall I doe for you, and wherewith ſhall I make the atonement, that I may bleſſe the inheritance of the Lord? In vaine ſhould David (though a Prophet) bleſſe Iſrael, if the Gibeonites did not bleſſe them: Injuries done us on earth give us power in heaven; The oppreſſor is in no mans mercy, but his whom he hath trampled upon.

Little did the Gibeonites think that God had ſo taken to heart their wrongs, that for their ſakes all Iſrael ſhould ſuffer. Even when we think not of it, is the righteous Judge avenging our unrighteous vexations; Our hard meaſures cannot be hid from him, his returns are hid from us, It is ſufficient for us, that God can be no more neglective, then ignorant of our ſufferings. It is now in the power of theſe deſpiſed Hivites to make their owne termes with Iſrael; Neither Silver, nor Gold will favour with them towards their ſatisfaction; nothing can expiate the blood of their fathers, but the blood of ſeven ſons of their deceaſed perſecutor; Here was no other then a juſt retaliatiõ; Saul had puniſhed in them the offence of their predeceſſors; they will now revenge Sauls ſin in his children. The meaſure wee mete unto others, is with much equity re-meaſured unto our ſelves. Every death would not content them of Sauls ſons, but a curſed and ignominious, hanging on the Tree; Neither would that death content them unleſſe their owne hands might be the executioners; Neither would any place ſerve for the execution but Gibeah, the Court of Saul; neither would they do any of this for the wreaking of their own fury, but for the appeaſing of Gods wrath, We will hang them up unto the Lord in Gibeah of Saul.

David might not refuſe the condition: He muſt deliver, they muſt execute: He chooſes out ſevẽ of the ſons, and grand children of Saul; That houſe had raiſed long an unjuſt perſecution againſt David, now God payes it upon anothers ſcore. Davids love and oath to Ionathan, preſerves lame Mephiboſheth: How much more ſhal the Father of all mercies do good unto the children of the faithfull, for the covenant made with their Parents?

The five ſonnes of Adriel the Meholathite, Davids ancient rivall in his firſt love which were borne to him by Merab, Sauls Daughter, and brought up by her barren

ſiſter

A sister Michol the wife of David, are yeelded up to death; Merab was after a promise of marriage to David, unjustly given away by Saul, to Adriel; Michol seemes to abet the match in breeding the children; now in one act (not of Davids seeking) the wrong is thus late avenged upon Saul, Adriel, Merab, Michol, the children: It is a dangerous matter to offer injurie to any of Gods faithfull ones; If their meeknesse have easily remitted it, their God will not passe it over without a severe retribution.

These five, together with two sons of Rizpah, Sauls Concubin, are hanged up at once before the Lord, yea and before the eyes of the world; No place but an Hil wil serve for this execution; The acts of justice as they are intended for example, so they should be done in that eminent fashion that may make thē both most instructive, & most terrifying; Unwarrantable courses of private revenge seek to hide their heads
B in secresie; The beautifull face of Justice both affects the light and becomes it.

It was the generall charge of Gods Law that no corps should remaine all night upon the gibbet; The Almighty hath power to dispense with his own command; so doubtlesse he did in this extraordinary case; these carcasses did not defile, but expiate. Sorrowfull Rizpah spreads her a Tent of Sackcloth upon the Rocke, for a sad attendance upon those sons of her womb, Death might bereave her of thē, not them of her love; This spectacle was not more grievous to her, then pleasing to God, and happy to Israel. Now the clouds drop fatnesse, and the earth runs forth into plenty. The Gibeonites are satisfied, God reconciled, Israel relieved.

How blessed a thing is it for any Nation that justice is unpartially executed even upon the mighty. A few drops of blood have procured large showers from Heaven.
C A few carcasses are a rich compost to the earth; The drought and dearth remove away with the breath of those pledges of the offender: Judgement cannot tyrannize where justice raignes: as contrarily, there can be no peace where blood cryes unheard, unregarded.

The numbring of the people.

ISrael was growne wanton and mutinous: God puls them downe first by the sword, then by famine, now by pestilence. Oh the wondrous, and yet just waies of the Almighty! Because Israel hath sinned, therefore David
D shall sinne, that Israel may be punished: Because God is angry with Israel, therefore David shall anger him more, and strike i imselfe in Israel, and Israel through himselfe.

The spirit of God elsewhere ascribes this motion to Satan, which here it attributes to God: Both had their hand in the worke; God by permission, Satan by suggestiō; God as a Judge, Satan as an enemy: God as in a just punishment for sin, Satan as in an act of sin: God in a wise ordination of it to good; Satan in a malicious intent of confusion. Thus at once God moved, and Satan moved: Neither is it any excuse to Satan or David, that God moved: neither is it any blemish to God, that Satā moved: The rulers sin is a punishment to a wicked people: though they had many sinnes of their owne, whereon God might have grounded a Judgement, yet as before he had
E punisht them with dearth for Sauls sin, so now he will not punish them with plague, but for Davids sin: If God were not angry with a people, he would not give up their governours to such evils as whereby he is provoked to vengeance; and if their governours be thus given up, the people cannot be safe: The body drownes not whiles the head is above the water; when that once sinkes, death is neere: Justly therefore are wee charged to make prayers and supplications, as for all, so especially for those that are in eminent authority; when we pray for our selves, we pray not alwaies for them, but we cannot pray for them, and not pray for our selves; the publique weale is not comprised in the private, but the private in the publique.

What then was Davids sin? He will needs have Israel and Juda numbred: Surely there is no malignity in numbers; Neither is it unfit for a Prince to know his own strength, this is not the first time that Israel hath gone under a reckoning: The act offends offends not,but the miſ-affectiō; The ſame thing had bin cōmendably done out of a Princely providence,which now through the curioſity,pride,miſ-confidence of the doer,proves hainouſly vicious;Thoſe actiōs which are in themſelves indifferent, receive either their life,or their bane frō the intentions of the agent: Moſes numbreth the people with thankes,David with diſpleaſure: Thoſe ſins which carrie the ſmootheſt foreheads,& have the moſt honeſt appearances, may more provoke the wrath of God, then thoſe which beare the moſt abomination in their faces. How many thouſand wickedneſſes paſſed through the hands of Iſrael, which we men would rather have branded out for judgment, then this of Davids? The righteous Iudge of the world cenſures ſins,not by their ill lookes,but by their foule hearts.

Who can but wonder to ſee Ioab the Saint,and David the treſpaſſer? No Prophet could ſpeake better then that man of blood; The Lord thy God increaſe the people an hundredfold more then they be,and that the eyes of my Lord the King may ſee it; but why doth my Lord the King deſire this thing? There is no man ſo lewd as not to be ſomtimes in good moods,as not to diſlike ſome evill:cōtrarily no man on earth can be ſo holy, as not ſometimes to overlaſh: It were pitty that either Ioab or David ſhould be tryed by every act; How commonly have we ſeene thoſe men ready to give good advice to others for the avoiding of ſome ſins, who in more groſſe outrages have not had grace to counſel their own hearts? The ſame man that had deſerved death from David for his treacherous cruelty,diſſwades David from an act that caried but a ſuſpition of evill; It is not ſo much to be regarded who it is that admoniſheth us, as what he brings;Good counſell is never the worſe for the foule cariage;there are ſome diſhes that we may eate even from ſluttiſh hands.

The purpoſe of ſin in a faithfull man is odious,much more the reſolution: Notwithſtanding Ioabs diſcreet admonition,David will hold on his courſe;and wil know the number of the people,only that he may know it;Ioab and the Captaines addreſſe themſelves to the work: In things which are not in themſelves evill,it is not for ſubjects to diſpute but to obey;That which authority may ſin in commanding, is done of the inferiour, not with ſafety onely, but with praiſe. Nine months and twenty dayes is this generall muſter in hand;at laſt the number is brought in: Iſrael is found eight hundred thouſand ſtrong, Judah five hundred thouſand; the ordinary companies which ſerved by courſe for the royall guard (foure and twenty thouſand each month)needed not be reckoned; the addition of them with their ſeverall Captaines raiſes the ſumme of Iſrael to the rate of eleven hundred thouſand. A power able to puffe up a carnall heart;but how can an heart that is more then fleſh truſt to an arme of fleſh? Oh holy David whither hath a glorious vanity tranſported thee? Thou which once didſt ſing ſo ſweetly, Put not your truſt in Princes nor in the ſon of man, for there is no helpe in him. His breath departeth,and he returneth to his earth,then his thoughts periſh.Bleſſed is he that hath the God of Iacob for his helpe,whoſe hope is in the Lord his God; How canſt thou now ſtoop to ſo unſafe and unworthy a confidence.

As ſome ſtomackful horſe that wil not be ſtopt in his career with the ſharpeſt bit, but runs on headily till he come to ſome wall or ditch, and there ſtands ſtill and trembles; ſo did David: All the diſſwaſions of Ioab could not reſtraine him from his intended courſe; almoſt ten months doth hee run on impetuouſly, in a way of his owne,rough & dangerous,at laſt his heart ſmites him;the conſcience of his offence, and the feare of judgment hath fetcht him upō his knees,O Lord I have ſinned exceedingly in that I have done; therefore now, Lord, I beſeech thee take away the treſpaſſe of thy ſervant, for I have done very fooliſhly. It is poſſible for a ſin not to bait only, but to ſojourne in the holieſt ſoule:but though it ſojourne there as a ſtranger,it ſhal not dwel there as an owner;the renewed heart after ſome rovings of error wil once(ere overlong)returne home to it ſelfe,and fall out with that ill guide,wherewith it was miſled,and with it ſelf for being miſled; and now it is reſolved into teares,and breathes forth nothing but ſighes,and confeſſions and deprecations.

Here needed no Nathan by a parabolicall circumlocution to fetch in David to a ſight and acknowledgment of his ſin; the heart of the penitent ſupplyed the Prophet; no other tongue could ſmite him ſo deepe as his owne thoughts: But though his

A his reines chaſtiſed him in the night, yet his Seer ſcourges him in the morning, Thus ſaith the Lord, I offer thee three things, chooſe the which of them I ſhall do unto thee. But what ſhall we ſay to this? When upon the Prophets reproofe for an adultery cloked with murder, David did but ſay, I have ſinned, it was preſently returned, God hath put away thy ſinne; neither did any ſmart follow, but the death of a miſ-begotten infant; and now when he voluntarily reproved himſelfe for both a needleſſe muſter, and ſought for pardon unbidden with great humiliation, God ſends him the three terrible ſcourges, Famine, Sword, or Peſtilence, that he may chooſe with which of them he had rather to bleed; he ſhal have the favour of an election, not of a remiſſion. God is more angred with a ſpirituall, and immediate affront offered to his Majeſty, in our pride, and falſe confidence in earthly things, then with a fleſhly crime though
B hainouſly ſeconded.

It was an hard and woful choice; of three yeares famine added to three fore-paſt; or of three moneths flight from the ſword of an enemy, or three dayes peſtilence; The Almighty that had fore-determined his judgement, referres it to Davids will as fully, as if it were utterly undetermined; God hath reſolved, yet David may chooſe; That infinite wiſdome hath foreſeene the very will of his creature; which whiles it freely inclines it ſelfe to what it had rather, unwittingly wils that which was fore-appointed in heaven.

We do wel beleeve thee, O David, that thou wert in a wonderful ſtrait; this very liberty is no other then fetters; Thou needſt not have famine, thou needſt not have the ſword, thou needſt not have peſtilence; one of them thou muſt have; There is mi-
C ſery in all, there is miſery in any; thou and thy people can dye but once; and once they muſt dye, either by famine, warre, or peſtilence. Oh God, how vainely do we hope to paſſe over our ſins with impunity, when all the favour that David and Iſrael can receive is to chooſe their bane?

Yet behold, neither ſins, nor threats, nor feares can bereave a true penitent of his faith, Let us fall now into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great. There can be no evill of puniſhment wherein God hath not an hand; there could be no famine, no ſword without him; but ſome evils are more immediate from a divine ſtroke; ſuch was that plague into which David is unwillingly willing to fall: He had his choyce of dayes, moneths, yeares in the ſame number; and though the ſhortneſſe of time prefixed to the threatned peſtilẽce might ſeem to offer ſome advantage for the leading D of his election, yet God meant (and David knew it) herein to proportion the difference of time to the violẽce of the plague; neither ſhould any fewer periſh by ſo few dayes peſtilence, than by ſo many yeares famine: The wealthieſt might avoid the dearth, the ſwifteſt might run away from the ſword; no man could promiſe himſelf ſafety from that peſtilence: In likelihood Gods Angell would rather ſtrike the moſt guilty; How ever therefore David might well look to be inwrapped in the common deſtruction, yet he rather chooſeth to fall into that mercy which he had abuſed, and to ſuffer from that juſtice which he had provoked; Let us now fall into the hands of the Lord.

Humble confeſſions, and devout penance cannot alwaies avert temporall judgements; Gods Angell is abroad, and within that ſhort compaſſe of time ſweepes away
E ſeventy thouſand Iſraelites; David was proud of the number of his ſubjects, now they are abated; that he may ſee cauſe of humiliation in the matter of his glory; In what we have offended, we commonly ſmart: Theſe thouſands of Iſrael were not ſo innocent, that they ſhould only periſh for Davids ſinne: Their ſins were the motives both of this ſin, and puniſhment; beſides the reſpect of Davids offence, they die for themſelves.

It was no ordinary peſtilence that was thus ſuddenly and univerſally mortal; Cõ-mon eyes ſaw the botch, & the markes, ſaw not the Angell; Davids clearer ſight hath eſpyed him (after that killing peragration through the Tribes of Iſrael) ſhaking his ſword over Jeruſalem, and hovering over Mount Sion; and now he who doubtleſſe had ſpent thoſe three diſmall dayes in the ſaddeſt contrition, humbly caſts himſelfe down at the feet of the avenger, and layes himſelfe ready for the fatall ſtroke of juſtice;

ſtice; It was more terrour that God intended in the viſible ſhape of his Angell, and deeper humiliation; and what he meant, he wrought; Never ſoule could be more dejected, more anguiſhed with the ſenſe of a judgment; in the bitterneſſe whereof he cryes out, Behold I have ſinned, yea I have done wickedly; But theſe Sheepe what have they done? Let thine hand, I pray thee, be againſt me, and againſt my fathers houſe. The better any man is, the more ſenſible he is of his owne wretchednesse: Many of thoſe Sheep were Wolves to David; What had they done? They had done that which was the occaſion of Davids ſin, and the cauſe of their owne puniſhment; But that gracious penitent knew his owne ſin, he knew not theirs; and therefore can ſay, I have ſinned, What have they done? It is ſafe accuſing where we may be boldeſt, and are beſt acquainted, our ſelves. A

Oh the admirable charity of David, that would have ingroſſed the plague to himſelfe, and his houſe, from the reſt of Iſrael; and ſues to interpoſe himſelfe betwixt his people and the vengeance; He that had put himſelf upon the pawes of the Beare, and Lyon, for the reſcue of his Sheep, will now caſt himſelfe upon the ſword of the Angel, for the preſervation of Iſrael: There was hope in thoſe conflicts; in this yeeldance there could be nothing but death. Thus didſt thou, O Son of David, the true and great Shepheard of thy Church, offer thy ſelfe to death for them who had their hands in thy blood; who both procured thy death and deſerved their own. Here he offered himſelf that had ſinned for thoſe whom he profeſſed to have not done evill; thou that didſt no ſin, vouchſafedſt to offer thy ſelfe for us that were all ſin; He offered and eſcaped, thou offeredſt, and diedſt; and by thy death we live, and are freed from everlaſting deſtruction. B

But O Father of all mercies, how little pleaſure doeſt thou take in the blood of ſinners? it was thine owne pity that inhibited the Deſtroyer: Ere David could ſee the Angell thou hadſt reſtrayned him; It is ſufficient, hold now thy hand: If thy compaſſion did not both withhold and abridge thy judgements, what place were there for us out of hell? C

How eaſie and juſt had it been for God to have made the ſhutting up of that third evening red with blood? his goodneſſe repents of the ſlaughter; and cals for that Sacrifice wherewith he will be appeaſed: An altar muſt be built in the threſhing-floore of Araunah the Jebuſite; Lo, in that very Hill where the Angell held the ſword of Abraham from killing his Son, doth God now hold the Sword of the Angell from killing his people; Upon this very ground ſhall the Temple after, ſtand; here ſhal be the holy Altar, which ſhall ſend up the acceptable oblations of Gods people in ſucceeding generations. D

O God, what was the threſhing-floore of a Jebuſite to thee above all other ſoiles? What vertue, what merit was in this earth? As in places ſo in perſons, it is not to be heeded what they are, but what thou wilt; That is worthieſt which thou pleaſeſt to accept.

Rich and bountifull Araunah is ready to meet David in ſo holy a motion; & munificently offers his Sion for the place, his Oxen for the Sacrifice, his Carts, & Ploughs, and other Utenſils of his Huſbandry for the wood: Two franke hearts are well met; David would buy, Araunah would give; The Jebuſite would not ſell, David will not take: Since it was for God, and to David, Araunah is loth to bargaine: Since it was for God, David wiſheth to pay deare, I will not offer burnt-offering to the Lord my God, of that which doth coſt me nothing: Heroicall ſpirits doe well become eminent perſons; He that knew it was better to give then to receive, would not receive but give: There can be no devotion in a niggardly heart: As unto dainty palates, ſo to the Godly ſoule, that taſtes ſweeteſt, that coſts moſt: Nothing is deare enough for the Creator of all things. It is an heartleſſe piety of thoſe baſe-minded Chriſtians, that care onely to ſerve God good cheape. E

TO MY WORTHILY MVCH HONOVRED FRIEND, SIR HENRY MILDMAY Knight, Master of the Jewell-house; All Grace and Peace.

SIR,

Besides all private obligations, your very name challengeth from mee all due services of love, and honour; If I have recieved mercy to beare any fruit, next under heaven, I may thanke the stocke wherein I was ymped; which was set by no other then the happy hand of your Right Honorable Grandfather; How have I so long forborne the publike Testimony of my just gratulations, and thankefull respects to so true an heire of his noble Vertues. Pardon mee that I pay this debt so late; and accept of this parcell of my well-meant labours: wherein you shall see Salomon both in his rising and setting; his rising hopefull and glorious, his declination fearefull: You shall see the proofes of his earely graces; of mercy, in sparing Adonijah, and Abiathar; of justice, in punishing that rivall of his, with Joab, and Shimei: of wisedome, in his award betwixt the two Harlots, and the administration of his Court, and State: of piety, in building and hallowing the Temple; all dashed in his fall, repayred in his repentance. I have no cause to misdoubt either the acceptation or use of these my high-pitched thoughts: which, together with your selfe, and your worthy and vertuous Lady, I humbly commend to the care and blessing of the Highest, who am bound by your worth and merits to be ever

Yours sincerely and thankfully devoted in all observance,

Jos. Hall.

THE SEVENTEENTH BOOKE.

Adonijah Defeated.

DAVID had not ſo carefully huſbanded his yeares, as to maintain a vigorous age; he was therefore what through warres, what with ſorrowes, what with ſickneſſe, decrepit betimes; By that time hee was Seventy yeares old, his naturall heate was ſo waſted, that his clothes could not warme him; how many have wee knowne of more ſtrength, at more age? The holyeſt ſoule dwels not in an impregnable fort; If the revenging Angel ſpared David, yet age and death will not ſpare him; Neither his new altar, nor his coſtly ſacrifice can be of force againſt decay of nature; Nothing but death can prevent the weakneſſes of age.

None can blame a people if when they have a good King, they are deſirous to hold him; Davids ſervants and ſubjects have commended unto his bed a faire young Virgin; not for the heat of luſt, but of life; that by this meanes they might make an outward ſupply of fuell for that vitall fire which was wel-neere extinguiſhed with age.

As it is in the market, or the ſtage, ſo it is in our life; One goes in, another comes out, when David was withering, Adonijah was in his bloſſome; That ſonne, as he was next to Abſalom both in the beauty of his body, & the time of his birth, ſo was he too like him in practice; He alſo taking advantage of his fathers infirmity, wil be carving himſelfe of the Kingdome of Iſrael; That he might no whit vary from his patterne, he gets him alſo Chariots and Horſemen, and fifty men to runne before him: Theſe two Abſalom and Adonijah were the darlings of their father; Their father had not diſpleaſed them from their childhood, therefore they both diſpleaſed him in his age; Thoſe children had need to be very gracious, that are not marred with pampering; It is more than God owes us, if we receive comfort in thoſe children whom we have over-loved; The indulgence of parents at laſt payes them home in croſſes.

It is true that Adonijah was Davids eldeſt ſon now remaining, and therefore might ſeeme to challenge the juſteſt title to the Crown; But the Kingdome of Iſrael (in ſo late an erection) had not yet knowne the right of ſucceſſion: God himſelfe that had ordained the government, was never the immediate Elector. He fetcht Saul from among the ſtuffe, and David from the Sheepfold; and had now appointed Salomon from the ferule, to the Scepter. A

And if Adonijah (which is unlike) had not knowne this, yet it had been his part to have taken his father with him in this claime of his ſucceſſion; & not ſo to prevent a brother, that he ſhould ſhoulder out a father; and not ſo violently to preoccupate the throne, that he ſhould rather be a rebell, than an heire.

As Abſalom, ſo Adonijah wants not furtherers in this uſurpation, whether ſpiritual, or temporall; Ioab the Generall, and Abiathar the Prieſt give both counſel, and aid to ſo unſeaſonable a challenge; Theſe two had beene firme to David in all his troubles, in all inſurrections; yet now finding him faſtened to the bed of age, and death, they ſhew themſelves thus ſlippery in the looſe: Outward happineſſe and friendſhip are not knowne till our laſt act; in the impotency of either our revenge or recompence, it will eaſily appeare who loved us for our ſelves, who for their owne ends. B

Had not Adonijah knowne that Salomon was deſigned to the Kingdome both by God, and David, hee had never invited all the reſt of the Kings ſonnes, his brethren, and left out Salomon; who was otherwiſe the moſt unlikely to have beene his rivall in his honour; all the reſt were elder than hee; and might therefore have had more pretence for their competition; Doubtleſſe the Court of Iſrael could not but know, that immediately upon the birth of Salomon, God ſent him by Nathan the Prophet, a name and meſſage of love; neither was it for nothing that God called him Iedidiah; and fore-promiſed him the honor of building an houſe to his Name; and (in returne of ſo glorious a ſervice) the eſtabliſhment of the throne of his Kingdome over Iſrael for ever: Notwithſtanding all which, Adonijah backed by the ſtrength of a Ioab, and the gravity of an Abiathar, will underworke Salomon, and juſtle into the not-yet-vacant ſeat of his father David. Vaine men, whiles like proud and yet brittle clay, they will be knocking their ſides againſt the ſolid, and eternall decree of God, breake themſelves in peeces. C

I doe not finde that Adonijah ſent any meſſage of threats or unkindneſſe to Zadock the Prieſt, or Nathan the Prophet, or Benaiah the ſonne of Iehoiada, and the other Worthies; only he invited them not to his feaſt with the Kings ſonnes, and ſervants; Sometimes a very omiſſion is an affront, and a menace. They well knew that ſince they were not called as gueſts, they were counted as enemies; Ceremonies of courteſie, though they be in themſelves ſleight, and arbitrary, yet the neglect of them in ſome caſes may undergoe a dangerous conſtruction. D

Nathan was the man by whom God had ſent that errand of grace to David, concerning Salomon, aſſuring him both to raigne, and proſper; yet now when Adonijahs plot was thus on foot, he doth not ſit ſtill and depend upon the iſſue of Gods decree, but he beſtirres him in the buſineſſe, and conſults with Bathſheba how at once to ſave their lives, and to advance Salomon, and defeat Adonijah; Gods pre-determination includes the meanes as well as the end; the ſame providence that had ordained a Crowne to Salomon, a repulſe to Adonijah, preſervation to Bathſheba and Nathan, had fore-appointed the wiſe and induſtrious indeavours of the Prophet to bring about his juſt, and holy purpoſes; If we would not have God wanting to us, we muſt not be wanting to our ſelves: Even when we know what God hath meant to us, wee may not be negligent. E

The Prophets of God did not look for revelation in all their affaires, in ſome things they were left to the counſell of their owne hearts; the policie of Nathan was of uſe as well as his prophecie: that alone hath turned the ſtreame into the right channell: Nothing could be more wiſely contrived than the ſending in of Bathſheba to David, with ſo ſeaſonable and forceable an expoſtulation, and the ſeconding of hers with his owne.

Though luſt were dead in David, yet the reſpects of his old matrimonial love lived ſtil; the very preſence of Bathſheba pleaded ſtrongly; but her ſpeech more; the time was, when his affectiõ oftẽded in exceſſe towards her being then anothers, he cannot

now

now neglect her being his own; & if either his age, or the remorſe of his old offence ſhould have ſet him off, yet ſhe knew his oath was ſure; My Lord thou ſwareſt by the Lord thy God unto thine handmaid, ſaying, Aſſuredly Salomon thy ſon ſhall raigne after me, & he ſhall ſit upon my throne; His word had been firme, but his oath was inviolable; we are engaged if we have promiſed, but if we have ſworne, we are bound.

Neither heaven nor earth have any gieves for that man that can ſhake off the fetters of an oath; for he cares not for that God whom he dares invoke to a falſhood; and he that cares not for God will not care for man.

Ere Bathſheba can be over the threſhold, Nathan (upon compact) is knocking at the doore. Gods Prophet was never but welcome to the bed-chamber of King David: In a ſeeming ſtrangneſſe he fals upon the ſame ſuit, upon the ſame complaint with Bathſheba: Honeſt policies doe not miſ-become the holieſt Prophets; Shee might ſeeme to ſpeake as a woman, as a mother, out of paſſion; the word of a Prophet could not be miſ-doubted: He therefore that had formerly brought to David that chiding and bloody meſſage concerning Bathſheba, comes now to David to ſue for the life and honour of Bathſheba; and he that was ſent from God (to David) to bring the newes of a gracious promiſe of favour unto Salomon, comes now to challenge the execution of it from the hands of a father; and he whoſe place freed him from ſuſpition of a faction, complaines of the inſolent demeanure and proclamation of Adonijah; what he began with an humble obeyſance, ſhutting up in a lowly and loving expoſtulation, Is this thing done by my Lord the King, and thou haſt not ſhewed thy ſervant who ſhould ſit on the Throne of my Lord the King after him? As Nathan was of Gods Counſell unto David, ſo was he of Davids Counſell both to God, and the State; As God therefore upon all occaſions told Nathan what he meant to doe with David, ſo had David wont to tell Nathan what he meant to doe in his holy & moſt important civill affaires. There are caſes wherein it is not unfit for Gods Prophets to meddle with matters of State. It is no diſparagement to religious Princes to impart their counſels unto them, who can requite them with the counſels of God.

That wood which a ſingle iron could not rive, is ſoone ſplitted with a double wedge; The ſeaſonable importunity of Bathſheba and Nathan, thus ſeconding each other, hath ſo wrought upon David, that now his love to Adonijah gives place to indignation, nature to an holy fidelity; & now he renewes his ancient oath to Bathſheba with a paſſionate ſolemnity: As the Lord liveth, who hath redeemed my ſoule out of all adverſitie, even as I ſware unto thee by the Lord God of Iſrael, ſaying, aſſuredly Salomon thy ſonne ſhall raigne after me, and he ſhall ſit upon my throne in my ſtead, ſo will I certainely doe this day: In the decay of Davids body I finde not his intellective powers any whit impaired: As one therefore that from his bed could with a perfect (if weake) hand ſtere the government of Iſrael, he gives wiſe and full directions for the inauguration of Salomon: Zadock the Prieſt, and Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine receive his grave and Princely charge for the cariage of that ſo weighty a buſineſſe. They are commanded to take with them the royall guard, to ſet Salomon upon his fathers Mule, to carry him downe in ſtate to Gihon, to anoint him with the holy oyle of the Tabernacle, to ſound the trumpets and proclaime him in the ſtreets to bring him back with triumph and magnificence to the Court, and to ſet him in the royall Throne with all the due ceremonies of Coronation.

How pleaſing was this command to them who in Salomons glory ſaw their owne ſafety? Benaiah applauds it, and not fearing a fathers envy, in Davids preſence wiſheth Salomons throne exalted above his: The people are raviſhed with the joy of ſo hopefull a ſucceſſion, and breake the earth, and fill the heaven with the noiſe of their Muſick and ſhouting.

Salomons gueſts had now at laſt better cheare than Adonijahs, whoſe feaſt (as all wicked mens) ended in horror, no ſooner are their bellies ful of meat, than their eares are full of the ſound of thoſe trumpets, which at once proclaime Salomons triumph, and their confuſion: Ever after the meale is ended comes the reckoning: God could as eaſily have prevented this jollity as marred it: But he willingly ſuffers vaine men to pleaſe themſelves for a time in the conceited ſucceſſe of their owne projects, that afterwards

terwards their disappointmẽt may be so much the more grievous; No doubt, at this feast there was many a health drunken to Adonijah, many a confident boast of their prospering designe; many a scorne of the despised faction of Salomon; & now for their last dish, is served up astonishment, and fearefull expectation of a just revenge. Ionathan the son of Abiathar the Priest, brings the newes of Salomons solemne and joyfull enthronization; now all hearts are cold, all faces pale; and every man hath but life enough to run away; How suddenly is this braving troupe dispersed? Adonijah their new Prince flyes to the hornes of the Altar, as distrusting all hopes of life, save the Sanctity of the place, and the mercy of his rivall.

So doth the wise and just God befoole proud and insolent sinners in those secret plots, wherein they hope to undermine the true son of David, the Prince of Peace; he suffers them to lay their heads together, and to feast themselves in a jocund security, and promise of successe; at last, when they are at the height of their joyes, and hopes, he confounds all their devices, & layes them open to the scorne of the world, and to the anguish of their owne guilty hearts.

Davids end, and Salomons beginning.

IT well became Salomon to begin his Raigne in peace. Adonijah receives pardon upon his good behaviour, and findes the Throne of Salomon, as safe as the Altar. David lives to see a wise sonne warme in his seat; and now he that had yeelded to succession, yeelds to nature. Many good counsels had David given his Heire; now he summes them up in his end. Dying words are wont to be weightiest; The Soule when it is entring into glory breathes nothing but divine. I goe the way of all the earth: How well is that Princely heart content to subscribe to the conditions of humane mortality; as one that knew Soveraignty doth not reach to the affaires of nature? Though a King, hee neither expects, nor desires an immunity from dissolution; making no account to goe in any other then the common track, to the universall home of mankinde, the house of age? Whither should earth but to earth? and why should we grudge to doe that, which all doe? Be thou strong therefore, and shew thy selfe a man; Even when his spirit was going out, he puts spirit into his Son; Age puts life into youth, and the dying animates the vigorous. Hee had well found that strength was requisite to government, that he had need to be no lesse than a man that should rule over men; If greatnesse should never receive any opposition, yet those worlds of cares, and businesses that attend the chaire of State, are able to over-lay any meane powers. A weak man may obey, none but the strong can governe. Graceless courage were but the whetstone of tyranny; Take heed therefore to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his wayes, and to keep his Statutes. The best legacy that David bequeathes to his heire, is the care of piety; himselfe had found the sweetnesse of a good conscience, and now he commends it to his Successor. If there bee any thing that in our desires of the prosperous condition of our children, takes place of goodnesse, our hearts are not upright. Here was the father a King, charging the King his sonne to keepe the Statutes of the King of Kings; as one that knew greatnesse cou'd neither exempt from obedience, nor priviledge sin; as one that knew the least deviation in the greatest & highest Orbe, is both most sensible, and most dangerous: Neither would hee have his sonne to looke for any prosperity, save onely from well-doing: That happinesse is built upon sand or Ice, which is raised upon any foundation besides vertue. If Salomon were wise; David was good; and if old Salomon had well remembred the counsell of old David, he had not so foully miscaried.

After the precepts of piety, follow those of justice; distributing in a due recompence, as revenge to Ioab and Shimei, so favour to the house of Barzillai. The bloodinesse of Ioab had laien long upon Davids heart; the hideous noise of those treacherous murders, as it had pierced heaven, so it still filled the eares of David; He could abhorre the villany, though he could not revenge it; What he cannot pay, he will owe, owe, and approve himselfe at last a faithfull debtor: Now he will defray it by the hand of Salomon. The slaughter was of Abner, and Amasa, David appropriates it; Thou knowest what Ioab did to me: The Soveraigne is smitten in the subject; Neither is it other then just, that the arraignment of meane malefactors runs in the stile of wrong to the Kings Crowne and dignity. How much more doth thou, O Sonne of David, take to thy selfe those insolencies which are done to thy poorest subjects, servants, sonnes, members here upon earth? No Saul can touch a Christian here below, but thou feelest it in heaven, and complainest.

But what shall we thinke of this? David was a man of Warre, Salomon a King of Peace, yet David refers this revenge to Salomon: How just it was that he who shed the blood of warre in peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about his loynes, should have his blood shed in peace, by a Prince of peace; Peace is fittest to rectifie the out-rages of War: Or whether is not this done in type of that divine administration, wherein thou, O Father of heaven, hast committed all judgement unto thine eternall Sonne? Thou who couldst immediately either plague, or absolve sinners, wilt doe neither but by the hand of a Mediator.

Salomon learned betimes what his ripenesse taught afterwards, Take away the wicked from the King, and his Throne shall be established in righteousnesse; Cruell Ioab, & malicious Shimei, must be therefore upon the first opportunity removed. The one lay open to present justice, for abetting the conspiracie of Adonijah, neither needes the help of time for a new advantage; The other went under the protection of an oath from David, and therefore must be fetcht in upon a new challenge. The hoare head of both must be brought to the grave with blood, else Davids head could not bee brought to his grave in peace: Due punishment of malefactors is the debt of authority: If that holy King have runne into arrerages; yet as one that hates and feares to breake the banke, he gives order to his pay-master; It shall be defrayed, if not by him, yet for him.

Generous natures cannot be unthankfull: Barzillai had shewed David some kindnesse in his extremity; and now the good man will have posterity to inherite the thankes. How much more bountifull is the Father of Mercies; in the remuneration of our poore unworthy services? Even successions of generations shall fare the better for one good parent.

The dying words and thoughts of the man after Gods owne heart did not confine themselves to the straites of these particular charges, but inlarged themselves to the care of Gods publike service; As good men are best at last, David did never so busily, and carefully marshall the affaires of God, as when hee was fixed to the bed of his age and death. Then did he lode his sonne Salomon with the charge of building the house of God; then did he lay before the eyes of his son the modell and patterne of that whole sacred worke, whereof if Salomon bare the name, yet David no lesse merits it: He now gives the platforme of the Courts, and buildings; He gives the gold and silver for that holy use; an hundred thousand talents of gold, a thousand thousand talents of silver; besides brasse and yron passing weight; He weighes out those precious metalls for their severall designements; Every future vessell is laid out already in his poise, if not in his forme; He excites the Princes of Israel to their assistance, in so high a worke: He takes notice of their bountifull offerings; Hee numbers up the Levites for the publique services, and sets them their taskes. He appoints the Singers, and other Musitians to their stations; the Porters to the gates that should be; And now when he hath set all things in a desired order, and forwardnesse, he shuts up with a zealous blessing of his Salomon, and his people, and sleepes with his fathers. Oh blessed soule, how quiet a possession hast thou now taken (after so many tumults) of a better Crowne! Thou that hast prepared all things for the house of thy God, how happily art thou now welcomed to that house of his, not made with hands, eternall in the heavens! Who now shall envy unto good Princes the honour of overseeing the businesses of God, and his Church; when David was thus punctuall in these divine provisions? What feare can be of usurpation where they have so glorious a precedent?

Now

Now is Salomon the ſecond time crowned King of Iſrael, and now in his owne right (as formerly in his fathers) ſits peaceably upon the Throne of the Lord; His awe and power come on faſter than his yeares; Envie and ambition where it is once kindled, may ſooner be hid in the aſhes, than quite put out; Adonijah yet hangs after his old hopes; He remembers how ſweet he found the name of a King; and now hath laid a new plot for the ſetting up of his crackt title: He would make the bed a ſtep to the throne: His old cõplices are ſure enough: His part would gather much ſtrẽgth, if he might enjoy Abiſhag the relect of his father, to wife; If it were not the Jewiſh faſhion (as is pretended) that a Kings widow ſhould marry none but a King; yet certainly the power both of the alliance, and friendſhip of a Queen muſt needs not a little advance his purpoſe: The crafty rivall dare not either move the ſuit to Salomon, or effect the mariage without him; but would cunningly undermine the ſon by the ſuit of that mother, whoſe ſuit had undermined him. The weaker veſſels are commonly uſed in the moſt dangerous ſuggeſtions of evill.

Bathſheba was ſo wiſe a woman that ſome of her counſels are canonized for divine, yet ſhe ſaw not the depth of this drift of Adonijah; therefore ſhe both entertaines the ſuit, and moves it: But what ever were the intent of the ſutor, could ſhe chooſe but ſee the unlawfulneſſe of ſo inceſtuous a match? It is not long ſince ſhe ſaw her late huſband David abominating the bed of thoſe his Concubines, that had been touched by his ſonne Abſalom; and can ſhe hold it lawfull that his ſon Adonijah ſhould climb up to the bed of his fathers wife? Sometimes even the beſt eyes are dimme and diſcerne not thoſe things which are obvious to weaker ſights: or whether did not Bathſheba well ſee the foulneſſe of the ſuit, and yet in compaſſion of Adonijahs late repulſe (wherein ſhe was the chiefe agent) and in a deſire to make him amends for the loſſe of the Kingdome, ſhe yeelds even thus to gratifie him. It is an injurious weakneſſe to be drawne upon any by-reſpects to the furtherance of faulty ſuits, of unlawfull actions.

No ſooner doth Bathſheba come in place, than Salomon her ſonne riſes from his chaire of State and meets her and bowes to her, and ſets her on his right hand; as not ſo remembring himſelfe to be a King, that he ſhould forget he was a ſonne. No outward dignity can take away the rights and obligations of nature; Had Bathſheba been as meane as Salomon was mighty, ſhe had caried away this honour from a gracious ſonne: Yet for all theſe due complements Bathſheba goes away with a deniall; Reverence ſhe ſhall have, ſhe ſhall not have a condeſcent.

In the acts of Magiſtracie, all regards of naturall relations muſt give way; That which ſhe propounded as a ſmall requeſt, is now, after a generall and confuſed ingagement rejected as unreaſonable. It were pitty wee ſhould bee heard in all our ſuits. Bathſheba makes a petition againſt her ſelfe, and knowes it not; her ſafety and life depends upon Salomons raign, yet ſhe unwittingly moves for the advancement of Adonijah.

Salomon was too dutifull to check his mother, and too wiſe to yeeld to her: In unfit ſupplications we are moſt heard when we are repelled. Thus doth our God many times anſwer our prayers with mercifull denials: & moſt bleſſeth us in croſſing our deſires.

Wiſe Salomon doth not finde himſelfe perplexed with the ſcruple of his promiſe; he that had ſaid Ask on, for I will not ſay thee nay, can now ſweare, God doe ſo to me, and more alſo, if Adonijah have not ſpoken this word againſt his owne life. His promiſe was according to his ſuppoſition; his ſuppoſition was of no other than of a ſuit, honeſt, reaſonable, expedient; now he holds himſelfe free from that grant, wherein there was at once both ſin and danger. No man can be intangled with generall words againſt his owne juſt and honeſt intentions.

The policies of wicked men befoole them at laſt; this interceſſion hath undone Adonijah, and inſtead of the Throne haſtens his grave: The ſword of Benaiah puts an end to that dangerous rivality. Ioab and Abiathar ſtill held Champerty with Adonijah; Their hand was both in his claime of the Kingdome, and in the ſuit of Abiſhag; There are crimes wherein there are no acceſſories, ſuch is this of treaſon. Abiathar may may thanke his burden that he lives; Had he not borne the Arke of the Lord before David, he had not now caried his head upon his shoulders; Had he not been afflicted with David, he had perished with Adonijah; now though he were, in his owne merit, a man of death, yet he shall survive his partners, Get thee to Anathoth unto thine owne fields. The Priesthood of Abiathar, as it aggravated his crime, so it shall preserve his life: Such honor have good Princes given to the Ministers of the Sanctuary, that their very coat hath been defence enough against the sword of justice, how much more should it be of proofe against the contempt of base persons?

Besides his function, respect is had to his sufferings, The father and brethren of Abiathar were slaine for Davids sake, therefore for Davids sake Abiathar (though worthy of death) shall live; He had been now a dead man, if he had not been formerly afflicted; Thus doth our good God deale with us; by the rod he prevents the sword, & therefore will not condemne us for our sins, because we have suffered. If Abiathar do not forfait his life, yet his office he shall, he must change Jerusalem for Anathoth, & the Priesthood for a retired privacie. It was fourscore yeares agoe since the sentence of judgement was denounced against the house of Eli; now doth it come to execution; This just quarrel against Abiathar (the last of that line) shal make good the threatned judgement: The wickednesse of Elies house was neither purged by sacrifice, nor obliterated by time: If God pay slowly, yet he payes sure: Delay of most certaine punishment is neither any hinderance to his justice, nor any comfort to our miseries

The execution of Joab, and Shimei.

Abiathar shall live though he serve not; It is in the power of Princes to remit (at least) those punishments which attend the breach of humane Lawes; good reason they should have power to dispence with the wrongs done to their owne persons. The newes of Adonijahs death, and Abiathars removal cannot but affright Ioab; who now runs to Gibeon, and takes sanctuary in the Tabernacle of God; all his hope of defence is in the hornes of the Altar. Fond Ioab, hadst thou formerly sought for counsell from the Tabernacle, thou hadst not now needed to seek to it for refuge; if thy devotions had not been wanting to that Altar, thou hadst not needed it for a shelter: It is the fashion of our foolish presumption to looke for protection, where we have not cared to yeeld obedience.

Even a Ioab clings fast to Gods Altar in his extremity, which in his ruffe and welfare he regarded not; The worst men would be glad to make use of Gods ordinances, for their advantage; Necessity will drive the most profane and lawlesse man to God; But what doe these bloody hands touching the holy Altar of God? Miserable Ioab, what help canst thou expect from that sacred pile: Those hornes that were sprinkled with the blood of beasts, abhorre to be touched by the blood of men, that Altar was for the expiation of sin by blood; not for the protection of the sin of blood. If Adonijah fled thither and escaped, it is murder that pursues thee more than conspiracie; God hath no sanctuary for a wilfull Homicide.

Yet such respect doth Benaiah give to that holy place, that his sword is unwilling to touch him that touches the Altar: Those hornes shall put off death for the time; and give protraction of the execution though not preservation of life; How sweet is life even to those who have been prodigal of the blood of others, that Ioab shifts thus to hold it but some few houres? Benaiah returnes with Ioabs answer, instead of his head; Nay, but I will dy here; as not daring to unsheath his sword against a man sheltered in Gods tabernacle, without a new commission. Young Salomon is so well acquainted with the Law of God, in such a case, that he sticks not at the sentence: hee knew that God had enacted, If a man came presumptuously upon his Neighbour, to slay him with guile, thou shalt take him from mine Altar, that he may die: He knew Ioabs murders had not been more presumptuous, than guilfull; and therefore hee sends Benaiah to take away the offender, both from God, and men, from the Altar, and the world.

No

No ſubject had merited more than Ioab; When proclamation was made in Iſrael, that whoever ſhould ſmite the Jebuſites firſt, he ſhould be the Chiefe and Captaine; Ioab was the man: When David built ſome part of Jeruſalem, Ioab built the reſt; ſo as Jeruſalem owes it ſelfe to Ioab, both for recovery, and reparation; No man held ſo cloſe to David; no man was more intent to the weale of Iſrael, none ſo ſucceſſeful in victories; yet now is he cald to reckon for his old ſinnes, and muſt repay blood to Amaſa, and Abner: It is not in the power of all our deſerts to buy off one ſinne, either with God or man: where life is ſo deeply forfaited, it admits of no redemption. A

The honeſt ſimplicity of thoſe times knew not of any infamy in the execution of juſtice. Benaiah, who was the great Marſhall under Salomon, thinkes not his fingers defiled with that fatall ſtroke. It is a fooliſh niceneſſe to put more ſhame in the doing of juſtice, than in the violating of it.

In one act Salomon hath approved himſelfe both a good Magiſtrate, and a good ſonne, fulfilling at once the will of a father and the charge of God, concluding upon this juſt execution, that, upon David, and upon his ſeed, and upon his houſe, and upon his Throne, there ſhall be peace for ever from the Lord; and inferring, that without this there could have been no peace. B

Blood is a reſtleſſe ſuitor, and will not leave clamoring for judgement, till the mouth be ſtopped with revenge. In this caſe favour to the offender is cruelty to the favourer.

Now hath Ioab paid all his arrerages by the ſword of Benaiah; there is no ſuit againſt his corps; that hath the honor of a buriall fit for a Peere of Iſrael, for the neere cozen to the King. Death puts an end to all quarrels: Salomon ſtrikes off the ſkore, when God is ſatisfied: The revenge that ſurvives death and will not bee ſhut up in the Coffin, is barbarous, and unbeſeeming true Iſraelites. C

Onely Shimei remaines upon the file, his courſe is next, yet ſo, as that it ſhall be in his owne liberty to haſten his end; Upon Davids remiſſion, Shimei dwels ſecurely in Bahurim, a town of the Tribe of Beniamin; Doubtleſſe, when he ſaw ſo round juſtice done upon Adonijah, and Ioab, his guilty heart could not think Salomons meſſage portended ought but his execution; and now he cannot but be well pleaſed with ſo eaſie conditions, of dwelling at Jeruſalem, and not paſſing over the brook Kidron; What more delightfull place could he chuſe to live in, than that city, which was the glory of the whole earth? What more pleaſing bounds could he wiſh than the ſweet banks of Kidron? Jeruſalem could be no priſon to him, whiles it was a Paradiſe to his betters, and if he had a deſire to take freſh ayre, he had the ſpace of ſix furlongs to walk from the city to the brooke. He could not complaine to be ſo delectably confined; And beſides, thrice every yeare hee might be ſure to ſee all his friends without ſtirring his foot. D

Wiſe Salomon whiles he cared to ſeeme not too ſevere an exactor of that, which his father had remitted, prudently layes inſenſible twigs for ſo foule an offender. Beſides the old grudge, no doubt Salomon ſaw cauſe to ſuſpect the fidelity of Shimei; as a man who was ever knowne to be hollow to the houſe of David; the obſcurity of a Country life would eaſily afford him more ſafe opportunities of ſecret miſchief; Many eyes ſhall watch him in the city; he cannot look out unſeen, he cannot whiſper unheard: Upon no other termes ſhall he enjoy his life, which the leaſt ſtraying ſhall forfait. E

Shimei feeles no paine in this reſtraint; How many Nobles of Iſrael doe that for pleaſure; which he doth upon command? Three yeares hath he lived within compaſſe limited both by Salomons charge & his own oath: It was ſtill in his power (notwithſtanding Davids Caveat) to have laid downe his hoare-head in the grave, without blood: The juſt God infatuates thoſe whom he meanes to plague: Two of Shimeies ſervants are fled to Gath; & now he ſaddles his Aſſe & is gone to fetch them backe; Either (he thinkes) this word of Salomon is forgotten, or in the multitude of greater affaires, not heeded; or this ſo ſmall an occurrence will not come to his eare: Covetouſneſſe and preſumption of impunity are the deſtruction of many a ſoule; Shimei ſeekes his ſervants, and loſes himſelfe; How many are there who cry out of this folly and and yet imitate it: Theſe earthly things either are our ſervants or ſhould bee; how commonly doe we ſee men run out of the bounds, ſet by Gods Law, to hunt after them, till their ſoules incurre a fearefull judgement?

Princes have thouſands of eyes & eares: If Shimei wil for more ſecreſie ſadle his own Aſſe, and take (as is like) the benefit of night, for his paſſage; his journey cannot be hid from Salomon. How warie had thoſe men need to be that are obnoxious? Without delay is Shimei complained of, convented, charged with violation both of the oath of God, and the injunction of Salomon; and that all theſe might appeare to be but an occaſion of that puniſhment, whoſe cauſe was more remote, now is all that old venom laid before him, which his malice had long ſince ſpit at Gods anointed: Thou knoweſt all the wickedneſſe, whereto thine heart is privy, that thou didſt to David my father.

Had this old tally beene ſtriken off, yet could not Shimei have pleaded ought for his life: For, had he ſaid, Let not my Lord the King be thus mortally diſpleaſed for ſo ſmall an offence: Who ever died for paſſing over Kidron? What man is the worſe for my harmeleſſe journey? It had ſoon been returned. If the act be ſmall, yet the circũſtances are deadly: The commands of Soveraigne authority make the ſleighteſt duties weighty; If the journey be harmeleſſe, yet not the diſobedience: It is not for ſubjects to poiſe the Princes charge in the ſcales of their weake conſtructions; but they muſt ſuppoſe it ever to be of ſuch importance, as is pretended by the Commander: Beſides the precept, here was a mutuall adjuration; Shimei ſwore not to goe; Salomon ſwore his death if he went; the one oath muſt be revenged, the other muſt be kept: If Shimei were falſe in offending, Salomon will be juſt in puniſhing. Now therefore, that which Abiſhai the ſon of Zeruiah wiſhed to have done in the greenneſſe of the wound, and was repelled; after long feſtering Benaiah is commanded to doe: The ſtones that Shimei threw at David ſtruck not ſo deep, as Benaiahs ſword; The tongue that curſed the Lords anointed hath paid the head to boot. Vengeance againſt rebels may ſleep, it cannot die: A ſure, if late, judgement attends thoſe that dare lift up either the hand or tongue againſt the ſacred perſons of Gods Vice-gerents. How much leſſe will the God of heaven ſuffer unrevenged the inſolencies, and blaſphemies againſt his owne divine Majeſtie? It is a fearefull word, He ſhould not be juſt, if hee ſhould hold theſe guiltleſſe.

AFter ſo many meſſages and proofes of grace, Salomon begins doubtfully both for his match, and for his devotion: If Pharaohs daughter were not a Proſelyte, his earely choyce was (beſides unwarrantable) dangerous: The high places not only ſtood, but were frequented, both by the people and King; I doe not finde David climbing up thoſe miſ hallowed hills, in an affection of the variety of Altars; Salomon doth ſo, and yet loves the Lord, and is loved of God againe: Such is the mercy of our God, that he will not ſuffer our wel-meant weakneſſes to bereave us of his favours: he rather pitties, than plagues us for the infirmities of upright hearts.

Gibeon was well worthy to be the chiefe, yea the onely high place; There was the allowed Altar of God, there was the Tabernacle, though (as then) ſevered from the Arke, thither did yong Salomon go up; and, as deſiring to begin his raigne with God, there he offers no leſſe than a thouſand ſacrifices.

Salomon worſhips God by day; God appeares to Salomon by night; Well may wee looke to enjoy God, when we have ſerved him; The night cannot but bee happy whoſe day hath been holy.

It was no unuſuall courſe with God to reveale himſelf unto his ſervants by dreams; So did he here to Salomon; who ſaw more with his eies ſhut, than ever they could ſee open, even him that was inviſible: The good King had offred unto God a thouſand burnt ſacrifices, and now God offered him his option, Aske what I ſhall give thee: Hee whoſe the beaſts are on a thouſand mountaines graciouſly accepts a ſmall returne of his owne. It ſtands not with the munificence of a bountifull God to bee indebted to his creature, we cannot give him ought unrecompenſed: There is no way wherein we can be ſo liberall to our ſelves, as by giving to the poſſeſſor of all things. And art thou ſtill, O God, leſſe free unto us thy meaner ſervants under the Goſpell? Haſt thou not ſaid, Whatſoever yee ſhall aske the Father in my name, it ſhall be given you? Only give us grace not to be wanting unto thee, and we know thou canſt not ſuffer any thing to be wanting unto us. A

The night followes the temper of the day; and the heart ſo uſeth to ſleepe, as it wakes: Had not the thoughts of Salomon been intent upon wiſdome by day, he had not made it his ſuit in his dreame: There needs no leiſure of deliberation: The heart was ſo fore-ſtalled with the love, and admiration of wiſdome, that not abiding the leaſt motion of a competition, it faſtens on that grace it had longed for: Give unto thy ſervant an underſtanding heart, to judge thy people. Had not Salomon been wiſe before, he had not knowne the worth of wiſdome, he had not preferred it in his deſires; The dung-hill cockes of the World cannot know the price of this pearle; thoſe that have it, know that all other excellencies are but traſh, & rubbiſh unto it. Salomon was a great King, and ſaw that he had power enough, but withall, he found that royalty, without wiſdome, was no other then eminent diſhonour; There is no trade of life whereto there belongs not a peculiar wiſdome; without which there is nothing but a tedious unprofitableneſſe; much more to the higheſt, and buſieſt vocation, the regiment of men: As God hath no reaſon to give his beſt favours unaſked, ſo hath hee no will to with-hold them where they are aſked. B

Hee that in his cradle had the title of Beloved of God, is now beloved more in the throne for the love and deſire of wiſdome; this ſoile could never have born this fruit alone; Salomon could not ſo much as have dreamed of wiſdome, if God had not put it into him; and now God takes the ſuit ſo well, as if he were beholden to his creature for wiſhing the beſt to it ſelfe: and becauſe Salomon hath aſked what hee ſhould, hee ſhall now receive both what he aſked, and what he aſked not: Riches and honor ſhal be given him into the match. So doth God love a good choyce, that he recompenſes it with over-giving: Could we but firſt ſeek the Kingdome of God and his righteouſneſſe, all theſe earthly things ſhould be ſuper-added to us; Had Salomon made wealth his boon, he had failed both of riches and wiſdome; now he aſkes the beſt and ſpeeds of all; They are in a faire way of happineſſe that can pray well; It was no diſ-comfort to Salomon, that he awaked and found it a dreame; for he knew this dreame was divine, and oracular; and he already found in his firſt waking, the reall performance of what was promiſed him ſleeping: Such illumination did he ſenſibly finde in all the roomes of his heart, as if God had now given him a new ſoule: No marvell if Salomon now returning from the Tabernacle to the Arke teſtified his joy and thankfulneſſe by burnt-offerings, and peace offerings, and publique feaſtings; The heart that hath found in it ſelfe the lively teſtimonies of Gods preſence, and favour, cannot contain it ſelfe from outward expreſſions. C

God likes not to have his gifts lie dead where he hath conferred them; Iſrael ſhal ſoone witneſſe they have a King enlightened from heaven; in whom wiſdome did not ſtay for heires, did not admit of any parallel in his predeceſſors. The all-wiſe God will find occaſions to draw forth thoſe graces to uſe and light, which he hath beſtowed on man; Two Harlots come before young Salomon with a difficult plea; It is not like, the Princes eare was the firſt that heard this complaint; there was a ſubordinate courſe of juſtice for the determination of theſe meaner incidences: the hardneſſe of this deciſion brought the matter, through all the bēches of inferior judicature, to the Tribunal of Salomon; The very Iſraelitiſh Harlots were not ſo unnatural as ſome now adayes that counterfeit honeſty; Theſe ſtrive for the fruit of their womb, ours to put thē off, One ſon is yet alive, two mothers contend for him. The children were alike for feature, for age, the mothers were alike for reputation: here can bee no evidence from others eyes; Whether's now is the living Child, and whether's is the dead? Had Salomon gone about to wring forth the truth by tortures, he had perhaps plagued the innocent, and added paine to the miſery of her loſſe; the weaker had been guilty, and D

the E

A the more able to beare, had carried away both the child and the victory: The countenance of either of the mothers bewrayed an equality of paſſion; Sorrow poſſeſſed the one, for the ſonne ſhe had loſt; and the other, for the ſonne ſhe was in danger to leeſe: Both were equally pereinptory, and importunate in their claime; It is in vain to thinke that the true part can be diſcerned by the vehemence of their challenge: Falſhood is oft-times more clamorous than truth; No witneſſes can bee produced; They two dwelt apart under one roofe: and if ſome neighbours have ſeene the children at their birth, and circumciſion, yet how little difference, how much change is there in the favour of Infants? how doth death alter more confirmed lines?

The impoſſibility of proofe makes the guilty more confident, more impudent; the true mother pleads that her child was taken away at midnight by the other; but B in her ſleep; ſhe ſaw it not, ſhe felt it not: and if all her ſenſes could have witneſſed it, yet, here was but the affirmation of the one, againſt the deniall of the other, which in perſons alike credible doe but counterpoiſe. What is there now to lead the Judge, ſince there is nothing either in the act, or circumſtances, or perſons, or plea, or evidence that might ſway the ſentence? Salomon wel ſaw that when all outward proofes failed, there was an inward affection, which if it could be fetcht out, would certainly bewray the true mother; he knew ſorrow might more eaſily be diſſembled than naturall love; both ſorrowed for their owne, both could not love, one, as theirs: To draw forth then this true proofe of motherhood, Salomon calls for a ſword: Doubtleſſe, ſome of the wiſer hearers ſmiled upon each other; and thought in themſelves, What, will the young King cut theſe knottie cauſes in peeces? Will hee divide juſtice C with edge tooles? will he ſmite at hazard before conviction? The actions of wiſe Princes are ridles to vulgar conſtructions; neither is it for the ſhallow capacities of the multitude to ſadome the deepe projects of Soveraigne authority: That ſword which had ſerved for execution, ſhall now ſerve for triall; Divide yee the living child in twaine, and give the one halfe to the one, and the other halfe to the other; Oh divine oracle of juſtice, commanding that which it would not have done, that it might finde out that which could not be diſcovered; Neither God, nor his Deputies may be ſo taken at their words, as if they alwayes intended their commands for action, and not ſometimes for probation.

This ſword hath already pierced the breaſt of the true mother; and divided her heart with feare, and griefe at ſo killing a ſentence: There needes no other racke to D diſcover nature; and now ſhe thinks, wo is me that came for juſtice, and am anſwered with cruelty; Divide yee the living child? Alas, what hath that poore infant offended? that it ſurvives, and is ſued for? How much leſſe miſerable had I been, that my childe had been ſmothered in my ſleep, then mangled before mine eyes? If a dead carkaſſe could have ſatisfied me, I needed not to have complained: What a wofull condition am I falne into, who am accuſed to have been the death of my ſuppoſed child already, and now ſhall be the death of my owne? If there were no loſſe of my childe, yet how can I endure this torment of mine owne bowels? How can I live to ſee this part of my ſelfe ſprawling under that bloody ſword? And whiles ſhe thinkes thus, ſhe ſues to that ſuſpected mercy of her juſt Judge, Oh my Lord, give her the living child, and ſlay him not: as thinking, if he live, he ſhall but change a mother; if he die, his mother loE ſeth a ſon; Whiles he lives, it ſhall be my comfort that I have a ſon, though I may not call him ſo: dying, he periſheth to both; it is better he ſhould live to wrong a mother, than to neither: Contrarily her envious competitor, as holding her ſelfe well ſatisfied that her neighbour ſhould be as childleſſe, as her ſelf, can ſay, Let it be neither mine, nor thine, but divide it; Well might Salomon, and every hearer conclude, that either ſhe was no mother, or a monſter, that could bee content with the murder of her childe; and that if ſhe could have been the true mother, and yet have deſired the blood of her infant, ſhe had been as worthy to have been ſtript of her childe for ſo foule unnaturalnes, as the other had been worthy to enjoy him for her honeſt compaſſiō. Not more juſtly than wiſely therfore doth Salomon trace the true mother by the footſteps of love, & pity; & adjudgeth the child to thoſe bowels that had yerned at his danger division: Satan that hath no right to the heart, would be content with a peece of it: God that made it all, will have either the whole, or none: The erroneous Church strives with the true, for the living childe of saving doctrine; each claimes it for her owne: Heresie, conscious of her owne injustice, could be content to goe away with a leg, or an arme of sound principles, as hoping to make up the rest with her owne mixtures: Truth cannot abide to part with a joynt and will rather endure to leese all by violence, than a peece through a willing connivency.

Even in morality it is thus alſo: Truth as it is one, ſo it loves intireneſſe; falſhood,

The Temple.

IT is a weake and injurious censure that taxeth Salomons slacknes in founding the house of God: Great bodies must have but slow motions; Hee was wise that said, the matters must be all prepared without, ere we build within: And if David have laid ready a great part of the metals and timber, yet many a tree must be felled and squared, and many a stone hewn and polished, ere this foundation could be laid; neither could those large Cedars be cut, sawne, seasoned in one yeare: Foure yeares are soone gone in so vast a preparation: David had not been so intire a friend to Hiram, if Hiram had not been a friend to God; Salomons wisdome hath taught him to make use of so good a neighbour, of a fathers friend; he knew that the Tyrians skill was not given them for nothing; Not Jewes onely, but Gentiles must have their hand in building the Temple of God; Onely Jewes medled with the Tabernacle, but the Temple is not built without the aide of Gentiles; They, together with us, make up the Church of God.

Even Pagans have their Arts from heaven; how justly may we improve their graces to the service of the God of heaven; if there be a Tyrian that can work more curiously in gold, in silver, in brasse, in iron, in purple, and blew silke, then an Israelite, why should not he be imployed about the Temple? their heathenisme is their own; their skill is their Makers: Many a one workes for the Church of God, that yet hath no part in it.

Salomon raises a tribute for the worke; not of mony, but of men: Thirty thousand Israelites are levied for the service; yet not continuedly, but with intermission, their labour is more generous, and lesse pressing: it is enough if they keep their courses one moneth in Lebanon, two at home; so as ever ten thousand work, whiles twenty thousand breathe. So favourable is God to his creature, that he requires us not to be over-toyled in the workes of his owne service. Due respirations are requisite in the holiest acts. The maine stresse of the worke lyes upon Proselites; whose both number, and paines was herein more than the Natives: An hundred and fifty thousand of them are imployed in bearing burthens, in hewing stones; besides their three thousand three hundred over-seers: Now were the despised Gibeonites of good use, and in vaine doth Israel wish that the zeale of Saul had not robbed them of so serviceable drudges.

There is no man so meane but may bee some way usefull to the House of God; Those that cannot worke in gold, and silver, and silke, yet may cut and hew; and those that can doe neither, yet may cary burdens: Even the services that are more homely, are not lesse necessary: Who can dis-hearten himselfe in the conscience of his owne insufficiency, when he sees, God can as well serve himselfe of his labour, as of his skill.

The Temple is framed in Lebanon, and set up in Sion; Neither hammer nor axe was heard in that holy structure; There was nothing but noise in Lebanon, nothing in Sion but silence and peace. What ever tumults are abroad, it is fit there should be all quietnesse and sweet concord in the Church, Oh God, that the axes of schisme, or the hammers of furious contentions should be heard within thy Sanctuary! Thine house is not built with blowes, with blowes it is beaten down: Oh knit the hearts of thy servants together in the unity of the spirit, and the bond of peace; that we may

A minde and ſpeake the ſame things, that thou who art the God of peace, maiſt take pleaſure to dwell under the quiet roofe of our hearts.

Now is the foundation laid, and the wals riſing of that glorious fabrick, which all Nations admired, and all times have celebrated; Even thoſe ſtones which were laid in the Baſe of the building were not ragged and rude, but hewne and coſtly: the part that lyes covered with earth from the eyes of all beholders, is no leſſe precious, than thoſe that are moſt conſpicuous: God is not all for the eye, he pleaſeth himſelfe with the hidden value of the living ſtones of his ſpirituall Temple; How many noble graces of his ſervants have beene buried in obſcurity; not diſcerned ſo much as by their owne eyes? which yet as he gave, ſo he crowneth: Hypocrites regard nothing but ſhew; God nothing but truth.

B The matter of ſo goodly a frame ſtrives with the proportion, whether ſhall more excell: Here was nothing but white Marble without; nothing but Cedar and Gold within: upon the Hill of Sion ſtands that glittering and ſnowy pile, which both inviteth and dazeleth the eyes of paſſengers afarre off; ſo much more precious within, as Cedar is better than ſtone, gold then Cedar; No baſe thing goes to the making up of Gods Houſe: If Satan may have a dwelling, he cares not though he patch it up of the rubbiſh of ſtone, or rotten ſticks, or droſſe of metals: God will admit of nothing that is not pure and exquiſite; His Church conſiſts of none but the faithfull, his habitation is in no heart but the gratious.

The faſhion was no other then that of the Tabernacle; onely this was more coſtly, more large, more fixed; God was the ſame that dwelt in both, hee varied not; the C ſame myſtery was in both; Onely it was fit there ſhould be a proportion betwixt the worke and the builder: The Tabernacle was erected in a popular eſtate, the Temple in a Monarchy; it was fit this ſhould favour of the munificence of a King, as that of the zeale of a multitude; That was erected in the flitting condition of Iſrael in the deſart: this, in their ſetled reſidence in the promiſed Land: it was fit therefore that ſhould be framed for motion, this for reſt. Both of them were diſtinguiſhed into three remarkable diviſions, whereof each was more noble, moſt reſerved than other.

But what doe we bend our eyes upon ſtone, and wood, and metals? God would never have taken pleaſure in theſe dead materials for their owne ſakes, if they had not had a further intendment: Me thinkes I ſee foure Temples in this one. It is but D one in matter, as the God that dwels in it is but one: three yet more, in reſemblance: according to diviſion of them in whom it pleaſes God to inhabite: For where ever God dwels, there is his Temple; Oh God, thou vouchſafeſt to dwell in the beleeving heart; as we thy ſilly creatures have our being in thee, ſo thou the Creator of heaven and earth haſt thy dwelling in us. The heaven of heavens is not able to contain thee and yet thou diſdaineſt not to dwell in the ſtrait lodgings of our renewed ſoule. So then, becauſe Gods children are many, and thoſe many divided in reſpect of themſelves, though united in their head, therefore this Temple which is but one in collection as God is one, is manifold in the diſtribution, as the Saints are many; each man bearing about him a little ſhrine of this infinite Majeſtie: And for that the moſt generall diviſion of the Saints is in their place and eſtate; ſome ſtrugling, and toyling in E this earthly warfare, others triumphing in heavenly glory; therefore hath God two other, more univerſall Temples; One the Church of his Saints on earth; the other, the higheſt heaven of his Saints glorified. In all theſe, O God, thou dwelleſt for ever, and this materiall houſe of thine is a cleere repreſentation of theſe three ſpirituall; Elſe what were a temple made with hands unto the God of ſpirits? And though one of theſe was a true type of all, yet how are they all exceeded each by other? This of ſtone, though moſt rich and coſtly, yet what is it to the living Temple of the holy Ghoſt, which is our body? What is the Temple of this body of ours, to the Temple of Chriſts body which is his Church? And what is the Temple of Gods Church on earth, to that which triumpheth glorioufly in heaven?

How eaſily doe we ſee all theſe in this one viſible Temple: which as it had three diſtinctions of roomes; the Porch, the Holy-place, the Holy of Holies, ſo is each of them answered spiritually: In the Porch we finde the regenerate soule entring into the blessed society of the Church. In the holy place, the Communion of the true visible Church on earth, selected from the world: In the Holy of Holies (whereinto the high-Priest entred once a yeare) the glorious heaven, into which our true high-Priest, Christ Jesus, entred once for all to make an atonement betwixt God and man. In all these what a meet correspondence there is both in proportion, matter, situation?

In proportion; The same rule that skilfull carvers observe in the cutting out of the perfect statue of a man, that the height be thrice the breadth, and the breadth one third of the height, was likewise duely observed in the fabrick of the Temple: whose length was double to the height, and treble to the breadth, as being sixty cubits long, thirty high, and twenty broad; How exquisite a symmetry hast thou ordained (O God) betwixt the faithfull heart, and thy Church on earth, with that in heaven: how accurate in each of these, in all their powers and parts compared with other? So hath God ordered the beleeving soule that it hath neither too much shortnesse of grace, nor too much height of conceit, nor too much breadth of passion; So hath he ordered his visible Church, that there is a necessary inequality, without any disproportion; an height of government, a length of extent, a breadth of jurisdiction duely answerable to each other; So hath he ordered his triumphant Church above, that it hath a length of eternity, answered with an height of perfection, and a breadth of incomprehensible glory.

In matter; All was here of the best; The wood was precious, sweet, lasting: The stone beautifull, costly, insensible of age; The gold pure and glittering: So are the graces of Gods children, excellent in their nature, deare in their acceptation, eternal in their use: So are the ordinances of God in his Church, holy, comfortable, irrefragable. So is the perfection of his glorified Saints incomparable, unconceivable.

In situation; The outer parts were here more common, the inner more holy, and peculiarly reserved: I finde one Court of the Temple open to the uncleane, to the uncircumcised: Within that, another, open onely to the Israelites; and of them, to the cleane; within that, yet another, proper onely to the Priests and Levites; where was the Brazen Altar for sacrifice, and the Brazen Sea for washings: The eyes of the Laitie might follow their oblations in hither, their feet might not.

Yet more, in the covered roomes of the Temple, there is, whither the Priests only may enter, not the Levites; there is, whither the high Priest onely may enter, not his brethren.

It is thus in every renewed man, the individual temple of God; the outward parts are allowed common to God and the world; the inwardest and secretest, which is the heart, is reserved onely for the God that made it. It is thus in the Church visible, the false and fou'e-hearted hypocrite hath accesse to the holy ordinances of God, and treads in his courts; onely the true Christian hath intire and private conversation with the holy One of Israel: He only is admitted into the Holy of Holies, and enters within the glorious vaile of heaven.

If from the wals we looke unto the furniture: What is the Altar whereon our sacrifices of prayer and praises are offered to the Almighty but a contrite heart? What the golden Candlestickes, but the illumined understanding, wherein the light of the knowledge of God, and his divine will shineth for ever? What the Tables of Shew-bread, but the sanctified memory, which keepeth the bread of life continually? Yea if we shall presume so farre as to enter into the very closet of Gods Oracle; even there, O God, doe we finde our unworthy hearts so honoured by thee, that they are made thy very Arke, wherein thy Royall law, and the pot of thy heavenly Manna is kept for ever; and from whose propitiatory, shaded with the wings of thy glorious Angels, thou giveſt thy gracious Testimonies of thy good spirit, witnessing with ours, that we are the children of thee the living God.

Behold, if Salomon built a Temple unto thee, thou hast built a Temple unto thy self in us. We are not only through thy grace living stones in thy Temple, but living Temples in thy Sion: Oh doe thou ever dwell in this thine house; and in this thy house

A house let us ever serve thee: Wherefore else hast thou a Temple, but for thy presence with us, and for our worshipping of thee? The time was, when, as thy people, so thy selfe, didst lodge in flitting Tents, ever shifting, ever moving; thence thou thoughtest best to sojourne both in Shilo, and the roofe of Obed Edom; After that, thou condescendedst to settle thine abode with men, and wouldst dwell in an house of thine owne, at thy Jerusalem. So didst thou in the beginning lodge with our first Parents in a Tent; Sojourne with Israel under the law; and now makest a constant residence under the Gospell, in the hearts of thy chosen children; from whence thou wilt remove no more; they shall remove from the world, from themselves, thou shalt not remove from them.

Whersoever thou art, O God, thou art worthy of adoration; Since thou ever wilt B dwell in us, be thou ever worshipped in us: Let the Altars of our cleane hearts send up ever to thee the sweetly perfumed smoakes of our holy meditations and faithfull prayers, and cheerfull thanks-givings: Let the pure lights of our faith, and godly conversation shine ever before thee, and men, and never be put out: let the bread of life stand ever ready upon the pure, and precious tables of our hearts. Locke up thy Law, and thy Manna within us; and speake comfortably to us from thy Mercy-seat. Suffer nothing to enter in hither that is uncleane: Sanctifie us unto thy selfe, and be thou sanctified in us.

Salomon, and the Queene of Sheba.

GOd hath no use of the dark lanterns of secret, & reserved perfections; We our selves doe not light up Candles to put them under bushels. The great lights whether of heaven or earth, are not intended to obscuritie; but as to give light unto others, so to be seen thē-selves; Dan and Beersheba were too strait bounds for the fame of Salomon; which now hath flown over all lands and seas, and raised the world to an admiration of his more than humane wisdome. Even so, O thou everlasting King of Peace, thy name is great among the Gentiles; There is no speech nor language where the report of thee is not heard; The sound of thee is gone forth through all the earth; Thy name is an ointment powred out, therefore the virgins D love thee.

No doubt many from all coasts came to learne and wonder; none with so much note as this noble daughter of Cham: Who her selfe deserves the next wonder to him whom she came to heare, and admire; That a woman, a Princesse, a rich and great Queene, should travell from the remotest South, from Saba, a region famous for the greatest delicacies of nature, to learne wisdome, is a matchlesse example. We know Merchants that venture to either Indies for wealth; Others we know daily to crosse the seas for wanton curiosity: Some few Philosophers we have known to have gone farre for learning; and amongst Princes it is no unusuall thing to send their Embassadors to far distant Kingdomes, for transaction of businesses either of State, or commerce; but that a royall Lady should in person undertake and overcome so tedious a E journey, onely to observe, and inquire into the mysteries of nature, art, religion, is a thing past both parallel, and imitation; Why doe we thinke any labour great, or any way long, to heare a greater than Salomon? How justly shall the Queene of the South rise up in judgment, and condemne us, who may heare wisdome crying in our streets and neglect her?

Certainly so wealthy a Queene, and so great a lover of wisdome could not want great schollers at home; them she had first opposed with her enigmaticall demands; and now finding her selfe unsatisfied, she takes her selfe to this Oracle of God; It is a good thing to doubt, better to be resolved: The minde that never doubts shall learn nothing; the minde that ever doubts shall never profit by learning. Our doubts onely serve to stirre us up to seeke truth; our resolutions settle us in the truth we have found. There were no pleasure in resolutions if we had not been formerly troubled with with doubts; There were nothing but discomfort and disquietnesse in doubts, if it were not for the hope of resolution. It is not safe to suffer doubts to dwel too long upon the heart; there may be good use of them as passengers, dangerous as inmates: Happy are we if we can finde a Salomon to remove them.

Fame as it is alwayes a blab, so oft-times a lyer. The wise Princesse found cause to distrust so uncertain an informer: whose reports are still either doubtful, or fabulous; and like windes, or streames, increase in passing: If very great things were not spoken of Salomon, fame should have wronged him; and if but just rumours were spread of his wisdome, there needed much credulity to beleeve them. This great Queene would not suffer her selfe to be lead by the eares; but comes in person to examine the truth of forraine relations. How much more unsafe is it in the most important businesses of our soules, to trust the opinions and reports of others? Those eares and eyes are ill bestowed that doe not serve to choose and judge for their owners.

When we come to a rich treasure, we need not be bidden to carry away what we are able. This wise Lady as she came far for knowledge, so finding the plenty of this veine, she would not depart without her full load: there was nothing wherein shee would leave her self unsatisfied: she knew that she could not every day meet with a Salomon; and therefore she makes her best use of so learned a Master: Now she empties her heart of all her doubts, and fils it with instruction. It is not good neglecting the opportunities of furnishing our soules with profitable, with saving knowledge. There is much wisdome in moving a question well, though there be more in assoiling it: What use doe we make of Salomons Teacher, if sitting at the feete of Christ we leave our hearts either ignorant, or perplexed?

As if the errand of this wealthy Queene had been to buy wisdome, she came with her Camels laden with gold, and precious stones, and rich odours: Though to a mighty King she will not come to schoole empty-handed: If she came to fetch an invaluable treasure, she findes it reason to give thankes unto him that kept it. As he is a foole that hath a price in his hand to get wisdome, and wants an heart: So is hee unthankfull that hath an heart to get wisdome, and hath no price in his hand; A price not countervailable to what he seekes, but retributory to him of whom hee seekes. How shamefull is it to come alwayes with close hands to them that teach us the great mysteries of salvation.

Expectation is no better than a kinde enemy to good deserts: We leese those objects which we over-look. Many had been admired if they had not been over-much befriended by fame; who now in our judgement are cast as much below their ranke, as they were fore-imagined above it. This disadvantage had wise Salomon with this stranger; whom rumour had bid to look for incredible excellencies; yet so wonderfull were the graces of Salomon, that they overcame the highest expectation, and the liberallest beliefe: So as when she saw the architecture of his buildings, the provisions of his tables, the order of his attendants, the religion of his sacrifices, she confessed both her unjust incredulity in not beleeving the report of his wisdome, and the injurie of report, in understanding it. I beleeved not the words till I came, and mine eyes had seene it, and loe the one halfe was not told me. Her eyes were more sure informers than her eares. She did not so much heare as see Salomons wisdome in these reall effects. His answers did not so much demonstrate it, as his prudent government. There are some whose speeches are witty, whiles their cariage is weake; whose deeds are incongruities, whiles their words are Apothegms. It is not worth the name of wisedome that may be heard onely, and not seene: Good discourse is but the froth of wisdome; the pure and solid substance of it is in well framed actions; if wee know these things, happy are we if we doe them.

And if this great person admired the wisdome, and buildings, the domesticke order of Salomon, and chiefly his stately ascent into the House of the Lord; how should our soules be taken up with wonder at thee, O thou true son of David, and Prince of everlasting peace, who receivedst the spirit not by measure? who hast built this glorious house, not made with hands, even the heaven of heavens? whose infinite providence hath sweetly disposed of all the family of thy creatures, both in heaven and earth;

A earth; and who laſtly didſt aſcend up on high, and ledſt captivity captive, and gaveſt gifts to men?

So well had this ſtudious Ladie profited by the Lectures of that exquiſite Maſter; that now ſhe envies, ſhe magnifies none but them who may live within the ayre of Salomons wiſdome: Happy are thy men, and happy are thy ſervants, which ſtand continually before thee, and that heare thy wiſdome. As if ſhee could have beene content to have changed her Throne for the footſtoole of Salomon. It is not eaſie to conceive how great a bleſſing it is to live under thoſe lips, which doe both preſerve knowledge and utter it: If we were not glutted with good counſell, we ſhould finde no reliſh in any worldly contentment in compariſon thereof: But, he that is full deſpiſeth an hony-combe.

B She, whom her own experience had taught how happy a thing it is to have a ſkil full Pilote ſitting at the ſterne of the State, bleſſeth Iſrael for Salomon, bleſſed God for Iſrael, bleſſeth Salomon and Iſrael mutually in each other; Bleſſed bee the Lord thy God which delighted in thee, to ſet thee on the Throne of Iſrael. Becauſe the Lord loved Iſrael for ever, therefore made he thee King to doe judgement and juſtice. It was not more Salomons advancement to be King of Iſrael, then it was the advancement of Iſrael to be governed by a Salomon. There is no earthly proofe of Gods love to any Nation comparable to the ſubſtitution of a wiſe and pious governour: to him we owe our peace, our life, and which is deſervedly dearer, the life of our ſoules, the Goſpel. But, oh God how much haſt thou loved thine Iſrael for ever, in that thou haſt ſet over it that righteous Branch of Ieſſe, whoſe name is Wonderfull, Counſellor, the mighty God,
C the everlaſting Father, the Prince of Peace: In whoſe dayes Iudah ſhall be ſaved, and Iſrael ſhall dwell ſafely? Sing O heaven, and reioyce O earth, and breake forth into ſinging, O mountaines, for God hath comforted his people, and will have everlaſting mercy upon his afflicted.

The Queene of Sheba did not bring her gold and precious ſtones to looke on, or to re-carie, but to give to a wealthier than her ſelfe. She gives therefore to Salomon an hundred & twenty talents of gold, beſides coſtly ſtones and odours. He that made ſilver in Hieruſalem as ſtones, is yet richly preſented on all hands. The rivers ſtill runne into the Sea; To him that hath ſhall be given: How ſhould we bring unto thee O thou King of Heaven, the pureſt gold of thine owne graces, the ſweeteſt odours of our obediences? Was not this withall a type of that homage which ſhould bee
D done unto thee, O Saviour, by the heads of the Nations? The Kings of Tarſhiſh and the Iles bring preſents; the Kings of Sheba and Saba bring gifts; yea all Kings ſhall worſhip thee, all Nations ſhall ſerve thee. They cannot enrich themſelves but by giving unto thee.

It could not ſtand with Salomons magnificence to receive rich courteſies without a returne: The greater the perſon was, the greater was the obligation of requitall; The gifts of meane perſons are taken but as tributes of duty; it is diſhonourable to take from equals, and not to retribute: there was not therefore more freedome in her gift, then in her receit: Her owne will was the meaſure of both; Shee gave what ſhe would, ſhe received whatſoever ſhe would aſke; And ſhee had little profited by Salomons ſchoole, if ſhe had not learned to aſke the beſt: Shee returnes therefore
E more richly ladē then ſhe came: ſhe gave to Salomon as a thankful Client of wiſdom; Salomon returnes to her as a munificent Patrone, according to the liberality of a King. We ſhall be ſure to be gainers by whaſoever we give unto thee, O thou God of wiſdome and peace: Oh that we could come from the remote regions of our infidelity, and worldlineſſe, to learne wiſdome of thee, who both teacheſt and giveſt it abundantly, without upbraiding, without grudging; and could bring with us the poore preſents of our faithfull deſires, and ſincere ſervices: how wouldſt thou receive us with a gracious acceptation, and ſend us away laden with preſent comfort, with eternall glory?

Salomons

Salomons defection.

SInce the first man Adam, the world hath not yeelded either so great an example of wisdome, or so fearefull an example of apostasie as Salomon: What humane knowledge Adam had in the perfection of nature by creation, Salomon had by infusion; both fully, both from one fountaine: If Adam called all creatures by their names, Salomon spake from the Cedars of Lebanon, to the mosse that springs out of the wall; and besides these vegetables, there was no Beast, nor Fowle, nor Fish, nor creeping thing that escaped his discourse. Both fell, both fell by one meanes; as Adam, so might Salomon have said; The woman deceived me: It is true indeed, that Adam fell as all; Salomon as one; yet so as that this one is the patterne of the frailtie of all. If knowledge could have given an immunity from sin, both had stood: Affections are those feet of the soule, on which it either stands, or fals; Salomon loved many out-landish women: I wonder not if the wise King mis-caryed; Every word hath bane enough for a man: Women, many women, outlandish, idolatrous, & those not onely had, but doted on; Sexe, multitude, nation, condition, all conspired to the ruine of a Salomon: If one woman undid all mankind, what marvell is it if many women undid one? yet had those many been the daughters of Israel, they had tempted him onely to lust; not to misdevotion; now they were of those Nations, whereof the Lord had said to the Children of Israel, Go not ye in to them, nor let them come in to you, for surely they will turne your hearts after their gods; to them did Salomon joyne in love; who can marvell if they dis-joyned his heart from God? Satan hath found this bait to take so well, that he never changed it since he crept into Paradise. How many have we known whose heads have been broken with their owne rib?

In the first world the sonnes of God saw the daughters of men, and tooke them wives of all they liked; they multiplied not children, but iniquities: Balaam knew well if the dames of Moab could make the Israelites wantons, they should soon make them Idolaters: All lyes open where the covenant is not both made with the eye, and kept.

It was the charge of God to the Kings of Israel before they were, that they should not multiply Wives. Salomon hath gone beyond the stakes of the law, and now is ready to leese himself amongst a thousand bed-fellowes: Who so layes the reines in the neck of his carnall appetite, cannot promise where he will rest. Oh Salomon, where was thy wisdome, whiles thine affections runne away with thee into so wilde a voluptuousnesse? What bootes it thee to discourse of all things; whiles thou mis-knowest thy selfe? The perfections of speculation doe not argue the inward powers of selfe-government; The eye may be cleare, whiles the hand is palsied. It is not so much to be heeded how the soule is informed, as how it is disciplined; The light of knowledge doth well, but the due order of the affections doth better: Never any meer man since the first, knew so much as Salomon, many that have known lesse have had more command of themselves: A competent estate well husbanded, is better than a vast patrimony neglected.

There can be no safety to that soule where is not a strait curbe upon our desires: If our lusts be not held under as slaves, they will rule as tyrants. Nothing can prevent the extremity of our mis-cariage but early and strong denials of our concupiscence: Had Salomon done thus, delicacie and lawlesse greatnesse had not led him into these bogs of intemperance.

The wayes of youth are steepe and slippery, wherein as it is easie to fall, so it is commonly relieved with pity; but the wanton inordinations of age are not more unseasonable than odious; yet behold Salomons yonger yeares were studious, and innocent, his over-hastened age was licentious and mis-governed; For, when Salomon was old, his wives turned away his heart after other gods: If any age can secure us from the danger of a spirituall fall, it is our last; and if any mans old age might secure him, it

A was Salomons; the beloved of God, the Oracle, the miracle of wisdome. Who would have looked but that the blossomes of so hopefull a spring, should have yeelded a goodly and pleasant fruit, in the Autumne of age? yet behold even Salomons old age vicious. There is no time wherein we can be safe, whiles we carry this body of sin about us: Youth is impetuous, mid-age stubborne, old age weak, all dangerous: Say not now; The fury of my youthfull flashes is over, I shall henceforth finde my heart calme and impregnable; whiles thou seest old Salomon doting upon his Concubines, yea upon their Idolatry.

It is no presuming upon time, or meanes, or strength: how many have begun and proceeded well, who yet have shamed themselves in their last stage? If God uphold us not, we cannot stand: If God uphold us we cannot fal; when we are at the strongest B it is the best to be weake in our selves; and when at our weakest, strong in him, in whom we can doe all things.

I cannot yet think so hard of Salomon, that he would project his person to Ashteroth the goddesse of the Sidonians, or Milchom the Idol of the Ammonites, or Chemosh the abomination of Moab: He that knew all things from the shrub to the Cedar, could not be ignorant that these statues were but stocks, or stones, or metals, and the powers resembled by them, Devils. It is not like he could be so insensate to adore such Deities; but so farre was the uxorious King blinded with affection, that he gave not passage onely to the Idolatry of his heathenish wives, but furtherance.

So did he dote upon their persons, that he humoured them in their sins: Their act is therefore his, because his eyes winkt at it; his hand advanced it: He that built a C Temple to the living God, for himselfe & Israel in Sion, built a Temple to Chemosh in the mount of Scandall, for his Mistresses of Moab, in the very face of Gods House: No hill about Jerusalem was free from a Chappell of Devils: Each of his dames had their Puppets, their Altars, their Incense; Because Salomon feeds them in their superstition, he drawes the sinne home to himselfe, and is branded for what hee shou'd have forbidden. Even our very permission appropriates crimes to us: Wee need no more guiltinesse of any sinne, than our willing toleration.

Who can but yearne, and feare to see the wofull wracke of so rich and goodly a vessell: O Salomon, wert not thou he whose yonger yeares God honoured with a message and stile of love? To whom God twice appeared; and in a gracious vision renewed the Covenant of his favour? Whom he singled out from all the generation D of men to be the founder of that glorious Temple which was no lesse cleerely the Type of heaven, than thou wert of Christ the Son of the everliving God? Wert not thou that deep Sea of wisdome which God ordained to send forth rivers and fountaines of all divine, and humane knowledge to all Nations, to all ages? Wert not thou one of those select Secretaries, whose hand it pleased the Almighty to imploy in three peeces of the divine monuments of sacred Scriptures? Which of us dares ever hope to aspire unto thy graces? Which of us can promise to secure our selves frō thy ruines? We fall, O God, we fall to the lowest hell, if thou prevent us not, if thou sustaine us not; Vphold thou me according to thy Word that I may live, and let me not be ashamed of my hope. Order my steps in thy word, and let not any iniquity have dominion over me. All our weaknesse is in our selves, all our strength is in thee. O God, bee thou strong E in our weaknesse, that our weake knees may be ever steddy in thy strength.

But in the midst of the horror of this spectacle (able to affright all the sons of men) behold some glimpse of comfort: was it of Salomon that David his father propheſied; Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast downe; for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand? If sensible grace, yet finall mercy was not taken from that beloved of God; In the hardest of this winter, the sap was gone downe to the root, though it shewed not in the branches: Even whiles Salomon removed, that word stood fast, Hee shall bee my sonne, and I will be his Father. He that foresaw his sinne, threatned and limited his correction, If he breake my statutes, and keep not my commandements, then will I visit his transgression with a rod, and his iniquitie with stripes; Nevertheless my loving kindnesse will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulnesse to faile; My Covenant will I not breake; nor alter the thing that is gone out of my mouth; Behold the favour of God doth doth not depend upon Salomons obedience: If Salomon ſhall ſuffer his faithfulneſſe to A faile towards his God; God will not requite him with the failing of his faithfulneſſe to Salomon: If Salomon breake his Covenant with God; God will not breake his Covenant with the father of Salomon, with the ſonne of David: Hee ſhall ſmart, hee ſhall not periſh. Oh gracious word of the God of all mercies, able to give ſtrength to the languiſhing, comfort to the deſpairing, to the dying, life. Whatſoever we are, thou wilt be ſtill thy ſelfe, O holy One of Iſrael, true to thy Covenant, conſtant to thy Decree; The ſinnes of thy choſen can neither fruſtrate thy counſell, nor out-ſtrip thy mercies.

Now I ſee Salomon of a wanton lover, a grave Preacher of mortification; I ſee him quenching thoſe inordinate flames with the teares of his repentance. Me thinkes I heare him ſighing deeply betwixt every word of that his ſolemne penance, which B he would needs enjoyne himſelfe before all the world. I have applyed my heart to know the wickedneſſe of folly, even the fooliſhneſſe of madneſſe; and I finde more bitter than death the woman whoſe heart is as nets and ſnares; and her hands as bands: Who ſo pleaſeth God ſhall be delivered from her, but the ſinner ſhall be taken by her.

Salomon was taken as a ſinner, delivered as a penitent. His ſoule eſcaped as a bird out of the ſnare of the fowlers; the ſnare was broken, & he delivered: It is good for us that he was both taken, and delivered; Taken, that we might not preſume; and that we might not deſpaire, delivered. He ſinned, that we might not ſinne; hee recovered, that we may not ſinke under our ſinne.

But, oh the juſtice of God inſeparable from his mercy; Salomons ſinne ſhall not e-ſcape the rod of men; Rather then ſo wiſe an offender ſhall want enemies, God ſhall C raiſe up three adverſaries unto Salomon; Hadad the Edomite, Bezon the King of Aram, Ieroboam the ſonne of Nebat; whereof two were foraine, one domeſticall: Nothing but love and peace founded in the name of Salomon; nothing elſe was found in his raigne, whiles he held in good termes with his God: But when once hee fell foule with his Maker, all things began to be troubled. There are whips laid up againſt the time of Salomons fore-ſeen offence, which are now brought forth for his correction. On purpoſe was Hadad the ſonne of the King of Edom hid in a corner of Egypt from the ſword of David and Ioab, that he might be reſerved for a ſcourge to the exorbitant ſonne of David: God would have us make account that our peace ends with our innocence: The ſame ſinne that ſets debate betwixt God and

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE IAMES LORD HAYE, BARON OF SALEY, Viſcount Doncaſter, Earle of Carlile, one of the Lords of his Majeſties moſt Honourable Privie Councell.

Right Honourable:

I Cannot but thus gratulate to you your happy return from your many & noble imployments; which have made you ſome yeares a ſtranger at home, and ſo renowned abroad, that all the better parts of Europe know and honour your name, no leſſe, then if you had been born theirs: Neyther is any of them ſo ſavage, as not to ſay, when they heare mention of your worth, that Vertue is a thouſand Eſcuchions.

If now your ſhort breathing-time may allow your Lordſhip the freedome of quiet and holy thoughts, caſt your eyes upon Iſrael and Iudah, upon the Kings and Prophets of both, in ſuch beneficiall variety as prophane Hiſtory ſhall promiſe in vaine. Your Lordſhip ſhall ſee Rehoboam following Salomon in nothing but his ſeat, and his fall; as much more wilfull then his Father, as leſſe wiſe; all head, no heart; loſing thoſe ten Tribes with a churliſh breath, whom hee would (and might not) recover with blood; Jeroboam as crafty, as wicked; plotting a revolt, creating a religion to his ſtate, marring Iſraelites to make ſubiects, branded in his name, ſmitten in his hand, in his loynes. You ſhall ſee a faithfull meſſenger of God, after miraculous proofe of his courage, fidelity, power, good nature, paying deare for a little circumſtance of credulous diſobedience; The Lyon is ſent to call for his blood, as the price of his forbidden harbour: You ſhall ſee the blinde Prophet deſcrying the diſguiſe of a Queene, the judgement of the King, the removall of a Prince, too good for Jeroboams heire. You ſhall ſee the right ſtocke of royall ſucceſſion flouriſhing in Aſa, whiles that true heire of David (though not without ſome blemiſhes of infirmity) inherits a perfect heart; purges his Kingdome of Sodomy, of Idolatry, not balking ſin even where he honoured nature. You ſhall ſee the wonder of Prophets, Elijah, opening and ſhutting heaven, as his private cheſt; catored for by the Ravens, nor leſſe miraculouſly catoring for the Sareptan, conteſting with Ahab, confronting the Baalites, ſpeaking both fire and water (from heaven) in one evening; meekly laquaying his Soveraigne, weakly flying from Jezebel, fed ſupernaturally by Angels, hid in the Rock of Horeb, confirmed by thoſe dreadfull apparitions, that had confounded ſome other; caſting his mantle upon his homely ſucceſſor, and by the touch of that garment, turning him from a ploughman, to a Prophet. But what do I with-hold your Lordſhip in the bare heads of this inſuing diſcourſe? In all theſe your piercing eyes ſhall eaſily ſee beyond mine, and make my thoughts but a ſtation for a further diſcovery. Your Lordſhips obſervation hath ſtudyed men, more then bookes; here it ſhall ſtudy God, more then men; That of bookes hath made you full, that of men, iudicious, this of God ſhall make you holy and happy: Hitherto ſhall ever tend the wiſhes and indevours of

in all faithfull obſervance,

Jos. Hall.

Rehoboam.

WHo would not but have looked that ſeven hundred wives, and three hundred concubines, ſhould have furniſhed Salomons Palace with choyce of heires, and have peopled Iſrael with royall iſſue? and now behold, Salomon hath by all theſe but one Son, and him by an Ammoniteſſe: Many a poore man hath an houſe-ful of children by one wife; whiles this great King hath but one ſon by many houſe-fulls of wives: Fertility is not from the meanes, but from the author: It was for Salomon that David ſung of old; Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord; and the fruit of the wombe is his reward: How oft doth God deny this heritage of heyres, where he gives the largeſt heritage of lands; and gives moſt of theſe living poſſeſſions, where he gives leaſt of the dead? that his bleſſings may be acknowledged free unto both; entailed upon neither.

As the greateſt perſons cannot give thēſelves children, ſo the wiſeſt cannot give their children wiſedome: Was it not of Rehoboam that Salomon ſaid; I hated all my labour which I had taken under the Sunne, becauſe I ſhould leave it unto the man that ſhall be after me, and who knoweth whether he ſhall be a wiſe man or a foole: Yet he ſhall rule over all my labour, wherein I have laboured, and ſhewed my ſelfe wiſe under the Sunne? All Iſrael found that Salomons wit was not propagated: Many a foole hath had a wiſer ſonne, then this wiſeſt father: Amongſt many ſonnes it is no newes to finde ſome one defective: Salomon hath but one ſon, and he no miracle of wiſdome: God gives purpoſely ſo eminent an inſtance, to teach men to looke up to heaven, both for heires and graces.

Salomon was both the King of Iſrael, and the father of Rehoboam, whē he was ſcarce out of his childhood; Rehoboam enters into the Kingdome at a ripe age, yet Salomon was the man, and Rehoboam the child: Age is no juſt meaſure of wiſdome: There are beardleſſe ſages, and gray-headed children: Not the ancient are wiſe, but the wiſe is ancient. Iſrael wanted not for thouſands that were wiſer then Rehoboam: Yet becauſe they knew him to bee the ſonne of Salomon, no man makes queſtion of his government: In the caſe of ſucceſſion into Kingdomes we may not looke into the qualities of the perſon, but into the right. So ſecure is Salomon of the peoples fidelity to Davids ſeed, that he followes not his fathers example in ſetting his ſonne by him, in his owne throne: here was no danger of a rivality to enforce it; no eminency in the ſon to merit it; It ſufficeth him to know that no bond can be ſurer then the naturall allegeance of ſubjects: I do not finde that the following Kings ſtood upon the confirmation of their people; but as thoſe that knew the way to their throne, aſcended their ſteps without aid; As yet the ſoveraignty of Davids houſe was greene, and unſetled; Iſrael therefore doth not now come to attend Rehoboam, but Rehoboam goes up to meet Israel. They come not to his Jerusalem, but he goes to their Shechem: To Shechem were all Israel come to make him King; If loyalty drew them together, why not rather to Jerusalem? there the majesty of his fathers Temple, the magnificence of his palace, the very stones in those walls, (besides the strength of his Guard) had pleaded strongly for their subjection; Shechem had beene many wayes fatall, was every way incommodious. It is an infinite helpe or disadvantage that arises from circumstances; the very place puts Israel in minde of a rebellion: There Abimelec had raised up his treacherous usurpation over, and against his brethren: There Gaol against Abimelec: There was Ioseph sold by his brethren: As if the very soile had beene stained with perfidiousnesse. The time is no lesse ill chosen; Rehoboam had ill counsell ere he bewrayed it: For had he speedily called up Israel, before Ieroboam could have beene sent for out of Egypt, he had found the way cleere: A little delay may leese a great deale of opportunity: What shall we say of both, but that misery is led in, by infatuation? A B

Had not Israel been somewhat predisposed to a mutiny, they had never sent into Egypt for such a spokesman as Ieroboam; a fugitive, a traytor to Salomon; long had that crafty conspirator lurked in a forraine Court: The alliances of Princes are not ever necessary bonds of friendship: The brother in law of Salomon harbours this snake in his bosome, and gives that heat, which is repaied with a sting to the posterity of so neere an allye: And now Salomons death calls him back to his native soile. That Israel would entertaine a rebell, it was an ill signe: worse yet, that they will countenance him; worst of all, that they would imploy him: Nothing doth more bewray evill intentions, then the choyce of vicious Agents. Those that meane well will not hazard either the successe, or credit of their actions upō offensive instruments: None but the sluttish will wipe their faces with foule clothes. Upright hearts would have said, as David did to God, so to his Anointed: Do not I hate them that hate thee? Yea I hate them with a perfect hatred. Ieroboams head had been a fit present to have been tendered unto their new King: and now instead thereof they tender themselves to Ieroboam, as the head of their faction. C

Had not Rehoboam wanted spirits, he had first (after Salomons example) done justice to his fathers traytor, & then have treated of mercy towards his subjects: The people soone found the weakenes of their new Soveraigne, else they durst not have spoken to him by so obnoxious a tongue: Thy father made our yoake grievous, make thou it lighter and we will serve thee; Doubtlesse the crafty head of Ieroboam was in this suit, which his mouth uttered in the name of Israel; nothing could have beene more subtill: It seemed a promise, it was a threat; that which seemed a supplication was a complaint: humility was but a vaile for discontentment; One hand held a paper, the other a sword: Had they said, Free us from Tributes, the capitulation had beene grosse, and strongly savouring of sedition: now they say Ease us, they professe his power to impose, and their willingnesse to yeeld, only craving favour in the weight of the imposition: If Rehoboam yeeld, he blemishes his father: If he deny, he indangers his Kingdome: His wilfulnesse shall seeme worthily to abandon his scepter, if he sticke at so reasonable a suit: Surely Israel came with a purpose to cavill: Ieroboam had secretly troubled these waters, that he might fish more gainfully: One male-content is enough to embroile a whole Kingdome. D E

How harshly must it needs sound in the eares of Rehoboam, that the first word he heares from his people, is a querulous challenge of his fathers government: Thy father made our yoke grievous: For ought I see, the suggestion was not more spightfull thē unjust: where was the weight of this yoke, the toile of these services? Here were none of the turmoiles of warre; no traynings, marchings, encampings, entrenchings, watchings, minings, sieges, fortifications; none of that tedious world of worke that attends hostility; Salomon had not his name for nought: All was calme during that long raigne: and if they had payed deare for their peace, they had no cause to complaine of an hard match; The warlike times of Saul and David had exhausted their blood together with their substance; what ingratitude was this to cry out of ease? Yea but that peace brought forth costly and labourious buildings: Gods house, and the

Kings,

Kings, the walls of Jeruſalem, Hazar, Megiddo, and Gezer, the Cities of ſtore, the Cities of defence, could not riſe without many a ſhoulder: True, but not of any Iſraelites; The remainders of Amorites, Hittites, PeriZZites, Hivites, and Iebuſites, were put to all the drudgery of theſe great works; the taſkes of Iſrael were eaſie, and ingenuous; free from ſervility, free frō painfulneſſe. But the charge was theirs, whoſe-ſoever was the labour: The diet of ſo endleſſe a retinue, the attendance of his Seraglio, the purveyance for his forty thouſand ſtables, the coſt of his ſacrifices, muſt needs weigh heavy; certainly, if it had layne on none but his owne. But wherefore went Salomons Navy every three yeares to Ophir? to what uſe ſerved the ſix hundred threeſcore and ſix Talents of Gold, that came in one yeare tō his Exchequer? Wherefore ſerved the large tributes of forraine nations? How did he make ſilver to be in Jeruſalem as ſtones if the exactions were ſo preſſive? The multitude is ever prone to picke quarrels with their Governors; and whom they feared alive, to cenſure dead; The benefits of ſo quiet and happy a raigne are paſt over in ſilence; the grevances are recounted with clamor: Who can hope that merit or greatneſſe can ſhield him from obloquie, when Salomon is traduced to his owne loynes?

The propoſition of Iſrael puts Rehoboam to a deliberation; Depart yee for three daies; then come againe to me: I heare no other word of his that argued wiſdome; Not to give ſudden reſolutions in caſes of importance was a point that might well beſeeme the ſon of Salomon: I wonder that he who had ſo much wit as to call for leiſure in his anſwer, ſhould ſhew ſo little wit in the improving of that leiſure, in the returne of that anſwer: Who cannot but hope well to ſee the gray heads of Salomons ſecret Councell called to Rehoboams Cabinet? As Counſellors, as ancient, as Salomons, they cānot chooſe but ſee the beſt the ſafeſt courſe for their new Soveraigne: They had learned of their old Maſter, that a ſoft anſwer appeaſeth wrath; wiſely therefore doe they adviſe him, If thou wilt be a ſervant to this people this day, and ſpeake good words to them they will be thy ſervants for ever: It was an eaſie condition; with one mouthfull of a breath to purchaſe an everlaſting homage: with one gentle motion of his tongue, to bind all peoples hearts to his allegeance for ever. Yet (as if the motion had been unfit) a new Councell Table is called: well might this people ſay; What will not Rehoboam grudge us, if he think much to give good words for a Kingdom. There is not more wiſdome in taking variety of advice, where the matter is doubtfull, then folly, when it is plaine: The young heads are conſulted; This very change argues weakneſſe; Some reaſon might be pleaded for paſſing from the younger Counſell to the aged; none, for the contrary: Age brings experience; and, it is a ſhame, if with the ancient be not wiſdome: Youth is commonly raſh, heady, inſolent, ungoverned, wedded to will, led by humour, a rebell to reaſon, a ſubject to paſſion, fitter to execute then to adviſe: Greene wood is ever ſhrinking & warping, whereas the welſeaſoning hold a conſtant firmneſſe: Many a life, many a ſoule, many a flouriſhing ſtate hath beene ruined by undiſciplined Monitors: Such were theſe of Rehoboam; whoſe great ſtomach tells them that this conditionating of Subjects, was no other then an affront to their new Maſter, and ſuggeſts to them, how unfit it is for Majeſty to brooke ſo ſawcy a treaty: how requiſite and Princely, to cruſh this preſumption in the egge: As ſcorning therefore to be braved by the baſe Vulgar, they put words of greatneſſe, and terror in their new Prince, My little finger ſhall be thicker then my fathers loynes; My father made your yoake heavy, I will adde to your yoake; My father hath chaſtiſed you with whips, I will chaſtiſe you with Scorpions. The very words have ſtings. Now muſt Iſrael needes thinke, How cruell will this mans hands bee, when he thus drawes blood with his tongue? Men are not wont to ſpeake out their worſt: who can endure the hopes of him that promiſeth tyranny? There can be no good uſe of an indefinite profeſſion of rigour and ſeverity; Feare is an unſafe guardian of any ſtate, much leſſe of an unſetled. Which was yet worſe, not the ſins of Iſrael were threatned, nor their purſes, but their perſons; neither had they deſired a remiſſion of juſtice, but of exactions; and now, they heare of nothing but burthens, and ſcourges, and Scorpions.

Here was a Prince and people well met; I do not find them ſenſible of ought, ſave

their

their owne profit; They do not say, Religion was corrupted in the shutting up of thy fathers dayes; Idolatry found the free favour of Priests, and Temples, and Sacrifices: Begin thy raigne with God; purge the Church, demolish those piles of abomination: abandon those Idol-mongers, restore devotion to her purity: They are all for their penny, for their ease: He on the other side, is all for his will, for an imperious Soveraignty; without any regard either of their reformation or satisfaction: They were worthy of load that cared for nothing but their backs; and he worthy of such subjects, who professed to affect their misery and torment.

Who would not but have looked any whither for the cause of this evill, rather then to heaven? yet, the holy God challenges it to himselfe: The cause was from the Lord, that he might performe this saying by Abijah, the Shilonite to Ieroboam: As sinne is a punishment of sinne, it is a part of justice: The holy One of Israel doth not abhorre to use even the grossest sins to his owne just purposes; whiles our wils are free to our owne choice, his decrees are as necessary, as just; Israel had forsaken the Lord, and worshipped Ashtaroth, the goddesse of the Zidonians, and Chemosh, and Milchom: God owes them and Salomon a whipping; The frowardnesse of Rehoboam shall pay it them; I see Ieroboams plot, the peoples insolence, the young mens misadvise, the Princes unreasonable austerity, meeting together (through the wise Providence of the Almighty) unwittingly to accomplish his most just decree: All these might have done otherwise for any force that was offered to their will; all would no more do otherwise, than if there had beene no predetermination in heaven; that God may be magnified in his wisdome, and justice, whiles man wittingly perisheth in his folly.

That three dayes expectation had warmed these smoaking Israelites, and made them ready for a combustion: upon so peremptory a resolution of rigour, the flame bursts out, which all the waters of the Well of Bethlehem could never quench: The furious multitude flyes out into a desperate revolt; What portion have we in David, nei-have we inheritance in the Son of Iesse: To your Tents O Israel; now, see to thine owne house David.

How durst these seditious mouthes mention David in defiance? One would have thought that very name had been able to have tempered their furie, & to have contained them within the limits obedience: It was the father of Rehoboam, and the son of David that had led Israel into Idolatry: Salomon hath drawne contempt upon his father and upon the son: If Israel have cast off their God, is it marvell that they shake off his anointed? Irreligion is the way to disobedience: There can be no true subjection but out of conscience: They cannot make conscience of civil duties, who make none of divine.

In vaine shal Rehoboam hope to prevaile by his Officer, when himselfe is rejected: The persons of Princes carry in them characters of Majesty; when their presence works not, how should that message? If Adoram sollicit the people too late w^th^ good words, they answer him with stones. Nothing is more untractable & violent, then an inraged multitude; It was time for Rehoboam to betake himselfe to his Charet; hee saw those stones were throwne at him, in his Adoram: As the messenger suffers for his Master, so the Master suffers in his messenger: Had Rehoboam beene in Adoram's clothes, this death had beene his: Onely flight can deliver him from those that might have beene subjects: Jerusalem must be his refuge against the conspiracy of Shechem.

Blessed be God for lawfull government: Even a mutinous body cannot want an head: If the rebellious Israelites have cast off their true Soveraigne, they must choose a false; Ieroboam the son of Nebat must be the man: He had need bee skilfull and fit sure, that shal back the horse which hath cast his Rider: Israel could not have any where met with more craft and courage, then they found in this Leader.

Rehoboam returnes to Jerusalem lighter by a crown then he went forth; Iudah and Benjamin stick still fast to their loyalty: the example of a generall rebellion cannot make them unfaithfull to the house of David: God will ever reserve a remnant free from the common contagion: Those Tribes, to approve their valour, no lesse then their fidelity, will fight against their brethren, for their Prince; and will hazard their lives to reduce the crown to the sonne of Salomon: An hundred and foureſcore thouſand of them are up in armes, ready to force Iſrael to their denied ſubjection: No noiſe ſounded on both parts but military; no man thought of any thing but blood; when ſuddenly God ſends his Prophet to forbid the battle: Shemaiah comes with a meſſage of ceſſation: Ye ſhall not goe up, nor fight againſt your brethren, the children of Iſrael, returne every man to his houſe, for this thing is from me, ſaith the Lord: The word of one ſilly Prophet diſmiſſes theſe mighty armies: He that would not lay down the threats of his rigour, upon the advice of his ancient Counſellors, will lay downe his ſword, upon the word of a Seer: Shall wee envy, or ſhame to ſee how much the Prophets of the old Teſtament could doe; how little thoſe of the new? If our commiſſion be no leſſe from the ſame God, the difference of ſucceſſe cannot goe away unrevenged.

There was yet ſome grace in Rehoboam, that he would not ſpurne againſt that which God challenged as his owne worke. Some Godleſſe Ruffian would have ſaid; Whoſoever is the Author, I wil be revēged on the inſtruments: Rehoboam hath learned this leſſon of his Grandfather, I held my peace, becauſe thou Lord haſt done it: If hee might ſtrive with the multitude, he knew it was no ſtriving with his Maker: quietly therefore doth he lay downe his armes, not daring after that prohibition, to ſeek the recovery of his kingdome by blood.

Where Gods purpoſes are hid from us, wee muſt take the faireſt wayes of all lawfull remedies; but where God hath revealed his determinations, wee muſt ſit downe in an humble ſubmiſſion; our ſtruggling may aggravate, cannot redreſſe our miſeries.

JEROBOAM.

AS there was no publike and univerſal conflict betwixt the ten Tribes, and the two, ſo no peace: Either King found reaſon to fortifie the borders of his owne territories: Shechem was worthy to be deare to Ieroboam; a City as of old ſeaſoned with many treaſons, ſo now auſpicious to his new uſurpation. The civill defection was ſoone followed by the ſpirituall: As there are neare reſpects betwixt God, and his Anointed, ſo there is great affinity betwixt treaſon and Idolatry: there is a connexion betwixt, Feare God, and Honor the King; and no leſſe betwixt the neglects of both: In vaine ſhall a man looke for faith in a miſ-religious heart.

Next to Achitophel, I do not find that Iſrael yeelded a craftier head thē Ieroboams, ſo hath he plotted this conſpiracie, that (what ever fall) there is no place for a challenge; not his owne intruſion, but Iſraels Election hath raiſed him to their Throne: neither is his cunning leſſe in holding a ſtolne Scepter: Thus he thinks in himſelfe: If Iſrael have made me their King; it is but a pang of diſcontentment; theſe violent thoughts will not laſt alwaies: ſudden fits have commonly ſudden recoveries; their returne to their loyalty ſhal forfeit my head together with my Crown: They cannot returne to God, and hold off from their lawfull Soveraigne? They cannot returne to Jeruſalem, and keep off from God, frō their loyalty: Thrice a yeere will their devotion call them up thither; beſides the exigence of their frequent vowes: How can they be mine, whiles that glorious Temple is in their eye; whiles the magnificence of the royall Palace of David and Salomon, ſhall admoniſh them of their native allegeance: whiles (beſides the ſollicitatiō of their brethren) the Prieſts and Levites ſhal preach to them the neceſſity of their due obedience, and the abominatiō of their ſacrifices in their wilfull diſobedience; whiles they ſhall (by their preſence) put themſelves upon the mercy, or juſtice of their lawfull, and forſaken Prince: Either therefore I muſt divert them from Jeruſalem, or elſe I cannot live and reigne. It is no diverting them by a direct reſtraint; ſuch prohibition would both endanger their utter diſtaſte, and whet their deſire to more eagerneſſe: I may change Religion, I may not inhibit inhibit it;ſo the people have a God,it ſufficeth them;they ſhall have ſo much formality as may content them: their zeale is not ſo ſharpe, but they can be well pleaſed with eaſe:I wil profer them both a more compendious,and more plauſible worſhip: Jeruſalem ſhall be ſupplied within mine own borders:naturally men love to ſee the objects of their devotion,I will therefore feed their eyes with two golden repreſentations of their God,nearer home; and what can be more proper then thoſe, which Aaron deviſed of old to humour Iſrael. A

Upon this peſtilent ground,Ieroboam ſets up two calves in Dan and Bethel,and perſwades the people; It is too much for you to go up to Ieruſalem, behold thy Gods O Iſrael, which brought thee out of the Land of Egypt. Oh the miſchiefe that comes of wicked infidelity:It was Gods Prophet that had rent Ieroboams garment into twelve pieces, and had given ten of them to him;in token of his ſharing the ten Tribes; who with the ſame breath alſo told him that the cauſe of this deſtraction was their Idolatry: Yet now will he inſtitute an Idolatrous ſervice for the holding together of them, whom their Idolatry had rent from their true Soveraigne to him:He ſayes not;God hath promiſed me this Kingdome, God hath conferd it, God ſhall find meanes to maintaine his owne act; I will obey him,let him diſpoſe of me: The God of Iſrael is wiſe and powerfull enough,to fetch about his owne deſignes:But, (as if the devices of men were ſtronger then Gods providence, and ordination) he will be working out his owne ends by prophane policies:Ieroboam being borne an Iſraelite, and bred in the Court of a Salomon, could not but know the expreſſe charge of God againſt the making of Images,againſt the erecting of any rivall altars, to that of Jeruſalem; yet now that he ſees both theſe may availe much to the advancing of his ambitious project,he ſets up thoſe Images,thoſe Altars: Wicked men care not to make bold with God in caſes of their owne commoditie:If the Lawes of their Maker lye in the way of their profit or promotion, they either ſpurne them out, or tread upon them at pleaſure:Aſpiring minds will know no God but honor:Iſrael ſojourned in Egypt, and brought home a golden calfe: Ieroboam ſojournes there,and brought home two; It is hard to dwell in Egypt untainted; not to ſavour of the ſins of the place we live in,is no leſſe ſtrange, then for wholeſome liquor tunned up in a muſty veſſell, not to ſmell of the caſk: The beſt body may be infected in a contagious ayre: Let him beware of Egypt that would be free from Idolatry. B

No ſooner are Ieroboams calves up,then Iſrael is down on their knees: their worſhip followes immediately upon the erection:How eaſily is the unſtable vulgar caried into whatſoever religion of authority?The weather-cocke will looke which way ſoever the wind blowes: It is no marvell if his Subjects be brutiſh,who hath made a calfe his god. C

Every acceſſary to ſin is filthy,but the firſt authors of ſin are abominable: How is Ieroboam branded in every of theſe ſacred leaves? How doe all ages ring of his fact, with the accent of diſhonour,and indignation: Ieroboam the ſon of Nebat,that made Iſrael to ſin? It was a ſhame for Iſrael that it could be made to ſin by a Ieroboam: but, O curſed name of Ieroboam that would draw Iſrael to ſin;The followers and abettors of evill are worthy of torment, but no hell is too deepe for the leaders of publique wicked neſſe. D

Religion is cloathed with many requiſite circumſtances: As a new King would have a new god; ſo that new God muſt have new Temples, Altars,Services,Prieſts, Solemnities: All theſe hath: Ieroboam inſtituted; all theſe hath he caſt in the ſame mold with his golden calves: Falſe devotion doth not more croſſe, then imitate the true. Satan is no leſſe a counterfet then an enemy of God: He knows it more eaſie to adulterate religion,then to aboliſh it. E

That which God ordained for the avoidance of Idolatry, is made the occaſion of it;a limitation of his holy ſervices to Jeruſalem: How miſchievouſly do wicked men pervert the wholeſome inſtitutions of God to their ſin,to their bane!

Ieroboam could not be ignorant how fearfully this very act was revenged upon Iſrael in the wilderneſſe;yet he dares renew it in Dan and Bethel: No example of judgment can affright wilfull offenders.

It

It is not the metall that makes their gods, but the worship; the sacrifices. What sacrifices could there be without Priests? No religion could ever want sacred Masters of Divine ceremonies: Gods Clergy was select and honourable; branches of the holy stemme of Aaron; Ieroboam rakes up his Priests out of the channell of the multitude; all Tribes, all persons were good enough for his spurious devotion; Leaden Priests are well fitted to golden Deities. Religion receives either much honour, or blemish, by the quality of those that serve at her Altars: Wee are not worthy to professe our selves servants of the True God, if wee doe not hold his service worthy of the best.

Ieroboams Calves must have sacrifices, must have solemne festivities; though in a day, and moneth of his owne devising: In vaine shall we pretend to worship a god, if we grudge him the just dayes, and rites of his worship.

It is strange that he who thought the dregs of the vulgar good enough for that Priesthood, would grace those gods by acting their Priest himselfe: and yet behold where the new King of Israel stands before his new Altar, with a Scepter in one hand and a Censer in the other, ready to sacrifice to his new gods; when the man of God comes from Iuda, with a message of judgement: Oh desperate condition of Israel, that was so far gone with impiety, that it yeelded not one faithfull monitor to Ieroboam: The time was, that the erecting of but a new altar (for memory, for monument) on the other side of Iordan, bred a challenge to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasses; and had cost much Israelitish blood, if the quarrelled Tribes had not given a seasonable and pious satisfaction; and now, lo, how the stronger stomach of degenerated Israel can digest new Altars, new Temples, new gods: What a difference there is betwixt a Church and Kingdome newly breathing from affliction, and setled upon the lees of a mis-used peace?

But oh the patience, and mercy of our long suffering God, that will not strike a very Ieroboam unwarned: Judgement hovers over the heads of sinners, ere it light: if Israel afford not a bold reprover of Ieroboam, Iuda shall: When the King of Israel is in all the height both of his State, and superstition, honouring his solemne day with his richest devotion, steps forth a Prophet of God, and interrupts that glorious service, with a loud inclamation of judgement. Doubtlesse the man wanted not wit to know what displeasure, what danger must needs follow so unwelcome a message: yet dares hee (upon the commission of God) doe this affront to an Idolatrous King, in the middest of all his awfull magnificence. The Prophets of God goe upon many a thankelesse errand: He is no messenger for God that either knowes, or feares the faces of men.

It was the Altar, not the person of Ieroboam, which the Prophet thus threatens; Yet not the stones are stricken, but the founder, in both their apprehensions: So deare are the devices of our own braine to us, as if they were incorporated into our selves; There is no opposition whereof we are so sensible, as that of religion.

That the royall Altar should be thus polluted by dead mens bones, and the blood of the Priests; was not more unpleasing, than that all this should be done by a childe of the house of David; for Ieroboam well saw that the throne and the altar must stand, or fall together; that a son of David could not have such power over the Altar, without an utter subversion of the government, of the succession; therefore is he thus galled with this comminatory prediction: The rebellious people who had said, What portion have we in David, heare now, that David will perforce have a portion in them and might well see, what beasts they had made themselves, in worshipping the image of a beast; and sacrificing to such a god, as could not preserve his owne Altar from violation and ruine.

All this while I doe not see this zealous Prophet laying his hand to the demolition of this Idolatrous Altar; or threatning a knife to the Author of this depravation of religion; Only his tongue smites both; not with foule, but sharpe words, of menace not of reproach: It was for Iosias a King, to shed the blood of those sacrificers, to deface those Altars: Prophets are for the tongue, Princes for the hand; Prophets must onely denounce judgement, Princes execute.

Future things are present to the Eternall: It was some two hundred and sixty years ere this prophecy should be fulfilled; yet the man of God speaks of it as now in acting. What are some Centuries of years to the Ancient of dayes? How slow, and yet how sure is the pace of Gods revenge? It is not in the power of time to frustrate Gods determinations; There is no lesse justice, nor severity in a delayed punishment.

What a perfect Record there is of all names in the roll of Heaven; before they be, after they are past? what ever seeming contingency there is in their imposition, yet they fall under the certainty of a decree, and are better knowne in heaven, ere they be, than on earth whiles they are. He that knowes what names we shall all have, before we or the world have a being, doth not oft reveale this peece of his knowledge to his creature; here he doth, naming the man that should be two hundred yeares after; for more assurance of the event, that Israel may say, this man speakes from a God who knows what shall be: There cannot be a more sure evidence of a true Godhead, than the foreknowledge of those things, whose causes have yet no hope of being; But because the proofe of this prediction was no more certaine, than remote; a present demonstration shall convince the future; The Altar shall rend in peeces, the ashes shall be scattered: How amazedly must the seduced Israelites needes looke upon this miracle; and why doe they not think with themselves; whiles these stones rend, why are our hearts whole? Of what an over-ruling power is the God whom we have forsaken, that can thus teare the Altars of his corrivalls? How shall we stand before his vengeance, when the very stones break at the word of his Prophet? Perhaps, some beholders were thus affected: but Ieroboam, whom it most cōcerned, instead of bowing his knees for humiliation, stretcheth forth his hand for revenge, and cryes, Lay hold on him. Resolute wickednesse is impatient of a reproofe, & instead of yeelding to the voice of God, rebelleth: Just and discreet reprehension doth not more reforme some sinners, than exasperate others.

How easie it is for God to coole the courage of proud Ieroboam? The hand which his rage stretches out, dryes up, and cannot be pulled backe againe: and now stands the King of Israel like some anticke statue, in a posture of impotent endeavour; so disabled to the hurt of the Prophet, that he cannot command that peece of himself; What are the great potentates of the world, in the powerfull hand of the Almighty? Tyrants cannot be so harmefull as they are malicious.

The strongest heart may be brought down with affliction; Now the stout stomach of Ieroboam is fallen to an humble deprecation, Intreat now the face of the Lord thy God, and pray for me, that my hand may bee restored mee againe. It must needes bee a great streight that could drive a proud heart to begge mercy, where he bent his persecution: so doth Ieroboam, holding it no scorne to be beholden to an enemy: In extremities, the worst men can be content to sue for favour, where they have spent their malice.

It well becomes the Prophets of God to be mercifull: I doe not see this Seer to stand upon termes of exprobration, and overly contestations with Ieroboam, to say, Thine intentions to me were cruell; Had thine hand prevailed, I should have sued to thee in vaine: Continue ever a spectacle of the fearefull justice of thy Maker, whom thou hast provoked by thine Idolatry, whom thou wouldst have smitten in my persecution: but he meekly sues for Ieroboams release: and (that God might abundantly magnifie both his power and mercy) is heard and answered with successe: We doe no whit savour of heaven, if we have not learned to doe good for evill.

When both winde and Sunne, the blasts of judgement, and the beames of favour met together to worke upon Ieroboam, who would not looke that hee should have cast off this cumbrous, and mis-beseeming cloake of his Idolatry; and have said, Lord thou hast stricken me in justice, thou hast healed me in mercy; I will provoke thee no more. This hand which thou hast restored shall bee consecrated to thee in pulling downe these bold abominations: Yet now, behold he goes on in his old courses, and, as if God had neither done him good nor evill, lives, and dyes idolatrous: No stone is more hard or insensate than a sinfull heart: The changes of judgement and mercy doe but obdure it, instead of meltings.

The

The seduced Prophet.

Eroboams hand is amended, his soule is not; that continues still dry, and inflexible; yet whiles he is unthankfull to the Author of his recovery, he is thankful to the instrument: he kindely invites the Prophet, whom he had threatned, and will remunerate him whom he endeavoured to punish: The worst men may be sensible of bodily favours: Civill respects may well stand with gracelessenesse: Many a one would be liberall of their purses, if they might be allowed to be niggardly of their obedience.

As God, so his Prophet cares not for these waste courtesies, where he sees maine duties neglected: More piety would have done well, with lesse complement: The man of God returnes a blunt and peremptory deniall to so bounteous an offer: If thou wilt give me halfe thine house, I will not goe in with thee, neither will I eate bread or drinke water in this place. Kindnesse is more safely done to an Idolater, than taken from him; that which is done to him obligeth him, that which is taken from him obligeth us: his obligation to us may be occasion of his good, our obligation to him may occasion our hurt; the surest way is to keep aloofe from the infectiously wicked.

The Prophet is not uncivill, to reject the favour of a Prince without some reason: He yeelds no reason of his refusall but the command of his God: God hath charged him, Eate no bread, nor drinke no water, nor turne againe by the same way that thou camest: It is not for a Prophet to plead humane, or carnall grounds for the actions of his function: He may not move but upon a divine warrant: would this Seer have lookt with the eyes of flesh and blood, he might have found many arguments of his yeeldance. He is a King that invites me; his reward, by enriching mee, may benefit many: and who knowes how much my further conversation may prevaile to reform him? how can he be but well prepared for good counsell by a miraculous cure? how gainfully should my receit of a temporall courtesie be exchanged with a spirituall to him? all Israel will follow him either into Idolatry, or reformation; which way can be devised of doing so great service to God and the Church, as by reclaiming him: what can yeeld so great likelihood of his reclamation, as the opportunity of my further entirenesse with him? But the Prophet dares not argue cases, where hee had a command; what ever become of Ieroboam, and Israel, God must be obeyed; Neither profit, nor hopes may carie us crosse to the word of our Maker. How safe had this Seer beene, if he had kept him ever upon this sure ward; which he no sooner leaves, then he miscaries.

So deeply doth God detest Idolatry, that he forbids his Prophet to eat the bread, to drinke the water of a people infected with this sinne; yea to tread in those very steps which their feet have touched. If this inhibition were personall, yet the grounds of it are common. No pestilence should be more shunned than the conversation of the misreligious, or openly scandalous: It is no thanke to us if their familiarity doe not enfeoffe us of their wickednesse.

I know not what to thinke of an old Prophet that dwels in Bethel, within the aire of Ieroboams Idol, within the noise of his sacrifices; that lives where the man of God dares not eate; that permitted his sonnes to be present at that Idolatrous service: If he were a Prophet of God, what did he now in Bethel? why did he winke at the sin of Ieroboam? what needed a Seer to come out of Iuda, for the reproofe of that sinne, which was acted under his nose? why did he lye? why did his family partake with Idolaters? If he were not a Prophet of God; how had he true visions, how had he true messages from God: why did he second the menacing word of that Prophet, whom he seduced? why did he desire that his owne bones might be honoured with his Sepulcher? Doubtlesse he was a Prophet of God, but corrupt, restie, vicious: Prophecy doth not alwayes presuppose sanctification; many a one hath had visions from God, who shall never enjoy the vision of God. A very Balaam in his extasies, hath so cleare a Revelation of the Messiah to come, as scarce ever any of the holiest Prophets; yea, his very Asse hath both her mouth miraculously opened, and her eyes; to see and notifie that Angell, which was hid from her Master: Yea, Satan himselfe sometimes receives notice from God of his future actions, which else that evill Spirit could neither foretell, nor foresee. These kindes of graces are both rare, and common: rare, in that they are seldome given to any: common, in that they are indifferently given to the evill, and to the good: A little holinesse is worth much illumination.

Whether out of envy, to heare that said by the Seer of Iuda, which he either knew not or smothered; to heare that done by another, which he could not have effected, and could not choose but admire: or whether out of desire to make tryall of the fidelity of so powerfull a Messenger, the old Prophet hastens to overtake, to recal that man of God, who had so defyed his Bethel; whom he finds sitting faint & weary under an Oake, in the way; taking the benefit of that shade which he hated to receive from those contagious groves that he had left behind him: His habit easily bewrayed him, to a man of his owne trade: neither doth his tongue spare to professe himself. The old Prophet of Bethel invites him to returne, to a repast: and is answered with the same words, wherewith Ieroboams offer was repelled; The man of God varies not a syllable from his message: It concernes us to take good heed of our charge, when we goe on Gods errand. A deniall doth but invite the importunate; what hee cannot doe by entreaty, the old man tries to doe by perswasion, I am a Prophet also as thou art, and an Angell spake to me, by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him backe with thee into thine house, that he may eate bread, and drinke water: There is no tentation so dangerous, as that which comes shrouded under a vaile of holinesse, and pretends authoritie of God himselfe: Ieroboam threatens, the Prophet stands undanted; Ieroboam fawnes, and promises, the Prophet holds constant, now comes a gray-headed Seer, and pleads a counter-message from God, the Prophet yeelds, and transgresses. Satan may affright us as a fiend, but he seduces us as an Angell of light.

Who would have lookt for a lyer under hoary haires, and an holy mantle? who would not have trusted that gravity, when there was no colour of any gaine in the untruth? Nothing is so apt to deceive as the faireſt semblances, as the sweeteſt words. We cannot erre if we beleeve not the speech for the person, but the person for the speech: Well might this man of God thinke, an aged man, a Prophet, an old Prophet will not (sure) bely God unto a Prophet; No man will forge a lye, but for an advantage; What can this man gaine by this match, but the entertainment of an unprofitable gueſt: Perhaps though God will not allow me to feast with Ieroboam, yet pitying my faintnesse, he may allow me to eate with a Prophet: Perhaps now that I have approved my fidelity in refusing the bread of Bethel, God thinks good to send me a gracious release of that strict charge: Why should I think that Gods revelations are not as free to others, as to me? and if this Prophet have received a countermand from an Angell of God, how shall I not disobey God, if I doe not follow him?

Upon this ground he returnes with this deceitfull hoſt, and when the meat was now in his mouth, receives the true message of death, frō the same lips that brought him the false message of his invitation; Thus saith the Lord, for as much as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and hast not kept the commandement of the Lord thy God, but cameſt back and hast eaten bread, and drunke water in the place forbidden thee, thy carkasse shall not come to the Sepulcher of thy fathers. Oh wofull Prophet, when he lookes on his hoſt he sees his executioner, whiles he is feeding of his body, he heares of his carkasse; at the table, he heares of his denied Sepulcher; and all this, for eating and drinking where he was forbidden by God, though bidden as from God: The violation of the leaſt charge of a God is mortall: No pretences can warrant the transgression of a divine command: A word from God is pleaded on both sides: The one was received immediatly from God, the other related mediately by man: One the Prophet was sure of, the other was questionable: A sure word of God may not be left for an uncertaine: An expresse charge of the Almighty admitteth not of any check: His will is but one, as himselfe is; and therefore it is out of the danger of contradiction.

Me thinks I see the man of God change countenance at this sharpe sauce of his pleasing morsels; his face before-hand is died with the palenes of death: me thinks I heare

A heare him urging many unkinde expostulations with his injurious host; who yet dismisses him better provided for the ease of his journey, then he found him. Perhaps, this officiousnesse was out of desire to make some amends for this late seducement. It is a poore recompence when he hath betrayed his life, and wronged the soule, to cast some courtesies upon the body.

The old Bethelite that had taken paines to come, and fetch the man of God into sin, will not now goe back with him to accompany his departure: Doubtlesse he was afraid to be inwrapped in the judgement, which he saw hanged over that obnoxious head: Thus the mischievous guides of wickednesse leave a man, when they have led him to his bane; as familiar Devils forsake their Witches, when they have brought them once into fetters.

B The man of God returnes alone, carefull (no doubt) and pensive for his offence, when a Lion out of the wood meets him, assaults him, kils him: Oh the just and severe judgements of the Almighty, who hath brought this fierce beast out of his wild ranges, into the high way, to bee the executioner of his offending servant: Doubtlesse this Prophet was a man of great holinesse, of singular fidelity, else he durst not have been Gods Herald to carry a message of defiance to Ieroboam, King of Israel, in the midst of all his royall magnificence; yet now, for varying from but a circumstance of Gods command (though upon the suggestion of a divine warrant) is given for a prey to the Lion: Our interest in God, is so farre from excusing our sin, that it aggravates it; Of all others the sin of a Prophet shall not passe unrevenged.

C The very wild beasts are led by a providence; Their wise and powerfull Creator knowes how to serve himselfe of them. The Lions guard one Prophet, kill another, according to the commission received from their Maker: What sinner can hope to escape unpunished, when every creature of God is ready to be an avenger of evill? The beasts of the field were made to serve us, we to serve our Creator: When we forsake our homage to him that made us, it is no marvell if the beasts forget their duty to us, and deale with us not as Masters, but as rebels: When an holy man buyes so dearely such a sleight frailty, of a credulous mistaking; what shall become of our hainous and presumptuous sinnes?

D I cannot think but this Prophet died in the favour of God, though by the teeth of the Lion; His life was forfaited for example, his soule was safe: Yea his very carkasse was left though torne, yet faire after those deadly graspes; as if God had said, I will onely take thy breath from thee, as the penalty of thy disobedience; a Lion shall doe that which an apoplexie, or fever might doe: I owe thee no further revenge then may be satisfied with thy blood.

Violent events doe not alwayes argue the anger of God; Even death it selfe is, to his servants, a fatherly castigation.

But oh the unsearchable wayes of the Almighty! The man of God sinnes, and dies speedily: the lying Prophet that seduced him, survives; Yea wicked Ieroboam enjoyes his Idolatry, and treads upon the grave of his reprover: There is neither favour in the delay of stripes, nor displeasure in the hast; Rather whom God loves, he chastises, as sharply, so speedily; whiles the rest prosper to condemnation: Even the rod of a loving father may draw blood: How much happier is it for us that we die now, to live

E for ever, then that we live a while, to die ever?

Had this Lion set upon the Prophet for hunger, why did he not devoure as well as kill him? Why did he not rather kill the beast than the man? since wee know the nature of the Lion such, that he is not wont to assaile man, save in the extremwant of other prey. Certainly the same power that imployed those fangs, restrained them, that the world might see, it was not appetite that provoked the beast to this violēce but the over-ruling command of God: Even so, O Lord, thy powerfull hand is over that roaring Lion, that goes about continually, seeking whō he may devoure? thine hand with-holds him, that though he may shed the blood of thine elect, yet he cannot hurt their soules; and whiles he doth those things which thou permittest, and ordereſt to thy just ends, yet he cannot doe lesser things, which he desireth, and thou permittest not.

The fierce beaſt ſtands by the carkaſſe; as to avow his owne act, & to tell who ſent him: ſo to preſerve that body, which he hath ſlaine: Oh wonderfull worke of God, the Executioner is turned Guardian: and (as the Officer of the higheſt) commands all other creatures to ſtand aloofe from his charge: and commands the feareful Aſſe, that brought this burthen thither, not to ſtirre thence, but ſtand ready preſt, to recary it to the Sepulcher: and now, when he hath ſufficiently witneſſed to all paſſengers, that this act was not done upō his own hunger, but upon the quarrel of his Maker, he delivers up his charge to that old Prophet; who was no leſſe guilty of this blood than himſelf.

This old Seducer hath ſo much truth, as both to give a right Commentary upon Gods intention, in this act, for the terrour of the diſobedient; and to give his voice to the certainty of that future judgement, which his late gueſt had threatned to Iſrael: (ſometimes it pleaſeth the wiſdome of God to expreſſe and juſtifie himſelfe even by the tongnes of faulty inſtruments.) Withall, he hath ſo much faith and courage, as to fetch that carkaſſe from the Lion; ſo much pitty and compaſſion, as to weepe for the man of God, to interre him in his owne Sepulcher; ſo much love, as to wiſh himſelfe joyned in death, to that body, which he had haſtened unto death: It is hard to find a man abſolutely wicked: Some grace will bewray it ſelfe in the moſt forſaken breſts.

It is a cruel courteſie to kill a man, and then to help him to his grave; to betray a man with our breath and then to bedew him with our teares: The Prophet had needed no ſuch friend, if he had not met with ſuch an enemy: The mercies of the wicked are cruell.

Jeroboams Wife.

IT is no meaſuring of Gods favour by the line of outward welfare: Ieroboam the idolatrous uſurper of Iſrael proſpers better, then the true heirs of David; He lives to ſee three ſucceſſions in the throne of Iudah; Thus the Ivy lives, when the Oak is dead. Yet could not that miſ-gottē crown of his, keep his head alwaies from aching: He hath his croſſes too: God whips ſometimes more than his own: His enemies ſmart from him, as well as his children: his children in love, his enemies in judgement: Not ſimply the rod argues love, but the temper of the hand, that weelds it, and the back that feeles it: Firſt Ieroboams hand was ſtriken, now his Sonne: Abijah the eldeſt, the beſt ſon of Ieroboam, is ſmitten with ſickneſſe: As children are but the pieces of their Parents in another ſkin, ſo Parents are no leſſe ſtriken in their children, than in their natural lims; Ieroboam doth not more feele his arme, than his ſonne: not wicked men onely, but beaſts may have naturall affections: It is no thanke to any creature, to love his owne.

Nature wrought in Ieroboam, not grace: He is enough troubled with his ſons diſeaſe, no whit bettered: I would have heard him ſay; God followes me with his afflictions, it is for mine impiety: what other meaſure can I expect from his Juſtice? Whiles mine Idols ſtand, how can I look that my houſe ſhould proſper? I will turne from my wickednes, O God, turne thou from thy wrath; Theſe thoughts were too good for that obdured heart: his ſon is ſick, he is ſorrowfull; but (as an amazed man ſeeks to go forth at the wrong doore) his diſtraction ſends him to a falſe help: He thinks not of God, he thinks of his Prophet: He thinks of the Prophet that had foretold him he ſhould be a King; he thinks not of the God of that Prophet who made him a King: It is the property of a carnall heart to confine both his Obligations, and his hopes to the meanes neglecting the Author of good. Vaine is the reſpect that is given to the ſervant, where the Maſter is contemned.

Extremity drawes Ieroboams thoughts to the Prophet; whom elſe he had not cared to remember. The King of Iſrael had Divines enough of his own: Elſe, he muſt needs have thought thē miſerable gods that were not worth a Prophet: And beſides, there was an old Prophet (if he yet ſurvived) dwelling within the ſmoak of his Palace, whoſe viſions had been too well approved: why would Ieroboam ſend ſo farre to an Abijah? Certainly, his heart deſpiſed thoſe baſe prieſts of his high places, neither could hee truſt

A truſt either to the gods, or the Clergy of his own making: His conſcience reſts upon the fidelity of that man, whoſe doctrine he had forſakē: How did this Idolater ſtrive againſt his own heart, whiles he inwardly deſpiſed thoſe, whom he profeſſed to honour; and inwardly honoured them, whom he profeſſed to deſpiſe? Wicked breaſts are falſe to themſelves; neither truſting to their owne choyce, nor making choice of that, which they may dare to truſt. They will ſet a good face upon their ſecretly unpleaſing ſins, and had rather be ſelfe-condemned, then wiſe and penitent: As for that old Seer, it is like Ieroboam knew his ſkill, but doubted of his ſincerity; that man was too much his neighbour to be good: Abijahs truth had beene tryed in a caſe of his owne: He whoſe word was found juſt in the prediction of his Kingdome, was well worthy of credit in the newes of his ſon: Experience is a great encouragement of our truſt: It is a good matter to be faithfull; this loadſtone of our fidelity ſhal B draw to us even hearts of iron, and hold them to our reliance: As contrarily deceit doth both argue, & make a bankrupt; who can truſt where he is diſappointed? O God, ſo oft, ſo ever, have we found thee true in all thy promiſes, in all thy performances, that if we doe not ſeek thee, if we doe not truſt thee in the ſequell, wee are worthy of our loſſe, worthy of thy deſertions.

Yet I do not ſee that Ieroboam ſends to the Prophet for his aid, but for intelligence: Curioſity is guilty of this meſſage, and not devotion; he cals not for the prayers, not for the benediction of that holy man, but for meere information of the event. He wel ſaw what the prayers of a Prophet could do: That which cured his hand, might it not have cured his ſon? Yet he that ſaid to a man of God, Intreat the face of the Lord thy God, that he may reſtore my hand: ſayes not now in his meſſage, to Abijah, Intreat thy C God to reſtore my Son: Sinne makes ſuch a ſtrangneſſe betwixt God and man, that the guilty heart either thinkes not of ſuing to God or feares it: What a poore contentment it was to foreknow that evill which he could not avoid, and whoſe notice could but haſten his miſery? Yet, thus fond is our reſtleſſe curioſity, that it ſeekes eaſe in the drawing on of torment: He is worthy of ſorrow that will not ſtay till it comes to him, but goes to fetch it.

Whom doth Ieroboam ſend on this meſſage, but his wife, and how but diſguiſed? Why her, and why thus? Neither durſt he truſt this errand with another, nor with her in her own form: It was a ſecret that Ieroboam ſends to a Prophet of God; none might know it but his own boſome, and ſhe that lay in it; if this had been noiſed in D Iſrael, the example had been dangerous: Who would not have ſaid, the King is glad to leave his counterfeit deities: and ſeek to the true: Why ſhould we adhere to them whom he forſakes? As the meſſage muſt not bee known to the people: ſo ſhee that beares it muſt not be known to the Prophet, her name, her habit muſt be changed: ſhe muſt put off her robes, and put on a ruſſet coat; ſhe muſt put off the Queene, and put on the peaſant: inſtead of her Scepter, ſhe muſt take up a baſket, and go a maſked pilgrimage to Shiloh: Oh the fondnes of vaine men that think to juggle with the Almighty, and to hide their counſels from that al-ſeeing eye! If this change of habit were neceſſary at Bethel, yet what needs it at Shiloh; though ſhe would hide her face from her ſubjects, yet why ſhould ſhe not pull off her muffler, and ſhew her ſelfe to the Prophet? Certainly, what policy began guiltineſſe muſt continue: Well might ſhe E think, there can be no good anſwer expected of the wife of Ieroboam; my preſence will do no leſſe, then ſolicit a reproofe: No Prophet can ſpeak well to the conſort of a founder of Idolatry; I may perhaps heare good as another, though as my ſelfe I can look for nothing, but tydings of evill: Wicked hearts know they deſerve ill at Gods hands, and therefore they doe all they can to avoid the eyes of his diſpleaſed juſtice and if they cannot do it by colours of diſſimulation, they will doe it by imploration of ſhelter; they ſhall ſay to the Rocks, Fall on us, and cover us.

But oh the groſſe folly mixt with the craft of wickednes! could Ieroboam think that the Prophet could know the event of his ſons diſeaſe, and did he think that he could not know the diſguiſe of his Wife? the one was preſent, the other future; this was but wrapt in a clout, that event was wrapt up in the coũſel of God. Yet this politik head preſumes that the greater ſhall be revealed, where the leſſer ſhall be hid: There was never never wicked man that was not infatuate, and in nothing more than in those things wherein he hoped most to transcend the reach of others. A

Abijah shunning the iniquity of the times, was retired to a solitary corner of Shilob; no place could be too private for an honest Prophet, in so extreme depravednes: Yet even there doth the King of Israel take notice of his reclusion, and sends his wife to that poore cell, laden with presents; presents that dissembled their bearer: had shee offered jewels, or gold, her greatnesse had been suspected: now she brings loaves and cracknels, and hony, her hand answers her back: She gives as she seemes, not as she is: Something she must give, even when she acts the poorest client.

The Prophets of God were not wont to have empty visitations: they who hated bribes, yet refused not tokens of gratitude: Yea the God of heaven who neither needs our goods, nor is capable of our gratifications, yet would have no man to come to him gift-lesse: Woe to those sacrilegious hands, that instead of bringing to the Prophets carie from them. B

Ieroboam was a bad man, yet, as he had a towardly son, so he had an obedient wife; else she had not wanted excuses to turne off both the journey, & the disguise; against the disguise she had pleaded the unbeseemingnesse for her person and state; against the journey, the perils of so long & solitary a walk; perhaps a Lion might be in the way; the Lion that tore the Prophet in peices; perhaps robbers; or if not they, perhaps her chastity might bee in danger: an unguarded solitarinesse in the weaker sexe might be a provocation to some forced uncleannes: she casts off all these shifting projectiõs of feare, according to the will of her husband, she changes her raiment, she sets upon the journey, and overcomes it: What needed this disguise to an old Prophet whose dim eyes were set with age? All cloathes, all faces were alike to a blinde Seer: The visiõs of Abijah were inward; neither was his bodily sight more dusky, than the eyes of his mind were cleare & piercing: It was not the common light of men wherby he saw, but divine illumination; things absent, things future, were no lesse obvious to those spirituall beames, then present things are to us: Ere the quicke eyes of that great Lady can discern him, he hath espied her; & as soone as he heares the sound of her feet, she heares from him the sound of her name, Come in thou Wife of Jeroboam: How God laughes in heaven at the frivolous fetches of crafty politicians, and when they think thẽselves most sure, shames them with a detection, with a defeat? What an idlenes it is for foolish Hypocrites to hope they can dãce in a net unseen of heavẽ. C

Never before was this Queen troubled to heare of her selfe; now she is: her very name struck her with astonishment; and prepares her for the assured horrour of following judgements, I am sent to thee with heavy tidings; Goe tell Jeroboam: Thus saith the Lord God of Israel. Could this Lady lesse wonder at the mercy of this stile of God, then trẽble at the sequel of his justice? Lo Israel hath forsakẽ God, yet God stil ownes Israel Israel had gone a whoring, yet God hath not divorced her: O the infinit goodnes of our long suffering God, whom our fouleſt sins cannot rob of his compassions. D

By how much dearer Israel was to God, so much more odious is Ieroboam that hath marred Israel: Terrible is that vengeance which God thunders against him by his Prophet whose passionate message upbraids him with his promotiõs, chargeth him with his sins, and lastly denounceth his judgements: No mouth was fitter to cast this royalty in the teeth of Ieroboam, then that, by which it was first foretold, fore-promised: Every circumstance of the advancement aggravates the sin, I exalted thee: Thou couldest not rise to honour alone. I exalted thee from among the people: not from the Peers; thy rank was but common, before this rise: I exalted thee from among the people to be a Prince; subordinate height was not enough for thee, no seat would serve thee but a throne; Yea to be a Prince of my people Israel: No Nation was for thee, but my chosen one; none but my royall inheritance: Neither did I raise thee into a vacant throne: a forlorne and forsaken Principality might be thankleſse: but I rent the Kingdome away from another for thy sake, yea from what other but the grandchild of David? out of his hands did I wrest the Scepter, to give it into thine: Oh what high favours doth God sometimes cast away upon unworthy subjects? How doe his abused bounties double both their sinne and judgement. E

A The ſinnes of his Prince were no leſſe eminent than his obligations, therefore his judgements ſhall be no leſſe eminent than his ſinnes: How bitterly doth God expreſſe that, which ſhall be more bitter in the execution: Behold, I will bring evill upon the houſe of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam, him that piſſeth againſt the wall; and him that is ſhut up, and left in Iſrael, and will take away the remnant of the houſe of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone: Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the City ſhall the dogs eate, and him that dieth in the field, ſhall the fowles of the ayre eate: Oh heavy loade that this diſguiſed Princeſſe muſt carie to her Huſband; but becauſe theſe evils, though grievous, yet might be remote, therefore for a preſent hanſell of vengeance, ſhe is diſmiſſed with the ſad tydings, of the death of her ſonne; When thy feet enter into the City, the Childe ſhall dye: It is heavy newes for a mother that ſhe B muſt leeſe her ſonne, but worſe yet that ſhe may not ſee him; In theſe caſes of our finall departures, our preſence gives ſome mitigation to our griefe: might ſhe but have cloſed the eyes, and have received the laſt breath of her dying ſonne, the loſſe had beene more tolerable; I know not how our perſonall farewell eaſes our heart even whiles it increaſes our paſſion; but now ſhe ſhall no more ſee, nor bee ſeene of her Abijah: She ſhall no ſooner be in the City, than hee ſhall be out of the world: Yet, more to perfect her ſorrow, ſhee heares that in him alone there is found ſome good; the reſt of her iſſue, are graceleſſe; ſhe muſt leeſe the good, and hold the graceleſſe; he ſhall die to afflict her, they ſhall live to afflict her.

Yet what a mixture is here of ſeverity and favour in one act? favour to the ſonne, ſeverity to the father: Severity to the father, that he muſt leeſe ſuch a ſonne, favour C to the ſonne that he ſhall be taken from ſuch a father: Ieroboam is wicked, and therefore he ſhall not enjoy an Abijah; Abijah hath ſome good things, therefore hee ſhall be removed from the danger of the depravation of Ieroboam: Sometimes God ſtrikes in favour, but more often forbeares out of ſeverity: The beſt are fitteſt for heaven; the earth is fitteſt for the worſt; this is the region of ſinne, and miſery, that of immortality: It is no argument of diſ-favour to be taken early from a well-led life; as not of approbation to age in ſinne.

As the ſoule of Abijah is favoured in the removall, ſo is his body with a buriall; he ſhall have alone both teares and tomb; all the reſt of his brethren ſhall have no grave but dogs and fowles; no ſorrow but for their life: Though the carkaſſe be inſenſible of any poſition, yet honeſt Sepulture is a bleſſing: It is fit the body ſhould bee D duely reſpected on earth, whoſe ſoule is glorious in heaven.

ASA.

THe two houſes of Juda, and Iſrael, grow up now together in an ambitious rivality; this ſplitted plant branches out ſo ſeverally, as if it had forgotten that ever it was joyned in the root: The throne of David oft changeth the poſſeſſors; and more complaineth of their iniquity, than their remove: Abijam inherits the ſins of his father Rehoboam, no leſſe than his Crown: & ſo ſpends his three yeares, as if he had been no whit of kin to his E grandfathers vertues. It is no newes that grace is not traduced, whiles vice is: Therefore is his reigne ſhort becauſe it was wicked: It was a ſad caſe when both the Kings of Judah and Iſrael (though enemies) yet conſpired in ſinne: Rehoboam (like his father Salomon) began gratiouſly, but fell to Idolatry: as he followed his father; ſo his ſonne, ſo his people followed him. Oh, what a face of a Church was here, when Iſrael worſhipped Ieroboams calves, when Judah built them high places, and Images, & groves, on every high Hill, and under every greene tree: On both hands GOD is forſaken, his Temple neglected, his worſhip adulterate: and this, not for ſome ſhort brunt, but during the ſucceſſion of two Kings: For, after the firſt three yeares Rehoboam changed his fathers Religion (as his ſhields) from gold to braſſe; the reſt of his ſeventeene yeares were ledde in impiety: His ſonne Abijam trod in the ſame mierie ſteps, and Judah with them both: If there were any (doubtleſſe there were ſome) ſome) faithfull hearts, yet remaining in both Kingdomes, during theſe heavy times, what a corroſive it muſt needs have beene to them, to ſee ſo deplored and miſerable a depravation. A

There was no viſible Church upon earth, but here; and this what a one? Oh GOD, how low doeſt thou ſometimes ſuffer thine owne flocke to bee driven? What wofull wanes, and eclipſes haſt thou ordained for this heavenly body? Yet at laſt, an Aſa ſhall ariſe from the loynes, from the grave of Abijam: he ſhall revive David and reforme Iudah: The gloomy times of corruption ſhall not laſt alwayes: The light of truth and peace ſhall at length breake out, and bleſſe the ſad hearts of the righteous.

It is a wonder how Aſa ſhould be good, of the ſeed of Abijam, of the ſoyle of Maachah, both wicked, both Idolatrous; God would have us ſee that grace is from heaven, neither needes the helpes of theſe earthly conveyances: Should not the children of good parents ſometimes be evill, and the children of evill parents, good; vertue would ſeeme naturall, and the giver would leeſe his thankes? Thus we have ſeen a faire flower ſpring out of dung; and a well-fruited tree riſe out of a ſowre ſtocke: Education hath no leſſe power to corrupt, than nature; It is therefore the juſt praiſe of Aſa that being trained up under an Idolatrous Maachah, he maintained his piety; As contrarily, it is a ſhame for thoſe that have beene bred up in the precepts and examples of vertue and Godlineſſe, to fall off to lewdneſſe, or ſuperſtition: There are foure principall monuments of Aſaes vertue, as ſo many rich ſtones in his Diadem: He tooke away Sodomy, and Idols out of Iudah; Who cannot wonder more that he found them there, than that he removed them? What a ſtrange incongruity is this; Sodom in Jeruſalem? Idols in Judah? Surely debauched profeſſion proves deſperate; Admit the Idols, yee cannot doubt of the Sodomy; If they have changed the glory of the uncorruptible God, into an Image, made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and foure-footed beaſts, and creeping things, it is no marvell, if God give them up to uncleanneſſe through the luſts of their owne hearts, to diſhonour their own bodies, betweene themſelves; If they changed the truth of God into a lye, and worſhipped and ſerved the creature more than the Creator, who is bleſſed for ever, no marvell, if God give them to vile affections, to change the naturall uſe into that which is againſt nature; burning in luſt one towards another, men with men working that which is unſeemly. B C

Contrarily, admit the Sodomy, yee cannot doubt of the Idols; unnaturall beaſtlineſſe in manners, is puniſhed juſtly with a ſottiſh dotage in religion, bodily pollution with ſpirituall: How ſhould the ſoule care to be chaſte, that keepes a ſtewes in the body? Aſa begins with the baniſhment of both; ſcouring Iudah of this double uncleanneſſe: In vaine ſhould he have hoped to reſtore God to his Kingdome, whiles theſe abominations inhabited it; It is juſtly the maine care of worthy, and religious Princes, to cleare their Coaſts of the fouleſt ſinnes: Oh the unpartiall zeale of Aſa! There were Idols that challenged a prerogative of favour; The Idols that his father had made, all theſe he defaces; the name of a father cannot protect an Idoll: The duty to his Parent cannot win him to a liking, to a forbearance of his miſdevotion: Yea, ſo much the more doth the heart of Aſa riſe againſt theſe puppets, for that they were the ſinne, the ſhame of his father: Did there want (thinke we) ſome Courtier of his Fathers retinue, to ſay: Sir, favour the memory of him that begot you; you cannot demoliſh theſe ſtatues, without the diſhonour of their Erector: Hide your diſlike at the leaſt; It will be your glory to lay your finger upon this blot of your fathers reputation: If you liſt not to allow his act, yet winke at it: The godly zeale of Aſa turnes the deafe eare to theſe monitors, and lets them ſee, that he doth not more honor a father, than hate an Idoll; No dearneſſe of perſon ſhould take off the edge of our deteſtation of the ſinne. Nature is worthy of forgetfulneſſe, and contempt, in oppoſition to the God of Nature: Upon the ſame ground, as hee removed the Idols of his father Abijam, ſo for Idols he removed his Grand-mother Maachah; ſhe would not be removed from her obſcene Idols, ſhee is therefore removed from the ſtation of her honor: That Princeſſe had aged both in her regency, and ſuperſtition: D E

Under

A Under her rod was Asa brought up; and schooled in the rudiments of her Idolatry: whom she could not infect, she hoped to over-awe; so, as if Asa will not follow her gods, yet shee presumes that shee may retaine her owne: Doubtlesse, no meanes were neglected for her reclamation; none would prevaile: Religious Asa gathers up himselfe, and begins to remember that he is a King, though a sonne: that she, though a mother yet is a subject: that her eminence could not but countenance Idolatry, that her greatnesse suppressed religion: which hee should in vaine hope to reforme, whiles her superstition swayed: forgetting therefore the challenges of nature, the awe of infancy, the custome of reverence, he strips her of that command, which hee saw prejudiciall to his Maker; All respects of flesh and blood must be trampled on, for God: Could that long-setled Idolatry want abettors? Questionlesse, some or o-
B ther would say; This was the religion of your father Abijam, this of your Grand-father Rehoboam, this of the latter dayes of your wife and great Grand-father Salomon, this of your Grand-mother Maachah, this of your great Grand-mother Naamah; why should it not be yours? Why should you suspect either the wisdom, or piety, or salvation of so many Predecessors? Good Asa had learned to contemne prescription against a direct law: He had the grace to know it was no measuring truth by so moderne antiquity; his eyes scorning to look so low, raise up themselves to the uncorrupt times of Salomon, to David, to Samuel, to the Iudges, to Ioshua, to Moses, to the Patriarks, to Noah, to the religious founders of the first world, to the first father of mankinde; to Paradise, to Heaven: In comparison of these, Maachahs god cannot overlook yesterday; the ancientest error is but a novice, to Truth; And if never any example could be pleaded for purity of religion; it is enough that the precept is
C expresse: He knew what God said in Sinai, and wrote in the Tables: Thou shalt not make to thy selfe any graven image, nor any similitude; Thou shalt not bow downe to them nor worship them: If all the world had beene an Idolater, ever since that word was given he knew how little that precedent could availe for disobedience: Practice must be corrected by law, and not the law yeelde to practice: Maachah therefore goes downe from her seat; her Idols from their grove; shee to retiredneſse, they to the fire, and from thence to the water: Wofull deities that could both burne, and drowne.

Neither did the zeale of Asa more magnifie it selfe in these privative acts of weeding out the corruptions of Religion, than in the positive acts of an holy plantari-
D on; In the falling of those Idolatrous shrines, the Temple of God flourishes; That doth he furnish with those sacred treasures, which were dedicated by himselfe, by his Progenitors; Like the true sonne of David, he would not serve God cost-free: Rehoboam turned Salomons gold into brasse: Asa turnes Rehoboams brasse into gold: Some of these vessels (it seemes) Abijam (Asaes father) had dedicated to God; but after his vow, inquired; yea with-held them: Asa like a good sonne, payes his fathers debts, and his owne. It is a good signe of a well-meant devotion, when wee can abide it chargeable; as contrarily in the affaires of God a niggardly hand argues a cold, and hollow heart.

All these were noble and excellent acts, the extirpation of Sodomie, the demo-
E lition of Idols, the removall of Maachah, the bounteous contribution to the Temple; but that which gives true life unto all these, is a sound root: Asaes heart was perfect with the Lord all his dayes; No lesse laudable workes than these have proceeded from Hypocrisie; which whiles they have caried away applause from men, have lost their thankes with God: All Asaes gold was but drosse to his pure intentions.

But oh what great, and many infirmities may consist with uprightneſse? what allayes of imperfection will there be found in the most refined soule? Foure no small faults are found in true-hearted Asa: First the high places stood still, unremoved; What high places? There were some dedicated to the worship of false gods; these Asa tooke away: There were some misdevoted to the worship of the true God; these hee lets stand; There was grosse Idolatry in the former; there was a weake will-worship in the latter; whiles he opposes impiety, hee winkes at mistakings, yet even the variety of altars was forbidden by an expresse charge from God, who had confined

confined his ſervice to the Temple: With one breath doth God report both theſe; The high places were not removed, yet nevertheleſſe Aſaes heart was perfit. God will not ſee weakneſſes, where he ſees truth: How pleaſing a thing is ſincerity, that in favour thereof the mercy of our juſt God digeſts many an errour: Oh God, let our hearts goe upright, though our feet ſlide, the fall cannot (through thy grace) be deadly; how ever it may ſhame or paine us.

Beſides, to confront his rivall of Iſrael, Baaſha, this religious King of Judah fetches in Benhadad the King of Syria into Gods inheritance, upon too deare a rate; the breach of his league, the expilation of the Temple. All the wealth wherewith Aſa had endowed the houſe of the Lord, was little enough to hire an Edomite, to betray his fidelity, and to invade Iſrael: Leagues may be made with Infidels; not at ſuch a price, upon ſuch termes; There can be no warrant for a wilfull ſubornation of perfidiouſneſſe: In theſe caſes of outward things, the mercy of God diſpenceth with our true neceſſities, not with the affected: O Aſa where was thy piety, whiles thou robbeſt God, to corrupt an Infidell for the ſlaughter of Iſraelites? O Princes, where is your piety, whiles ye hire Turkes to the ſlaughter of Chriſtians? to the ſpoile of Gods Church?

Yet (which was worſe) Aſa doth not onely imploy the Syrian, but relies on him, relies not on God; A confidence leſſe ſinfull coſt his Grandfather David deare: And when Hanani Gods Seer, the Herald of heaven, came to denounce warre againſt him for theſe ſinnes, Aſa in ſtead of penitence, breakes into choler: Fury ſparkles in thoſe eyes, which ſhould have guſhed out with water; Thoſe lippes that ſhould have called for mercy, command revenge; How ill doe theſe two agree, The heart of David, the tongue of Ieroboam? That holy Grandfather of his would not have done ſo; when Gods meſſenger reproved him for ſinne, hee condemned it, and himſelfe for it; I ſee his teares, I doe not heare his threats: It ill becomes a faithfull heart to rage, where it ſhould ſorrow; and inſtead of ſubmiſſion, to perſecute: Sometimes no difference appeares betwixt a ſonne of David, and the ſonne of Nebat: Any man may doe ill, but to defend it, to outface it, is for rebels; yet even upright Aſa impriſons the Prophet, and cruſheth his gainſayers. It were pittie that the beſt man ſhould be judged by every of his actions, and not by all; The courſe of our life muſt either allow or condemne us, not theſe ſudden eruptions.

As the Life, ſo the Death-bed of Aſa wanted not infirmities; Long and proſperous had his raigne beene; now after forty yeares health and happineſſe, he that impriſoned the Prophet, is impriſoned in his bed; There is more paine in thoſe fetters which God put upon Aſa, than thoſe which Aſa puts upon Hanani: And now, behold, he that in his warre ſeekes to Benhadad, not to God, in his ſickneſſe ſeekes not to God, but to Phyſitians: We cannot eaſily put upon God a greater wrong, than the alienation of our truſt: Earthly meanes are for uſe, not for confidence; We may, we muſt imploy them; we may not rely upon them: Well may God challenge our truſt, as his peculiar, which if we caſt upon any creature, we deifie it: Whence have herbes, and drugges, and Phyſitians, their being, and efficacie, but from that divine hand? No marvell then if Aſaes gout ſtrucke to his heart, and his feet caried him to his grave, ſince his heart was miſcaried for the cure of his feet, to an injurious miſconfidence in the meanes, with neglect of his Maker.

Elijah with the Sareptan.

WHo ſhould be match't with Moſes in the hill of Tabor, but Elijah? Surely next after Moſes, there was never any Prophet of the old Teſtament more glorious than he: None more glorious, none more obſcure; The other Prophets are not mentioned without the name of their Parent, for the mutuall honour both of the father, and the ſonne; Elijah, (as if he had beene a ſonne of the earth) comes forth with with the bare mention of the place of his birth; Meanneſſe of deſcent is no block in Gods way to the moſt honourable vocations; It matters not whoſe ſon he be whom God will grace with his ſervice: In the greateſt honors that humane nature is capable of, God forgets our parents: As when we ſhal be raiſed up to a glorious life, there ſhal be no reſpect had to the loynes whence we came; ſo it is proportionally in theſe ſpirituall advancements.

Theſe times were fit for an Elijah; an Elijah was fit for them; The eminenteſt Prophet is reſerved for the corrupteſt age; Iſrael had never ſuch a King as Ahab, for impiety; never ſo miraculous a Prophet, as Elijah; This Elijah is addreſſed to this Ahab; The God of Spirits knows how to proportion men to the occaſions; and to raiſe up to himſelfe ſuch witneſſes, as may be moſt able to convince the world. A mild Moſes was for the low eſtate of afflicted Iſrael; mild of ſpirit, but mighty in wonders; mild of ſpirit becauſe hee had to doe with a perſecuted, and yet a techy and perverſe people; mighty in wonders becauſe he had to do with a Pharaoh. A grave and holy Samuel was for the quiet conſiſtence of Iſrael; A fiery-ſpirited Elijah was for the deſperateſt declination of Iſrael: and if in the late times of the depraved condition of his Church, God have raiſed up ſome ſpirits that have beene more warme, and ſtirring, then thoſe of common mould, wee cannot cenſure the choyce, when we ſee the ſervice.

The firſt word that we heare from Elijah, is an oath, and a threat to Ahab, to Iſrael: As the Lord God of Iſrael liveth before whom I ſtand, there ſhall not be dew, nor raine, theſe yeares but according to my word: Hee comes in like a Tempeſt, who went out in a whirl-winde; Doubtleſſe he had ſpoken faire, and peaceable invitations to Iſrael (though we heare them not;) This was but the ſtorme which followed his repulſe, their obſtinacy; After many ſolicitations, and warnings, Iſrael is ſtriken by the ſame tongue that had prayed for it; Elijah dares avouch theſe judgements to their Head, to Ahab: I do not ſo much wonder at the boldneſſe of Elijah, as at his power; Yea, who ſees his power, can no whit wonder at his boldneſſe: How could he be but bold to the face of a man, who was thus powerfull with God? As if God had lent him the keyes of heaven to ſhut it up, and open it at pleaſure; he can ſay, There ſhall be neither dew, nor raine, theſe yeares but according to my word; Oh God, how farre it hath pleaſed thee to communicate thy ſelfe to a weake man? What Angell could ever ſay thus? Thy hand, O Lord, is not ſhortened; Why art thou not thus marvellous in the miniſters of thy Goſpel? Is it for that their miracles were ours? Is it for that thou wouldſt have us live by faith, not by ſenſe? Is it for that our taſke is more ſpirituall, and therefore more abſtracted from bodily helps? we cannot command the Sun with Joſhua, nor the Thunder with Samuel, nor the Raine with Elijah; It ſhal content us if we can fixe the Sun of righteouſneſſe in the ſoule, if we can thunder out the judgements of God againſt ſin, if wee can water the earthen hearts of men with the former, and latter raine of heavenly doctrine.

Elijahs mantle cannot make him forget his fleſh; whiles he knows himſelfe a Prophet, he remembers to be a man; hee doth not therefore arrogate his power, as his own, but publiſheth it as his Maſters; This reſtraint muſt be according to his word; and that word was from an higher mouth, then his: He ſpake from him by whom he ſware; whoſe word was ſure as his life; and therefore he durſt ſay, As the Lord liveth, there ſhall be no raine. Man only can denounce what God will execute; which when it is once revealed, can no more faile, then the Almighty himſelfe.

He that had this intereſt & power in heaven, what needed he flee from an earthly purſuit? Could his prayers reſtraine the clouds, and not hold the hands of fleſh and blood? Yet behold Elijah muſt flee from Ahab, and hide him by the brooke Cherith; The wiſdome of God doth not thinke fit ſo to make a beaten path of miracles; as that he will not walke beſide it; He will have our owne indeavours concurre to our preſervation; Elijah wanted neither courage of heart, nor ſtrength of hand, and yet he muſt truſt to his feet for ſafety; How much more lawfull is it for our impotence to flee from perſecution? Even that God ſends him to hide his head, who could as eaſily have protected, as nouriſhed him: Hee that wilfully ſtands ſtill to latch dangers, tempteth God inſtead of truſting him.

The Prophet muſt be gone; not without order taken for his purveyance; Oh the ſtrange Cators for Elijah, I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there; I know not whether had beene more miraculous, to preſerve him without meat, or to provide meat by ſuch mouthes: The Raven, a devouring and ravenous fowle, that uſes to ſnatch away meat frō others, brings it to him: He that could have fed Elijah by Angels, will feed him by Ravens; There was then in Iſrael an hoſpitall Obadiah, that kept a ſecret Table in two ſeverall caves, for an hundred Prophets of God; There were ſeven thouſand faithfull Iſraelites (in ſpight of the Devill) who had never bowed knee to Baal; Doubtleſſe, any of theſe would have had a trencher ready for Elijah, and have thought himſelfe happy to have defrauded his owne maw, for ſo noble a Prophet; God rather chuſes to make uſe of the moſt unlikely fowles of the ayre, than their bounty; that he might give both to his Prophet, and us a pregnant proofe of his abſolute command over all his creatures, and winne our truſt in all extremities. Who can make queſtion of the proviſions of God, when he ſees the very Ravens ſhall forget their owne hunger, and purvey for Elijah? Oh God, thou that provideſt meat for the fowles of the ayre, wilt make the fowles of the ayre provide meat for man, rather than his dependance on thee ſhall be diſappointed; Oh let not our faith be wanting to thee, thy care can never be wanting to us.

Elijah might have lived for the time with bread and water; neither had his fare been worſe then his fellowes in the caves of Obadiah; but the munificence of God will have his meales better furniſhed; The Ravens ſhall bring him both bread, and fleſh, twice in the day; It is not for a perſecuted Prophet to long after delicates; God gives order for competency, not for wantonneſſe; Not out of the dainty compoſitions in Iezebels kitchen, not out of the pleaſant wines in her celler, would God provide for Elijah, but the Ravens ſhall bring him plaine, and homely victualls, and the river ſhall afford him drink; If we have wherewith to ſuſtaine nature (though not to pamper it) we owe thanks to the giver; Thoſe of Gods family may not be curious, not diſdainfull: Ill doth it become a ſervant of the higheſt, to be a ſlave to his palate. Doubtleſſe, one bit from the mouth of the Raven was more pleaſing to Elijah, then a whole Table-full of Ahab: Nothing is more comfortable to Gods children, then to ſee the ſenſible demonſtrations of the divine care, and providence.

The brook Cherith cannot laſt alwaies; that ſtreame ſhall not for Elijahs ſake be exempted from the univerſall exſiccation; Yea the Prophet himſelfe feeles the ſmart of this drought, which he had denounced; It is no unuſuall thing with God to ſuffer his own deare children to be inwrapped in the common calamities of offenders: He makes difference in the uſe, and iſſue of their ſtripes, not in the infliction; The corne is cut downe with the weeds, but to a better purpoſe.

When the brook failes, God hath a Zarephath for Elijah; In ſtead of the Ravens, a Widow ſhall there feed him; yea her ſelfe by him: Who can enough wonder at the pitch of this ſelective providence of the Almighty; Zarephath was a town of Sidon, and therefore without the pale of the Church; Poverty was the beſt of this Widow, ſhe was a Pagan by birth, heatheniſhly ſuperſtitious by inſtitution; Many Widowes were in Iſrael in the daies of Elijah when the heaven was ſhut up three yeares, and ſix months, when great famine was throughout all the Land, but unto none of them was Elias ſent, ſave unto this Sarepta, a City of Sidon, unto a woman that was a Widow; He that firſt fed the Prophet by the mouth of uncleane fowles, will now feed him by the hand of an Heatheniſh Hoſteſſe; His only command ſanctifies thoſe creatures which by a generall charge were legally impure.

There were other birds beſides Ravens, other Widowes beſides this Sareptan; none but the Ravens, none but the Sareptan ſhall nouriſh Elijah. Gods choice is not led in the ſtring of humane reaſons, his holy will is the guide, and the ground of all his elections. It is not in him that wils, nor in him that runs, but in God that ſhewes mercy.

The Prophet followes the call of his God; the ſame hand that brought him to the gate of Sarepta, led alſo this poore Widow out of her doores, ſhee ſhall then goe to

ſeeke

ſeeke her ſtickes, when ſhe ſhall be found of Elijah; ſhe thought of her hearth, ſhe thought not of a Prophet; when the man of God cals to her, Fetch me a little water (I pray thee) in a veſſell, that I may drinke. It was no eaſie ſuit in ſo droughty a ſeaſon; and yet, at the firſt ſight, the Prophet dares ſecond it with a greater; Bring me a morſell of Bread in thine hand; That long drought had made every drop, every crum precious; yet the Prophet is emboldened by the charge of God to call for both water and bread; He had found the Ravens ſo officious, that he cannot make doubt of the Sareptan: She ſticks not at the water, ſhe would not ſtick at the bread, if neceſſity had not preſſed her: As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but an handfull of meale in a barrell, and a little oyle in a cruſe, and behold I am gathering two ſtickes, that I may go in and dreſſe it for me and my ſon, that we may eat it and dye.

If ſhe knew not the man, how did ſhe know his God? and if ſhe knew not the God of Elijah, how did ſhe ſweare by him? Certainely though ſhee were without the bounds of Iſrael, yet ſhe was within the borders; ſo much ſhe had gained by her neghbourhood, to know an Iſraelite, a Prophet by his habit; to know the onely living God was the God of the Prophet, the God of Iſrael; & if this had not been, yet it is no marvell if the widow knew Elijah, ſince the Ravens knew him. It was high time for the Prophet to viſit the Sareptan; poore ſoule, ſhe was now making her laſt meale, after one meane morſell ſhe was yeelding her ſelf over to death: How opportunely hath God provided ſuccours to our diſtreſſes? It is his glory to helpe at a pinch, to begin where we have given over: that our reliefe might be ſo much the more welcome, by how much it is leſſe look't for.

But oh, what a tryall is this of the faith of a weake Proſelyte, if ſhe were ſo much; Feare not, go do as thou haſt ſaid, but make me thereof a little cake firſt, and bring it to me, and after make for thee, and thy ſon. For, thus ſaith the God of Iſrael, The barrel of meale ſhal not waſte, nor the cruſe of oyle faile till the day that God ſend raine upon the earth: She muſt go ſpend upon a ſtranger part of that little ſhe hath, in hope of more which ſhe hath not, which ſhe may have; ſhe muſt part with her preſent food, which ſhe ſaw, in truſt of future which ſhe could not ſee; ſhe muſt rob her ſenſe in the exerciſe of her beleef, & ſhorten her life in being, upō the hope of a protractiō of it, in promiſe; ſhe muſt beleeve God wil miraculouſly increaſe what ſhe hath yeelded to conſume; ſhe muſt firſt feed the ſtranger with her laſt victuals, and then after her ſelf, and her ſonne: Some ſharpe dame would have taken up the Prophet, and have ſent him away with an angry repulſe: Bold Iſraelite, there is no reaſō in this requeſt; wert thou a friend, or a brother, with what face couldſt thou require to pull my laſt bit out of my mouth? Had I ſuperfluity of proviſion, thou mighteſt hope for this effect of my charity; now, that I have but one morſell for my ſelfe, and my ſonne, this is an injurious importunity; what can induce thee to thinke thy life (an unknowne traveller) ſhould be more deare to mee then my ſons, then my own? How uncivill is this motiō that I ſhould firſt make proviſion for thee, in this dying extremity? It had bin too much to have begged my laſt ſcraps; Thou telleſt me the meale ſhall not waſte, nor the oile faile; how ſhall I beleeve thee? Let me ſee that done, before thou eateſt; In vaine ſhould I challenge thee when the remainder of my poore ſtore is conſumed; If thou canſt ſo eaſily multiply victuals, how is it that thou wanteſt? Do that beforehand, wch thou promiſeſt ſhall be afterwards performed, there will be no need of my little. But this good Sareptan was wrought by God not to miſtruſt a Prophet; ſhee will do what he bids, and hope for what he promiſes; ſhe will live by faith rather thē by ſenſe, and give away the preſent, in the confidence of a future remuneration; firſt, ſhe bakes Elijahs cake, then her own; not grudging to ſee her laſt morſels go downe anothers throat, whiles her ſelfe was famiſhing. How hard precepts doth God lay where he intends bounty; Had not God meant her preſervation, he had ſuffered her to eat her laſt cake alone, without any interpellatiō; now the mercy of the Almighty purpoſing as well this miraculous favour to her, as to his Prophet, requires of her this taſk, which fleſh and blood would have thought unreaſonable. So we are wont to put hard queſtions to thoſe ſchollers, whom we would promote to higher formes. So in all atchievements the difficulty of the enterpriſe makes way for the glory of the actor.

Happy was it for this widow, that ſhe did not ſhut her hand to the man of God; that ſhe was no niggard of her laſt handfull; Never corne or olive did ſo increaſe in growing, as here in conſuming; This barrell, this cruſe of hers had no bottome; the barrell of meale waſted not, the cruſe of oyle failed not; Behold, not getting, not ſaving is the way to abundance, but giving. The mercy of God crownes our beneficence with the bleſſing of ſtore; who can feare want by a mercifull liberality, when he ſees the Sareptan had famiſhed, if ſhe had not given, and by giving abounded? With what thankful devotion muſt this woman every day needs look upon her barrell, & cruſe, wherein ſhe ſaw the mercy of God renewed to her continually? Doubtleſſe her ſoule was no leſſe fed by faith, then her body with this ſupernaturall proviſion. How welcome a gueſt muſt Elijah needs be to this widow, that gave her life and her ſons to her, for his board? yea, that in that wofull famine gave her and her ſon their board for his houſe roome.

The dearth thus overcomne, the mother looks hopefully upon her onely ſon, promiſing her ſelfe much joy in his life and proſperity, when an unexpected ſickneſſe ſurpriſeth him, and doth that which the famine but threatned: When can we hold our ſelves ſecure from evills? No ſooner is one of theſe Sergeants compounded withall then we are areſted by another.

How ready we are to miſtake the grounds of our afflictions, and to caſt them upon falſe cauſes; The paſſionate mother cannot find whither to impute the death of her ſon, but to the preſence of Elijah: to whom ſhe comes diſtracted with perplexity, not without an unkind challenge of him, from whom ſhe had received both that life ſhe had loſt, and that ſhe had; What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God; Art thou come to me to call my ſin to remembrance, and to ſlay my ſon?

As if her ſon could not have died if Elijah had not been her gueſt; when as her ſon had dyed, but for him; why ſhould ſhe thinke that the Prophet had ſaved him from the famine, to kill him with ſickneſſe? As if God had not been free in his actions; and muſt needs ſtrike by the ſame hands, by which he preſerved; Shee had the grace to know that her affliction was for her ſin; yet was ſo unwiſe, to imagine the arerages of her iniquities had not bin called for, if Elijah had not been the remembrancer; He who had appeaſed God towards her, is ſuſpected to have incenſed him; This wrongfull miſconſtruction was enough to move any patience; Elijah was of an hot ſpirit; yet his holineſſe kept him from fury; This challenge rather increaſed the zeale of his prayer, then ſtirred his choller to the offendent: He takes the dead child out of his mothers boſome, and layes him upon his own bed, and cries unto the Lord; Oh Lord my God, haſt thou brought evil alſo upon the Widow with whom I ſojourne, by ſlaying her ſon? In ſtead of chiding the Sareptan, out of the fervẽcy of his ſoule, he humbly expoſtulates with his God: His only remedy is in his prayer; that which ſhut heaven for raine, muſt open it for life. Every word inforceth; Firſt he pleads his intereſt in God, Oh Lord my God; thẽ the quality of the patient; a Widow, and therefore, both moſt diſtreſſed with the loſſe, and moſt peculiar to the charge of the Almighty. Then, his intereſt, as in God, ſo in this patient; with whom I ſojourne: as if the ſtroke were given to himſelf, through her ſides: and laſtly, the quality of the puniſhment, By ſlaying her ſon, the onely comfort of her life; and in all theſe implying the ſcandall, that muſt needs ariſe from this event, where ever it ſhould be noiſed, to the name of his God, to his owne; when it ſhould be ſaid; Lo how Elijahs entertainment is rewarded; Surely the Prophet is either impotent, or unthankfull.

Neither doth his tongue move thus only; Thrice doth he ſtretch himſelf upon the dead body; as if he could wiſh to infuſe of his owne life into the child; and ſo often cals to his God for the reſtitution of that ſoule: What can Elijah aſke to be denyed? The Lord heard the voice of the Prophet, the ſoule of the child came into him againe, and he revived: What miracle is impoſſible to faithfull prayers! There cannot be more difference betwixt Elijahs devotion, and ours, then betwixt ſupernaturall and ordinary acts; If he therefore obtained miraculous favours by his prayers, do we doubt of thoſe which are within the ſphere of nature, and uſe? What could we want, if we did not ſlacke to ply heaven with our prayers?

Certainly

Certainly Elijah had not been premoniſhed of this ſudden ſickneſſe, and death of the child; He who knew the remote affaires of the world, might not know what God would do within his owne roofe; The greateſt Prophet muſt content himſelfe with ſo much of Gods counſell, as he will pleaſe to reveale, and he wil ſometimes reveale the great ſecrets, and conceale the leſſe, to make good both his owne liberty, and mans humiliation. So much more unexpected as the ſtroke was, ſo much more welcome is the cure; How joyfully doth the man of God take the revived child into his armes and preſent him to his mother? How doth his heart leap within him, at this proofe of Gods favour to him, mercy to the widow, power to the child.

What life and joy did now ſhew it ſelfe in the face of that amazed mother, when ſhe ſaw againe the eyes of her ſon fixed upon hers; when ſhe felt his fleſh warm, his motions vitall? Now ſhe can ſay to Elijah; By this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth; Did ſhe not till now know this? Had ſhe not ſaid before, What have I to do with thee O thou man of God? Were not her cruſe, and her barrell ſufficient proofes of his divine commiſſion? Doubtleſſe what her meale and oyle had aſſured her of, the death of her ſon made her to doubt; and now reviving did re-aſcertaine. Even the ſtrongeſt faith ſometimes ſtaggereth, and needeth new acts of heavenly ſupportation; the end of miracles is confirmation of truth; It ſeemes, had this widdowes ſonne continued dead, her beleefe had been buried in his grave: notwithſtanding her meale and her oile, her ſoule had languiſhed: The mercy of God is faine to provide new helps for our infirmities, and graciouſly condeſcends to our owne tearmes, that he may worke out our faith and ſalvation.

Elijah with the Baalites.

THree yeares and an halfe, did Iſrael lie gaſping under a parching drought, and miſerable famine: No creature was ſo odious to them, as Elijah, to whom they aſcribed all their miſery: Me thinks I heare how they railed on, and curſed the Prophet: How much envy muſt the ſervants of God undergo for their maſter? Nothing but the tongue was Elijahs, the hand was Gods; the Prophet did but ſay what God would do: I do not ſee them fall out with their ſins, that had deſerved the judgment, but with the meſſenger that denounced it; Baal had no fewer ſervants then if there had beene both raine, and plenty: Elijah ſafely ſpends this ſtorme under the lee of Sarepta: Some three yeares hath he lien cloſe in that obſcure corner, and lived upon the barrell, and cruſe which he had multiplied: At laſt, God cals him forth, Go ſhew thy ſelfe to Ahab, and I will ſend raine upon the earth; no raine muſt fall till Elijah were ſeene of Ahab; He caried away the clouds with him, he muſt bring them againe: The King, the people of Iſrael, ſhall be witneſſes that God wil make good the word, the oath of his Prophet: Should the raine have falne in Elijahs abſence, who could have knowne it was by his procuremēt? God holds the credit of his meſſengers percious, and neglects nothing that may grace them in the eyes of the world; Not the neceſſity of ſeven thouſand religious Iſraelites could cracke the word of one Elijah; There is nothing wherein God is more tender, then in approving the veracity of himſelfe in his miniſters.

Lewd Ahab hath an holy Steward: As his name was, ſo was he, a ſervant of God, whiles his Maſter was a ſlave to Baal. He that reſerved ſeven thouſand in the Kingdome of Iſrael, hath reſerved an Obadiah in the Court of Iſrael: and, by him, hath reſerved them: Neither is it likely there had been ſo many free hearts in the country, if Religion had not been ſecretly backed in the Court: It is a great happineſſe when God gives favour, and honor to the Vertuous. Elijah did not lie more cloſe in Sarepta, then Obadiah did in the Court: He could not have done ſo much ſervice to the Church, if he had not beene as ſecret, as good; Policy and religion do as well together, as they do ill aſunder: The Dove without the Serpent is eaſily caught; the ſerpent without the Dove ſtings deadly; Religion without policy is too ſimple to be ſafe:

safe: Policy without Religion, is too subtile to be good; Their match makes themselves secure, and many happy. A

Oh degenerated estate of Israel, any thing was now lawfull there saving piety: It is well if Gods Prophets can find an hole to hide their heads in: They must needs be hard driven when fifty of them are faine to croud together into one cave; There they had both shade & repast: Good Obadiah hazards his own life to preserve theirs, and spends himself in that extreame dearth, upon their necessary diet; Bread and water was more now, then otherwhiles wine, and delicates; Whether shall we wonder more at the mercy of God in reserving an hundred Prophets, or in thus sustaining them being reserved; When did God ever leave his Israel unfurnished of some Prophets? When did he leave his Prophets unprovided of some Obadiah? How worthy art thou, O Lord, to be trusted with thine owne charge; whiles there are men upon earth, or birds in the ayre, or Angels in heaven, thy messengers cannot want provision. B

Goodnesse caries away trust, where it cannot have imitation. Ahab divides with Obadiah the survey of the whole land; They two set their owne eyes on work, for the search of water, of pasture, to preserve the horses and mules alive: Oh the poore and vaine cares of Ahab: He casts to kill the Prophet, to save the cattle; he never seekes to save his owne soule, to destroy Idolatry; he takes thought for grasse, none for mercy: Carnall hearts are ever either grovelling on the earth, or delving into it; no more regarding God, or their soules, then if they either were not, or were worthlesse.

Elijah heares of the progresse, and offers himselfe to the view of them both; Here was wisedome in this courage: First, he presents himselfe to Obadiah, ere he will bee seene of Ahab; that Ahab might upon the report of so discreet an informer, digest the expectation of his meeting: Then he takes the opportunity of Ahabs presence, when he might be sure Iezebel was away. C

Obadiah meets the Prophet, knows him, and (as if he had seen God in him) fals on his face to him, whom he knew his master persecuted: Though a great Peere, he had learned to honor a Prophet. No respect was too much for the president of that sacred colledge: To the poore Boarder of the Sareptan, here was no lesse, then a prostration; and, My Lord Elijah, from the great High Steward of Israel: Those that are truly gracious cannot be niggardly of their observances to the messengers of God. D

Elijah receives the reverence, returnes a charge: Go tell my Lord, behold Elijah is here: Obadiah findes this lode too heavy; neither is he more striken with the boldnesse, then with the unkindnesse of this command: boldnesse in respect of Elijah; unkindnesse in respect of himselfe: For, thus he thinkes, If Elijah do come to Ahab, he dyes: If he do not come, I die: If it be knowne that I met him, and brought him not, it is death: If I say that he will come voluntarily, and God shall alter his intentions, it is death: How unhappy a man am I, that must be either Elijahs executioner, or my own: were Ahabs displeasure but smoaking, I might hope to quench it, but now that the flame of it hath broken forth to the notice, to the search of all the Kingdomes and Nations round about, it may consume me, I cannot extinguish it: This message were for an enemy of Elijah; for a client of Baal: As for me, I have well approved my true devotion to God, my love to his Prophets: What have I done, that I should be singled out either to kill Elijah, or to be killed for him? Many an hard plunge must that man needs be driven to, who would hold his conscience together with the service, and favour of a Tyrant: It is an happy thing to serve a just master; there is no danger, no strayne in such obedience. E

But, when the Prophet binds his resolution with an oath, and cleares the heart of Obadiah from all feares, from all suspitions, the good man dares be the messenger of that, which he saw was decreed in heaven: Doubtlesse Ahab startled to heare of Elijah comming to meet him; as one that did not more hate, then feare the Prophet. Well might he think, thus long, thus far have I sought Elijah, Elijah would not come to seeke me, but under a sure guard, and with some strange commission: His coorse

mantle

A mantle hath the advantage of my robe and Scepter: if I can command a peece of the earth, I see he can command heaven. The edge of his revenge is taken off with a doubtful expectation of the issue: and now when Elijah offers himselfe to the eyes of Ahab, He who durst not strike, yet durst challenge the Prophet, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? Ieroboams hand was stil in Ahabs thoughts; he holds it not so safe to smite, as to expostulate: He, that was the head of Israel, speakes out that which was in the heart of all his people, that Elijah was the cause of all their sorrow: Alas, what hath the righteous Prophet done? He taxed their sin, he foretold the judgement; he deserved it not, he inflicted it not? yet he smarts, and they are guilty: As if some fond people should accuse the Herald or the Trumpet as the cause of their warre; or as if some ignorant peasant, when he sees his fowles bathing in his pond, should cry out
B of them as the causes of foule weather.

Oh the heroical Spirit of Elijah! he stands alone amids all the traine of Ahab, and dares not onely repell this charge, but retort it: I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy fathers house, in that yee have forsaken the Commandements of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim. No earthly glory can daunt him who hath the cleare and heartning visions of God: This holy Seer discernes the true cause of our sufferings, to be our sinnes: Foolish men are plagued for their offences; and it is no small part of their plague that they see it not; The onely common disturber of men, Families, Cities, Kingdomes, Worlds, is sin; There is no such traitor to any State, as the wilfully wicked; the quietest and most plausible offender is secretly seditious, and stirreth quarrels in heaven.

C The true messengers of God cary authority even where they are maligned; Elijah doth at once reprove the King, and require of him the improvement of his power, in gathering all Israel to Carmel, in fetching thither all the prophets of Baal. Baal was rich in Israel, whiles God was poore; Whiles God hath but one hundred Prophets, hid closely in Obadiahs caves, Baal hath eight hundred and fifty; foure hundred and fifty dispersed over the villages & townes of Israel, foure hundred at the Court; Gods Prophets are glad of bread & water, whiles the foure hundred Trencher-Prophets of Iezebel feed on her dainties. They lurke in caves, whiles these Lord it in the pleasantest groves. Outward prosperity is a false note of truth: All these with all Israel, doth Elijah require Ahab to summon unto Carmel. It is in the power of Kings to command the Assembly of the Prophets; the Prophet sues to the Prince for the D indiction of this Synod. They are injurious to Soveraigntie who arrogate this power to none but spirituall hands. How is it that Ahab is as ready to performe this charge, as Elijah to move it? I dare answer for his heart, that it was not drawne with love: Was it out of the sense of one judgement, and feare of another? he smarted with the dearth and drought, and wel thinks Elijah would not be so round with him, for nothing: Was it out of an expectation of some miraculous exploit which the Prophet would do in the sight of all Israel? Or, was it out of the over-ruling power of the Almighty; The heart of Kings is in the hand of God, and he turnes it which way soever he pleaseth.

Israel is met together, Elijah rates them, not so much for their superstition, as for their unsetledness, and irresolution: One Israelite serves God, another Baal; yea the E same Israelite perhaps serves both God and Baal. How long halt yee betweene two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him: Nothing is more odious to God then a prophane neutrality in maine oppositions of religion: To go upright in a wrong way, is a lesse eye-sore to God, then to halt betwixt right & wrong; The spirit wisheth that the Laodicean were either hot or cold; either temper would better be borne, thē neither, then both: In reconcileable differences nothing is more safe then indifferency both of practice and opinion; but in cases of so necessary hostility, as betwixt God, and Baal, he that is on neither side, is the deadliest enemy to both: Lesse hatefull are they to God that serve him not at all, then they that serve him with a rivall.

Whether out of guiltinesse, or feare, or uncertainty, Israel is silent; yet whiles their mouth was shut, their eyes were open: It was a faire motion of Elijah, I am onely re- maining a Prophet of the Lord, Baals Prophets are foure hundred and fifty: Let them choose one bullocke, let me choose another; Their devotion shall be combined, mine single: The God that consumes the sacrifice by fire from heaven, let him be God. Israel cannot but approve it; the Prophets of Baal cannot refuse it; they had the appearance of the advantage, in their number, in the favour of King and people. Oh strange disputation, wherein the argument which must be used is fire; the place whence it must be fecht, heaven; the mood and figure, devotion; the conclusion, death to be overcomne.

maining

Had not Elijah, by divine instinct, been assured of the event, he durst not have put religion upon such hazard: That God commanded him this triall, who meant confusion to the authors of Idolatry, victory to the truth: His terror shalbe approved both by fire & by water; first by fire, then by water: There was no lesse terror in the fire, then mercy in the raine: It was fit they should first be humbled by his terrors, that they might be made capable of his mercy: and by both, might be wonne to repentance. Thus still the feares of the law make way for the influences of grace, neither do those sweet and heavenly dewes descend upon the soule, till way be made for them by the terrible flashes of the law.

Justly doth Elijah urge this triall: Gods sacrifices were used to none but heavenly fires; whereas the base and earthly religion of the heathen contented it selfe with grosse and naturall flames.

The Prophets of Baal durst not (though with faint and guilty hearts) but imbrace the condition; they dresse their bulloke, and lay it ready upon the wood; and send out their cries to Baal from morning untill mid-day; O Baal heare us: What a yelling was here, of foure hundred and fifty throats, tearing the skies for an answer? What leaping was here upon the altar, as if they would have climbed up to fetch that fire, which would not come down alone? Mount Carmel might give an Eccho to their voice, heaven gave none; In vaine do they roare out, and weary thēselves in imploring a dumb and deafe deity; Grave and austere Elijah holds it not too light to flout their zealous devotion; he laughs at their teares, and playes upon their earnest; Cry aloud, for he is a God, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is travelling, or he is sleeping, and must be awaked.

Scornes and taunts are the best answers for serious Idolatry; Holinesse will beare us out in disdainfull scoffes, & bitternesse against wilful superstition; No lesse in the indignation at these insulting frumps, then zeale of their owne safety, and reputation, do these Idolatrous Prophets now rend their throats with inclamations, and that they may assure the beholders, they were not in jest, they cut and slash themselves, with knives, and lancers, and solicit the fire with their blood; How much painfulnesse there is in mis-religion? I do not find that the true God ever required or accepted the self-tortures of his servants; He loves true inward mortification of our corruptions, he loves the subduing of our spiritual insurrections, by due exercise of severe restraint; he takes no pleasure in our blood, in our carcasses: They mistake God that thinke to please him by destroying that nature, which he hath made; and measure truth by rigour of outward extremities; Elijah drew no blood of himselfe, the Priests of Baal did: How faine would the Devil (whom these Idolaters adored) have answered the suit of his suppliants? What would that ambitious spirit have given, that as he was cast down from heaven like lightning, so now he might have falne downe in that forme upon his altar?

God forbids it: All the powers of darknesse can no more shew one flash of fire in the ayre, then avoyd the unquenchable fire in hell: How easie were it for the power of the Almighty to cut short all the tyrannicall usurpations of that wicked one; if his wisdome and justice did not find the permission thereof usefull to his holy purposes.

These Idolaters now towards evening, grew so much more vehemēt, as they were more hopelesse; and at last, when neither their shrikes, nor their wounds, nor their mad motions could prevaile, they sit down hoarse and weary; tormenting thēselves afresh with their despaires, and with the feares of bitter successe of their adversarie; when Elijah cals the people to him, (the witnesses of his sincere proceedings) and taking

taking the opportunity both of the time,(the juſt houre of the evening ſacrifice)and of the place, a ruined altar of God, now by him repaired,convinces Iſrael with his miracle,and more cuts theſe Baalites with envy, then they had cut themſelves with their lancers.

O holy Prophet why didſt thou not ſave this labor?what needed theſe unſeaſonable reparations?Was there not an altar,was there not a ſacrifice ready prepared to thine hand? that which the Prophets of Baal had addreſſed,ſtood ſtill waiting for that fire from thee,which the founders threatned in vaine:the ſtones were not more impure, either for their touch,or their intentiõs: yet ſuch was thy deteſtatiõ of Idolatry,that thou abhorredſt to meddle with ought,which their wickedneſſe had defiled: Even that altar, whoſe ruines thou didſt thus repaire,was miſ-erected though to the name of the True God;yet didſt thou find it better to make up the breaches of that altar, which was miſ-conſecrated to the ſervice of thy God, then to make uſe of that pile, which was idolatrouſly devoted to a falſe god: It cannot be but ſafe to keep aloofe from participation with Idolaters, even in thoſe things which not onely in nature, but in uſe are uncleane.

Elijah layes twelve ſtones in his repayred altar, according to the number of the Tribes of the ſons of Iacob: Alas ten of theſe were perverted to Baal: The Prophet regards not their preſent Apoſtacy;he regards the ancient covenant,that was made with their father Iſrael; he regards their firſt ſtation,to which he would reduce thẽ: he knew that the unworthineſſe of Iſrael could not make God forgetfull: he would by this monument put Iſrael in mind of their own degeneration,and forgetfulneſſe. He employes thoſe many hands for the making a large trench round about the altar; and cauſes it to be filled with thoſe precious remainders of water,which the people would have grudged to their own mouthes;neither would eaſily have parted with, but (as thoſe that poure down a pailfull into a drie pump) in the hope of fetching more.The altar,the trench is full: A barrell full is poured out for each of the Tribes, that every Tribe might be afterwards repleniſhed. Ahab and Iſrael are no leſſe ful of expectation; and now, when Gods appointed houre of the evening ſacrifice was come, Elijah comes confidently to his altar,and looking up into heaven, ſayes, Lord God of Abraham,Iſaac,and Iſrael, Let it be knowne this day,that thou art God in Iſrael,and that I am thy Servant,and that I have done all theſe things at thy word: Heare me, O Lord heare me, that this people may know that thou art the Lord God, and that thou haſt turned their hearts backe againe.

The Baalites prayers were not more tedious, then Elijahs was ſhort;and yet more pithy then ſhort;charging God with the care of his covenant,of his truth,of his glory.It was Elijah that ſpake loud;Oh ſtrong cries of faith,that pierce the heavens,and irreſiſtibly make their way to the throne of grace:Irael ſhal wel ſee that Elijahs God whom they have forſakẽ,is neither talking,nor purſuing,nor travelling,nor ſleeping: Inſtantly,the fire of the Lord fals from heaven,and conſumes the burnt ſacrifice,the wood,the ſtones,the duſt,& licks up the water that was in trench:With what terror muſt Ahab and Iſrael needs ſee this fire rolling downe out of the ſkie, and alighting with ſuch fury ſo neere their heads;heads no leſſe fit for this flame then the ſacrifice of Elijah: Well might they have thought,How eaſily might this fire have dilated it ſelfe and have conſumed our bodies,as well as the wood and ſtone,and have lickt up our blood,as well as that water? I know not whether they had the grace to acknowledge the mercy of God; they could do no leſſe then confeſſe his power, The Lord is God, The Lord is God.

The iron was now hot with this heavenly fire:Elijah ſtayes not till it coole againe, but ſtrikes immediately: Take the Prophets of Baal,let not one of them eſcape. This wager was for life:Had they prevailed in procuring this fire,and Elijah failed of effect; his head had beene forfeited unto them:now in the contrary ſucceſſe, theirs are loſt to him.Let no man complaine that thoſe holy hands were bloody:This ſacrifice was no leſſe pleaſing to God,then that other.Both the man and the act were extraordinary, and led by a peculiar inſtinct: Neither doth the Prophet this without the aſſent of the ſupreme Magiſtrate, who was now ſo affected with this miraculous worke, that he

he could not in the heat of that conviction, but allow the iuſtice of ſuch a ſentence. Far be it from us to accuſe Gods commands or executions of cruelty: It was the ancient and peremptory charge of God, that the authors of Idolatry and ſeduction ſhould dye the death; no eye, no hand might ſpare them: The Prophet doth but move the performance of that Law, which Iſrael could not without ſin have omitted: It is a merciſull and thank-worthy ſeverity to rid the world of the Ring-leaders of wickedneſſe.

Elijah running before Ahab, flying from Jezebel.

HEare no newes of the foure hundred Prophets of the Groves: They lie cloſe under the wing of Iezebel, under their pleaſing ſhades: neither will be ſuffered to undergo the danger of this triall; the carkeiſes of their fellowes helpe to fill up the halfe-dry channell of Kiſhon: Juſtice is no ſooner done, then Ahab heares newes of mercy from Elijah: Get thee up, eat and drink, for there is a ſound of abundance of raine: Their meeting was not more harſh, then their parting was friendly: It ſeemes Ahab had ſpent all that day faſting in an eager attendance of thoſe conflicting Prophets: It muſt needs bee late, ere the execution could be done: Elijahs part began not till the evening: So farre muſt the King of Iſrael be from taking thought for the maſſacre of thoſe foure hundred and fifty Baalites, that now, he may go eat his bread with joy, and drink his wine with a cheareſull heart: for God accepteth this worke, and teſtifies it in the noyſe of much raine: Every drop of that Idolatrous blood was anſwered with a ſhowre of raine, with a ſtreame of water, and plenty poured downe in every ſhowre: A ſenſible bleſſing followes the unpartiall ſtrokes of ſevere juſtice: Nothing is more cruel then an unjuſt piety.

No eares but Elijahs could as yet perceive a ſound of raine; the clouds were not yet gathered, the vapours were not yet riſen, yet Elijah heares that which ſhall bee: Thoſe that are of Gods Councell can diſcerne either favours or judgements afarre off; the ſlacke apprehenſions of carnall hearts make them hard to beleeve that, as future, which the quick and refined ſenſes of the faithfull receive, as preſent.

Ahab goes up to his repaſt; Elijah goes up to his prayers: That day had been painfull to him, the vehemency of his ſpirit draws him to a neglect of his body: The holy man climbes up to the top of Carmel, that now he may talke with his God alone: neither is he ſooner aſcended, then he caſts himſelf down upon the earth: He bowes his knees to God, and bowes his face down to his knees: by this humble poſture acknowledging his awfull reſpects to that Majeſty which he implored: Wee cannot proſtrate our bodies, or ſoules, too low to that infinitely glorious Deity, who is the Creator of both.

His thoughts were more high then his body was low: what he ſaid we know not, we know that what he ſaid opened the heavens, that for three yeares and an half had bin ſhut up: God had ſaid before, I will ſend raine upon the earth; yet Elijah muſt pray for what God did promiſe; The promiſes of the Almighty do not diſcharge our prayers, but ſuppoſe them; he will do what he undertakes, but wee muſt ſue for that which we would have him do: Our petitions are included in the decrees, in the ingagements of God.

The Prophet had newly ſeene and cauſed the fire to deſcend immediately out of heaven, he doth not look the water ſhould do ſo; he knew that the raine muſt come from the clouds, and that the clouds muſt ariſe from vapours, and thoſe vapours frō the Sea, thence doth he expect them: But as not willing that the thoughts of his fixed devotion ſhould be diſtracted, he doth not go himſelfe, only ſends his ſervant to bring him the newes of his ſucceſſe. At the firſt ſight nothing appeares: Seven times muſt he walke to that proſpect, and not till his laſt view can diſcerne ought: All that while is the Prophet in his prayers, neither is any whit daūted with that delay: Hope holds up the head of our holy deſires, and perſeverance crowns it. If we receive not

an

A an anſwer to our ſuits at the ſixth motion, we may not be out of countenance, but muſt try the ſeventh: At laſt, a little cloud ariſes out of the Sea, of an hand breadth. So many, ſo fervent prayers cannot but pul water out of heaven as wel as fire: Thoſe ſights reflect upon the earth, and from the earth reflect upon heaven, from heaven rebound upon the Sea, and raiſe vapours up thence to heaven againe: If we find that our prayers are heard for the ſubſtance, we may not cavill at the quantity: Even an hand-broad cloud contents Elijah, and fils his heart full of joy and thankfulneſſe: He knew well this meteor was not at the biggeſt, it was newly born of the womb of the waters, & in ſome minutes of age muſt grow to a large ſtature: ſtay but a while, and Heaven is covered with it: From how ſmal beginnings have greater matters riſen? It is no otherwiſe in all the gracious proceedings of God with the ſoule; ſcarce ſenſi-
B ble are thoſe firſt works of his ſpirit in the heart, which grow up at laſt to the wonder of men, and applauſe of Angels.

Well did Elijah know that God who is perfection it ſelfe, would not defile his hand with an inchoate and ſcanted favour, as one therefore that fore-ſaw the face of heaven over-ſpread with this cloudy ſpot, hee ſends to Ahab to haſten his Chariot, that the raine ſtop him not: It is long ſince Ahab feared this let; never was the news of a danger more welcome: Doubtleſſe the King of Iſrael whiles he was at his diet, lookt long for Elijahs promiſed ſhowers; where is the raine whoſe ſound the Prophet heard? how is it that his eares were ſo much quicker then our eyes? We ſaw his fire to our terror, how gladly would we ſee his Waters? When now the ſervant of Elijah brings him newes from heaven, that the clouds were ſetting forward, and
C (if he haſtened not) would be before him: The winde ariſes, the clouds gather, the ſkie thickens, Ahab betakes him to his Charet; Elijah girds up his loynes, and runnes before him: Surely the Prophet could not want the offer of more eaſe in his paſſage; but he will be for the time Ahabs lacquey, that the King and all Iſrael may ſee his humility no leſſe then his power, & may confeſſe that the glory of thoſe miracles hath not made him inſolent. Hee knew that his very ſight was monitory: neither could Ahabs mind be beſide the miraculous workes of God, whiles his eye was upon Elijah: neither could the Kings heart be otherwiſe then well-affected towards the Prophet, whiles he ſaw that himſelfe and all Iſrael, had received a new Life by his procurement. But what newes was here for Iezebel? Certtinely Ahab minced nothing of the report of all thoſe aſtoniſhing accidents: If but to ſalve up
D his owne honour, in the death of thoſe Baalites, he made the beſt of Elijahs merits; he told of his challenge, conflict, victory, of the fire that fell downe from heaven, of the conviction of Iſrael, of the unavoydable execution of the Prophets, of the prediction and fall of thoſe happy ſhowers, and laſtly of Elijahs officious attendance. Who would not have expected that Iezebel ſhould have ſaid; It is no ſtriving, no dallying with the Almighty: No reaſonable creature can doubt, after ſo prodigious a deciſion; God hath wonne us from Heaven, he muſt poſſeſſe us: Juſtly are our ſeducers periſhed; None but the God that can command fire and water ſhal be ours; There is no Prophet but his: But ſhe contrarily, in ſtead of relenting, rageth; and ſends a meſſage of death to Elijah, So let the gods do to mee, and more alſo; If I make not thy life, as the life of one of them by to morrow about this time: Neither ſcourges, nor
E favours can worke any thing with the obſtinately wicked; All evill hearts are not equally diſ-affected to good: Ahab and Iezebel were both bad enough, yet Ahab yeelds to that worke of GOD, which Iezebel ſtubbornely oppoſeth: Ahab melts with that water, with that fire, wherewith Iezebel is hardened, Ahab was baſhfully, Iezebel audaciouſly impious. The weaker ſexe is ever commonly ſtronger in paſſion; and more vehemently carried with the ſway of their deſires, whether to good or evill: Shee ſweares, and ſtampes at that whereat ſhee ſhould have trembled. Shee ſweares by thoſe gods of hers, which were not able to ſave their Prophets, that ſhee will kill the Prophet of God, who had ſcorned her gods, and ſlaine her Prophets.

It is well that Iezebel could not keepe counſell: Her threat preſerved him whom ſhe had meant to kill: The wiſdome and power of God could have found

evaſions

evaſions for his Prophet,in her greateſt ſecreſie:but now,he needs no other meanes of reſcue,but her owne lips:She is no leſſe vayne,then the gods ſhe ſweares by : In ſpight of her fury,and her oath,and her gods,Elijah ſhall live : At once ſhall ſhe find her ſelfe fruſtrat, & forſworne:She is now ready to bite her tongue,to eat her heart for anger,at the diſappointment of her cruell Vow.It were no living for godly men, if the hands of Tyrants were allowed to be as bloody as their hearts. Men and Devils are under the reſtraint of the Almighty;neither are their deſignes more laviſh, then their executions ſhort.

Holy Elijah flees for his life ; wee heare not of the command of God, but wee would willingly preſuppoſe it : So divine a Prophet ſhould doe nothing without God : His heeles were no new refuge; As no where ſafe within the tenne Tribes, he flees to Beerſheba, in the Territories of Iudah; as not there ſafe from the machinations of Iezebel, he flees alone (one dayes journey) into the wilderneſſe; there he ſits him downe under a Juniper Tree, and (as weary of life, no leſſe then of his way) wiſhes to riſe no more. It is enough now, O Lord, take away my life, for I am not better then my fathers : O ſtrange and uncouth mutation ! What is this wee heare ? Elijah fainting and giving up ? that heroicall ſpirit dejected, and proſtrate? He that durſt ſay to Ahabs face , It is thou , and thy fathers houſe that troubleth Iſrael; hee that could raiſe the dead, open and ſhut the heavens, fetch downe both fire, and water with his prayers; he that durſt chide and conteſt with all Iſrael,that durſt kill the foure hundred and fifty Baalites, with the ſword ; doth hee ſhrinke at the frownes and threats of a woman?doth he wiſh to be rid of his life becauſe he feared to loſe it ? Who can expect an undaunted conſtancy from fleſh and blood, when Elijah failes? The ſtrongeſt and holieſt Saint upon earth is ſubject to ſome qualmes of feare, and infirmity : To be alwayes and unchangeably good, is proper onely to the glorious Spirits in heaven : Thus the wiſe and holy God will have his power perfitted in our weakeneſſe : It is in vaine for us whiles wee carry this fleſh about us, to hope for ſo exact health, as not to be caſt downe ſometimes with fits of ſpirituall diſtemper.It is no new thing for holy men to wiſh for death: Who can either marvel at,or blame the deſire of advantage?For the weary traveller to long for reſt, the priſoner for liberty,the baniſhed for home,it is ſo naturall,that the contrary diſpoſition were monſtrous : The benefit of the change is a juſt motive to our appetition:but to cal for death out of a ſatiety of life,out of an impatience of ſuffering,is a weakeneſſe unbeſeeming a Saint:It is not enough, O Elijah; God hath more worke yet for thee:thy God hath more honoured thee,then thy fathers,and thou ſhalt live to honour him.

Toyle and ſorrow have lulled the Prophet aſleepe , under his Juniper tree; that wholeſome ſhade was well choſen, for his repoſe : whiles death was called for,the couzen of death comes unbidden : The Angell of God waits on him in that hard lodging: no wildernes is too ſolitary for the attendance of thoſe bleſſed ſpirits: As he is guarded , ſo is he awaked by that Meſſenger of GOD, and ſtirred up from his reſt,to his repaſt; whiles he ſlept, his breakefaſt is made ready for him, by thoſe ſpirituall hands ; There was a cake baked on the coales, and a cruſe of water at his head : Oh the never-ceaſing care and providence of the Almighty, not to be barred by any place, by any condition, when meanes are wanting to us, when wee are wanting to our ſelves, when to God,even then doth he follow us, with his mercy, and caſt favours upon us,beyond,againſt expectation : What variety of purveyance doth he make for his ſervant? One while the Ravens, then the Sareptan, now the Angell ſhall be his Cator;none of them without a miracle.Thoſe other provided for him waking,this ſleeping : O GOD,the eye of thy providence is not dimmer,the hand of thy power is not ſhorter ; onely teach thou us to ſerve thee, to truſt thee.

Needs muſt the Prophet eate, and drinke, and ſleepe with much comfort, whiles hee ſaw that he had ſuch a guardian,attendance,purveiour ; and now the ſecond time is he raiſed,by that happy touch,to his meale,and his way: Ariſe,and eate, becauſe the journey is too great for thee. What needed hee to travell further, ſith that divine

A divine power could as well protect him in the Wildernesse, as in Horeb? what needed he to eate, since he that meant to sustaine him forty dayes with one meale, might as well have sustained him without it? God is a most free Agent, neither will he be tyed to the termes of humane regularities: It is enough that he knowes and approves the reasons of his owne choyce and commands: once in forty dayes and nights shal Elijah eate, to teach us what God can doe with little meanes; and but once, to teach us what he can doe without meanes: once shall the Prophet eate, Man lives by bread; and but once, Man lives not by bread onely, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God: Moses, Elijah, our Saviour, fasted each of them forty dayes, and forty nights: the three great fasters met gloriously in Tabor: I doe not finde where God ever honoured any man for feasting: It is abstinence, not fulnesse, that makes a man
B capable of heavenly visions, of divine glory.

The journey was not of it selfe so long; the Prophet tooke those wayes, those houres which his heart gave him: In the very same Mount where Moses first saw God, shall Elijah see him: one and the same cave (as is very probable) was the receptacle to both: It could not be but a great confirmation of Elijah, to renue the sight of those sensible monuments of Gods favour, and protection, to his faithfull predecessor. Moses came to see God in the bush of Horeb: God came to finde Elijah in the Cave of Horeb: What doest thou here Elijah? The place was directed by a providence, not by a command: Hee is hid sure enough from Iezebel: hee cannot bee hid from the all-seeing eye of God. Whither shall I goe from thy Spirit? or Whither shall I flye from thy presence? If I ascend up into Heaven, thou art there; If I make my bed
C in Hell, behold thou art there: If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the utmost parts of the Sea, even there shall thine hand finde me, and thy right hand shall hold me: Twice hath God propounded the same question to Elijah: Once in the heart, once in the mouth of the Cave: Twice doth the Prophet answer, in the same words: Had the first answer satisfied, the question had not beene re-demanded. Now, that sullen answer which Elijah gave in the darknesse of the Cave is challenged into the Light, not without an awfull preface. The Lord first passeth by him with the terrible demonstrations of his power. A great and strong winde rent the Mountaines, and brake the Rockes in pieces: The tearing blast was from God, God was not in it: So was hee in it, as in his other extraordinary workes; not so in it, as by it to impart himselfe to Elijah: it was the Ushier not the cariage of God: After the D winde, came an Earth-quake, more fearefull than it: That did but move the ayre, this the earth; that beat upon some prominences of earth, this shooke it from the Center. After the earthquake came a fire more fearefull than either. The other affected the eare, the feeling: but this lets in horror into the soule, by the eye, the quickest and most apprehensive of the senses. Elijah shall see Gods mighty power in the earth, aire, fire, before he heare him in the soft voice: all these are but boistrous harbingers of a meek, and still word: In that God was; Behold, in that gentle and milde-breath there was omnipotencie; there was but powerfulnesse in those fierce representations: There is not alwayes the greatest efficacy where is the greatest noise: God loves to make way for himselfe by terrour, but he convayes himselfe to us in sweetnesse: It is happy for us if after the gusts and flashes of the Law, wee have heard the soft
E voice of Evangelicall mercy.

In this very mount, with the same horrour God had delivered his Law to Moses and Israel: It is no marvell if Elijah wrapt his face in his mantle: His Obedience drawes him forth to the mouth of the Cave, his feare still hides his head: Had there not beene much courage in the Prophets faith, he had not stood out these affrightfull fore-runners of the divine presence, though with his face covered: The very Angels doe no lesse, before that al-glorious Majesty then vaile themselves with their wings: Farre be it from us once to thinke of that infinite, and omnipotent Deity, without an humble awfulnesse.

Feare changes not the tenour of Elijahs answer: Hee hath not left one word behinde him in the Cave: I have beene very jealous for the Lord God of Hosts, because the children of Israel have forsaken thy Covenant, throwne downe thine Altars, and slaine thy Prophets with the ſword, and I, even I onely, am left, and they ſeeke my life to take it away. I heare not a direct anſwer from the Prophet to the demand of God: then he had ſaid, I runne away from the threats of Iezebel, and here I hide my head from her malicious purſuit: His guiltineſſe would not let him ſpeake out all: Hee had rather ſay, I have beene jealous for the Lord God of Hoſts, then, I was fearefull of Iezebel: We are all willing to make the beſt of our owne caſe: but what hee wants of his owne accuſation, hee ſpends upon the complaint of Iſrael. Neither doth he more bemone himſelfe, then exclaime againſt them, as Apoſtates from Gods Covenant, violaters of his Altars, murtherers of his Prophets: It muſt needes be a deſperate condition of Iſrael, that drives Elijah to indite them before the throne of God: That tongue of his was uſed to plead for them, to ſue for their pardon, it could not be but a forceable wickedneſſe, that makes it their accuſer. Thoſe Idolatrous Iſraelites were well forward to reformation: The fire and raine from heaven at the prayers of Elijah had wonne them to a ſcorne of Baal; onely the violence of Iezebel turned the ſtream, and now they are re-ſetled in impiety, & perſecute him for an enemy, whom they almoſt adored for a benefactor; otherwiſe, Elijah had not complained of what they had beene: Who would thinke it? Iezebel can doe more than Elijah: No miracle is ſo prevalent with the vulgar, as the ſway of authority, whether to good, or evill.

Thou art deceived, O Elijah; thou art not left alone; neither is all Iſrael tainted: God hath children and Prophets in Iſrael, though thou ſee them not; Thoſe cleere eyes of the Seer diſcerne not the ſecret ſtorie of God: they lookt not into Obadiahs Caves, they lookt not into the cloſets of the religious Iſraelites; he that ſees the heart can ſay, I have left me ſeven thouſand in Iſrael, all the knees which have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth which hath not kiſſed him: According to the faſhion of the wealthy, God pleaſeth himſelfe in hidden treaſures; it is enough that his owne eyes behold his riches: Never did hee, never will hee leave himſelfe unfurniſhed with holy clients, in the midſt of the fouleſt depravations of his Church: The ſight of his faithfull ones hath ſometimes beene loſt, never the being: Doe your worſt, O yee Gates of Hell, God will have his owne: He that could have more, will have ſome: that foundation is ſure, God knoweth who are his.

It was a true cordiall for Elijahs ſolitarineſſe, that hee had ſeven thouſand inviſible abettors; neither is it a ſmall comfort to our weakneſſe to have companions in good: for the wickedneſſe of Iſrael God hath another receit; the oyle of royall and propheticall unction; Elijah muſt anoint Hazael King of Syria, Iehu King of Iſrael; Eliſha for his ſucceſſor: All theſe ſhall revenge the quarrels of God, and him; one ſhall begin, the other ſhall proſecute, the third ſhall perfect the vengeance upon Iſrael.

A Prophet ſhall avenge the wrongs done to a Prophet: Eliſha is found, not in his ſtudy, but, in the field; not with a booke in his hand, but a plough: His father Shaphat was a rich farmer in Abel-Meholah, himſelfe was a good huſband not trained in the ſchooles of the Prophets, but, in the thrifty trade of tillage: and behold, this was the man whom God will pick out of all Iſrael for a Prophet; God ſeeth not as man ſeeth; Neither doth he chooſe men before they are fit, but therefore he fits them, becauſe he hath choſen them; his call is above all earthly inſtitution.

I heare not of ought that Elijah ſaid: Onely he caſts his cloake upon Eliſha in the paſſage; That Mantle, that act was vocall: Together with this ſigne, Gods inſtinct teacheth this amazed ſonne of Shaphat that he was deſigned to an higher worke, to breake up the fallow grounds of Iſrael, by his Propheticall function: Hee findes a ſtrange vertue in that Robe; and (as if his heart were changed with that habit) forgets his teme, and runnes after Elijah; and ſues for the leave of a farewell to his Parents, ere hee had any but a dumbe command to follow; The ſecret call of God offers an inward force to the heart, and inſenſibly drawes us beyond the power of our reſiſtance; Grace is no enemy to good nature; well may the reſpects to our earthly Parents ſtand to our duties with our Father in heaven. I doe not ſee Eliſha wring his hands and deplore his condition, that hee ſhall leave the the world, and follow a Prophet, but for the joy of that change, hee makes a feaſt: thoſe Oxen, thoſe utenſils of huſbandry whereon his former labours had beene beſtowed, ſhall now be gladly devoted to the celebration of that happy day, wherein hee is honoured with ſo bleſſed an imployment. If with deſire, if with cheerfulneſſe we doe not enter into the workes of our heavenly Maſter, they are not like to proſper in our hands: He is not worthy of this ſpirituall ſtation, who holds not the ſervice of God his higheſt, his richeſt preferment.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE EDWARD LORD DENNY, BARON OF Waltham, my bountifull and dearely Honoured Patron.

Right Honourable:

NOne can challenge so much right in these Meditations, as your Lordship, under whose happy shade they received their first conception: Under this Iuniper of yours, have I (not driven by force, but drawne by pleasure) slept thus long, sweetly, safely; and have received these Angelicall touches: How iustly may your Lordship claime the fruits of your owne favours? Your carefull studies in the booke of God, are fit to be exemplary; which have so enriched you, that your Teacher shall gaine. In this reach of divine thoughts, you shall see Benhadads insolence taken downe by Ahabs victory, an humble (though Idolatrous) Israelite carying it from an insulting Pagan: You shall see in Ahab the impotent passions of greatnesse; in Naboth bleeding honesty; in Jezebel bloody hypocrisie, cruell craft; plotting from hell, pretending from heaven: You shall see the wofull successe of an uniust mercy; Ahab forfaiting what hee gave, killed by him whom he should have killed: you shall see resolute Michaiah opposing the mercenary Synode of Prophets, a beaten victor, an imprisoned freeman: You shall see Ahaziah falling through his grate; Elijah climbing up his Mount, mounting up to his glory; fetching fire from heaven, fetcht by a fiery charet to heaven. Elisha the heire of his mantle, of his spirit, no leſſe marvellous in his beneficences, in his revenges. What doe I foretell all? Me thinkes I feele my ſelfe now too like an Italian hoſt, thus to meet your Lordſhip on the way, and to promiſe beforehand your fare and entertainment: Let it pleaſe your Lordſhip rather to ſee and allow your cheare: Indeed the feaſt is Gods, and not mine, wherein ſtore ſtrives with delicacie: If my cookery hurt it not, it is enough: Through your hands I commend it to the world, as I doe your Lordſhip, and my Honourable good Ladie, to the gracious protection of the Almighty, inſtly vowing my ſelfe.

Your Lordſhips in all faithfull obſervance for ever to command,

AHAB and BENHADAD.

Here is nothing more dangerous for any State, than to call in forraigne powers, for the ſuppreſſion of an home-bred enemie; the remedy hath oft in this caſe, proved worſe than the diſeaſe. Aſa King of Iudah implores the ayde of Benhadad, the Syrian, againſt Baaſha King of Iſrael. That ſtranger hath good colour to ſet his foot in ſome out-ſkirt-townes of Iſrael; and now theſe ſerve him but for the hanſell of more; Such ſweetneſſe doth that Edomite finde in the ſoile of Iſrael, that his ambition will not take up with leſſe than all; He that entred as a Friend, will proceed as a Conqueror; and now aimes at no leſſe than Samaria it ſelfe, the heart, the head of the ten Tribes: There was no cauſe to hope for better ſucceſſe of ſo perfidious a League with an Infidell: Who can look for other than warre when he ſees Ahab and Iezabel in the Throne, Iſrael in the groves and temples of Baalim? The ambition of Benhadad was not ſo much guilty of this warre, as the Idolatry of that wicked nation; How can they expect peace from earth, who doe wilfully fight againſt heaven? Rather will the God of Hoſts arme the brute, the ſenſeleſſe creatures againſt Iſrael, than he will ſuffer their defiance unrevenged. Ahab and Benhadad are well matched, an Idolatrous Iſraelite, with a paganiſh Idumæan; well may God plague each with other, who meanes vengeance to them both. Ahab findes himſelfe hard preſſed with the ſiege; and therefore is glad to enter into treaties of peace; Benhadad knowes his owne ſtrength; and offers inſolent conditions, Thy ſilver and thy gold is mine, thy wives alſo and thy children, even the goodlieſt are mine. It is a fearefull thing to be in the mercy of an enemy; In caſe of hoſtility might will carve for it ſelfe: Ahab now after the diviſion of Iudah, was but halfe a King; Benhadad had two and thirty Kings to attend him; What equality was in this oppoſition? Wiſely doth Ahab therefore, as a reed in a tempeſt, ſtoop to this violent charge of ſo potent an enemy: My Lord, O King, according to thy ſaying I am thine, and all that I have: It is not for the over-powred to capitulate; Weakneſſe may not argue but yeeld. Tyranny is but drawne on by ſubmiſſion; and where it findes feare, and dejection, inſulteth. Benhadad not content with the ſoveraignty of Ahabs goods, calls for the poſſeſſion; Ahab had offered the Dominion, with reſervation of his ſubordinate intereſt: he will be a tributary, ſo hee may bee an owner: Benhadad imperiouſly beſides the command, calls for the propriety; and ſuffers not the King of Iſrael to enjoy thoſe things at all, which he would enjoy but under the favour of that predominancy. Over-ſtrained ſubjection turnes deſperate; if conditions be impoſed worſe than death, there needes no long diſputation of the remedy; The Elders of Iſrael (whoſe ſhare was proportionably in this danger) hearten Ahab to a deniall: which yet comes out ſo fearefully, as that it appeares rather extorted by the peremptory peremptory indignation of the people, than proceeding out of any generosity of his Spirit: Neither doth he say, I will not, but, I may not, The proud Syrian (who would have taken it in foule scorn to be denied, though he had sent for all the heads of Israel) snuffes up the winde like the wilde Asse in the Wildernesse, and brags, and threats, and sweares, The gods doe so to me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfulls for all the people that follow me: Not the men, not the goods onely of Samaria shall be caryed away captive, but the very earth whereon it stands; and this, with how much ease? No Souldier shall need to be charged with more than an handfull, to make a valley where the mother City of Israel once stood: Oh vaine boaster! In whom I know not whether pride or folly be more eminent: Victorie is to bee atchieved, not to be sworne: future events are no matter of an oath; Thy gods (if they had beene) might have beene called as witnesses of thy intentions, not of that successe, whereof thou wouldest bee the Author without them: Thy gods can doe nothing to thee, nothing for thee, nothing for themselves; all thine Aramites shall not cary away one corne of sand out of Israel, except it bee upon the soles of their feet, in their shamefull flight; It is well, if they can cary backe those skins that they brought thither: Let not him that girdeth on his harnesse boast himselfe as hee that putteth it off: There is no cause to feare that man that trustes in himselfe. Man may cast the dice of war, but the disposition of them is of the Lord.

Ahab was lewd, but Benhadad was insolent; If therefore Ahab shall bee scourged with the rod of Benhadads feare; Benhadad shall be smitten with the sword of Ahabs revenge; Of all things God will not endure a presumptuous, and selfe-confident Vaunter; after Elijahs flight and complaint, yet a Prophet is addressed to Ahab; Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou seene all this great multitude? behold I will deliver it into thine hand, this day, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. Who can wonder enough at this unweariable mercy of God? After the fire and raine fetcht miraculously from Heaven, Ahab had promised much, performed nothing, yet againe will God blesse and solicit him with victory; One of those Prophets whom he persecuted to death shall comfort his dejection with the newes of deliverance and triumph: Had this great worke beene wrought without premonition; either chance, or Baal, or the golden calves had caryed away the thankes: Before hand therefore shall Ahab know both the Author and the meanes of his victory; God for the Author, the two hundred thirty two young men of the Princes for the meanes; What are these for the Vantgard, and seven thousand Israelites for the maine battell, against the troupes of three and thirty Kings, and as many centuries of Syrians, as Israel had single souldiers? An equality of number had taken away the wonder of the event; but now, the God of hosts will be confessed in this issue, not the valour of men; How indifferēt it is with thee, O Lord, to save by many, or by few; to destroy many or few? A world is no more to thee than a man; how easie is it for thee to enable us to be more than Conquerors over Principalities & Powers: to subdue spirituall wickednesses to flesh and blood? Through thee we can doe great things, yea wee can doe all things through thee that strengtheneſt us; Let not us want faith, we are sure there can be no want in thy power or mercy.

There was nothing in Benhadads pavilions but drink, and surfet, and jollity; as if wine should make way for blood; Security is the certain usher of destruction: we never have so much cause to feare as when we feare nothing. This handfull of Israel dares look out (upon the Prophets assurance) to the vast hoast of Benhadad: It is enough for that proud Pagan to sit still, and command amongst his cups: To defile their fingers with the blood of so few, seemed no mastery; that act would be inglorious on the part of the Victors: More easily might they bring in three heads of dead enemies than one alive: Imperiously enough therefore doth this boaster out of his chaire of state and ease, command, Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether they be come out for war, take them alive; There needs no more, but, Take them, this field is won with a word. Oh the vaine and ignorant presumptions of wretched men, that will be reckoning without, against their Maker.

Every Israelite kills his man, the Syrians flee, and cannot runne away from death:

Benhadad

A Benhadad and his Kings, are more beholding to their horſes, than to their gods, or themſelves for life and ſafetie, elſe they had beene either taken or ſlaine, by thoſe, whom they commanded to be taken.

How eaſie is it for him that made the heart, to fill it with terror, and conſternation, even where no feare is? Thoſe whom God hath deſtined to ſlaughter, hee will ſmite, neither needs he any other enemy or executioner, than what he findes in their owne boſome: We are not the maſters of our owne courage, or feares; both are put into us by that over-ruling power that created us. Stay now, O ſtay, thou great King of Syria, and take with thee thoſe forgotten handfulls of the duſt of Iſrael: Thy gods will doe ſo to thee, and more alſo, if thy followers returne without their vowed burden: Learne now of the deſpiſed King of Iſrael, from henceforth not to ſound the triumph before the battell; not to boaſt thy ſelfe in the girding on of thy harneſſe, as
B in the putting off.

I heare not of either the publike thankſgiving, or amendment of Ahab. Neither danger nor victory can change him from himſelfe: Benhadad and he, though enemies, agree in unrepentance; the one is no more moved with mercy, then the other with judgement: Neither is God any changeling in his proceedings towards both; his judgement ſhall ſtill follow the Syrian, his mercy Iſrael: mercy, both in fore-warning and redelivering Ahab; Judgement, in overthrowing Benhadad. The Prophet of God comes againe, & both foretels the intended re-encounter of the Syrian, and adviſes the care, and preparation of Iſrael: Goe ſtrengthen thy ſelfe, and mark, and ſee what thou doeſt; for, at the returne of the yeare, the King of Syria will come up againſt thee: God
C purpoſeth the deliverance of Iſrael, yet may not they neglect their fortifications; The mercifull intentions of God towards them may not make them careleſſe; The induſtry and courage of the Iſraelites fall within the decree of their victory; Security is the bane of good ſucceſſe; It is no contemning of a foyled enemy; the ſhame of a former diſgrace and miſcariage, whets his valor, & ſharpens it to revenge: No power is ſo dreadfull, as that which is recollected from an overthrow.

The hoſtility againſt the Iſrael of God may ſleepe, but will hardly die. If the Aramites ſit ſtil, it is but till they be fully ready for an aſſault; Time wil ſhew that their ceſſation was onely for their advantage; neither is it otherwiſe with our ſpirituall adverſaries: ſometimes their onſets are intermitted; they tempt not alwaies, they alwayes hate us: their forbearance is not out of favour, but attendance of opportunity;
D happy are we, if out of a ſuſpition of their ſilence, we can as buſily prepare for their reſiſtance, as they doe for our impugnation.

As it is a ſhame to be beaten, ſo yet the ſhame is leſſe, by how much the victor is greater; to mitigate the grief, and indignation of Benhadads foile, his parafites aſcribe it to gods, not to men; an humane power could no more have vanquiſh't him, than a divine power could by him be reſiſted; Their gods are gods of the hills; Ignorant Syrians, that name gods, and confine them; varying their deities according to ſituatiõs; They ſaw that Samaria (whence they were repelled) ſtood upon the hill of Shemer? They ſaw the Temple of Ieruſalem ſtood upon mount Sion; they knew it uſuall with the Iſraelites to ſacrifice in their high places, and perhaps they had heard of Eliiahs
E altar, upon mount Carmel; and now they ſottiſhly meaſure the effects of the power, by the place of the worſhip; as if he that was omnipotent on the hill, were impotent in the Valley; What doltiſh conceits doth blinde Paganiſme frame to it ſelfe of a Godhead? As they have many gods, ſo finite; every region, every hill, every dale, every ſtreame hath their ſeverall gods, and each ſo knowes his owne bounds, that hee dares not offer to incroach upon the other; or, if he doe, abuyes it with loſſe: Who would think that ſo groſſe blockiſhneſſe ſhould finde harbour in a reaſonable ſoule? A man doth not alter with his ſtation; He that wraſtled ſtrongly upon the hill, loſeth not his force in the plaine; all places finde him alike active, alike valorous; yet theſe barbarous Aramites ſhame not to imagine that of God, which they would bluſh to affirme of their owne champions. Superſtition infatuates the heart out of meaſure; neither is there any fancy ſo abſurd or monſtrous, which credulous infidelity is not ready to entertaine with applauſe.

In

In how high ſcorne doth God take it to be thus baſely under-valued by rude heathen? This very miſ-opinion concerning the God of Iſrael ſhall coſt the Syrians a ſhamefull, and perfect deſtruction; They may call a Councell of War, and lay their heads together, and change their Kings into Captaines, and their hills into valleyes, but they ſhall finde more graves in the plaines, then in the mountaines; This very miſ-priſon of God ſhall make Ahab (though he were more lewd) victorious; An hundred thouſand Syrians ſhall fall in one day, by thoſe few hands of Iſrael; And a dead wall in Aphek (to whoſe ſhelter they fled) ſhall revenge God upon the reſt that remained; The ſtones in the wall ſhall rather turne executioners, then a blaſphemous Aramite ſhall eſcape unrevenged. So much doth the jealous God hate to be robd of his glory, even by ignorant Pagans, whoſe tongues might ſeeme no ſlander. That proud head of Benhadad, that ſpoke ſuch big words of the duſt of Iſrael, and ſwore by his gods, that he would kill and conquer, is now glad to hide it ſelfe in a blinde hole of Aphek; and now inſtead of queſtioning the power of the God of Iſrael, is glad to heare of the mercy of the Kings of Iſrael; Behold, now, wee have heard that the Kings of the houſe of Iſrael are mercifull Kings; Let us, I pray thee, put ſackcloth on our loines, and ropes on our heads, and go out to the King of Iſrael, peradventure hee will ſave thy life. There can be no more powerfull attractive of humble ſubmiſſion, then the intimation and conceit of mercy; We doe at once feare, and hate the inexorable; This is it, O Lord, that allures us to thy throne of grace, the knowledge of the grace of that throne; with thee is mercy and plenteous redemption; thine hand is open before our mouths, before our hearts; If we did not ſee thee ſmile upon ſuiters, we durſt not preſſe to thy foorſtoole; Behold now we know that the King of heaven, the God of Iſrael, is a mercifull God; Let us put ſackcloth upon our loines, and ſtrew aſhes upon our heads, and goe meet the Lord God of Iſrael, that he may ſave our ſoules.

How well doth this habit become inſolent, and blaſphemous Benhadad and his follower? a rope, and ſackcloth? A rope for a Crowne, ſackcloth for a robe; Neither is there leſſe change in the tongue, Thy ſervant Benhadad ſaith, I pray thee let me live. Even now the King of Iſrael ſaid to Benhadad, My Lord O King, I am thine: Tell my Lord the King, all that thou didſt ſend for to thy ſervant, I will doe: Now Benhadad ſends to the King of Iſrael, Thy ſervant Benhadad ſaid, I pray thee let me live: He that was ere while a Lord and King, is now a ſervant; and he that was a ſervant to the king of Syria, is now his Lord: he that would blow away all Iſrael in duſt, is now glad to beg for his own life at the doore of a deſpiſed enemy; no courage is ſo haughty, which the God of hoſts cannot eaſily bring under; what are men or devils in thoſe Almighty hands?

The greater the dejection was, the ſtronger was the motive of commiſeration; That haltar pleaded for life, and that plea for but a life, ſtirred the bowels for favour: How readily did Ahab ſee in Benhadads ſudden miſery the image of the inſtability of all humane things? and relents at the view of ſo deep and paſſionate a ſubmiſſion. Had not Benhadad ſaid, Thy ſervant, Ahab had never ſaid, My brother; ſeldome ever was there loſſe in humility; How much leſſe can we feare diſparagement, in the annihilating of our ſelves, before that infinite Majeſtie? The drowning man ſnatches at every twig; It is no marvell if the meſſengers of Benhadad cacht haſtily at that laſt of grace, and hold it faſt, Thy brother Benhadad; Favours are wont to draw on each other: Kindneſſes breed on themſelves: neither need wee any other perſwaſion to beneficence, then from our owne acts. Ahab cals for the King of Syria, ſets him in his own Charet; treats with him of an eaſie (yet firme) league, gives him both his life, and his Kingdome. Neither is the Crowne of Syria ſooner loſt, than recovered; Onely he that came a free Prince, returnes tributary: Onely his traine is clipt too ſhort for his wings; an hundred twenty ſeven thouſand Syrians are abated of his Guard, homeward. Blaſphemy hath eſcaped too well, Ahab hath at once peace with Benhadad, warre with God; God proclaimes it by his Herald, one of the ſonnes of the Prophets; not yet in his owne forme, but diſguiſed both in faſhion, and complaint; It was a ſtrange ſuit of a Prophet, Smite me I pray thee; Many a Prophet was ſmitten, and would not; never any but this wiſhed to be ſmitten; The reſt of his fellowes

A lowes were glad to ſay, Save mee; this onely ſayes, Smite mee; His honeſt neighbour, out of love and reverence, forbeares to ſtrike; There are too many (thinkes hee) that ſmite the Prophets, though I refraine; What wrong haſt thou done that I ſhould repay with blowes? Hadſt thou ſued for a favour, I could not have denyed thee, now thou ſueſt for thine hurt, the deniall is a favour, Thus he thought; but Charity cannot excuſe diſobedience; Had the man of God called for blowes, (upon his owne head) the refuſall had beene juſt and thank-worthy; but now that he ſayes, In the Word of the Lord, Smite me, this kindneſſe is deadly: Becauſe thou haſt not obeyed the voyce of the Lord, behold, aſſoone as thou art departed from me a Lyon ſhall ſlay thee; It is not for us to examine the charges of the Almighty; Be they never ſo harſh, or improbable, (if they be once knowne for his) there is no way but obedience, or death. Not to
B ſmite a Prophet, when God commands, is no leſſe ſinne, then to ſmite a Prophet, when God forbids; It is the divine precept or prohibition, that either makes or aggravates an evill; And if the Iſraelite be thus revenged, that ſmote not a Prophet, what ſhall become of Ahab that ſmote not Benhadad? Every man is not thus indulgent; an eaſie requeſt will gaine blowes to a Prophet from the next hand; yea, and a wound in ſmiting. I know not whether it were an harder taſke for the Prophet to require a wound, then for a well-meaning Iſraelite to give it; Both muſt be done; The Prophet hath what he would, what he muſt will, a ſight of his owne blood: and now diſguiſed herewith, and with aſhes upon his face, he way-layes the King of Iſrael, and ſadly complaines of himſelfe in a reall parable, for diſmiſſing a Syrian priſoner delivered to his hands, upon no leſſe charge then his life; and ſoone
C receives ſentence of death, from his owne mouth: Well was that wound beſtowed that ſtrucke Ahabs ſoule through the fleſh of the Prophet: The diſguiſe is removed; The King ſees not a ſouldier, but a Seer, and now finds that he hath unawares paſſed ſentence upon himſelfe. There needs no other doome then from the lips of the offender: Thus ſaith the Lord, Becauſe thou haſt let go out of thy hand a man whom I appointed to utter deſtruction, therefore thy life ſhall go for his life, and thy people for his people: Had not Ahab known the will of God concerning Benhadad, that had beene mercy to an enemy, which was now cruelty to himſelfe, to Iſrael: His eares had heard of the blaſphemies of that wicked tongue: His eyes had ſeene God go before him, in the example of that revenge; No Prince can ſtrike ſo deepe into his ſtate, as in not ſtriking: In private favour there may be publike unmercifulneſſe.
D

Ahab and Naboth.

Naboth had a faire Vineyard; It had beene better for him to have had none; His vineyard yeelded him the bitter Grapes of death. Many a one hath beene ſold to death by his lands and goods; wealth hath been a ſnare, as to the ſoule, ſo to the life; Why doe wee call thoſe goods, which are many times the bane of the owner? Naboths Vineyard lay neere to the Court of Iezebel; It had beene better for him, it had been planted in the E wilderneſſe; Doubtleſſe this vicinity made it more commodious to the poſſeſſor; but more envious and unſafe: It was now the perpetuall object of an evill eye, and ſtirred thoſe deſires, which could neither be well denyed, nor ſatisfied: Eminency is ſtill joyned with perill, obſcurity with peace; There can be no worſe annoyance to an inheritance, then the greatneſſe of an evil neighbourhood: Naboths vines ſtood too neere the ſmoake of Iezebels chimneys; too much within the proſpect of Ahabs window; Now lately had the King of Iſrael beene twice victorious over the Syrians; no ſooner is he returned home then he is overcome with evill deſires; The foyle he gave was not worſe then that hee tooke: There is more true glory in the conqueſt of our luſts, then in all the bloody Trophees; In vaine ſhall Ahab boaſt of ſubduing a forraine enemy, whiles he is ſubdued by a domeſtick enemy within his owne breſt; Opportunity and Convenience is guilty of many a theft: Had not this ground lyen ſo faire, Ahab had not beene tempted: His eye lets in this evill gueſt into the ſoule, which now dares come forth at the mouth; Give mee thy Vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbes, becauſe it is neere to my houſe, and I will give thee a better Vineyard for it, or if it ſeeme good to thee, I will give thee the worth of it in money; Yet had Ahab ſo much civility, and juſtice, that he would not wring Naboths patrimony out of his hand by force, but requires it upon a faire cõpoſition, whether of price, or of exchange: His government was vicious, not tyrannicall; Propriety of goods was inviolably maintained by him; No leſſe was Naboth allowed to claime a right in his vineyard, then Ahab in his palace; This we owe to lawfull Soveraignty to call ought our owne, and well worthy is this priviledge to be repaid with all humble and loyall reſpects. The motion of Ahab (had it beene to any other then an Iſraelite) had been as juſt, equall, reaſonable, as the repulſe had been rude, churliſh, inhumane. It is fit that Princes ſhould receive due ſatisfactiõ in the juſt demands, not only of their neceſſities, but convenience, and pleaſure; well may they challenge this retribution to the benefit of our common peace and protection; If there be any ſweetneſſe in our vineyards, any ſtrength in our fields, we may thanke their ſcepters; Juſtly may they expect from us the cõmoditie, the delight of their habitation; and if we gladly yeeld not to their full elbow-roome, both of ſite and proviſion, we can be no other then ingratefull; Yet dares not Naboth give any other anſwer to ſo plauſible a motion, then, The Lord forbid it me, that I ſhould give thee the inheritance of my Fathers: The honeſt Iſraelite ſaw violence in this ingenuity; There are no ſtronger commands, then the requeſts of the great. It is wel that Ahab wil not wreſt away this patrimony, it is not well that he deſired it; The land was not ſo much ſtood upon, as the law; One earth might be as good as another, and money equivalent to eyther: The Lord had forbidden to alien their inheritance: Naboth did not feare loſſe, but ſinne: What Naboth might not lawfully doe, Ahab might not lawfully require: It pleaſed God to be very punctuall, and cautelous, both in the diſtinctiõ, and preſervation of the intireneſſe of theſe Jewiſh inheritances: Nothing but extreme neceſſity might warrant a ſale of land, and that, but for a time; if not ſooner, yet at the Jubile, it muſt revert to the firſt owner: It was not without a comfortable ſignification, that whoſoever had once his part in the land of Promiſe, could never loſe it; Certainly Ahab could not but know this divine reſtrictiõ, yet doubts not to ſay, Give me thy vineyard; The uncõſcionable wil know no other law but their profit, their pleaſure. A lawleſſe greatneſſe hates all limitations, and abides not to heare men ſhould need any other warrant but will.

Naboth dares not be thus tractable; How gladly would he be quit of his inheritance, if God would acquit him from the ſin? Not out of wilfulneſſe, but obedience, doth this faithfull Iſraelite hold off frõ this demand of his Soveraine; not daring to pleaſe an earthly King with offending the heavenly: When Princes command lawfull things, God commands by them; when unlawfull, they command againſt God; paſſive obedience we muſt give, active we may not; we follow them as ſubordinate, not as oppoſite to the higheſt.

Who cannot but ſee and pitty the ſtraits of honeſt Naboth: Ahab requires what God forbids; he muſt fall out either with his God, or his King: Conſcience caries him againſt policy; and he reſolves not to ſin, that he might be gracious. For a world he may not give his Vineyard: Thoſe who are themſelves godleſſe, thinke the holy care of others but idly ſcrupulous: The King of Iſrael could not chuſe but ſee that onely Gods prohibition lay in the way of his deſignes, not the ſtomacke of a froward ſubject; yet he goes away into his houſe heavy and diſpleaſed, and caſts himſelfe downe upon his bed, turnes away his face, and refuſes his meat; Hee hath taken a ſurfet of Naboths grapes which marres his appetite, and threates his life: How ill can great hearts endure to bee croſſed, though upon the moſt reaſonable and juſt grounds; Ahabs place call'd him to the Guardianſhip of Gods Law; and now his heart is ready to breake, that this parcell of that Law may not be broken: No marvell if hee made not dainty to tranſgreſſe a locall ſtatute of God, who did ſo ſhamefully violate the eternall Law of both Tables,

I know not whether the ſpleen, or the gal of Ahab be more affected; Whether more

of

A of anger, or griefe, I cannot say; but sick he is & keeps his bed, and balks his meat, as if he should die of no other death, then the salads that he would have had: O the impotent passion and insatiable desires of Covetousnesse! Ahab is Lord and King of all the territories of Israel; Naboth is the owner of one poore Vineyard; Ahab cannot injoy Israel, if Naboth injoy his Vineyard; Besides Samaria, Ahab was the great Lord Paramount of Damascus and all Syria, the victor of him that was attended with two and thirty Kings; Naboth was a plaine townsman of Jezreel, the good husband of a little Vineyard; Whether is the wealthier? I do not heare Naboth wish for any thing of Ahabs, I heare Ahab wishing (not without indignation of a repulse) for somewhat from Naboth: Riches and poverty, is no more in the heart then in the hand; He is wealthy that is contented, he is poore that wanteth more: Oh rich Naboth, that careſt not for all the large possessions of Ahab; so thou maist be the Lord of thine owne
B Vineyard; Oh miserable Ahab, that careſt not for thine owne possessions whiles thou mayest not be the Lord of Naboths Vineyard.

He that caused the disease sends him a Physitian; Satan knew of old how to make use of such helpers; Iezebel comes to Ahabs bed side, and casts cold water in his face, and puts into him spirits of her owne extracting. Dost thou now governe the Kingdome of Israel? Arise, eat bread, and let thine heart be merry, I will give thee the Vineyard of Naboth. Ahab wanted neither wit, nor wickednesse; Yet is he in both, a very novice to this Zidonian dame. There needs no other Devill, than Iezebel, whether to project evill, or to worke it: She chides the pusillanimity of her dejected husband, and perswades him his rule cannot be free, unlesse it be licentious; that there should bee no
C bounds for soveraignty, but will: Already hath she contrived to have by fraud and force, what was denied to intreaty; Nothing needs but the name, but the seale of Ahab: let her alone with the rest: How present are the wits of the weaker sex for the devising of wickednesse? She frames a letter in Ahabs name, to the Senatours of Jezreel, wherein she requires them to proclaime a fast, to suborne two false witnesses against Naboth, to charge him with blasphemy against God and the King, to stone him to death; A ready payment for a rich Vineyard: Whose indignation riseth not, to heare Iezebel name a fast? The great contemners of the most important Lawes of God, yet can be content to make use of some divine, both statutes, and customes, for their own advantage: She knew the Israelites had so much remainder of grace, as to hold blasphemy worthy of death; She knew their manner was to expiate those crying sins
D with publike humiliatiō She knew that two witnesses at least must cast the offender; all these she urges to her own purpose. There is no mischiefe so devilish, as that wch is cloked with piety: Simulatiō of holinesse doubleth a villany; This murder had not been halfe so foule, if it had not bin thus masked with a religious observatiō; Besides devotion, what a faire pretence of legality is heere? Blasphemy against God and his Anointed may not passe unrevenged; The offender is cōvented before the sad & severe bench of Magistacy; the justice of Israel allowes not to condemn an absent, an unheard malefactor; Witnesses come forth, and agree in the intentatiō of the crime; the Judges rend their garments, and strike their brests as grieved, not more for the
E sin, than the punishment; their very countenance must say, Naboth should not die, if his offence did not force our justice, and now, he is no good subject, no true Israelite, that hath not a stone for Naboth.

Iezebel knew well to whom she wrote; Had not those letters falne upon the times of a wofull degeneration of Israel, they had received no lesse strong denials from the Elders, than Ahab had from Naboth; God forbid that the Senate of Iezreel should forge a perjury, belie truth, condemne innocency, brooke corruption: Command just things, we are ready to die in the zeale of our bedience, we dare not imbrue our hands in the blood of an innocent.

But she knew whom she had engaged; whom she had marred by making cōscions. It were strange if they who can countenance evil with greatnes, should want factors for the unjustest designes. Miserable is that people whose Rulers (instead of punishing) plot, and incourage wickednesse; when a distillation of evil falls from the head, upon the lungs of any State, there must needs follow a deadly consumption.

Yet, perhaps there wanted not ſome colour of pretence for this proceeding; They could not but heare, that ſome words had paſſed betwixt the King and Naboth; Haply it was ſuggeſted, that Naboth had ſecretly over-laſhed into ſaucy and contemptuous terms his Soveraigne, ſuch as neither might be well borne, nor yet (by reaſon of their privacy) legally convinced; the bench of Iezreel ſhould but ſupply a forme to the juſt matter, and deſert of condemnation; What was it for thē to give their hand to this obſcure midwifery of Juſtice? It is enough that their King is an accuſer and witneſſe of that wrong, which only their ſentence can formally revenge. All this cannot waſh their hands from the guilt of blood; If juſtice be blind, in reſpect of partiality, ſhe may not be blind in reſpect of the grounds of execution; Had Naboth beene a blaſphemer, or a traitor, yet theſe men were no better then murtherers; What difference is there betwixt the ſtroke of Magiſtracie, and of man-ſlaughter, but due conviction.

Wickedneſſe never ſpake out of a Throne, and complained of the defect of inſtruments; Naboth was (it ſeemes) ſtrictly conſcionable, his fellow Citizens looſe, & lawleſſe; they are glad to have gottē ſuch an opportunity of his diſpatch: No clauſe of Ahabs letter is not obſerved; A faſt is warned, the city is aſſembled, Naboth is cōvented, accuſed, confronted, ſentenced, ſtoned. His vineyard is eſcheated to the Crowne; Ahab takes ſpeedy and quiet poſſeſſion. How ſtill doth God ſit in heaven, and look upon the complots of treachery & villanies, as if they did not concern him: The ſucceſſe ſo anſwers their deſires, as if both heaven and earth were their friends. It is the plague, which ſeemes the felicity of ſinners, to ſpeed well in their lewd enterpiſes; No reckoning is brought in the midſt of the meale, the end payes for all: Whiles Ahab is rejoycing in his new garden-plot, and promiſing himſelfe contentment in this commodious enlargement, in comes Elijah, ſent from God with an errand of vengeance. Me thinks, I ſee how the Kings countenance changed; with what agaſt eyes, and pale cheeks, he lookt upon that unwelcome Prophet: Little pleaſure tooke he in his proſpect, whiles it was clogged with ſuch a gueſt: yet his tongue begins firſt; Haſt thou found me, O mine enemy? Great is the power of conſcience; upon the laſt meeting (for ought we know) Ahab and Elijah parted friends; The Prophet had lacquayed his coach, and took a peaceable leave at this townes end; now Ahabs heart told him (neither needed any other meſſenger) that God, and his Prophet were falne out with him; His cōtinuing Idolatry, now ſecōded with blood, bids him look for nothing but frownes from heaven; A guilty heart can never be at peace: Had not Ahab knowne how ill he had deſerved of God, he had never ſaluted his Prophet by the name of an enemy; Hee had never beene troubled to be found by Elijah; if his own breſt had not found him out for an enemy to God: Much good may thy vineyard do thee, O thou King of Iſrael, many faire flowres, and ſavoury herbes may thy new garden yeeld thee; pleaſe thy ſelfe with thy Iezebel, in the triumph over the carcaſſe of a ſcrupulous ſubject; let me rather die with Naboth, then rejoyce with thee: His turn is over, thine is to come: The ſtones that overwhelmed innocent Naboth, were nothing to thoſe that ſmite thee; Haſt thou killed, & alſo taken poſſeſſion? thus ſaith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, ſhall dogs lick thy blood even thine. What meaneſt thou, O Elijah, to charge this murther upon Ahab: He kept his Chamber, Iezebel wrote, the Elders condemned, the people ſtoned; yet thou ſayeſt, Haſt thou killed? Well did Ahab know that Iezebel could not give this vineyard with drie hands; yet was he content to wink at what ſhe ſhould do: He but ſits ſtill whiles Iezebel works: Only his Signet is ſuffered to walke for the ſealing of this unknowne purchaſe: Thoſe that are truſted with authority, may offend no leſſe in connivency, or neglect, thē others in act, in participation: Not onely command, conſent, countenance, but very permiſſion feoffes publike perſons in thoſe ſins, which they might, and will not prevent. God loves to puniſh by retaliation: Naboth and Ahab ſhall both bleed; Naboth by the ſtones of the Jezreelites; Ahab by the ſhafts of the Aramites; The dogs ſhall taſte of the blood of both: What Ahab hath done in cruelty, he ſhall ſuffer in juſtice: The caſe and the end make the difference happy on Naboths ſide; on Ahabs woful; Naboth bleeds as a Martyr; Ahab as a murtherer: What ever is

A Ahabs condition, Naboth changes a vineyard on earth, for a Kingdome in heaven. Never any wicked man gained by the perſecution of an innocent: Never any innocent man was a loſer by ſuffering from the Wicked.

Neither was this judgment perſonall but hereditary: I will take away thy poſterity; and will make thine houſe like the houſe of Ieroboam: Him that dyeth of Ahab in the City, the Dogs ſhal eat; and him that dieth in the field, ſhall the fowles of the ayre eat: Ahab ſhall not need to take thought for the traducing of this ill gotten inheritance; God hath taken order for his heyres; whom his ſin hath made no leſſe the heyres of his curſe, then of his body: Their fathers cruelty to Naboth hath made thē, together with their mother Iezebel, dogs-meat. The revenge of God doth at laſt make amends for the delay; Whether now is Naboths vineyard payd for?

B The man that had ſold himſelfe to worke wickedneſſe, yet rues the bargaine. I do not heare Ahab (as bad as he was) revile or threaten the Prophet, but he rends his cloathes, and weares & lies in ſack-cloth, & faſts, and walks ſoftly: Who that had ſeen Ahab would not have deemed him a true penitent: All this was the viſor of ſorrow, not the face; or if the face, not the heart; or if the ſorrow of the heart, yet not the repentance: A ſorrow for the judgement, not a repentance for the ſin: The very devils howle to be tormented; Griefe is not ever a ſigne of grace; Ahab rends his cloathes, he did not rend his heart; he puts on ſack-cloth, not amendment; he lies in ſack-cloth, but he lies in his Idolatry; he walks ſoftly, he walks not ſincerely; worldly ſorrow cauſeth death; Happy is that griefe for which the ſoule is the holier.

Yet what is this I ſee? This very ſhadow of repentance caries away mercy; It is no C ſmall mercy to defer an evill; Even Ahabs humiliation ſhal prorogue the judgment; ſuch as the penitence was, ſuch ſhal be the reward; a temporary reward of a temporary penitence; As Ahab might be thus ſorrowfull, and never the better; ſo hee may be thus favoured, and never the happier; Oh God, how graciouſly art thou ready to reward a ſound, and holy repentance, who art thus indulgent to a carnall and ſervile dejection.

AHAB and MICHAIAH:
OR,
The death of AHAB.

D WHo would have look't to have heard any more of the wars of the Syrians with Iſrael, after ſo great a ſlaughter, after ſo firme a league; a league not of peace only but of Brotherhood; The haltars, the ſack-cloth of Benhadads followers were worne out, as of uſe, ſo of memory, and now they are changed for Iron and ſteele. It is but three yeares that this peace laſts; and now that warre begins which ſhal make an end of Ahab; The King of Iſrael rues his unjuſt mercy; according to the word of the Prophet, that gift of a life, was but an exchange; Becauſe Ahab gave Benhadad his life; Benhadad ſhall take Ahabs; He muſt forfeit in himſelf what he hath givē to another. There can be no better fruit of E two much kindneſſe to Infidels; It was one Article of the league betwixt Ahab & his brother Benhadad, that there ſhould be a ſpeedy reſtitutiō of al the Iſraelitiſh Cities; The reſt are yeelded, only Ramoth Gilead is held back, unthankfully, injuriouſly; Hee that begged but his life receives his Kingdome, and now reſts not content with his own bounds; Juſtly doth Ahab challenge his owne, juſtly doth he move a war to recover his owne from a perfidious tributary; the lawfulneſſe of actions may not be judged by the events, but by the grounds; the wiſe and holy arbiter of the world knowes why many times the better cauſe hath the worſe ſucceſſe; Many a juſt buſineſſe is croſſed, for a puniſhment to the agent.

Yet Iſrael and Judah were now peeced in friendſhip; Iehoſhaphat the good King of Judah had made affinity with Ahab the Idolatrous King of Iſrael: and beſides a perſonall viſitation, joynes his forces with his new Kinſman, againſt an old confederate:

Judah had called in Syria againſt Iſrael; and now Iſrael cals in Juda againſt Syria : Thus rather ſhould it be : It is fit that the more pure Church ſhould joyne with the more corrupt, againſt a common Paganiſh enemy. A Iehoſhaphat hath match't with Ahab; not with a divorce of his devotion. Hee will fight, not without God, Inquire I pray thee at the word of the Lord, to day : Had he done thus ſooner, I feare Athaliah had never called him father: This motion was news in Iſrael; It was wont to be ſaid, Inquire of Baal : The good King of Judah will bring Religion into faſhion in the Court of Iſrael; Ahab had inquired of his Counſellors, What needed he be ſo devout, as to inquire of his Prophets? Onely Iehoſaphats preſence made him thus godly: It is an happy thing to converſe with the vertuous; their counſell and example cannot but leave ſome tincture behind them of a good profeſſion, if not of piety : Thoſe that are truely religious dare not but take God with them in all their affaires; with him they can be as valiant, as timorous without him. B

Ahab had Clergy enough, ſuch as it was : Foure hundred prophets of the groves were reſerved frō appearing to Elijahs challenge; theſe are now conſulted by Ahab : they live to betray the life of him who ſaved theirs. Theſe care not ſo much to inquire what God would ſay, as what Ahab would have them ſay; they ſaw which way the Kings heart was bent, that way they bent their tongues : Goe up, for the Lord ſhall deliver it into the hands of the King : Falſe Prophets care onely to pleaſe; a plauſible falſhood paſſes with them above an harſh truth. Had they ſeen Ahab fearefull, they had ſaid, Peace, Peace; now they ſee him reſolute, war and victory: It is a fearefull preſage of ruine when the Prophets conſpire in aſſentation.

Their number, conſent, confidence hath eaſily won credit with Ahab: We do all willingly beleeve what we wiſh; Iehoſhaphat is not ſo ſoone ſatisfied: Theſe prophets were (it is like) obtruded to him (a ſtranger) for the true Prophets of the true God: The judicious King ſees cauſe to ſuſpect thē, and now perceiving at what altars they ſerved, hates to reſt in their teſtimony : Is there not here a Prophet of the Lord beſides, that we might inquire of him? One ſingle Prophet ſpeaking from the oracles of God, is more worth than foure hundred Baalites; Truth may not ever be meaſured by the poll. It is not number but weight that muſt cary it in a Councell of Prophets; A ſolid Verity in one mouth is worthy to preponderate light falſhood in a thouſand. C

Even King Ahab (as bad as he was) kept tale of his prophets; and could give account of one that was miſſing : There is yet one man (Michaiah the ſon of Imlah) by whom we may inquire of the Lord; but I hate him, for he doth not prophecy good concerning me, but evill. It is very probable that Michaiah was that diſguiſed Prophet, who brought to Ahab the fearefull meſſage of diſpleaſure, and death, for diſmiſſing Benhadad, for which he was ever ſince faſt in priſon, deepe in diſgrace; Oh corrupt heart of ſelfe-condemned Ahab; If Michaiah ſpake true to thee, how was it evill? If others ſaid falſe, how was it good? and if Michaiah ſpake frō the Lord, why doſt thou hate him? This hath wont to be the ancient lot of Truth, cenſure and hatred; Cenſure of the meſſage, hatred of the bearer. To carnall eares the meſſage is evill, if unpleaſing; and if plauſible, good; If it be ſweet, it cannot be poiſon; if bitter, it cannot be wholeſome; The diſtemper of the receiver is guilty of this miſ-conceit; In it ſelfe every truth as it is good, ſo amiable; every faſhood loathſome, as evill; A ſicke palate cryes out of the taſt of thoſe liquors, which are wel allowed of the healthful. It is a ſigne of a good ſtate of the ſoule, when every vendure can receive his proper judgement. D E

Wiſe and good Iehoſaphat diſſwades Ahab from ſo hard an opinion, and ſees cauſe ſo much more to urge the conſultation of Michaiah, by how much he findes him more unpleaſing; The King of Iſrael to ſatisfie the importunity of ſo great, and deare an Allie, ſends an Officer for Michaiah; He knew well (belike) where to finde him; within thoſe foure walls, where unjuſt cruelty had diſpoſed of that innocent Seer. Out of the obſcurity of the priſon, is the poore Prophet fetcht in the light of ſo glorious a Confeſſiō of two Kings, who thought this Convocation of Prophets not unworthy of their greateſt repreſentation of State and Majeſty; There he finds Zedekiah, the leader of that falſe crue, not ſpeaking only, but acting his prediction; Signes were no leſſe uſed by the Prophets, then words; this arch-flatterer hath made him hornes

A hornes of iron; the horne is forcible, the iron irreſiſtible; by an irreſiſtible force ſhall Ahab puſh the Syrians; as if there were more certainty in this mans hands thē in his tongue: If this ſon of Chenaanah had not had a fore-head of braſſe for impudēcy, & a heart of Lead for flexibleneſſe to humors, & times, he had never deviſed theſe horns of iron, wherewith his King was goared unto blood: Howſoever, it is enough for him that he is beleeved, that he is ſeconded: All the great inqueſt of theſe Prophets gave up their verdict by this foreman: not one of foure hundred diſſented: Unanimity of opinion in the greateſt Eccleſiaſticall aſſemblies is not ever an argument of truth: There may be as common, and as firme agreement in error.

The meſſenger that came for Michaiah, like a carnall friend, ſets him in a way of favour: tels him what the reſt ſaid, how they pleaſed: how unſafe it would be for him to varie, how beneficiall to aſſent: Thoſe that adore earthly greatneſſe, thinke every B man ſhould dote upon their Idols, and hold no tearms too high for their ambitious purchaſes. Faithfull Michaiah ſcornes the motion, he knows the price of the word, and contemnes it, As the Lord liveth, what the Lord ſaith unto me, that will I ſpeake: Neither feares, nor favours, can tempt the holily reſolute: They can trample upon dangers, or honors, with a careleſſe foot; and whether they be ſmiled or frowned on by the great, dare not either alter, or conceale their errand.

The queſtion is moved to Michaiah; He at firſt ſo yeelds, that he cōtradicts; yeelds in words, contradicts in pronunciation; The ſyllables are for them, the ſound againſt them: Ironies deny ſtrongeſt in affirming; and now being preſſed home, he tels them that God had ſhewed him thoſe ſheep of Iſrael ſhould ere long, by this means, want C their Shepheard; The very reſemblance, to a good Prince, had beene affective; The ſheep is an helpleſſe creature, not able either to guard or guide it ſelf; al the ſafety, all the direction of it, is from the keeper; without whom, every curre chaſes and werries it, every track ſeduceth it; Such ſhall Iſrael ſoone be, if Ahab be ruled by his prophets; The King of Iſrael doth not beleeve, but quarrell; not at himſelfe, who had deſerved evill, but at the Prophet, who foreſignified it, and is more carefull that the King of Juda ſhould marke how true he had fore-told concerning the Prophet, than how the Prophet had fore-told concerning him.

Bold Michaiah (as no whit diſcouraged with the uniuſt checks of greatnes) doubles his prediction, and by a ſecond viſion particularizeth the meanes of this dangerous errour. Whiles the two Kings ſate majeſtically in their Thrones, he tels them of a D more glorious Throne, then theirs, whereon he ſaw the King of Gods ſitting: Whiles they were cōpaſſed with ſome hundreds of prophets, and thouſands of Subjects, and Souldiers, he tells them of all the hoſt of heavē, attending that other Throne; Whiles they were deliberating of a war, he tels them of a God of heaven juſtly decreeing the judgement of a deadly deception to Ahab: The decree of the Higheſt is not more plainely revealed, thē expreſſed parabolically. The wiſe and holy God is repreſented, after the manner of men, conſulting of that ruine, which he intended to the wicked King of Iſrael; That increated and infinite wiſdome, needs not the advice of any finite, and created powers, to direct him, needs not the aſſent, and aid of any ſpirit for his execution; much leſſe of an evil one: yet here an evil ſpirit is brought in (by way of viſion mixt with parable) profering the ſervice of his lie, accepted, imployed, E ſucceſſefull: Theſe figures are not voyd of truth: The action and event is reduced to a decree; the decree is ſhadowed out by the reſemblance of humane proceedings: All evil motions, and counſels are originally from that malignant Spirit: That evill ſpirit could have no power over men, but by the permiſſiō, by the decree of the Almighty: That Almighty, as he is no Author of ſin, ſo he ordinates all evill to good: It is good that is juſt; it is good that one ſin ſhould be puniſhed by another: Satan is herein no other then the executioner of that God, who is as farre from infuſing evill as from not revenging it. Now Ahab ſees the ground of that applauſed conſent of his rabble of prophets; one evill ſpirit hath no leſſe deceived them, than they their maſter; he is one, therefore he agrees with himſelfe; he is evill, therefore both he and they agree in deceit.

Oh the noble and undaunted ſpirit of Michaiah: neither the Thrones of the Kings, nor nor the number of the Prophets could abate one word of his true (though displeasing) message; The King of Israell shal heare, that he is mis-led by lyers, they by a devill: Surely Iehoshaphat cannot but wonder at so unequall a contentiō: to see one silly Prophet affronting foure hundred; with whom lest cōfidence should carry it, behold Zedekiah more bold, more zealous : If Michaiah haue given him (with his fellowes) the lye, he gives Michaiah the fist : before these two great Guardians of peace, and justice, swaggering Zedekiah smites Michaiah on the face; & with the blow expostulates; Which way went the spirit of the Lord from me, to speake unto thee? For a Prophet to smite a Prophet, in the face of two Kings, was intolerably insolent; the act was much unbeseeming the person, more the presence; Prophets may reprove, they may not strike; It was enough for Ahab to punish with the hand; no weapon was for Zedekiah, but his tongue; neither could this rude presumption have been well taken, if malice had not made magistracy insensibly of this usurpation; Ahab was well content to see that hated mouth beaten by any hand. It is no new condition of Gods faithful messengers to smart for saying truth. Falshood doth not more bewray it self in any thing then in blowes; Truth suffers, whiles errour persecutes; None are more ready to boast of the Spirit of God, then those that have the least; As in vessels, the full are silent.

Innocent Michaiah, neither defends, nor complaines; It would have well beseemed the religious King of Judah, to have spoken in the cause of the dumbe, to have checked insolent Zedekiah; He is content to give way to this tide of peremptory, and generall opposition: The helples Prophet stands alone, yet layes about him with his tongue, Behold, thou shalt see in that day, when thou shalt go into an inner chamber, and hide thy self. Now the proud Baalite shewed himself too much; ere long he shall be glad to lurke unseene; his hornes of iron cannot beare off this danger. The sonne of Ahab cannot chuse but, in the zeale of revenging his fathers deadly seducement, call for that false head of Zedekiah : In vaine shall that Impostor seeke to hide himselfe from justice : But, in the meane while, he goes away with honour, Michaiah with censure. Take Michaiah, and cary him backe to Amon, the Governour of the City, and to Ioash the Kings sonne; and say, Thus saith the King, Put this fellow in prison, and feed him with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, untill I come in peace.

An hard doome of Truth; The Jayle for his lodging; coorse bread and water for his food, shall but reserve Michaiah for a further revenge. The returne of Ahab shall be the bane of the Prophet : Was not this he that advised Benhadad, not to boast in the putting on his Armour, as in the ungirding it; and doth he now promise himselfe peace and victory, before he buckle it on? No warning will disswade the wilfull; So assured doth Ahab make himselfe of successe, that he threats ere he goe, what he will do when he returnes in peace : How justly doth God deride the misreckonings of proud and foolish men; If Ahab had no other sinnes, his very confidence shall defeat him; yet the Prophet cannot be overcome in his resolution; hee knows his grounds cannot deceive him, and dare therefore cast the credit of his function upon this issue : If thou returne at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me: And hee sayd, Hearken, O people, every one of you; Let him never bee called a Prophet, that dare not trust his God: This was no adventure therefore of reputation, or life; since hee knew whom he beleeved, the event was no lesse sure, then if it had beene past: Hee is no God that is not constant to himselfe : Hath hee spoken, and shall he not performe ? What hold have we for our soules, but his eternall Word? The being of God is not more sure, then his promises, then his sentences of judgement. Well may we appeale the testimonie of the world in both : if there bee not plagues for the wicked; if there be not rewards for the righteous; God hath not spoken by us.

Not Ahab onely, but good JEHOSHAPHAT is caried with the multitude; Their forces are joyned against Ramoth: The King of Israel doth not so trust his Prophets, that he dares trust himselfe in his owne cloathes: Thus shall hee elude Michaiahs threat; Iwis, the judgement of God, the Syrian shafts cannot finde him out in this unsuspected

A ſuſpected diſguiſe: How fondly do vaine men imagine to ſhift off the juſt revenges of the Almighty.

The King of Syria gives charge to his Captaines to fight againſt none, but the King of Iſrael; Thus doth the unthankfull Infidell repay the mercy of his late victor; Ill was the Snake ſaved, that requites the favour of his life, with a ſting; Thus ſtill the greateſt are the faireſt marke to envious eyes. By how much more eminent any man is in the Iſrael of God, ſo many more, and more dangerous enemies muſt he expect; Both earth and hell conſpire in their oppoſition to the worthieſt. Thoſe who are advanced above others, have ſo much more need of the guard, both of their own vigilancy, and others prayers. Iehoſhapat had like to have payd deare for his love; He is purſued, for him, in whoſe amitie he offended; His cryes deliver him; his cries, not to his purſuers, but to his God, whoſe mercy takes not advantage of our infirmity, but reſcues us from thoſe evils, which we wilfully provoke; It is Ahab againſt whom, not the Syrians only, but God himſelfe intends this quarrell; The enemy is taken off from Iehoſhaphat; Oh the juſt and mighty hand of that divine providence, which directeth all our actions to his owne ends; which takes order where every ſhaft ſhall light; and guides the arrow of the ſtrong Archer, into the joynts of Ahabs harneſſe; It was ſhot at a venture, fals by a deſtiny; and there fals where it may carie death to an hidden debtor; In all actions both voluntary and caſuall, thy will, O God, ſhall be done by us, with what ever intentions. Little did the Syrian know whom he had ſtriken, no more then the arrow wherewith he ſtroke; An inviſible hand diſpoſed of both, to the puniſhment of Ahab, to the vindication of Michaiah; How worthily, O God, art thou to be adored in thy juſtice, and wiſdome, to be feared in thy judgements. Too late doth Ahab now think of the faire warnings of Michaiah, which he unwiſely cõtemned; of the painfull flatteries of Zedekiah, which he ſtubbornly beleeved; That guilty blood of his runs downe out of his wound, into the midſt of his charet, and payes Naboth his arrerages; O Ahab, what art thou the better for thine Ivory houſe, whiles thou haſt a blacke ſoule? What comfort haſt thou now, in thoſe flattering prophets, which tickled thine eares, and ſecured thee of victories? What joy is it to thee now, that thou waſt great? Who had not rather be Michaiah in the Jayle, then Ahab in the Charet: Wicked men have the advantage of the way, godly men of the end: The Charet is waſhed in the poole of Samaria, the dogges come to claime their due: they licke up the blood of the King of Iſrael: The tongues of thoſe brute creatures ſhall make good the tongue of Gods Prophet: Michaiah is juſtified, Naboth is revenged, the Baalites confounded, Ahab judged: Righteous art thou O God in all thy wayes, and holy in all thy works.

Ahaziah ſicke, and Elijah revenged.

AHaziah ſucceeded his father Ahab, both in his Throne, and in his ſinne: Who could looke for better iſſue of thoſe loynes, of thoſe examples? God followes him with a double judgement; of the revolt of Moab, and of his owne ſickneſſe: All the reigne of Ahab, had Moab beene a quiet Tributarie; and furniſhed Iſrael with rich flocks, and fleeces; now their ſubjection dies with that warlike King, and wil not be inherited: This rebellion took advantage, as from the weaker ſpirits, ſo from the ſickly body of Ahaziah, whoſe diſeaſe was not naturall, but caſuall: walking in his Palace of Samaria, ſome grate in the floore of his Chamber, breaks under him, and gives way to that fall, whereby he is bruiſed, and languiſheth: The ſame hand that guided Ahabs ſhaft, cracks Ahaziahs latteſſe: How infinite variety of plagues hath the juſt God for obſtinate ſinners? whether in the field or in the chamber, he knows to find them out: How feareleſly did Ahaziah walke on his wonted pavement? The Lord hath laid a trappe for him, whereinto, whiles he thinks leaſt, he fals irrecoverably: No place is ſafe for the man that is at variance with God.

The body of Ahaziah was not more ſicke, then his ſoule was graceleſſe: None but but chance was his enemy, none but the God of Ekron must be his friend: He lookes not up to the Omnipotent hand of divine justice for the disease, or of mercy for the remedy: An Idol is his refuge, whether for cure or intelligence: We heare not till now of Baal-zebub: this new God of flies is (perhaps) of his making, who now is a suter to his own erection: All these heathen Deities were but a devil, with change of appellations; the influence of that evill spirit deluded those miserable clients; else, there was no fly so impotent as that outside of the god of Ekron: Who would thinke that any Israelite could so farre dote upon a stocke, a Fiend? Time gathered much credit to this Idol; in so much as the Jewes afterwards stiled Beel-zebub, the Prince of all the regions of darknesse: Ahaziah is the first that brings his Oracle in request, and payes him the tribute of his devotion: He sends messengers, and sayes, Goe inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, whether I shall recover of this disease: The message was either idle, or wicked: idle, if he sent it to a stock; if to a devill, both idle and wicked. What can the most intelligent spirits know of future things, but what they see either in their causes, or in the light of participation: What a madnesse was it in Ahaziah to seeke to the posterne, whiles the fore-gate stood open? Could those evill spirits truly foretell events no way pre-existent, yet they might not, without sinne, be consulted; the evill of their nature debarres all the benefits of their information: If not as intelligencers, much lesse may they be sought to, as gods: who cannot blush to heare and see, that even the very Evangelicall Israel should yeeld Pilgrims to the shrines of darknesse? How many, after this cleere light of the Gospell, in their losses, in their sicknesses, send to these infernal Oracles, and damne themselves wilfully, in a vaine curiosity: The message of the jealous God intercepts them, with a just disdaine; as here by Elijah, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that yee goe to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? What can be a greater disparagement to the True God, then to be neglected, thē to stand aside, and see us make love to an hellish rival: were there no God in Israel, in heaven, what could we doe other? what worse? This affront of what ever Ahaziah cannot escape without a revenge: Therefore thus saith the Lord; Thou shalt not come downe from that bed, on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. It is an high indignitie to the True God, not to be sought to in our necessities; but so to be cashiered from our devotions, as to have a false god thrust in his roome, is such a scorne, as it is well if it can escape with one death: Let now the famous god of Ekron take off that brand of feared mortality, which the living God hath set upon Ahaziah: Let Baal-zebub make good some better newes to his distressed suppliant: Rather the King of Israel is himselfe (without his repentance) hasting to Beel-zebub. This errand is soone done; The messengers are returned, ere they goe: Not a little were they amazed to heare their secret message from anothers mouth; neither could chuse but thinke, Hee that can tell what Ahaziah said, what he thought, can foretell how he shall speed: Wee have met with a greater God then we went to seeke; what need we inquire for another answer? With this conceit, with this report, they returne to their sicke Lord, and astonish him with so short, so sad a relation: No marvell if the King inquired curiously of the habit, and fashion of the man, that could know this, that durst say this: They describe him a man whether of an hairy skin, or of rough, course, careless attire; thus drest, thus girded: Ahaziah readily apprehends it to be Elijah, the old friend of his father Ahab, of his mother Iezebel: More then once had he seene him (an unwelcome guest) in the Court of Israel: The times had beene such, that the Prophet could not at once speake true, and please: Nothing but reproofes and menaces sounded from the mouth of Eijah; Michaiah and he were still as welcome to the eyes of that guilty Prince, as the Syrian arrow was into his flesh: Too well therefore had Ahaziah noted that querulous Seer, and now is not a little troubled to see himself (in succession) haunted with that bold, and ill-boding spirit.

Behold the true sonne of Iezebel, the anguish of his disease, the expectation of death cannot take off the edge of his persecution of Elijah: It is against his will that his death-bed is not bloody: Had Ahaziah meant any other then a cruell violence to Elijah, he had sent a peaceable messenger, to call him to the Court, he had not sent a Captaine,

A Captaine, with a band of Souldiers to fetch him: the inſtruments which hee uſeth, cary revenge in their face: If he had not thought Elïjah more thē a man, what needed a band of fifty to apprehend one? and if he did thinke him ſuch, why would hee ſend to apprehend him by fifty? Surely Ahaziah knew of old how miraculous a Prophet Elïjah was: what power that man had over all their baſe Deities: what command of the Elements, of the heavens: and yet hee ſends to attache him. It is a ſtrange thing to ſee how wilfully, godleſſe men ſtrive againſt the ſtreame of their own hearts: hating that which they know good, fighting againſt that which they know divine. What a groſſe diſagreement is in the meſſage of this Iſraelitiſh Captaine? Thou man of God, the King hath ſaid, Come downe; If hee were a man of God, how hath hee offended? and if he have juſtly offended the Anointed of God, how is he a man of B God? And if he be a man of God, and have not offended, why ſhould he come down to puniſhment? Here is a kind confeſſion, with a falſe heart, with bloody hands: The world is full of theſe windy courteſies, reall cruelties: Deadly malice lurkes under faire complements, and whiles it flatters, killeth. The Prophet hides not himſelfe from the purſuit of Ahaziah; rather hee ſits where hee may bee moſt conſpicuous, on the top of an Hill: this band knowes well where to find him; and climbes up, in the ſight of Elïjah, for his arreſt: The ſteepneſſe of the aſcent (when they drew neere to the higheſt reach) yeelded a cōvenience, both of reſpiratiō and parle: thence doth the Captaine imperiouſly call down the Prophet. Who would not tremble at the dreadfull anſwer of Elïjah, If I be a man of God, then let fire come downe from Heaven and conſume thee, and thy fifty: What ſhall we ſay? That a Prophet is revengefull, C that Souldiers ſuffer whiles a Prophet ſtrikes; that a Princes command is anſwered with imprecation, words with fire; that an unarmed Seer ſhould kill one and fifty at a blow? There are few trackes of Elïjah that are ordinarie, and fit for common feet: His actions are more for wonder, then for precedent: Not in his own defence would the Prophet have been the death of ſo many, if God had not by a peculiar inſtinct made him an inſtrument of this juſt vengeance. The divine juſtice finds it meet to doe this for the terrour of Iſrael, that he might teach them, what it was to contemne, to perſecute a Prophet; that they might learne to feare him whom they had forſaken, and confeſſe that heaven was ſenſible of their inſolencies, and impieties: If not as viſibly, yet as certainly doth God puniſh the violations of his ordinances, the affronts offered to his meſſengers, ſtill and ever: Not ever with the ſame ſpeed: ſometimes, the puniſhment overtakes the act: ſometimes dogs it afarre off, & ſeizeth upD on the offender, whē his crime is forgotten: Here, no ſooner is the word out of Elïjahs mouth then the fire is out of Heaven. Oh the wonderfull power of a Prophet! There ſits Elïjah in his coorſe Mantle, on the top of the Hill, and cōmands the heavens, and they obey him; Let fire fall downe from heaven; He needs no more but ſay what hee would have done: The fire fals down, as before upon the ſacrifice in Carmel, ſo now upon the Souldiers of Ahaziah: What is man in the hands of his Maker? One flaſh of lightning hath conſumed this one and fifty. And if all the hoſts of Iſrael, yea of the world, had beene in their roomes, there had needed no other force. What madneſſe is it for him whoſe breath is in his noſthrils to contend with the Almighty? The time was, when two zealous Diſciples would faine have imitated this E fiery revenge of Elïjah, and were repelled with a checke; The very place puts them in minde of the judgement; Not farre from Samaria was this done by Elïjah, and wiſht to be done by the Diſciples; So churliſh a rejection of a Saviour ſeemed no leſſe hainous, than the endevour of apprehending a Prophet; Lord, wilt thou that wee command fire to come downe from heaven, and conſume them, as Elias did. The world yeelded but one Elias: that which was zeale in him, might be fury in another; the leaſt variatiō of circumſtance may make an example dangerous; preſently therefore do they heare, Ye know not of what ſpirit ye are: It is the calling that varies the ſpirit; Elïjah was Gods Miniſter for the execution of ſo ſevere a judgement; they were but the the Servants of their own impotent anger; there was fire in their breſts, which God never kindled; farre was it from the Saviour of men, to ſecond their earthly fire, with his heavenly; Hee came indeed to ſend fire upon earth; but to warme, warme, not to burne; and if to burne, not the persons of men, but their corruptions: How much more safe is it for us to follow the meek Prophet of the New Testamẽt, then that fervent Prophet of the Old : Let the matter of our prayers be the sweet dewes of mercy, not the fires of vengeance.

Would not any man have thought Ahaziah sufficiently warned by so terrible a judgment: Could he chuse but say, It is no medling with a man that can speake lightening and death: what he hath said concerning me, is too well approved by what he hath done to my messengers; Gods hand is with him; mine shall not bee against him: Yet, now, behold, the rage of Ahaziah is so much the more kindled by this fire from heaven; and a more resolute Captain, with a second band, is sent to fetch Elijah to death; This man is in haste; and commands not onely his discent, but his speed; Come downe quickly : The charge implies a threat; Elijah must looke for force, if hee yeeld not : There needs no other weapon for defence, for offence, then the same tongue, the same breath: God hath fire enough for all the troopes of Ahaziah. Immediately, doth a sudden flame breake out of heaven, and consume this forward Leader, and his bold followers : It is a just presage and desert of ruine, not to be warned: Worthily are they made examples, that will not take them.

What Marble, or Flint is harder then a wicked heart? As if Ahaziah would despightfully spit in the face of heaven, and wrestle a fall with the Almighty, hee will needs yet againe set a third Captaine upon so desperate an imployment: How hot a service must this Commander needs thinke himselfe put upon? Who can but pity his straits? There is death before him, death behinde him: If he goe not, the Kings wrath is the messenger of death: if he goe, the Prophets tongue is the executioner of death; Many an hard taske will follow the service of a Prince wedded to his passion, divorced from God; Unwillingly, doubtlesse, and fearefully doth this Captain climb up the Hill, to scale that impregnable Fort; but now, when he comes neere to the assault, the battery that he layes to it, is his prayers; his surest fight is upon his knees : Hee went up, and came, and fell upon his knees, before Elijah, and besought him, and said unto him, O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, bee precious in thy sight : he confesses the judgement that befell his Predecessors; the monuments of their destruction were in his eye, and the terrour of it, in his heart; of an enemy therefore he is become a suppliant, & sues not so much for the Prophets yeeldance, as for his owne life : This was the way to offer violence to the Prophet of God, to the God of that Prophet, even humble supplications; We must deprecate that evill, which we would avoid: if we would force blessings, we must intreat them; There is nothing to be gotten from God by strong hand; any thing by suit. The life of the Captaine is preserved; Elijah is by the Angell commanded to goe downe with him, speedily, fearelesly. The Prophet casts not with himselfe; What safety can there be in this journey? I shall put my self into the hands of rude Souldiers, and by them into the hands of an inraged King; if he did not eagerly thirst after my blood, hee had never sought it, with so much losse; But, so soone as he had a charge from the Angell, he walkes downe resolutely, and (as it were) dares the dangers of so great an hostility; Hee knew that the same God who had fought for him, upon the hill, would not leave him in the Valley; hee knew that the Angell which bade him goe, was guard enough against a world of enemies. Faith knowes not how to feare; and can as easily contemne the suggestion of perils, as infidelity can raise them.

The Prophet lookes boldly upon the Court, which doubtlesse was not a little disaffected to him, and comes confidently into the bed-chamber of Ahaziah; and sticks not to speak over the same words to his head, which he had sent him not long since by his first messengers, Not one syllable wil the Prophet abate of his errand; It is not for an Herald of Heaven to be out of countenance; or to mince ought of the most killing messages of his God.

Whether the inexpected confidence both of the man, and of the speech amazed the sicke King of Israel, or whether the feare of some present judgment (wherewith hee might suspect Elijah to come armed upon any act of violence that should bee offered) offered) over-awed him; or whether now at last, upon the sight and hearing of this man of God, the Kings heart began to relent, and checke it selfe for that sinne, for which hee was justly reproved, I know not; but sure I am, the Prophet goes away untouched; neither the furious purposes of Ahaziah, nor the exasperations of a Iezebel can hurt that Prophet, whom God hath intended to a fiery Chariot: The hearts of Kings are not their owne: Subjects are not so much in their hands, as they are in their Makers: How easily can God tame the fierceness of any creature, and in the midst of their most heady careere, stop them on the sudden, and fetch them upon the knees of their humble submission: It is good trusting God with the events of his owne commands; who can at pleasure either avert evills, or improve them to good.

According to the word of the Prophet, Ahaziah dies: not two whole yeares doth hee sit in the Throne of Israel; which he now must yeeld (in the want of children) to his brother. Wickednesse shortens his reigne; he had too much of Ahab, and Iezebel, to expect the blessing, either of length, or prosperity of government: As alwayes in the other, so oft-times in this world doth God testifie his anger to wicked men: Some live long, that they may aggravate their judgement; others die soon, that they may hasten it.

The Rapture of Elijah.

LOng and happily hath Elijah fought the wars of his God; and now after his noble, and glorious victories, God will send him a chariot of Triumph: Not suddenly would God snatch away his Prophet without warning, without expectation; but acquaints him before-hād with the determination of his glory. How full of heavenly joy was the soule of Elijah, whiles he fore-knew, and lookt for this instant happinesse: With what contempt did he cast his eyes upon that earth, which he was now presently to leave? With what ravishment of an inward pleasure did he look upon that heaven which he was to enjoy? For a meet farewell to the earth, Elijah will goe visit the schooles of the Prophets before his departure: These were in his way: Of any part of the earth they were neerest unto heaven: In an holy progresse therefore he walkes his last round, from Gilgal (neare Iordan) to Bethel, from Bethel to Iericho, from Iericho to Iordan againe. In all these sacred Colleges of Divines, he meant to leave the legacy of his love, counsel confirmation, blessing. How happy a thing it is, whiles we are upon earth to improve our time and gifts to the best behoofe of Gods Church? and after the assurance of our own blessednesse, to help others to the same heaven? But, O God, who can but wonder at the course of thy wise and powerfull administrations? Even in the midst of the degeneration, and Idolatries of Israel hast thou reserved to thy selfe whole societies of holy Prophets; and out of those sinfull and revolted Tribes, hast raised the two great miracles of Prophets, Elijah and Elisha, in an immediate succession: Iudah it selfe under a religious Iehoshaphat, yeelded not so eminent, and cleerly illuminated spirits: The mercy of our provident God will neither be confined, nor excluded: neither confined to the places of publike profession, nor excluded from the depraved Congregations of his owne people; where he hath loved, he cannot easily be estranged: Rather, where sin abounds, his grace aboundeth much more; and raiseth so much stronger helpes, as he sees the dangers greater.

Happy was Elisha in the attendance of so gracious a Master, and the more happy that he knowes it: Faine would Elijah shake him off at Gilgal; if not there, at Bethel; if not yet there, at Iericho. A private message (on which Elijah must go alone) is pretended, from the Lord: whether shall we say the Prophet did this for the tryall of the constant affection of his carefull and diligent servant; or, that it was concealed from Elijah that his departure was revealed to Elisha: Perhaps he that knew of his owne reception into heaven, did not know what witnesses would be allowed that miraculous act: and now his humble modesty affected a silent and un-noted passage; Even Eliſha knew ſomething that was hid frō his Maſter, now upon the threſhold of heaven: No meere creature was ever made of the whole counſell of the Higheſt: Some things have beene diſcloſed to babes & novices, that have been cloſed up to the moſt wiſe and judicious: In natural ſpeculations the greater wit, and deeper judgment ſtill caries it; but in the revelations of God, the favour of his choice ſwayes all, not the power of our apprehenſion: The Maſter may both command and intreat his ſervants ſtay, in vaine: Eliſha muſt be pardoned this holy and zealous diſobedience, As the Lord liveth, and as thy ſoule liveth, I will not leave thee: His Maſter may be withdrawne from him, he will not be withdrawne from his Maſter. He knew that the bleſſing was at the parting; and if he had diligently attended all his life, and now ſlacked in the laſt act, hee had loſt the reward of his ſervice. The evening praiſes the day, and the chiefe grace of the theater is in the laſt Scene: Be faithfull to the death, and I will give thee a Crowne of life.

That Elijah ſhould be tranſlated, and what day he ſhould de tranſlated, God would have no ſecret: The ſonnes of the Prophets at Bethel, at Iericho, both know it, and aſk Eliſha if he knew it not: Knoweſt thou that the Lord will take away thy Maſter from thy head this day? and he anſwered, Yea, I know it, hold yee your peace. How familiarly doe theſe Prophets inter-know one another? How kindly doe they communicate their viſions? Seldome ever was any knowledge given to keep, but to impart: The grace of this rich Jewell is loſt in concealement. The removall of an Elijah is ſo important a buſineſſe, that it is not fit to be done without noiſe: Many ſhall have their ſhare in his loſſe: he muſt be miſſed on the ſudden: it was meet therefore that the world ſhould know his rapture ſhould be divine and glorious. I doe not finde where the day of any naturall death is notified to ſo many: by how much more wonder there was in this Aſſumption, by ſo much more ſhall it be fore-revealed. It is enough for ordinary occurrents to be knowne by their event: ſupernaturall things have neede of premonition, that mens hearts may be both prepared for their receit, and confirmed in their certainty. Thrice was Eliſha intreated, thrice hath he denied to ſtay behinde his now-departing Maſter; on whom both his eyes and his thoughts are ſo fixed, that he cannot give allowance ſo much as to the interpellation of a queſtion of his fellow-Prophets: Together therefore are this wonderfull paire comne to the laſt ſtage of their ſeparation, the bankes of Iordan. Thoſe that were not admitted to bee attendants of the journey, yet will not bee debarred from being ſpectators of ſo marvellous an iſſue. Fifty men of the ſonnes of the Prophets, went and ſtood to view afarre off; I marvell there were no more: How could any ſon of the Prophets ſtay within the Colledge walls that day: when he knew what was meant to Elijah? Perhaps, though they knew that to be the Prophets laſt day; yet they might think his diſparition ſhould be ſudden, and inſenſible; beſides, they found how much hee affected ſecrecie in this intended departure: yet the fifty Prophets of Iericho will make proofe of their eyes, and with much intention aſſay who ſhall have the laſt ſight of Elijah. Miracles are not purpoſed to ſilence and obſcuritie: God will not worke wonders without witneſſes; ſince he doth them on purpoſe to win glory to his name, his end were fruſtrate without their notice. Even ſo, O Saviour, when thou hadſt raiſed thy ſelfe from the dead, thou wouldſt be ſeene of more than five hundred brethren at once; and when thou wouldſt raiſe up thy glorified body from earth into Heaven, thou didſt not aſcend from ſome cloſe valley, but from the Mount of Olives; not in the night, not alone, but in the cleare day, in the view of many eyes; which were ſo fixed upon that point of thine heaven, that they could ſcarce be removed by the checke of Angels.

Iordan muſt be croſſed by Elijah in his way to heaven: There muſt be a meet parallel betwixt the two great Prophets, that ſhall meet Chriſt upon Tabor; Moſes and Elias; Both received viſions on Horeb, to both God appeared there in fire, and other formes of terrour; both were ſent to Kings, one to Pharaoh, the other to Ahab: Both prepared miraculous Tables, the one of Quailes and Manna in the Deſert, the other of meale and Oyle in Sarepta: Both opened heaven, the one for that nouriſhing dew, the other for thoſe refreſhing ſhowers: Both revenged Idolatries with the ſword,

the

A the one upon the worſhippers of the golden Calfe, the other upon the foure hundred Baalites: Both quenched the drought of Iſrael, the one out of the Rocke, the other out of the Cloud: Both divided the waters, the one of the Red Sea, the other of Iordan: Both of them are forewarned of their departure: Both muſt be fetcht away beyond Iordan; The body of Elijah is tranſlated, the body of Moſes is hid: What Moſes doth by his Rod, Elijah doth by his Mantle; with that he ſmites the Waters, and they (as fearing the divine power which wrought with the Prophet) run away from him, and ſtand on heapes, leaving the dry channell for the paſſage of thoſe awfull feet: It is not long ſince he mulcted them with a generall exſiccation: now hee onely bids them ſtand aſide, and give way to his laſt walke; that hee might with dry feet mount up into the celeſtiall chariot.

B The waters do not now firſt obey him: they know that Mantle of old; which hath oft given lawes to their falling, riſing, ſtanding: they are paſt over; and now when Elijah findes himſelfe treading on his laſt earth, he profers a munificent boone to his faithfull ſervant, Aske what I ſhall doe for thee before I am taken from thee. I do not heare him ſay, Aske of me when I am gone; In my glorified condition, I ſhall be more able to beſtead thee; but, aske before I goe. We have a communion with the Saints departed, not a commerce: when they are inabled to doe more for us, they are leſſe apt to be ſollicited by us. It is ſafe ſuing where we are ſure that we are heard. Had not Elijah received a peculiar inſtinct for this profer, he had not been thus liberall: It were preſumption to be bountifull on anothers coſt, without leave of the owner: The mercy of our good God allowes his favourites not onely to receive, but to give: not only to

C receive for themſelves, but to convey bleſſings to others: What can that man want that is befriended of the faithfull?

Eliſha needes not goe farre to ſeeke for a ſuit; It was in his heart, in his mouth: Let a double portion of thy ſpirit be upon me. Every Prophet muſt be a ſonne to Elijah; but Eliſha would be his heire, and craves the happy right of his primogeniture, the double ſhare to his brethren: It was not wealth, nor ſafety, nor eaſe, nor honour, that Eliſha cares for, the world lies open before him, he may take his choice: the reſt he contemneth; nothing will ſerve him but a large meaſure of his Maſters ſpirit: No carnall thought was guilty of this ſacred ambition: Affectation of eminence was too baſe a conceit to fall into that man of God: Hee ſaw that the times needed ſtrong convictions, he ſaw that he could not otherwiſe weild the ſucceſſiō to ſuch a Maſter,

D therefore he ſues for a double portion of ſpirit; the ſpirit of prophecie to fore-know, the ſpirit of power to worke: We cannot be too covetous, too ambitious of ſpirituall gifts, ſuch eſpecially as may enable us to win moſt advantage to God in our vocations. Our wiſhes are the true touch-ſtone of our eſtate; ſuch as we wiſh to be, we are: worldly hearts affect earthly things; ſpirituall, divine: we cannot better know what we are indeed; then by what we would be.

Elijah acknowledges the difficultie, and promiſes the grant of ſo great a requeſt; ſuſpended yet upon the condition of Eliſhaes eye-ſight. If thou ſee me when I am taken from thee, it ſhall be ſo unto thee; but if not, it ſhall not be: What are the eyes to the furniture of the ſoule? What power is there in thoſe viſive beames to draw downe a double portion of Elijahs ſpirit? God doth not alwaies look at efficacy & merit in the

E conditions of our actions, but at the freedome of his own appointments: The eye was onely to be imployed as the ſervant of the heart, that the deſires might bee ſo much more intended with the ſight: Vehemence is the way to ſpeed both in earth and in Heaven; If but the eye-lids of Eliſha fall, if his thoughts ſlacken, his hopes are daſhed; There muſt bee fixedneſſe and vigilance, in thoſe that deſire double graces.

Elijah was going on, and talking, when the Charet of heaven came to fetch him; Surely, had not that conference beene needfull and divine, it had given way to meditation: and Elijah had beene taken up rather from his knees, then from his feet. There can bee no better poſture, or ſtate, for the meſſenger of our diſſolution to finde us in, then in a diligent proſecution of our calling. The buſie attendance of our holy vocation is no leſſe pleaſing to God, than an immediate devotion: Happy is the ſervant whom the maſter (when hee comes) ſhall finde ſo doing.

Oh the ſingular glory of Elijah! What mortall creature ever had this honour to be viſibly fetched by the Angels of God to his heaven? Every ſoule of the elect is attended and caried to bleſſedneſſe by thoſe inviſible meſſengers, but, what fleſh and blood was ever graced with ſuch a convoy? There are three bodily Inhabitants of Heaven; Henoch, Elijah, our Saviour Chriſt. The firſt before the law, the ſecond under the Law, the third under the Goſpell; All three in a ſeverall forme of tranſlation: Our bleſſed Saviour raiſed himſelfe to and above the heavens, by his owne immediate power: he aſcended as the Son, they as ſervants: he as God, they as creatures: Elijah aſcended by the viſible miniſterie of Angels; Henoch inſenſibly: Wherefore, O God haſt thou done thus, but to give us a taſte of what ſhall be? to let us ſee that heaven was never ſhut to the faithfull: to give us aſſurance of the future glorification of this mortall and corruptible part?

Even thus, O Saviour, when thou ſhalt deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of an Archangell, and with the trumpet of God, wee that are alive and remain, ſhall be caught up together with the raiſed bodies of thy Saints, into the clouds to meet thee in the ayre, to dwell with thee in glory.

Many formes have thoſe celeſtiall ſpirits taken to themſelves in their apparitions to men: but of all other, moſt often hath the Almighty made his meſſengers a flame of fire: never more properly than here: How had the ſpirit of God kindled the hot fires of zeale in the breſt of Elijah? How had this Prophet thrice commanded fire from heaven to earth? How fitly now at laſt doe theſe Seraphicall fires carie him from earth to heaven?

What doe wee ſee in this rapture of Elijah, but violence and terrour, whirlewinde and fire? two of thoſe fearefull repreſentations which the Prophet had in the Rocke of Horeb: Never any man entred into glory with eaſe: Even the moſt favourable change hath ſome equivalency to a naturall diſſolution. Although doubtleſſe to Elijah this fire had a light ſomneſſe and reſplendance, not terrour: this whirlwinde had ſpeed, not violence: Thus haſt thou, O Saviour, bidden us when the Elements ſhall be diſſolved, and the heavens ſhall be flaming about our eares, to lift up our heads with joy, becauſe our redemption draweth nigh. Come death, come fire, come whirlewinde, they are worthy to bee welcome that ſhall carie us to immortality.

This arreption was ſudden, yet Eliſha ſees both the Charet, and the horſes, and the aſcent; and cries to his now-changed Maſter, betweene heaven and earth, My father, my father, the charet of Iſrael, and the horſemen thereof. Shaphat of Abel-meholah hath yeelded this title to Elijah, the naturall father of Eliſha, to the ſpirituall; neither of them may be neglected, but, after the yoake of oxen killed at the farewell, we heare of no more greetings, no more bewaylings of his bodily parent; and now that Elijah is taken from him, hee cryes out like a diſtreſſed Orphane, My father, my father; and when he hath loſt the ſight of him, he rends his cloathes in peeces according to the faſhion of the moſt paſſionate mourners: That Eliſha ſees his maſter halfe-way in heaven, cannot take away the ſorrow of his loſſe: The departure of a faithfull Prophet of God is worthy of our lamentation: Neither is it private affection that muſt ſway our griefe, but reſpects to the publike: Eliſha ſayes not onely, My father, but the charet and horſemen of Iſrael. That we have forgone a father, ſhould not ſo much trouble us as that Iſrael hath loſt his guard. Certainely, the view of this heavenly charet and horſes that came for Elijah, puts Eliſha in minde of that charet and horſemen, which Elijah was to Iſrael. Theſe were Gods charets, Elijah was theirs: Gods charet and theirs are upon the ſame wheeles mounted into heaven: No forces are ſo ſtrong as the ſpirituall; the prayers of an Elijah are more powerfull, than all the Armies of fleſh: The firſt thing that this Seer diſcernes, after the ſeparation of his Maſter, is, the nakedneſſe of Iſrael in his loſſe. If we muſter Souldiers, and leeſe zealous Prophets, it is but a wofull exchange.

Elijahs Mantle fals from him in the riſing; there was no uſe of that, whither he was

A was going; there was, whence he was taken: Elisha justly takes up this deare monument of his glorified master: A good supply for his rent garments: This was it which (in presage of his future right) Elijah invested him withall, upon the first sight, when he was ploughing with the twelve yoke of oxen; now it fals from heaven to his possession: I doe not see him adore so precious a relique, I see him take it up, and cast it about him: Pensive and masterlesse doth he now come backe to the bankes of Iordan, whose streame he must passe in his returne to the schooles of the Prophets. Ere while he saw what way that river gave to the Mantle of Elijah, he knew that power was not in the cloth, but in the spirit of him that wore it: to try therefore whether he were no lesse the heire of that spirit, than of that garment, he tooke the mantle of Elijah and smote the waters, and said, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Elisha doth not expostulate, and challenge, but pray; As if he had said, Lord God, it was thy promise to me by my departed master, that if I should see him in his last passage, a double portion of his Spirit should be upon me: I followed him with my eyes in that fire, and whirlewinde; now therefore, O God, make good thy gracious Word to thy servant; shew some token upon mee for good; make this the first proofe of the miraculous power wherewith thou shalt indue mee: Let Iordan give the same way to me as it gave to my master. Immediately the streame (as acknowledging the same Mantle, though in another hand) divides it selfe, and yeelds passage to the successor of Elijah.

B

The fifty sons of the Prophets having been afar off witnesses of these admirable events, do well see that Elijah (though translated in body) hath yet left his Spirit behinde him; they meete Elisha, and bow themselves to the ground before him: It was not the outside of Elijah which they had wont to stoope unto, with so much veneration, it was his Spirit; which since they now finde in another subject, they entertaine with equall reverence: No envy, no emulation raiseth up their stomackes against Elijahs servant; but where they see eminēt graces, they are willingly prostrate. Those that are truly gracious, doe no lesse rejoyce in the riches of others gifts, than humbly under-value their owne. These men were trained up in the schooles of the Prophets, Elisha at the plough and cart, yet now they stand not upon termes of their worth, and his meannesse, but meekly fall down before him whom God will honour: It is not to be regarded who the man is, but whom God would make him. The more unlikely the meanes is, the more is the glory of the workman: It is the praise of an holy ingenuity to magnifie the graces of God where ever it findes them.

C

These young Prophets are no lesse full of zeale, than reverence; zeale to Elijah, reverence to Elisha: They see Elijah caried up in the ayre; they knew this was not the first time of his supernaturall removall; Imagining it therefore possible that the Spirit of God had cast him upon some remote mountaine, or valley, they profer the labour of their servants to seek him: In some things even professed Seers are blinde: Could they thinke God would send such a Charet and horses for a lesse voyage then heaven.

D

Elisha (knowing his master beyond all the sphere of mortality) forbids them: Good will makes them unmannerly; their importunity urges him till he is ashamed; not his approbation but their vehemence caries at last a condescent: Else he might perhaps have seemed enviously unwilling to fetch back so admired a Master: and loth to forgoe that mantle. Some things may be yeelded for the redeeming of our owne vexation, and avoidance of others misconstruction, which out of true judgment we see no cause to affect.

E

The messengers tyred with three dayes search, turne backe as wise as they went: some men are best satisfied, when they have wearied themselves in their own waies: nothing will teach them wit, but disappointments. Their painefull errour leades them to a right conceit of Elijahs happier transportation: Those that would finde Elijah, let them aspire to the heavenly Paradise: Let them follow the high steps of his sincere faithfulnesse, strong patience, undaunted courage, fervent zeale; shortly, let them walk in the wayes of his holy and constant obedience: at last God shall send the fiery charet of death to fetch them up to that heaven of heavens, where they shall triumph in everlasting joyes.

Elisha { Healing the Waters. / Cursing the Children. / Releeving the Kings.

AT is good making use of a Prophet whiles we have him. Elisha stayed some-while at Iericho; The Citizens resort to him with a common suit: Their structure was not more pleasant, than their waters unwholsome, and their soile by those corrupt waters: They sue to Elisha for the remedie. Why had they not all this while, made their moane to Eliah? Was it that they were more awed with his greater austerity? Or was it that they met not with so fit an opportunity of his commoration amongst them? It was told them what power Elisha had exercised upon the waters of Iordan, and now they ply him for theirs: Examples of beneficence easily move us to a request, and expectation of favours.

What ailed the waters of Iericho? Surely, originally they were not ill affected: No men could be so foolish as to build a city, where neither earth nor water were useful: Meere prospect could not carie men to the neglect of health, and profit. Hiel the Bethelite would never have reedified it with the dāger of a curse, so lately as in the daies of Ahab, if it had beene of old notorious for so foule an annoyance: Not therefore the ancient malediction of Ioshua, not the neighbourhood of that noysome lake of Sodome, was guilty of this disease of the soyle, and waters, but the late sinnes of the inhabitants. He turneth the rivers into a wilderness, and water-springs into a dry ground; a fruitfull land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein: How oft have we seene the same field both full and famishing: How oft the same waters both safe, and by some irruption or new tincture hurtfull? Howsoever naturall causes may concurre, heaven and earth, and ayre, and waters follow the temper of our soules, of our lives, and are therefore indispосed because wee are so: Iericho began now to make it selfe capable of a better state, since it was now become a receptacle of Prophets: Elisha is willing to gratifie his hosts; it is reason that any place should fare the better for the presence of Divines. The medicine is more strange than the disease. Bring me a new Cruse, and put salt therein: Why a Cruse? why new? why Salt in that new Cruse? How should Salt make water potable? Or, if there were any such vertue in it, what could a Cruse-full doe to a whole current? Or, if that measure were sufficient, what was the age of the Cruse to the force of the Salt? Yet Elisha cals for Salt in a new Cruse. God (who wrought this by his Prophet) is a free agent; as hee will not binde his power to meanes; so will he by his power binde unlikely meanes to performe his will.

Naturall proprieties have no place in miraculous workes: No lesse easie is it for God to worke by contrary, than subordinate powers.

The Prophet doth not cast the Salt into the channel, but into the spring of the waters: If the fountaine be redressed, the streames cannot be faulty; as contrarily, the purity and soundnesse of the stream availes nothing to the redresse of the fountain: Reformation must begin at the well-head of the abuse: The order of being is a good guide to the method of amending. Vertue doth not runne backward: Had Elisha cast the Salt into the brookes and ditches, the remedy must have striven against the streame, to reach up to the spring: now it is but one labour to cure the fountaine. Our heart is a Well of bitter and venemous water, our actions are the streames: In vaine shall we cleanse our hands, whiles our hearts are evill.

The Cruse and the Salt must be their owne: The act must be his; the power, Gods: He cast the Salt into the spring, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death, or barrenness. Farre was it from Elisha to challenge challenge ought to himselfe: Before, when he should divide the waters of Iordan, he did not say, Where is the power of Elisha, but, Where is the Lord God of Eliah? and now, when he should cure the waters of Iericho, he saies not, Thus sayes Elisha, but thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. How carefull is the man of God that no part of Gods glory should stick to his owne fingers. Iericho shall know to whom they owe the blessing, that they may duely returne the thankes. Elisha professes he can doe no more of himselfe than that Salt, than that Cruse; only God shall work by him, by it: and what ever that Almighty hand undertakes, cannot faile, yea is already done: neither doth he say, I will heale, but I have healed: Even so, O God, if thou cast into the fountaine of our hearts, but one Cruse-full of the Salt of thy Spirit, wee are whole, no thought can passe betweene the receit and the remedy.

As the generall visitor of the Schooles of the Prophets, Elisha passeth from Iericho to that other Colledge at Bethel. Bethel was a place of strange composition: there was at once the golden Calfe of Ieroboam; and the Schoole of God: True religion and Idolatry found a free harbour within those walls: I doe not marvell that God Prophets would plant there; there was the most need of their presence, where they found the spring head of corruption: Physitians are of most use where diseases doe abound: As he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the City, and mocked him, and said to him, Goe up thou bald-head; Goe up thou bald-head. Even the very boyes of Bethel have learned to scoffe at a Prophet; The spight of their Idolatrous parents is easily propagated; Children are such as their institution; Infancy is led altogether by imitation, it hath neither words nor actions, but infused by others; If it have good or ill language, it is but borrowed; and the shame or thank is due to those that lent it them.

What was it that these ill-taught children upbraided to the Prophet, but a sleight naturall defect, not worthy the name of a blemish, the want of a little haire; at the best, a comely excrement, no part of the body; Had there beene deformity in that smoothnesse of the head, which some great wits have honoured with praises, a faultlesse and remedilesse eye-sore had been no fit matter for a taunt: How small occasions will be taken to disgrace a Prophet? If they could have said ought worse, Elisha had not heard of this; God had crowned that head with honour, which the Bethelitish children loaded with scorne. Who would have thought the rude termes of waggish boyes worthy of any thing but neglect? Elisha looks at them with severe brows, and (like the heire of him that cald downe fire upon the two Captaines and their fifties) curses them in the name of the Lord; Two she-beares out of the Wood hasten to be his executioners, and teare two and forty of them in peeces. O fearefull example of divine Justice! This was not the revenge of an angry Prophet, it was the punishment of a righteous Judge: God and his Seer lookt through these children, at the parents, at all Israel; he would punish the parents mis-nurturing their children (to the contemptuous usage of a Prophet) with the death of those children, which they had mis-taught: Hee would teach Israel what it was to mis-use a Prophet: And if hee would not endure these contumelies unrevenged in the mouthes of children, what vengeance was enough for aged persecutors?

Doubtlesse some of the children escaped to tell the newes of their fellowes; what lamentation doe we thinke there was in the streets of Bethel? how did the distressed mothers wring their hands for this wofull orbation? And now when they came forth to fetch the remnants of their owne flesh, what a sad spectacle it was to finde the fieldes strawed with those mangled carkasses? It is an unprofitable sorrow that followes a judgement; Had these Parents beene as carefull to train up their children in good discipline, and to correct their disorders, as they are now passionate in bemoaning their losse, this slaughter had never been: In vaine doe we look for good of those children, whose education we have neglected: In vaine doe we grieve for those miscariages, which our care might have prevented.

Elisha knew the successe, yet doth he not balke the City of Bethel: Doe we not wonder that the furious impatience of those parents, whom the curse of Elisha robbed of their children, did not breake forth to some malicious practice against the Prophet?

Prophet? Would we not thinke the Prophet might misdoubt some hard measure from those exasperated Citizens? There lay this way; he followes God, without feare of men; as well knowing that either they durst not, or they could not act violence. They knew there were Beares in the wood, and fires in heaven, & if their malice would have ventured above their courage, they could have no more power over Elisha in the streets, then those hungry beasts had in the way. Whither dare not a Prophet goe when God calls him? Having visited the schooles of the Prophets, Elisha retires to mount Carmel, and after some holy solitarinesse, returnes to the City of Samaria: He can never be a profitable Seer, that is either alwayes or never alone: Carmel shall fit him for Samaria; contemplation for action: That mother City of Israel must needs afford him most work: Yet is the Throne of Ahaziah succeeded by a brother lesse ill than himself, than the parents of both: Ahabs impiety hath not a perfect heire of Iehoram: That son of his hates his Baal, though hee keepes his calves. Even into the most wicked families it pleaseth God to cast his most powerfull restraints, that all are not equally vicious: It is no newes to see lewd men make scruple of some sins: The world were not to live in, if all sinnes were affected by all. It is no thank to Ahab and Iezebel that their sonne is no Baalite: As no good is traduced from parents so not all evill; there is an Almighty hand that stops the foule current of nature, at his pleasure: No Idolater can say, that his child shall not be a convert. A B

The affinity betwixt the houses of Israel and Iudah, holds good in succession; Iehoram inherits the friendship, the aid of Iehoshaphat: whose counsell (as is most likely) had cured him of that Baalisme. It was a good warre whereto he solicits the good King of Iudah. The King of Moab (who had been an ancient tributary from the dayes of David) falls now from his homage, & refuses to pay his hundred thousand Lambs an hundred thousand Rammes with fleeces, to the King of Israel; The backes of Israel can ill misse the wooll of Moab, they will put on iron to recover their cloth. Iehoshaphat had been once well chid, well frighted for joyning with Ahab against Aram; yet doth he not sticke now againe to come into the field with Iehoram against Moab: The case is more favourable, lesse dangerous; Baal is cast downe: The Images of the false gods are gone, though the false Images of the true God stand still; Beside, this rebellious Moab had joyned with the Syrians formerly against Iudah, so as Iehoshaphat is interessed in the revenge. C

After resolution of the end, wisely doe these Kings deliberate of the way. It is agreed to passe through Edom; that Kingdome was annexed to the Crowne of Iudah: well might Iehoshaphat make bold with his owne: It was (it seemes) a march farre about in the measure of the way; but neerest to their purpose: the assault would bee thus more easie if the passage were more tedious: The three Kings of Israel, Iudah, Edom, together with their Armies, are upon foot. They are no sooner come into the parching wildes of Edom, than they are ready to die for thrist; If the channels were farre off, yet the waters were further; the scorching beames of the Sun have dried them up; and have left those rivers more fit for walke, than entertainment: What are the greatest Monarchs of the world, if they want but water to their mouthes? What can their Crownes, and Plumes; and rich Armes availe them, when they are abridged but of that which is the drink of beasts? With dry tongues and lips, do they now confer of their common misery: Iehoram deplores the calamity, into which they were falne; but Iehoshaphat askes for a Prophet: Every man can bewaile a misery; every man cannot finde the way out of it: still yet I heare good Iehoshaphat speak too late: He should have inquired for a Prophet, ere he had gone forth; so had he avoided these straits: Not to consult at all with God, is Iehorams sinne; to consult late, is Iehoshaphats; the former is atheous carelessenesse; the latter, forgetfull oversight: The best man may slacken good duties, the worst contemnes them. D E

Not without some specialty from God doth Elisha follow the campe: Else, that had been no Element for a Prophet: Little did the good King of Iudah thinke that God was so neere him: Purposely was this holy Seer sent for the succour of Iehoshaphat, and his faithfull followers, when they were so farre from dreaming of their delivery, that they knew not of a danger: It would be wide with the best men, if the eye

A eye of divine providence were not open upon them, when the eye of their care is ſhut towards it: How wel did Eliſha in the wars? The ſtrongeſt ſquadron of Iſrael was within that breaſt: All their Armour of proofe had not ſo much ſafety and protection, as his Mantle: Though the King of Iſrael would take no norice of the Prophet, yet one of his Courtiers did, Here is Eliſha the ſonne of Shaphat, which powred water on the hands of Elijah; This follower of Iehoram knowes Eliſha by his owne name, by his fathers, by his maſters: The Court of Iſrael was profane, and Idolatrous enough, yet, even there Gods Prophet had both knowledge, and honour: His very ſervice to Elijah was enough to win him reverence: It is better to be an attendant of ſome man, than to be attended by many: That he had powred water on Elijahs hands was inſinuation enough, that he could powre out water for thoſe three Kings: The three
B Kings walke downe (by the motion of Iehoſhaphat) to the man of God: It was newes to ſee three Kings going downe to the ſervant of him, who ranne before the charet of Ahab: Religion and neceſſity have both of them much power of humiliation, I know not whether more: Either zeale or need will make a Prophet honored.

How ſharply dares the man of God to chide his Soveraigne, the King of Iſrael? The liberty of the Prophets was no leſſe ſingular, then their calling: He that would borrow their tongue, muſt ſhew their Commiſſion: As God reproved Kings for their ſakes, ſo did not they ſticke to reprove Kings for his ſake: Thus much freedome they muſt leave to their ſucceſſors, that we may not ſpare the vices of them, whoſe perſons we muſt ſpare.

Juſtly is Iehoram turned off to the Prophets of his father, and the Prophets of his
C mother: It is but right and equall, that thoſe which we have made the comfort, and ſtay of our peace, ſhould be the refuge of our extremity: If our proſperity have made the world our God, how worthily ſhall our death-bed be choaked with this exprobration? Neither would the caſe beare an Apology, nor the time an expoſtulation: Iehoram cannot excuſe, he can complaine; he findes that now three Kings, three kingdomes are at the mercy of one Prophet; it was time for him to ſpeake faire; nothing ſounds from him but lamentations, and intreaties: Nay, for the Lord hath called theſe
D three Kings together to deliver them into the hand of Moab. Iehoram hath ſo much grace as to confeſſe the impotency of thoſe he had truſted; and the power of that God whom he had neglected; Every ſinner cannot ſee, and acknowledge the hand of God in his ſufferings; Already hath the diſtreſſed Prince gained ſomething by this miſery; None complaines ſo much as he, none feeles ſo much as he; All the reſt ſuffer for him, and therefore he ſuffers in them all.

The man of God, who well ſees the inſufficiency of Iehorams humiliation, layes on yet more load; As the Lord liveth before whom I ſtand, Surely, were it not that I regard the preſence of Iehoſhaphat the King of Iudah, I would not looke toward thee, nor ſee thee; Behold the double Spirit of Elijah; the maſter was not more bold with the father, then the ſervant was with the ſonne: Eliſha was a ſubject; and a Prophet; He muſt ſay that as a Prophet, which he might not as a ſubject; As a Prophet hee would not have lookt at him, whom as a ſubject he would have bowed to: It is one thing when God ſpeakes by him, another, when he ſpeakes of himſelf; That it might well appeare
E his diſlike of ſin ſtood with his honour of Soveraignty, Iehoſhaphat goes away with that reſpect which Iehoram miſſed; No leſſe doth God and his Prophet regard religious ſincerity, then they abhorre Idolatry, and profaneneſſe: What ſhall not be done for a Iehoſhaphat? For his ſake ſhall thoſe two other Princes, and their vaſt Armies live, and prevaile; Edom and Iſrael, whether ſingle or conjoyned, had periſhed by the drought of the deſart, by the ſword of Moab; One Iehoſhaphat gives them both life, and victory: It is in the power of one good man to oblige a world; wee receive true (though inſenſible) favours from the preſence of the righteous; Next to being good, it is happy to converſe with them that are ſo: if wee be not bettered by their example, we are bleſt by their protection.

Who wonders not to heare a Prophet call for a Minſtrell, in the middeſt of that mournfull diſtreſſe of Iſrael and Iudah? Who would not have expected his Charge of teares and prayers, rather than of Muſick? How unſeaſonable are ſongs to an heavy heart?

heart? It was not for their eares, it was for his owne bosome, that Elisha called for Musicke: that his spirits after their zealous agitation, might be sweetly composed, and put into a meet temper, for receiving the calme visions of God: Perhaps it was some holy Levite, that followed the Campe of Iehoshaphat, whose minstrelsie was required for so sacred a purpose: None but a quiet breast is capable of divine Revelations; Nothing is more powerfull to settle a troubled heart than a melodious harmony; The Spirit of Prophecie was not the more invited, the Prophets Spirit was the better disposed, by pleasing sounds: The same God that will reveale his will to the Prophet, suggests this demand; Bring me a Minstrell; How many say thus when they would put God from them? Profane mirth, wanton musicke debauches the soule; and makes no lesse roome for the uncleane spirit, than spirituall melody doth for the Divine. A

No Prophet had ever the Spirit at command; The hand of the Minstrel can do nothing without the hand of the Lord; Whiles the Musicke sounds in the eare, God speakes to the heart of Elisha. Thus saith the Lord, Make this valley full of ditches; Yee shall not see winde, neither shall ye see raine, yet that valley shall be full of water, &c. To see winde, and raine in the height of that drought, would have seemed as wonderful, as pleasing; but, to see abundance of water, without winde or raine, was yet more miraculous; I know not how the sight of the meanes abates our admiration of the effect; Where no causes can be found out, we are forced to confesse omnipotency; Elijah releeved Israel with water, but it was out of the cloudes, and those clouds rose from the sea; but whence Elisha shall fetch it, is not more marvellous than secret. B

All that evening, all that night must the faith of Israel and Iudah bee exercised with expectation; At the houre of the morning sacrifice no sooner did the blood of that Oblation gush forth, then the streames of waters gushed forth into their new channells, and filled the Countrey with a refreshing moisture: Elijah fetcht downe his fire, at the houre of the evening sacrifice: Elisha fetcht up his water, at the houre of the morning sacrifice: God gives respect to his owne houres, for the encouragement of our observation: If his wisdome hath set us any peculiar times wee cannot keepe them without a blessing: The devotions of all true Jewes (all the world over) were in that houre combined; How seasonably doth the wisdome of God picke out that instant, wherein hee might at once answer both Elishaes prophecie, and his peoples prayers. C

The Prophet hath assured the Kings, not of water onely, but of victory; Moab heares of enemies, and is addressed to warre; Their owne error shall cut their throats; they rise soone enough to beguile themselves; the beames of the rising Sun glistering upon those vaporous, and unexpected waters, caried in the eyes of some Moabites a semblance of blood; a few eyes were enough to fill all eares with a false noise; the deceived sense miscaries the imagination; This is blood, the Kings are surely slaine, and they have smitten one another; now therefore, Moab to the spoile: Civill broyles give just advantage to a common enemy; Therefore must the Camps be spoiled, because the Kings have smitten each other. Those that shall be deceived, are given over to credulity; The Moabites doe not examine either the conceit, or the report; but flie in, confusedly, upon the Campe of Israel; whom they finde, too late, to have no enemies but themselves; As if death would not have hastened enough to them, they come to fetch it, they come to challenge it; It seizeth upon them unavoidably; they are smitten, their Cities razed, their Lands marred, their Wells stopped, their trees felled; as if God meant to waste them but once. D

No onsets are so furious as the last assaults of the desperate: The King of Moab now hopelesse of recovery; would be glad to shut up with a pleasing revenge, with seven hundred resolute followers, he rushes into the battaile, towards the King of Edom; as if he would bid death welcome, might he but carie with him that despighted neighbour; and now, mad with the repulse, he returnes: and whether as angry with his destiny, or as barbarously affecting to win his cruell gods with so deare a sacrifice he offers them with his owne hand the blood of his eldest son in the sight of Israel, and sends him up in smoake to those hellish Deities. O prodigious act, whether of E rage,

rage, or of devotion! What an hand hath Satan over his miserable vassals? What marvell is it to see men sacrifice their soules, in an unfelt oblation, to these plausible tempters, when their owne flesh and blood hath not beene spared? There is no Tyrant to the Prince of darknesse.

Elisha with the Shunamite.

THE holy Prophets under the old Testament, did not abhorre the mariage bed; they did not thinke themselves too pure for an institution of their Maker; The distressed widow of one of the sonnes of the Prophets comes to Elijah to bemoane her condition; Her husband is dead, and dead in debt. Death hath no sooner seized on him, then her two sonnes (the remaining comfort of her life) are to be seized on, by his creditors, for bond-men: How thicke did the miseries of this poore afflicted woman light upon her; Her husband is lost, her estate clogged with debts, her children ready to be taken for slaves: Her husband was a religious, and worthy man; he paid his debts to Nature, he could not to his Creditors; they are cruell, and rake in the scarce-closed wound of her sorrow, passing an arrest, worse than death, upon her sonnes: Widowhood, poverty, servitude have conspired to make her perfitly miserable. Vertue and goodnesse can pay no debts; The holyest man may be deepe in arrerages, and breake the banke: Not through lavishnesse, and riot of expence: (Religion teaches us to moderate our hands, to spend within the proportion of our estate) but through either iniquity of times, or evill casualties. Ahab and Iezebel were lately in the Throne, who can marvell that a Prophet was in debt? It was well that any good man might have his breath free, though his estate were not: wilfully to over-lash our ability, cannot stand with wisdome, & good government; but no providence can guard us from crosses; Holinesse is no more defence against debt, than against death: Grace can keepe us from unthriftinesse, not from want. Whither doth the Prophets widow come to bewaile her case, but to Elisha? Every one would not be sensible of her affliction, or if they would pity, yet could not releeve her; Elisha could doe both; Into his eare doth she unload her griefes. It is no small point of wisdome to know where to plant our Lamentation; otherwise, in stead of comfort, we may meet with scorne and insultation.

None can so freely compassionate the hard termes of a Prophet as an Elisha; Hee findes that she is not querulously impatient, expressing her sorrow without murmuring, and discontentment; making a loving, and honorable mention of that husband, who had left her distressed; readily therefore doth he incline to her succour: What shall I doe for thee? Tell me what hast thou in thine house? Elisha, when he heares of her debt, askes of her substance; Had her house beene furnished with any valuable commodity, the Prophet implies the necessity of selling it for satisfaction; Our owne abundance can ill stand with our ingagement to others; It is great injustice for us to be full of others purses: It is not our owne which we owe to another. What is it other then a plausible stealth to feede our riot with the want of the owner? He that could multiply her substance, could know it; God and his Prophet loves to heare our necessities out of our owne mouthes (Thine hand-maid hath not any thing in the house save a pot of oyle.) It is neither newes nor shame for a Prophet to be poore; Grief and want perhaps hastned his end; both of them are left for the dowry of his carefull widow; She had complained, if there had been any possibility of remedy, at home; bashfulnesse had stopt her mouth thus long, and should have done yet longer, if the exigence of her childrens servitude had not opened it; No want is so worthy of releefe, as that which is loatheſt to come forth. Then he said, Goe borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours, even emptie vessels, borrow not a few; and when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the doore upon thee, and upon thy sons, and shalt powre out into all those vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full.

Shee that owed much, and had nothing, yet must borrow more, that shee may pay pay all: Poverty had not ſo diſcredited her with her neighbours, that they ſhould doubt to lend her thoſe veſſels empty, which they had grudged full: Her want was too well knowne; it could not but ſeeme ſtrange to the neighbours, to ſee this poore widow ſo buſily peſtring her houſe with empty tubs; which they knew ſhee had nothing to fill; they knew well enough ſhee had neither field nor vineyard, nor orchard, and therefore muſt needs marvell at ſuch unprofitable diligence: If their curioſity would be inquiring after her intentions, ſhee is commanded ſecrecy. The doores muſt be ſhut upon her ſelfe, and her ſonnes; whiles the oyle is increaſing; No eye ſhall ſee the miracle in working, enow ſhall ſee it once wrought; This act was no leſſe a proofe of her faith, than an improvement of her eſtate; it was an exerciſe of her devotion, as well as of her diligence; it was fit her doores ſhould be ſhut, whiles her heart and lips were opened in an holy invocation; Out of one ſmall Jarre was powred out ſo much oyle, as by miraculous multiplication filled all that empty caſke: Scarce had that pot any bottome: At leaſt the bottome that it had, was to bee meaſured by the brims of all thoſe veſſels; this was ſo deepe, as they were high; Could they have held more, this pot had not been emptie: Even ſo the bounty of our God gives grace, & glory, according to the capacity of the receiver; when he ceaſeth to infuſe, it is for want of roome in the heart that takes it in; Could we hold more, O God, thou wouldeſt give more; If there be any defect, it is in our veſſels, not in thy beneficence; How did the heart of this poore widow runne over, as with wonder, ſo, with joy and thankfulneſſe, to ſee ſuch a river of oyle riſe out of ſo ſmall a ſpring; to ſee all her veſſels ſwimming full with ſo beneficiall a liquor; Juſtly is ſhee affected with this ſight, ſhe is not tranſported from her duty; I doe not ſee her run forth into the ſtreet, and proclaime her ſtore, nor calling in her neighbours, whether to admire or bargaine; I ſee her running to the Prophets doore, and gratefully acknowledging the favour, and humbly depending on his directions, as not daring to diſpoſe of that, which was ſo wondrouſly given her, without the advice of him, by whoſe powerfull meanes ſhe had received it; Her owne reaſon might have ſufficiently ſuggeſted what to doe; ſhe dares not truſt it, but conſults with the Oracle of God; If we would walke ſurely, we muſt doe nothing without a word; Every action, every motion muſt have a warrant; We can no more erre with this guide, than not erre without him.

The Prophet ſets her in a right way; Goe ſell the oyle, and pay the debt, and live, thou, and thy children, on the reſt; The firſt care is of her debts, the next, of her maintenance, It ſhould be groſſe injuſtice to raiſe meanes for her ſelfe, and her charge, ere ſhe have diſcharged the arrerages of her huſband; None of the oyle was hers, till her creditors were ſatisfied; all was hers that remained; It is but ſtealth to enjoy a borrowed ſubſtance; Whiles ſhe had nothing, it was no ſin to owe; but when once her veſſels were full, ſhe could not have beene guiltleſſe, if ſhe had not paid, before ſhee ſtored. God and his Prophets were bountifull; after the debts paid, they provide not onely againſt the thraldome of her charge, but againſt the want. It is the juſt care of a religious heart to defend the widow and children of a Prophet from diſtreſſe and penurie.

Behold the true ſervant, and ſucceſſor of Elijah; What hee did to the Sareptan widow, this did to the widow of a Prophet; That increaſe of oyle was by degrees, this at once; both equally miraculous; this, ſo much more charitable, as it leſſe concerned himſelfe.

He that gives kindneſſes, doth by turnes receive them; Eliſha hath releeved a poore woman, is releeved by a rich. The Shunamite, a religious and wealthy matron, invites him to her houſe, and now after the firſt entertainment, finding his occaſions to call him to a frequent paſſage, that way, moves her huſband to ſet up, and furniſh a lodging for the man of God; It was his holineſſe that made her deſirous of ſuch a gueſt; Well might ſhe hope that ſuch an Inmate would pay a bleſſing for his houſe-rent: Oh happy Shunamite that might make her ſelfe the Hoſteſſe of Eliſha! As no leſſe dutifull than godly, ſhe imparts her deſire to her huſband, whom her ſute hath drawne to a partnerſhip in this holy hoſpitality; Bleſſed of God is that man, whoſe whose bed yeelds him an help to heaven. The good Shunamite desires not to harbour Elisha in one of her wonted lodgings, she sollicites her husband to build him a chamber on the wall apart: she knew the tumult of a large family unfit for the quiet meditations of a Prophet: retiredness is most meet for the thoughts of a Seer: Neither would she bring him to bare walls, but sets ready for him a bed, a table, a stoole, and a Candlesticke, and what ever necessary utensils for his entertainment: The Prophet doth not affect delicacy, shee takes care to provide for his convenience; Those that are truly pious, and devout, think their houses and their hands cannot be too open to the messengers of God; & are most glad to exchange their earthly commodities for the others spirituall. Superfluity should not fall within the care of a Prophet, necessity must: he that could provide oyle for the widow, could have provided all needfull helpes for himselfe: What roome had there been for the charity and beneficence of others, if the Prophet should have alwayes maintained himselfe out of power?

The holy man is so farre sociable as not to neglect the friendly offer of so kinde a benefactor: Gladly doth he take up his new lodging: and, as well pleased with so quiet a repose, and carefull attendance, he sends his servant Gehezi with the message of his thankes, with a treaty of retribution: Behold, thou hast beene carefull for us, with all this care: What is to be done for thee? Wouldest thou bee spoken for to the King, or to the Captaine of the Host? An ingenuous disposition cannot receive favours without thoughts of returne: A wise debtor is desirous to retribute in such kinde, as may bee most acceptable to his obligers: without this discretion, wee may offer such requitals, as may seeme goodly to us, to our friends, worthlesse: Every one can choose best for himselfe; Elisha therefore (who had never beene wanting in spirituall duties to so hospitall a friend) gives the Shunamite the election of her suit, for temporall recompence also; No man can be a loser by his favour to a Prophet. It is a good hearing that an Elisha is in such grace at the Court, that he can promise himselfe accesse to the King, in a friends suit: It was not ever thus; the time was, when his master heard, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy: Now the late miracle which Elisha wrought in gratifying the three Kings, with water, and victory, hath endeared him to the King of Israel; and now, Who but Elisha? Even that rough mantle findes respect amongst those silkes and tissues: As bad as Iehoram was, yet he honored the man of God; He that could not prevaile with an Idolatrous King, in a spirituall reformation, yet can cary a civill suit; Neither doth the Prophet in a sullen discontentment, fly off from the Court, because he found his labours unprofitable, but stil holds good termes with that Prince, whom he cannot reclaime, & will make use notwithstanding of his countenance in matters, whether of courtesie, or justice; We may not cast off our due respects even to faulty authority; but must still submit and persist, where we are repelled: Not to his owne advancement doth Elisha desire to improve the Kings favour, but to the behoofe, to the releefe of others; If the Shunamite have businesse at the Court, she shall need no other Solicitor; There cannot be a better office, nor more beseeming a Prophet, than to speake in the cause of the dumbe, to befriend the oppressed, to win greatnesse unto the protection of innocence.

The good matron needs no shelter of the great; I dwell among mine owne people, as if she said; The courtesie is not small in it selfe, but not usefull to me; I live here quietly in a contented obscurity, out of the reach either of the glories, or cares of a Court; free from wrongs, free from envies: Not so high as to provoke an evil eye, not so low as to be troden on; I have neither feares, nor ambitions; my neighbours are my friends; my friends are my protectors; and (if I should be so unhappy as to be the subject of maine injuries) would not stick to be mine Advocates; This favour is for those that either affect greatnesse, or groane under oppressions; I doe neither, for I live among my owne people. O Shunamite, thou shalt not escape envy! Who can heare of thine happy condition, and not say, Why am not I thus? If the world affoord any perfect contentment, it is in a middle estate, equally distant from penury, from excesse; it is in a calme freedome, a secure tranquillity, a sweet fruition of our selves, of ours; But what hold is there of these earthly things? How long is the Shunamite thus blessed with peace? stay but a while, you shall see her come on her knees to the King of Israel, pitifully complaining that she was stripped of house, and land: and now Gehezi is faine to doe that good office for her, which was not accepted from his master. Those that stand fastest upon earth have but slippery footing: no man can say that he shall not need friends.

Modesty sealed up the lips of the good Shunamite: shee was ashamed to confesse her longing: Gehezi easily guessed that her barrennesse could not but be her affliction shee was childlesse, her husband old: Elisha gratifies her with the newes of a sonne: About this season according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a sonne: How liberall is God, by his Prophet, in giving beyond her requests: not seldome doth his bounty over-reach our thoughts, and meet us with those benefits, which wee thought too good for us to aske. Greatnesse and inexpectation makes the blessing seeme incredible, Nay, my Lord, thou man of God, doe not lie to thine hand-maid: Wee are never sure enough of what we desire: Wee are not more hard to beleeve, than loath to distrust beneficiall events: She well knew the Prophets holinesse could not stand with wilfull falshood; perhaps, she might thinke it spoken by way of tryall, not of serious affirmation; as unwilling therefore that it should not be, and willing to heare that pleasing word seconded, she sayes, Doe not lie to thine hand-maid. Promises are made good, not by iteration, but by the effect; The Shunamite conceives, and beares a son, at the set season: How glad a mother she was, those know best, that have mourned under the discomfort of a sad sterility. The childe growes up, and is now able to finde out his father in the field, amongst his Reapers: His father now grew young againe with the pleasure of his sight; and more joyed in this spring of his hopes, than in all the crops of his harvest; But what stability is there in these earthly delights? The hot beames of the Sunne beat upon that head which too much care had made tender, and delicate; The child complaines to his father, of his paine; Oh that grace could teach us, what nature teaches Infants, in all our troubles to bemoane our selves to our heavenly father! He sends him to his mother; upon her lap, about noone, the child dies; as if he would returne his soule into that bosome, from which it was derived to him; The good Shunamite hath lost her sonne, her faith she had not lost; Passion hath not robbed her of her wisdome; As not distracted with an accident so sudden, so sorrowfull; she layes her dead childe upon the Prophets bed, she lockes the doore; shee hides her griefe, lest that consternation might hinder her designe; she hastens to her husband, and (as not daring to be other than officious in so distresse-full an occasion) acquaints him with her journey, (though not with the cause) requires of him both attendance, and conveyance; she posts to mount Carmel; she cannot so soone finde out the man of God, as hee hath found her; He sees her afarre off, and like a thankefull guest, sends his servant hastily to meet her, to inquire of the health of her selfe, her husband, her childe; Her errand was not to Gehezi, it was to Elisha; no messenger shall interrupt her; no eare shall receive her complaint but the Prophets; Downe shee fals passionately at his feete, and, forgetting the fashion of her bashfull strangenesse, layes hold of them, whether in an humble veneration of his person, or in a fervent desire of satisfaction. Gehezi, who well knew how uncouth, how unfit this gesture of salutation was for his master, offers to remove her, and admonisheth her of her distance; The mercifull Prophet easily apprehends that no ordinary occasion could so transport a grave, and well-governed matrone; as therefore pitying her unknowne passion, hee bids, Let her alone, for her soule is vexed within her, and the Lord hath hid it from mee, and hath not told mee. If extremitie of griefe have made her unmannerly, wise and holy Elisha knowes how to pardon it; Hee dares not adde sorrow to the afflicted; hee can better beare an unseemelinesse in her greeting, than cruelty in her molestation. Great was the familiarity that the Prophet had with his God; and as friends are wont mutually to impart their counsells to each other, so had the Lord done to him; Elisha was not idle on mount Carmel; What was it that he saw not from thence? Not heaven onely, but the world was before him, yet the Shunamites losse is concealed from him: neither doth he shame to confesse it; Oft-times those that know greater

greater matters may yet be ignorant of the lesse: It is no disparagement to any finite creature not to know something. By her mouth will God tell the Prophet, what by vision he had not; Then she said, Did I desire a sonne of my Lord? Did I not say, doe not deceive me? Deep sorrow is sparing of words; The expostulation could not be more short, more quick, more pithy: Had I begged a sonne, perhaps my importunity might have been yeelded to, in anger; Too much desire is justly punished with losse. It is no marvell if what we wring from God, prosper not; This favour to mee was of thine owne motion; Thy suit, O Elisha, made me a mother: Couldst thou intend to torment me with a blessing? How much more easie had the want of a sonne been, than the miscariage? Barrennesse than orbation? Was there no other end of my having a son, than that I might lose him? O man of God, let me not complaine of a cruell kindnesse; thy prayers gave me a son, let thy prayers restore him; let not my dutifull respects to thee be repaid with an aggravation of misery; give not thine handmaid cause to wish that I were but so unhappy as thou foundest me; Oh wofull fruitfulnesse, if I must now say, That I had a sonne.

I know not whether the mother, or the Prophet were more afflicted, the Prophet for the mothers sake, or the mother for her owne; Not a word of reply doe we heare from the mouth of Elisha, his breath is onely spent in the remedy; Hee sends his servant with all speed, to lay his staffe upon the face of the child; charging him to avoide all the delayes of the way: Had not the Prophet supposed that staffe of his able to beate away death, why did he send it? and if upon that supposition hee sent it, how was it that it failed of effect? was this act done out of humane conceit, not out of instinct from God? Or did the want of the mothers faith hinder the successe of that cure? She, not regarding the staffe, or the man, holds fast to Elisha; No hopes of his message can loose her fingers: As the Lord liveth and as thy soule liveth, I will not leave thee: Shee imagined that the servant, the staffe might be severed from Elisha, she knew that where ever the Prophet was, there was power; It is good relying on those helpes that cannot faile us.

Merit and importunity have drawne Elisha from Carmel to Shunem: Hee findes his lodging taken up by that pale carkeise; he shuts his doore, and fals to his prayers; this staffe of his (what ever became of the other) was long enough (hee knew) to reach up to heaven to knocke at those gates, yea to wrench them open; He applies his body to those cold and senselesse limbs; By the fervour of his soule he reduces that soule, by the heat of his body he educeth warmth out of that corps: The child neeseth seven times, and as if his spirit had been but hid for the time, not departed, it fals to worke afresh; the eyes looke up, the lippes and hands move; The mother is called in to receive a new life, in her twice-given sonne: she comes in, full of joy, full of wonder, and bowes her selfe to the ground, and fals downe before those feet, which she had so boldly laid hold of in Carmel. Oh strong faith of the Shunamite, that could not be discouraged with the seizure, and continuance of death; raising up her heart still to an expectation of that life, which to the eyes of nature had beene impossible, irrevocable; Oh infinite goodnesse of the Almighty, that would not suffer such faith to be frustrate, that would rather reverse the lawes of nature, in returning a guest from heaven, and raising a corps from death, than the confidence of a beleeving heart should be disappointed.

How true an heire is Elisha of his master, not in his graces only, but in his actions? Both of them divided the waters of Iordan, the one as his last act, the other as his first; Eliahs curse was the death of the Captaines, and their troups; Elishaes curse was the death of the children: Eliah rebuked Ahab to his face; Elisha Iehoram: Eliah supplied the drought of Israel by raine from heaven; Elisha supplied the drought of the three Kings by waters gushing out of the earth; Eliah increased the oyle of the Sareptan; Elisha increased the oyle of the Prophets widow; Eliah raysed from death the Sareptans son; Elisha the Shunamites: Both of them had one mantle, one spirit; both of them climbed up one Carmel, one heaven.

Eliſha with Naaman.

OF the full ſhowers of grace which fell upon Iſrael & Iudah, yet ſome drops did light upon their neighbours: If Iſrael be the worſe for her nereneſſe to Syria, Syria is the better for the vicinity of Iſrael. Amongſt the worſt of Gods enemies ſome are ſingled out for mercy. Naaman was a great Warriour, an honourable Courtier, yet a Leper; no diſeaſe incident to the body is ſo naſty, ſo loathſome, as Leproſie. Greatneſſe can ſecure no man from the moſt odious and weariſome condition; how little pleaſure did this Syrian Peere take, to be ſtooped to by others, whiles he hated to ſee himſelfe: Even thoſe that honoured him, avoided him; neither was he other than abhorred of thoſe that flattered him; yea his hand could not move to his mouth without his owne deteſtation; the baſeſt ſlave of Syria would not change ſkins with him, if he might have his honour to boot: Thus hath the wiſe God thought meet to ſauce the valour, dignity, renowne, victories, of the famous Generall of the Syrians; Seldome ever was any man ſerved with ſimple favours; Theſe compoſitions make both our croſſes tolerable, and our bleſſings wholeſome.

The body of Naaman was not more tainted with his lepry, than his ſoule was tainted with Rimmon; and beſides his Idolatry, hee was a profeſſed enemy to Iſrael, and ſucceſſefull in his enmity: How far doth God fetch about his purpoſes? The leproſie, the hoſtility of Naaman ſhall be the occaſions of his ſalvation; That leproſie ſhall make his ſoule ſound; That hoſtility ſhall adopt him a ſon of God; In ſome proſperous in-rodes, that the Syrians under Naamans conduct have made into the land of Iſrael, a little maid is taken captive; ſhe ſhall attend on Naamans wife; and ſhall ſuggeſt to her miſtreſſe the miraculous cures of Eliſha. A ſmall chink may ſerve to let in much light; Her report findes credit in the Court, and begets both a letter from the King and a journey of his Peere; whiles the Syrians thought of nothing but their booty, they bring happineſſe to the houſe of Naaman; The captivity of a poore Hebrew girle is a meanes to make the greateſt Lord of Syria, a ſubject to God; It is good to acquaint our children with the workes of God, with the praiſes of his Prophets. Little doe we know how they may improve this knowledge, and whither they may carie it; perhaps the remoteſt Nations may light their candle at their coale: Even the weakeſt intimatiõs may not be neglected: A childe, a ſervãt, a ſtrãger may ſay that, which we may bleſſe God to have heard: How well did it become the mouth of an Iſraelite to extoll a Prophet; to wiſh the cure of her maſter, though an Aramite; to adviſe that journey, unto the man of God, by whom both body and ſoule might be cured: True Religion teacheth us pious and charitable reſpects to our Governours, though Aliens from the Common-wealth of God.

No man that I heare blames the credulity of Naaman; upon no other ground doth the King of Syria ſend his chiefe Peere, with his letters to the King of Iſrael; from his hands requiring the Cure: The Syrian ſuppoſed, that what ever a ſubject could doe, a Soveraigne might command; that ſuch a Prophet could neither be out of the knowledge, nor out of the obedience to his Prince; never did hee dreame of any exemption, but imagining Iehoram to be no leſſe a King of Prophets, than of people, and Eliſha no leſſe a ſubject, than a Seer, he writes, Now when this letter is come to thee, behold, I have herewith ſent Naaman my ſervant to thee, that thou maiſt recover him of his leproſie. Great is the power of Princes; every mans hand is theirs, whether for ſkill, or for ſtrength: Beſides the eminency of their owne gifts, all the ſubordinate excellencies of their ſubjects, are no leſſe at their ſervice, than if they were inherent in their perſons: Great men are wanting to their owne perfections, if they do not both know, and exerciſe the graces of their inferiors.

The King of Iſrael cannot read the letter without amazement of heart, without rending of garments, & ſaies; Am I God, to kill & to make alive, that this man ſendes to me, to recover a man of his leproſie? Wherefore conſider, & ſee, I pray you, how he ſeeketh a quar-

rell

A rell against me? If God have vouchsafed to call Kings, Gods; it well becomes Kings to call themselves, men; and to confesse the distance wherein they stand to their Maker: Man may kill, man cannot kill and make alive; yea of himselfe he can do neither: with God, a Worme, or a fly may kill a man; without God no Potentate can doe it: much lesse can any created power both kill, and revive: since to restore life is more than to bereave it, more than to continue it, more than to give it: And if leprosie be a death, what humane power can either inflict, or cure it: It is a trouble to a well-affected heart to receive impossible commands: To require that of an inferiour which is proper to the highest, is a derogation from that supreame power whose property it is: Had Iehoram beene truly religious, the injury done to his Maker in this motion, (as he tooke it) had more afflicted him, than the danger of his owne quarrell.

B Belike, Elisha was not in the thoughts of the King of Israel: Hee might have heard that this Prophet had made alive one, whom he killed not: Himselfe with the two other Kings had beene eye-witnesses of what Elisha could doe: yet now, the Calves of Dan and Bethel have so often taken up his heart, that there is no roome for the memory of Elisha; whom hee sued to in his extremity, now his prosperity hath forgotten: Carnall hearts (when need drives them) can think of GOD, and his Prophet; when their turne is served, can as utterly neglect them, as if they were not.

Yet cannot good Elisha repay neglect, and forgetfulnesse: He listens what is done at the Court, and finding the distresse of his Soveraigne, profers that service, which should have beene required; Wherefore hast thou rent thy cloathes; Let him come now to mee, and hee shall know that there is a Prophet in Israel. It was no small fright, from

C which Elisha delivers his King: Iehoram was in awe of the Syrians, ever since their late victorie, wherein his father Ahab was slaine, Israel and Judah discomfited: nothing was more dreadfull to him, than the frownes of these Aramites: The quarrell which he suspected to be hatched by them, is cleared by Elisha: their Leper shall be healed; both they, and Israel shall know they have neglected a God, whose Prophet can doe wonders: Many eyes, doubtlesse, are fastened upon the issue of this message. But what state is this that Elisha takes upon him; hee doth not say, I will come to him; but, Let him come now to mee: The three Kings came downe once to his Tent, it is no marvell, if hee prevent not the journey of a Syrian Courtier: It well beseemes him that will bee a suiter for favour, to bee obsequious: Wee may not stand upon termes of our labour, or dignity, where wee expect

D a benefit: Naaman comes richly attended with his troupes of servants and horses, and waites in his Charet at the doore of a Prophet: I doe not heare Elisha call him in; for though he were great, yet he was leprous: neither doe I see Elisha come forth to him, and receive him with such outward courtesies, as might be fit for an honourable stranger; for in those rich cloathes the Prophet saw an Aramite; and perhaps some tincture of the late-shed blood of Israel. Rather, that he might make a perfect triall of the humility of that man, whom he meanes to gratifie, and honour, after some short attendance at his doore, he sends his servant with a message to that Peere, who could not but thinke the meanest of his retinue, a better man than Gehezies Master.

E What could the Prophet have done other to the Lacquy of Naamans man? Hee that would bee a meet subject of mercy, must bee throughly abased in his owne conceit: and must be willingly pliable to all the conditions of his humiliation: Yet, had the message caried in it either respect to the person, or probability of effect, it could not have beene unwelcome: but now it sounded of nothing, but sullennesse, and unlikelihood: Goe, and wash in Iordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come againe to thee, and thou shalt be cleane: What wise man could take this for anyother than a meer scorne, and mockery? Goe, wash? Alas, what can water doe? It can cleanse from filthinesse, not from leprosie: And why in Iordan? What differs that from other streames? and why just seven times? What vertue is either in that channell, or in that number? Naaman can no more put off nature than leprosie: In what a chafe did he fling away from the Prophets doore; and sayes, Am I comne thus far to fetch a flout from an Iſraelite? Is this the iſſue both of my journey, and the Letters of my King? Could this Prophet finde no man to play upon, but Naaman? Had he meant ſeriouſly, why did he thinke himſelfe too good to come forth unto me? Why did he not touch me with his hand, and bleſſe me with his prayers, and cure me with his bleſſing? Is my miſery fit for his deriſion? If water could doe it, what needed I to come ſo farre for this remedy? Have I not oft done thus in vaine? Have we not better ſtreames at home, than any Iſrael can afford? Are not Abana and Pharphar, Rivers of Damaſcus, better than all the waters of Iſrael? Folly and pride ſtrive for place in a naturall heart, and it is hard to ſay whether is more predominant. Folly in meaſuring the power of Gods ordinances by the rule of humane diſcourſe, and ordinary event: pride, in a ſcornefull valuation of the inſtitutions of God, in compariſon of our owne devices. Abana and Pharphar, two for one: Rivers, not waters; of Damaſcus, a ſtately City, and incomparable: Are they not? Who dares deny it? Better, not as good; than the waters, not the rivers; all the waters, Iordan, and all the reſt; of Iſrael, a beggarly region to Damaſcus. No where ſhall we finde a truer patterne of the diſpoſition of Nature; how ſhe is altogether led by ſenſe, and reaſon; how ſhe fondly judges of all objects by the appearance, how ſhe acquaints her ſelfe onely with the common rode of Gods proceedings, how ſhe ſtickes to her owne principles, how ſhe miſconſtrues the intentions of God, how ſhe over-conceits her owne, how ſhee diſdaines the meane conditions of others, how ſhe upbraids her oppoſites with the proud compariſon of her owne priviledges.

Nature is never but like her ſelfe: No marvell if carnall mindes deſpiſe the fooliſhneſſe of preaching, the ſimplicity of Sacraments, the homelineſſe of ceremonies, the ſeeming inefficacy of cenſures: Theſe men looke upon Iordan with Syrian eyes; One drop of whoſe water ſet apart by divine ordination, hath more vertue, than all the ſtreames of Abana, and Pharphar.

It is a good marter for a man to be attended with wiſe and faithful followers: Many a one hath had better counſell from his heeles, than from his elbowes: Naamans ſervants were his beſt friends: they came to him, and ſpake to him, and ſaid, My Father, If the Prophet had bid thee doe ſome great thing, wouldſt thou not have done it? How much rather then, when he ſaith to thee, Waſh, and be cleane. Theſe men were ſervants, not of the humour, but of the profit of their maſter: Some ſervile ſpirits would have cared onely to ſooth up, not to benefit their Governour, and would have encouraged his rage, by their owne: Sir, will you take this at the hand of a baſe fellow? was ever man thus flouted? Will you let him carie it away thus? Is any harmeleſſe anger ſufficient revenge for ſuch an inſolence? Gives us leave at leaſt to pull him out by the eares, and force him to doe that by violence, which he would not doe out of good manners. Let our fingers teach this ſawcy Prophet what it is to offer an affront to a Prince of Syria: But theſe men loved more their maſters health, than his paſſion; and had rather therefore to adviſe, than flatter: to draw him to good, than follow him to evill: Since it was a Prophet from whom he received this preſcription, they perſwade him not to deſpiſe it; intimating there could be no fault in the ſleightneſſe of the receit, ſo long as there was no defect of power in the commander; that the vertue of the cure ſhould be in his obedience, not in the nature of the remedy: They perſwade, and prevaile. Next to the Prophet, Naaman may thanke his ſervants that he is not a Leper: He goes downe (upon their intreaty) and dips ſeven times in Iordan, his fleſh riſeth, his Leproſie vaniſheth: Not the unjuſt fury and techineſſe of the patient ſhall croſſe the cure: leſt whiles God is ſevere, the Prophet ſhould be diſcredited. Long enough might Naaman have waſhed there in vaine, if Eliſha had not ſent him: Many a Leper hath bathed in that ſtreame, and hath come forth no leſſe impure: It is the word, the ordinance of the Almighty which puts efficacy into thoſe meanes which of themſelves are both impotent and improbable: What can our Font doe to the waſhing away of ſinne? If Gods inſtitution ſhall put vertue into our Iordan, it ſhal ſcoure off the ſpirituall leproſies of our hearts; and ſhall more cure the ſoule, than cleanſe the face.

How joyfull is Naaman to ſee this change of his ſkin, this renovation of his fleſh, of

of his life: Never did his heart finde such warmth of inward gladnesse, as in this streame.

Upon the sight of his recovery, he doth not poste home to the Court, or to his family, to call for witnesses, for partners of his joy; but thankfully returnes to the Prophet, by whose meanes he received this mercy: He comes back with more contentment than he departed with rage: Now will the man of God be seene of that recovered Syrian, whom he would not see leprous: His presence shall be yeelded to the gratulation which was not yeelded to the suit: Purposely did Elisha forbeare before, that he might share no part of the praise of this worke with his Maker; that God might be so much more magnified, as the meanes were more weake and despicable. The miracle hath his due worke. First, doth Naaman acknowledge the God that wrought it; then the Prophet, by whom he wrought it: Behold, now I know there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel. Oh happy Syrian, that was at once cured of his leprosie, and his mis-prison of God: Naaman was too wise, to think that either the water had cured him, or the man: he saw a divine power working in both: such as he vainly sought from his Heathen Deities: with the heart therefore he beleeves, with the mouth he confesses.

Whiles he is thus thankfull to the author of his cure, hee is not unmindfull of the instrument. Now therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant. Naaman came richly furnished with ten talents of silver, sixe thousand peeces of gold, ten changes of raiment: All these and many more would the Syrian Peere have gladly given to be delivered from so noisome a disease: no marvell if he importunately offer some part of them to the Prophet, now that he is delivered; some testimony of thankfulnesse did well, where all earthly recompence was too short: The hands of this man were no lesse full of thankes, than his mouth Dry and barren professions of our obligations where is power to requite, are unfit for noble and ingenuous spirits.

Naaman is not more franke in offering his gravity, than Elisha vehement in refusing it, As the Lord liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none. Not that he thought the Syrian gold impure: Not that he thought it unlawfull to take up a gift, where he hath laid downe a benefit: But the Prophet will remit of Naamans purse, that he may win of his soule: The man of God would have his new Convert see cause to be more enamoured of true piety; which teacheth her Clients to contemne those worldly riches and glories, which base worldlings adore: and would have him thinke, that these miraculous powers are so far transcending the valuatiō of all earthly pelfe, that those glittering treasures are worthy of nothing, but contempt, in respect thereof: Hence is it, that he who refused not the Shunamites table, and stoole, and candlestick will not take Naamans present: there is much use of godly discretion in directing us when to open, when to shut our hands.

He that will not be allowed to give, desires yet to take it: Shall there not, I pray thee, bee given to thy servant two mules load of earth? For thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering, nor sacrifice to other gods, but unto the Lord. Israelitish mold lay open to his cariage, without leave of Elisha: but Naaman regards not to take it, unlesse it may be given him, and given him by the Prophets hand: Well did this Syrian find that the man of God had given a supernatural vertue to the water of Israel, and therefore supposed he might give the like to his earth: Neither would any earth serve him but Elishaes; else the mold of Israel had been more properly craved of the King than the Prophet of Israel.

Doubtlesse it was devotion that moued this suit: The Syrian saw God had a propriety in Israel, and imagines that he will be best pleased with his owne; On the sudden was Naaman halfe a Proselyte, still here was a weake knowledge with strong intentions: He will sacrifice to the Lord; but where? in Syria, not in Hierusalem: Not the mold, but the Altar is that God respects; which he hath allowed no where but in his chosen Sion. This honest Syrian will be removing God home to his Country; he should have resolved to remove his home, to God; And though he vowes to offer no sacrifice to any other God, yet he craves leave to offer an outward courtesie to Rimmon; though not for the Idols sake, yet for his masters: In this thing

the Lord pardon thy ſervant, that when my maſter goeth into the houſe of Rimmon, to worſhip there, and hee leaneth on my hand, and I bow my ſelfe in the houſe of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy ſervant in this thing. Naaman goes away reſolute to profeſſe himſelfe an Iſraelite for Religion; all the Syrian Court ſhall know that hee ſacrifices upon Iſraeliticſh earth, to the God of Iſrael: they ſhall heare him proteſt to have neither heart, nor knee for Rimmon: If he muſt goe into the houſe of that Idoll, it ſhall bee as a ſervant, not as a ſuppliant; his duty to his Maſter ſhall cary him, not his devotion to his Maſters god; If his maſter goe to worſhip there, not he; neither doth hee ſay, When I bow my ſelfe to the Image of Rimmon; but, in the houſe: hee ſhall bow, to be leaned upon, not to adore; yet had not Naaman thought this a fault, he had not craved a pardon; his heart told him that a perfect Convert ſhould not have abidd the roofe, the ſight, the ayre of Rimmon; that his obſervance of an earthly maſter ſhould not draw him to the ſemblance of an act of outward obſervance to the rivall of his maſter in Heaven, that a ſincere deteſtation of Idolatry could not ſtand with ſo unſeaſonable a courteſie.

Farre therefore is Naaman from being a patterne, ſave of weakneſſe; ſince he is yet more than halfe a Syrian; ſince he willingly accuſes himſelfe, and inſtead of defending, deprecates his offence; It is not for us to expect a full ſtature in the cradle of converſion. As nature, ſo grace riſes by many degrees, to perfection; Leproſie was in Naaman cured at once, not corruption.

The Prophet, as glad to ſee him but thus forward, diſmiſſes him with a civill valediction; Had an Iſraelite made this ſuit, he had been anſwered, with a checke; thus much from a Syrian was worthy a kinde farewell; They are parted.

Gehezi cannot thus take his leave; his heart is ma'ed up in the rich cheſts of Naaman, and now he goes to fetch it; The Prophet and his man had not looked with the ſame eyes upon the Syrian treaſure; the one with the eye of contempt, the other with the eye of admiration, and covetous deſire. The diſpoſition of the maſter may not be meaſured by the minde, by the act of his ſervant; Holy Eliſha may be attended by a falſe Gehezi: No examples, no counſels will prevaile with ſome hearts; who would not have thought that the follower of Eliſha could bee no other then a Saint? yet, after the view of all thoſe miracles, this man is a mirrour of worldlineſſe. Hee thinkes his maſter either too ſimple, or too kinde, to refuſe ſo juſt a preſent from a Syrian; himſelfe will be more wiſe, more frugall; Deſire haſtens his pace, he doth not goe, but runne after his booty; Naaman ſees him, and, as true nobleneſſe is ever courteous, alights from his Charet, to meet him; The great Lord of Syria comes forth of his Coach to ſalute a Prophets ſervant: not fearing that hee can humble himſelfe over-much to one of Eliſha's family: He greets Gehezi with the ſame word wherewith he lately was dimitted by his maſter: Is it peace? So ſudden a meſſenger might ſeeme to argue ſome change. Hee ſoone receives from the breathleſſe bearer newes of his maſters health, and requeſt: All is well, My Maſter, hath ſent mee, ſaying, Behold, even now there be come to mee from mount Ephraim, two young men of the ſonnes of the Prophets: Give mee, I pray thee, a talent of ſilver, and two changes of garments. Had Gehezi craved a reward in his owne name, calling for the fee of the Prophets ſervant, as the gaine, ſo the offence had beene the leſſe; now, reaching at a greater ſumme, he belies his Maſter, robs Naaman, burdens his owne ſoule. What a ſound tale hath the craft of Gehezi deviſed? Of the number, the place, the quality, the age of his Maſters gueſts? That he might ſet a faire colour upon that pretended requeſt: ſo proportioning the value of his demand, as might both enrich himſelfe, and yet well ſtand with the moderation of his maſter. Love of money can never keepe good quarter with honeſtie, with innocence: Covetouſneſſe never lodged in the heart alone; If it finde not, it will breed wickedneſſe. What a mint of fraud there is in a worldly breſt? How readily can it coine ſubtle falſhood for an advantage?

How thankfully liberall was this noble Syrian; Gehezi could not be more eager in taking, then he was in giving; As glad of ſo happy an occaſion of leaving any peece of his treaſure behinde him, hee forces two talents upon the ſervant of Eliſha: and

A binds them in two bags, and layes them upon two of his owne servants; his owne trayne shall yeeld Porters to Gehezi: Cheerefulnesse is the just praise of our beneficence: Bountifull mindes are as zealous in over-paying good turnes, as the niggardly are in scanting retributions.

What projects doe we thinke Gehezi had all the way? How did hee please himselfe with the waking dreames of purchases, of traffique, of jolly? and now, when they are comne to the tower, he gladly disburdens, and dismisses his two Syrian attendants, and hides their load, and wipes his mouth, & stands boldly before that Master, whom he had so foully abused: Oh Gehezi! where didst thou thinke God was this while? Couldest thou thus long powre water upon the hands of Elisha, and be either ignorant, or regardlesse of that undeceivable eye of providence, which was ever fixB ed upon thy hands, thy tongue, thy heart? Couldst thou thus hope to blind the eyes of a Seer? Heare then thy inditement, thy sentence, from him, whom thou thoughtest to have mocked with thy concealment; Whence commest thou Gehezi? Thy servant went no whither. He that had begun a lye to Naaman, ends it to his Master: who so lets his tongue once loose to a wilfull untruth, soone growes impudent in multiplying falsehoods. Of what metal is the forehead of that man, that dares lye to a Prophet? What is this, but to out-face the senses? Went not my heart with thee, when the man turned againe from his charet to meet thee? Didst thou not till now know, O Gehezi, that Prophets have spirituall eyes, which are not confined to bodily prospects?

Didst thou not know, that their hearts were often, where they were not? Didst thou not know that thy secretest wayes were over-looked by invisible witnesses? C Heare then and be convinced: Hither thou wentest, thus thou saidst, thus thou didst, thus thou spedst. What answer was now here but confusion? Miserable Gehezi, how didst thou stand pale and trembling before the dreadfull tribunall of thy severe Master, looking for the wofull sentence of some grievous judgement for so haynous an offence? Is this a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and (which thou hadst already purchased in thy conceit) Olive-yards, and Vine-yards, and Sheep, and Oxen, and Men-servants, and Maid-servants? Did my mouth refuse, that thy hands might take? Was I so carefull to win honour to my God, and credit to my profession, by denying these Syrian presents, that thou mightst dash both in receiving them? Was there no way to enrich thy selfe, but by belying thy Master; by disparaging this holy function in the eyes of a new convert? Since thou wouldst needs therefore take part of Naamans treasure, take part with him in his Leprosie, The leprosie of Naaman, shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. Oh heavy talents of Gehezi! Oh the horror of this one unchangeable suit, which shall never be but loathsomely white, noysomely uncleane! How much better had been a light purse, and an homely coat, with a sound body, a cleare soule? Too late doth that wretched man now finde, that he hath loaded himselfe with a curse, that he hath clad himselfe with shame: His sin shall be read ever in his face, in his seed; All passengers, all posterities shall now say, Behold the characters of Gehezies covetousnesse, fraud, sacriledge! The act overtakes the word, He went out of his presence a Leper as white as snow. It is a wofull exchange that Gehezi hath made with Naaman; Naaman became a Leper, returned a Disciple; Gehezi came a Disciple, returned a Leper: Naaman left behind both his disease and money; Gehezi E takes up both his money and his disease. Now shal Gehezi never look upō himself, but he shall think of Naaman whose skin is transferred upon him with those Talents; and shall weare out the rest of his dayes in shame, and paine, and sorrow: His teares may wash off the guilt of his sin, shall not (like another Jordan) wash off his Leprosie, that shall ever remaine as an hereditary monument of divine severity. This sonne of the Prophets shall more loud & lively preach the Justice of God by his face, than others by their tongue. Happy was it for him, if whiles his skin was snow-white with Leprosie, his humbled soule were washed white as snow with the water of true repentance.

Elisha

Eliſha raiſing the Iron, blinding the Aſſyrians.

THere was no loſſe of Gehezi; when he was gone, the Prophets increaſed: an ill man in the Church, is but like ſome ſhrubbie tree in a Garden, whoſe ſhade keepes better plants from growing: A blank doth better in a roome, than an ill filling: The view of Gods juſt judgements doth rather draw clients unto him, than alienate them, The Kings of Iſrael had ſucceeded in Idolatry, and hate of ſincere Religion; Yet the Prophets multiply: Perſecutiō enlargeth the bounds of the Church. Theſe very tempeſtuous ſhowers bring up flowers and herbes in abundance. There would have been neither ſo many, nor ſo zealous Prophets in the languiſhments of peace: Beſides, what marvell is it, if the immediate ſucceſſion of two ſuch noble Leaders, as Elijah and Eliſha, eſtabliſhed and augmented Religion, and bred multitudes of Prophets. Rather who cannot marvell, upon the knowledge of all their miracles, that all Iſrael did not propheſie? It is a good hearing, that the Prophets want elbow-roome; out of their ſtore, not out of the envy of neighbours, or incompetency of proviſion: Where viſion failes, the people periſh; they are bleſſed, where it abounds.

When they found themſelves ſtraitned, they did not preſume to carve for themſelves, but they craved the leave, the counſell of Eliſha: Let us goe, we pray thee, unto Iordan, and take thence every man a beame, and let us make us a place where we may dwell. And he ſaid, Goe ye. It well becomes the Sons of the Prophets, to enterpriſe nothing without the allowance of their Superiours. Here was a building towards, none of the curiouſeſt: I doe not ſee them making meanes for the procurement of ſome cunning artificers, nor for the conquiſition of ſome coſtly marbles, and Cedars, but every man ſhall hew, and ſquare, and frame his owne beame. No nice termes were ſtood upon by theſe ſons of the Prophets Their thoughts were fixed upon the perfection of a ſpirituall building: As an homely roofe may ſerve them, ſo their own hands ſhall raiſe it. The fingers of theſe contemplative men did not ſcorne the Axe, and Mallet, and Cheſell: It was better being there than in Obadiahs Cave; and they that dwell now contentedly under rude ſtickes, will not refuſe the ſquared ſtones, and poliſhed contignations of better times. They ſhall be ill teachers of others, that have not learned both to want, and to abound.

The Maſter of this ſacred Societie, Eliſha, is not ſtately, not auſtere: he gives not only paſſage to this motion of his Collegiates, but aſſiſtance. It was fit the ſons of the Prophets ſhould have convenience of dwelling, though not pompe, not coſtlineſſe. They fall to their worke; No man goes ſlackly about the building of his own houſe: One of them more regarding the tree than the toole, lets fall the head of the Ax into the river: Poore men are ſenſible of ſmall loſſes: He makes his moane to Eliſha, Alas Maſter, for it was borrowed; Had the Axe been his owne, the trouble had been the leſſe to forgo it; therefore doth the miſcariage afflict him, becauſe it was of a borrowed Axe. Honeſt mindes are more carefull of what they have by loane than by proprietie: In lending there is a truſt, which a good heart cannot diſappoint without vexation. Alas poore novices of the Prophet, they would be building, and were not worth their axes: if they would give their labour, they muſt borrow their inſtrumēts

Their wealth was ſpirituall: Outward poverty may well ſtand with inward riches: He is rich, not that hath the world, but that can contemne it.

Eliſha loves and cheriſhes this juſt ſimplicity; rather will he worke a miracle, than a borrowed axe ſhall not bee reſtored: It might eaſily bee imagined, hee that could raiſe up the iron out of the bottome of the water, could tell where it fell in; yet even that powerfull hand calls for direction: In this one point, the ſonne of the Prophet knowes more than Eliſha: The notice of particularities is neither fit for a creature, nor communicable: a meane man may beſt know his owne caſe: This Novice better knowes where his axe fell, than his maſter: his maſter knowes better how to get it out, than he. There is no reaſon to be given of ſupernaturall actions. The

Prophet

A phet borrowes an axe to cut an helve for the lost axe: Why did he not make use of that handle which had cast the head? Did he hold it unworthy of respect, for that it had abandoned the metal wherewith it was trusted? Or did he make choice of a new stick, that the miracle might be more cleare and unquestionable? Divine power goes a contrary way to Art: Wee first would have procured the head of the axe, and then would have fitted it with an helve: Elisha fits the head to the helve, and causeth the wood, which was light and knew not how to sinke, to fetch up the iron, which was heavy, and naturally uncapable of supernatation. Whether the metall were stripped of the naturall waight, by the same power which gave it being; or whether retaining the wonted poise, it was raised up by some spirituall operation, I enquire not: Only I see it swim like corke upon the streame of Iordan, and move towards the hand that B lost it. What creature is not willing to put off the properties of nature at the command of the God of nature? O God, how easie is it for thee, when this hard and heavy heart of mine is sunke downe into the mud of the world, to fetch it up againe by thy mighty Word, and cause it to float upon the streames of life, and to see the face of heaven againe?

Yet still doe the sides of Israel complaine of the thornes of Aram; The children of Ahab rue their fathers unjust mercy: From an enemy, it is no making question whether of strength or wyle: The King of Syria consults with his Servants, where to encampe for his greatest advantage; their opinion is not more required, than their secresie. Elisha is a thousand scouts: he sends word to the King of Israel of the projects, of the removes of his enemie. More than once had Iehoram saved both his life, and his Hoast, by these close admonitions. It is well that in something yet a Prophet may C be obeyed. What strange State-service was this which Elisha did, besides the spirituall? The King, the people of Israel owe themselves, and their safety to a despised Prophet. The man of God knew, and felt them Idolaters, yet how carefull and vigilant is he for their rescue. If they were bad yet they were his owne: If they were bad, yet not all; God had his number amongst their worst: If they were bad, yet the Syrians were worse. The Israelites mis-worshipped the true God, the Syrians worshipped a false. That (if it were possible) he might win them, he will preserve them; and if they will needs be wanting to God, yet Elisha will not be wanting to them; their impiety shall not make him undutifull.

There cannot be a juster cause of displeasure, than the disclosing of those secret counsels, which are laid up in our eare, in our breast. The King of Syria, not without reason, stomacks this supposed treachery. What Prince can beare, that an adverse D power should have a party, a Pensionary in his owne Court? How famous was Elisha even in forraine Regions? Besides Naaman, others of the Syrian Nobility take notice of the miraculous faculties of this Prophet of Israel; He is accused for this secret intelligence: No words can escape him, though spoken in the bed-chamber. O Syrian, whosoever thou wert, thou saidst not enough: If thy master doe but whisper in thine eare, if he smother his words within his owne lips; if hee doe but speake within his own bosome, Elisha knowes it from an infallible information. What counsell is it, O God, that can be hid from thee? what counsel is it that thou wilt hide from thy Seer? Even this very word that accuseth the Prophet, is knowne to the accused. He heares this tale whiles it is in telling; he heares the plot for his apprehension. How ill do the E projects of wicked men hang together? They that confesse Elisha knowes their secretest words, doe yet conferre to take him. There are spies upon him, whose espials have moved their anger, and admiration. He is descryed to be in Dothan, a smal town of Manasses; A whole Armie is sent thither to surprise him: The opportunity of the night is chosen for the exploit. There shal be no want either in the number, or valour or secrecie of these conspired troupes: and now when they have fully girt in the village with a strong & exquisite siege, they make themselves sure of Elisha, and please themselves to think how they have incaged the miserable Prophet, how they should take him at unawares in his bed, in the midst of a secure dreame; how they should cary him fettered to their King; what thanks they should have for so welcom a prisoner.

The successor of Gehezi riseth early in the morning, & sees all the City encompas-

ſed with a fearefull hoaſt, of foot, horſe, charets. His eyes could meet with nothing but woods of pikes, and wals of harneſſe, and luſtre of metals; and now he runs in affrighted to his Maſter: Alas, my maſter, what ſhall weedoe? He had day enough to ſee they were enemies that environed them, to ſee himſelf helpleſſe, & deſperate; & hath onely ſo much life left in him, as to lament himſelfe to the partner of his miſery. He cannot flee from his new Maſter, if he would; he runs to him with a wofull clamour Alas, my Maſter, what ſhall we doe?

Oh the undaunted courage of faith! Eliſha ſees all this, and ſits in his chamber ſo ſecure, as if theſe had onely beene the guard of Iſrael, for his ſafe protection. It is an hard precept that he gives his ſervant, Feare not: As well might he have bid him, not to ſee, when he ſaw, as not to feare, when he ſaw ſo dreadfull a ſpectacle: The operations of the ſenſes are no leſſe certaine, than thoſe of the affections, where the objects are no leſſe proper: But the taſke is eaſie if the next word may finde beleefe, [For there are moe with us, than with them.] Multitude, and other outward probabilities doe both lead the confidence of naturall hearts, and fixe it. It is for none but a David to ſay, I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of people, that have ſet themſelves againſt mee round about. Fleſh and blood riſeth, and falleth, according to the proportion of the ſtrength, or weakneſſe of apparent meanes.

Eliſhaes man lookt about him, yet his Maſter prayes, Lord open his eyes that they may ſee. Naturally we ſee not, whiles we doe ſee: Every thing is ſo ſeene, as it is. Bodily eyes diſcerne bodily objects, onely ſpirituall can ſee the things of God: Some men want both eyes and light. Eliſhaes ſervant had eyes, wanted illumination: No ſooner were his eyes open, than he ſaw the mountain full of horſes, and charets of fire round about Eliſha. They were there before, (neither doth Eliſha pray that thoſe troupes may be gathered, but that they may be ſeen) not till now were they deſcryed. Inviſible armies guard the ſervants of God, whiles they ſeeme moſt forſaken of earthly aide, moſt expoſed to certaine dangers: If the eyes of our faith be as open as thoſe of our ſenſe, to ſee Angels as well as Syrians, we cannot be appalled with the moſt unequall termes of hoſtility. Thoſe bleſſed Spirits are ready either to reſcue our bodies, or to cary up our ſoules to bleſſedneſſe; whither ever ſhall be enjoyned by their Maker: there is juſt comfort in both, in either.

Both thoſe Charets that came to feteh Eliĳah, & thoſe that came to defend Eliſha, were fiery: God is not leſſe lovely to his own, in the midſt of his judgements, than he is terrible to his enemies, in the demonſtration of his mercies. Thus guarded, it is no marvell if Eliſha dare walke forth into the midſt of the Syrians. Not one of thoſe heavenly Preſidiaries ſtruck a ſtroke for the Prophet; neither doth hee require their blowes, onely he turnes his prayer to his God, and ſayes, Smite this people, I pray thee, with blindneſſe. With no other than deadly intentions did theſe Aramites come down to Eliſha, yet doth not he ſay, Smite them with the Sword, but, Smite them with blindneſſe: All the evill he wiſheth to them, is their repentance; There was no way to ſee their error, but by blindneſſe. He that prayed for the opening of his Servants eyes, to ſee his ſafe-guard, prayes for the blinding of the eyes of his enemies, that they might not ſee to doe hurt.

As the eyes of Eliſhaes Servant were ſo ſhut, that they ſaw not the Angels, when they ſaw the Syrians: ſo the eyes of the Syrians ſhall be likewiſe ſhut, that when they ſee the man, they ſhall not ſee the Prophet. To all other objects their eyes are cleare onely to Eliſha they ſhall be blinde, blinde not through darkneſſe, but through miſknowledge: They ſhall ſee, and miſtake both the perſon and place. Hee that made the ſenſes, can either hold, or delude them at pleaſure: How eaſily can hee offer to the ſight other repreſentations, than thoſe which ariſe from the viſible matter, and make the heart to beleeve them?

Juſtly now might Eliſha ſay, This is not the way, neither is this the City, wherein Eliſha ſhall be deſcryed. He was in Dothan, but not as Eliſha; he ſhall not be found but in Samaria; neither can they have any guide to him, but himſelfe. No ſooner are they come into the ſtreets of Samaria, than their eyes have leave to know both the place and the Prophet. The firſt ſight they have of themſelves, is in the trap of Iſrael, in the jawes

A jawes of death: thoſe ſtately Palaces, which they now wonder at unwillingly, carie no reſemblance to them, but of their graves: Every Iſraelite ſeemes an executioner; every houſe a Jayle; every beame a Gibbet; and now, they look upon Eliſha tranſformed from their guide, to their common murderer, with horror and paleneſſe: It is moſt juſt with God to intangle the plotters of wickedneſſe, in their owne ſnare.

How glad is a mortall enemy to ſnatch at all advantages of revenge? Never did the King of Iſrael ſee a more pleaſing ſight, than ſo many Syrian throats at his mercy: & as loth to loſe ſo faire a day, (as if his fingers itched to be dip't in blood) he ſaies, My father, ſhall I ſmite, ſhall I ſmite them? The repetition argued deſire, the compellation, reverence: Not without allowance of a Prophet, would the King of Iſrael lay his hand upon an enemy, ſo miraculouſly trained home: His heart was ſtil foule with
B idolatry, yet would he not taint his hand with forbidden blood: Hypocriſie will bee ſtill ſcrupulous in ſomething, and in ſome awfull reſtraints is a perfect counterfeit of conſcience.

The charitable Prophet ſoone gives an angrie prohibition of ſlaughter; Thou ſhalt not ſmite them: Would'ſt thou ſmite thoſe whom thou haſt taken captive, with thy ſword, and with thy bow? As if he ſaid, Theſe are Gods captives, not thine; and if they were thine own, their blood could not be ſhed without cruelty: though in the hot chaſes of war, executions may be juſtifiable; yet in the cooleneſſe of deliberation, it can be no other than inhumane, to take thoſe lives which have been yeelded to mercy: But here, thy bow and thy ſword are guiltleſſe of the ſucceſſe; only a ſtrange providence of the Almighty hath caſt them into thine hands, whom neither thy force, nor thy
C fraud could have compaſſed: If it be victory thou aimeſt at, overcome them with kindneſſe: Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drinke: Oh noble revēge of Eliſha, to feaſt his perſecutors! To provide a Table for thoſe, who had provided a grave for him: Theſe Syrians came to Dothan ful of bloody purpoſes to Eliſha: he ſends them from Samaria full of good cheare, and jollity. Thus, thus ſhould a Prophet puniſh his purſuers: No vengeance but this is heroicall, and fit for Chriſtian imitation: If thine enemy hunger, give him bread to eate: if he thirſt, give him water to drink: For thou ſhalt heape coales of fire upon his head; and the Lord ſhall reward thee: Be not overcome with evill, but overcome evill with good.

The King of Iſrael hath done that by his feaſt, which he could not have done by his ſword: The bands of Syria will no more come by way of ambuſh, or incurſion,
D into the bounds of Iſrael. Never did a charitable act go away without the retribution of a bleſſing. In doing ſome good to our enemies, we do moſt good to our ſelves; God cannot but love in us this imitation of his mercy, who bids his Sun ſhine, and his raine fall where he is moſt provoked; and that love is never fruitleſſe.

The Famine of Samaria releeved.

E NOt many good turnes are written in Marble; ſoone have theſe Syrians forgotten the mercifull beneficence of Iſrael: After the forbearance of ſome hoſtile inroade, all the forces of Syria are muſtered againſt Iehoram: That very Samaria which had releeved the diſtreſſed Aramites, is by the Aramites beſieged, and is famiſhed by thoſe, whom it had fed. The famine within the walles was more terrible than the ſword without. Their worſt enemy was ſhut within; and could not be diſlodged of their owne bowels: Whither hath the Idolatry of Iſrael brought them? Before, they had been ſcourged with war, with drought, with dearth, as with ſingle cord; they remaine incorrigible, and now God twiſts two of theſe bloody laſhes together, and galls them even to death: there needs no other executioners then their own mawes. Thoſe things which in their nature were not edible, (at leaſt, to an Iſraelite) were now both deare, and dainty. The Aſſe was (beſides the untoothſomneſſe) an impure creature: that which the law of Ceremonies had made uncleane, the law of neceſſity had made delicate and precious: the bones of ſo carrion an head could not be picked for leſſe than foure hundred peeces of ſilver: neither was this ſcarcity of victuals only, but of all other neceſſaries for humane uſe; that the belly might not complaine alone, the whole man was equally pinched. A

The King of Iſrael is neither exempted from the judgment, nor yet yeelds under it: He walks upon the walls of his Samaria, to over-ſee the Watches ſet, the Engines ready, the Guards changed, together with the poſture of the enemy; when a woman cryes to him out of the City, Help my Lord, O King: Next to God what refuge have we in all our neceſſities, but his Anointed? Earthly Soveraignty can aid us in the caſe of the injuſtice of men, but what can it do againſt the judgements of God? If the Lord do not helpe thee, whence ſhall I helpe thee? out of the barne floore, or out of the wine-preſſe? Even the greateſt powers muſt ſtoop to afflictions in themſelves; how ſhould they be able to prevent them in others? To ſue for aid where is an utter impotence of redreſſe, is but to upbraid the weakeneſſe, and aggravate the miſery of thoſe whom wee implore. Iehoram miſtakes the ſuit: The ſuppliant calls to him for a woful peece of juſtice: Two mothers have agreed to eate their ſons; the one hath yeilded hers to be boyled and eaten; the other, after ſhe hath taken her part of ſo prodigious a banquet, with-draws her child, and hides him from the knife; hunger and envy make the Plaintiffe importunate; and now ſhe craves the benefit of Royall Juſtice. Shee that made the firſt motion, with-holds her part of the bargaine, and flyes from that promiſe, whoſe truſt had made this mother childleſſe. Oh the direfull effects of famine, that turnes off all reſpects of nature, and gives no place to horror, cauſing the tender mother to lay her hands, yea, her teeth upon the fruit of her owne body; and to receive that into her ſtomacke, which ſhe hath brought forth of her wombe: What ſhould Iehoram do? The match was monſtrous: The challenge was juſt, yet unnaturall: This complainant had purchaſed one halfe of the living childe, by the one halfe of hers, dead. The mother of the ſurviving Infant is preſſed by covenant, by hunger; reſtrained by nature. To force a mother to deliver up her childe to voluntary ſlaughter, had beene cruel: To force a debtor to pay a confeſſed arerage, ſeemed but equal: If the remaining child be not dreſſed for food, this mother of the devoured child is both robbed, and affamiſhed: If he be, innocent blood is ſhed by authority. It is no marvell if the queſtion aſtoniſhed the Judge; not ſo much for the difficulty of the demand, as the horror of the occaſion; to what lamentable diſtreſſe did Iehoram find his people driven? Not without cauſe did the King of Iſrael rend his garments, and ſhew his ſackcloth; wel might he ſee his people branded with that ancient curſe w^ch God had denounced againſt the rebellious: The Lord ſhall bring a Nation againſt thee of a fierce countenance, which ſhall not regard the perſon of the old, nor ſhew favour to the young; And he ſhall beſiege thee in all thy gates; And thou ſhalt eat the fruit of thine owne body, the fleſh of thy ſons, and of thy daughters: The tender and delicate woman, her eyes ſhall be evill towards her young one that commeth out from betweene her feet, and toward the children which ſhe ſhall beare, for ſhe ſhall eate them for want of all things ſecretly in the ſiege & ſtraitneſſe. He mournes for the plague, he mournes not for the cauſe of this plague, his ſin, and theirs: I find his ſorrow, I find not his repentance. The worſt man may grieve for his ſmart, onely the good heart grieves for his offence; In ſtead of being penitent, Iehoram is furious, and turnes his rage from his ſins, againſt the Prophet; God do ſo to me and more alſo, if the head of Eliſha, the ſon of Shaphat, ſhall ſtand on him this day: Alas, what hath the righteous done? Perhaps Eliſha (that we may imagine ſome colours of this diſpleaſure) fore-threatned this judgement; but they deſerved it: perhaps he might have averted it by his prayers; their unrepentance diſabled him: Perhaps he perſwaded Iehoram to hold out the ſiege; though through much hardneſſe: he fore-ſaw the deliverance. In all this how hath Eliſha forfeited his head? All Iſrael did not afford an head ſo guiltleſſe, as this that was deſtined to ſlaughter. This is the faſhion of the world; the lewd blames the innocent, and will revenge their owne ſins upon others uprightneſſe. B C D E

In the midſt of all this ſad eſtate of Samaria, and theſe ſtormes of Iehoram, the Prophet ſits quietly in his own houſe, amongſt his holy Conſorts; bewailing no doubt both the ſins, and miſery of their people; and prophetically conferring of the iſſue; when

A when ſuddenly God reveales to him the bloody intent, and meſſage of Iehoram, and he at once reveales it to his fellowes. See yee how this ſon of a murderer hath ſent to take away mine head. Oh the unimitable liberty of a Prophet! The ſame God that ſhewed him his danger, ſuggeſted his words; He may be bold, where we muſt be awfull: Still is Naboths blood layd in Iehorams diſh: The foule fact of Ahab blemiſheth his Poſterity, and now when the ſon threats violence to the innocent, murder is objected to him as hereditary.

He that fore-ſaw his owne perill, provides for his ſafety; [Shut the doore and hold him faſt at the doore.] No man is bound to tender his throat to an unjuſt ſtroke: This bloody commiſſion was prevented by a propheticall fore-ſight: The ſame eye that ſaw the executioner comming to ſmite him, ſaw alſo the King haſting after him, to
B ſtay the blow: The Prophet had been no other thā guilty of his own blood, if he had not reſerved himſelf a while, for the reſcue of authority: Oh the inconſtancy of carnall hearts! It was not long ſince Iehoram could ſay to Eliſha, My father, ſhall I ſmite them? now he is ready to ſmite him as an enemy, whom he honoured as a father: Yet againe, his lips had no ſooner given ſentence of death againſt the Prophet, than his feet ſtir to recall it: It ſhou'd ſeeme that Eliſha, upō the challenges & expoſtulations of Iehorams meſſenger, had ſent a perſwaſive meſſage to the King of Iſrael, yet a while to wait patiently upon God for his deliverance: The diſcontented Prince flies off in an impotent anger, Behold, this evill is of the Lord, what ſhould I wait for the Lord any longer? Oh the deſperate reſolutions of impatient minds! They have ſtinted God both for his time and his meaſure; if he exceed either, they either turne their backes
C upon him, or fly in his face: The poſition was true, the inference deadly: All that evill was of they Lord, the deſerved it; he ſent it: What then? It ſhould have beene therefore argued, Hee that ſent it, can remove it: I will wait upon his mercy, under whoſe juſtice I ſuffer: Impatience and diſtruſt ſhall but aggravate my judgement: It is the Lord, let him do what he will: But now to deſpaire becauſe God is juſt, to defie mercy becauſe it lingers, to reject God for correction, it is a preſumptuous madnes, an impious pettiſhneſſe.

Yet in ſpight of all theſe provocations both of King, and people, Eliſha hath good news for Iehoram: Thus ſaith the Lord, To morrow about this time ſhall a meaſure of fine flowre be ſold for a Shekel, and two meaſures of Barly for a Shekel in the gate of Samaria: Miſerable Iſrael now ſees an end of this hard triall; One dayes patience ſhall
D free them both of ſiege, and famine. Gods deliverances may over-ſtay our expectation, not the due period of his owne counſels. Oh infinite mercy, when man ſayes, No longer, God ſayes, To morrow: As if he would condeſcend where he might judge; and would pleaſe them who deſerved nothing but puniſhment. The word ſeemed not more comfortable, than incredible: A Lord, on whoſe hand the King leaned, anſwered the man of God, and ſaid, Behold, if the Lord would make windowes in heaven, might this thing be? Prophecies, before they be fulfilled, are riddles; no ſpirit can areed them, but that by which they are delivered. It is a fooliſh and injurious infidelity to queſtion a poſſibility, where we know the meſſage is Gods: How eaſie is it for that omnipotent hand to effect thoſe things, which ſurpaſſe all the reach of humane conceit? Had God intended a miraculous multiplicatiō, was it not as eaſie for him to in-
E creaſe the corne or meale of Samaria, as the widowes oyle? was it not as eaſie for him to give plenty of victuals without opening the windows of heavē, as to give plenty of water without wind or raine? The Almighty hates to be diſtruſted: This Peere of Iſrael ſhall rue his unbeleefe; Behold, thou ſhalt ſee it with thine eyes, but ſhalt not eate thereof: The ſight ſhall be yeelded for conviction, the fruition ſhall be denied for puniſhment: Well is that man worthy to want the benefit which he would not beleeve: Who can pitty to ſee Infidelity excluded from the bleſſings of earth, from the glory of heaven?

How ſtrange a choyce doth God make of the intelligencers of ſo happy a change: Foure Lepers ſit at the entring of the Gate, they ſee nothing but death before thē, famine within the wals, the enemy, without: The election is wofull, at laſt they reſolve upon the leſſer evill; Famine is worſe than the Syrian; In the famine there is certainty of periſhing; amongſt the Syrians, hazzard: Perhaps the enemy may have ſome pity, hunger hath none: and, were the death equally certaine, it were more eaſie to die by the ſword, than by famine: upon this deliberation they come down into the Syrian campe, to find eyther ſpeed of mercy, or diſpatch. Their hunger would not give them reſpight till morning: By twi-light are they falne upon the uttermoſt tents: Behold, there was no man; They marvell at the ſilence, and ſolitude, they looke, and liſten; the noyſe of their own feet affrighted thē; their guilty hearts ſupplied the Syrians; and expected fearefully thoſe which were as fearefully fled: How eaſily can the Almighty confound the power of the ſtrong, the policy of the wiſe? God puts a Pannick terror into the hearts of the proud Syrians; he makes them heare a noiſe of charets, and a noyſe of horſes, even the noyſe of a great hoaſt; They ſay one to other, Loe the King of Iſrael hath hired againſt us the Kings of the Hittites, and the Kings of the Egyptians, to come upon us: they ariſe therefore in a confuſed rout, and leaving all their ſubſtance behind them, flee for their lives. Not long before, Eliſhaes ſervant ſaw charets and horſes, but heard none; Now, theſe Syrians heare charets & horſes, but ſee none; That ſight comforted his heart, this ſound diſmaied theirs: The Iſraelites heard no noyſe within the wals, the Lepers heard no noiſe without the gates; Only the Syrians heard this noiſe in their camp: What a ſcorne doth God put upon theſe preſumptuous Aramites? He will not vouchſafe to uſe any ſubſtantiall ſtratagem againſt thē; nothing but an empty ſound ſhall ſcatter them, and ſend them home empty of ſubſtance, laded with ſhame, half-dead with feare; the very horſes that might have haſtened their flight, are left tyed in their Tents; their very garments are a burden; all is left behind, ſave their very bodies, and thoſe breathleſſe for ſpeed.

Doubtleſſe theſe Syrians knew well to what miſerable exigents the incloſed Iſraelites were brought by their ſiege; and now made full account to ſack, and ranſacke their Samaria; already had they divided, and ſwallowed the prey; when ſuddenly God puts them into a ridiculous confuſion; and ſends them to ſeek ſafety in their heeles; no booty is now in price with them but their life, and happy is he that can run faſteſt. Thus the Almighty laughs at the deſignes of inſolent men, and ſhuts up their counſels in ſhame.

The feare of the foure Lepers began now to give way to ſecurity; they fill their bellies, and hide their treaſures, and paſſe from one Tent to another, in a faſtidious choice of the beſt commodities; they who ere-while would have held it happineſſe enough to have been bleſſed with a cruſt, now wantonly rove for dainties, and from neceſſity leape into exceſſe.

How far ſelfe-love caries us in all our actions, even to the neglect of the publike? Not till their own bellies, & hands, and eyes were filled, did theſe Lepers thinke of imparting this newes to Iſrael: at laſt, whē themſelves are glutted, they begin to remember the hunger of their brethren, and now they find roome for remorſe, We doe not well, this day is a day of good tydings, and we hold our peace. Nature teaches us that it is an injury to ingroſſe bleſſings; and ſo to mind the private, as if we had no relation to a community; we are worthy to be ſhut out of the City-gates for Lepers, if the reſpects to the publike good doe not over-ſway us in all our deſires, in all our demeanure; and wel may we with theſe covetous Lepers feare a miſchiefe upon our ſelves, if we ſhall wilfully conceale bleſſings from others.

The conſcience of this wrong and danger ſends backe the Lepers into the City; they cal to the Porters, & ſoone tranſmit the newes to the Kings houſhold; The King of Iſrael complaines not to have his ſleep broken with ſuch intelligence; He ariſeth in the night, and not contemning good newes, though brought by Lepers, conſults with his ſervants of the buſineſſe.

We cannot be too jealous of the intentions of an enemy; Iehoram wiſely ſuſpects this flight of the Syrians to be but ſimulatory, and politick, only to draw Iſrael out of their City, for the ſpoile of both. There may be more perill in the back of an enemy, than in his face: the cruelleſt ſlaughters have been in retiring; eaſily therefore is the King perſwaded to adventure ſome few for-lorne Scouts for further aſſurance. The word of Eliſha is out of his head, out of his heart, elſe there had beene no place for this

A this doubt: Timorous hearts never thinke themſelves ſure; thoſe that have no faith, had need of much ſenſe.

Thoſe few horſes that remaine, are ſent forth for diſcovery, they find nothing but monuments of frightfulneſſe, pledges of ſecurity. Now Iſrael dares iſſue forth to the prey; There (as if the Syrians had comne thither to inrich them) they find granaries, wardrobes, treaſures, and what ever may ſerve either for uſe or oſtentation: Every Iſraelite goes away filled, laden, wearyed with the wealthy ſpoile.

As ſcarcity breeds dearth, ſo plenty cheapneſſe. To day a meaſure of fine flower is lower rated, than yeſterday of dung.

The diſtruſtfull Peere of Iſrael ſees this abundance, according to the word of the Prophet, but enjoyes it not: he ſees this plenty can come in at the gate, though the
B windowes of heaven be not open. The gate is his charge: the affamiſhed Iſraelites preſſe in upon him, and beare him downe in the throng: Extreame hunger hath no reſpect to greatneſſe. Not their rudeneſſe but his owne unbeliefe hath trampled him under feet. He that abaſed the power of God by his diſtruſt, is abaſed worthily to the heeles of the multitude: Faith exalts a man above his ſphere; Infidelity depreſſes him into the duſt, into Hell: He that beleeves not is condemned already.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE MONARCH,

CHARLES,

By the Grace of God King of Great Britaine, France and Ireland, Defender of the FAITH, &c.

My dread Soveraigne Lord And Master.

May it please your MAJESTIE:

NOw at last (thankes be to my good God) I have finished the long task of my Meditations upon the Historicall part of the Old Testament; A Worke that I foresaw must be the issue both of time, and thoughts; It presumed to intitle it selfe at first, to your Gracious name, in succession to your immortall Brothers; and now, it brings to your Royall hands, a due account of an happie dispatch.

Besides my owne publique ingagement, the incouragements of many worthy Divines, both at home, and abroad, drew me on, in this pleasing, though busie labour; and made me beleeve the service would not be of more paine, than use.

I humbly present it to your Majestie; not fearing to say, that in regard of the subiect, it is not so fit for any eyes as Princely; For what what doth it elſe but comment upon that, which God hath thought good to ſay of Kings; what they have done, what they ſhould have done; how they ſped in good, in evill? Certainely there can be none ſuch miror of Princes under heaven, as this, which God hath made for the faces of his Deputies of on earth. Neither can the eyes of Soveraigne Greatneſſe be better taken up than with this ſacred reflection. If my defects have not beene notorious, the matter ſhall enough commend the worke; which together with the unworthy Author, humbly caſts it ſelfe at the feet of your Majeſty, with the beſt vowes of fidelity and obſervance, from him, that prides himſelfe in nothing more, than in the ſtyle of A B

Your Majeſties

moſt faithfully

devoted Servant,

Jos: Hall.

The Shunamite ſuing to Jehoram; Eliſha conferring with Hazael.

HOw royally hath Eliſha paid the Shunamite for his lodging! To him already ſhe owes the life of her ſonne, both given, and reſtored; and now againe (after ſo many yeares, as might well have worne out the memory of ſo ſmall a courteſie) her ſelfe, her ſonne, her family owe their lives to ſo thankfull a gueſt. That table, and bed, and ſtoole, and candleſticke was well beſtowed: That candleſticke repaid her the light of her future life and condition, that table the meanes of maintenance, that ſtoole a ſeat of ſafe abode, that bed a quiet reſt from the common calamities of her nation: He is a niggard to himſelfe, that ſcants his beneficence to a Prophet, whoſe very cold water ſhall not goe unrewarded. Elijah preſerved the Sareptan from famine; Eliſha the Shunamite; he, by proviſion of oyle and meale; this, by premonition: Ariſe, and goe, thou and thine houſhold, and ſojourne whereſoever thou canſt ſojourne. The Sareptan was poore, and driven to extreames, therefore the Prophet provides for her, from hand to mouth: The Shunamite was wealthy, and therefore the Prophet ſends her to provide for her ſelfe: The ſame goodneſſe that relieves our neceſſitie, leaves our competency to the hand of our owne counſell; in the one, hee will make uſe of his owne power; in the other, of our providence.

The very Prophet adviſes this holy Client to leave the bounds of the Church, and to ſeek life, where ſhe ſhould not find Religion: Extremity is for the time a juſt diſpenſation with ſome common rules of our outward demeanure and motions, even from better to worſe. All Iſrael and Iudah ſhall be affamiſhed; The body can be preſerved no where, but where the ſoule ſhall want; Sometimes the conveniences of the ſoule muſt yeeld to bodily neceſſities. Wantonneſſe and curioſity can finde no advantage from that which is done out of the power of need.

It is a long famine that ſhall afflict Iſrael; He upon whom the ſpirit of Elijah was doubled, doubled the judgement inflicted by his Maſter; Three yeares and an halfe did Iſrael gaſpe under the drought of Elijah; ſeven yeares dearth ſhall it ſuffer under Eliſha: The trials of God are many times not more grievous for their ſharpeneſſe, than for their continuance.

This ſcarcity ſhall not come alone; God ſhall call for it: what ever be the ſecond cauſe, he is the firſt. The executioners of the Almighty (ſuch are his judgements) ſtand ready waiting upon his juſt Throne; and doe no ſooner receive the watchword, than they fly upon the world, and plague it for ſinne; Onely the cry of our ſinnes moves God to call for vengeance: And if God once call, it muſt come; How oft, how earneſtly are we called to repentance, and ſtirre not? The meſſengers of Gods wrath flie forth at the leaſt becke; and fulfill the will of his revenge upon thoſe, whoſe obedience would not fulfill the will of his command.

After ſo many proofes of fidelity the Shunamite cannot diſtruſt the Prophet; not ſtaying therefore to be convicted by the event, ſhee removes her family into the Land of the Philiſtins: No nation was more oppoſite to Iſrael, none more worthily odious; yet, there doth the Shunamite ſeeke and finde ſhelter; Even the ſhade of thoſe trees that are unwholſome, may keepe us from a ſtorme; Every where will God finde roome for his owne. The fields of Philiſtins flouriſh, whiles the ſoyle of Iſrael yeelds nothing but weeds and barrenneſſe: Not that Iſrael was more ſinfull, but that the ſinne of Iſrael is more intolerable. The offers of grace are ſo many aggravations of wickedneſſe: In equall offences thoſe doe juſtly ſmart more, who are more obliged. No peſtilence is ſo contagious as that which hath taken the pureſt aire.

Theſe Philiſtine neighbours would never have endured themſelves to be peſtered with forrainers, eſpecially Iſraelites, whom they hated (beſides Religion) for their uſurpation: neither were they in all likelihood preſſed with multitude: The reſt of Iſrael were led on with hopes; preſuming upon the amends of the next harveſt, til their want grew deſperate, and irremediable; only the forwarned Shunamite prevents the miſchiefe; now ſhe findes what it is to have a Prophet her friend: Happy are thoſe ſoules that upon all occaſions conſult with Gods Seers; they ſhall be freed from the plagues, wherein the ſecure blindneſſe of others is heedleſly overtaken.

Seven yeares had this Shunamite ſojourned in Paleſtine, now ſhee returnes to her owne; and is excluded: She that found harbour among Philiſtines, findes oppreſſion and violence among Iſraelites: Thoſe of her kindred, taking advantage of her abſence, had ſhared her poſſeſſions. How oft doth it fall out that the worſt enemies of a man are thoſe of his owne houſe? All went by contraries with this Shunamite; In the famine ſhe had enough, in the common plenty ſhe was ſcanted; Philiſtines were kinde unto her, Iſraelites cruell: Both our feares, and our hopes do not ſeldome diſappoint us; It is ſafe truſting to that ſtay which can never faile us, who can eaſily provide us both of friendſhip in Paleſtine, and of juſtice in Iſrael. We may not judge of the Religion by particular actions; A very Philiſtine may be mercifull, when an Iſraelite is unjuſt; The perſon may be faulty when the profeſſion is holy.

It was not long ſince the Prophet made that friendly offer to the Shunamite, out of the deſire of a thankfull requitall; What is to bee done for thee? wouldeſt thou bee ſpoken for to the King, or to the Captaine of the Hoaſt? and ſhe anſwered; I dwell among my brethren. Little did ſhe then thinke of this injurious meaſure; elſe ſhe might have ſaid; I dwell among mine enemies, I dwell among robbers. It is like they were then friendly, who were now cruell, and oppreſſive; There is no truſt to bee repoſed in fleſh and blood: How ſhould their favours be conſtant, who are in their nature, and diſpoſition, variable? It is the ſureſt way to relie on him, who is ever like himſelfe; the meaſure of whoſe love is eternity.

Whither ſhould the Shunamite goe to complaine of her wrong, but to the Court? There is no other refuge of the oppreſſed, but publike authority: All Juſtice is derived from Soveraignty: Kings are not called Gods for nothing; They doe both ſentence and execute for the Almighty.

Doubtleſſe, now the poore Shunamite, thought of the courteous proffer of Eliſha; and miſſing a friend at the Court, is glad to be the preſenter of her owne petition.

How happily doth God contrive all events for the good of his! This ſuppliant ſhall fall upon that inſtant for her ſuit, when the King ſhall be talking with Gehezi; when Gehezi ſhall be talking of her to the King; the words of Gehezi, the thoughts of the King, the deſires of the Shunamite ſhall be all drawne together by the wiſe providence of God into the center of one moment, that his oppreſſed ſervant might receive a ſpeedie juſtice. Oh the infinite wiſdome, power, mercy of our God, that inſenſibly

A sensibly orders all our wayes, as to his owne holy purposes, so to our best advantage.

What doth Iehoram the King talking with Gehezi the Leper? That very presence was an eyesore.

But if the cohabitation with the infectious were forbidden, yet not the conference. Certainely, I begin to thinke of some goodnesse in both these: Had there not beene some goodnesse in Iehoram, he had not taken pleasure to heare, even from a leprous mouth, the miraculous acts and praises of Gods Prophet; Had there not been some goodnesse in Gehezi, he had not after so fearefull an infliction of judgement, thus ingenuously recounted the praises of his severe Master; He that told that deare-bought lie to the Prophet, tells now all truths of the Prophet, to the King: Perhaps his leprosie had made him cleane; If so: Happy was it for him that his forehead was B white with the disease, if his soule became hereupon white with repentance. But we may well know that the desire, or report of historicall Truths, doth not alwayes argue grace. Still Iehoram, after the inquiry of the Prophets miracles, continues his Idolatry. He that was curious to hearken after the wonders of Elisha, is not carefull to follow his doctrine; Therefore are Gehezi and the Shunamite met before him, that he may be convicted, who will not be reformed: Why was it else that the presence of the persons should thus inexpectedly make good the relation, if God had not meant the inexcusablenes of Iehoram, whiles he must needs say within himself; Thus potent is the Prophet of that God, whom I obey not; Were not Elishaes the true God, how could he worke such wonders? And if he be the true God, why is he not mine? But what? Shall I change Ahabs God for Iehosaphats? No; I cannot denie the C miracles, I will not admit of the Author: Let Elisha be powerfull, I will be constant. O wretched Iehoram; how much better had it been for thee never to have seene the face of Gehezi, and the sonne of the Shunamite, than to goe away unmoved with the vengeance of leprosie in the one, with the mercifull resuscitation of the other? Therefore is thy judgement fearefully aggravated, because thou wouldst not yeeld to what thou couldst not oppose. Had not Ahabs obdurateness been propagated to his son, so powerfull demonstrations of divine power could not have been uneffectuall. Wicked hearts are so much worse by how much God is better; This anvile is the harder by being continually beaten upon, whether with judgements or mercy.

Yet this good use will God have made of this report, and this presence, that the D poore Shunamite shall have justice; That sonne, whose life was restored, shall have his inheritance revived; His estate shall fare the better for Elishaes miracles: How much more will our mercifull God second his owne blessings, when the favours of unjust men are therefore drawne to us, because we have beene the subjects of divine beneficence.

It was a large, and full award, that this occurrence drew from the King; Restore all that was hers, and all the fruits of the field, since the day that she left the land, even until now. Not the present possession onely is given her, but the arerages.

Nothing hinders, but that outward justice may stand with grosse Idolatry. The Widdow may thanke Elisha for this; His miracle wrought still, and puts this new life in her dead estate; his absence did that for the preservation of life, which his E presence did for the restoring it from death. Shee that was so ready to expostulate with the man of God, upon the losse of her son, might perhaps have been as ready to impute the losse of her estate to his advice; Now, that for his sake shee is enriched with her owne, how doth she blesse God for so happy a guest? When we have forgotten our owne good turnes, God remembers and crownes them: Let us doe good to all whiles we have time, but especially to the houshold of faith.

Could Israel have been sensible of their owne condition, it was no small unhappinesse to lose the presence of Elisha: Whether, for the Idolatries, or for the famine of Israel, the Prophet is gone into Syria; No doubt Naaman welcomd him thither; and now would force upon him thankes for his cure, which the man of God would not receive at home.

How famous is he now growne that was taken from the Teame? His name is not confined to his owne Nation; forrain countries take notice of it; and Kings are glad to liſten after him, and woo him with preſents: Benhadad the King of Syria, whoſe counſells he had detected, rejoyceth to heare of his preſence; and now, as having forgotten that he had ſent a whole Hoſt, to beſiege the Prophet in Dothan, ſends an honourable meſſenger to him, laden with the burden of forty Camels, to conſult with this Oracle, concerning his ſickneſſe, and recovery.

This Syrian belike in his diſtreſſe dares not truſt to his owne gods; but having had good proofe of the power of the God of Iſrael, both in Naamans cure, and in the miraculous defeats of his greateſt forces, is glad to ſend to that ſervant of God, whom he had perſecuted. Wicked men are not the ſame in health and in ſickneſſe: their affliction is worthy of the thankes, if they be well minded; not themſelves.

Doubtleſſe the errand of Benhadad was not only to inquire of the iſſue of his diſeaſe, but to require the Prayers of the Prophet for a good iſſue: Even the worſt man doth ſo love himſelfe, that he can be content to make a beneficiall uſe of thoſe inſtruments, whoſe goodneſſe he hateth.

Hazael the chiefe Peere of Syria is deſigned to this meſſage; The wealth of his preſent ſtrives with the humility of his cariage, and ſpeech: Thy ſon Benhadad King of Syria hath ſent me to thee, ſaying, Shall I recover of this diſeaſe? Not long ſince, Iehoram King of Iſrael had ſaid to Eliſha, My father, ſhall I ſmite them; and now Benhadad King of Syria, ſayes, My father, ſhall I recover: Loe how this poore Meholathite hath Kings to his ſonnes: How great is the honour of Gods Prophets with Pagans, with Princes? Who can be but confounded to ſee Evangelicall Prophets deſpiſed by the meaneſt Chriſtians!

It is more than a ſingle anſwer that the Prophet returnes to this meſſage: One anſwer he gives to Benhadad, that ſent it; another he gives to Hazael, that brings it: That to Benhadad, is, Thou maiſt ſurely recover; That to Hazael, The Lord hath ſhewed me that he ſhall ſurely die: What ſhall we ſay then? Is there a lye, or an equivocation in the holy mouth of the Prophet? God forbid: It is one thing what ſhall be the nature and iſſue of the diſeaſe; Another thing what may outwardly befall the perſon of Benhadad: The queſtion is moved of the former; whereto the anſwer is direct; The diſeaſe is not mortall; But withall an intimation is given to the bearer, of an event beyond the reach of his demand; which he may know, but either needs not, or may not returne: The Lord hath ſhewed me that he ſhall ſurely die; by another meanes, though not by the diſeaſe.

The Seer of God deſcries more in Hazael, than he could ſee in himſelfe; he fixes his eyes therefore ſtedfaſtly in the Syrians face, as one that in thoſe lines read the bloody ſtory of his life.

Hazael bluſhes, Eliſha weepes, The intention of thoſe eyes did not ſo much amaze Hazael, as the teares; As yet he was not guilty to himſelfe of any wrong that might ſtraine out this juyce of ſorrow: Why weepeth my Lord?

The Prophet feares not to foretell Hazael all the villanies which he ſhould once doe to Iſrael; How he ſhould fire their forts, and kill their yong men, and rip the mothers, and daſh their children. I marvell not now at the teares of thoſe eyes which foreſaw this miſerable vaſtation of the inheritance of God; The very mention whereof is abhorred of the future author: What is thy ſervant a dog, that I ſhould do this great thing? They are ſavage cruelties whereof thou ſpeakeſt; It were more fit for me to weepe that thou ſhouldſt repute me ſo brutiſh; I ſhould no leſſe condemne my ſelfe for a beaſt, if I could ſuſpect my owne degeneration ſo farre. Wicked men are caried into thoſe heights of impietie, which they could not in their good mood have poſſibly beleeved; Nature is ſubject to favourable opinions of it ſelfe; & will rather miſtruſt a Prophet of God, than her own good diſpoſition: How many from honeſt beginnings, have riſen to incredible licentiouſneſſe, whoſe lives are now ſuch, that it were as hard for a man to beleeve they had ever been good, as to have perſwaded them once they ſhould prove ſo deſperately ill.

To give ſome overture unto Hazael of the opportunity of this enſuing miſchiefe; the Prophet foretells him from God, that he ſhall be the King of Syria.

He

He that ſhewes the event, doth not appoint the meanes; Farre was it from the ſpirit of Gods Prophet to ſet, or encourage a treaſon: whiles he ſaid therefore, Thou ſhalt be King of Syria; he ſaid not, Goe home, and kill thy Maſter: The wicked ambition of Hazael drawes this damnable concluſion out of holy premiſes; and now having fed the hopes of his Soveraigne with the expectation of recovery: the next day he ſmothers his Maſter. The impotent deſire of rule brookes no delay: Had not Hazeel been graceleſly cruell, after he had received this prediction of the Seer, hee ſhould have patiently awaited for the crowne of Syria, till lawfull meanes had ſet it upon his head; now, he will by a cloſe execution make way to the throne; A wet cloth hath ſtopt the mouth of his ſicke Soveraigne; No noyſe is heard, the carkaſſe is faire; who can complaine of any thing but the diſeaſe?

O Hazael, thou ſhalt not thus eaſily ſtop the mouth of thine owne conſcience; that ſhall call thee Traytor, even in thy chaire of State; and ſhall checke all thy royall triumphes, with, Thou haſt founded thy throne in blood. I am deceived, if this wet cloth ſhall not wipe thy lips in thy jollieſt feaſts, and make thy beſt morſells unſavory: Soveraignty is painfull upon the faireſt termes; but upon treachery, and murder, tormenting: Wofull is the caſe of that man whoſe publike cares are aggravated with private guiltineſſe; and happy is he, that can enjoy a little with the peace of an honeſt heart.

Jehu with Jehoram and Jezebel.

YEt Hazael began his crueltie with loſſe: Ramoth Gilead is won from him; Iehoram the ſon hath recovered that, which Ahab his father attempted in vaine; That City was deare-bought of Iſrael; it coſt the life of Ahab, the blood of Iehoram; Thoſe wounds were healed with victory; The King tends his health at Iezreel, whiles the Captaines were enjoying, and ſeconding their ſucceſſe at Ramoth. 2 Kings 9.

Old Eliſha hath neither cottage nor foot of land, yet ſitting iu an obſcure corner he gives order for Kingdomes; Not by way of authoritie (this uſurpation had been no leſſe proud, than unjuſt) but by way of meſſage, from the God of kings; Even a meane Herald may goe on a great errand: The Prophets of the Goſpell have nothing to doe but with ſpirituall Kingdomes; To beate downe the Kingdomes of ſin and Satan, to tranſlate ſoules to the Kingdome of heaven.

Hee that renued the life of the Shunamites ſonne, muſt ſtoope to age; That block lyes in his way to Iehu; The aged Prophet imployes a ſpeedier meſſenger, who muſt alſo gird up his loynes, for haſte: No common pace will ſerve us when we go on Gods meſſage; The very loſſe of minutes may be unrecoverable. This great Seer of God well ſaw a preſent concurrence of all opportunities: The Captaines of the Hoſt were then readily combined for this exploit: The Armie was on foot; Iehoram abſent; a ſmall delay might have troubled the work; the diſperſion of the Captaines, and Hoſt, or the preſence of the King, might either have defeated, or ſlacked the diſpatch: He is prodigall of his ſucceſſe, that is ſlow in his execution.

The directions of Eliſha to the yong Prophet, are full, and punctuall, whither to go; what to carrie; what to do, where to do it; what to ſay, what ſpeed to make, in his act, in his returne: In the buſineſſes of God, it matters not how little is left to our diſcretion; There is no important buſineſſe of the Almighty, wherein his precepts are not ſtrict, and expreſſe; Look how much more ſpecialty there is in the charge of God, ſo much more danger is in the violation.

The young Prophet is curiouſly obedient; in his haſte; in his obſervation and carriage: and finding Iehu, according to Eliſhaes prediction, ſet amongſt the Captaines of the Hoſt, he ſingles him forth, by a reverent compellation; I have an errand to thee, O Captaine; Might not the Prophet had ſtayed till the table had riſen, and then have followed Iehu to his lodging? Surely, the wisdome of God hath purposely pitcht upon this season, that the publike view of a sacred messenger, and the hastie evocation of so noted a person, to such a secrecie, might prepare the hearts of those Commanders of Israel, to the expectation of some great designe. A

The inmost roome is but close enough for this act; Ere many houres, all Israel shall know that, which yet may not be trusted with one eye; The goodnesse of God makes wise provision for the safety of his messengers, and whiles he imployes their service, prevents their dangers.

But how is it that of all the Kings of the Ten tribes, none was ever anointed but Iehu? Is it for that the God, who would not countenance the erection of that usurped throne, would countenance the alteration? Or is it, that by this visible testimony of divine ordination, the courage of the Israelitish Captaines might be raised up to second the high and bold attempt of him, whom they saw destined from heaven to rule? B

Together with the oyle of this unction, here was a charge of revenge; A revenge of the blood of the Prophets, upon Iezebel; of wickednesse and Idolatry, upon Ahab: neither was the extirpation of this lewd family fore-prophesied onely to Iehu, but injoyned.

Elijah foretold, and the world expected some feareful account of the abominable crueltie, & impietie of that accursed house; Now it is called for, when it seemed forgotten: Ahab shall have no posteritie, Iezebel shall have no tombe, but the dogges. This wofull doome is committed to Iehues execution.

Oh the sure, though patient, justice of the Almighty: not onely Ahab and Iezebel had beene bloody, and idolatrous, but Israel was drawne into the partnership of their crimes; All these shall share in the judgement: Elijahs complaint in the cave now receives this late answer, Hazael shall plague Israel; Iehu shall plague the house of Ahab and Iezebel; Elishaes servant thus seconds Elishaes Master: When wickednes is ripe in the field, God will not let it sheed to grow againe, but cuts it up by a just, and seasonable vengeance: Ahabs drouping under the threat hath put off the judgement from his owne dayes; now it comes, and sweepes away his wife, his issue; and falls heavie upon his subjects. Please your selves, O ye vaine sinners, in the slow pace of vengeance; it will be neither lesse certaine, nor more easie for the delay; rather it were to pay for that leisure in the extremity. C

The Prophet hath done his errand, and is gone. Iehu returnes to his fellowes, with his head not more wet with oyle, than busied with thoughts: no doubt, his face bewrayed some inward tumults, and distractions of imagination; neither seemed hee to returne the same he went out. They aske therefore, Is all well? Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? The Prophets of God were to these idolatrous Israelites, like comets; who were never seen without the portendment of a mischiefe: When the priests of their Baal were quietly sacrificing, all was well; but now when a Prophet of God comes in sight, their guiltinesse askes, Is all well? All would bee well but for their sins; they feare not these, they feare their reprover. D

Israel was come to a good passe, when the Prophets of God went with them for mad men: Oh ye Baalitish Ruffians, whither hath your impiety and profaneneſſe caried you, that yee should thus blaspheme the servants of the living God? Ye that runne on madding after vaine Idols, taxe the sober guides of true worship, for madnesse. Thus it becomes the godlesse enemies of truth, the heralds of our patience, to mis-call our innocence, to revile our most holy profession: What wonder is it that Gods messengers are mad men unto those, to whom the wisdome of God is foolishnesse? E

The message was not delivered to Iehu for a concealement, but for publication: Silence could not effect the word that was told him; common notice must; Yee know the man, and his communication: The habit showes you the man; the calling showes you his errand: Even Prophets were distinguished by their cloathes; Their mantle was not the common weare; why should not this sacred vocation bee knowne by a peculiar attyre? These Captaines had not called him a mad-man, if

A if they had not knowne him a Prophet: By the man therefore they might gueſſe at his meſſage; Prophets doe not uſe to appeare, but upon ſerious errands; whether of reproofe, or of prediction.

Nice civilities of denials were not then known to the world; They ſaid, It is falſe, tell us now: Amongſt theſe Captaines no combat, no unkindneſſe followes upon a word ſo rudely familiar.

Iehu needs not tell them that the man was a Prophet; he tels them the prophecie of the man; what he had ſaid, what he had done.

Their eyes had no ſooner ſeene the oyle; their eares had no ſooner heard, Thus ſaith the Lord, I have anointed thee King over Iſrael, than they riſe from their ſeates, as rapt with a tempeſt, and are hurled into armes; So doe they haſte to pro-
B claime Iehu, that they ſcarce ſtay to ſnatch up their garments, which they had perhaps left behinde them for ſpeed, had they not meant with theſe rich abiliments to garniſh a ſtate for their new Soveraigne; To whom having now erected an extemporall Throne, they doe by the ſound of Trumpets give the ſtile of Royaltie, Iehu is King.

So much credit hath that mad fellow with theſe gallants of Iſrael, that upon his word they will preſently adventure their lives, and change the Crowne. God gives a ſecret authority to his deſpiſed ſervants; ſo as they which hate their perſon, yet reverence their truth: Even very ſcorners cannot but beleeve them; If when the Prophets of the Goſpell tell us of a ſpirituall Kingdome, they be diſtruſted of thoſe which profeſſe to obſerve them, how ſhamefull is the diſproportion? how juſt ſhall
C their judgement be?

Yet I cannot ſay whether meere obedience to the Prophet, or perſonall diſlikes of Iehoram, or partiall reſpects to Iehu, drew the Captaines of Iſrael; The will of God may be done thankeleſly, when fulfilling the ſubſtance, we faile of the intention, and erre in circumſtance.

Onely Ramoth is conſcious of this ſudden Inauguration; This new princedome yet reaches no further than the ſound of the trumpet: Iehu is no leſſe ſubtile, than valiant; he knew that the notice of this inexpected change might worke a buſie, and dangerous reſiſtance; he therefore gives order that no meſſenger of the newes may prevent his perſonall execution, that ſo he might ſurpriſe Iehoram in his palace of Iezreel, whether tending his late wounds, or ſecurely feaſting his friends, and dreaming of nothing leſſe than danger; and might be ſeene, and felt at once. Secrecie is
D the ſafeſt gard of any deſigne; diſcloſed projects are either fruſtrated, or made needleſly difficult.

Neither is Iehu more cloſe, than ſwift; That very trumpet with the ſame winde ſounds his march; from the top of the ſtaires, he ſteps downe into his charet. That man meanes to ſpeed, who can be at once reſerved in his counſels, and reſolute and quicke in his performances.

Who could but pity the unhappy and unſeaſonable viſitation of the grand-child of Iehoſaphat, were it not that he was degenerate into the family of Ahab? Ahaziah King of Judah is comne to viſit Iehoram King of Iſrael, the knowledge of his late received wounds hath drawne thither this kinde il-matched allie: He who was part-
E ner of the war, cannot but be a viſitor of the wounds.

The two Kings are in the height of their complement, and entertainements, when the watch-man of the Tower of Iezreel eſpies a troupe, afarre off. For ought was knowne, there was nothing but peace in all the Land of Iſrael; and Judah was now ſo combined with it, that both their Kings were feaſting under one roofe; yet, in the midſt of this ſuppoſed ſafety, the watch tower is not unfurniſhed with heedy eyes: No ſecurity of peace can free wiſe governors from a carefull ſuſpition of what may come, and a providence againſt the worſt. Even whiles we know of no enemies, the watch tower of due intelligence may not be emptie.

In vaine are dangers fore ſeene, if they bee not premoniſhed; It is all one to have a blinde and a mute watch-man; This ſpeakes what hee ſees, I ſee a companie.

Doubtleſſe

Doubtleſſe Iehorams head was now full of thoughts: neither knew he what conſtruction to put upon this approching troupe; Perhaps, the Syrians (he thinkes) may have recovered Ramoth; and chaſed the garriſon of Iſrael; neither can hee imagine whether theſe ſhould be hoſtile victors, or vanquiſhed ſubjects, or conſpiring rebels. Every way this rout was dreadfull. Oh Iehoram, thou beginſt thy feares too late; Hadſt thou been afraid to provoke the God of Iſrael, thine innocencie had yeelded no roome to theſe terrors.

An horſeman is diſpatcht to diſcover the meaning of this deſcried concourſe: He meets them, and inquires of peace; but receives a ſhort anſwer. What haſt thou to doe with peace? turne thee behind me? A ſecond is addreſſed; with the ſame ſucceſſe: Both attend the traine of Iehu inſtead of returning; Indeed it is not for private perſons to hope to rectifie the publike affaires, when they are growne to an height of diſorder, and from thence to a ripeneſſe of miſ-cariage: Sooner may a well-meaning man hurt himſelfe, than redreſſe the common danger.

Theſe meſſengers were now within the mercy of a multitude, had they but endeavoured to retire, they had periſhed as wilfully, as vainely: Whoſoever will bee ſtriving againſt the torrent of a juſt judgement, muſt needes bee caried downe in the ſtreame: Sometimes there is as much wiſdome in yeelding, as courage in reſiſtance.

Had this troupe been far off, the watch-man could not have deſcried the arrivall of the meſſengers, their turning behinde, the manner of the march; Iehu was a noted Captaine, his cariage and motion was obſerved more full of fire, than his fellowes; The driving is like Iehues, for he driveth furiouſly: God makes choice of fit inſtruments, as of mercy, ſo of revenge; Theſe ſpirits were needfull for ſo tragicall a ſcene, as was now preparing in Iſrael.

Iehoram and Ahaziah, as netled with this forced patience of expectation, can no longer keep their ſeates; but will needs haſten their charets; and fetch that coſtly ſatisfaction, which would not be ſent, but given.

They are infatuated, which ſhall periſh: otherwiſe Iehoram had beene warned enough by the forceable retention of his meſſengers, to expect none but an enemie. A friend, or a ſubject could not have been unwilling to be known, to be lookt for; Now, forgetting his wounds, he will goe to fetch death.

Yet when he ſees Iehu, whom he left a ſubject, hopes ſtrive with his doubts, Is it peace, Iehu? what may be the reaſon of this ſudden journey? Is the army foyled by the Syrians? Is Ramoth recovered? or hath the flight of the enemy left thee no further worke? or is ſome other ill newes guilty of thy haſte? What meanes this unwiſhed preſence, and returne?

There needs no ſtay for an anſwer; the very face of Iehu, and thoſe ſparkling eyes of his ſpake fury, and death to Iehoram; which yet his tongue angerly ſeconds: What peace, ſo long as the whoredomes of thy mother Iezebel, and her witchcrafts are ſo many?

Wicked Tyrant, what ſpeakeſt thou of peace with men, when thou haſt thus long waged war with the Almighty? That curſed mother of thine hath nurſed thee with blood, and trained thee up in abominable Idolatries.

Thou art not more hers, than her ſinne is thine; thou art polluted with her ſpirituall whoredomes, and inchanted with her helliſh witchcrafts: Now that juſt God whom thou, and thy parents have ſo hainouſly deſpited, ſends thee by mee this laſt meſſage of his vengeance; which whiles hee ſpake, his hand is drawing up that deadly arrow, which ſhall cure the former wounds with a worſe.

Too late now doth wretched Iehoram turne his charet, and flee, and crie Treaſon, O Ahaziah; There was treaſon before, O Iehoram; thy treaſon againſt the Majeſty of God, is now revenged by the treaſon of Iehu againſt thee.

That fatall ſhaft, notwithſtanding the ſwift pace of both the charets, is directed to the heart of Iehoram; there is no erring of thoſe feathers which are guided by the hand of deſtinie.

How

A How juſt are the judgements of God ! It was in the field of Naboth, wherein Iehoram met with Iehu; That very ground called to him for blood; And now this new avenger remembers that prophecie which hee heard from the mouth of Eliiah, in that very place, following the heeles of Ahab; and is careſull to performe it. Little did Iehu thinke, when hee heard that meſſage of Eliiah, that his hands ſhould act it; now, as zealous of accompliſhing the word of a Prophet, hee gives charge to Bidkar his Captaine, that the bleeding carkaſſe of Iehoram ſhould bee caſt upon that very plat of Naboth: Oh Naboths blood well paid for ! Ahabs blood is licked by dogges, in the very place where thoſe dogges lickt Naboths; Iehorams blood ſhall manure that ground, which was wrung from Naboth; and Iezebel ſhall adde to this compoſt. Oh garden of hearbes dearely bought, royally
B dunged!

What a reſemblance there is betwixt the death of the father, and the ſon; Ahab and Iehoram? Both are ſlaine in their charet; Both with an arrow; Both repay their blood to Naboth; and how perfit is this retaliation ? Not onely Naboth miſcaried in that cruell injuſtice, but his ſons alſo; elſe the inheritance of the vineyard had deſcended to his heires, notwithſtanding his pretended offence; and now not onely Ahab forfeits his blood to this field but his ſon Iehoram alſo: Face doth not more anſwer to face, than puniſhment to ſin.

It was time for Ahaziah King of Iuda, to flee : Nay it had beene time long before to have fled from the ſinnes, yea from the houſe of Ahab; That brand is fearefull which God ſets upon him; Hee did evill in the ſight of the Lord as did the
C houſe of Ahab, for hee was the ſonne in law of the houſe of Ahab; Affinity is too often guilty of corruption; The ſonne of good Iehoſhaphat is loſt in Ahabs daughter. 2 Kings 27.

Now he payes for his kinde alliance; accompanying the ſon of Ahab in his death, whom he conſorted with, in his Idolatry : Yong Ahaziah was ſcarce warme in his throne, when the miſ-matched blood of Athaliah is required from him; Nothing is more dangerous than to be imped in a wicked family; this relation too often drawes in a ſhare both of ſin and puniſhment.

Who would not have lookt that Iezebel hearing of this bloody end of her ſon, and purſuit of her allie; and the fearefull proceedings of this proſperous conſpiracie, ſhould have put her ſelfe into ſackcloth and aſhes; & now finding no meanes either
D of defence, or eſcape, ſhould have caſt her ſelfe into ſuch a poſture of humiliation, as might have moved the compaſſion of Iehu; Her proud heart could not ſuddenly learne to ſtoope : rather ſhee recollects her high ſpirits; and inſtead of humbling her ſoule by repentance, and addreſſing her ſelfe for an imminent death; ſhe prankes up her old carkaſſe, and paints her wrinkled face, and as one that vainly hopes to daunt the courage of an uſurper, by the ſudden beames of Majeſtie; ſhee lookes out, and thinkes to fright him with the challenge of a traitor, whoſe either mercy, or juſtice could not bee avoided: Extremitie findes us ſuch as our peace leaves us; Our laſt thoughts are ſpent upon that wee care moſt for; thoſe that have regarded their face more than their ſoule, in their latter end are more taken up with deſire of ſeeming faire, than being happy : It is no marvell if an heart obdured with the cu-E ſtome of ſinne ſhut up graceleſly. Counterfet beautie agrees well with inward uncleanneſſe.

Iehues reſolution was too ſtrongly ſetled to be remoued with a painted face, or an opprobrious tongue; Hee lookes up to the window, and ſayes, Who is on my ſide, Who ? There want not thoſe every where, which will be ready to obſerve prevailing greatneſſe : Two or three Eunuchs looke out; hee bids them, Throw her downe : They inſtantly lay hold on their lately-adored Miſtris, and notwithſtanding all her ſhriekes and prayers, caſt her downe headlong into the ſtreet.

What heed is to be taken of the deepe profeſſed ſervices of hollow-hearted followers; All this while they have humbly with ſmiles, and officious devotions fawned upon their great Queene; now upon the call of a proſperous enemie they forger

get their reſpects, her royaltie; and caſt her downe, as willing executioners, into the jawes of a fearefull death: It is hard for greatneſſe to know them whom it may truſt: Perhaps the faireſt ſemblance is from the falſeſt heart; It was a juſt plague of God upon wicked Iezebel, that ſhee was inwardly hated of her owne; Hee whoſe ſervants ſhee perſecuted, raiſed up enemies to her from her owne elbow.

Thus muſt pride fall; Inſolent, idolatrous, cruell Iezebel beſprinkles the walls, and pavement with her blood; and now thoſe braines that deviſed miſchiefe againſt the ſervants of God, are ſtrawed upon the ſtones; and ſhe that inſulted upon the Prophets, is trampled upon by the horſes heeles: The wicked is kept for the day of deſtruction, and ſhall be brought forth to the day of wrath. Iob. 21.

Death puts an end commonly to the higheſt diſpleaſure. Hee that was ſevere in the execution of the living, is mercifull in the ſepulture of the dead; Goe ſee now this curſed woman and burie her, for ſhe is a Kings daughter; Shee that upbraided Iehu with the name of Zimri, ſhall bee interred by Iehu as Omries daughter in law, as a Sydonian Princeſſe; Somewhat muſt be yeelded to humanitie; ſomewhat to State.

The dogs have prevented Iehu in this purpoſe, and have given her a living tombe more ignoble, than the worſt of the earth; Onely the ſcull, hands, and feet of that vaniſhed carkaſſe yet remaine; The ſcull which was the roofe of all her wicked devices, the hands and feete which were the executioners; theſe ſhall remaine as the monuments of thoſe ſhamefull exequies: that future times ſeeing theſe fragments of a body, might ſay, the dogges were worthy of the reſt; Thus Iezebel is turned to dung, and dogges meat; Eliah is verified, Naboth is revenged! Iezreel is purged, Iehu is zealous, and in all, God is juſt.

Jehu killing the ſons of Ahab, and the Prieſts of Baal.

2 Kings 10.

THere were two prime Cities of the Ten Tribes, which were the ſet Courts of the Kingdome of Iſrael; Samaria and Iezreel; The chiefe palace of the Kingdome was Iezreel; the mother City of the Kingdome, was Samaria; Iehu is poſſeſſed of the one, without any ſword drawne againſt him Iezreel willingly changes the maſter, yeelding it ſelfe to the victor of two Kings, to the avenger of Iezebel; the next care is Samaria; Either pollicie, or force ſhall fetch in that head of the Tribes.

The plentifull iſſue of Princes is no ſmall aſſurance to the people; Ahab had ſonnes enough to furniſh the Thrones of all the neighbour nations, to maintaine the hopes of ſucceſſion, to all times; How ſecure did he thinke the perpetuation of his poſterity, when hee ſaw ſeventy ſonnes from his owne loynes? Neither was this Royall iſſue truſted, either to weake walls, or to one roofe; but to the ſtrong bulwarkes of Samaria, and therein to the ſeverall guards of the chiefe Peeres; It was the wiſe care of their parents not to have them obnoxious to the danger of a common miſ-cariage, or, of thoſe emulations which wait upon the cloyedneſſe of an undivided converſation; but to order their ſeparation ſo, as one may reſcue others from the perill of aſſault, as one may reſpect other out of a familiar ſtrangeneſſe: Had Ahab and Iezebel been as wiſe for their ſoules, as they were for their ſeed, both had proſpered.

Iehu is yet but in his firſt act; If all the ſonnes of Ahab bleed not, the propheſie is unanſwered; There ſhall bee no need of his ſword, his penne ſhall worke all this ſlaughter. Hee writes a challenge to Samaria, and therein to the guardians of the ſonnes of Ahab; daring them, out of the confidence in their defenced Citie, in their charets, and horſes, in their aſſociats and armes, to ſet up the beſt of their maſters masters sonnes, on his fathers throne, and to fight for his succession.

All the Governours of Ahabs children conspire in one common feare; no doubt there wanted not in that numerous brood of Kings, some great spirits that, if at least they attained to the notice of this designe, longed for a revenge, and suggested counsels of resolution to their cowardly guardians; Shall an audacious usurper runne thus away with the Crowne of Israel? Shall the blood of Iezebel bee thus traitrously spilt, thus wilfully forgotten? O Israelites, can you bee so base, as to bee ruled by my fathers servant? Where are the merits of Ahab, and Iehoram? What is become of the loyall courage of Israel? Doubtlesse, yee shall not want able Seconds to your valour; Doe yee thinke the royall and potent alliances of our mother Iezebel; and the remaining heires of Iudah, can draw backe their hands from your aide? Will they endure to swallow so cruell an indignitie? Stir up your astonished fortitude, O yee Nobles of Israel; redeeme your bleeding honour, revenge this treacherous conspirator, and establish the right of the undoubted heires of your Soveraigne; But as warme cloathes to a dead man, so are the motions of valour to a fearefull heart: Behold two Kings stood not before him, how then shall we stand.

Feare affrights it selfe rather than it will want bugs of terror: It is true: Two Kings fell before Iehu; but, two Kings unarmed, unguarded; Had not the surprizall of Iehu taken advantage of the unsuspitious nakednesse of these two Princes, his victorie had not beene thus successefull, thus easie. Halfe one of those two Kings, upon advertisement and preparation, had abated the furie of that hot Leader. It is the fashion of feare to represent unto us alwaies the worst, in every event: not looking at the inequality of the advantages, but the misery of the successe: as contrarily it is the guise of faith, and valour, by the good issue of one enterprise to raise up the heart to an expectation and assurance of more.

These mens hearts are dead with their Kings, neither dare entertaine the hope of a safe and prosperous resistance, but basely returne, We are thy servants, and will doe all that thou shalt bid us, we will not make any King; doe thou that which is good in thine eyes.

Well may Iehu thinke, these men which are thus disloyall to their charge, cannot be faithfull to me; It is their feare that drawes them to this observation: Were they not cowards, they would not be traitors to their Princes, subjects to me: I may use their hands, but I will not trust them: It is a thankelesse obedience that is grounded upon feare; there can be no true fidelity without love, and reverence. Neither is it other betwixt God and us; if out of a dread of hell we be officious, who shall thank us for these respects to our selves?

As one that had tasted already the sweetnesse of a resolute expedition; Iehu writes backe instantly, If yee bee mine, and if yee will hearken unto my voyce; take ye the heads of the men your Masters sonnes, and come to mee to Iezreel to morrow this time. Valiant Iehu was so well acquainted with the nature of feare, that hee well knew this passion once growne desperate, would bee ready to swallow all conditions: so farre therefore doth his wisedome improve it, as to make these Peeres his executioners; who presently upon the receit of his charge turne cruell, and by a joynt consent fetch off the seventie heads of those Princes, whom they undertooke to guard, whom they had flattered with the hopes of greater honour.

No doubt, but amongst so many sonnes of Ahab, some had so demeaned themselves, that they had won zealous professions of love from their guardians: Except perhaps death stole upon them in sleepe, what teares, what intreaties, what conjurations must here needs have beene?

What have wee done, O yee Peeres of Israel, that might deserve this bloody measure? Wee are the sonnes of Ahab, therefore have yee hitherto professed to observe us; what change is this? why should that which hath hitherto kept you loyall, now make you cruell? Is this the reward of the long peaceable government of our father? are these the Trophees of Ahabs victories against Benhadad, Iehorams rams againſt Hazael? If we may not raigne, yet at leaſt, let us live: Or if wee muſt die; why will your hands be imbrued in that blood, which yee had wont to terme royall, and ſacred? Why will ye of Tutors turne murtherers? All pleas are in vaine to them that are deafned with their owne feares. Perhaps theſe expoſtulations might have fetched ſome dewes of pitie from the eyes, and kiſſes from the lips of theſe unfaithfull Tutors, but cannot prevent the ſtroke of death; Theſe Crocodiles weepe upon thoſe, whom they muſt kill: and if their owne ſonnes had beene in the place of Ahabs, doubtleſſe they had been ſacrificed to the will of an uſurper, to the parents ſafety: It is ill relying upon timorous natures; upon every occaſion thoſe crazie reeds will breake, and runne into our hands. How worthy were Ahab and Iezebel of ſuch friends? They had been ever falſe to God, how ſhould men be true to them? They had ſold themſelves to worke wickedneſſe, and now they are requited with a mercenary fidelity: for a few lines have theſe men ſold all the heads of Ahabs poſteritie: could ever the policy of Iezebel have reacht ſo farre, as to ſuſpect the poſſibilitie of the extirpation of ſo ample an iſſue in one night, by the hands of her truſtieſt ſubjects? A B

Now ſhee that by her letter ſent to the Elders of Iezreel, ſhed the blood of Naboth and his ſonnes, hath the blood of all her ſonnes ſhed by a letter ſent from Iezreel to the Elders of Samaria. At laſt, God will be ſure to come out of the debt of wicked ſinners, and will pay them with that coyne, which is both moſt proper, and leaſt lookt for.

Early in the morning, in that gate of Iezreel where Ahab had paſſed many an unjuſt ſentence, is preſented unto Iehu, the fearefull pledge of his ſoveraignitie, ſeventy gaſtly heads of the ſonnes of Ahab. C

Some carnall eye that had ſeene ſo many yong and ſmooth faces beſmeared with blood, would have melted into compaſſion, bemoaning their harmeleſſe age, their untimely end: It is not for the juſtice of God to ſtand at the barre of our corrupted judgement. Except we include ſome grandchildren of Ahab within this number, none of theſe died before they were ſeaſoned with horrible Idolatrie; or if they had; they were in the loynes of Ahab when he ſold himſelfe to worke wickedneſſe; and now it is juſt with God to puniſh Ahabs wickedneſſe in this fruit of his loynes. The holy ſeverity of God in the revenge of ſinne ſometimes goes ſo far that our ignorance is ready to miſtake it for cruelty.

The wonder and horror of thoſe two heapes hath eaſily drawne together the people of Iezreel: Iehu meets them in that ſeat of publike judgement; and finding much amazedneſſe and paſſionate confuſion in their faces; he cleares them, and ſends them to the true originall of theſe ſudden and aſtoniſhing maſſacres. D

However his owne conſpiracie, and the cowardly treachery of the Princes of Iſrael had beene (not without their hainous ſinne) the viſible meanes of this judgement, yet hee directs their eyes to an higher authority; the juſt decree of the Almighty, manifeſted by his ſervant Elijah; who even by the willing ſinnes of men can moſt wiſely, moſt hoſtilely fetch about his moſt righteous and bleſſed purpoſes.

If the Peeres of Samaria out of a baſe feare, if Iehu out of an ambition of raigning, ſhed the foule blood of Ahabs poſterity; the ſinne is their owne, but in the meane time the act is no other than what the infinite juſtice of God would juſtly worke by their miſ-intentions. Let theſe Iſraelites but looke up from earth to heaven, theſe tragicall changes cannot trouble them; thither Iehu ſends them; wiping off the envy of all this blood, by the warrant of the divine preordination: In obedience whereunto hee ſends after theſe heires of Ahab, all his kinsfolkes, favorites, prieſts that remained in Iezreel: and now having cleared theſe coaſts, he haſtes to Samaria: whom ſhould hee meete with, in the way, but the brethren of Ahaziah, King of Iudah; they are going to viſit their couzens the ſonnes of Ahab: This young troupe was thinking of nothing but jollitie, and courtly entertainement, when they meete with death: So ſuddenly, ſo ſecretly had Iehu diſpatched theſe bold executions, that theſe Princes could imagine no cauſe of ſuſpition: E

How

A How could they thinke it might be dangerous to bee knowne for the brethren of Ahaziah, or friends to the brethren of Iehoram? The juſt providence of the Almighty hath brought all this covey under one net; Iehu thinkes it not ſafe to let go ſo many avengers of Ahaziahs blood; ſo many corrivals of his Soveraignty. The unhappy affinity of Iehoſaphat with Ahab is no leſſe guilty of this ſlaughter, then Iehues ambition; This match by the inoculation of one bud, hath tainted all the ſap of the houſe of Iudah. The two and fortie brethren of Ahaziah are therefore ſent after the ſeventie Sonnes of Ahab; that they may overtake them in death, whom they came to viſit, God will much leſſe brooke Idolatry from the loynes of a Iehoſaphat: Our entireneſſe with wicked men feoffes us both in their ſinnes and judgments.

B Doubtleſſe, many Iſraelites that were devoted to the family and allies of Ahab, lookt(what they durſt)awry at this cõmon effuſion of royall blood; yet in the worſt of the depravedneſſe of Iſrael, there were ſome which both drouped under the deplored Idolatry of the times, and congratulated to Iehu this ſevere vindication of Gods inheritance: Amongſt the reſt, Ionadab the ſonne of Rechab was moſt eminent. That man was by deſcent derived from Iethro; a Midianite by nation, but incorporated into Iſrael; a man, whoſe piety and ſtrict converſation did both teach, and ſhame thoſe twelve Tribes to which he was joyned; He was the author of an auſtere rule of civility to his poſterity; to whom he debarred the uſe of wine, cities, poſſeſſions: This old and rough friend of Iehu, (out of his moving habitations) meets him, and applauds his ſucceſſe; He that allowed not wine to his ſeed, allowes the blood of A-
C habs ſeed poured out, by the hand of Iehu; He that ſhun'd the city, is carried in Iehues charet to the palace of Samaria.

How eaſily might Iehu have beene deceived? Many a one profeſſes uprightneſſe, who yet is all guile: Ionadabs carriage hath beene ſuch, that his word merits truſt: It is a bleſſing upon the plaine-hearted, that they can be beleeved. Honeſt Ionadab is admitted to the honour of Iehues ſeat; and called (inſtead of many) to witneſſe the zeale of the new anointed King of Iſrael.

Whiles Iehu had to doe with Kings, his cunning and his courage held equall pace together; but now that he is to deale with idolatrous Prieſts, his wile goes alone, and prevailes: Hee cals the people together, and diſſembling his intentions, ſayes, Ahab ſerved Baal a little, but Iehu ſhall ſerve him much: Now therefore
D call unto mee all the Prophets of Baal, all his ſervants, and all his prieſts, let none bee wanting: for I have a great ſacrifice to doe to Baal: whoſoever ſhall be wanting, he ſhall not live.

What a dead paleneſſe was there now in the faces of thoſe few true-hearted Iſraelites, that looked for an happy reſtauration of the Religion of God? How could they chooſe but think; Alas, how are we fallen from our hopes? Is this the change we look't for? was it only ambition that hath ſet this edge upon the ſword of Iehu? It was not the perſon of Ahab that we diſliked but the ſins: If thoſe muſt ſtill ſucceed, what have we gained? Wo be to us, if only the author of our miſery be changed, not the condition, not the cauſe of our miſery.

On the other ſide, what inſultations and triumphs ſounded every where of the E joyfull Baalites? What glorying of the truth of their profeſſion, becauſe of the ſucceſſe? what ſcornes of their dejected oppoſites? what exprobrations of the diſappointed hopes, and predictions of their adverſe Prophets, what promiſes to themſelves of a perpetuity of Baaliſme? How did the diſperſed prieſts of Baal now flocke together, and applaud each others happineſſe, and magnifie the devotions of their new Soveraigne? Never had that Idoll ſo glorious a day as this for the pompe of his ſervice; Before, he was adored ſinglely in corners, now ſolemne ſacrifices ſhall bee offered to him by all his clients, in the great Temple of the mother City of Iſrael. I can commend the zeale of Iehu, I cannot commend the fraud of Iehu: We may come to our end even by crooked wayes: He that bad him to ſmite for him, did not bid him to lie for him: Falſehood, though it be but tentative, is neither needed, nor approved by the God of truth: If policy have allowed officious untruths, Religion ne-

By this device, the house of Baal is well furnished, well filled; not one of his Chemarim either might, or would be absent: not one of those which were present, might be unrobed: False Gods have ever affected to imitate the true. Even Baal hath Temples, Altars, Priests, vestments: Al religions have allotted peculiar habits to their highest devotions. Those Vestments which they mis-called sacred, are brought forth, and put on for the glory of this service.

Iehu and Ionadab are first carefull that this separation be exact, they search and see that no servant of the Lord be crept into that throng: What should a religious Israelite do in the Temple of Baal? Were any such there, he had deserved their smart, who would partake with their worship; but if curiosity should have drawne any thither, the mercy of Iehu seekes his rescue: How much more favourable is the God of mercies in not taking advantage of our infirmities.

Wel might this search have bred suspition, were it not that in all those Idolatrous sacrifices, the first care was to avoid the prophane: Even Baal would admit no mixture, how should the true God abide it.

Nothing wanted now, but the sacrifice: No doubt whole heards and flockes were ready for a pretence of some royall hecatombes; whereof some had now already smoaked on their Altars. O Iehu what meanes this dilation? If thou abhorrest Baal, why didst thou give way to this last sacrifice? why didst thou not cut off these Idolaters before this upshot of their wickednesse? Was it that thou mightest be sure of their guiltinesse? Was it that their number, together with their sinne, might bee compleate? What acclamations were here to Baal, what joy in the freedome of their revived worship: When all on the sudden, those that had sacrificed, are sacrificed; The Souldiers of Iehu by his appointment rush in with their swords drawne, and turne the temple into a slaughter-house. How is the tune now changed? What shrieking was here? what out-cries? what running from one sword, to the edge of another? what scrambling up the walls and pillars? what climbing into the windowes? what vaine indevours to escape that death which would not be shunned? whether running, or kneeling, or prostrate, they must die.

The first part of the sacrifice was Baals, the latter is Gods: The bloud of beasts was offered in the one, of men in the other; the shedding of this was so much more acceptable to God, by how much these men were more beasts, than those they sacrificed. Oh happie obedience, God was pleased with a sacrifice from the house of Baal; The Idolaters are slaine, the Idols burnt, the house of Baal turn'd to a draught (though even thus lesse uncleane, lesse noysome, than in the former perfumes;) and in one word, Baal is destroyed out of Israel.

Who that had seene all this zeale for God, would not have said; Iehu is a true Israelite. Yet, he that rooted out Ahab, would not be rid of Ieroboam. He that destroyed Baal, maintained the two Calves of Dan and Bethel. That Idolatry was of a lower ranke; as being a mis-worship of the true God, whereas the other was a worship of the false: Even the easier of both is hainous; and shall rob Iehu of the praise of his uprightnesse.

A false heart may laudably quit it selfe of some one grosse sin, and in the meane time hug some lesser evill that may condemne it; As a man recovered of a Fever may die of a Iaundis, or a Dropsie. We loose the thanke of all, if we wilfully fault in one.

It is an entire goodnesse that God cares for; Perhaps (such is the bounty of our God) a partiall obedience may be rewarded with a temporall blessing; (as Iehues severity to Ahab shall carrie the crowne to his seed for foure generations) but we can never have any comfortable assurance of an eternall retribution, if our hearts and wayes be not perfit with God. Wo be to us, O God, if we be not all thine; we cannot but everlastingly depart from thee, if we depart not from every sin; Thou hast purged our hearts from the Baal of our grosse Idolatries, oh cleare us ftom the golden Calves of our petty-corruptions also; that thou maist take pleasure in our uprightnesse; and wee may reap the sweet comforts of thy glorious remuneration.

Athaliah

Athaliah and Joash.

OH the wofull ruines of the house of good Iehoſaphat : Iehu hath ſlaine two and forty of his iſſue ; Athaliah hopes to root out the reſt : This daughter of Ahab was not like to be other than fatall to that holy Line ; One drop of that wicked blood was enough both to impure, and ſpill all the reſt which affinity had mixed with it.

2 Kings 11, & 12. And 2 Chron. 23, & 24.

It is not unlike that Ahaziah betaking himſelfe to the ſociety of Iehorams wars, committed the ſway of his Scepter to his mother Athaliah. The daughter of Iezebel cannot but be plotting: when ſhe heares of the death of Ahaziah, and his brethren, inflicted by the heavy hand of Iehu, ſhee ſtraight caſts for the Kingdome of Judah : The true heires are infants, their minority gives her both colour of rule, and opportunity of an eaſie extirpation. Perhaps, her ambition was not more guilty than her zeale of Baaliſme : ſhee ſaw Iehu out of a deteſtation of Idolatry, trampling on the blood of Iehoram, Iezebel, Ahaziah, the ſons of Ahab, the brethren of Ahaziah, the prieſts and prophets of Baal, and in one word, triumphing in the deſtruction both of Ahab, and his Gods out of Iſrael : and now ſhe thinks, Why ſhould not I deſtroy Iehoſaphat, and his God out of Judah?

Who ever ſaw an Idolater that was not cruell? Athaliah muſt needs let out ſome of her own blood, out of the throat of Ahaziahs ſonnes; yet ſhe ſpares not to ſhed it out of a thirſt of ſoveraignty. O God how worthy of wonder are thy juſt and merciſull diſpenſations? In that thou ſuffereſt the ſeed of good Iehoſaphat to be deſtroyed by her hand, in whoſe affinity he offended, and yet ſaveſt one branch of this ſtock of Iehoſaphat, for the ſake of ſo faithfull a progenitor.

Wicked Athaliah, couldſt thou thinke God would ſo far forget his Servant David (though no other of thoſe loynes had ſeconded his vertues) as to ſuffer all his ſeed to be rooted out of the earth? This vengeance was for thy father Ahab. The man according to Gods owne heart ſhal have a lineall heire to ſucceed in his Throne, when thou and thy fathers houſe ſhall have vaniſhed into forgetfulneſſe.

For this purpoſe hath the wiſe providence of God ordained a Iehoſheba, and matcht her in the prieſtly Tribe: Such reverence did Iehoram, King of Judah (though degenerated into the Idolatry of his father in law Ahab) beare to this ſacred function, that he marries his daughter to Iehoiada the Prieſt. Even Princeſſes did not then ſcorne the bed of thoſe that ſerved at Gods Altar : Why ſhould the Goſpell powre contempt upon that which the Law honoured?

That good Lady had too much of Iehoſaphat in her, to ſuffer the utter extirpation of that royall ſeed ; She could not, doubtleſſe, without the extreme danger of her own life, ſave the life of her nephew Ioaſh ; With what a loving boldneſſe doth ſhe adventure to ſteale him from amongſt thoſe bleeding carcaſſes, in the chamber of death? Her match gave her opportunity to effect that, which both nature, and Religion moved her to attempt: neither know I, whether more to wonder at the cunning of the device, or the courage of the enterpriſe, or the ſecreſie of the concealement, or the happineſſe of the ſucceſſe : Certainly, Athaliah was too cruelly carefull to forget this ſo late borne ſon of Ahaziah; of all the reſt, his age would not ſuffer him to be out of her eye : In all likelihood therefore, ſhe muſt needs have miſſed ſo noted a corps, had there not beene a ſubſtitution of ſome other dead child in his roome : In that age, the favour is not ſo diſtinguiſhable; eſpecially of a dead face. Without ſome pious deceit this worke could never have been effected; Elſe, had the child beene ſecretly ſubduced, and miſſed by his bloody grand-mother, her perpetuall jealouſie had both expected a ſurviving heire, and continued a curious, and unavoydable ſearch: both which were now ſhunned at once, whiles Athaliah reckons him for dead whom Iehoſheba hath preſerved. Miſchiefe ſometimes failes of thoſe appointments, wherein it thinks to have made the ſureſt worke; God laughes in heaven at the plots of Tyrants; and befooles them in their deepeſt projects. He had ſaid to David, Of the fruit of thy body will I ſet upon thy ſeate; In vaine ſhall earth and hell conſpire to fruſtrate it. A

Sixe yeares hath Ioaſh, and his nurſe beene hid in a cloſe cell of the Temple: Thoſe roomes were deſtin'd onely to the holy Tribe; yet now rejoyce to harbour ſuch a gueſt; The rigour of the ordinary Law muſt yeeld to caſes of ſo important neceſſity.

All this could not poſſibly bee done and continued without the privity of many faithfull Prieſts and Levites; who were as carefull to keep this counſell, as hopefull of the iſſue of it: It is not hard for many honeſt hearts to agree in a religious ſecreſie; Needs muſt thoſe lips be ſhut, which God hath ſealed up. B

Judah had not been uſed to ſuch a yoke; long had it groned under the tyranny not of a woman only, but of an Idolatrous Sydonian: If any of that ſexe might have claimed that Scepter, none had ſo much right to it, as Iehoſheba her ſelfe; But good Iehoiada the Prieſt, who had rather to be a loyall guardian to the King, than an huſband to a Queene, now finds time to ſet on foot the juſt title of Ioaſh; and to put him into the miſ-uſurped throne of his father Ahaziah.

In the ſeventh yeare, therefore, he ſends for the Captaines, and the Guard; and having ſworne them ſecrecy, by undoubted witneſſes makes faith unto them of the truth of their native Prince, thus happily reſcued from the bloudie knife of his mercileſſe Grandmother; marſhals the great buſineſſe of his Inauguration; gives every one his charge; ſets every one his ſtation; and ſo diſpoſes of his holy forces, as was moſt needfull for the ſafety of the King, the revenge of the Uſurper, the prevention of tumults, the eſtabliſhment of the Crowne upon the owners head in Peace and Joy. C

There was none of all theſe agents who did not hold the buſineſſe to be his owne. Every true ſubject of Judah was feelingly intereſſed in this ſervice; neither was there any of them, who was not ſecretly heart-burned all this while, with the hatefull government of this Idolatrous Tyranneſſe: And now this inward fire is glad to finde a vent; How gladly doe they addreſſe themſelves to this welcome imployment? The greateſt part of this ſecret band were Levites, who might therefore both meete together with leaſt ſuſpition, and bee more ſecurely truſted by Iehoiada, under whom they ſerved; Even that holy Prieſt of God inſtead of teaching the Law, ſets the Guard, orders the Captaines, ranges the troupes of Judah; and inſtead of a Cenſer, brings forth the Speares and Shields of David; the Temple is, for the preſent, a Field, or an Artillery-yard; and the Ephods are turned into harneſſe. That houſe, in the rearing whereof not the noyſe of a hammer might be heard, now admits of the claſhing of armour, and the ſecret murmurs of ſome military atchievement. No circumſtances either of place, or calling, are ſo punctall, as that publique neceſſity may not diſpenſe with their alteration. D

All things are now ready for this ſolemnity: Each man rejoyces to fixe upon his owne footing; and longs to ſee the face of their long-concealed Soveraigne; and vowes his blood to the vindication of the common liberty, to the puniſhment of a cruell intruder: Now Iehoiada brings forth unto them the Kings Sonne, and preſents him to the Peeres, and people; Hardly can the multitude containe it ſelfe from ſhouting out too ſoone: One ſees in his countenance the features of his father, Ahaziah; another of his Grand-father, Iehoram; a third profeſſes to diſcerne in him ſome lines, and faſhion of his great grand-father Iehoſaphat; all finde in his face the naturall impreſſions of Majeſty; and reade in it the hopes, yea the propheſies of their future happineſſe. Not with more joy, than ſpeed, doth Iehoiada accompliſh all the rites of the Coronation. Before that young King could know what was done to him; hee is anointed, crowned; preſented with the booke of the Law: Thoſe ceremonies were inſtructive; and no doubt, Iehoiada failed E not

A not to comment upon the m in due time, to that royall Pupill.

The Oyle, wherewith he was anointed, ſignified his deſignation to that high ſervice ; and thoſe indowments from heaven that might inable him to ſo great a function.

The Crowne, wherewith he was adorned, ſignified that glorie and majeſty which ſhould both incourage, and attend his Princely cares.

The booke of the Teſtimonie ſignified the divine rules and directions, whereto he muſt frame his heart and actions, in the weilding of that Crown, in the improvement of that oyle.

Theſe three, the Oyle, the Crowne, the Teſtimonie, that is, inward powers, outward magnificence, true piety and juſtice make up a perfect Prince; None of
B theſe may be wanting; If there be not a due calling of God; and abilities meet for that greatneſſe, the Oyle faileth : If there be not a Majeſticke grace and royalty that may command reverence, the Crowne is miſſing; If there be not a carefull reſpect to the Law of God, as the abſolute guide of all counſels, and determinations, the Teſtimony is neglected, all of them concurring, make both King and people happy.

Now it is time for the people to clap their hands, and by their lowd acclamations to witneſſe their joy; which muſt needs breake forth with ſo much more force, by how much it was longer, upon feares and policy ſuppreſſed.

The Court and Temple were neere together ; However it was with Athaliah, and the late revolted Princes of Judah, according to the common word, the nee-
C rer to the Church, the further from God ; their religious predeceſſors held it the greateſt cõmodity of their houſe, that it neighboured upon the houſe of God; From her palace might Athaliah eaſily heare the joyfull ſhouts of the multitude, the lowd noiſe of the Trumpets; and as aſtoniſhed with this new tumult of publique gratulations, ſhe comes running into the Temple : Never had her foot trod upon that holy pavement, till now that ſhe came to fetch a juſt revenge from that God whoſe worſhip ſhe had contemned.

It fell out well that her ſudden amazedneſſe called her forth, without the attendance of any ſtrong guard, whoſe ſide-taking might have made that quarrell mutually bloody: She ſoone heares and ſees what ſhe likes not; her eare meets with, God ſave the King; her eye meets with the unlooked-for heire of the Kingdome, ſitting
D on his throne, crowned, and robed, in the royall faſhion, guarded with the Captaines and ſouldiers, proclaimed by the Trumpeters, acclamed and applauded by the people.

Who can ſay whether this ſight drave her more neere to frenzie, or death? How could it bee otherwiſe, when thoſe great ſpirits of hers, that had beene long uſed to an uncontrolled ſoveraigntie, finde themſelves ſo inexpectedly ſuppreſſed.

She now rends her cloathes, and cryes, Treaſon, treaſon, as if that voyce of hers could ſtill command all hearts, all hands; as if one breath of hers were powerfull enough to blow away all theſe new deſignes : Oh Athaliah, to whom doſt thou complaine thy ſelfe ? they are thy juſt executioners wherewith thou art in-
E compaſſed ; If it be treaſon to ſet up the true heire of Ahaziah, thou appealeſt to thy Traitors. The treaſon was thine, theirs is juſtice ; The time is now come of thy reckonings for all the royall blood of Judah, which thine ambition ſhed; wonder rather at the patience of this long forbearance, than the rigour of this execution.

There needs no formall ſeate of Juſtice in ſo apparent offence, Iehoiada paſſes the ſentence of death upon her; Have her forth of the ranges; Let her not be ſlaine in the houſe of the Lord, and him that followeth her, kill with the ſword.

Had not this uſurpation beene palpable, Iehoiada would not have preſumed to intermeddle; Now being both the Prieſt of God, and Uncle and Protector to the lawfull King, he doth that, out of the neceſſity of the State, which his infant Soveraigne (if he could have been capable of thoſe thoughts) would have deſired.

Violent hands are laid upon Athaliah, whom no doubt a proud and furious disdaine of so quick a charge, and of so rough an usage made miserably impatient; Now she frownes and cals, and shrieks, and commands, and threatens, and reviles, and intreats in vaine; and dies with as much ill will from her selfe, as she lived with the ill will of her repining subjects. A

I see not any one man of all her late flatterers, that followes her, either for pitty, or rescue; Every man willingly gives her up to justice; Not one sword is drawne in her defence; Not one eye laments her. Such is the issue of a tyrannicall mis-government; that which is obeyed not without secret hate, is lost not without publique joy.

How like is Athaliah to her mother Iezebel, as in conditions and carriage, so even in death; Both killed violently, both killed under their owne walls; both slaine with Treason in their mouths; both slaine in the entrance of a changed government: One trod on by the horses, the other slaine in the horse-gate. Both paid their own blood for the innocent blood of others. B

How suddenly, how easily is Judah restored to it selfe, after so long, and so feare-full a depravation; The people scarce beleeve their owne eyes, for the wonder of this happie change; neither know I whether they be more joyed in the sight of their new King thus strangely preserved, or in the sight of Iehoiada, that had preserved him.

No man can envie the protection of the young King unto him, by whose meanes he lives and raignes: That holy man cares onely to improve his authority, to the common good: He makes a covenant betweene the Lord, and the King, and the people: and after so long and dangerous a disjunction, reunites them to each other. Their revived zeale bestirs it selfe, and breakes downe the Temples, and Altars, and Images of Baal, and sacrifices his idolatrous Priest; Shortly, both Ahab, and Baal is destroyed out of Judah. C

The Scepter of Judah is changed from a woman, to a child; but, a Child trained up, and tutored by Iehoiada; This minority so guided was not inferiour to the mature age of many predecessors. Happy is that land, the non-age of whose Princes falls into holy and just hands. Yet even these holy and just hands came short of what they might have done; The high places remained still: Those altars were erected to the true God, but in a wrong place: It is marvell if there be not some blemishes found in the best government: I doubt Iehoiada shall once abuy it deare, that he did not his utmost. D

But for the maine, all was wel with Judah, in all the daies of Iehoiada; even after that Ioash was growne past his pupillage: He that was the Tutor to his infancie, was the counsellor of his ripe age; and was equally happie in both: How pleasing was it to that good High Priest, to be commanded by that charge of his in the businesse of God? The yong King gives order to the Priests, for the collection of large summes, to the repayring of the breaches of Gods house. It becomes him well to take care of that, which was the nurserie of his infancy: And now, after three and twenty yeares he expostulates with his late Guardian, Iehoiada, and the rest of his coate, Why repaire ye not the breaches?

Oh gracious and happy vicissitude; Iehoiada the Priest had ruled the infancie of King Ioash in matters of State; and now Ioash the King commands aged Iehoiada the Priest in matter of devotion. In the affaires of God, the action is the Priests, the over-sight and coaction is the Princes: By the carefull indeavour of both, Gods house is repaired, his service flourisheth, E

But alas, that it may too well appeare, that the ground of this devotion was not altogether inward, no sooner doth the life of Iehoiada cease than the devotion of Ioash begins to languish: and after some languour, dyes.

The benefit of a truly religious Prelate, or Statesman, is not knowne till his losse.

Now some Idolatrous Peeres of Judah have soone mis-carried the King from the House of the Lord God of their Fathers to serve Groves and Idols. Yea, whither go

A go we wretched men, if we be left by our Maker? King Ioash is turned, not Idolater only, but persecutor; yea (which is yet more horrible to consider) persecutor of the son of that Iehoiada to whom he owes his own life, Zechariah his Cosen-german, his foster-brother, the holy issue of those parents, by whom Ioash lives, and raignes; for the conscionable rebuke of the Idolatry of Prince and people, is unjustly, and cruelly murthered by that unthankful hand: How possible is it for faire and Saint-like beginnings to shut up in monstrous impieties? Let him that thinkes he stands, take heed lest he fall. When did God ever put up so foule ingratitude to himselfe, to his servants? O Ioash, what eyes can pittie the fearefull destruction of thee and thy Judah?

If ye have forgotten the kindnesse of Iehoiada, your unkindnesse to Iehoida shall not be forgotten: A small armie of Syrians came up against Iudah and Ierusalem, and destroyed all the Princes of the people, and sent all the spoyle of them to Damascus. Now Hazael revenges this quarrell of God, and his anointed; and plagues that people which made themselves unworthy to be the Lords inheritance.

And what becomes of Ioash? He is left in great diseases, when his owne servants conspired against him for the blood of the sons of Iehoiada, and slew him on his bed, and he died; and they buried him not in the Sepulcher of the Kings. Dying Zechariah had said in the bitternesse of his departing soule, The Lord looke upon it, and require it: I confesse I had rather to have heard him say, The Lord passe it over and remit it; so said Steven; such difference there is betweene a Martyr of the Law, and of the Gospell: although I will hope the zeale of justice, not the uncharitable heat of revenge drew forth this word: God heares it, and now gives an account of his notice; Thus doth the Lord require the blood of Iehoiadaes son, even by the like unthankfull hand of the obliged servants of Ioash. He that was guilty of abhominable Idolatry, yet (as if God meant to wave that challenge) is called to reckoning for his cruel unthankfulnesse to Iehoiada; This crime shall make him odious alive, and shall abandon him dead from the sepulcher of his fathers; as if this last royalty were too good for him, who had forgotten the law of humanity. Some vices are such, as Nature smiles upon, though frowned at by divine justice: Others are such, as even Nature it selfe abhorres; such is this of ingratitude, which therefore carries so much more detestation from God, as it is more odious even to them that have blotted out the image of God.

Joash with Elisha dying.

THe two Kingdomes of Judah and Israel how ever divided both in government, and affection, yet loved to interchange the names of their Kings; Even Israel also had their Ioash, no better than that of Judah; he was not more the father of a later Ieroboam, than (in respect of mis-worship) he was the son of the first Ieroboam, who made Israel to sin; Those Calves of Dan and Bethel, out of a politick mis-devotion, besotted all the succession of the ten usurped Tribes: yet even this idolatrous King of Israel comes downe to visit the sicke bed of Elisha, and weepes upon his face. 2 Kings 13.

That holy Prophet was never any flatterer of Princes, neither spared he invectives against their most plausible sins: yet King Ioash, that was beaten by his reproofes, washes that face with the teares of love, and sorrow, which had often frowned upon his wickednesse.

How much difference there was betwixt the Ioash of Israel, and the Ioash of Judah? That of Judah having beene preserved and nurtured by Iehoiada the Priest, after all professions of dearnesse shuts up in the unkinde murder of his Sonne; and that meerely for the just reproofe of his owne Idolatry: This of Israel having ving beene eſtranged from the Prophet Eliſha, and ſharply rebuked for the like offence, makes love to his dying reprover, and be-dewes his pale face with his teares: Both were bad enough, but this of Iſrael was, how ever vicious, yet good-natur'd: That of Judah added to his wickednesſe, an ill diſpoſition, a dogged humour. There are varieties even of evill men; ſome are worſe at the roote, others at the branch; ſome more civilly harmeleſſe, others fouler in morality. According to the exerciſe of the reſtraining grace, naturall men do either riſe, or fall in their ill. A

The longeſt day muſt have his evening: Good Eliſha, that had lived ſome ninetie yeares, a wonder of Prophets, and had out-worne many ſucceſſions in the thrones of Iſrael, and Judah, is now caſt upon the bed of his ſickneſſe, yea, of his death: That very age might ſeeme a diſeaſe; which yet is ſeconded with a languiſhing diſtemper. It is not in the power of any holineſſe to priviledge us from infirmity of body, from finall diſſolution: He that ſtretched himſelfe upon his bed, over the dead carcaſſe of the Shunamites ſon, and revived it; muſt now ſtretch out his owne limbes upon his ſick bed, and die. He ſaw his Maſter Elijah rapt up ſuddenly from the earth, and fetcht by a fiery chariot from this vale of mortality; himſelfe muſt leiſurely wait for his laſt pangs, in a lingring paſſage to the ſame glory. There is not one way appointed to us, by the divine providence, unto one common bleſſednesſe: One hath more paine, another hath more ſpeed: Violence ſnatcheth away one, another by an inſenſible pace drawes every day neerer to his terme: The wiſedome and goodneſſe of God magnifies it ſelfe in both: Happie is hee that after due preparation, is paſt through the gates of death, ere he be aware; Happie is he that by the holy uſe of long ſickneſſe is taught to ſee the gates of death a farre off, and addreſſed for a reſolute paſſage: The one dies like Elijah, the other like Eliſha, both bleſſedly. B C

The time was, when a great King ſent to Eliſha to know if he ſhould recover; now the King of Iſrael, as knowing that Eliſha ſhall not recover (ſo had his conſumption ſpent him) comes to viſit the dying Prophet; and when his teares would give him leave, breakes forth into a paſſionate exclamation, O my father, my father; the charets of Iſrael and the horſemen thereof. Yet the Calves of Dan and Bethel have left ſome goodneſſe in Ioaſh; As the beſt man hath ſomething in him worthy of reproofe; ſo the faultieſt hath ſomething commendable. Had not the Spirit of God himſelfe told us, that Ioaſh did that which was evill in the ſight of the Lord, we had admired this piety, this reverent reſpect to the Prophet. The holieſt man could not have ſaid more: It is poſſible for the clients of a falſe worſhip, to honour (out of another regard) the profeſſors of Truth; From the hand of Eliſha had Iehu the Grand-father of Ioaſh received his unction to the Kingdome: this favour might not be forgotten. D

Viſitation of the ſicke is a duty required both by the law of humanity, and of Religion; Bodily infirmity is ſad, and comfortleſſe; and therefore needs the preſence, and counſell of friends to relieve it; Although, when wee draw the curtaines of thoſe that are eminently gracious, wee do rather fetch (with Ioaſh) than bring a bleſſing.

How ſenſible ſhould we be of the loſſe of holy men, when a Ioaſh ſpends his teares upon Eliſha? If we be more affected with the forgoing of a naturall friend, or kinſman, than of a noted and uſefull Prophet, it argues more love to our ſelves, than to the Church of God, than to God himſelfe. E

What uſe there was of chariots and horſemen in thoſe warres of the Ancient, all Hiſtories can tell us: All the ſtrength of the battell ſtood in theſe: There could bee neither defence, nor offence, but by them: ſuch was Eliſha unto Iſrael; The greateſt ſafegard to any nation is the ſanctity and faithfulneſſe of their Prophets; without which the Church and State lyes open to utter deſolation.

The ſame words that Eliſha ſaid of his maſter Elijah, when he ſaw him taken up from the earth, doth Ioaſh now ſpeake of Eliſha, neere his diſſolution: O my father, my father, the charets of Iſrael, and the horſemen thereof. The words were good;

A good; the teares were pious ; but where are the actions ? O Ioash, if the Prophet were thy father, where was thy filiall obedience ? Hee cri'd downe thy Calves, thou upheldst them; hee counsell'd thee to good, thou didst evill in the sight of the Lord.

If the Prophet were the charets and horsemen of Israel , why didst thou fight against his holy doctrine? If thou weepest for his losse, why didst thou not weepe for those sins of thine, that procured it?

Had thine hand answered thy tongue, Israel had beene happie in Elisha; Elisha had beene happie in Israel, and thee ; Words are no good triall of profession : The worst men may speake well : Actions have onely the power to descry hypocrites.

B Yet even a Ioash thus complying, shall not goe away unblessed : This outward kindnesse shall receive an outward retribution ; These few drops of warme water shed upon the face of a Prophet, shall not lose their reward ; The spirit of prophesie forsakes not the death-bed of Elisha ; Hee calls for bow, and arrowes, and puts them into the hand of Ioash , and putting his hands upon the Kings hand, he bids to shoot Eastward : and whiles the shaft flyes, and lights, he saies, The Arrow of the Lords deliverance from Syria; for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou have consumed them : If the weake and withered hand of the Prophet had not beene upon the youthfull, and vigorous hand of the King, this bow had beene drawne in vaine ; the strength was from the hand of the King, the blessing from the hand of the Prophet : Hee whose reall parable hath made the
C earth to bee Syria, the arrow, revenge, the archer, Ioash, hath obtained for his last boone from God to Israel, that this archer shall shoot this arrow of revenge, into the heart of Syria, and wound it to death. When then the hand of the King, and of the Prophet, drawes together, there cannot chuse but successe must follow.

How readily doth Elisha now make good the words of Ioash? How truly is he the Charets and Horsemen of Israel ? Israel had not fought without him, much lesse had been victorious; If theirs be the indeavour, the successe is his : Even the dying Prophet puts life, and speed into the Forces of Israel, and whiles he is digging his owne grave, is raising Trophees to Gods people.

He had received kindnesse from the Syrians; amongst them was he harbour'd in D the dearth ; and from some of their Nobles, was presented with rich gifts; but their enmity to Israel drownes all his private respects, hee cannot but professe hostilitie to the publique enemies of the Church : Neither can he content himselfe with a single prediction of their ruine. He bids Ioash to take the arrowes, and smite upon the ground, he sets no number of those strokes ; as supposing the frequence of those blowes, which Ioash might well (upon his former parabolicall act) understand to bee significant. The slacke hand of the King smites but thrice. So apt wee are to bee wanting to our selves; so coldly doe wee execute the commands of God : The sicke Prophet is not more greeved, than angry at this dull negligence; Doubtlesse God had revealed to him (for his last gratification)
E that upon his fervent prayers, so oft as Ioash should voluntarily (after his generall charge) smite the earth, so oft should Israel smite Syria. Elshaes zeale doth not languish with his body : with a fatherly authority he chides him, who had stiled him father; not fearing to spend some of his last winde in a milde reproofe, Thou shouldest have smitten five or sixe times, then thou hadst smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it, whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice. Not that the unchangeable decree of the Almighty meant to suspend it selfe upon the uncertaine issue of Ioashes will; but, he that puts this word into the mouth of his Prophet, puts this motion into the hand of the King, which did not more willingly stay, then necessarily obey that providence whereby it was stirred. Even whiles wee have our freest choyce, wee fall upon those actions and circumstances, whereby the just and holy will of our God is brought about. Our very neglects, our ignorances shall fulfill his eternall counsells.

Elisha

Eliſha dies, and is buried; his miracles doe not ceaſe with his life: Who can marvell that his living prayers raiſed the ſon of the Shunamite, when his dead bones raiſe the carkaſſe that touched them. God will be free in his workes; hee that muſt die himſelfe, yet ſhall revive another; the ſame power might have continued life to him, that gave it by his bones. Iſrael ſhall well ſee that he lives, by whoſe vertue Eliſha was both in life, and death, miraculous: Whiles the Prophet was alive, the impetration might ſeeme to be his, though the power were Gods; now that he is dead, the bones can challenge nothing, but ſend the wandring Iſraelites to that almighty Agent, to whom it is all one to worke by the quicke, or dead. Were not the men of Iſrael more dead than the carkaſſe thus buried, how could they chooſe but ſee in this revived corps, an embleme of their owne condition? How could they chooſe but thinke, If we adhere to the God of Eliſha, he ſhall raiſe our decayed eſtates, and reſtore our nation to the former glory. A B

The Sadduces had as yet no being in Iſrael, with what face could that hereſie ever after looke into the world, when before the birth of it, it was ſo palpably convinced, with an example of the reſurrection? Intermiſſion of time, and degrees of corruption adde nothing to the impoſſibility of our riſing: The body that is once cold in death, hath no more aptitude to a reanimation, than that which is moldred into duſt; Onely the divine power of the Maker muſt reſtore either, can reſtore both: When we are dead, and buryed in the grave of our ſinne; it is onely the touch of Gods Prophets, applying unto us the death and reſurrection of the Son of God, that can put new life into us; No leſſe true, though ſpirituall, is the miracle of our raiſing up from an eſtate of inward corruption, to a life of grace.

Yet all this prevailes not with Iſrael: No bones of Eliſha could raiſe them from their wicked Idolatry: and, notwithſtanding their groſſe ſinnes, Ioaſh their King proſpers: Whether it were for the ſake of Iehu, whoſe grand-child he was, or for the ſake of Eliſha, whoſe face he wept upon, his hand is notably ſucceſſefull: not only againſt the ſon of Hazael, King of Syria, whom he beates out of the Cities of Iſrael; but, againſt Amaziah King of Judah, whom he took Priſoner, beating down the very wals of Jeruſalem, and returning laden with the ſacred, and rich ſpoile both of the Temple, and Court, to his Samaria. C

Oh the depth of the divine Juſtice, and wiſedome in theſe outward adminiſtrations! The beſt cauſe, the beſt man doth not ever fare beſt: Amaziah did that which was right in the ſight of the Lord; Ioaſh, evill: Amaziah followes David (though not with equal paces) Ioaſh followes Ieroboam, yet is Amaziah ſhamefully foyled by Ioaſh; Whether God yet meant to viſit upon this King of Judah, the ſtill-odious unthankfulneſſe of his father to Iehoiada; or, to plague Judah for their ſhare in the blood of Zecharia, and their late revolt to Idolatry; or, whether Amaziahs too much confidence in his own ſtrength (which moved his bold challenge to Ioaſh) were thought fit to be thus taken downe, or what ever other ſecret ground of Gods judgement there might be, it is not for our preſumption to inquire: Who ſo by the event ſhal judge of love, or hatred, ſhall be ſure to run upon that woe, which belongs to them that call good evill, and evill good. D

What a ſavage peece of juſtice it is to put the right, whether of inheritance, or honor, to the deciſion of the ſword, when it is no newes for the better to miſcarry by the hand of the worſe. E

The race is not to the ſwift; the battell is not to the ſtrong; no not to the good: Perhaps, God will correct his own by a foyle; perhaps, he will plague his enemy by a victory. They are only our ſpirituall combats wherein our faithfull courage is ſure of a crowne.

UZZIAH Leprous.

EVen the Throne of David paſſed many changes of good, and evill: Good Iehoſaphat was followed with three ſucceſſions of wicked Princes; and thoſe three, were againe ſucceeded with three others godly, and vertuous; Amaziah for a long time ſhone faire, but at the laſt, ſhut up in a cloud; The gods of the Edomites marred him; his rebellion againſt God, ſtirr'd up his peoples rebellion againſt him: The ſame hands that ſlew him, crowned his ſonne Vzziah; ſo as the young King might imagine it was not their ſpight, that drew violence upon his father, but his owne wickedneſſe; Both early did this Prince raigne, and late; he began at ſixteene; and ſat fifty two yeares in the Throne of Iudah: They that mutined in the declining age of Amaziah, the father; are obſequious to the childhood of the ſonne, as if they profeſſed to adore Soveraignty, whiles they hated lewdneſſe: The unchanged government of good Princes is the happineſſe, no leſſe of the ſubjects than of themſelves: The hand knowes beſt to guide thoſe raines to which it hath beene inured; and even meane hackneyes goe on chearefully in their wonted rode; Cuſtome, as it makes evils more ſupportable, ſo where it meets with conſtant mindes, makes good things more pleaſing and beneficiall. 2 Chron. 26. And 2 Kings 15.

The wiſe and holy Prophet Zechariah, was an happy Tutor to the minority of King Vzziah; That veſſell can hardly miſ-carry where a ſkilfull ſtereſ-man ſits at the helme: The firſt praiſe of a good Prince is to be judicious, and juſt, and pious, in himſelfe; the next is, to give eare, and way, to them that are ſuch: Whiles Zechariah hath the viſions of God, and Vzziah takes the counſels of Zechariah, it is hard to ſay whether the Prophet, or the King, or the State be happier.

God will be in no mans debt; ſo long as Vzziah ſought the Lord, God made him to proſper. Even what we do out of dutie cannot want a reward: Godlineſſe never diſappointed any mans hopes, oft hath exceeded them. If Vzziah fight againſt the Philiſtims, if againſt the Arabians, and Mehunims; according to his names, the ſtrength, the help of the Almighty is with him: The Ammonites come in with preſents, and all the neighbour-nations ring of the greatneſſe, of the happineſſe of Vzziah; his bounty and care makes Jeruſalem both ſtrong, and proud of her new Towers; yea the very Deſart muſt taſte of his munificence. Uzziah, Azariah,

The outward magnificence of Princes cannot ſtand firme, unleſſe it be built upon the foundations of providence and frugality; Vzziah had not beene ſo great a King, if he had not been ſo great an huſband; he had his flocks in the deſarts, and his heards in the plaines, his ploughs in the fields, his vinedreſſers upon the mountaines, and in Carmel: neither was this more out of profit, than delight, for he loved husbandry. Who can contemne thoſe callings for meanneſſe, which have been the pleaſures of Princes.

Hence was Vzziah ſo potent at home, ſo dreadfull to his neighbours; his warres had better ſinewes than theirs; which of his predeceſſors was able to maintaine ſo ſetled an army, of more than of three hundred and tenne thouſand trained ſouldiers well furniſhed, well fitted for the ſuddenneſt occaſion? Thrift is the ſtrongeſt prop of power.

The greatneſſe of Vzziah, and the rare devices of his artificiall Engines for war, have not more raiſed his fame, than his heart: ſo is he ſwolne up with the admiration of his owne ſtrength, and glory, that he breakes againe; How eaſie it is for the beſt man to dote upon himſelf; and to be lifted up ſo high, as to loſe the ſight both of the ground, whence he ariſes, and of the hand that advanced him? How hard it is for him that hath invented ſtrange Engines for the battering of his enemies, to find out any meanes to beate downe his owne proud thoughts? Wiſe Salomon knew what he did, when he prayed to be delivered from too much: Leſt, ſaid he, I be full, and denie thee thee, and ſay, Who is the Lord? Upon this Rocke did the ſon of Salomon runne and ſplit himſelfe; His full ſayles of proſperity carried him into preſumption and ruine: what may he not doe? what may he not be? Becauſe he found his power otherwiſe unlimited; over-ruling in the Court, the Cities, the Fields, the Deſerts, the armes, and Magazins, therefore hee thinkes hee may doe ſo in the Temple too: as things royall, civill, huſbandly, military paſſed his hands, ſo why ſhould not (thinkes he) ſacred alſo? It is a dangerous indiſcretion for a man not to know the bounds of his owne calling: What confuſion doth not follow upon this breaking of the rankes. A

Upon a ſolemne day, King Vzziah clothes himſelf in Pontificall robes, and in the view of that populous aſſembly, walkes up in ſtate, into the Temple of God, and boldly appproching to the Altar of Incenſe, offers to burne ſweet odors upon it to the Gods of heaven: Azariah the Prieſt is ſenſible of ſo perillous an incroachment; he therefore, attended with foureſcore valiant aſſiſtants of that holy Tribe, haſtens after the King, & finding him with the cenſer in his hand, ready addreſſed to that ſinfull devotion, ſtayes him with a free, and grave expoſtulation: There is no place wherein I could be ſorry to ſee thee, O King, but this, where thou art; neither is there any act, that we ſhould grudge thee ſo much, as this, which is the moſt ſacred; Is it poſſible that ſo great an overſight ſhould fall into ſuch wiſedome? Can a religious Prince trained up under an holy Zechariah, after ſo many yeares zealous profeſſion of piety, be either ignorant, or regardleſſe of thoſe limits, which God hath ſet to his owne ſervices? B

Oh, what meanes this uncouth attempt? Conſider O deare Soveraigne, for Gods ſake, for thy ſoules ſake, conſider where thou art, what thou doeſt; it is Gods houſe wherein thou ſtandeſt, not thine owne; Looke about thee, and ſee, whether theſe vailes, theſe Tables, theſe Pillars, theſe Walls, theſe Pavements, have any reſemblance of earth: There is no place in all the world whence thy God hath excluded thee; but only this; this he hath reſerved for his owne uſe: And canſt thou thinke much to allow one roome as proper to him, who hath not grudged all the reſt to thee, But if it be thy zeale of a perſonall ſervice to God, that hath caried thee hither; alas, how canſt thou hope to pleaſe the Almighty with a forbidden ſacrifice? Which of thine holy Progenitors ever dared to tread, where thy foot now ſtandeth? which of them ever put forth their hand to touch this ſacred Altar? Thou knoweſt that God hath ſet apart, and ſanctified his owne attendants; Wherefore ſerves the Prieſthood, if this be the right of Kings? were it not for the ſtrict prohibition of our God, it could ſeeme no other then an honour to our profeſſion, that a King ſhould thinke to dignifie himſelfe by our employment; but now knowing the ſevere charge of the great King of heaven, we cannot but tremble to ſee that cenſer in thine hand; who ever, out of the holy Tribe, hath weilded it unrevenged? This affront is not to us, it is to the God whom we ſerve; In awe of that terrible Majeſty, as thou wouldſt avoid ſome exemplary judgement, O King withdraw thy ſelfe, not without humble deprecations, from this preſence; and lay down that interdicted handfull, with feare and trembling; Be thou ever a King, let us be Prieſts; The Scepter is thine, let Cenſers be ours. C D

What religious heart could do other then relent at ſo faithfull and juſt an admonition? But how hard is it for great perſons to yeeld they have offended? Vzziah muſt not be faulty, what is done raſhly ſhall be borne out with power; Hee was wroth; and thus expreſſeth it: What meanes this ſaucy expoſtulation, O ye ſons of Levi, how dare yee thus malapertly controll the well-meant actions of your Soveraigne? If yee be Prieſts, remember that yee are ſubjects; or if yee will needs forget it, how eaſie is it for this hand to awake your memory? What ſuch offence can it be for me to come into that houſe, and to touch that Altar, which my royall Progenitors have made, beautified, conſecrated? Is the God of this place only yours? Why do ye thus ambitiouſly ingroſſe Religion? If Princes have not intermedled with theſe holy affaires, it was becauſe they would not, not becauſe they might not; When thoſe lawes were made for the Sanctuary, there were no Kings to grace theſe divine E ceremonies;

A ceremonies; yet even then, Moſes was priviledged. The perſons of Princes (if yee know not) are no leſſe ſacred then your owne. It is your preſumption to account the Lords anointed, prophane: Conteſt with thoſe, whoſe dry and unhallowed heads are ſubject to your power; For me, I will not aſke your leave to be devout; Looke yee to your owne Cenſers, preſume not to meddle with mine; in the meane time, can ye thinke this inſolence of yours ſhall eſcape unrevenged? Can it ſtand with the honour of my ſoveraignitie, to be thus proudly checked by ſubjects? God doe ſo to me and more alſo, if. Whiles Vzziah yet ſpeakes, God ſtrikes: Ere the words of fury can come forth of his mouth, the leproſie appeares in his forehead: Leproſie was a moſt loathſome diſeaſe; the forehead is the moſt conſpicuous part: Had this ſhamefull ſcurfe broken forth upon his hand, or foot, or breaſt, it might
B have been hid from the eyes of men; now the forehead is ſmitten with this judgement, that God may proclaime to all beholders, Thus ſhall it bee done to the man whoſe arrogance hath thruſt him upon a ſacred charge. Publique offences muſt have open ſhame.

It is a dangerous thing to put our ſelves into the affaires, into the preſence of God, unwarranted; There cannot be a more fooliſh miſpriſion, than, becauſe we are great on earth, to thinke we may be bold with heaven: When Gods meſſengers cannot prevaile by counſels, intreaties, threats, it is time for God to ſhow his immediate judgements. Wilfull offenders can expect nothing but a fearefull revenge.

Now begins Vzziah to be confounded in himſelfe; and ſhame ſtrives with leproſie, for a place in his forehead; The hand of God hath done that in an inſtant which
C all the tongues of men had attempted in vaine: There needs no further ſolicitor of his egreſſe; the ſenſe of his plague ſends him forth alone: And now he thinkes, Wretched man that I am, how have I angred God; and undone my ſelfe? I would needs come in like a Prieſt, and now goe forth a Leper: the pride of my heart made me thinke my ſelfe worthy the preſence of a God; Gods juſt diſpleaſure hath now made me unworthy of the preſence of men: whiles I affected the altar, I have loſt my throne; whiles I ſcornefully rejected the advice and cenſures of Gods Miniſters, I am now become a ſpectacle of horror, and deformitie, to my owne ſervants; I that would be ſending up perfumes to heaven, have made my naſtineſſe hatefull to my owne ſenſes. What doe I under this ſacred roofe? Neither is Gods houſe now, for me, nor mine owne; what cell, what dungeon is cloſe enough for me, wherein to D weare out the reſidue of mine unhappy and uncomfortable dayes? O God thou art juſt, and I am miſerable.

Thus with a dejected countenance, and ſad heart, doth Vzziah haſte to retire himſelfe; and wiſhes, that he could be no leſſe hid from himſelfe, than from others: how eaſie is it for the God of heaven to bring downe the higheſt pitch of earthly greatneſſe, and to humble the ſtubborneſt pride?

Upon the leiſure of ſecond thoughts, Vzziah cannot but acknowledge much favour in this correction, and confeſſe to have eſcaped well; Others, hee knew, had been ſtruck dead, or ſwallowed up quick for ſo preſumptuous an intruſion: It is happy for him if his forehead may excuſe his ſoule.

Vzziah ceaſed not to be a King, when he began to be a leper; the diſeaſe of his
E forehead did not remove his Crowne: his ſonne Iotham raigned for him, under him, and whiles he was not ſeen, yet he was obeyed. The character of Soveraignty is indeleble, whether by bodily infirmitie, or by ſpirituall cenſure: Neither is it otherwiſe, O God, betwixt thee, and us, if we be once a royall generation unto thee, our leproſies may deforme us, they ſhall not dethrone us: ſtill ſhall we have the right, ſtill the poſſeſſion of that glorious kingdome, wherein we are inveſted from eternitie.

Ahaz with his new Altar.

2 Kings 16.

After many unhappy changes of the two thrones; Ahaz ſucceeds Iotham in the Kingdome of Judah: an ill ſonne of a good father; not more the heire of Davids ſeate, than of Ieroboams ſin: Though Iſrael play the harlot, yet who can abide that Judah ſhould ſinne? It is hard not to be infected with a contagious neighbour-hood: who ever read that the Kingdome of Iſrael was ſeaſoned with the vicinity of the true Religion of Judah? Goodneſſe (ſuch as our nature is) is not ſo apt to ſpread: A tainted ayre doth more eaſily affect a ſound body, than an wholeſome ayre can cleare the ſicke: Superſtition hath ever been more ſucceſſefull, than truth; The yong yeares of Ahaz are ſoone miſ-led to a plauſible miſ-devotion.

A man that is once falne from truth, knowes not where hee ſhall ſtay: From the Calves of Ieroboam is Ahaz drawne to the gods of the heathen; yea, now, Bulls and Goates are too little for thoſe new deities, his owne fleſh and blood is but deare enough; He made his ſonne to paſſe through their fire. Where doe we finde any religious Iſraelite thus zealous for God? Neither doth the holineſſe and mercy of our God require ſo cruell a ſacrifice: neither is our dull, and niggardly hand ready to gratifie him with more eaſie obediences; O God how gladly ſhould we offer unto thee our ſoules, and bodies, which wee may enoy ſo much the more, when they are thine; ſince zealous Pagans ſticke not to leeſe their owne fleſh, and blood in an Idols fire?

He that hath thus ſhamefully caſt off the God of his fathers, cannot be long without a fearefull revenge. The King of Iſrael galls him on the one ſide; the King of Syria on the other: To avoide the ſhocke of both, Ahaz doth not betake himſelfe to the God whom he had offended, who was able to make his enemies at peace with him, but to Tiglath Pileſer King of Aſſur: Him doth he woo with ſuites, with gifts; and robs God of thoſe preſents, which may indeare ſo ſtrong an helper. Hee that thought not his ſonne too deare for an Idoll, thinkes not Gods ſilver and gold too deare for an Idolatrous abettor.

Oh the infinite patience of the Almighty! God gives ſucceſſe a while to ſo offenſive a rivalitie: This Aſſyrian King prevailes againſt the King of Syria, kills him, and takes his chiefe Citie, Damaſcus; The quarrell of the King of Judah hath enlarged the Territories of his aſſiſtant, beyond hope; And now, whiles this Aſſyrian victor is enjoying the poſſeſſion of his new-won Damaſcus: Ahaz goes up thither to meet him, to congratulate the victorie, to adde unto thoſe triumphs, which were drawne on by his ſolicitation. There he ſees a new faſhioned Altar, that pleaſes his eye; That old forme of Solomons, which was made by the patterne ſhewed to Moſes in the Mount, is now growne ſtale, and deſpicable; A modell of this more exquiſite frame is ſent to Vrijah, the Prieſt; and muſt be ſampled in Ieruſalem.

It is a dangerous preſumption to make innovations, if but in the circumſtances of Gods worſhip. Thoſe humane additions which would ſeeme to grace the inſtitution of God, deprave it: That infinite wiſdome knowes beſt what will pleaſe it ſelfe, and preſcribes accordingly; The fooliſhneſſe of God is wiſer than the wiſedome of men; Idolatry and falſhood is commonly more gawdy and plauſible, than truth; That heart which can for the outward homelineſſe deſpiſe the ordinances of God, is alreadie alienated from true Religion, and lies open to the groſſeſt ſuperſtition.

Never any Prince was ſo foulely idolatrous, as that he wanted a Prieſt to ſecond him: An Vrijah is fit to humour an Ahaz. Greatneſſe could never command any thing, which ſome ſervile wits were not readie both to applaud, and juſtifie.

Ere the King can be returned from Damaſcus, the altar is finiſhed; It were happy if true godlines could be ſo forward in the proſecutions of good: Neither is this ſtrang pile reared only, but thruſt up betwixt Gods Altar, and the Temple; in an apparent precedencie, as if he had ſaid, Let the God of Iudah come behinde the Deities of Syria.

And

A And now, to make up the full measure of his impietie, this idolatrous King will himselfe be sacrificing upon his new altar, to his new gods; the gods of Damascus: An usurped priesthood well becomes a false Deitie. Because (saith he) the gods of the Kings of Syria helpe them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may helpe me.

Oh blinde superstition! how did the gods of Syria help their Kings, when both those Kings, and their gods were vanquished, and taken by the King of Assyria? Even this Damascus, and this altar were the spoile of a forraigne enemy; How then did the gods of Syria help their Kings, any other, than to their ruine? what dotage is this to make choyce of a foyled protection? But had the Syrians prospered, must their gods have the thankes? Are there no authors of good but blockes or Devills? Or is an outward prosperity the onely argument of truth, the onely motive of de-
B votion? O foolish Ahaz, it is the God thou hast forsaken, that plagues thee, under whose onely arme thou mightest have prevailed. His power beates those Pagan stockes, one against another, so, as one while, one seemes victorious, another vanquisht; and at last he confounds both, together with their proudest clients: Thy selfe shall be the best instance.

Of all the Kings of Iudah hitherto, there is none so dreadfull an example either of sin, or judgement, as this son of good Iotham. I abhorre to think that such a monster should descend from the loynes of David; where should be the period of this wickednesse? He began with the high places, thence he descends to the Calves of Dan and Bethel; from thence he falls to a Syrian altar, to the Syrian god; then from a part-
C nership he falls to an utter exclusion of the true God, and blocking up his Temple; and then to the sacrifice of his own son; and at last, as if hell were broken loose upon Gods inheritance, every severall City, every high place of Iudah hath a new god: No marvell if he be branded by the Spirit of God, with, This is that King Ahaz.

What a fearefull plague did this noy some deluge of sin leave behinde it, in the land of Iudah? who can expresse the horror of Gods revenge upon a people that should have been his? Pekah the King of Israel, slew an hundred and twenty thousand of them in one day: amongst whom was Maseiah the son of Ahaz: O just judgment of the Almighty! Ahaz sheds the blood of one sonne to an Idoll: The true God sheds the blood of another of his sons, in revenge.

Yet, the hand of the Lord is stretched out still:

Two hundred thousand of them were caried away by the Israelites captive, to D Samaria.

The Edomites came, and caried away another part of them for bondslaves, to their countrie:

The Philistims came up and shared the Cities of the South of Iudah, and the villages thereof; Shortly, what other is miserable Iudah, then the prey, and spoile of all the neighbouring Nations? For the Lord brought Iudah low because of Israel, for hee made Iudah naked, and transgressed sore against the Lord: As for the great King of Ashur, whom Ahaz purchased with the sacrilegious pillage of the house of God, in- 2 Chron.28.19.
stead of an ayde, he proves a burden; How ever he sped in his first on-sets, now, hee distressed Iudah, but strengthened it not: The charge was as great, as the benefit small: sooner shall he eate them out, than rescue them. No arme of flesh can shelter Ahaz
E from a vengeance.

Be wise, O yee Kings, be instructed O yee Judges of the earth; serve the Lord with feare, and rejoyce with trembling: Kisse the Son lest he be angry, and yee perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little.

His subjects complaine, that he dyed so late, and, as repenting that hee ever was, deny him a roome in the sepulchers of Kings: as if they said; the common earth of Ierusalem is too good for him that degenerated from his Progenitors, marred his Kingdome, depraved his people, forsooke his God.

The utter deſtruction of the Kingdome of Iſrael.

2 Kings 17.

IVdah was at a ſore heave; yet Iſrael ſhall miſ-carie before it: ſuch are the ſinnes of both, that they ſtrive whether ſhall fall firſt; but this lot muſt light upon the tenne Tribes; though the late King of Iudah were perſonally worſe than the moſt of Ieroboams ſucceſſors, yet the people were generally leſſe evill, upon whom the incroachments of Idolatrie were more by obtruſion than by conſent; beſides that, the thrones of Iudah had ſome interchanges of good Princes, Iſrael none at all: The ſame Juſtice therefore that made Iſrael a ſcourge to Iudah, made Aſſyria a ſcorpion to Iſrael.

It was the quarrell of Iudah that firſt ingaged the King of Aſhur in this warre againſt Iſrael; now he is not ſo eaſily fetcht off; So wee have ſeene ſome eager Maſtive, that hath been ſet on by the leaſt clap of the hand, but could not be looſned by the force of ſtaves.

Salmaneſer King of Aſſyria comes up againſt Hoſhea King of Iſrael, and ſubdues him; and puts him to his Tribute: This yoke was uncouth and unpleaſing; The vanquiſht Prince was neither able to reſiſt, nor willing to yeeld; ſecretly therefore hee treats with the King of Egypt for aſſiſtance, as deſiring rather to hazard his libertie by the hand of an equall, than to enjoy a quiet ſubjection under the hand of an overruling power; we cannot blame Princes to be jealous of their Soveraignties; The detaining of his yearely Tribute, and the whiſperings with new confederates, have drawne up the King of Aſhur to perfect his owne victories: He returnes therefore with a ſtrong power, and after three yeares ſiege, takes Samaria, impriſons Hoſhea, and in the exchange of a wofull captivity, he peoples Iſrael with Aſſyrians, and Aſſyria with Iſraelites. Now that abuſed ſoyle hath upon a ſurfet of wickedneſſe, caſt out her perfidious owners, and will try how it can fare with heatheniſh ſtrangers: Now the Aſſyrian gallants triumph in the Palaces of Samaria and Iezreel; whiles the Peeres and Captaines of Iſrael are driven manicled through the Aſſyrian ſtreetes, and billeted to the ſeverall places of their perpetuall ſervitude: Shortly, now the flouriſhing Kingdome of the ten Tribes is come to a finall and ſhamefull end; and ſo vaniſhed in this laſt diſſipation, that, ſince that day, no man could ever ſay, This was Iſrael.

Oh terrible example of vengeance, upon that peculiar people, whom God hath choſen for himſelfe, out of all the world: All the world were witneſſes of the favours of their miraculous deliverances, and protections; All the world ſhall be witneſſes of their juſt confuſion.

It is not in the power of ſleight errors to ſet off that infinite mercy: What was it, O God, what was it, that cauſed thee to caſt off thine owne inheritance? What but the ſame that made thee to caſt the Angells out of heaven? Even their rebellious ſinnes. Thoſe ſinnes dared to emulate the greatneſſe of thy mercies, no leſſe, than they forced the ſeverity of thy judgements: They left all the commandements of the Lord their God; and made them molten Images, even two Calves; and made a grove and worſhipped all the hoſt of heaven; and ſerved Baal; and cauſed their ſonnes and daughters to paſſe through the fire, and uſed divination, and enchantments, and ſold themſelves to doe evill in the ſight of the Lord to provoke him to anger.

Neither were theſe ſlips of frailty, or ignorant miſ-takings, but wilfull crimes, obſtinate impieties, in ſpight of the doctrines, reproofes, menaces, miraculous convictions of the holy Prophets, which God ſent amongſt them: Thy deſtruction is of thy ſelf, O Iſrael, what could the juſt hand of the Almighty do leſſe than conſume a nation ſo incorrigibly flagitious? A nation ſo unthankfull for mercies, ſo impatient of remedies, ſo uncapable of repentance: ſo obliged, ſo warned, ſo ſhameleſſely, ſo lawleſſely wicked?

What nation under heaven can now challenge an undefaiſible intereſt in God; when Iſrael it ſelf is caſt off? What Church in the world can ſhew ſuch deare love tokens

A kens from the Almighty as this, now-abhorred, and adulterous ſpouſe? He that ſpared not the naturall Olive, ſhall he ſpare the wilde? It is not for us ſinners of the Gentiles to be highminded, but awfull.

The Iſraelites are caried captive into Aſſyria; thoſe goodly Cities of the tenne Tribes may not lie waſte, and unpeopled: The wiſedome of the victor findes it fit to tranſplant his owne Colonies thither; that ſo he may raiſe profit thence, with ſecurity: From Babylon therefore, and Cuthah, and Ava, and Hamath, and Sepharvaim, doth he ſend of his owne ſubjects to poſſeſſe, and inhabit the Cities of Samaria. The land doth not brooke her new Tenants: They feared not the Lord; (how ſhould they, they knew him not?) Therefore the Lord ſent Lyons amongſt them which ſlew ſome of them: Not the veryeſt Pagan can be excuſed for his ignorance of God; Even the
B depravedſt nature might teach us to tremble at a Deitie; It is juſt with the Almighty not to put up neglect, where he hath beſtowed reaſon.

The brute creatures are ſent to revenge the quarrell of their Maker, upon worſe beaſts, than themſelves. Still hath God left himſelfe Champions in Iſrael: Lyons teare the Aſſyrians in pieces; and put them in minde, that, had it not beene for wickedneſſe, that land needed not to have changed maſters. The great Lord of the world cannot want meanes to plague offenders: If the men be gone, yet the beaſts are there; And if the beaſts had been gone, yet ſo long as there were ſtones in the walls, in the quarries, God would be ſure of avengers: There is no ſecurity but in being at peace with God.

The King of Aſſyria is ſued to, for remedy: Even theſe Pagans have learned to
C know that theſe Lyons were ſent from a God; that this puniſhment is for ſin; They know not the maner of the God of the land, therefore he hath ſent Lyons among them: Theſe blinde heathen that thinke every land hath a ſeverall God, yet, hold that God, worthy of his owne worſhip; yet, hold that worſhip muſt be grounded upon knowledge; the want of that knowledge, puniſhable; the puniſhment of that want, juſt and divine: How much worſe than Aſſyrians are they that are ready to aſcribe all calamities to nature, to chance? that acknowledging but one God of all the world, are yet careleſſe to know him, to ſerve him?

One of the Prieſts of Iſrael is appointed to be caried back to Samaria, to teach the Aſſyrian Colony the faſhions of the God of the land; not for devotion, but for impunity: vaine Politicians thinke to ſatisfie God by patching up religions; any
D formes are good enough for an unknowne deity: The Aſſyrian Prieſts teach, and practiſe the worſhip of their owne gods; The Iſraelitiſh Prieſt preſcribes the worſhip of the true God; The people will follow both; the one out of liking, the other out of feare: What a prodigious mixture was here of religions? true with falſe, Jewiſh with Paganiſh, divine with deviliſh; Every diviſion of theſe tranſplanted Aſſyrians had their ſeverall deities, high places, ſacrifices; This high Prieſt of Iſrael intercommons with every of them: So that now theſe fathers of Samaritaniſme, are in at all; They feare the Lord and ſerve their idols: No beggers cloake is more peeced than the Religion of theſe new inhabitants of Iſrael. I know not how their bodies ſped for the Lyons, I am ſure their ſoules fared the worſe for this medlie: Above all things God hates a mungrell devotion; If we be not all Iſrael, it were better
E to be all Aſſur; It cannot ſo much diſpleaſe God to be unknowne or neglected, as to be conſorted with Idols.

Hezekiah and Senacherib.

IN Iſrael is gone, Iudah is left ſtanding; or rather ſome few ſprigs of thoſe two Tribes: ſo we have ſeen in the ſhredding of ſome large Timber-tree, one or two boughs left at the top to hold up the ſap. Who can but lament the poore remainders of that languiſhing kingdome of David. Take out of the two Tribes of Iudah, and Benjamin, one hundred and twentie

2 Kings 18. and 19.

twentie thouſand whom Pekah the King of Iſrael ſlew in one day. Take out two hundred thouſand that were caried away captive to Samaria; Take out thoſe that were tranſported into the bondage of the Edomites; and thoſe that were ſubdued in the South parts, by the Philiſtims; alas what an handfull was left to the King of Iudah ſcarce worth the name of a dominion: Yet, even now, out of the gleeds of Iudah, doth God raiſe up a glorious light to his forlorne Church; yea, from the wretched loynes of Ahaz, doth God fetch an holy Hezekiah. It had been hard to conceive the ſtate of Iudah worſe than it was; neither was it more miſerable, than ſinfull, and in regard of both, deſperate; when beyond hope, God revives this dying ſtocke of David, and out of very ruines builds up his own houſe. Ahaz was not more the ill ſon of a good father, than he was the ill father of a good ſonne. He was the ill ſonne of good Iotham, the ill father of good Hezekiah; Good Hezekiah makes amends for his fathers impietie; and puts a new life into the heartleſſe remnant of Gods people. A B

The wiſdome of our good God knowes when his aide will be moſt ſeaſonable, moſt welcome; which he then loves to give, when he findes us left of all our hopes: That mercifull hand is reſerved for a dead lift; then, he failes us not.

Now, you might have ſeen this pious Prince buſily beſtirring himſelfe, in ſo late and needfull a reformation, removing the high places, battering and burning the Idols, demoliſhing their Temples, cutting downe their groves, opening the Temple, purging the altars, and veſſells, ſanctifying the Prieſts, rekindling the Lampes, renuing the incenſe, reinſtituting the ſacrifices, eſtabliſhing the order of Gods ſervice, appointing the courſes, ſetling the maintenance of the Miniſters, publiſhing the decrees for the long-neglected Paſſe-over; celebrating it, and the other feaſts, with due ſolemnity, incouraging the people, contributing bountifully to the offerings, and, in one word, ſo ordering all the affaires of God, as if he had been ſent downe from heaven to reſtore Religion; as if David himſelfe had been alive againe in this bleſſed heyre, not ſo much of his Crowne, as of his piety. Oh Iudah, happy in thy Hezekiah, Oh Hezekiah, happy in the gratious reſtauration of thy Iudah: Ahaz ſhall have no thanke for ſuch a ſonne; The God that is able of the very ſtones to raiſe children to Abraham, raiſes a true ſeed of David out of the corrupt loynes of an Idolater: That infinite mercy is not tyed to the termes of an immediate propagation: For the ſpace of three hundred yeers, the man after Gods owne heart had no perfect heire till now; Till now did the high places ſtand: the devotions of the beſt Princes of Iudah were blemiſhed with ſome weake omiſſions; Now the zeale of good Hezekiah cleares all thoſe defects, and workes an entire change. C D

How ſeaſonably hath the providence of God kept the beſt man for the worſt times? When God hath a great worke to doe, he knowes to fit himſelfe with inſtruments.

No marvell if the Paganiſh Idols goe to wrack, when even the brazen Serpent that Moſes had made by Gods owne appointment, is broken in peeces: The Iſraelites were ſtung with fiery Serpents, this brazen Serpent healed them, which they did no ſooner ſee, than they recovered: But now, ſuch was the venome of the Iſraelitiſh Idolatry, that this Serpent of braſſe, ſtung worſe than the fiery; That, which firſt cured by the eye, now by the eye poyſoned the ſoule; That which was at firſt, the type of a Saviour, is now, the deadly Engine of the Enemie. Whiles it helped, it ſtood; it ſtood whiles it hurt not; but when once wicked abuſe hath turned it into an Idoll; what was it but Nehuſhtan? E

The holineſſe of the firſt inſtitution cannot priviledge ought from the danger of a future profanation; nor, as the caſe may ſtand, from an utter abolition: What antiquity, what authority, what primary ſervice might this Serpent have pleaded? All that cannot keep it out of the duſt. Thoſe things which are neceſſary in their being, beneficiall in their continuance, may ſtill remaine when their abuſe is purged; but thoſe things whoſe uſe is but temporary, and whoſe duration is needleſſe and unprofitable, may ceaſe with the occaſion, & much more periſh with an inſeparable abuſe. Hezekiah willingly forgets who made the Serpent, when he ſees the Iſraelites make it an Idoll: It is no leſſe intolerable for God, to have a rivall of his owne making.

Since

A Since Hezekiah was thus, above all his Anceſtors, upright with the Lord; it is no marvell if the Lord were with him; if he proſpered, whitherſoever he went; The ſame God that would have his juſtice magnified in the confuſion of the wicked Princes of Iſrael, and Iudah, would have his mercy no leſſe acknowledged, in the bleſſings of faithfull Hezekiah.

The great King of Aſſyria had in a ſort ſwallowed up both the Kingdomes of Iudah, and Iſrael; yet not with an equall cruelty; He made Iſrael captive, Iudah (upon a willing compoſition) tributary. Iſrael is vaniſhed in a tranſportation; Iudah continues under the homage wherein Ahaz left it: Hezekiah had raigned but ſix yeers when he ſaw his neighbours of Iſrael packing into a miſerable captivity; and the proud Aſſyrians Lording in their Cities; yet, even then, when he ſtood alone, in a
B corner of Iudah, durſt Hezekiah draw his neck out of the yoke of the great, and victorious Monarch of Aſſyria; and, as if one enemy had not been enough, at the ſame time, he falls upon the incroaching Philiſtims, and prevailes. It is not to be aſked, what powers a man can make, but in what termes he ſtands with heaven. The unworthy father of Hezekiah had clogged Iudah with this ſervile fealtie to the Aſſyrian; what the conditions of that ſubjection were, it is too late, and needleſſe for us to inquire; If this payment were limited to a period of time, the expiration acquitted him; If upon covenants of ayde, the ceſſation thereof acquitted him; If the Reforming of Religion, and baniſhment of Idolatry ranne under the cenſure of rebellion, the quarrell on Hezekiahs part, was holy; on Senacheribs unjuſt: but if the reſtipulation were abſolute, & the withdrawing of this homage upon none but civil grouds,
C I cannot excuſe the good King from a juſt offence: It was an humane frailtie in an obliged Prince, by force to effect a free and independant Soveraignty.

What doe we mince that fact, which holy Hezekiah himſelfe cenſures? I have offended, returne from me, what thou putſt on me will I beare. The comfort of liberty may not be had with an unwarranted violence. Holineſſe cannot free us from infirmity: It was a weakneſſe to doe that act, which muſt be ſoone undone with much repentance, and more loſſe; This revolt ſhall coſt Hezekiah (beſides much humiliation) three hundred yeerly Talents of ſilver, thirty Talents of gold: How much better had it been for the Cities of Iudah to have purchaſed their peace with an eaſie Tribute, than war with intolerable taxation?

Fourteene yeers had good Hezekiah fed upon a ſweet peace, ſauced onely with a
D ſet penſion; now he muſt prepare his Pallat for the bitter morſels of war. The King of Aſſyria is comne up againſt all the defenced Cities of Iudah; and hath taken them: Hezekiah is faine to buy him out with too many Talents; The poore Kingdome of Iudah is exhauſt, with ſo deep a payment; in ſo much as the King is forced to borrow of God himſelfe, for Hezekiah gave him all the ſilver that was found in the houſe of the Lord; yea, at that time did Hezekiah cut off the gold from the doores of the Temple of the Lord, and from the Pillars which he had over-laid, and gave it to the King of Aſſyria. How hard was good Hezekiah driven, ere he would be thus bold with his God? Surely if the mines, or Coffers of Iudah could have yeelded any ſupply, this ſhift had beene hatefull; to fetch back for an enemie, that which he had given to his Maker: Onely neceſſity excuſes that from ſacriledge in the ſon, which will, made ſacriledge in the
E father: That which is once devoted to a ſacred uſe, may not be called back to a profane: But he whoſe the earth is, and the fulneſſe of it, is not ſo taken with our metals, that he ſhould more regard our gold, than our welfare: His goodneſſe cannot grudge any outward thing for the price of our peace: To rob God out of covetouſneſſe, or wantonneſſe, or neglect is juſtly damnable; we cannot rob him out of our need; for then he gives us all we take; and bids us ranſome our lives, our liberties; The treaſures of Gods houſe were precious, for his ſake, to whom they were conſecrated; but more precious in the ſight of the Lord was the life of any one of his Saints.

Every true Iſraelite was the ſpirituall houſe of God; why ſhould not the doore of the materiall Temple be willingly ſtripped, to ſave the whole frame of the ſpirituall Temple. Take therefore, O Hezekiah, what thou haſt given, no gold is too holy to redeeme thy vexation: It matters not ſo much how bare the doores of the Temple be,

be, in a case of necessity, as how well the insides be furnished with sincere devotion. O the cruell hard heartednesse of those men which will rather suffer the living Temples of God to be ruined, than they will ransome their life, with farthings. A

It could not be, but that the store of needy Iudah must soone be drawne dry with so deep an exaction, that summe cannot be sent, because it cannot bee raised: The cruell Tyrant calls for his Bricks whiles he allowes no straw; His anger is kindled because Hezekiahs Coffers have a bottome; with a mighty host doth hee come up against Ierusalem; therefore shall that City bee destroyed by him, because by him it hath been impoverished; the inhabitants must be slaves, because they are beggers.

Oh lamentable, and, in sight, desperate condition of distressed Ierusalem: wealth it had none; strength it had, but a little; all the Country round about was subdued to the Assyrian; that proud victor hath begirt the walls of it, with an innumerable army, scorning that such a shovell-full of earth should stand out but one day; Poore Ierusalem stands alone, blocked up with a world of enemies, helpelesse, friendlesse, comfortlesse; looking for the worst of an hostile fury; when Tartan and Rabsaris, and Rabshakeh, the great Captaines of the Assyrians call to a parlee. Hezekiah sends to them three of his prime officers, his Steward, his Secretary, his Recorder. Lord, what insolent blasphemies doth that foule mouth of Rabshakeh belch out against the living God, against his anointed servant? B

How plausibly doth he discourage the subjects of Hezekiah, how proudly doth he insult upon their impotency, how doth hee brave them with base offers of advantage; and lastly, how cunningly doth he fore-lay their confidence (which was only left them) in the Almighty, protesting not to bee comne up thither without the Lord; The Lord said to me, Go up to this land, and destroy it; How fearefull a word was this? The rest were but vaine cracks, this was a thunderbolt to strike dead the heart of Hezekiah; If Rabshakeh could have been beleeved, Ierusalem could not but have flowne open; How could it thinke to stand out no lesse against God, than men? Even thus doth the great enemy of mankinde; if he can dishearten the soule from a dependance upon the God of mercies, the day is his: Lewd miscreants care not how they bely God for their owne purposes. C

Eliakim the Steward of Hezekiah well knew, how much the people must needs be affected with this pernicious suggestion; and faine would therefore, if not stop that wicked mouth, yet divert these blasphemies into a foraigne expression. I wonder that any wise man should look for favour from an enemy: Speake I pray thee, to thy servants in the Syrian language: What was this but to teach an adversary how to doe mischiefe? Wherefore came Rabshakeh thither but to gall Hezekiah, to withdraw his subjects? That tongue is propereſt for him which may hurt most; Deprecations of evill to a malicious man are no better than advices. An unknowne idiome is fit to keep counsell; they are familiar words that must convey ought to the understanding. Lewd men are the worse for admonitions. D

Rabshakeh had not so strained his throat to corrupt the citizens of Ierusalem, had it not been for the humble obtestation of Eliakim; Now hee reares up his voice, and holds his sides, and roares out his double blasphemies; one while affrighting the people with the great power of the mighty King of Assyria; another while debasing the contemptible force of Hezekiah; now smoothly alluring them, with the assurances of a safe and successefull yeeldance; then, discouraging them with the impossibility of their deliverance; laying before them the fearefull examples of greater nations vanquished, by that sword, which was now shaken over them; triumphing in the impotency, & miscariage of their gods: Who are they among all the gods of the Countries, that have delivered their Country out of mine hand, That the Lord should deliver Ierusalem out of mine hand? Where are the gods of Arpad, and of Hamath? Where? but in that hellish darknesse, that is ordained both for them, and for thee, barbarous Assyrian, that dareſt thus open thy mouth against thy Maker: And can those Atheous eyes of thine see no difference of gods? Is there no distance betwixt a stock, or stone, and that infinite Deity that made heaven and earth? It is enough that thou now feeleſt it; thy torments have taught thee too late, that thou affrontedst a living God. E

How

A How did the fingers and tongues of theſe Jewiſh Peeres and people itch to be at Rabſhakeh; in a revengefull anſwer to thoſe impieties: All is huſht; not a word ſounds from thoſe walls: I doe not more wonder at Hezekiahs wiſdome, in commanding ſilence, than at the ſubjects obedience in keeping it; This railer could not bee more ſpighted, than with no anſwer; and, if he might be exaſperated, he could not bee reformed; beſides, the rebounding of thoſe multiplyed blaſphemies, might leave ſome ill impreſſions in the multitude; This ſulphurous flaſk, therefore, dyes in his owne ſmoak: onely leaving an hatefull ſtench behinde it.

Good Hezekiah cannot eaſily paſſe over this deviliſh oratory; no ſooner doth he heare of it, than he rends his clothes, and covers himſelfe with ſackcloth, and betakes himſelfe to the houſe of the Lord; and ſends his officers, and the graveſt of
B the Prieſts, clad in ſack-cloth, to Eſay the Prophet of God, with a dolefull and querulous meſſage.

Oh the noble piety of Hezekiah! notwithſtanding all the ſtraits of the ſiege, and the danger of ſo powerfull an enemy; I finde not the garments of this good King, any otherwiſe than whole, and unchanged; but now ſo ſoone as ever a blaſphemie is uttered againſt the Majeſtie of his God, (though by a Pagan dog) his cloathes are torne, and turned into ſackcloth: There can bee no better argument of an upright heart, than to be more ſenſible of the indignities offered to God, than of our owne dangers. Even theſe deſperate reproaches ſend Hezekiah to the Temple: The more we ſee Gods name prophaned, the more ſhall we, if wee bee truely religious, love and honour it.

C Whither ſhould Hezekiah run but to the Temple, to the Prophet? There, there is the refuge of all faithfull ones; where they may ſpeake with God, where they may be ſpoken to from God, and fetch comfort from both: It is not poſſible that a beleeving heart ſhould be diſappointed: Iſaiah ſends that meſſage to the good King, that may dry up his teares, and cheere his countenance, and change his ſuit; Thus ſaith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words which thou haſt heard, with which the ſervants of the King of Syria have blaſphemed me; Behold, I will ſend a blaſt upon him; & he ſhall heare a rumor, and ſhall returne to his own Land; and I will cauſe him to fall by the ſword in his own Land.

Loe; even whiles Senacherib was in the height of his jollity and aſſurance; Gods Prophet fore-ſees his ruine; and gives him for dead, whiles that Tyrant thought
D of nothing but life and victory. Proud and ſecure worldlings little dreame of the neere approach of their judgements: whiles they are plotting their deepeſt deſignes, the over-ruling juſtice of the Almighty hath contrived their ſudden confuſion, and ſees, and ſets them their day.

Rabſhakeh returnes, and finding the King of Aſſyria warring againſt Libnah, reports to him the ſilent, (and therein) contemptuous anſwer, and firme reſolutions of Hezekiah; In the meane time God pulls Senacherib by the eare, with the newes of the approaching armie of Tirhakah King of Ethiopia, which was comming up to raiſe the ſiege; and to ſuccour his confederates: That dreadfull power will not allow the Aſſyrian King, in perſon to lead his other forces up againſt Ieruſalem, nor to continue his former Leaguer long before thoſe walls. But now, he writes big words to Hezeki-
E ah, and thinkes with his thundering menaces to beat open the gates, and levell the bulwarks of Ieruſalem: Like the true maſter of Rabſhakeh, he reviles the God of Heaven; and baſely parallels him with the dunghill deities of the heathen.

Good Hezekiah gets him into his ſanctuarie; there he ſpreads the letter before the Lord; and calls to the God that dwells betweene the Cherubims, to revenge the blaſphemies of Senacherib, to protect and reſcue himſelfe, and his people. Every one of thoſe words pierced heaven; which was no leſſe open to mercy unto Hezekiah, than, vengeance to Senacherib; Now is Iſaiah addreſſed with a ſecond meſſage of comfort to him, who doubtleſſe diſtruſted not the firſt: only the reiteration of that furious blaſphemie made him take faſter hold, by his faithfull devotion. Now, the jealous God in a diſdaine of ſo blaſphemous a conteſtation, riſes up in a ſtile of Majeſtie, and glorioufly tramples upon this ſaucie inſolencie,

Becauſe

Becauſe thy rage againſt me, and thy tumult is come up into mine eares, therefore I will put my hooke into thy noſe, and my bridle into thy lips: and will turne thee backe by the way thou cameſt. Loe Senacherib, the God of heaven makes a beaſt of thee, who haſt ſo brutiſhly ſpurned at his name; If thou be a ravenous Beare, he hath an hooke for thy noſthrils: If thou be a reſtie horſe, he hath a bridle for thy mouth; In ſpight of thee thou ſhalt follow his hooke, or his bridle; and ſhalt bee led to thy juſt ſhame by either. A

It is not for us to be the Lords of our owne actions; Thus ſaith the Lord concerning the King of Aſſyria; He ſhall not come into this City, nor ſhoot an arrow there, nor come before it with ſhield, nor caſt a bank againſt it, by the way that he came ſhall he returne, &c. Impotent men, what are we in the hands of the Almighty? we purpoſe, he over-rules; we talk of great matters, and think to doe wonders; he blowes upon our projects, and they vaniſh with our ſelves: He that hath ſet bounds to the Sea, hath appointed limits to the rage of the proudeſt enemies; yea, even the Devils themſelves are confined; Why boaſt yee your ſelves, O yee Tyrants, that ye can doe miſchiefe; yee are ſtinted: and even within thoſe liſts, is confuſion. B

O the Trophees of divine Juſtice, That very night the Angell of the Lord went out, and ſmote in the campe of the Aſſyrians an hundred foureſcore and five thouſand, and when they roſe early in the morning, behold they were all dead corps.

How ſpeedy an execution was this, how miraculous? No humane arme ſhall have the glory of this victory; It was God that was defied by that preſumptuous Aſſyrian; It is God that ſhall right his owne wrongs; Had the Egyptian, or Ethiopian forces been come up, though the ſame God had done this worke by them, yet ſome praiſe of this ſlaughter had perhaps cleaved to their fingers. Now an inviſible hand ſheds all this blood; that his very enemies may cleare him from all partnerſhip of revenge. Goe now wicked Senacherib, and tell of the gods of Hamath and Arpad, & Sepharuaim, and Hena, and Iuah, which thou haſt deſtroyed, and ſay, that Hezekiahs God is but as one of theſe: Goe, and adde this Deity to the number of thy conqueſts: Now ſay, that Hezekiahs God in whom he truſted hath deceived him, and graced thy Triumphs. C

With ſhame and griefe enough is that ſheaped Tyran returned to his Ninivie, having left behinde him, all the pride and ſtrength of Aſſyria, for compoſt to the Jewiſh fields. Well were it for thee O Senacherib, if thou couldſt eſcape thus; vengeance waits for thee at home, and welcomes thee into thy place; whiles thou art worſhiping in the houſe of Niſroch thy god, two of thine owne ſons ſhall be thine executioners. See now if that falſe Deitie of thine can preſerve thee from that ſtroke which the true God ſends thee by the hand of thine owne fleſh; He that ſlew thine hoaſt by his Angels, ſlayes thee by thy ſons: The ſame Angell that killed all thoſe thouſands, could as eaſily have ſmitten thee; but he rather reſerves thee for the further torment of an unnaturall ſtroke, that thou mayeſt ſee too late, how eaſie it is for him in ſpight of thy god, to arme thine owne loynes againſt thee. D

Thou art avenged, O God, thou art avenged plentifully of thine enemies. Whoſoever ſtrives with thee, is ſure to gaine nothing but loſſe, but ſhame, but death, but hell. The Aſſyrians are ſlaine, Senacherib is rewarded for his blaſphemy: Ieruſalem is reſcued, Hezekiah rejoyces, the nations wonder and tremble. O love the Lord all ye Saints, for the Lord preſerveth the faithfull, and plenteouſly rewardeth the proud doer. E

Hezekiah ſicke, recovered, viſited.

2 Kings 20.

HEzekiah was freed from the ſiege of the Aſſyrians, but hee is ſurpriſed with a diſeaſe: hee that delivered him from the hand of his enemies, ſmites him with ſickneſſe: God doth not let us looſe from all afflictions, when he redeemes us from one.

To thinke that Hezekiah was either not thankefull enough for

A for his deliverance, or too much lifted up with glory of ſo miraculous a favour; were an injurious miſ-conſtruction of the hand of God; and an uncharitable cenſure of an holy Prince: For, though no fleſh and blood can avoid the juſt deſert of bodily puniſhment, yet God doth not alwayes ſtrike with an intuition of ſinne; ſometimes he regards the benefit of our triall; ſometimes the glory of his mercy in our cure.

It was no ſleight diſtemper, that ſeized upon Hezekiah, but a diſeaſe both painful, and fierce, and in nature deadly. O God, how thou laſheſt even thoſe whom thou loveſt: Hadſt thou ever any ſuch dearling in the throne of Iudah, as Hezekiah? Yet hee no ſooner breatheth from a miſerable ſiege, than he panteth under a mortall ſickneſſe: when as yet he had not ſo much as the comfort of a child to ſucceed him, thy Prophet is ſent to him with the heavy meſſage of his death, Set thine houſe in order,
B for thou ſhalt die and not live. It is no ſmall mercie of God that he gives us warning of our end; we ſhall make an ill uſe of ſo gratious a premonition, if we make not a meet preparation for our paſſage. Even thoſe that have not an houſe, yet have a ſoule; no ſoule can want importāt affaires to be ordered for a final diſſolutiō; the neglect of this beſt thrift is deſperate. Set thy ſoule in order, O man, for thou ſhalt die and not live.

If God had given Hezekiah a ſon, nature had bequeathed his eſtate; now, he muſt ſtudie to finde heires: Even theſe outward things, (though in themſelves worthleſſe) require our carefull diſpoſition, to thoſe we leave behinde us; and if we have delayed theſe thoughts, till then, our ſicke beds may not complaine of their importunity; We cannot leave to our families a better legacie, than Peace.

Never was the Prophet Eſay unwelcome to this good King, untill now: Even ſad
C tidings muſt be caried by thoſe meſſengers, which would be faithfull: neither may we regard ſo much how they will be taken, as by whom they are ſent.

It was a bold and harſh word to ſay to a King, Thou ſhalt die, and not live. I doe not heare Hezekiah rage, and fret at the meſſage; or threat the bearer, but hee meekely turnes his face to the wall, and weepes, and prayes: Why to the wall? Was it for the greater ſecrecie of his devotion? was it for the more freedome from all diſtraction? was it that the paſſion which accompanied his prayer, might have no witneſſes? Or, was it for that this wall lookt towards the Temple, which his heart and eyes ſtil moved unto, though his feet could not?

Howſoever, the patient ſoule of good Hezekiah turnes it ſelfe to that holy God, from whom he ſmarts, and bleeds; and poures out it ſelfe into a fervent deprecation,
D I beſeech thee, O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart; and have done that which is good in thy ſight.

Couldſt thou feare, O Hezekiah, that God had forgotten thine integritie? The grace that was in thee, was his owne worke; could he in thee neglect himſelfe? Or doſt thou therefore doubt of his remembrance of thy faithfulneſſe, becauſe he ſummons thee to receive the crowne of thy faithfulneſſe, glory, and immortality? wherin canſt thou be remembred, if this be to forget thee? What challenge is this? Is God a debter to thy perfection? Hath thine holy cariage merited any thing from that infinite juſtice? Far, far were theſe preſumptuous conceits from that humble and mortified ſoule: Thou hadſt hated thine owne breſt, if it could once have harboured ſo proud a thought. This perfection of thine was no other, then an honeſt ſoundneſſe
E of heart, and life, which thou knoweſt God had promiſed to reward: It was the mercy of the covenant that thou pleadedſt, not the merit of thine obedience.

Every one of theſe words were ſteeped in teares: But what meant theſe words, theſe teares? I heare not of any ſuit moved by Hezekiah; onely hee wiſhes to be remembred, in that which could never be forgotten, though he ſhould have intreated for an oblivion.

Speake out Hezekiah, what is it that thy teares crave, whiles thy lips expreſſe not? O let me live, and I ſhall praiſe thee O God.

In a naturall man none could wonder at this paſſionate requeſt; who can but wonder at it, in a Saint? whoſe happineſſe doth but then beginne, when his life ceaſeth: whoſe miſery doth but then end, when his death enters: the word of faith, is, Oh let me die, that I may enjoy thee. How then doth the good King crie at the newes

of that death, which ſome reſolute Pagans have intertained with ſmiles? Certainely, the beſt man cannot ſtrip himſelfe of ſome fleſh; and whiles nature hath an undeniable ſhare in him, he cannot but retaine ſome ſmatch of the ſweetneſſe of life, of the horror of diſſolution; Both theſe were in Hezekiah, neither of them could tranſport him into this paſſion: they were higher reſpects that ſwayed with ſo holy a Prince; a tender care of the glory of God, a carefull pittie of the Church of God; His very teares ſaid; O God, thou knoweſt that the eyes of the world are bent upon me, as one that hath abandoned their Idolatry, and reſtored thy ſincere worſhip; I ſtand alone in the midſt of a wicked and idolatrous generation, that lookes thorough all my actions, all my events; If now they ſhall ſee mee ſnatcht away in the midſt of my dayes, what will theſe Heathen ſay; how can thy great name but ſuffer in this my untimely extinction? A

Beſides, what will become of thy poore Church, which I ſhall leave feebly religious, and as yet ſcarce warme, in the courſe of a pious reformation? how ſoone ſhall it be miſerably over-growne with ſuperſtition, and heatheniſme; how ſoone ſhall the wilde Boare of Aſſyria root up this little vineyard of thine? What need I beſeech thee, O Lord, to regard thy name, to regard thine inheritance? B

What one teare of Hezekiah can run waſte? What can that good King pray for, unheard, unanſwered? Senacherib came in a proud confidence to ſwallow up his city, and people: prayers and teares ſend him away confounded: Death comes to ſwallow up his perſon, (and that not without authority;) prayers and teares ſend him away diſappointed. Before Iſaiah was gone out into the middle Court, the word of the Lord came to him, ſaying, Turne againe, and tell Hezekiah the Captaine of my people; Thus ſaith the Lord, the God of David thy father; I have heard thy prayer, I have ſeen thy teares; behold I will heale thee; On the third day thou ſhalt goe up to the houſe of the Lord; and I will adde to thy dayes fifteene yeares. C

What ſhall we ſay then, O God; haſt thou thus ſoone changed thy purpoſe? Was it not thy true meſſage which thy Prophet, even now, delivered to Hezekiah? Is ſomewhat falne out that thou fore-ſaweſt not? or doeſt thou now decree ſomewhat thou meaneſt not? The very thought of any of theſe were no better than blaſphemous impiety. Certainely, Hezekiah could not live one day longer, than was eternally decreed; The decree of Gods eternall counſell had from everlaſting determined him fifteene yeares yet longer: Why then doth God ſay, by his Prophet, Thou ſhalt die, and not live? He is not as man that he ſhould repent; the meſſage is changed the will is not changed; yea rather the meſſage is explicated, not changed; For the ſignified will of God, though it ſound abſolutely, yet muſt be underſtood with condition; that tells Hezekiah what he muſt expect from the nature of his diſeaſe, what would befall him, without his deprecations: There was nothing but death in the ſecond cauſes, what ever ſeeret purpoſe there was in the firſt; and that purpoſe ſhall lie hid for a time, under a reſerved condition: The ſame decree that ſayes, Ninive ſhall bee deſtroyed, meanes, if Ninive repent, it ſhall not bee deſtroyed; hee that findes good reaſon to ſay, Hezekiah ſhall dy, yet ſtill meanes, if the quickned devotion of Hezekiah ſhall importune me for life, it ſhall bee protracted. And the ſame God that hath decreed this addition of fifteene yeares, had decreed to ſtirre up the ſpirit of Hezekiah, to that vehement and weeping importunitie, which ſhould obtaine it. O God, thou workeſt thy good pleaſure in us, and with us; and by thy revealed will moveſt us in thoſe wayes, whereby thou effecteſt thy ſecret will. D E

How wonderfull is this mercy? Hezekiahs teares are not dry upon his checkes, yea his breath is not paſſed his lips, when God ſends him a comfortable anſwer. How carefull is the God of compaſſions, that his holy ſervant ſhould not languiſh one houre, in the expectation of his denounced death? What ſpeed was here, as in the errand, ſo in the act of recovery? Within three dayes ſhall Hezekiah bee upon his feete; yea his feete ſhall ſtand in the Courts of Gods houſe; he that now in his bed, ſighes and groanes and weeps out a petition, ſhall then ſing out a thankſgiving in the Temple. O thou that heareſt the prayer, unto thee ſhall all fleſh come:

With

A With what cheerefull aſſurance ſhould wee approach to the throne of that grace; which never failed any ſuppliant.

Neither was this grant more ſpeedy, than bountifull; we are wont to reckon ſeven yeares for the life of a man; and now, behold, more than two lives hath God added to the age of Hezekiah. How unexampled a favour is this? who ever but Hezekiah knew his period ſo long before? the fixedneſſe of his terme, is no leſſe mercie, than the protraction; we muſt be content to live or die at uncertainties; we are not worthy to calculate the date of our own times: Teach us, O Lord, ſo to number our dayes, that we may apply our hearts to wiſedome.

There is little joy in many dayes, if they be evil; Ezekiah ſhall not be bleſſed only with life, but with peace; The proud Aſſyrian threatens an invaſion; his late foyle
B ſtill ſtickes in his ſtomacke, and ſtirs him to a revenge; the hooke is in his noſtrils, he cannot move whither he liſt; The God of heaven will maintaine his owne quarrell: I will defend this City for mine owne ſake, and for my ſervant Davids ſake. Loe; for his life Ezekiah is beholden (next under the infinite goodneſſe of God) to his prayers; for his protection, to the deare memory of his father David; ſurely for ought wee find, Ezekiah was no leſſe upright, and leſſe offenſive than David; yet both Ezekiah and Jeruſalem ſhall fare the better for Davids ſake, above three hundred yeares after.

To that man after his owne heavt, had God ingaged himſelfe, by his gracious promiſe, to preſerve his throne, his ſeed: God loves to remember his ancient mercies: How happy a thing is it to be faithfull with God; this is the way to oblige thoſe
C which are yet unborne; and to intayle bleſſings upon the ſucceſſions of future generations.

It ſeemes it was ſome peſtilent ulcer that thus indangered the life of Hezekiah. Iſaiah is not a Prophet onely, but a Phyſitian. And Iſaiah ſaid, Take a lump of figs: He that gave an aſſurance of recovery, gives a receit for the recovery. The decree of God includes the meanes: neither can the medicine worke without a word; neither will the word worke without the medicine; both of them muſt meet in the cure: If wee ſo truſt the promiſe, that we neglect the preſcript, wee preſume to no purpoſe. Happy is that ſoule, that ſo regards the promiſe of Gods Prophets, as that withall he receives their counſels.

Nothing could be more proper for the ripening of hard and purulent tumors, than D dry figs; Herein Iſaiahs direction was according to nature; Wherefore ſhould we balke the ordinary road, where it is both faire and neere?

The ſudden contradiction of the meſſage cauſes a juſt difficulty in the aſſent. Hezekiah therefore craves a ſigne; not for that he diſtruſted; but that he might truſt the more; we can never take too faſt hold of thoſe promiſes of God, which have not more comfort in the application, than naturall impoſſibility in the performance. We beleeve, Lord, helpe our unbeleefe.

The ſick King hath his option; His father was offerd a ſigne and refuſed it; he ſues for one, and obtaines it: Shall the ſhadow go forward ten degrees, or backe ten degrees? As if heaven it ſelfe lay open to his choice; and were ready either to mend his pace, or retire for his confirmation; What creature is not cheerefully forward to obey the E faith of Gods ſervants.

Hezekiah faſtens rather upon that ſigne which is more hard, more diſagreeing from the courſe of nature; not without good reaſon; Every proofe muſt be clearer than the thing to be prooved, neither may there want a meet proportion betwixt both; now the going forward of the ſhadow was a motion, no other than naturall, the recovery of that peſtilent diſeaſe was againſt the ſtreame of nature; the more difficult ſigne therefore, the ſurer evidence.

Whether ſhall we more wonder at the meaſure of the love of God to Hezekiah, or at the power of Iſaiahs faith in God? Out of both, either the Sun goes back in heaven that his ſhadow may go back on earth, or the ſhadow no leſſe miraculouſly goes backe on earth, whiles the Sun goes forward in heaven. It is true that the Prophet ſpeakes of the ſhadow, not of the Sun; except perhaps becauſe the motion of the Sun is best discerned by the shadow; and the motion of the shadow is led by the course of the Sun: besides that, the demonstration of this miracle is reported to be locall in the Diall of Ahaz, not universall, in the sensible length of the day; withall, the retrait of the Sunne had made a publike and noted change in the frame of nature; this particular alteration of the shadow in places limited, might satisfie no lesse without a confusive mutation in the face of the world; Whethersoever; to draw the Sunne backe together with the shadow; or to draw the shadow backe without the Sunne was the proofe of a divine omnipotence; able therefore to draw backe the life of Hezekiah, fifteene degrees, from the night of death, towards which it was hasting. O God, thou wilt rather alter the course of heaven and earth, than the faith of thy children shall fincke for want of supportation.

It should seeme the Babylonians finding the Assyrians power abated by the revengefull hand of Gods Angell, and their own discord, tooke this advantage of a revolt; and now to strengthen their part, fall in with Hezekiah King of Judah, whom they found the old enemy to the Assyrians, and the great favourite of heaven: Him they wooe with gifts; him they congratulate with Ambassages: The fame of Hezekiahs sicknesse, recovery, forme, and assurance of cure, have drawne thither messengers, and presents from Berodach Baladan King of Babylon.

The Caldees were curious searchers into the secrets of nature, especially into the motions of the celestiall bodies; Though there had beene no politicke relations, this very Astronomicall miracle had been enough to fetch them to Jerusalem, that they might see the man, for whose sake the Sunne forsooke his place, or the shadow forsooke the Sunne.

How easily have wee seene those holy men mis-carried by prosperity, against whom no miseries could prevaile? He that stood out stoutly against all the Assyrian onsets, clinging the faster to his God, by how much he was harder assaulted by Senacherib, melteth now with these Babylonian favours, and runs abroad into offensive weaknesses.

The Babylonian Ambassadors are too welcome to Ezekiah; As a man transported with the honor of their respective and costly visitations, he forgets his teares, and his turning to the wall; he forgets their incompatible Idolatry; so hugging them in his bosome, as if there had beene no cause of strangenesse: All his doores flie open to them; and in a vaineglorious ostentation all his new-gathered treasures, al his strong armories entertaine their eyes; nothing in his house, nothing in his Dominion is hid from them.

Oh Hezekiah, what meanes this impotent ambition? It is not long since thou tarest off the very plates of the Temple doores, to give unto Senacherib; and can thy treasures be suddenly so multiplied, that they can be worthy to astonish forraine beholders? Or, if thy storehouse were as rich as the earth, can thy heart be so vaine as to be lifted up with these heavy metals? Didst thou not see that heaven it selfe was at thy becke, whilest thou wert humbled? and shall a little earthly drosse have power over thy soule? Can the flattering applause of strangers let thee loose into a proud joy, whom the late message of Gods Prophet resolved into teares? O God, if thou do not keep us, as well in our sun-shine, as in our storme, we are sure to perish: As in all time of our tribulation, so in all time of our wealth, good Lord deliver us.

Alas, how sleight doth this weaknesse seeme in our eyes, to rejoyce in the abundance of Gods blessings? to call in forraine friends to be witnesses of our plenty? to raise our conceits, some little, upon the acclamations of others, upon the value of our owne abilities?

Lay thy hand upon thy mouth, O foolish flesh and bloud, when thou seest the censure of thy Maker.

Isaiah the Prophet is sent speedily to Hezekiah, with a sharpe and heart-breaking message: Behold, the dayes come that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried into Babylon; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord; And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away, and they shall be Eunuches in the Palace of the King of Babylon.

No

No ſin can be light in Hezekiah: the holineſſe of the perſon addes to the unholineſſe of the act; Eminency of profeſſion doubles both the offence, and the judgment. This glory ſhall end in an ignominious loſſe.

The great and holy God wil not digeſt pride in any, much leſſe in his owne. That which was the ſubject of Hezekiahs ſin, ſhall be the matter of his puniſhment; thoſe with whom he ſinned, ſhall be his avengers; It was his treaſure & munition, wherein he prides himſelfe to theſe men of Babylon: The men of Babylon ſhall carry away his treaſure and munition; What now doth Hezekiah but tempt them with a glorious bootie; as ſome fond traveler that would ſhow his gold to a Theefe?

Theſe worldly things are furtheſt off from the heart; Perhaps Hezekiah might not be much troubled with their loſſe: Loe, God comes cloſer to him, yet.

As yet was Hezekiah childleſſe; how much better had it bin to continue ſo ſtil, than to be plagued in his iſſue? He ſhall now beget children to ſervitude; his loynes ſhall yeeld Pages to the Court of Babylon: whiles he ſees them borne Princes, he ſhall foreſee them made Eunuches in a forraigne Palace: What comfort can he take in the wiſhes and hopes of ſons, when ere they be borne, he heares them deſtin'd to captivity and bondage?

This rod was ſmart, yet good Hezekiah kiſſes it; his heart ſtruck him no leſſe, than the mouth of the Prophet; meekely therefore doth he yeild to this divine correction; Good is the Word of the Lord which thou haſt ſpoken. Thou haſt ſpoken this word, but from the Lord; it is not thine, but his; and being his, it muſt needs be, like himſelfe, good: Good, becauſe it is juſt, for I have deſerved more, and worſe; Good, becauſe merçifull; for I ſuffer not according to my deſerts. Is it not good, if there be peace and truth in my dayes? I have deſerved a preſent payment, O God thou deferreſt it; I have deſerved it in perſon, thou reſerveſt it for thoſe whom I cannot yet ſo feele, becauſe they are not; I have deſerved war and tumult, thou favoureſt me with peace; I have deſerv'd to be over-run with ſuperſtition, and Idolatry, thou bleſſeſt me with truth; ſhouldſt thou continue truth unto me, (though upon the moſt unquiet termes) the bleſſing were too good for me; but now thou haſt promiſed, and wilt not reverſe it, that both truth and peace ſhall be in my dayes; Lord I adore thy juſtice, I bleſſe thy mercy.

Gods children are neither waſpiſh nor ſullen when they are chid or beaten, but patiently hold their backs to the ſtripes of a diſpleaſed mercy; knowing how much more God is to be magnified, for what he might have done, than repined at, for what he hath done; reſigning themſelves over into the hand of that gracious juſtice, which in their ſmart ſeeks their reformation and glory.

Manaſſeh.

AT laſt, ſome three yeares after his recovery, Hezekiah hath a ſon; but ſuch a one, as if he could have fore-ſeene, orbitie had beene a bleſſing. 2 Kings 21. And 1 Chron. 33.

Still in the throne of Judah there is a ſucceſſion, and interchange of good and evill: Good Iotham is ſucceeded by wicked Ahaz; wicked Ahaz is ſucceeded by good Ezekiah; Good Ezekiah is ſucceeded by wicked Manaſſeh: Evill Princes ſucceed to good, for the exerciſe of the Church, and good ſucceed to evill, for the comfort of the Church.

The yong yeares of Manaſſeh give advantage to his miſ-carriage; Even whiles he might have been under the Ferule, he ſwayed the Scepter: Whither may not a child be drawne, eſpecially to a gariſh, and puppet-like ſuperſtition? As infancy is capable of all impreſſions, ſo moſt of the worſt.

Neither did Manaſſeh begin more earely, than he held out long. He raigned more yeares than his good father liv'd, notwithſtanding the miraculous addition to his age; More than ever any King of Judah, beſides, could reach: Length of dayes is no true rule of Gods favour; As plants laſt longer than ſenſitive creatures, and brute creatures out-live the reaſonable; ſo, amongſt the reaſonable, it is no newes for the wickedly great, to inherit theſe earthly glories, longer than the beſt. A

There wants not apparant reaſon for this difference; Good Princes are fetcht away to a better Crowne; They cannot be loſers, that exchange a weake and fading honor, for a perfection and eternity of bleſſedneſſe: Wicked men live long to their owne diſadvantage; they do but carry ſo many more brands to their hell: If therefore there be a juſt man that periſheth in his righteouſneſſe; and there be a wicked man that prolongs his life in his wickedneſſe, far be it from us, either to pitty the removall of the juſt, or to envy the continuance of the wicked; This continues to his loſſe, that departs to an happy advancement.

It is very like that Ezekiah marrying ſo late, in the vigour both of his age, and holineſſe, made a carefull choyce of a wife ſutable to his owne piety; Neither had his delight beene ſo much in her (according to her name) if her delight had not beene, as his, in God; Their iſſue ſwarves from both, ſo fully inheriting the vices of his grand-father Ahaz; as if there had beene no intervention of an Ezekiah: So we have ſeene the kernell of a well fruited plant degenerate into that crab, or willow, which gave the originall to his ſtock; yet can I not ſay that Ezekiah was as free from traducing evill to his ſon Manaſſeh, as Ahaz was free from traducing good to his ſon Ezekiah: Evill is incorporated in the beſt nature, whereas even the leaſt good deſcends from above. B

Wee may not meaſure grace by meanes: Was it poſſible that Manaſſeh having beene trained up in the religious Court of his father Hezekiah, under the eye of ſo holy Prophets and Prieſts, under the ſhadow of the Temple of God, after a childhood ſeaſoned with ſo gracious precepts, with ſo frequent exerciſe of devotion, ſhould run thus wild into all heatheniſh abominations; as if there had beene nothing but Idolatry in the ſeed of his conception, in the milke of his nouriſhment, in the rules of his inſtitution, in the practice of his examples? How vaine are all outward helps without the influence of Gods Spirit? and that Spirit breathes where he liſteth: good education raiſeth great hopes, but the proofe of them is in the divine benediction. C

I feare to looke at the out-rages of this wicked ſon of Hezekiah: What havocke doth he make in the Church of God? as if he had been borne to ruine Religion, as if his only felicity had been to untwiſt, or teare, in one day, that holy web which his father had been weaving, nine and twenty yeares? and contrarily, to ſet up in one houre that offenſive pile, which had beene above three hundred yeares in pulling downe: ſo long had the high places ſtood; the zeale of Hezekiah in demoliſhing them honoured him, above all his predeceſſors; and now the firſt act of this greene head was their reedifying: That miſchiefe may be done in a day, which many ages cannot redreſſe. D

Fearefull were the preſages of theſe bold beginnings; From the miſ-building of theſe Chappels of the Hils to the true God, Manaſſeh proceeds to erecting of altars to a falſe, even to Baal, the God of Ahab, the ſtale Idoll of the heathen; yet further, not content with ſo few Deities, he worſhips all the hoaſt of heaven; and that he might deſpight God yet more, he ſets up altars to theſe abuſed rivals of their Maker, in the very houſe of the Lord; that holy place doth he not feare to defile with the graven Image of the grove, that hee had made: Never Amorite did ſo wickedly as Manaſſeh; and, which was yet worſe, it ſufficed not to be thus wicked himſelfe, but he ſeduced Gods people to theſe abominations; and that his example might move the more, he ſpares not his owne ſon from the fire of the Idol-ſacrifice. Neither were his witcheries leſſe enormious, than his Idolatrie; he obſerved times, he uſed inchantments, he dealt with familiar ſpirits, and with wizards: Neither were either of theſe worſe than his cruelty; He ſhed innocent bloud till he had filled Jeruſalem from one end to another. E

O Manaſſeh, how no leſſe cruell wert thou to thine own ſoule, than to thy Judah: What an hideous liſt of monſtrous impiety is here; Any one of which were enough

A to draw judgment upon a world; but what hell is ſufficient for all together?

What browes are not now lifted up to an attentive expectation of ſome preſent, and fearefull vengeance from God, upon ſuch flagitious wickedneſſe? Therefore thus ſaith the Lord, Behold I am bringing ſuch evill upon Ieruſalem and Iudah, that whoſoever heareth of it, both his eares ſhall tingle: The perſon of Manaſſeh is not capable of revenge enough; as his ſin dilated it ſelfe by an infectious diffuſion to his people, ſo ſhall the puniſhment. We are ſenſible of the leaſt touch of our own miſeries, how rarely are we affected with other mens calamities? yet this evill ſhall be ſuch, as that the rumor of it ſhall beat no eare that ſhall not glow with an aſtoniſhing commiſeration: What then, O God, what ſhall that plague be, which thou threatneſt with ſo much preface of horror? I will ſtretch over Ieruſalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the houſe
B of Ahab; and I will wipe Ieruſalem as a man wipeth a diſh, wiping it and turning it upſide downe: And I will forſake the remnant of mine inheritance; and I will deliver them into the hand of their enemies, and they ſhall become a prey and a ſpoile unto all their enemies.

It is enough O God, it is enough: What eare can but tingle? what eye can but weep? what haire can but ſtart up? what heart can be but confounded at the mention of ſo dreadfull a revenge? Can there be a worſe judgement than deſolation, captivity, deſertion, ſpoyle, and torture of prevailing enemies? but however, other Cities and Nations have undergone theſe diſaſters, without wonder; that all this ſhould befall to thy Jeruſalem, the place which thou haſt choſen to thy ſelfe, out of the whole earth, the lot of thine inheritance, the ſeat of thine abode, whereof thou haſt
C ſaid, Here ſhall be my reſt for ever, it is able to amaze all eyes, all eares.

No City could fare worſe than Samaria, whoſe inhabitants after a wofull ſiege, were driven, like cattell, into a wretched ſervitude; Jeruſalem ſhall fare no better from Nobuchadnezzar the King of Babylon: Jeruſalem the glory of the earth, the dearling of heaven; See, O yee vaine men, that boaſt of the priviledges of Chaires and Churches, ſee, and tremble. There is no place under heaven to which the preſence of God is ſo wedded as that the ſins thereof ſhall not procure a diſdainefull, and finall divorce: The height of former favours ſhall be but an aggravation of vengeance.

This totall vaſtation of Jeruſalem ſhall take time: onwards, God begins with the perſon of wicked Manaſſeh; againſt whom he ſtirres up the Captaines of the hoaſt of D the late friend, and old enemy of Judah: Thoſe thornes amongſt which he had ſhrouded his guilty head, cannot ſhelter him from their violence; they take him and binde him with fetters of iron, and carry him to Babylon; There he lies loaded with chaines, in an uncomfortable dungeon, exerciſed with varietie of tortures, fed with ſuch courſe pittances of bread, and ſips of water, as might maintaine an unwilling life, to the puniſhment of the owner. What eye can now pittie the deepeſt miſeries of Manaſſeh? What but bondage can befit him, that hath ſo lawleſly abuſed his liberty? What but an utter abdication can befit him that hath caſt off his God, and doted upon Devils? What but a dying life, and a tormenting death can be fit for a man of blood?

E Who now would not have given this man for loſt; and have lookt when hell ſhould claime her owne? But oh the height, oh the depth of divine mercy? After all theſe prodigies of ſin, Manaſſeh is a convert; When he was in affliction he beſought the Lord his God: and humbled himſelf greatly before the God of his Fathers. How true is that word of the Prophet, Vexation gives underſtanding. The viper when he is laſhed, caſts up his poyſon: The traitor whē he is racked, tells that truth which he had elſe never uttered; If the croſſe beare us not to heaven, nothing can: What uſe were there of the graine, but for the edge of the ſickle, wherewith it is cut downe; the ſtroke of the flayle, wherewith it is beaten; the weight and attrition of the mill, wherewith it is cruſhed; the fire of the oven wherewith it is baken? Say now, Manaſſeh, with that Grand-father of thine (who was, till now, too good for thee) It was good for mee that I was afflicted: Even thine iron was more precious to thee, than thy gold; thy Goale was a more happy lodging to thee, than thy palace;

Babylon was a better Schoole to thee, than Jeruſalem: what fooles are we to frowne upon our afflictions? Theſe, how crabbed ſoever, are our beſt friends. They are not, indeed, for our pleaſure, they are for our profit: their iſſue makes them worthy of a welcome. What doe wee care how bitter that potion be which brings health? A

How farre a man may go, and yet turne? Could there be fouler ſins than theſe? Lo, here was Idolatry in the height, violation of Gods houſe, ſorceries of all kinds, bloody cruelty to his owne fleſh, to the Saints of God; and all theſe againſt the ſtreame of a religious inſtitution, of the zealous counſels of Gods Prophets, of the checks of his owne heart.

Who can complaine that the way of heaven is blocked up againſt him, when he ſees ſuch a ſinner enter? Say the worſt againſt thy ſelfe, O thou clamorous ſoule; Here is one that murthered men, defied God, worſhipt divels; and yet finds the way to repentance; if thou be worſe than he, denie (if thou canſt) that to thy ſelfe, which God hath not denied to thee, capacity of grace: In the meane time; know that it is not thy ſin, but thine impenitence that barres heaven againſt thee. B

Preſume not yet, O man, whoſoever thou art, of the liberty of thy converſion; as if thou couldeſt run on lawleſly in a courſe of ſinning, till thou come to the brim of hel; and then couldſt ſuddenly ſtop, and returne at leaſure: the mercy of God never ſet period to a wilfull ſinner; neither yet did his owne corrupt deſires; ſo as when he is gone the furtheſt, he could yet ſtay himſelfe from another ſtep: No man that truely repents is refuſed: but many a one ſinnes ſo long, that he cannot repent. His cuſtome of wickedneſſe hath obdur'd his heart, and made it flint to all good impreſſions. There were Ieroboams, and Abijams, and Ahabs, and Ioaſhes, and Ahazes, in theſe ſacred Thrones, there was but one Manaſſeh. God hath not left in any mans hand the raines of his owne heart, to pace, and turne, and ſtop as he liſts; This priviledge is reſerved to him that made it; It is not of him that wils, nor of him that runs, but of God that ſhowes mercy: and that mercy neglected, juſtly binds over to judgment. C

I wonder not at Manaſſeh, either ſinning, or repenting; I wonder at thy goodnes O Lord, who after thy juſt permiſſiō of his ſin, calleſt him thus graciouſly to repent; and ſo receiveſt him repenting: So as Manaſſeh was not a more loathſome and monſtrous ſpectacle of wickedneſſe, than he is now a pleaſing and uſefull patterne of converſion; Who can now deſpaire of thy mercy, O God, that ſees the teares of a Manaſſeh accepted? when we have debauched our worſt, our evill cannot match with thy goodneſſe; rather it is the praiſe of thine infinite ſtore, that where ſinne abounds, grace abounds much more; O keep us from a preſumption of grace, that we may repent; and raiſe us from a diſtruſt of grace when we have repented. D

No ſooner is Manaſſeh penitent, than he is free; his prayers have at once looſed him from his ſins, and from his chaines; and of a captive have made him a King; and from the dungeon of Babylon have reſtored him to the Palace of Jeruſalem: How eaſie is it for the ſame hand that wounds, to cure: What cannot fervent prayers do, either for our reſcuing from evill, or for our inveſting with good?

Then Manaſſah knew that the Lord he was God. Then? and not before? Could his yonger yeares eſcape the knowledge of Gods miraculous deliverance of Jeruſalem from the Aſſyrians? Could he but know the ſlaughter that Gods Angell made in one night, of an hundred foureſcore and five thouſand? Could he but have heard the juſt revenge upon Senacherib? Could he be ignorant of his fathers ſupernaturall recovery? Could he but ſee that everlaſting monument of the noted degrees in the Diall of Ahaz? Could he avoid the ſenſe of thoſe fifteene yeares, which were ſuper-added to his fathers age? What one of theſe proofes doth not evince a Deity? Yet, till his own ſmart, and cure, Manaſſeh knew not that the Lord was God. E

Fooliſh ſinners pay deare for their knowledge; neither will indure to be taught good-cheape: ſo we have ſeene reſtie horſes that will not move till they bleed with the ſpur: So we have ſeene dull and careleſſe children, that will learne nothing but what is put into them with the rod.

The

A The Almighty will be sure to be knowne for what he is, if not by faire meanes, yet by foule; If our prosperity, and peace, and sweet experience of his mercy can win us to acknowledge him, it is more for our ease, but, if we will needes be taught by stripes, it is no lesse for his glory.

Manasseh now returnes another man to Ierusalem: With what indignation doth he looke upon his old follies? and now, all the amends he can make, is to undoe what he did; to do that which he undid: He tooke away the strange Gods, and the Idoll out of the house of the Lord; and all the altars that he had built in the mount of the house of the Lord, and in Ierusalem, and cast them out of the City. True repentance begins to decline at the ablative; destroying those monuments of shame which former error had reared; The thornes must first be stubbed up, ere the ground can be capable of seed; The true B method of grace, is first, Cease to do evill; then, Learne to do good.

In vaine had Manasseh professed a repentance, if the strange gods had stil held possession of Jerusalem, if the Idoll had still harboured in Gods Temple, if forraine altars had still smoked upon the holy mountaine; Away with all his trash, when once Manasseh comes to a true sense of piety.

There is nothing but hypocrisie in that penitent, who after all vowes, and teares, retaines his old abominations; It is that poore peece of satisfaction which wee can give to the divine justice, in a heartie indignation, to fling downe that cup of wickednesse wherewith we have been bewitched, and to trample upon the sheards: without which, confession is but wind, and the droppes of contrition, water.

The living God loves to dwell cleane, he will not come under the roofe of Idols, C nor admit Idols to come under his: First therefore, Manasseh casts out the strange Gods and Idols, and altars; and then He repaires the Altar of the Lord, and sacrifices thereon peace-offerings, and thanke-offerings. Not, till he had pull'd down, might he build; & when he had pull'd downe, he must build: True repentance is no lesse active of good, What is it the better, if whē the Idolatrous altars are defaced, the true God hath not an Altar erected to his Name? In many altars was superstition; in no altars, Atheisme.

Neither doth penitent Manasseh build God a new altar, but he repaires the old, which by long dis-use lay waste, and was mossie and mouldred with age and neglect.

God loves well his owne institutions; neither can he abide innovations, so much as in the out-sides of his services. It is an happie worke to vindicate any ordinance of God from the injuries of times, and to restore it to the originall glory.

D What have our pious Governors done other in Religion? had we gone about to lay a new foundation, the worke had bin accursed; now wee have onely scraped off some superfluous mosse, that was growne upon these holy stones, we have cemented some broken peeces, we have pointed some crazie corners with wholesome morter, in stead of base clay, wherewith it was disgracefully patched up: The altar is old, it is Gods altar: It is not new, not ours: If we have laid one new stone in this sacred building, let it flye in our faces, and beat out our eyes.

On this repaired altar doth Manasseh send up the sacrifices of his peace, of his thankfulnesse; and doubtlesse the God of heaven smells a sweet savour of rest; No perfume is so pleasing to God, as that which is cast in by a penitent hand.

It had not served the turne that Manasseh had approached alone to this renued altar; As his lewd example had withdrawne the people from their God; so now he commands Iudah to serve the Lord God of Israel; Had he been silent, he could not have been E unfollowed: Every act of greatnesse is preceptive; but now that Religion is made Law, what Israelite will not be devout.

The true God hath now no competitour in Judah; All the Idolls are pull'd down, the high places will not be pull'd downe; an ill guise is easily taken up, is not so easily left: After a common depravation of Religion, it is hard to returne unto the first puritie: as when a garment is deepely soiled, it cannot without many lavers recover the former cleanneſſe.

Iosiahs

Iosiahs Reformation.

2 Kings 22, And 23.

YEt, yet if we must alter from our selves, it is better to be a Manasseh, than a Ioash: Ioash beganne well, and ended ill: Manasseh began ill, and ended well; his age varied from his youth, no lesse, than one mans condition can varie from anothers; His posterity succeeded in both; Ammon his son succeeded in the sins of Manasses youth; Iosiah his grand-child succeeded in the vertues of his age. What a vast difference doth grace make in the same age? Manasseh began his raigne at twelve yeares, Iosiah at eight; Manasseh was religiously bred under Hezekiah; Iosiah was mis-nurtured under Ammon; and yet Manasseh runs into absurd Idolatries, Iosiah is holy and devout. The Spirit of God breathes freely; not confining it selfe to times, or meanes.

No rules can bind the hands of the Almighty; It is in ordinary proofe too true a word, that was said of old, Wo be to thee O Land, whose King is a child: the goodnesse of God makes his owne exceptions; Judah never fared better, than in the greene yeares of a Iosiah: If we may not rather measure youth and age by government, and disposition, than by yeares: Surely thus, Iosiah was older with smooth cheekes, than Manasseh with gray haires. Happy is the infancy of Princes, when it falls into the hands of faithfull Counsellors.

A good patterne is no small help for yong beginners; Iosiah sets his father David before him, not Ammon not Manasseh: Examples are the best rules for the inexperienced; where their choyce is good, the directions are easiest: The Lawes of God are the waies of David; Those Laws were the rule, these wayes were the practice; Good Iosiah walkes in all the wayes of his Father David.

Even the minority of Iosiah was not idle; we cannot be good too earely: At eight yeares it was enough to have his eare open to heare good counsaile; to have his eyes and heart open to seeke after God: At twelve, he begins to act and shewes well that he hath found the God he sought: Then he addresses himselfe to purge Judah and Jerusalem, from the high places, groves, images, altars, wherewith it was defiled; burning the bones of the idolatrous Priests upon their altars; streawing the ashes of the idols upon the graves of them that had sacrificed to them, striving by those fires and mattocks to testifie his zealous detestation of all idolatrie.

2 Chron. 34. 3.

The house must first be cleansed, ere it can be garnished; no man will cast away his cost upon uncleane heaps; so soone as the Temple was purged, Iosiah bends his thoughts upon the repayring and beautifying of this house of the Lord.

What stir was there in Judah, wherein Gods Temple suffered not? Sixe severall times was it pillaged, whether out of force or wil: First, Iehoash King of Judah is faine by the spoile of it to stop the mouth of Hazael; Then, Ioash King of Israel fils his own hands with that sacred spoile, in the dayes of Amaziah; after this, Ahaz rifles it for Tiglath Pileser, King of Assyriah; then Hezekiah is forced to ransacke the treasures of it for Senacherib; yet after, the sacriledge of Manasseh makes that bootie of it, which his later times indeavoured to restore; and now lastly, Ammon his son neglects the frame, embeazels the furniture of this holy place: The very pile began to complaine of age and unrespect. Now comes good Iosiah, and in his eighteenth yeare (when other yong Gallants would have thought of nothing but pleasure, and iollity) takes up the latest care of his father David, and gives order for the repayring of the Temple.

The keepers of the doore have received the contribution of all faithfull Jewes, for this pious use; the King sends Shaphan the scribe to Helkiah the Priest to sum it up, and to deliver it unto Carpenters, and Masons, for so holy a worke.

How well doth it beseeme the care of a religious Prince, to set the Priests and Scribes in hand with reedifying the Temple? The command is the Kings the charge is the high-Priests, the execution is the workemens: when the labourers are faithfull

A full in doing the worke, and the high-Priest in the directing it, and the King in injoying it, Gods house cannot faile of an happie perfection : but when any of these slackens, the businesse must needs languish.

How God blesses the devout indeavours of his servants? Whiles Helkijah was diligently survaying the breaches and the reparation of the Temple, he lights upon the booke of the Law: The authentick and originall Booke of Gods Law was by a speciall charge appointed to be carefully kept within a safe shrine, in the Sanctuary: In the depraved times of Idolatry, some faithfull Priest (to make sure work) had locked it fast up in some corner of the Temple, from the reach of all hands, of all eyes : as knowing how impossible it was, that divine monument could otherwise escape the furie of prophane guiltinesse: Some few transcripts there were doubtlesse, (parcels B of this sacred Book) in other hands; neither doubt I, but as Helkijah had been formerly well acquainted with this holy volume (now of long time hid) so the eares of good Iosiah had beene inured to some passages thereof; but the whole body of these awfull Records, since the late night of Idolatrous confusion and persecution, saw no light till now; this precious treasure doth Helkijah find, whiles he digs for the Temple: Never man laboured to the reparation of Gods Church, but he met with a blessing more than he looked for. Deut. 31. 26.

Helkijah the Priest, and Shaphan the Scribe do not ingrosse this invaluable wealth into their owne hands, nor suppresse these more than sacred roles, for their owne advantage; but transmit them, first to the eares of the King, then by him, to the people: It is not the praise of a good Scribe, to lay up, but to bring forth, both old and C new: And if the Priests lips shall keepe knowledge, they keep it to impart, not to smoother, The people shall seeke the Law at his mouth; for he is the messenger of the Lord of Hoasts.

So soone as the good King heares the words of the book of the Law, and in speciall, those dreadfull threats of judgment, denounced against the Idolatries of his Judah, he rends his cloathes, to shew his heart rent with sorrow, and fearefull expectation of those plagues; and washes his bosome with teares. Oh gracious tendernesse of Iosiah: he doth but once heare the Law read, and is thus humbled; humbled for his fathers sins, for the sins of his people: how many of us, after a thousand hammerings of the menaces of Gods Law, upon our guilty soules, continue yet insensible of our danger? The very reading of this Law doth thus affect him; the preaching of D it stirs not us; The sins of others strucke thus deepe with him; our own are sleighted by us: A soft heart is the best tempered for God: So Physitians are wont to like those bodyes best, which are easiest to worke upon : O God make our clay, waxe, and our waxe pliable to thine hand; so shall we be sure to be free either from sin, or from the hurt of sinne.

It is no holy sorrow that sends us not to God; Iosiah is not moaped with a distractive griefe, or an astonishing feare, but in the height of his passion, sends five choise messengers to Huldah the Propheteſſe, to enquire of the Lord, for himselfe, for Judah: It is an happy trouble that drives us to this refuge. I doe not heare any of these Courtiers reply to this godly motion of their yong King: Alas, Sir, what meanes this deepe perplexity? What needs all this busie inquisition? If your father were idola- E trous, what is that to you, who have abandoned his sins? If your people were once idolatrous, what is that to you, yea to them; who have expiated these crimes by their repentance? Have you not carefully reformed all those abuses? hath not your happy reformation made an abundant amends for those wrongs? Spare your teares, and save the labour of your messengers; All is well, all shall be well; these judgments are for the obstinate; had we beene still guilty, these feares had beene just : were wee still in danger, what had wee gained by our conversion? Rather, as glad to second the religious cares of their young King, they feed his holy anxieties with a just aggravation of perill; and by their good counsell, whet these his zealous desires of a speedy resolution : That state cannot but be happie, whose Priests and Peeres are ready as to suggest, so to cherish, and execute the devout projects of their Soveraignes.

The

The grave Prieſt, the learned ſcribe, the honourable Courtiers do not diſdaine A to knocke at the doore of a Propheteſſe: Neither doth any of them ſay; It were hard if wee ſhould not have as much acquaintance with God, as a Woman; but in an humble acknowledgement of her Graces; they come to learne the will of God, from her mouth: True piety is modeſt, and ſtands not upon termes of reputation, in the buſineſſes of God; but willingly honors his gifts in any ſubject, leaſt of all in it ſelfe.

The ſexe is not more noted in Huldah, than the condition; As ſhe was a woman, ſo a wife; the wife of Shallum: Holy matrimony was no hinderance to her divine revelations; ſhe was at once a Propheteſſe in her colledge, an huſwife in her family; It was never the practice of God to confine his graces to virginity: At this very time the famous Prophet Ieremy flouriſhed; ſome yeares had hee already ſpent in this publike B ſervice; why was not he rather conſulted by Ioſiah? It is not unlike that ſome propheticall imployments called him away; at this time from Jeruſalem: His preſence could not have been balked: purpoſely, doubtleſſe doth God caſt his meſſage upon the point of that abſence, that he might honour the weaker veſſell with his divine oracle; and exerciſe the humility of ſo great clients: in the anſwers of God, it is not to bee regarded, who ſpeakes, but from whom: The injurie redounds to God, if the weakeneſſes of the perſon cauſe us to under-value the authority of the function.

As Ioſiah and his meſſengers doe not deſpiſe Huldah, becauſe ſhee was a woman; ſo Huldah doth not flatter Ioſiah, becauſe a King: Goe tell the man that ſent you, Thus ſaith the Lord: Behold, I will bring evill upon this place. Lo, he that was as God C to his ſubjects, is but as man to the Propheteſſe: neither is the meſſage ever the ſweeter, becauſe it is required by a Prince: No circumſtance may vary the forme of divine truth.

Evill muſt befall Jeruſalem and Judah; yea, all the words of that book, muſt allight upon the inhabitants of both: In how bad a caſe we may be, and yet think our ſelves not ſafe only, but happy? Theſe Jewes had forgotten their old revolts; and now having framed themſelves to holy courſes, promiſed themſelves nothing but peace, when the Propheteſſe foreſees, and foretells their approaching ruine: Even their old ſcore muſt be paid, after the opinion of a cleere agreement. In vaine ſhall we hope to quit our arrerages by prorogation. This Propheteſſe had immediate viſions from God, yet ſhe muſt ſpeak out of the Book; There was never any revelation from D the Lord that croſſed his writings: His hand, and his tongue agree eternally: If that booke have curſed Judah, ſhe may not abſolve it.

Yet, what a gracious mixture was here of mercy, with ſeverity; ſeverity to Iudah, mercy to Ioſiah; Judah ſhall be plagued and ſhall become a deſolation, and a curſe; Ioſiah ſhall be quietly houſed in his grave, before this ſtorme fal upon Iudah: His eye ſhall not ſee, what his people ſhall feele: It is enough that the expectation of theſe evils afflict him, the ſenſe ſhall not.

Whence is this indulgence? Becauſe thine heart was tender, and thou haſt humbled thy ſelfe before the Lord. How happy a thing it is to be a reed unto Gods judgments, rather than an oake; the meeke and gentle reed ſtoops, and therefore ſtands, the oake ſtands ſtiffely out againſt the ſtrongeſt guſt, and therefore is turned up by the roots: At E leaſt, let us lament thoſe ſins we have not avoided; and mourne for the ſins of others, whiles we hate our owne.

He that found himſelfe exempted from this vengeance, by his repentance and deepe humiliation, would faine find the ſame way for the deliverance of his people:
The ſame words of the Law therefore, that had wrought upon his heart, are by him cauſed to be publikely read in the eares of Judah and Jeruſalem; The aſſembly is univerſall, of Prieſts, Prophets, people, both ſmall and great; becauſe the ſinne was ſuch, the danger was ſuch: that no man may complaine to want information, the Law of God ſounds in every eare. If our eare be ſhut to the Law, the ſinne is ours; but if the Law be ſhut to our eares, the ſinne is of our governors: Woe be to them that hide Gods Booke from the people, as they would doe rats-bane from

A from the eyes of children : Ignorant soules cannot perish without their murder: There is no feare of knowing too much, there is too much feare of practizing too little: Now, if the people do not imitate their King in relenting, they are not worthy to partake with him in his impunity. Howsoever, they shall not want a great example, as of sorrow, so of amendment. Good Iosiah stands by the pillar, and solemnly renues his Covenant with his God; the people cannot for shame refuse to second him: Even they that lookt for a destruction, yet do not with-draw their obedience; Gods Children may not be sullen under his corrections, but whether they expect or feele smart, are no other than dutifull to his awfull hand. As a man that finds he hath done something that might indanger the forfeit of his favour, puts himselfe into some deserving action, whereby he may hope to re-indeare himselfe, so doth Iosiah
B here; No indeavour is enough to testifie his zeale to that name of God which was so profaned by his peoples Idolatry; what ever monuments were yet remaining of wicked Paganisme, he defaces with indignation, he burnes the vessels of Baal, and puts downe his Chemarim, destroyes the houses of the Sodomites, strawes the powder of their Idols in the brook Kedron, defiles Topheth, takes away the horses of the Sun, burnes the charets of the Sun with fire, and omits nothing that might reconcile God, cleare Judah, perfect a reformation.

Neither is this care confined to Jerusalem, & the neighbouring Towns, but stretches it selfe to the utmost coasts of Iosiahs Kingdom; Bethel was the infamous seat of the pollution of Israel; it seemes the heyres of Ieroboam (who set up his golden Calfe there) injoyed it not long; the Kings of Judah recovered it to their crowne, but, it
C had not yet recovered it selfe from that ancient infection: Thither doth good Iosiah send the unhallowed ashes of Baals Reliques, to staine that altar first, which he will soone after deface.

The time was, and it was no lesse than three hundred and fifty yeares since, that the man of God, out of Judah, cried against Ieroboams altar.

O Altar, Altar; Thus saith the Lord; Behold a Child shall be borne, unto the House of David, Iosiah by name, and upon thee shall he offer the Priests of the high places, that burne incense upon thee, and mens bones shall be burnt upon thee.

And now is the houre come, wherein every of those words shal be accomplished: It could not but be a great confirmation to Iosiah, to see that God so long agoe foremarkt him for his owne; and fore-nam'd him to so zealous a service.

D All our names are equally foreknowne of that divine providence, though not fore-spoken : neither can any act passe from us, which was not pre-determined in that eternall Counsel of the Almighty: neither can any act that is pre-determined be unfulfilled upon earth: Intervention of time breaks no square in the divine decrees: our pur-blind eyes see nothing, but that which toucheth their lids; the quick sight of Gods prescience sees that, as present, which is a world off: According to the prediction, the stench of dead mens bones is a fit perfume to send up from this altar to heaven, whose best sacrifices savoured worse in the nostrils of God. And the blood of the idolatrous sacrificers was a meet oblation to that God, who had been dishonoured by their burnt-offerings to his base corrivals,

E Even that Prophet who foretold this, had his toomb in Bethel, and that toomb had his inscription ; His weakneſse might not rob him of the honour of his sepulture: How palpable do these Israelites condemne themselves, whiles they reserve so famous a monument of their owne conviction. It was no prejudice to this holy Prophet, that his bones lay amongst the sepulchers of idolaters. His Epitaph preserved those bones from burning, upon that altar, which he had accursed; As the Lyon might not teare his carcasse, when he died, so now, the furie of the multitude may not violate the very bones, in his grave.

I do not see Iosiah save them for reliques; I heare him command they shall rest in peace ; it is fit the dead bodies of Gods Saints should be as free from contempt, as from superstition.

After the removall of these rites of false worship, it is time to bring in the true: Now a solemne Passeover shall be kept unto the Lord, by the charge of Iosiah: That booke booke of the Law ſets him, the time, place, circumſtances, of this Sacrament; his zeale ſo carefully followes it, that ſince the dayes of Samuel, this feaſt was never ſo gloriouſly, ſo punctually celebrated. Jeruſalem is the place, the fourteenth day of the firſt month is the time, the Levites are the actors, a yeareling and ſpotleſſe Lambe is the proviſion; no bone of it is broken, the blood is ſprinkled upon the doore-poſtes, it is roaſted whole, eaten with ſowre herbs, with bread unleavened, the remainder is conſumed by fire. The Law, the Sacrifices had beene in vaine, if the Paſſeover had beene neglected: No true Iſraelite might want, whether this monument of their deliverance paſt, or this Type of the Meſſiah to come. Rather than faile, Ioſiahs bountie ſhall ſupply to Judah Lambs for their paſchall devotion: No almes is ſo acceptable, as that whereby the ſoule is furthered.

Joſiahs Death; with the deſolation of the Temple and Jeruſalem.

2 Kings 23. verſ. 29. And 2 Chron. 35. verſe 20. 2 Chron. 36.

Ioſiah hath now happily ſetled the affaires both of God, and the State: and now hath ſweet leiſure to injoy himſelfe, and his people: his conſcience doth not more cheare him at home, than his ſubjects abroad; Never King raigned with more officious piety to God, with more love, and applauſe of men: But what ſtability is there in theſe earthly things? how ſeldome is excellency in any kind long-liv'd? In the very ſtrength of his age, in the height of his ſtrength, is Ioſiah withdrawne from the earth; as not without a mercifull intention of his glory, on Gods behalfe, ſo, not without ſome weakeneſſe, on his owne. Pharaoh Necho King of Ægypt comes up to fight againſt the King of Aſſyria: What is that to Ioſiah? Perhaps the Ægyptians attempted to paſſe thorow the land of Judah, towards Charchemiſh the ſeat of his warre; but, as a neighbour, not as an enemy: Ioſiah reſiſts him; as neither holding it ſafe to admit a forraine power into the boſome of his Countrey, nor daring to give ſo faire an occaſion of provoking the Aſſyrian hoſtility againſt him.

The King of Ægypt mildly deprecates this enmity, he ſends Ambaſſadors to Ioſiah, ſaying, What have I to do with thee thou King of Iudah, I come not againſt thee, this day, but againſt the houſe wherewith I have war; for God commanded me to make haſte; forbeare thee from medling with God, who is with me, that he deſtroy thee not.

What friend could have ſaid more? what Prophet could have adviſed more holily? why doth not good Ioſiah ſay with himſelfe; There may be truth in this ſuggeſtion; God may have ſent this man, to be a ſcourge of mine old enemy, of Aſſhur: If the hand of the Almighty be in this deſigne, why do I oppoſe it? The quarrell is not mine, why do I thruſt my finger into this flame, unbidden; Wherefore ſhould I hazard the effuſion of bloud, upon an harmleſſe paſſage? Can I heare him plead a command from God, and not inquire into it? How eaſie is it for me to know the certainty of this pretended commiſſion? Have not I the Prieſts, and Prophets of God about me? Let me firſt go and conſult his oracle; If God have ſent him, and forbidden me, why ſhould my courage carrie me againſt my piety?

It is ſtrange that the good heart of Ioſiah could eſcape theſe thoughts, theſe reſolutions: Yet, he that upon the generall threats of Gods Law againſt Judah, ſends meſſengers to inquire of a Propheteſſe; now upon theſe particular threats of danger to himſelfe; ſpeakes not, ſtirs not: The famous Prophet Ieremy was then living, and Zephaniah; beſides a whole Colledge of Seers: Ioſiah doth not ſo much as ſend out of doores, to aſke, Shall I go up againſt the King of Egypt? Sometimes, both grace and wit are aſleepe in the holieſt and warieſt breſts: the beſt of all Gods Saints may be ſometimes miſ-carried by their paſſions to their coſt.

The

A The wise providence of God hath mercifully determined to leave Iosiah to his owne counsels, that by the weakenesse of his servant, he might take occasion to perfit his glory: Even that wherein Iosiah was wanting unto God, shall concurre to the making up of Gods promise to Iosiah: when we are the most blinde-folded, we runne on the wayes of Gods hidden decrees; and, what ever our intents be, cannot, if wee would, goe out of that unknowne path.

Needs will Iosiah put himselfe into armes against an unwilling enemy; and, to be lesse noted, diguises himselfe. The fatall arrow of an Egyptian archer findes him out in the throng, and gives him his deaths-wound; Now, too late he calls to a retrait; his changed Charet is turned to a Biere, to cary his bleeding corps to his grave, in Ierusalem.

B What eye doth not now pity and lament the untimely end of a Iosiah? Whom can it choose but affect, to see a religious, just, vertuous Prince snatcht away in the vigor of his age? After all our foolish moane, the providence that directed that shaft to his lighting place, intends that wound for a stroke of mercy: The God whom Iosiah serves, lookes thorough his death, at his glory: and by this sudden violence will deliver him from the view, and participation of the miseries of Iudah, which had been many deaths; and fetches him to the participation of that happinesse, which could countervaile more deaths, than could be incident unto a Iosiah. Oh the wonderfull goodnesse of the Almighty, whose very judgements are mercifull; Oh the safe condition of Gods children, whom very paine easeth, whom death revives, whom dissolution unites, whom lastly, their very sinne and temptation glorifies.

C How happily hath Iosiah gained by this change? Instead of a froward people, hee now is sorted with Saints and Angels; instead of a fading, and corruptible crowne, he now enjoyes an eternall. The orphane subjects are ready to weep out their eyes, for sorrow; their losse cannot be so great, as his gaine: he is glorious, they, as their sinnes had deserved, miserable. If the separated soule could bee capable of passion; could Iosiah have seene, after his departure, the calamities of his sons, of his people, it could not but have laid siege to his peace.

The sad subjects proclaime his son Iohoahaz, King instead of so lamented a father; He both doth ill, and fares ill: By that time he hath sate but three moneths in the throne, Pharaoh Necoh King of Egypt seconds the fathers death, with the sons captivity: This victorious enemy puts downe the wicked sonne of Iosiah, and lades him
D with chaines at Riblath, in the land of Hamath; and lades his people with a tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold: Yet, as if he that was unwilling to fight with Iosiah, were no lesse unwilling to root out his posterity, this Egyptian sets Eliakim, the second son of Iosiah, upon the seat of his father; and, that he might bee all his, changes his name to Iehoiakim: oh the wofull and unworthy succession of Iosiah; one son is a prisoner, the other is a tributary; both are wicked. After that Iehoiakim hath been some yeers Pharaohs Baylife, to gather, and rack the deare rents of Iudah; Nebuchadnezzar the great King of Babylon comes up, and sweeps away both the Lord, and his Feodary, Pharaoh, and Iehoiakim.

So far was the ambitious Egyptian from maintaining his incroachment upon the
E territories of Iudah, that he could not now hold his owne: From Nilus to Euphrates, all is lost: So subject are the lesser powers still to be swallowed up of the greater; so just it is with God, that they which will be affecting undue enlargement of their estates, should fall short of what they had.

Iehoiakim is caryed in fetters to Babylon: and now in that dungeon of his captivity, hath more leisure, than grace, to bethinke himselfe of all his abominations; and whiles he inherits the sad lodging of his great grandfather Manasseh, inherits not his successe.

While he is rotting in this Goale, his yong son Iehoiachin starts up in his throne; like to a mushrom that rises up in a night, and withers in a day: Within three moneths, and ten dayes is that yong Prince (the meet son of such a father) fetcht up in irons to his fathers prison; Neither shall he goe alone; his attendance shall adde to his misery; His mother, his wives, his officers, his peeres, his craftsmen, his warri-ours accompany him, manicled, and chained, to their perpetuall bondage.

Now, according to Isaiahs word, it would have been great preferment for the fruit of Hezekiahs loynes to be Pages in the Court of Babylon.

One onely branch yet remaines of the unhappy ſtock of holy Ioſiah, Mattaniah, the brother of Iehoiakim, whom Nebuchadnezzar (changing his name to Zedekiah) ſets up in that forlorne, and tributary throne; There might he have lived (though an underling) yet peaceable; This man (to make up the meaſure of Gods juſt judgements) as he was ever a rebell to God, ſo proves rebellious to his Soveraigne maſter the King of Babylon: The Prophet Ieremie hath forewarned him in vaine; nothing could teach this man, but ſmart.

Who can look for other than fury from Nebuchadnezzar, againſt Ieruſalem, which now had affronted him with three ſeverall ſucceſſions of revolts, and conſpiracies againſt his government; and thrice abuſed his bounty, and indulgence? With a mighty army doth he therefore come up againſt his ſeditious deputy; and beſieges Ieruſalem, and blocks it up with forts round about. After two yeers ſiege, the Caldees without and the famine within, have prevailed; King Zedekiah and his ſoldiers are fled away by night, as thinking themſelves happy, if they might abandon their walls, and ſave their lives.

The Chaldees (as caring more for the birds, than for the neſt) purſue them, and overtake Zedekiah, forſaken of all his forces, in the plaine of Iericho, and bring him to Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon. What can ſo unthankfull and perfidious a vaſſall expect, but the worſt of revenge? The ſentence is fearefull: Firſt, the ſons of Zedekiah are ſlaine before his eyes; then thoſe eyes of his (as if they had ſeene enough, when they had ſeen him childleſſe) are put out: His eyes are onely lent him ſo long, as to torment him with the ſight of his owne utmoſt diſcomfort; Had his ſons but over-lived his eyes, the griefe had been ſo much the leſſe, as the apprehenſion of it had been leſſe lively, and piercing; Now, this wofull object ſhall ſhut up his ſight, that even when his bodily eyes are gone, yet the eyes of his minde might ever ſee what he laſt ſaw; That thus his ſons might be ever dying before him, and himſelf in their death ever miſerable.

Who doth not now wiſh that the blood of Hezekiah and Ioſiah could have been ſevered from theſe impure dregs of their lewd iſſue? no man could pity the offenders, were it not for the mixture of the intereſt of ſo holy progenitors.

No more ſorrow can come in at the windowes of Zedekiah, more ſhall come in at his doores; his eare ſhall receive what more to rue for his Ieruſalem, Nebuzaradan the great Marſhall of the King of Babylon comes up againſt that deplored City, and breakes downe the walls of it, round about, and burnes the Temple of the Lord, and the Kings houſe, and every faire Pallace of Ieruſalem, with fire; drives away the remainder of her inhabitants, into Captivity, caries away the laſt ſpoyles of the glorious Temple. Oh Ieruſalem, Ieruſalem, the wonder of all times, the paragon of nations, the glory of the earth, the favourite of heaven, how art thou now become heaps of aſhes, hills of rubbiſh, a ſpectacle of deſolation, a monument of ruine? If later, yet no leſſe deep haſt thou now pledged that bitter cup of Gods vengeance, to thy ſiſter Samaria; How carefully had thy God forewarned thee? Though Iſrael play the harlot, yet, let not Iudah ſin: Loe now, as thine iniquities, ſo thy judgements have overtaken her: Both ly together in the duſt, both are made a curſe to all poſterities: O God, what place ſhall thy juſtice ſpare, if Ieruſalem have periſhed? If that delight of thine were cut off for her wickedneſſe, Let us not be high minded but feare.

What pity it was to ſee thoſe goodly Cedars of the Temple flaming up higher than they ſtood in Lebanon? to ſee thoſe curious marbles, which never felt the dint of the pick-axe, or hammer, in the laying, wounded with mattocks, and wounding the earth in their fall? to ſee the holy of holies, whereinto none might enter but the high-prieſt, once a yeare, thronged with Pagans; the vailes rent, the ſacred Arke of God violated, and defaced, the Tables over-turned, the Altars broken downe, the pillars demoliſhed, the pavements digged up, yea the very ground, where that famous pile ſtood, deformed. O God, thou wouldeſt rather have no viſible visible house upon earth, than endure it defiled with Idolatries.

Foure hundred thirty and six yeers had that Temple stood, and beautified the earth, and honoured heaven, now it is turned into rude heapes; There is no prescription to be pleaded for the favour of the Almighty : Onely that Temple, not made with hands, is eternall in the heavens. Thither he graciously bring us, that hath ordain'd us thither, for the sake of that glorious high-Priest, that hath once for all entred into that holy of holies,
Amen.

Zerubbabel and Ezra.

THE firſt tranſportation into Babylon, under Iehoiakim, (wherein Daniel, Ezekiel, and many other of the beſt note, were driven into captivity;) was (ſome eleven yeers after) followed with a ſecond, under Zedekiah; wherein the remnant of the now ruined Ieruſalem, and Iudah, were ſwept away. Seventy yeers was the period of their longeſt ſervitude: whiles Babylon was a Queen, Iudah was her vaſſall: when that proud Tyranneſſe fell, Gods people began to riſe againe: The Babylonian Monarchy was no ſooner ſwallowed up of the Perſian, than the Iews felt the comfort of liberty.

For Cyrus conquering Babylon, and finding the Jews groaning under that captivity, ſtraight releaſes them, and ſends them, under the Conduct of their Captaine Zerubbabel, back to their almoſt-forgotten country.

The world ſtands upon viciſſitudes; Every nation hath her turne, and muſt make up her meaſure: Threeſcore and ten yeers agoe, it was the courſe of Iudah, the iniquity of that rebellious people was full. Some hundred and thirty yeers before that, was the turne of Samaria, and her Iſraelites: Now the ſtaffe is come to the doores of Babylon, even that wherewith Iudah was beaten: and thoſe Perſians which are now victorious, muſt have their terme alſo. It is in vaine for any earthly ſtate to promiſe to it ſelfe an immutable condition. At laſt, the rod that ſcourged Gods children, is caſt into the fire: Thou haſt remembred, O Lord, the children of Edom in the day of Ieruſalem, how they ſaid, Downe with it, downe with it, even to the ground: O daughter of Babylon waſted with miſery, how happy is he that rewardeth thee as thou haſt ſerved them: It is Cyrus that hath wrought this revenge, this reſcue.

Doubtleſſe, it did not a little move Cyrus to this favour, that he found himſelfe honorably forenamed in theſe Jewiſh prophecies, and fore-appointed to this glorious ſervice, no leſſe than an hundred and ſeventy yeers, before he was: Who would not be glad to make good ſo noble and happy a deſtiny? O God, if wee heare that thou haſt ordained us to life, how gladly, how carefully ſhould wee worke out our ſalvation? if to good workes, how ſhould we abound? Eſay 44. ult.

In the firſt yeer of his Monarchy, doth Cyrus both make proclamations, and publiſh publiſh them in writing thorow all his Kingdome; wherein hee both profeſſeth his zealous reſolutions, and deſires, to build up Gods houſe in Ieruſalem, and injoynes, and incourages all the Jewes, thorow his dominions, to addreſſe themſelves to that ſacred worke; and incites all his ſubjects to aide them with ſilver, and gold, and goods, and beaſts. How gracious was the command of that, whereof the very allowance was a favour? A

Was it Cyrus that did this? was it not thou, O God, in whoſe hands are the hearts of Kings, that ſtirredſt up the ſpirit of that Perſian; as if hee had beene more than a ſon of thy Church, a father? How eaſie is it for thee to make very Pagans protectors to thy Church; enemies, benefactors?

Not with an empty grace doth this great King diſmiſſe the Iewes, but with a royall bounty; He brings forth the veſſells of the houſe of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Ieruſalem, and had put them in the houſe of his gods; and cauſes them to be numbred by his Treaſurer to the hands of Sheſhbazzar the Prince of Iudah, for the uſe of the Temple; no fewer than five thouſand and foure hundred veſſels of gold and ſilver. B

Certainely, this great Monarch wanted not wit to think; It is a rich booty that I finde in the Temples of Babylon; by the law of conqueſt it is mine; having vanquiſht their gods, I may well challenge their ſpoile; how ſeaſonably doth it now fall into my hands, upon this victory, to reward my ſoldiers, to ſettle my new Empire: what if this treaſure came from Ieruſalem? the propriety is now altered; the very place (according to the conceit of the Iewes) hath profaned it; The true God, I have heard, is curious; neither will abide thoſe veſſels, which have been polluted with idolatrous uſes: It ſhall be enough if I looſe the bonds of this miſerable people: If I give liberty, let the next give wealth: they will think themſelves happy in bare walls, in their native earth: To what purpoſe ſhould I pamper their penury with a ſudden ſtore? But the Princely heart of Cyrus would admit of no ſuch baſe ſacrilegious thoughts; Thoſe veſſels that he findes ſtampt with Gods marke, hee will returne to their owner; neither his owne occaſions, nor their abuſe ſhall be any colour of their detention. O Cyrus, how many cloſe-handed, gripple-minded Chriſtians ſhall once be choked in judgement with the example of thy juſt munificence? thou reſtoredſt that which we purloine: woe be to thoſe houſes that are ſtored with the ſpoiles of Gods Temple: woe be to thoſe fingers that are tainted with holy treaſures. C

Kings can hardly doe good alone, their lawes are not more followed, than their examples: No ſooner doe the chiefe of the fathers of Iudah and Benjamin, and the Prieſts, and Levites ſet their faces towards Ieruſalem for the building of the Temple, then the liberall hands of their Pagan neighbours furniſh them with gold, and ſilver, and precious things. Every Perſian is glad to be at the charge of laying a ſtone, in Gods houſe. The ſame God that had given them theſe metals, out of his coffers of the earth, gives it out of their coffers to his Temple. He that took away by the Chaldees, gives by the Perſians: Where the Almighty intends a work, there cannot be any want of meanes. D

Thus heartened, thus laded, doe the joyfull families of Iudah returne to their old home; How many thouſands of them were worne out, and loſt in that ſeventy yeers ſervitude? How few of them yet ſurvived, that could know the place of their birth, and habitation, or ſay, Here ſtood the Temple, here the Pallace? Amongſt thoſe forty and two thouſand, three hundred and threeſcore Iewes, that returned in this firſt expedition, there were, whom the confuſion of their long captivity had robbed of their pedegree; They knew themſelves Iewes, but could not derive their line: theſe were yet admitted, without difficulty; But thoſe of the Prieſtly tribe, which could not deduce their genealogie from the regiſter, are caſheired as uncleane. Then, God would be ſerved in a blood, now in a due ſucceſſion: If wee could not fetch the line of our pedegree from Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, we were not fit for the Evangelicall altars. Their calling was by nature, ours by grace; The grace of inward abilities, of outward ordination; if we cannot approve both theſe, we are juſtly abandoned; now had the children of Iſrael taken downe their Harps from E

A the Willowes which grew by the waters of Babylon, and could, unbidden, ſing the true ſongs of their recovered Zion: They are newly ſetled in their old manſions, when upon the firſt publike feaſt, in the Autumne immediatly following their returne, they flock up to Ieruſalem: their firſt care is their publike ſacrifice; That School of their Captivity, wherein they have been long trained, hath taught them to begin with God: A forced diſcontinuance, makes devotion more ſavory, more ſweet to religious hearts; whereas in an open freedome, piety doth too often languiſh.

Ioſhua the Prieſt, and Zorobabel the Prince are fitly joyned in the building of the Altar: neither of their hands may be out of that ſacred worke: no ſooner is that ſet upon the baſes, then it is imployed to the daily burnt-offerings: The Altar may not ſtay the leiſure of the Temple; Gods Church may not want her oblations; Hee can
B be none of the ſonnes of Iſrael, that doth not every day renue his acknowledgements of God.

How feelingly doe theſe Iewes keepe their feaſt of Tabernacles, whiles their ſojourning in Babylon was ſtill in their thoughts; whiles as yet their Tents muſt ſupply their ruined houſes? The firſt motions of zeale are commonly ſtrong, and fervent; How carefully doe theſe Governours and Prieſts make preparation for Gods Temple? Carpenters and Maſons are hyred; Tyrian workmen are againe called for, and Lebanon is now anew ſolicited for Cedar trees. The materials are ready; Every Iſraelite, with ſuch courage addreſſes himſelfe to this ſervice, as if his life lay in thoſe
C ſtones: And now, whiles the foundation of the Temple was laying, the Prieſts ſtand in their habits, with Trumpets, the Levites with Cymbals, interchanging their holy Muſicke, and Melodiouſly ſinging praiſes to the God of Iſrael, who had turned their captivity as the ſtreames in the South, and honoured their eyes and hands with the firſt ſtones of his houſe: The people ſeconds their ſongs with ſhouts; the earth ſounds, and heaven rings with the joyfull acclamations of the multitude; It is no ſmal comfort, in a good action, to have begun well; The entrance of any holy enterpriſe is commonly encountred with many diſcouragements, which if we have once overcome, the paſſage is ſmooth.

How would theſe men have ſhouted at the laying on of the laſt ſtone of the battlements; who are thus joyed with laying the firſt ſtones of the foundation? The end of any thing is better than the beginning: that hath certainty, this danger; this labour; that reſt: little did theſe men think that, for all this, few of them ſhould live to D ſee the roofe.

What different affections ſhall we ſee produced in men by the ſame occaſion? The yonger Jews ſhouted at this ſight, the elder wept: The yonger ſhouted to ſee a new foundation; The elder wept to remember the old: They who had ſeen no better, thought this goodly; They who had ſeene the former, thought this meane, and homely; more ſorrowing for what they had loſt, than rejoycing in ſo unequall a reparation.

As it may fall out, it is ſome peece of miſery to have been happier; every abatement of the degrees of our former height laies ſiege to our thankfulneſſe, for leſſer mercies. Sometimes, it proves an advantage to have knowne no better; hee ſhall more comfortably enjoy preſent benefits, who takes them as they are, without any
E other compariſons, than of the weakneſſe of his owne deſervings. It is nothing to me what my ſelfe or others have been, ſo I be now well: Neither is it otherwiſe in particular Churches, if one be more gloriouſly built than another, yet if the foundation be rightly laid in both; one may not inſult, the other may not repine: Each muſt congratulate the truth to other, each muſt thankfully injoy it ſelfe.

The noiſe was not more loud, than confuſed; here was a diſcordant mixture of lamentation, and ſhouting; it was hard to ſay whether drowned the other.

This aſſembly of Jews was a true image of Gods Church on earth; one ſings, another cryes; never doth it all either laugh or mourn at once. It ſhall be in our triumph that all teares ſhall be wip't from our eyes; till then, our paſſions muſt be mixed, according to the occaſions.

The Jews are buſie at worke, not more full of joy, than hopes; and now that the

the walls begin to over-looke the earth; their thoughts seeme to over-looke the walls. But what great enterprise was ever set on foot for God, which found not some crosses? A

There was a mungrell broode of Samarit-Assyrians, which ever since the dayes of Senacherib dwelt in the land of Israel; whose Religion was a patched coate of severall shreds; some little part Jewish, the rest Pagan, not without much variety of idolatry. These hollow neighbours profer their assistance to the children of the captivity; Let us build with you, for we seeke your God, as ye doe: and doe sacrifice to him. Might men be their owne judges, there would be no heresie in the world, no mis-worship. It is true; these men did sacrifice to the true God; The lyons taught them to seeke, and the Israelitish Priest taught them to finde the fashions of the God of the land; Some of these Jews knew their devotion of old; They served Israels God; but with their own: As good no God, as too many. In a just indignation therefore doe these Jewish governours repell the partnership of such helpers: You have nothing to do with us, to build an house to our God; but we our selves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel. The hand of an idolater is contagious. Yet, had it been to the building of some fortresse, or common-hall, perhaps their aide had not been refused, but when the walls of Gods house are to be raised, this society had been piacular. B

Those that may not be allowed to help the worke, will aske no leave to hinder it: their malicious suggestions weaken the hands of the people of Judah, and stirre up authority to suppresse them.

Cyrus was far off, neither lived he long after that gracious commission; and besides was so taken up the while with his wars, that he could not have leisure to sift those querulous accusations. Now therefore, during the last yeers of Cyrus, and the raigne of his son Cambyses, and the long government of Darius Histaspides, and of his son Xerxes, or Ahasuerus, and lastly of his son Artaxerxes; untill the dayes of Darius Nothus, (which was no lesse than five successions of Kings, besides Cyrus) do the walls of the Temple stand still, yea lie waste; subject to the wrongs of time, and wether: the fit matter of sorrow to the Iewes, insultation to the enemies, derision to passengers. C

What a wide gap of time was here betwixt the foundation of Gods House, and the battlements? How large a tryall doth God now secondly take of the faith, of the patience of his people? How large a proofe doth he give of his owne long-suffering? Oh God, when thou hadst but one house upon earth, thou wert content to put up delayes, yea affronts in the building of it; now thou hast many, it is no marvell if thy longanimity and justice, abide some of them to lie desolate: They are not stones, or mettals, or men that can make thee more glorious; thou best knowest when to serve thy selfe of all these, when to honour these with thy service. D

A small matter hinders the worthiest action: as a little fish (they say) stayes the greatest ship: Before, the Iews were discouraged with words, but now they are stopped by commands.

These envious Samaritans have corrupted the governours which the Persian Kings set over those parts; and from their hands have obtained letters of deepe calumniation, to Ahasuerus the King; and after him, to his son Artaxerxes; wherein Ierusalem is charged with old rebellion to Kings; and for proofe, appellation is made to the records; from which evidence, is spitefully inferred, that if these wals be once built, the King shall receive no tribute on this side the river. Never was Gods Church but subject to reproaches. E

Princes have reason to be jealous of their rights. The records are searcht; It soon appeares that within one Century of yeers, Ierusalem had rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, and held out two yeers siege of that great Babylonian. The scandall of disloyalty is perpetuall: although indeed they held him rather a prevailing enemy, than a lawfull Soveraign; One act disparages either place, or person, to all posterities. Therefore shall the walls of Jerusalem lie waste, because it had once been treacherous; After an hundred yeers doth that City rue one perfidious act of Zedekiah. Fidelity to our governours is ever both safe, and honourable.

Command

A Command is now ſent out from * Artaxerxes, (even the ſon of Queene Eſther) to reſtraine the worke: All reſpects muſt ceaſe with carnall mindes, when their honours and profits are in queſtion. Rehum the Chancellor, and Shimſhai the Scribe, come now armed with authority: The ſword hath eaſily prevailed againſt the trowell. Still doe the Iewes finde themſelves as it were captives at home, and in ſilence, and ſorrow, ceaſe from their labours, untill the dayes of the next ſucceſſour, Darius Nothus.

As thoſe that had learned to ſow after a bad crop; theſe Iewes, upon the change of the Prince, by the incouragement of the Prophets of God, Haggai, and Zechariah, take new heart to build againe: If others power hinder us in the work of God, our will may not be guilty.

B Their new governours come, as before, to expoſtulate; Who hath commanded you to build this houſe, and to make up this wall? and what are your names? They wiſely and modeſtly plead the ſervice of the God of heaven, the decree of Cyrus; ſtill perſiſting to build, as if the prohibition of Artaxerxes had died with the author. The unpartiall Governours doe neither claw nor exaſperate; but relating the humble and juſt anſwer of the Iewes, move the King that ſearch may be made in the rolles of Babylon, whether ſuch an Edict were made by Cyrus; and require his royall pleaſure, concerning the validity of ſuch a pretended decree. Darius ſearches, findes, ratifies, inlargeth it, not onely charging his officers not to hinder the work, but commanding to levy ſummes of his own Tribute, beyond the river, for the expences of the building, for the furniſhing of ſacrifices; threatning utter ruine to the houſe of that man, and death to his perſon, who ſhould offer to impeach this bounty: and ſhutting up with
C a zealous imprecation; The God of heaven that hath cauſed his Name to dwell there, deſtroy all Kings and people that ſhall put to their hand to alter, and to deſtroy this Houſe of God which is at Ieruſalem: I Darius have made a decree, let it be done with ſpeed.

Who would have lookt for ſuch an Edict from a Perſian? No Solomon, no David could have ſaid more.

The ruler of all hearts makes choice of his owne inſtruments, and when he pleaſeth, can glorifie himſelfe by thoſe meanes, which are leaſt expected: That ſacred work which the huſband, and ſonne of an Eſther croſſed, ſhall bee happily accompliſhed by a Darius: In the ſixt yeer of his raigne, is the Temple of God fully finiſhed; and now the Dedication of it, is celebrated, by a joyfull feaſt: An hun-
D dred bullocks, two hundred rams, foure hundred lambes, in a meet proportion, ſmoke upon their altars: And now the children of the captivity think this day a ſufficient payment for all their ſorrowes: We have reaſon to thinke it the faireſt day that ever ſhone forth to us, wherein the ſpirituall building of Gods Houſe is raiſed up in our ſoules. How ſhould we ſhout at the laying of this foundation, and feaſt at the laying on of the roofe? What other, what better ſacrifice can we offer up to God in the ſenſe of our joy, than our ſelves? Let our hearts be at once, the Temple, the Altar, the Sacrifice; O God, be thou glorified in all theſe, who haſt graciouſly honoured all theſe with thy ſelfe.

Every holy feaſt is now duely kept, the Prieſts know their diviſions, the Levites their courſes; and the whole ſervice of God is put into a ſetled order; But, as
E there can be no new beginnings without imperfection nor long continuance, without corruption; reformation is no leſſe neceſſary than good inſtitutions; Artaxerxes * Mnemon hath learned of his father Darius to befriend Gods people; and ſtrives to inherit his beneficence: under his government, is Ezra the Prieſt and learned Scribe, ſent with a large commiſſion from Babylon, to Ieruſalem, to enquire into the wants, and redreſſe the diſorders of the Iews; with full power not onely to cary with him all the voluntaries of his nation; and the treaſures contributed in all the province of Babylon; but to raiſe ſuch ſummes, out of the Kings revenues, as ſhould be found requiſite; and withall to ordaine Magiſtrates, and Judges, and to crowne the Lawes with due execution, whether to death or baniſhment, or confiſcation; and laſtly, with a large exemption of the Prieſts and Levites, and all the inferiour officers of the Temple, from all tolles, tributes, cuſtomes. Nothing wanted here, whether ther for direction, or incouragement. It is a ſigne of Gods great favour to any nation, when the hearts of Soveraigne Governours are raiſed up, both to the choice of worthy agents, and to the commanding of pious, and reſtorative actions. A Holy and carefull Ezra gathers a new colony of Iewes, takes view of them at the river of Ahava; and finding a miſſe of the ſons of Levi (without whom no company, no plantation can be compleat) ſends for their ſupply; And now fully furniſhed, he proclaimes a faſt in the way.

* The mindful.

I doe not heare him ſay, The journey is long and dangerous; the people have need of all their ſtrength. I could well wiſh us all afflicted with a religious faſt, were it not that the abatement of the courage, and vigour of the multitude may indanger our ſucceſſe; But without all theſe carnall conſultations, he begins with this ſolemne act of humiliation; It is better to have God ſtrong in our weakneſſe, than to have B fleſh and blood ſtrong in His neglect.

Artaxerxes was a Patron of the Iewes, yet a Pagan by profeſſion; wiſe Ezra was afraid of quenching thoſe ſparkes of piety which he deſcried in this ſemi-proſelyte. Rather therefore than he will ſeeme to imply a diſtruſt in the providence of that God, in whoſe ſervice he went by ſeeking a convoy of ſoldiers from the King; Ezra chooſes to put himſelfe upon the hazard of the way, and the immediate protection of the Almighty. Any death were better than to heare Artaxerxes ſay, Is this the man that ſo confidently told me, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that ſeeke him; but his power & his wrath is againſt all thē that forſake him? Doth he beleeve himſelf that he thus doubts ere he begin? Dare he not truſt his God with his own buſineſſes?

The reſolutions of faithfull hearts are heroicall: Nó heathen man ſhall ſtumble at Ezraes feare: He can finde more aſſurance in his faſt, than in a Perſian band: with a couragious reliance upon the hand of his God he puts himſelfe into the journey; and findes nothing but ſafety and ſucceſſe: The fidelity of the Almighty never diſappointed the confidence of his ſervants. All the army of Artaxerxes could not have beene C ſo ſtrong a guard to the Iewes, as their inviſible protection.

In the ſpace of foure moneths is Ezra and his company happily arrived at Ieruſalem: where he joyes to ſee the new Temple, and his old Colleagues: and now having delivered up the charge of his treaſure, by waight, in the chambers of the houſe of the Lord, he applyes himſelfe to his work, and delivers the Kings Commiſſion to the Lieu-tenants and Governours, for their utmoſt aſſiſtance.

The Princes of Iudah doe not (for ought I heare) repine at the large Patent granted to this Prieſt, nor ſay, What doth a man of this robe meddle with placing, or diſplacing Magiſtrates? with executions of judgements to death, bonds, baniſhment? D but rather as congratulating this power to ſacred hands, gladly preſent unto him all their grievances. Truly religious hearts cannot grudge any honor to their ſpirituall guides.

This holy Commiſſioner is ſoon welcomed with a ſad Bill of Complaint, from ſome good Peeres of Iſrael; wherein they charge divers of the Prieſts, Levites, people, not to have ſeparated themſelves from the idolatrous inhabitants of the lands, nor (therefore) from their abominations, even from Canaanites, Hittites, Perizzites, and the reſt of thoſe branded nations; that they have taken of their daughters for themſelves, and for their ſons: So that the holy ſeed have mingled themſelves with E thoſe forbidden people; and, (which made the matter ſo much more hainous, leſſe remediable) that the hand of the Princes, and Rulers, hath been chiefe in this treſpaſſe.

Oh hypocriticall Iewes, did ye refuſe to ſuffer your Samaritan neighbours to joyne with you in building a liveleſſe houſe unto God, and doe ye now joyne affinity with a more accurſed generation for the building of living houſes unto poſterity? for the pulling downe of the lively Houſe of God?

How could Ezra heare this with his clothes, his haire, his beard untorne? What griefe, what aſtoniſhment muſt this newes needs bring to a zealous heart? And, were it not that the conſcience of his ſincere reſpect to Gods glory relieved him, how could Ezra chooſe but repent of his journey; and ſay; Am I come from Babylon to finde Paganiſme in Iudah? Did I leave Perſians, to meet with Canaanites? what doe

A I heere if Jeruſalem be removed? How much better were a cleare captivity than an idolatrous freedome? Wo is me, that having left many Jewiſh hearts in Babylon, I now am forced to find heathen blood in Jeruſalem.

As a man diſtracted with ſorrow, Ezra ſits down upon the earth with his garments rent, with the haire of his head, and beard pluckt off, wringing his hands, knocking his breſt, not moving from his place untill the evening ſacrifice. It is hard to be too much affected with the publike ſins of Gods people. Thoſe who find themſelves in the ſhip of Gods Church, cannot but be much troubled with every dangerous leake that it takes: Common caſes are not more neglected by the careleſſe, than taken to heart by the wiſe and godly.

There, and thus, Ezra ſits aſtonied untill the evening ſacrifice: others reſorted to
B him the while, even all that trembled at the words of the God of Iſrael; but to help on his ſorrow, not to relieve, neither doth any man wiſh a mitigation of his own, or others griefe. At laſt, he riſes up from his heavineſſe, and caſts himſelfe upon his knees, and ſpreads out his hands unto the Lord his God: Wherefore was all that penſiveneſſe, faſting, ſilence, tearing of haire and clothes, but to ſerve as a meet preface to his prayers? wherein he ſo freely powres out his heart, as if it had beene all diſſolved into devotion; profeſſing his ſhame to lift up his face towards the Throne of God; confeſſing the iniquities of his people, which were increaſed over their heads, and growne up unto heaven; fetching their treſpaſſe farre, and charging them deep; feelingly acknowleging the juſt hand that had followed them, in all their judgments, and the juſt confuſion wherein they now ſtand before the face of their God.

C Teares, and ſighes, and grovelings accompanied his prayers; the example and noiſe whereof drew Iſrael into a participation of this publike mourning, For the people wept very ſore: How can they chooſe but thinke, if he thus lament for us, how ſhould we grieve for our ſelves?

All Judah went away merrily with their ſin, till this checke of Ezra; now they are afflicted: Had not the hands of the Peeres been in this treſpaſſe, the people had not been guilty; had not the cheekes of Ezra beene firſt drenched with teares, the people had not been penitent. It cannot be ſpoken, what power there is in a great example, wherher to evill or good.

Prayers and teares are nothing without indeavours. Shecaniah, the ſon of Iehiel puts the firſt life into this buſineſſe. Having ſeconded the complaint of Ezra, he now
D addes, Yet there is hope in Iſrael concerning this thing. Now therfore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and ſuch as are borne of them. Ariſe, for this matter belongeth to thee, we alſo will be with thee, Be of good courage, and do it.

When miſchiefe is once done, the chiefe care is how to redreſſe it. The beſt way of redreſſe is the deliberate undoing of that which we have raſhly committed; The ſureſt obligation to the undoing of an evill act, is an oath or covenant made with God for the performance.

There is no man ſo wiſe, but he may make uſe of good counſell; there is no man ſo forward, but he may abide incitation. It is no ſmall incouragement to ſee an heartie aſſiſtance in an envious and difficult ſervice. Then aroſe Ezra, and made the chiefe Prieſts, the Levites, and all Iſrael to ſweare that they ſhould doe according to this word.

E It is halfe done that is thus aſſured. There was need of a ſtrong power to diſſolve a matrimoniall, though inordinate love: Doubtleſſe, theſe men had married out of affection; their hearts were no leſſe ſet upon theſe wives (though heatheniſh) then if they had been of their own Tribes; neither were their children, thus begotten, leſſe deare unto them, then if they had laine in Jewiſh wombs: Nothing leſſe than an oath of God therefore could quit theſe paſſions; That is both required and taken.

Now begins Ezra to conceive ſome hope of preſent redreſſe; the comfort whereof, yet, cannot turne off his ſorrow for the offence paſſed; He neither eates bread, nor drinks water; willingly puniſhing himſelfe, becauſe Iſrael had ſinned: Now ſhall his Countrey-men eaſily read in his face their owne penance, and juſt humiliation; and ſay; This man takes no joy in our ſufferings; he would not ſmart thus for us, if he did not deſcrie more danger towards us than we can apprehend.

Proclamation is made thorow Judah and Jeruſalem, under paine of forfeiture of ſubſtance, and excommunication from Gods people; that all the children of the captivity ſhould gather themſelves together unto Jeruſalem. They are met accordingly; The Courts of Gods Houſe are thronged with penitents; and now, as if the heaven would teach them what to do, the clouds raine downe abundance of teares. What with thoſe ſad ſhowres, what with their inward remorſe, the people ſit trembling in the open Courts; and humbly wait for the reproofe, for the ſentence of Ezra. He riſes up, and with a ſevere countenance, layes before them their ſin, their amends: The ſin of their ſtrange wives; the amends of their confeſſion, of their ſeparation: not ſparing to ſearch their wound; not neglecting the meet plaiſter for their cure. The people, as willing to be healed, yeeld themſelves patiently to that rough hand, not ſhrinking at the paine, not favouring the ſore; As thou haſt ſaid, ſo muſt we do; Only craving a fit proportion of time, and a due aſſiſtance for the diſpatch of ſo long and important a worke. Ezra gladly harkens to this, not ſo much requeſt, as counſell of Iſrael; The charge is divided to men, and dayes; For two months ſpace the commiſſioners ſit cloſe; and within that compaſſe, finiſh this buſineſſe, not more thankleſſe then neceſſary: Doubtleſſe much variety of paſſion met with them in this buſie ſervice; Here you ſhould have ſeene an affectionate huſband bitterly weeping at the diſmiſſion of a loving wife, and drowning his laſt farewell in ſobs: there you might have ſeene a paſſionate wife, hanging upon the armes of her beloved huſband, and on her knees, conjuring him by his former vowes, and the deare pledges of their loves; and profering with many teares, to redeeme the loſſe of her huſband with the change of her Religion: Here you might have ſeene, the kindred and parents of the diſmiſſed, ſhutting up their denied ſuits with rage and threats. There, the abandoned children kneeling to their ſeemingly-cruell father, beſeeching him not to caſt off the fruit of his owne loynes; and expoſtulating, what they have offended in being his: The reſolved Iſraelites muſt be deafe, or blind to theſe moving objects; and ſo farre forget nature, as to put off part of themſelves. Perſonall inconveniences have reaſon to yeeld to publike miſchiefes: Long intertainment makes that ſin hard to be ejected; whoſe firſt motions might have beene repelled with eaſe.

Had not the prohibition of theſe mariages beene expreſſe, and their danger and miſchiefe palpable, the care of their ſeparation had not bred ſo much tumult in Iſrael. He that ordained matrimony, had upon fearefull curſes forbidden an unequall yoke with infidels. Beſides the marring of the Church by the mixture of an unholy ſeed, Religion ſuffered for the preſent, and all good hearts with it; Many teares, many ſacrifices need to expiate ſo foule an offence, and to ſet Iſrael ſtraight againe.

All this while even theſe meſline Jewes were yet forward to build the Temple; The worſt ſinners may yeeld an outward conformity to actions of piety: Ezra hath done more ſervice in pulling down, than the Jewes in building; without this act, the Temple might have ſtood, Religion muſt needs have falne. Babel had been tranſlated to Jeruſalem; Jewes had turned Gentiles. Oh happy indeavours of devout and holy Ezra that hath at once reſtored Judah to God, and to it ſelfe.

Nehemiah building the walls of Jeruſalem.

Neh. 1, 2, 3, 4, Chapt.

THirteene yeares were now paſſed, ſince Ezraes going up to Jeruſalem; when Nehemiah the religious Courtier of Artaxerxes, inquires of the eſtate of his Country, and brethren of Judæa: He might well finde that holy ſcribe had not been idle: The commiſſion of Artaxerxes had been improved by him to the utmoſt; Diſorders were reformed, but the walls lay waſt; The Temple was built, but the City was ruinous; and if ſome ſtreets were repaired, yet they ſtood unguarded; open to the mercie of an enemy, to the infeſtation of ill neighbourhood; Great bodies muſt have ſlow motions; As Jeruſalem, ſo the Church of God whoſe type it was, muſt be finiſht by leaſure.

Nehemiah

A Nehemiah ſate warme in the Court at Shuſhan, favoured by the great King Artaxerxes; nothing could be wanting to him, whether for pleaſure or ſtate; what needed he to trouble his head with thoughts for Jeruſalem? what if thoſe remote walls lay on heaps whiles himſelfe dwelt faire? what if his far-diſtant country-men be deſpiſed, whiles himſelfe is honoured by the great Monarch of the world.

It is not ſo eaſie for gracious diſpoſitiõs to turne off the publik calamities of Gods Church: neither can they do other than leeſe their private felicities in the common diſtreſſes of the univerſall body. If I forget thee, O Ieruſalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth.

Many Jewes went up from Babylon, and Shuſhan, to Jeruſalem, few ever returned voluntarily from their native home to the region of their captivity: Some occaſion
B drew Hanani with certaine others of Judah, to this voyage. Of them doth Nehemiah carefully inquire the preſent condition of Jeruſalem: It was no newes that the people were afflicted, and reproached, the walls broken downe, the gates burnt with fire. Even ſince the furious vaſtation of Nebuzaradan, that City knew not better termes: ſeldome when doth the ſpirituall Jeruſalem fare otherwiſe in reſpect of outward eſtate? Externall glory and magnificence is an unſure note of the Church.

Well had Nehemiah hoped that the gracious Edict, and beneficence of Darius, and the ſucceſſive patronage of his Lord Artaxerxes had by the continuance of twenty yeares favour advanced the ſtrength and glory of Jeruſalem; but now, finding the holy City to lie ſtill in the duſt of her confuſion, neglected of God, deſpiſed of men,
C he ſits downe and weeps, and mournes, and faſts, and prayes to the God of heaven. How many ſaw thoſe ruines, and were little affected? he heares of them afar off, and is thus paſſionate? How many were upon this ſight affected with a fruitleſſe ſorrow, his mourning is joyned with the indevours of redreſſe. In vaine is that griefe which hath no other end than it ſelfe.

Nehemiah is reſolved to kneele to the King his maſter, for the repaire of his Jeruſalem; he dares not attempt the ſuit till he have begun with God; This good Courtier knew well that the hearts of theſe earthly Kings are in the over-ruling hand of the King of heaven to incline whither he pleaſeth: Our prayers are the onely true meanes to make way for our ſucceſſe; If in all our occaſions we do not begin with the firſt mover, the courſe is prepoſterous and commonly ſpeeds thereafter.

Who dares cenſure the piety of Courtiers, when he finds Nehemiah ſtanding be-D fore Artaxerxes? Even the Perſian Pallace is not uncapable of a Saint: No man that waites on the Altar at Jeruſalem can compare for zeale, with him, that waits on the cup of a Pagan Monarch: The mercies of God are unlimited to places, to callings.

Thus armed with devotions, doth Nehemiah put himſelfe into the preſence of his maſter Artaxerxes. His face was overclouded with a deepe ſadneſſe, neither was he willing to cleare it. The King eaſily notes the diſparity of the countenance of the bearer, and the wine that he beares: and in a gracious familiarity aſkes the reaſon of ſuch unwonted change; How well it becomes the great to ſtoop unto a curteous affability, and to exchange words of reſpect, even with their humble vaſſals.

Nehemiah had not beene ſo long in the Court but he knew that Princes like no other than cheereſull attendants; neither was he wont to bring any other face into
E that preſence, then ſmooth, and ſmiling.

Greatneſſe uſes to be ful of ſuſpition, and where it ſees a dejection, and ſowreneſſe of the browes, is ready to apprehend ſome ſullen thoughts of diſcontentment, or, at the leaſt, conſtrues it for a diſreſpect to that Soveraignty, whoſe beames ſhould be of power to diſperſe all our inward miſts: Even good manners forbid a man to preſſe into the preſence of a Prince, except he can either lay by theſe unpleaſing paſſions, or hide them: So had Nehemiah hitherto done: Now, he purpoſely ſuffers his ſorrowe to looke through his eyes, that it may worke both inquiry, and compaſſion from his maſter; neither doth he faile of his hopes in either; Why is thy countenance ſad, ſeeing thou art not ſick? How ſenſible do we think the father of mercies is of all our penſive thoughts, when an heathen maſter is ſo tender of a ſervants griefe? How ready ſhould our tongues be to lay open our cares to the God of all comfort, when we ſee Nehemiah ſo quicke in the expreſſions of his ſorrowe to an uncertaine eare? A

Let the King live for ever : Why ſhould not my countenance be ſad, when the City the place of my fathers ſepulchers lieth waſte, and the gates thereof burnt with fire. Not without an humble preface doth Nehemiah lay forth his grievance; Complaints have ever an unpleaſing harſhneſſe in them, which muſt be taken off by ſome diſcreet inſinuation: although it could not but ſound well in the generous eare of Artaxerxes, that his ſervant was ſo carefull for the honour of his Country. As nature hath made us all members of a community and hath given us common intereſts, ſo, it is moſt pleaſing to us, to ſee theſe publike cares divide us from our owne.

The King eaſily deſcries a ſecret ſupplication wrapt up in this moanefull anſwer, which the modeſt ſuiter was afraid to diſcloſe, and therefore he helps that baſhfull motion into the light; For what doeſt thou make requeſt? It is the praiſe of bounty to B draw on the juſt petitions of fearefull ſuppliants.

Nehemiah dares not open his mouth to the King, till his heart hath opened it ſelfe by a ſudden ejaculation to his God; No buſines can be ſo haſty, but our prayer may prevent it; the wings whereof are ſo nimble, that it can flie up to heaven, and ſolicit God, and bring downe an anſwer, before ever our words need to come forth of our lips. In vaine ſhall we hope that any deſigne of ours can proſper, if we have not firſt ſent this meſſenger on our errand.

After this ſilent and inſenſible preparation, Nehemiah moves his ſuit to the King; yet not at once, but by meet degrees; firſt he craves leave for his journey, and for building: then he craves aid for both; Both are granted; Nehemiah departs furniſhed C with letters to the governours, for a convoy; with letters to the Keeper of the Kings forreſt for timber. Not more full of deſire than hope.

Who ever put his hand to any great worke for the behoofe of Gods Church, without oppoſition? As the walls of the Temple found buſie enemies, ſo ſhall the walls of the City; and theſe ſo much more, as they promiſe more ſecurity and ſtrength to Jeruſalem: Sanballat the Deputie-Lieutenant of the Moabites, and Tobiah the like officer to the Ammonites, and Geſhem to the Arabians, are galled with envy at the arrivall of a man authorized to ſeeke the well-fare of the children of Iſrael: There cannot be a greater vexation to wicked hearts, than to ſee the ſpirituall Jeruſalem in any likelihood of proſperity. Evill ſpirits and men need no other torment, than their owne deſpight.

This wiſe Courtier hath learnt that ſecrecie is the ſureſt way of any important D diſpatch. His errand could not but be knowne to the governours; their furtherance was injoyned for the proviſion of materialls; elſe the walls of Jeruſalem had overlookt the firſt notice of their heathen neighbours. Without any noiſe doth Nehemiah ariſe in the dead of night, and taking ſome few into his company, none into his counſaile, he ſecretly rounds the decaied walls of Jeruſalem, and viewes the breaches, and obſerves the gates; and returnes home in ſilence, joying in himſelfe to foreſee thoſe reparations, which none of the inhabitants did once dreame of: At laſt, when he had fully digeſted this great worke in his owne breſt, he cals the Rulers and Citizens together, and having condoled with them the common diſtreſſe, and reproach, he tells them of the hand of his God, which was good upon him; he ſhewes them the gracious commiſſion of the King his maſter, for that good worke. They E anſwer him with a zealous incouragement of each other, Let us riſe up and build. Such an hearty invitation countenanced by authority hath eaſily ſtrengthened the hands of the multitude; with what obſervance and deareneſſe doe they now looke upon their unexpected Patron? How doe they honour him as a man ſent from heaven, for the welfare of Jeruſalem? Every man flyes to his hodde, and trowell, and rejoyces to ſecond ſo noble a leader, in laying a ſtone in that wall of their common defence.

Thoſe emulous neighbours of theirs, Sanballat, Tobiah, Geſhem, the chiefe commanders of Moab, Ammon, Arabia, have ſoone eſpied the firſt morter, that is laid upon that old foundation. Envie is uſually more quick-ſighted than love: And now they

ſcorn-

A scornfully apply themselves to these despised Jewes, and think to scoffe them out of their worke: The favourablest persecution of any good cause is the lash of lewd tongues; whether by bitter taunts or by scurrilous invectives: wch it is as impossible to avoid, as necessary to contemne. The barking of these dogs do not hinder Nehemiah from walking on his way; professing his confidence in the God of heaven, whose worke that was, he shakes off their impotent malice, and goes on chearefully to build: Every Israelite knowes his station. Eliashib the high Priest, and the rest of that sacred tribe put the first hand to this worke; they build the sheep-gate, and sanctifie it; and in it, all the rest. As the first fruits of the field, so the first stones of the wal, are hallowed to God, by the consecration of those devout agents: That businesse is like to prosper, which begins with God.

B No man was idle, no part was intermitted; All Jerusalem was at once encompassed with busie labourers. It cannot be but the joynt-indeavours of faithfull hearts must raise the walls of the Church.

Now Sanballat, and his brethren, find some matter to spend their scoffes upon; What do these feeble Iewes? will they fortifie themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day? will they revive the stones out of the heapes of rubbish which are burnt.

How basely do carnall minds think of the projects, and actions of Gods children; therefore vilifying them, because they measure them by no other line, than outward probability. Oh foolish Moabites, this worke is Gods, and therefore in despight of all your tongues and hands, it shal prosper: He heares you whom ye have blasphemed, and shall turne your reproach upon your owne heads.

C And thou proud Ammonite, that couldst say, If a Fox go upon their stone-wall he shal breake it down, shalt well find, that all the wolvish troopes of your confederates shall not be able to remove one stone of this sure fortification; Whiles Moab and Ammon repine and bluster in vaine, this wall shall rise; and when Moab and Ammon shall lie in the dust, this wall shall stand. The morter that hath beene tempered with so many prayers cannot but out-last all the flints, and marbles of humane confidence.

Now the growth of this wall hath turned the mirth of the adversaries into rage: These Moabites, Ammonites, Arabians, Ashdadites conspire all together, to fight against Jerusalem, & whiles the morter is yet green, to demolish those envied heaps.

What hath this Citie offended in desiring to be defenced? what wrong could it be to wish a freedome from wrongs? Were this people so mighty, that there could be
D danger in over-powering their neighbours, or in resisting a common Soveraigne, there might have appeared some colour for this hostile opposition; but, alas; what could a despised handfull do to the prejudice of either? It is quarrell enough to Jerusalem that it would not be miserable.

Neither is it otherwise with the head of these hellish complices; there needs no other cause of his utmost furie, than to see a poore soule strugling to get out of the reach of his tyranny. So do savage beasts bristle up themselves, and make the most fierce assaults, when they are in danger of losing the prey, which they had once seised on.

In the meane while, what doth Nehemiah with his Jews for their common safety? They pray, and watch; they pray unto God, they watch against the enemy.

E Thus, thus shall we happily prevaile against those spirituall wickednesses, which war against our soules: No evill can surprize us if we watch; no evil can hurt us, if we pray; This is the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith.

There was need of a continued vigilancy; the enemy was not more malicious, than subtile, and had said; They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst amongst them, and slay them. Open force is not so dangerous, as close dissimulation; They meant to seeme Jewes, whiles they were Moabites and Ammonites; and in the cloathes of bretheren purposed to hide murderers. Never is Satan so prevalent, as when hee comes transformed into an Angell of light.

It was a mercifull providence of God, that made these mens tongues the blabs of their owne counsell. Many a fearefull designe had prospered, if wickednesse could have beene silent. Warning is a lawfull guard to a wise adversarie: Now doth Nehe- miah arme his people; and for the time, changes their trowels into ſwords, and ſpeares, and bowes; raiſing up their courage with a vehemēt exhortation, to remember the Lord, which is great, and terrible, and to fight for their brethren, their ſons, their daughters, their wives, and their houſes. Nothing can ſo hearten us to the encountring of any evill, as the remembrance of that infinite power and wiſdome which can either avert, or mitigate, or ſanctifie it: we could not faint if we did not forget God.

Neceſſity urges a man to fight for himſelf, love inables his hand to fight for thoſe which challenge a part in him; where love meets with neceſſity, there can want no indevour of victory; Neceſſity can make even cowards, valiant; love makes the valiant, unreſiſtible: Nehemiah doth not therefore perſwade theſe Jewes to fight for themſelves, but for theirs: The judgement of the intereſt, and danger, cannot but quicken the dulleſt ſpirits.

Diſcovered counſels are already prevented: Theſe ſerpents die by being firſt ſeen; When the enemies heard that it was knowne unto us, they let fall their plot. Could we deſcrie the enterpriſes of Satan, that tempter would returne aſhamed.

It is a ſafe point of wiſdome to carry a jealous eye over thoſe, whom we have once found hollow, and hoſtile: From that time forth Nehemiah divided the taſk, betwixt the trowell, and the ſword; ſo diſpoſing of every Iſraelite, that whiles one hand was a Maſon, the other was a ſouldier: one is for work, the other for defence. Oh lively image of the Church militant, wherein every one labours weaponed; wherein there is neither an idle ſouldier, not a ſecure workeman: every one ſo builds, as that he is ready to ward temptations; every one ſo weilds the ſword of the Spirit, for defence, that withall he builds up himſelfe in his moſt holy faith; here is neither a fruitleſſe valour, nor a unſafe diligence.

But what can our weapons availe us, if there be not meanes to warne us of an enemy? Without a trumpet we are armed in vaine. The worke is great and large, and we are ſeparated upon the wall, one farre from another: Yea, ſo farre as the utmoſt bounds of the earth, are we ſeparated one from another, upon the walls of the ſpirituall Jeruſalem; onely the ſacred Trumpets of God, call us, who are diſtant in place, to a combination in profeſſion. And who are thoſe Trumpets, but the publike meſſengers of God, of whom God hath ſaid; If the Watchmen ſee the ſword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned, if the ſword come, and take any perſon from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at the Watchmans hand. Wo be to us if we ſound not; if the ſound we give be uncertaine: wo be to our people, if when we premoniſh them of enemies, of judgments, they ſit ſtill unmoved, not buckling themſelves to a reſiſtance, to a prevention.

It is a mutuall aide, to which theſe Trumpets invite us; we might fight apart, without the ſignals of war; In what place yee heare the ſound of the Trumpet, reſort yee thither unto us. There can be no ſafety to the Church, but where every man thinks his life, and welfare conſiſts in his fellowes; Conjoyned forces may proſper, ſingle oppoſitions are deſperate: All hearts and hands muſt meet in the common quarrell.

Nehemiah redreſſing the extortion of the Jewes.

With what difficulty do theſe miſerable Jewes ſettle in their Jeruſalem? The feare of forraigne enemies doth not more afflict them than the extortion of their owne: Dearth is added unto war: Miſeries do not ſtay for a mannerly ſucceſſion to each other, but in a rude importunity throng in, at once. Babel may be built with eaſe, but whoſoever goes about to raiſe the walls of Gods City, ſhall have his hands full: The incurſion of publike enemies may be prevented with vigilancie and power; but there is no defence againſt the ſecret gripes of oppreſſion.

There is no remedy, the Jews are ſo taken up with their trowel, and ſword, for the time,

A time, that they cannot attend their trades; ſo as, whiles the wall did riſe, their eſtates muſt needs impaire: Even in the cheapeſt ſeaſon they muſt needs be poore, that earned nothing but the publike ſafety; how much more in a common ſcarcity? Their houſes, lands, vineyards are therefore morgaged, yea their very ſkins are ſold for corne, to their brethren: Neceſſity forces thē to ſel that, which it was cruelty to buy; What will we not, what muſt we not part with for life? The covetous rulers did not conſider the occaſions of this want, but the advantage. Sometimes a bargaine may be as unmercifull as a robberie: Charity muſt be the rule in all contracts; the violation whereof, whether in the matter, or the price, cannot but be ſinfull.

There could not be a juſter ground of expoſtulation then this of the oppreſſed Jewes; Our fleſh is as the fleſh of our brethren, our children as their children; and loe, wee
B bring into bondage our ſons and our daughters: whiles there is no difference in nature, why ſhould there be ſuch an injurious diſproportion in condition. Even the ſame fleſh may beare a juſt inequality; ſome may be rulers, whiles others are ſubject; ſome wealthy, others poore; but why thoſe wealthy Rulers ſhould tyrannize over thoſe poore inferiours, and turne brother-hood into bondage no reaſon can be given but lawleſſe ambition; If there were one fleſh of Peeres, another of Peaſants, there ſhould be ſome colour for the proud impoſitions of the great, as becauſe the fleſh of beaſts is in a lower rank than ours, we kil, we devoure it at pleaſure; but now ſince the large body of mankind conſiſts of the ſame fleſh, why ſhould the hand ſtrike the foot? And if one fleſh may challenge meet reſpects from us, how much more one ſpirit; The ſpirit is more noble than the fleſh is baſe; the fleſh is dead with-
C out the ſpirit; the ſpirit without the fleſh, active and immortall. Our ſoule, though ſhapeleſſe and immateriall, is more apparently one, than the fleſh; And if the unity of our humane ſpirit call us to a mutuall care, and tenderneſſe in our cariage, each to other, how much more of the divine? by that we are men, by this we are Chriſtians: As the ſoule animates us to a naturall life, ſo doth Gods Spirit animate the ſoule to an heavenly; which is ſo one, that it cannot be divided. How ſhould that one ſpirit cauſe us ſo farre to forget all naturall, and civill differences, as not to contemne, not to oppreſſe any whom it informeth.

They are not Chriſtians, not men, that can injoy the miſeries of their brethren, whether in the fleſh or ſpirit,

Good Nehemiah cannot chooſe but be much moved at the barbarous extortion
D of the people; and now, like an unpartiall governour, he rebukes the Rulers, and Nobles, whoſe hand was thus bloody with oppreſſion. As of fiſhes, ſo of men, the leſſer are a prey to the great: It is an ill uſe made of power, when the weight of it ſerves only to cruſh the weake. There were no living amongſt men, had not God ordained higher than the higheſt; and yet higher than they. Eminency of place cannot be better improved, than by taking downe mighty offenders.

If nobility do imbaſe it ſelfe to any foule ſin, it is ſo much more worthy of coertion, by how much the perſon is of greater marke.

The juſtice of this reproofe could not but ſhame impudence it ſelfe; We after our ability have redeemed our brethren the Iewes which were ſold to the heathen, and will you ſell
E your brethren, or ſhall they be ſold to us? Shall they find at home that yoake of bondage which they had put off abroad? whiles they are ſtill Jewes, ſhall we turne Aſſyrians? If they muſt be ſlaves, why not rather to enemies, than to brethren? How much more tollerable were a foraine ſervitude, than a domeſticall: Be aſhamed, O ye Nobles of Iſrael, to renue Babylon in Jeruſalem. I marvell not if the offenders be ſtrucken dumb with ſo unanſwerable an expoſtulation; Guiltineſſe, and confuſion have ſtopt their mouths.

Many of thoſe who have not had grace enough to refraine ſinne, yet are not ſo utterly void of grace as to maintaine ſin; Our after-wits are able to diſcerne a kinde of unreaſonableneſſe in thoſe wicked actions, which the firſt appearance repreſents unto us plauſible. Gaine leads in ſin; but ſhame followes is out. There are thoſe that are bold and witty to beare out commodious or pleaſant evils; neither could theſe Jewiſh enormities, have wanted ſome colours of defence; Their ſtocke was their owne, owne, which might have been otherwiſe improved, to no leſſe profit; The offer, the A ſuit of theſe bargaines was from the ſellers; Theſe eſcheates fell into their hands, unſought; neither did their contract cauſe the need of their brethren, but relieve it: But their conſcience will not beare this plea. I know not whether the maintenance of the leaſt evil be not worſe, than the commiſſion of the greateſt; This may be of frailty, that argues obſtinacy: There is hope of that man that can bluſh and be ſilent.

After the conviction of the fact, it is ſeaſonable for Nehemiah, to perſwade reformation: No oratory is ſo powerfull, as that of mildneſſe: eſpecially when we have to do with thoſe, who either through ſtomach, or greatneſſe, may not indure a rough reproofe: The drops that fall eaſily upon the corne, ripen, and fill the eare, but the ſtormy ſhowers that fall with violence, beat down the ſtalkes flat to the earth, and lay whole fields, without hope of recovery. Who can reſiſt this ſweet and ſoveraigne reprehenſion; Ought ye not to walk in the feare of our God, becauſe of the reproach of the heathen, our enemies? Did we dwell alone in the midſt of the earth, yet the feare of our God ſhould over-awe our waies; but now that we dwel in the midſt of our enemies, whoſe eyes are bent upon all our actions, whoſe tongues are as ready to blaſpheme God, as we to offend him, how carefully ſhould we avoid thoſe ſins, which may draw ſhame upon our profeſſion? B

Now the ſcandall is worſe than the fact; Thus ſhal Religion ſuffer more from the heathen, than our brethren do from us: If juſtice, if charity cannot ſway with us, yet let the ſcornfull inſultations of the prophane Gentiles, affright us frō theſe preſſures. No ingenuous diſpoſition can be ſo tender of his owne diſgrace, as the true Iſraelite is of the reproch of his God: What is it that he will not rather refraine, do, ſuffer, C than that glorious Name ſhall hazard a blemiſh? They cannot want outward retentives from ſin, that live either among friends, or enemies; if friends, they may not be grieved, if enemies, they may not be provoked: Thoſe that would live well, muſt ſtand in awe of all eyes; Even thoſe that are without the Church, yet may not be without regard: No perſon can be ſo contemptible, as that his cenſure ſhould be contemned.

In diſſwading from ſin, reaſon it ſelfe cannot prevaile more than example. I likewiſe, and my brethren, and my ſervants might exact of them money, and corne. But from the time that I was appointed to the charge of Iudah, I, and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governour. He ſhall never rule well, that doth all that he may: It is not ſafe for either part that a Prince ſhould live at the height of his power, and if the greateſt abate of their right, is it for inferiors to extort? Had Nehemiah aimed at his owne D greatneſſe no man could have had fairer pretences for his gaine.

The former governors that were before him were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, beſides fortie ſhekels of ſilver. His foot had not firſt trode in this commodious path; it was beaten by the ſteps of his predeceſſors; neither did any of them walke beſides it: How ever it might be envious to raiſe new taxations, yet to continue thoſe he found unrepined at, had been out of the reach of exception: A good Governour lookes not ſo much what hath beene done, as what ſhould be; Precedents, are not the rule, whereby he rules, but juſtice, but piety. So did not I, becauſe of the feare of the Lord: Lawes are not a ſtraighter curbe to ſubjects, than conſcience is to good Princes.

They dare not do what they cannot do charitably: what advantage can they think E it, to be frō under the controlment of men, when the God of heaven notes, and puniſhes their offences? Who ſo walketh by this rule, can neither erre, not miſ-carry. It is no truſting to the externall remedies of ſin, eyther they are not alwaies preſent; or if preſent, not powerfull enough; but if the feare of God have once taken up the heart, it goes ever with us, and is ſtrong enough to over-maſter the forceableſt temptation.

Therefore muſt theſe Jewes follow this example of Nehemiah, becauſe he followed not the example of his predeceſſors; becauſe he left their evill, they muſt imitate his good. In vaine ſhall Rulers adviſe againſt their owne practice; when they lead the way, they may wel challenge to be followed: Seldome hath it been ever ſeen

that

A that great perſons have not beene ſeconded in evill; why ſhould not their power ſerve to make patterns of their vertues?

Thus well did it ſpeed with Nehemiah; his merciſull carriage, and zealous ſuit have drawne the Rulers to a promiſe of reſtitution; We will reſtore them, and will require nothing of them, ſo will we do as thou ſaieſt.

It is no ſmall advantage that theſe Nobles muſt forgoe, in their releaſes: there cannot be a better ſigne of a ſound amendment, than that we can be content to be loſers by our repentance; Many formall penitents have yeelded to part with ſo much of their ſin, as may abate nothing of their profit; as if theſe Rulers ſhould have beene willing to reſtore the perſons, but withall ſhould have ſtood ſtiffely to require their ſummes: This whining and partiall ſatisfaction had been thankleſſe. True
B remorſe inlargeth the heart, and openeth the hand to a bountifull redemption of our errors.

Good purpoſes do too often coole in time, and vaniſh into a careleſſe forgetfulneſſe; Nehemiah feared this iſſue of theſe holy reſolutions; and therefore he proſecutes them in their firſt heat; not leaving theſe promiſes, till he had ſecured them, with an oath; The Prieſts are called for, that in their mouthes the adjuration may be more ſolemne, and ſacred; It is the beſt point of wiſdome to take the firſt opportunity of fixing good motions w^ch otherwiſe are of themſelves, light and ſlighty. To make all yet more ſure, their oathes are croſſe-barred with his execration. Alſo I ſhooke my lap and ſaid, ſo God ſhake out every man from his houſe, and from his labour that performeth not this promiſe, even thus be he ſhaken out, and emptyed, and all the Congregation ſaid, Amen. A
C promiſe, an oath, a curſe, are paſſed upon this act; now, no Iſraelite dares falter in the execution: When we have a ſin in chaſe, it is good to follow it home, not ſlackning our purſuit till we have fully prevailed; and when it is once falne under our hands, we cannot kill it too much.

Now Nehemiah having thus happily delivered his people frō a domeſticall captivity, commends his ſervice to the gracious remuneration of the Almighty; Think upon me my God for good, according to all that I have done for this people; Therefore doth he refuſe the bread of the Governor, that he may receive the reward of the Governor of heaven: Had he taken a temporary recōpence, both he, & it had been forgotten, now he hath made an happy change for eternity. Not that he pleads his merit, but ſues for mercy; neither doth he pray to be remembred for his work, but according to his
D work. Our good deeds as they are well accepted of God, ſo they ſhall not goe unrewarded; and what God will give, why may not we crave. Doubtleſſe, as we may offer up our honeſt obediences unto God, ſo we may expect and beg his promiſed retributions; not out of a proud conceit of the worth of our earnings, who at the beſt are no other than unprofitable ſervants, but out of a faithfull dependance upon his pact of bounty, who cannot be leſſe than his word: O God, if we do ought that is good, it is thine act, and not ours: crowne thine owne work in us, and take thou the glory of thine owne mercies.

Whiles Nehemiah is buſie in the reforming abuſes, at home; the enemie is plotting againſt him, abroad; Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geſhem the Arabian conſpire againſt his life, and in him, againſt the peace of Jeruſalem: What open hoſtility could not do,
E they hope to effect by pretence of treaties: Foure ſeverall meſſages call Nehemiah to a friendly meeting. Diſtruſt is a ſure guard. The wiſe governor hath learn'd to ſuſpect the hollow favours of an enemy and to returne them, with ſafe and juſt excuſes. I cannot come downe, why ſhould the worke ceaſe whiles I leave it, and come downe to you? I do not heare him ſay, You intend miſchiefe to me; I will not come forth to you; though this were the proper cauſe of his forbearance, but he turnes them off with an anſwer, that had as much truth, as reſervedneſſe. Fraud is the fitlieſt anſwered with ſubtletie. Even innocency is allowed a lawfull craft; That man is in an ill caſe, that conceales no truth from an adverſary.

What intreaties cannot do, ſhall be attempted by threats; Sanballats ſervant comes now the fifth time, with an open'd letter, importing dangerous intimation, wherein is written, It is reported among the heathen, and Gaſhmu ſaith it, that the Iewes thinke think to rebell; for which cauſe thou buildeſt the wall that thou maiſt be their King. It is reported: and what falſhood may not plead this warrant? What can be more lying than report? Among the heathen: and who is more Ethnick than Sanballat? what Pagan can be worſe than a mungrel Idolater? And Gaſhmu ſaith it, Aſke my fellow elſe; This Arabian was one of thoſe three heads of all the hoſtile combination, againſt Jeruſalem, againſt Nehemiah; It would be wide with innocence if enemies might be allow'd to accuſe.

That the Iewes think to rebell: A ſtale ſuggeſtion, but once, powerfull; Malice hath learn'd to miſcal al actions; where the hands cannot be taxed, very thoughts are prejudged: For which cauſe thou buildeſt the wall, that thou mayeſt be their King; He was never true Iſraelite that hath not paſſed ſpightful ſlanders, and miſconſtructions: Artaxerxes knew his ſervant too well, to beleeve any rumor, that ſhould have beene ſo ſhameleſſe; The ambition of Nehemiah was well knowne to reach only to the cup, not to the Scepter of his Soveraigne; And yet, to make up a ſound tale, Prophets are ſuborned to preach, There is a King in Iudah: as if that loyall governour had corrupted the pulpits alſo; and had taught them the language of treaſon.

But what of all this? what if ſome falſe tongue have whiſpered ſuch idle tales? It is not ſafe for thee, ô Nehemiah, to contemne report: Perhaps this newes ſhal fly to the Court, and work thee a deadly diſpleaſure ere thou canſt know thy ſelf traduced; Come therefore, and let us take counſell together: Surely that man cannot be ſparing of any thing, that is prodigall of his reputation. If ought under heaven can fetch Nehemiah out of his hold, it is the care of his fame. But that warie governour ſees a net ſpread neere unto this ſtall; and therefore keeps aloofe, not without contempt of thoſe ſlie devices. There are no ſuch things done as thou ſayeſt, but thou faineſt them out of thine owne heart: Some imputations are beſt anſwered with a neglective deniall: It falls out often that plaine dealing puts craft out of countenance.

Since neither force nor fraud can kill Nehemiah, they will now trie to draw him into a ſin, and thereby into a reproach; O God, that any Prophets tongue ſhould be mercenary! Shemaiah the Seer, is hired by Tobiah, and Sanballat, to affright the Governor, with the noiſe of his intended murder; and to adviſe him for ſhelter, to flie to the forbidden refuge of the Temple. The colour was faire; Violence is meant to thy perſon, no place but one can promiſe thee ſafety; The City hath as yet no gates; come therefore, and ſhut thy ſelfe up in the Temple, there onely ſhalt thou be free from all aſſaults.

And what if Nehemiah had hearkened to this counſell? Sin, and ſhame had followed; That holy place was for none but perſons ſacred, ſuch as were priviledged by blood, and function; others ſhould preſume, and offend in entring; and now, what would the people ſay? What ſhall become of us whiles our Governor hides his head for feare? Where ſhall we find a Temple to ſecure us? What do we depending upon a cowardly leader?

Well did Nehemiah fore-caſt theſe circumſtances, both of act, and event, and therefore reſolving to diſtruſt a Prophet that perſwaded him to the violation of a Law, he rejects the motion with ſcorne; Should ſuch a man as I flee? Should I go into the Temple to ſave my life? I will not go: It is fit for great perſons to ſtand upon the honour of their places; Their very ſtations ſhould put thoſe ſpirits into them, that ſhould make them hate to ſtoope unto baſe conditions.

Had God ſent this meſſage, we know he hath power to diſpenſe with his owne Lawes; but well might the contradiction of a Law argue the meſſage not ſent of God. God as he is one, ſo doth he perfitly agree with himſelfe. If any private ſpirit croſſe a written word let him be accurſed.

A

Ahaſuerus Feaſting, Vaſhti caſt off, Eſther choſen.

WHat bounds can be ſet to humane ambition? Ahaſuerus, that is, Xerxes the ſon of Darius is already the King of an hundred, and ſeaven and twenty Provinces, and now is ready to fight for more. He hath newly ſubdued Egypt, and is now addreſſing himſelfe for the conqueſt of Greece. He cannot hope ever to ſee all the land that he poſſeſſeth, and yet he cannot be quiet, whiles he heares of more. Leſſe then B two ells of earth ſhall ere long ſerve him, whom, for the time, a whole world ſhall ſcarce ſatisfie; in vaine ſhall a man ſtrive to have that which he cannot injoy, and to injoy ought by meere relation; It is a windie happineſſe that is ſought in the exaggeration of thoſe titles, which are taken upon others credit, without the ſenſe of the owner: Nothing can fill the heart of man, but he that made it. Eſther 1.2.

This great Monarch, partly in triumph of the great victories, that he hath lately wonne in Egypt, and partly, for the animation of his Princes, and ſouldiers to his future exploits, makes a feaſt, like himſelfe, royall and magnificent.

What is greatneſſe if it be not ſhowed? And wherein can greatneſſe be better ſhowne, then in the atchievements of war, and the entertainment of peace?

All other feaſts were but hunger to this of Ahaſuerus, whether wee regard the C number of gueſts, or the largeneſſe of preparation, or continuance of time: During the ſpace of a whole halfe yeer, all the tables were ſumptuouſly furniſhed for all commers from India, to Ethyopia; A world of meat; every meale was ſo ſet on, as if it ſhould have been the laſt: Yet all this long feaſt hath an end; and all this glory is ſhut up in forgetfulneſſe; What is Ahaſuerus the better, that his Peeres then ſaid, he was incomparably great? What are his Peeres the better, that they were feaſted? Happy is he that eates bread, and drinkes new wine in the Kingdome of God; this banquet is for eternity; without intermiſſion, without ſatietie.

What variety of habits, of languages, of manners, met at the boards of Ahaſuerus? What confluence of ſtrange gueſts was there now to Shuſhan? And, leſt the glory of this great King might ſeeme, like ſome courſe picture, onely faire afarre off, after D the Princes and Nobles of the remote Provinces, all the people of Shuſhan are entertained, for ſeven dayes with equall pompe and ſtate; The ſpacious Court of the Palace is turned into a Royall Hall, the walls are of rich hangings, the pillars of marble, the beds of ſilver and gold, the pavement of porphyrie curiouſly checkered; The wine and the veſſels ſtrove whether ſhould be the richer; no men drunke in worſe then gold; and whiles the metall was the ſame, the forme of each cup was diverſe; the attendance was anſwerable to the cheare; and the freedome matched both: Here was no compulſion, either to the meaſure, or quality of the draught; every mans rule was his owne choiſe. Who can but bluſh to ſee forced healths in Chriſtian banquets, when the civility of very Pagans commands liberty.

I cannot but envy the modeſty of heathen Dames, Vaſhti the Queene, and her E Ladies, with all the ſeverall ranks of that ſexe, feaſt apart; intertaining each other, with a bathfull courteſie, without wantonneſſe, without that wild ſcurrility, which uſeth to haunt promiſcuous meetings: Oh ſhamefull unchaſtity of thoſe looſe Chriſtians, who muſt feed their luſt, whiles they fill their bellies; and thinke the feaſt unperfit, where they may not ſatiate their eye no leſſe their palate.

The laſt day of this pompous feaſt is now come: King Ahaſuerus is ſo much more cheerefull, by how much his gueſts are neere to their diſmiſſion. Every one is wont to cloſe up his curteſie with ſo much more paſſion, as the laſt acts uſe to make the deeper impreſſion; And now, that he might at once amaze, and indeare the beholders, Vaſhti the Queene in all her royalty, is called for; Her ſight ſhall ſhut up the feaſt, that the Princes and people may ſay, How happy is King Ahaſuerus, not ſo much in this greatneſſe, as in that beauty.

Seven

Seven officers of the chamber are ſent to carry the meſſage, to attend her entrance, and are returned with a deniall: Perhaps Vaſhti thought, What meanes this uncouth motion? More than ſix months hath this feaſt continued, and all this while we have injoyed the wonted liberty of our ſexe; Were the King ſtill himſelfe, this command could not be ſent; it is the wine, and not he, that is guilty of this errand. Is it for me to humour him in ſo vaine a deſire? Will it agree with our modeſt reſervednesſe, to offer our ſelves to be gazed at by millions of eyes? Who knowes what wanton attempts may follow upon this ungoverned exceſſe? This very meſſage argues that wit, and reaſon have yeelded their places to that beſotting liquor. Nothing but abſence can ſecure us from ſome unbeſeeming profer; neither doubt I, but the King when he returnes to himſelfe, will give me thanks for ſo wiſe a forbearance. A

Thus upon the conceit (as is likely) that her preſence would be either needleſſe, or unſafe, Vaſhti refuſeth to come; Although perhaps her great ſpirits thought much to receive a command from the hand of officers. B

The blood that is once inflamed with wine, is apt to boyle with rage: Ahaſuerus is very wroth with this indigne repulſe: It was the oſtentation of his glory, & might, that he affected, before theſe Princes, Peeres, people; and now that ſeems eclipſed, in the ſhutting up of all his magnificence, with the diſgraceſull affront of a woman. It vexes him to think that thoſe Nobles, whom he meant to ſend away aſtoniſhed with the admiration of his power, and majeſty, ſhould now ſay: What boots it Ahaſuerus to rule afarre off, when he cannot command at home? In vaine doth he boaſt to governe Kings, whiles he is checked by a woman.

Whatever were the intentions of Vaſhti, ſurely her diſobedience was inexcuſable, it is not for a good wife to judge of her huſbands will, but to execute it: neither wit, nor ſtomacke may carry her into a curious inquiſition into the reaſons of an injoyned charge, much leſſe to a reſiſtance: but in a hood-winkt ſimplicity ſhe muſt follow, whither ſhee is led; as one that holds her chiefe praiſe to conſiſt in ſubjection. C

Where ſhould the perfection of wiſdome dwell, if not in the Courts of great Princes? or what can the treaſures of Monarchs purchaſe more invaluably precious, than learned and judicious attendance? Or who can bee ſo fit for honour as the wiſeſt.

I doubt how Ahaſuerus could have been ſo great, if his throne had not beene ſtill compaſſed with them that knew the times, and underſtood the law, and judgment. Theſe were his Oracles in all his doubts. Theſe are now conſulted in this difficulty; neither muſt their advice be ſecretly whiſpered, in the Kings eare, but publikely delivered in the audience of all the Princes. It is a perilous way that theſe ſages are called to go, betwixt a huſband and wife; eſpecially of ſuch power, and eminency: yet Memucan feares not to paſſe a heavy ſentence againſt Queene Vaſhti. Vaſhti, the Queene hath not done wrong to the King onely, but alſo to all the Princes, and all the people, that are in all the Provinces of the King Ahaſuerus. A deep and ſore crimination; injuries are ſo much more intolerable, as they are dilated unto more; thoſe offences which are of narrow extent, may receive an eaſie ſatisfaction; the amends are not poſſible, where the wrong is univerſall: For this deed of the Queen ſhall come abroad to all women, ſo that they ſhall deſpiſe their husbands in their eyes: Indeed ſo publik a fact muſt needs flie; That concourſe gave fit opportunity to diffuſe it all the world over; The examples of the great are eaſily drawne into rules. Bad leſſons are apt to be taken out; as honour, ſo contempt fals downe from the head to the ſkirts; never aſcends from the ſkirts to the head. D E

Theſe wiſe men are ſo much the more ſenſible of this danger, as they ſaw it more likely, the caſe might prove their owne. Likewiſe ſhall the Ladies of Perſia and Media ſay this day unto all the Kings Princes. The firſt precedents of evill muſt be carefully avoided, if we care to keepe a conſtant order in good. Prudence cannot better beſtirre it ſelf, than in keeping miſchiefe from home.

The foundation of this doome of Memucan is not laid ſo deep for nothing; If it pleaſe the King let there goe a royall commandement from him, and let it be written among

the

A the lawes of Perſians, and Medians, that it be not altered, that Vaſhti come no more before Ahaſuerus; and let the King give her royall eſtate to another that is better than ſhe. How bold a word was this, and how hazardous? Had Ahaſuerus more loved the beauty of Vaſhti, than his honor, Memucan had ſpoken againſt his owne life: Howſoever, a Queene of ſo great ſpirits, could not want ſtrength of favour, and faction, in the Perſian Court; which could not but take fire at ſo deſperate a motion. Faithfull Stateſmen, overlooking private reſpects, muſt bend their eyes upon publique dangers, labouring to prevent a common miſchiefe, though with the adventure of their owne. Nature had taught theſe Pagans the neceſſity of a female ſubjection; and the hate and ſcorne of a proud diſobedience. They have unlearned the very dictates of Nature, that can abide the head to be ſet below the ribbe.

B I cannot ſay but Vaſhti was worthy of a ſharp cenſure; I cannot ſay ſhee was worthy a repudiation. This plaiſter drew too hard; It was but heathen juſtice to puniſh the wives diſobedience in one indifferent act, with a divorce: Nothing but the violation of the mariage-bed, can either breake or unty the knot of mariage. Had ſhe not been a Queen, had not that contemptuous act been publique, the ſentence had not been ſo hard; now the puniſhment muſt be exemplary, leſt the ſin ſhould be ſo. Many a one had ſmarted leſſe, if their perſons, if their places had been meaner.

The King, the Princes approve this heavy judgement of Memucan; It is not in the power of the faire face of Vaſhti, to warrant her ſtomacke: No doubt many meſſages paſſed ere the rigour of this execution: That great heart knowes not to relent, but will rather break, than yeeld to an humble deprecation. When the ſtone and the
C ſteele meet, fire is ſtricken; it is a ſoft anſwer that appeaſeth wrath. Vaſhti is caſt off, Letters are ſent from the King, into all his Provinces, to command that every man ſhould rule at home; The Court affords them an awfull patterne of authority: Had not Ahaſuerus doted much upon Vaſhties beauty, he had not called her forth at the feaſt, to be wondred at, by his Peeres and people, yet now he ſo feeles the wound of his reputation, that he forgets he ever felt any wound of his affection. Even the greateſt love may be over-ſtrained; It is not ſafe preſuming upon the deepeſt aſſurances of deareneſſe: There is no heart that may not be eſtranged. It is not poſſible that great Princes ſhould want ſoothing up in all their inclinations, in all their actions: Whiles Ahaſuerus is following the chaſe of his ambition, in the warres of Greece, his followers are providing for his luſt at home; Nothing could ſound more plea-
D ſing to a carnall eare, than that all the faire yong virgins, thorowout all his dominions, ſhould be gathered into his palace at Shuſhan, for his aſſay, and choice: The decree is ſoon publiſhed; The charge is committed to Hegai, the Kings Chamberlaine, both of their purification, and ornaments.

What ſtrife, what emulation was now, amongſt all the Perſian damoſells, that either were, or thought themſelves faire? Every one hopes to be a Queene, and ſees no reaſon why any other ſhould be thought more excellent; How happy were wee if we could be ſo ambitious of our eſpouſalls to the King of heaven?

Amongſt all this throng of Virgins, God hath provided a wife for Ahaſuerus; having determined his choice, where moſt advantage ſhall riſe to his forlorne people.

E The Iewes were miſerably ſcattered over the world, in that wofull deportation under Ieconiah; ſcarce an handfull of them returned to Ieruſalem; the reſt remaine ſtill diſperſed where they may but have leave to live. There are many thouſands of them turned over with the Babylonian Monarchy, to the Perſian; amongſt the reſt, was Mordecai, the ſon of Iair, of the tribe of Beniamin; a man of no meane note, or abilitie; who, living in Shuſhan, had brought up Hadaſſah, or Eſther, his uncles daughter, in a liberall faſhion; It was happy for this Orphane, that in a region of captivity, ſhe light into ſuch good hands; Her wiſe kinſman findes it fit, that her breeding, and habit ſhould be Perſian like; In outward and civill formes, there was no need to vary from the heathen; her Religion muſt bee her owne; the reſt was ſo altogether theirs, that her very Nation was not diſcerned.

The ſame God that had given incomparable beauty to this Ieweſſe, gave her alſo favour in the eyes of Hegai, the keeper of the women; She is not only taken into the Persian Court, as one of the selected virgins, but observed with more than ordinary respect; all necessaries for her speedy purification are brought to her; Seven maides are allowed for her attendance, and the best and most honourable place in that Seraglio is allotted to her; As if this great officer had designed her for a Queene, before the choice of his master. A

What strange preparation was here for the impure bed of an heathen? Every Virgin must be sixe moneths purified with oyle of myrrhe, and sixe other moneths perfumed with sweet odors, besides those speciall receits that were allowed to each, upon their owne election: O God, what care, what cost is requisite to that soule which should be addressed a fit Bride for thine holy and glorious Majestie?

When we have scoured our selves with the most cleansing oyle of our repentance, and have perfumed our selves with thy best graces, and our perfectest obedience, it is the onely praise of thy mercy, that we may be accepted. B

The other Virgins passed their probation, unregarded; when Esthers turne came, though she required nothing, but tooke what was given her; though she affected nothing, but brought that face, that demeanure, which nature had cast upon her, no eye sees her without admiration; the King takes such pleasure in her beauty, that contemning all the other vulgar formes, his choice is fully fixed upon her; All things must prosper, where God hath intended the successe: the most wise providence of the Almighty fetches his projects from far; The preservation and advantage of his owne people is in hand; for the contriving of this, Vashti shall be abandoned; the Virgins shall be chosen; Esther onely shall please Ahasuerus; Mordecai shall displease Haman; Hamans ruine shall raise Mordecai: The purposes of God cannot be judged by his remote actions; onely the accomplishment showes his designes; In the meane time, it pleaseth him to looke another way, than he moves; and to worke his owne ends, by arbitrary and unlikely accidents. C

None but Esther shall succeed Vashti; she onely caries the heart of Ahasuerus from all her sexe; The royall Crowne is set upon her head; And, as Vashti was cast off at a feast, so, with a solemne feast shall Esther be espoused; Here wanted no triumph, to expresse the joy of this great Bridegroome; and that the world might witnesse he could be no lesse loving, than severe, all his Provinces shall feele the pleasure of this happy match, in their immunities, in their rich gifts.

With what envious eyes doe we think Vashti lookt upon her glorious rivall? How doth she now (though too late) secretly chide her peevish will, that had thus stript her of her royall crowne, and made way for a more happy successor? Little did shee thinke her refusall could have had so hainous a construction: Little did she feare, that one word (perhaps not ill meant) should have forfeited her husband, her crown, and all that she was. Who so is not wise enough to forecast the danger of an offence, or indiscretion, may have leisure enough of an unseasonable repentance. D

That minde is truly great and noble, that is not changed with the highest prosperity; Queene Esther cannot forget her cozen Mordecai; No pompe can make her sleight the charge of so deare a kinsman: In all her royalty, she casts her eye upon him, amongst the throng of beholders, but she must not know him; her obedience keepes her in awe, and will not suffer her to draw him up with her, to the participation of her honor; it troubles her not a little, to forbeare this duty; but she must: It is enough for her, that Mordecai hath commanded her not to be acknowne, who, or whose she was. E

Perhaps the wise Jew feared, that whiles her honour was yet green, and unsetled, the notice of her nation, and the name of a despised captive might be some blemish to her in that proud Court; when as afterwards, upon the merit of her cariage, and the full possession of all hearts, her name might dignifie her nation, and countermand all reproches.

Mordecai was an officer in the Court of Ahasuerus; his service called him daily to attend in the Kings gate; Much better might he, being a Jew, serve a Pagan Master, than his foster-daughter might ascend to a Pagans bed.

If the necessity or convenience of his occasions called him to serve; his piety and and Religion called him to faithfulneſſe in his ſervice: Two of the Kings Chamberlaines, Bigthana, and Teriſh, conſpire againſt the life of their Soveraigne. No greatneſſe can ſecure from trechery, or violence: He that ruled over millions of men, through an hundred and ſeven and twenty Provinces, cannot aſſure himſelfe from the hand of a villaine; He that had the power of other mens lives, is in danger of his owne. Happy is that man, that is once poſſeſſed of a crowne incorruptible, unfadable, reſerved for him in heaven: no force, no treaſon can reach thither, there can bee no perill of either violence, or forfeiture,

The likelieſt defence of the perſon of any Prince, is the fidelity of his attendants: Mordecai over-heares the whiſpering of theſe wicked conſpirators; & reveales it to Eſther; ſhe (as glad of ſuch an opportunity to commend unto Ahaſuerus the loyaltie of him whom ſhe durſt but ſecretly honour) reveales it to the King; The circumſtances are examined, the plot is diſcovered, the traytors executed, the ſervice recorded in the Perſian Annalls. A good foundation is thus laid for Mordecaies advancement, which yet is not over-haſtened, on either part; Worthy diſpoſitions labour only to deſerve well, leaving the care of their remuneration, to them, whom it concernes; It is fit that Gods leaſure ſhould be attēded in all his deſignments; The houre is ſet, when Mordecai ſhall be raiſed: If in the meane time there be an intervention, not onely of neglect, but of feares, and dangers, all theſe ſhall make his honour ſo much more ſweet, more precious.

Haman disrespected by Mordecai. Mordecaies message to Esther.

BEſides the charge of his office, the care of Eſthers proſperity cals Mordecai to the Kings gate; and fixes him there: With what inward contentment did he thinke of his ſo royall pupill? Here I ſit among my fellowes; little doth the world thinke, that mine adopted child ſits in the Throne of Perſia: that the great Empreſſe of the world owes her ſelfe to me; I might have more honour, I could not have ſo much ſecret comfort, if all Shuſhan knew what intereſt I have in Queen Eſther. Esther 3. 4.

Whiles his heart is taken up with theſe thoughts, who ſhould come ruffling by him, but the new-raiſed favourite of King Ahaſuerus, Haman the ſon of Ammedatha the Agagite? Him hath the great King inexpectedly advanced, and ſet his ſeat above all the Princes that were with him: The gracious reſpects of Princes are not alwaies led by merit, but by their owne will; which is ever affected to be ſo much the freer, as themſelves would be held more great.

When the Sun ſhines upon the Diall, every paſſenger will be looking at it; There needed no command of reverence, where Ahaſuerus was pleaſed to countenance; All knees will bow alone even to forbidden Idolls of honour; how much more where royall authority injoynes obeiſance? All the ſervants, all the ſubjects of King Ahaſuerus are willingly proſtrate before this great mignon of their Soveraigne; onely Mordecai ſtands ſtiffe, as if he ſaw nothing more than a man in that proud Agagite.

They are not obſerved that doe as the moſt; but if any one man ſhall vary from the multitude, all eyes are turned upon him: Mordecaies fellow-officers note this palpable irreverence, and expoſtulate it; Why tranſgreſſeſt thou the Kings commandements? Conſidereſt thou not how farre this affront reacheth? It is not the perſon of Haman, whom thou refuſeſt to adore, but the King in him: Neither doe wee regard ſo much the man, as the command; Let him be never ſo vile whom the King bids to be honoured, with what ſafety can a ſubject examine the charge, or reſiſt it? his unworthineſſe cannot diſpence with our loyalty.

What a dangerous wilfulneſſe ſhould it be to incurre the forfeiture of thy place, of thy life for a curteſie? If thou wilt not bow with others, expect to ſuffer alone; perhaps (they thought) this omiſſion was unheedy; in a caſe of ignorance, or incogitancie, it was a friendly office to admoniſh; the ſight of the errour had been the remedy. A Mordecai heares their challenge, their advice; and thinkes good to anſwer both, with ſilence; as willing they ſhould imagine, his inflexibleneſſe proceeded from a reſolution; and that reſolution upon ſome ſecret grounds, which he needed not impart: at laſt yet he imparts thus much: Let it ſuffice, that I am a Iew, and Haman an Amalekite.

After a private expoſtulation, the continuance of that open neglect is conſtrued for a ſullen obſtinacie; and now, the monitors themſelves grow ſenſible of the contempt: Men are commonly impatient to loſe the thanke of their indeavours, and are prone to hate whom they cannot reforme. Partly therefore to picke a thanke, and partly to revenge this contumacy, theſe officers turne informers againſt Mordecai, neither meant to make the matter fairer than it was; they tell Haman how proud and ſtubborne a Iew ſate amongſt them, how ill they could brooke ſo ſaucy an affront to be offered to his greatneſſe; how ſeriouſly they had expoſtulated, how ſtomackefully the offender perſiſted; and beſeech him, that he would be pleaſed in his next paſſage, to caſt ſome glances that way, and but obſerve the faſhion of that intolerable inſolency. B

The proud Agagite cannot long endure the very expectation of ſuch an indignity; On purpoſe doth he ſtalke thither, with higher than his ordinary ſteps; ſnuffing up the aire as he goes, and would ſee the man, that durſt deny reverence to the greateſt Prince of Perſia. C

Mordecai holds his old poſture; onely he is ſo much more careleſſe, as he ſees Haman more diſdainefull, and imperious; neither of them goes about to hide his paſſion; one lookt as if he ſaid, I hate the pride of Haman; the other lookt, as if he ſaid, I will plague the contempt of Mordecai: how did the eyes of Haman ſparkle with fury, and as it were dart out deadly beames in the face of that deſpightfull Iew? How did he ſwell with indignation; and then againe waxe pale with anger? ſhortly, his very brow and his motion bad Mordecai look for the utmoſt of revenge.

Mordecai foreſees his danger, and contemnes it; no frownes, no threats can ſouple thoſe joynts: he may breake, he will not bow. D

What ſhall we ſay then to this obfirmed reſolution of Mordecai? What is it, what can it be, that ſo ſtiffens the knees of Mordecai, that death is more eaſie to him, than their incurvation? Certainely, if meere civility were in queſtion, this wilfull irreverence to ſo great a Peere, could not paſſe without the juſt cenſure of a rude perverſneſſe; It is Religion that forbids this obeiſance, and tells him, that ſuch curteſie could not be free from ſinne; Whether it were, that more than humane honour was required to this new-erected image of the great King, as the Perſians were ever wont to be noted for too much laviſhneſſe in theſe courtly devotions: Or whether it were that the ancient curſe wherewith God had branded the blood, and ſtocke of Haman, made it unlawfull for an Iſraelite to give him any obſervance: For the Amalekites (of whoſe royall line Haman was deſcended) were the nation, with which God had ſworne perpetuall hoſtility; and whoſe memory he had ſtraitly charged his people to root out, from under heaven; How may I (thinkes he) adore, where God commands me to deteſt? How may I profeſſe reſpect, where God profeſſeth enmity? How may I contribute to the eſtabliſhment of that ſeed upon earth, which God hath charged to be pulled up from under heaven? Outward actions of indifferency, when once they are felt to trench upon the conſcience, lay deepe obligations upon the ſoule; even whiles they are moſt ſleighted by careleſſe hearts. E

Exod. 17. 16. Deut. 25. 19.

In what a flame of wrath doth Haman live this while? wherewith hee could not but have conſumed his owne heart, had he not given vent to that rage in his aſſured purpoſes of revenge: Great mens anger is like to themſelves, ſtrong, fierce, ambitious, of an exceſſive ſatisfaction. Haman ſcorns to take up with the blood of Mordecai;

This

A This were but a vulgar amends; Poore men can kill where they hate, and expiate their owne wrong, with the life of a single enemy: Hamans fury shall fly an higher pitch; Millions of throates are few enow to bleed for this offence: It is a Iew that hath despighted him, all the whole nation of the Iewes shall perish for the stomach of this one: The Monarchy of the world was now in the hand of the Persian, as Iudæa was within this compasse, so there was scarce a Iew upon earth, without the verge of the Persian dominions: The generation, the name shall now die at once; Neither shall there be any memory of them, but this; There was a people, which having beene famous through the world, for three thousand, foure hundred and fourescore yeares, were in a moment, extinct by the power of Haman for default of a curtesie.

Perhaps, that hereditary grudge, and old antipathy, that was betwixt Israel, and
B Amalek, stucke still in the heart of this Agagite; he might know that God had commanded Israel to root out Amalek from under heaven; and now therefore an Amalekite shall be ready to take this advantage against Israel. It is extreame injustice to dilate the punishment, beyond the offence; and to enwrap thousands of innocents within the trespasse of one: How many that were yet unborne when Haman was unsaluted, must rue the fact they lived not to know? How many millions of Iewes were then living, that knew not there was a Mordecai? all of them are fetcht into one condition, and must suffer, ere they can know their offence. Oh the infinite distance betwixt the unjust cruelty of men, and the just mercies of the Almighty; Even Caiphas himselfe could say, It is better that one man die, than that all the people should perish; and here Haman can say, It is better that all the people should perish than that one man
C should die. Thy mercy, O God, by the willing death of one that had not sinned, hath defrayed the just death of a world of sinners: Whiles the injurious rigour of a man, for the supposed fault of one, would destroy a whole nation, that had not offended: It is true, that by the sin of one, death raigned over all; but it was, because all sinned in that one: had not all men been in Adam, all had not falne in him, al had not died in him; It was not the man, but mankinde that fell into sin, and by sin, into death: No man can complaine of punishment, whiles no man can exempt himselfe from the transgression: Unmercifull Haman would have imbrued his hands in that blood, which he could not but confesse innocent.

It is a rare thing, if the height of favour cause not presumption; Such is Hamans
D greatnesse, that he takes his designe for granted, ere it can receive a motion; The fittest dayes for this great massacre, are determined by the lots of their common divination; according whereunto, Haman chooseth the houre of this bloody suit; and now, waited on by opportunity, he addresseth himselfe to King Ahasuerus. There is a certaine people scattered abroad, and dispersed among the people, in all the Provinces of the Kingdome, and their lawes are divers from all people; neither keepe they the Kings lawes, therefore it is not for the Kings profit to suffer them; If it please the King, let it be written that they may be destroyed, and I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the hands of the officers. With what cunning hath this man couched his malice? He doth not say, There is a Jew that hath affronted me, let me be avenged of his nation; this rancour was too monstrous to be confessed; perhaps this suggestion might have bred in the mind of Ahasuerus a conceit of Hamans ill nature, and intolerable immanity; but his pretences
E are plausible, and such as drive at no other, than the publike good; Every word hath his insinuation, It is a scattered people; were the nation intire, their maintenance could not but stand with the Kings honour; but now since they are but straglers, as their losse would be insensible, so their continuance, and mixture cannot but be prejudiciall; It was not the fault, it was the misery of these poore Iews, that they were dispersed: and now their disperson is made an argument of their extirpation; therefore must they be destroyed, from the earth, because they were scattered over the earth. As good, so evils draw on each other; That which should plead for pitty in the well affected, is a motive to cruelty in savage mindes. Seldome ever hath extremity of mischiefe seized, where easier afflictions have not been billeted before.

All faithfull Iews had wont to say unto God, Have mercy upon us, O God, and save us, for our soule is full of contempt, and we are scattered amongst the heathen; and here this enemy can say of them, to Ahasuerus, Destroy them for they are scattered; Root them out, for they are contemned; How much better is it to fall into the hands of God, than of men; since that which whets the sword of men, workes commiseration in the Almighty: Besides the dissipation of the persons, Their lawes are divers from all people: All other people live by thy lawes, they onely by their owne: and how can this singularity of their fashions, but breed disorder, and inconvenience? Did they live in some corner of the earth apart, the difference in Religion and government could not import much; now, that they are dispersed amongst all thy subjects, what doe these uncouth formes of theirs, but teach all the world to bee irregular? Why should they live under thy protection, that will not be governed by thy lawes?

Wicked Haman! what were the lawes of Israel, but the lawes of God? if this be a quarrell, what shall the death of the Iewes be other, than martyrdome?

The diversity of judgement, and practice from the rest of the world hath been an old, and envious imputation cast upon Gods Church: What if we be singled from others, whiles we walk with God? In matters lawfull, arbitrary, indifferent, wisdome teacheth us to conforme our selves to all others; but where God hath laid a speciall imposition upon us, we must either vary, or sin: The greatest glory of Israel was their lawes, wherein they as far exceeded all other nations, as heaven is above earth; yet, here their lawes are quarrelled, and are made the inducements of their destruction; It is not possible that the Church of God should escape persecution, whiles that which it hath good is maligned; whiles that offends which makes it happy.

Yet, that they have lawes of their owne, were not so unsufferable, if withall, they did observe thine, O King; but these Iewes, as they are unconformable, so they are seditious: They keep not the Kings lawes: Thou slandrest, Haman; they could not keep their owne lawes, if they kept not the Kings; for their lawes call them to obedience unto their Soveraignes; and adjudge hell to the rebellious: In all those hundred and seven and twenty Provinces, King Ahasuerus hath no subjects, but them; They obey out of conscience, others out of feare: why are they charged with that, which they doe most abhorre? What can be the ground of this crimination? Ahasuerus commanded all knees to bow to Haman; A Iew onely refuses; Malicious Haman! He that refused to bow unto thee, had sufficiently approved his loyalty to Ahasuerus; Ahasuerus had not been, if Mordecai had not been a good subject; Hath the King no laws, but what concerne thine adoration? Set aside Religion (wherein the Iew is ready to present if not active, yet passive obedience) and name that Persian law, which a Iew dares breake.

As I never yet read, or heard of a conscionable Israelite, that hath not passed under this calumniation, so I cannot yeeld him a true Israelite, that deserves it.

In vaine doth he professe to acknowledge a God, in heaven, that denies homage to his deputy, on earth.

It is not for the Kings profit to suffer them. Worldly hearts are not led by good, or evil, but by profit, or losse; neither have they grace to know that nothing is profitable but what is honest, nothing so desperately incommodious, as wickednesse; They must needs offend by rule that measure all things by profit, and measure profit by their imagination. How easie is it to suggest strange untruths, when there is no body to make answer? False Haman, how is it not for the Kings profit to suffer the Iews? If thou construe this profit, for honour, the Kings honour is in the multitude of subjects, and what people more numerous than they? If for gaine, the Kings profit is in the largenesse of his Tributes; and what people are more deep in their payments? If for service, what people are more officious? How can it stand with the Kings profit to bereave himselfe of subjects, his subjects of their lives, his Exchequer of their tributes, his State of their defence? Hee is a weake polititian that knowes not to guild over the worst project, with a pretence of publike utility. No name under heaven hath made so many fooles, so many villaines, as this of profit.

Lastly, as Ahasuerus reapes nothing but disprofit by the lives of the Iewes, so hee shall reape no small profit by their deaths: I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to

the

A the Kings treasurie for this execution. If revenge were not very sweet to the malicious man, he could not be content to purchase it at so high a rate; How doe wee see daily that the thirst hereof caries men to a riotous prodigality of estate, body, soule?

Cruell Haman! if thou couldst have swimmed in a whole Sea of Iewish blood, if thou couldst have raised mountaines of their carcasses; if thou couldst have made all Persia thy shables, who would have given thee one farthing for al those piles of flesh, for all those streames of blood? yea who would not rather have been at charge for the avoiding of the annoyances of those slaughtered bodies, which thou offerest to buy at ten thousand talents? It were an happy thing, if charity could enlarge it selfe, but so much as malice; if the preservation of mankinde could be so much beholden to our bounty, as the destruction.

B Now when all these are laid together, the baseness and dispersedness of the people, the diversitie of the lawes, the irregularity of their government, the rebellion of their practice, the inconvenience of their toleration, the gaine of their extirpation; what could the wit or art of man devise more insinuative, more likely to perswade? How could it be but Ahasuerus must needs thinke (since hee could not suspect the ground of this suit;) What a zealous patriot have I raised, that can be content to buy off the incommodity of the State, at his owne charge? How worthy is he rather of the aide both of my power, and purse? why should I be fee'd to ease my Kingdomes of rebells: The silver is given to thee, the people also, to doe with them as seemeth good to thee: Without all delay, the secretaries are called to write the warrants, the Kings ring is given to seale them, the Posts are sent out to cary them into all Provinces; C The day is set wherein all Iewes, of all ages, of both sexes, thorow the hundred and seven and twentie Provinces of the King, shall bee sacrificed to the wrath of Haman.

In all the cariage of Ahasuerus, who sees not too much headdinesse of passion? Vashti is cast off for a trifle; the Iewes are given to the slaughter for nothing, his rage in the one, his favour in the other is too impotent: He is not a worse husband than a King; the bare word of Haman is enough to kill so many subjects: No disposition can be more dangerous in great persons, than violence of affection mixt with credulity. Oh the seeming inequality of humane conditions: The King and Haman sate downe to drinke, but the Citie of Shushan was perplexed: It is a wofull thing to see great ones quaffe the teares of the oppressed; and to heare them make musicke of D shriekes.

With what lamentation doe we thinke all the Synagogues of Iewes thorow the world received this fatall message of their proclaimed destruction? How doe they bemone themselves, each to other? How doe their conjoyned cries fill heaven, and earth? But above all, what sack-cloth and ashes could suffice wofull Mordecai, that found in himselfe the occasion of all this slaughter? What soule could be capable of more bitternesse, than he felt? Whiles he could not but think, Wretched man that I am; It is I, that have brought all this calamity upon my nation; It is I, that have been the ruine of my people: woe is me that ever I put my selfe into the Court, into the service of a Pagan; how unhappy was I to cast my selfe into these straits, that I must either honour an Agagite, or draw a vengeance upon Israel? Yet how could I imaE gine, that, the flame of Hamans rage would have broke out so farre? might that revenge have determined in my blood, how happy should I have been? now, I have brought death upon many thousands of innocents, that cannot know wherefore they die; Why did I not hide my selfe rather from the place of that proud Amalekite? Why did I stand out in contestation with so over-powerfull an enemy? Alas, no man of Israel shall so much as live to curse me, onely mine enemies shall record my name with ignominie, and say, Mordecai was the bane of his nation. Oh, that my zeale should have reserved me for so heavy a service! Where now are those vaine ambitions, wherewith I pleased my selfe in this great match of Esther? How fondly did I hope by this undue meanes to raise my selfe and my people? Yea, is not this carnall presumption the quarrell that God hath against me? Doe I not therefore smart frō these Pagans, for that I secretly affected this uncircumcised alliance? How-soever

ſoever it be, yet, O God, what have thy people done? Oh let it be thy juſt mercy that I may periſh alone! A

In theſe ſad thoughts did Mordecai ſpend his heart, whiles he walked mournfully in ſackcloth, before that gate, wherein he was wont to ſit; now his habit bars his approch; no ſackcloth might come within the Court: Loe, that which is welcomeſt in the Court of heaven, is here excluded from the preſence of this earthly royaltie: A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe.

Neither did it a little adde to the ſorrow of Mordecai, to heare the bitter inſultations of his former monitors: Did we not adviſe thee better? Did we not fore-admoniſh thee of thy danger? See now the iſſue of thine obſtinacie: now ſee, what it is for thine earthen pitcher to knock with braſſe? now, where is the man that would needs conteſt with Haman? haſt thou not now brought thy matters to a faire paſſe? Thy ſtomacke had long owed thee a ſpight, and now it hath paid thee; who can pitty thy wilfulneſſe? ſince thou wouldeſt needs deride our counſell, wee will take leave to laugh at thy ſackcloth. Nothing but ſcornes and griefes, and terrors preſent themſelves to miſerable Mordecai. All the externall buffets of adverſaries were ſleight to the wounds that he hath made, and felt in his owne heart. B

The perpetuall intelligences that were cloſely held betwixt Eſther and Mordecai, could not ſuffer his publike ſorrow to be long concealed from her; The newes of his ſackcloth afflicts her ere ſhe can ſuſpect the cauſe; her crown doth but clog her head, whiles ſhe heares of his aſhes; True friendſhip transformes us into the condition of thoſe we love; and if it cannot raiſe them to our cheerefulneſſe, drawes us downe to their dejection: Faine would ſhe uncaſe her foſter-father of theſe mournfull weeds, and change his ſackcloth for tiſſue; that yet, at leaſt, his cloathes might not hinder his acceſſe to her preſence, for the free opening of his griefes. C

It is but a ſleight ſorrow that abides to take in outward comforts; Mordecai refuſes that kinde offer; and would have Eſther ſee that his affliction was ſuch, as that he might well reſolve to put off his ſackcloth and his ſkin at once; that hee muſt mourne to death rather than ſee her face to live.

The good Queene is aſtoniſht with this conſtant humiliation of ſo deare a friend; and now ſhe ſends Hatach, a truſtie (though a Pagan) attendant, to inquire into the occaſion of this ſo irremediable heavineſſe: It ſhould ſeeme Eſther inquired not greatly into matters of State; that which perplexed all Shuſhan, was not yet knowne to her; her followers, not knowing her to be a Ieweſſe, conceived not how the newes might concerne her, and therefore had forborn the relation: Mordecai firſt informes her, by her meſſenger, of the decree that was gone out againſt all her nation, of the day wherein they muſt all prepare to bleed, of the ſumme which Haman had profered for their heads, and delivers the copy of that bloody Edict; charging her, now, if ever, to beſtir her ſelfe; and to improve all her love, all her power with King Ahaſuerus, in a ſpeedy and humble ſupplication for the ſaving of the life (not of himſelfe ſo much, as) of her people. D

It was tydings able to confound a weake heart; and hers, ſo much the more, as ſhee could apprehend nothing but impoſſibility of redreſſe: ſhee needs but to put Mordecai in minde of that, which all the Kings ſervants & ſubjects knew well enough that the Perſian law made it no leſſe than death for whomſoever, man, or woman, that ſhould preſſe into the inner court of the King, uncalled. Nothing but the royall ſcepter extented, could keep that preſumptuous offender from the grave. For her, thirtie dayes were now paſſed ſince ſhe was called in to the King; an intermiſſion, that might be juſtly ſuſpicious; Whether the heate of his firſt affection were thus ſoone (of it ſelfe) allayed towards her; or whether ſome ſuggeſtions of a ſecret enemy (perhaps his Agagite) may have ſet him off; or whether ſome more pleaſing object may have laid hold on his eyes; what ever it might be, this abſence could not but argue ſome ſtrangeneſſe, and this ſtrangeneſſe muſt needs imply a danger in her bold intruſion: Shee could bewaile therefore, ſhe could not hope to remedy this diſmall day of her people. This anſwer in the eares of Mordecai ſounded truth, but weakneſſe; neither can he take up with ſo feeble a returne; Theſe occaſions require E

other

A other ſpirits, other reſolutions, which muſt be quickened by a more ſtirring replie: Thinke not with thy ſelfe that thou ſhalt eſcape in the Kings houſe, more than all the Iewes. For if thou altogether holdeſt thy peace at this time, then ſhall there inlargement, and deliverance ariſe to the Iewes from another place, but thou and thy fathers houſe ſhall be deſtroyed. And who knoweth whether thou art come to the Kingdome for ſuch a time as this?

The expectation of death had not quailed the ſtrong heart of faithful Mordecai; even, whiles he mournes, his zeale droops not; there could have been no life in that breſt, which this meſſage could not have rouzed.

What then? is it death that thou feareſt in this attempt of thy ſupplication; what other than death awaits thee in the neglect of it? there is but this difference, ſue, and thou maiſt die, ſue not, and thou muſt die: what blood haſt thou but Iewiſh? and if
B theſe unalterable Edicts exempt no living ſoule, what ſhall become of thine? and canſt thou be ſo vainely timerous, as to die for feare of death? to prefer certainty of danger, before a poſſibility of hopes? Away with this weake cowardiſe unworthy of an Iſraelite, unworthy of a Queen: But if faint-heartedneſſe or private reſpects ſhall ſeale up thy lips, or withhold thine hand from the aide of thy people; if thou canſt ſo far neglect Gods Church, know thou that God will not neglect it; it ſhall not be in the power of Tyrants to root out his choſen ſeed; that holy one of Iſrael ſhall rather worke miracles from heaven, than his inheritance ſhall periſh upon earth? and how juſt ſhall it then be for that jealous God, to take vengeance upon thee, and thy fathers houſe for this cold unhelpfulneſſe to his diſtreſſed Church? Suffer mee therefore to adjure thee by all that tenderneſſe of love, wherewith I have trained up
C thine orphane infancie; by all thoſe deare and thankfull reſpects which thou haſt vowed to me againe; by the Name of the God of Iſrael whom we ſerve, that thou awaken and ſtirre up thine holy courage, and dare to adventure thy life, for the ſaving of many; It hath pleaſed the Almighty to raiſe thee up to that height of honor, which our progenitors could little expect; why ſhouldſt thou be wanting to him, that hath been ſo bountifull to thee? yea, why ſhould I not thinke that God hath put this very act into the intendment of thine exaltation, having on purpoſe thus ſeaſonably hoyſed thee up to the throne, that thou maiſt reſcue his poore Church from an utter ruine?

Oh the admirable faith of Mordecai, that ſhines thorow all theſe cloudes, and in the thickeſt of theſe fogges, deſcries a chearefull glimpſe of deliverance; He ſaw the D day of their common deſtruction enacted, he knew the Perſian decrees to be unalterable; but, withall, he knew there was a Meſſias to come; hee was ſo well acquainted with Gods covenanted aſſurances to his Church, that he thorow the midſt of thoſe bloody reſolutions foreſees indemnity to Iſrael; rather truſting the promiſes of God, than the threats of men. This is the victory that overcomes all the feares, and fury of the world, even our faith.

It is quarrell enough againſt any perſon, or community not to have been aidfull to the diſtreſſes of Gods people. Not to ward the blow, if we may, is conſtrued for little better than ſtriking. Till we have tryed our utmoſt, we know not whether we have done that we came for.

Mordecai hath ſaid enough; Theſe words have ſo put a new life into Eſther that
E ſhe is reſolute to hazard the old; Goe gather together all the Iewes that are preſent in Shuſham, and faſt ye for me, and neither eate nor drinke three dayes, night or day; I alſo and my maidens will faſt likewiſe, and ſo will I goe in unto the King, (which is not according to the law) and if I periſh, I periſh. Heroicall thoughts doe well befit great actions. Life can never be better adventured, than where it ſhall be gaine to leeſe it.

There can be no law againſt the humble deprecation of evils; where the neceſſity of Gods Church calls to us, no danger ſhould with-hold us from all honeſt meanes of reliefe. Deep humiliations muſt make way for the ſucceſſe of great enterpriſes, we are moſt capable of mercy, when we are throughly emptie: A ſhort hunger doth but whet the appetite, but ſo long an abſtinence meets death halfe way, to prevent it; Well may they injoyne ſharpe penances unto others, who practiſe it upon themſelves.

It

It was the face of Eſther that muſt hope to win Ahaſuerus, yet that ſhall bee macerated with faſting, that ſhee may prevaile. A carnall heart would have pampered the fleſh, that it might allure thoſe wanton eyes; ſhee pines it, that ſhee may pleaſe. A

God, and not ſhe, muſt worke the heart of the King; Faith teaches her rather to truſt her devotions, than her beauty.

Eſther ſuing to Ahaſuerus.

Eſther. 5.

B

THE Iewes are eaſily intreated to faſt, who had received in themſelves the ſentence of death; what pleaſure could they take in meate, that know what day they muſt eate their laſt? The three dayes of abſtinence are expired; now Eſther changes her ſpirits, no leſſe than her clothes; Who that ſees that face, and that habit, can ſay ſhe had mourned, ſhe had faſted? Never did her royall apparell become her ſo well. That God before whom ſhee had humbled her ſelfe, made her ſo much more beautifull, as ſhe had been more dejected; And now, with a winning confidence, ſhe walkes into the inner court of the King, and puts her ſelfe into that forbidden preſence: as if ſhee ſaid, Here I am with my life in my hand, if it pleaſe the King to take it, it is ready for C him; Vaſhti, my predeceſſor, forfaited her place for not comming when ſhe was called; Eſther ſhall now hazard the forfeiture of her life, for comming when ſhe is not called: It is neceſſity, not diſobedience that hath put me upon this bold approach; according to thy conſtruction, O King, I doe either live or die; either ſhall be welcome. The inexpectedneſſe of pleaſing objects makes them many times the more acceptable: The beautifull countenance, the gracefull demeanour, and goodly preſence of Eſther, have no ſooner taken the eyes, than they have raviſhed the heart of King Ahaſuerus: Love hath ſoon baniſhed all dreadfulneſſe; And the King held out to Eſther the golden ſcepter that was in his hand: Moderate intermiſſion is ſo farre from cooling the affection, that it inflames it: had Eſther been ſeen every day, perhaps that ſatietie had abated of the height of her welcome; now, three and thirty dayes retiredneſſe hath indeared her more to the ſurfeted eyes of Ahaſuerus. D

Had not the golden Scepter been held out, where had Queen Eſther been? The Perſian Kings affected a ſterne awfulneſſe to their ſubjects; It was death to ſolicit them, uncalled; How ſafe, how eaſie, how happy a thing it is to have to doe with the King of heaven, who is ſo pleaſed with our acceſſe, that he ſolicits ſutors; who, as hee is unweariable with our requeſts, ſo is infinit in his beneficences!

How gladly doth Eſther touch the top of that Scepter, by which ſhe holds her life? and now, whiles ſhe thinkes it well that ſhe may live, ſhe receives beſides pardon, favour: What wilt thou, Queen Eſther, and what is thy requeſt? it ſhall be given thee, even to the halfe of the Kingdome. Commonly, when we feare moſt, we ſpeed beſt; God then moſt of all magnifies his bounty to us, when we have moſt afflicted our ſelves. E Over-confident expectations are ſeldome but diſappointed; whiles humble ſuſpitions goe laughing away: It was the benefit and ſafety of but one peece of the Kingdome that Eſther comes to ſue for, and behold Ahaſuerus offers her the free power of the halfe: He that gave Haman, at the firſt word, the lives of all his Iewiſh ſubjects, is ready to give Eſther halfe his Kingdome, ere ſhe aſke: Now ſhe is no leſſe amazed at the loving munificence of Ahaſuerus, than ſhe was before afraid of his auſterity; The Kings heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whereſoever he will.

It is not good to ſwallow favours too greedily, leſt they either choke us in the paſſage, or prove hard of digeſtion. The wiſe Queen, however ſhee might ſeeme to have a faire opportunity offered to her ſuit, findes it not good to apprehend it too

ſuddenly

A ſuddenly; as deſiring by this ſmall dilation, to prepare the eare and heart of the King for ſo important a requeſt.

Now, all her petition ends in a banquet; If it ſeeme good unto the King, let the King and Haman come this day unto the banquet, that I have prepared for him, It is an eaſie favour to receive a ſmall courteſie, where we offer to give great. Haman is called, the King comes to Eſthers table; and now highly pleaſed with his entertainement, he himſelfe ſolicites her to propound that ſuit, for which her modeſty would, but durſt not ſolicit him: Baſhfulneſſe ſhall leeſe nothing at the hand of well-governed greatneſſe.

Yet ſtill Eſthers ſuit ſtickes in her teeth, and dares not come forth without a further preface of time, and expectation; Another banquet muſt paſſe, ere this reckon-
B ing can be given in. Other ſuitors wait long for the delivery of their petition; longer for the receit of their anſwer: Here the King is faine to wait for his ſuit: Whether Eſthers heart would not yet ſerve her to conteſt with ſo ſtrong an adverſary, as Haman, without further recollection; or whether ſhe deſired to get better hold of the King, by indearing him with ſo pleaſing entertainments; or whether ſhe would thus ripen her hopes, by working in the minde of King Ahaſuerus a fore-conceit of of the greatneſſe, and difficultie of that ſuit, which was ſo loath to come forth; or, whether ſhe meant thus to give ſcope to the pride and malice of Haman, for his more certaine ruine: Howſoever it were, to morrow is a new day, ſet for Eſthers ſecond banquet, and third petition.

The King is not invited without Haman; Favours are ſometimes done to men,
C with a purpoſe of diſpleaſure, Doubtleſſe Haman taſteth of the ſame cates with his maſter; neither could he in the forehead of Eſther reade any other characters, than of reſpect, and kind applauſe, yet had ſhe then, in her hopes, deſigned him to a juſt revenge. Little do we know, by outward cariages, in what termes we ſtand with either God or man.

Every little wind raiſeth up a bubble; How is Haman now exalted in himſelf with the ſingular graces of Queene Eſther; and begins to value himſelfe ſo much more, as he ſees himſelf higher in the rate of others opinion.

Onely ſurly, and ſullen Mordecai is an allay to his happineſſe; No Edict of death can bow the knees of that ſtout Jew: yea the notice of that bloody cruelty of this Agagite, hath ſtiffned them ſo much the more: Before, he lookt at Haman as an
D Amalekite, now, as a perſecutor. Diſdaine and anger looke out at thoſe eyes, and bid that proud enemy doe his worſt. No doubt, Mordecai had beene liſtening after the ſpeed of Queen Eſther; how ſhee came in to the King, how ſhee was welcommed with the golden ſcepter, and with the more precious words of Ahaſuerus; how ſhee had entertained the King, how ſhee pleaſed; the newes had quit his ſack-cloth, and raiſed his courage to a more ſcornefull neglect of his profeſſed adverſary.

Haman comes home, I know not whether more full of pride, or of rage; calls an inward councell of his choice friends, together with his wife; makes a glorious report of all his wealth, magnificence, height of favour, both with the King and Queene; and at laſt, after all his ſhun-ſhine, ſets in this cloudy epilogue, Yet all this availeth me
E nothing, ſo long as I ſee Mordecai the Iew ſitting at the Kings gate. It is ſeldome ſeene that God allowes even to the greateſt dearlings of the world, a perfect contentment; ſomething they muſt have to complaine of, that ſhall give an unſavory verdure to their ſweeteſt morſels; and make their very felicity, miſerable.

The wit of women hath wont to be noted for more ſudden and more ſharp. Zereſh the wife of Haman ſets on foot that motion of ſpeedy revenge, which is applauded by the reſt. Let a gallowes be made of fiftie cubits high, and to morrow, ſpeake thou to the King, that Mordecai may be hanged thereon; then goe thou in merily with the King, unto the banquet. I doe not heare them ſay; Be patient awhile, thou haſt already ſet Mordecai his laſt day; the moneth Adar will not be long in comming; the determination of his death hath made him deſperate, let him in the meane time eate his owne heart in envy at thy greatneſſe, but they rather adviſe of a quick diſpatch.

Malice

Malice is a thing full of impatience, and hates delay of execution, next unto mercy. Whiles any grudge lies at the heart, it cannot be freely cheerfull. Forced ſmiles are but the hypocriſie of mirth. How happy were it for us, if we could bee ſo zealouſly carefull to remove the hinderances of our true ſpiritual joy, thoſe ſtubborne corruptions, that will not ſtoope to the power of grace.

Mordecai honoured by Haman.

Esther. 6.

THe wit of Zereſh had like to have gone beyond the wit of Eſther: had not the working providence of the Almighty contrived theſe events, beyond all hopes, all conceits, Mordecai had been diſpatched, ere Eſthers ſecond banquet. To morrow was the day pitched for both their deſignes; had not the ſtreame beene inexpectedly turned, in vaine had the Queene blamed her delayes; Mordecaies breakefaſt had prevented Eſthers dinner: for certainly he that had given to Haman ſo many thouſand lives, would never have made daintie, upon the ſame ſuit, to anticipate one of thoſe, whom he had condemned to the ſlaughter: But God meant better things to his Church, and fetches about all his holy purpoſes, after a wonderfull faſhion, in the very inſtant of opportunity: Hee that keepeth Iſrael, and neither ſlumbreth, nor ſleepeth, cauſeth ſleep that night to depart from him that had decreed to root out Iſrael. Great Ahaſuerus, that commanded an hundred and ſeven and twenty Provinces, cannot command an houres ſleep. Poverty is rather bleſſed with the freedome of reſt, than wealth, and power: Cares and ſurfet with-hold that from the great, which preſſeth upon the ſpare diet, and labour of the meaneſt. Nothing is more tedious than an eager purſuit of denied ſleepe: which (like to a ſhadow) flyes away ſo much faſter, as it is more followed: Experience tels us, that this benefit is beſt ſolicited by neglect; and ſooneſt found, when wee have forgotten to ſeeke it.

Whether to deceive the time, or to beſtow it well, Ahaſuerus ſhall ſpend his reſtleſſe houres in the Chronicles of his time. Nothing is more requiſite for Princes, than to looke back upon their owne actions and events, and thoſe of their predeceſſors; The examination of fore-paſſed actions makes them wiſe; of events, thankfull, and cautelous.

Amongſt thoſe voluminous regiſters of Acts and Monuments, which ſo many ſcores of Provinces muſt needs yeeld, the book ſhall open upon Mordecaies diſcovery of the late treaſon of the two Eunuches: the reader is turned thither, by an inſenſible ſway of Providence: Our moſt arbitrary or caſuall actions are over-ruled by a hand in heaven.

The King now feeles afreſh the danger of that conſpiracie; and (as great ſpirits abide not to ſmother or bury good offices) inquires into the recompence of ſo loyall a ſervice, What honour and dignitie hath been done to Mordecai for this? Surely Mordecai did but his duty; he had hainouſly ſinned, if he had not revealed this wicked treachery; yet Ahaſuerus takes thought for his remuneration: How much more carefull art thou, O God of all mercies, to reward the weake obedience of thine (at the beſt) unprofitable ſervants?

That which was intended to procure reſt, ſets it off; King Ahaſuerus is unquiet in himſelf, to think that ſo great a merit ſhould lie, but ſo long, neglected; neither can he find any peace in himſelf, till he have given order for a ſpeedy retribution: hearing therefore by his ſervants, that Haman was below in the Court; he ſends for him up, to conſult with him, What ſhould be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour: O marvellous concurrence of circumſtances, drawne together by the infinite wiſedome, and power of the Almighty: Who but Haman ſhould be the man? And when ſhould Haman be called to adviſe of Mordecaies honour, but in the very inſtant, when he

A he came to sue for Mordecaies hanging? Had Ahasuerus but slept that night; Mordecai had beene that morning advanced fifty cubits higher than the earth, ere the King could have remembred to whom he was beholden.

What shall we say then to reconcile these crosse-passions in Ahasuerus? Before he signed that decree of killing all the Jewes, he could not but know that a Jew had saved his life; and now, after that he hath enacted the slaughter of all Jewes, as rebels, he is giving order to honor a Jew, as his preserver. It were strange if great persons in the multitude of their distractions should not let fall some incongruities.

Yet, who can but thinke that King Ahasuerus meant upon some second thoughts to make amends to Mordecai? neither can he choose but put these two together; The Jewes are appointed to death, at the suit of Haman; This Mordecai is a Jew; how then
B can I do more grace to him, that hath saved my life, than to command him to be honoured by that man who would spill his?

When Haman heard himself called up to the bed-chamber of his master, he thinks himselfe too happy in so early an opportunity of presenting his suit; but yet more in the pleasing question of Ahasuerus; wherein he could not but imagine that favour forced it selfe upon him with strange importunity; For how could he conceive that any intention of more than ordinary honour could fall besides himselfe? Selfe-love, like to a good stomach, drawes to it selfe what nourishment it likes, and casts off that which offends it. Haman will be sure to be no niggard in advising those ceremonies of honour, which he thinkes meant to his owne person. Could he have once dreamed that this grace had beene purposed to any under heaven, besides himselfe,
C he had not been so lavish in counselling so pompous a shew of excessive magnificence. Now the Kings own royall apparrell, and his owne Steed is not sufficient, except the royall Crowne also make up the glory of him, who shall thus triumph in the Kings favour. Yet all this were nothing in base hands: The actor shall be the best part of this great Pageant. Let this apparell, and this horse, be delivered to one of the Kings most noble Princes, that they may aray the man withall, whom the King delighteth to honor, and bring him on horse-backe thorow the streets of the City, and proclaime before him, thus shall it be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour. Honour is more in him that gives, than him that receives it: To be honoured by the unworthy is little better than disgrace; No meaner person will serve to attend this Agagite, in his supposed greatnesse, than one of the noblest Princes. The ambition is too high flowne
D that seekes glory in the servility of equals.

The place adds much to the act; There is small heart in a concealed honour; It is nothing, unlesse the streets of the city Shushan be witnesses of this pompe, and ring with that gracious acclamation.

The vaine hearts of proud men can easily devise those meanes, whereby they may best set out themselves. Oh that we would equally affect the meanes of true and immortall glory. The heart of man is never so cold within him, as when from the height of the expectatiõ, of good, it falls into a sudden sense of evill. So did this Agagite. Then the King said to Haman, make haste, and take the apparell, and the horse, as thou hast said, and do even so to Mordecai the Iew, that sitteth at the Kings gate; Let nothing faile
E of all that thou hast said. How was Haman thunder-stricken with this killing word, Do thou so to Mordecai? I dare say al the honors that Ahasuerus had heaped upon Haman, cannot countervaile this one vexation: Doubtlesse, at first, he distrusts his eare, and then muses whether the King be in earnest; at last, when he heares the charge so seriously doubled, and findes himselfe forced to beleeve it, he begins to thinke, What meanes this unconceiveable alteration? Is there no man in all the Court of Persia to be pickt out for extraordinary honour, but Mordecai? Is there no man to be pickt out for the performance of this honour to him, but Haman? have I but one proud enemy in all the world, and am I singled out to grace him? Did it gall me to the heart, and make all my happinesse tedious to me, to see that this Jew would not bow to me, and must I now bow to him? That which he would rather die, and forfait the life of all his nation, than do to me, notwithstanding the Kings command; shall I be forced by the Kings command to do unto him? Yea, did he refuse to give but a cap and a knee to my greatneſſe, and muſt I lacquay ſo baſe a fellow thorow the ſtreets, muſt I be his herald to proclaime his honor thorow all Shuſhan? Why do I not let the King know the inſolent affronts that he hath offered me? Why doe I not ſignifie to my Soveraigne, that my errand now was for another kinde of advancement to Mordecai? If I obtaine not my deſired revenge, yet at leaſt, I ſhal prevaile ſo farre, as to exempt my ſelfe from this officious attendance upon ſo unequall an enemy. And yet, that motion cannot be now ſafe; I ſee the Kings heart is (upon what ground ſoever) bent upon this action; ſhould I flye off never ſo little (after my word ſo directly paſſed) perhaps my coldneſſe, or oppoſition might be conſtrued as ſome wayward conteſtation with my maſter: Eſpecially, ſince the ſervice that Mordecai hath done to the King, is of an higher nature, than the deſpight which he hath done to me. I will, I muſt give way for the time; mine humble yeeldance, (when all the carriage of this buſineſſe ſhall be underſtood) ſhall (I doubt not) make way for mine intended revenge: Mordecai, I will honour thee now, that by theſe ſteps I may ere long raiſe thee many cubits higher. I will obey the command of my Soveraigne in obſerving thee, that he may reward the merit of my loyalty, in thine execution.

Thus reſolved, Haman goes forth with a face and heart full of diſtraction, full of confuſion; and addreſſes himſelfe to the attyring, to the attending of his old adverſary, and new maſter, Mordecai; What lookes do we now thinke were caſt upon each other, at their firſt greeting? their eyes had not forgotten their old language; Certainely, When Mordecai ſaw Haman come into the roome where he was, he could not but thinke; This man hath long thirſted for my blood, and now he comes to fetch it; I ſhall not live to ſee the ſucceſſe of Eſther, or the fatall day of my nation: It was knowne that morning in the Court, what a lofty gibbet Haman had provided for Mordecai; and why might it not have come to Mordecaies eare? What could he therefore now imagine other, than that he was called out to that execution? But, when hee ſaw the royall robe that Haman brought to him; he thinks, Is it not enough for this man to kill me, but he muſt mocke me too? What an addition is this to the former cruelty, thus to inſult and play upon my laſt diſtreſſe? But, when he yet ſaw the royall crown ready to be ſet on his head, and the Kings owne horſe richly furniſhed, at his gate, and found himſelfe raiſed by Princely hands, into that royall ſeat, he thinks what may all this meane? Is it the purpoſe of mine adverſary that I ſhall die in ſtate? Would he have me hanged in triumph? At laſt, when he ſees ſuch a traine of Perſian Peeres attending him, with a grave reverence; and heares Haman proclaime before him, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour; finding this pompe to be ſerious, and well meant, he imagines (in all likelihood) that this inexpected change proceeds from the ſuit of his Eſther; now he begins to lift up his head, and to hope well of himſelfe, and his people, and could not but ſay within himſelfe, that he had not faſted for nothing. O the wonderous alteration that one morning hath made in the Court of Perſia; he that was yeſternight deſpiſed by Hamans footmen, is now waited on by Haman, and all his fellow-Princes; he that yeſternight had the homage of all knees but one, and was ready to burſt for the lacke of that, now doth obeyſance to that one, by whom he was wilfully neglected; It was not Ahaſuerus that wrought this ſtrange mutation, it was the over-ruling power of the Almighty, whoſe immediate hand would thus prevent Eſthers ſuit, that he might challenge all the thank to himſelfe. Whiles Princes have their own wills, they muſt doe his; and ſhall either exalt, or depreſſe according to divine appointment.

I ſhould commend Hamans obedience in his humble condeſcent to ſo unpleaſing and harſh a command of his maſter, were it not, that either he durſt doe no other, or that he thus ſtoopt for an advantage. It is a thankleſſe reſpect that is either forced, or for ends: True ſubjection is free and abſolute; out of the conſcience of duty, not out of feares, or hopes.

All Shuſhan is in amaze at this ſudden glory of Mordecai, and ſtudies how to reconcile this day with the thirteenth of Adar; Mordecai had reaſon to hope well; It could

A could not ſtand with the honour of the King, to kill him whom he ſaw cauſe to advance; neither could this be any other, than the beginning of a durable promotion; otherwiſe, what recompence had an houres riding beene to ſo great a ſervice?

On the other ſide, Haman droupes, and hath changed paſſions with Mordecai; Neither was that Jew ever more deepely afflicted with the decree of his own death, than this Agagite was with that Jewes honour: How heavy doth it lie at Hamans heart, that no tongue, but his, might ſerve to proclaime Mordecai happy: Even the greateſt mignons of the world muſt have their turnes of ſorrow.

With a covered head, and a dejected countenance, doth he haſten home, and longs to impart his griefe, where he had received his advice: It was but cold comfort that he finds from his wife Zeriſh, and his friends. If Mordecai be of the ſeed of the Iewes, before whom thou haſt begun to fall, thou ſhalt not prevaile againſt him, but ſhalt ſurely fall before him: Out of the mouth of Pagans, O God, haſt thou ordained ſtrength, that thou maiſt ſtill the enemy, and the avenger. What credit hath thy great name won with theſe barbarous nations, that they can out of all experience make maximes of thine undoubted protection of thy people, and the certaine ruine of their adverſaries? Men find no difference in themſelves; the face of a Jew lookes ſo like other mens, that Eſther and Mordecai were not (of long) taken for what they were: He that made them, makes the diſtinction betwixt them; ſo as a Iew may fall before a Perſian, and get up and prevaile; but if a Perſian (or whoſoever of the Gentiles) begin to fall before a Jew, he can neither ſtay, nor riſe: There is an inviſible hand of omnipotencie that ſtrikes in for his owne, and confounds their oppoſites. O God, C neither is thine hand ſhortned, nor thy bowels ſtraitned in thee; thou art ſtill and ever thy ſelfe; If we be thy true ſpirituall Iſrael, neither earth nor hell ſhall prevaile againſt us; we ſhall either ſtand ſure, or ſurely riſe, whiles our enemies ſhall licke the duſt.

HAmans day is now come; That vengeance which hath hitherto ſlept, is now awake, and rouzeth up it ſelfe to a juſt execution; That heavy morning was but the preface to his laſt ſorrow, & the ſad preſage of friends is verified in the ſpeaking; While the word was in their mouthes, the meſſengers were at the doore to fetch Haman to his funerall-banquet. Eſther 7.8.

How little do we know what is towards us? As the fiſhes that are taken in an evill net, and as the birds that are caught in the ſnare, ſo are the ſons of men ſnared in an evill time, when it falleth ſuddenly upon them. Eccleſ. 9.12.

It was (as Haman conceived) the onely priviledge of his deareneſſe, and the comfort of his preſent heavineſſe, that he onely was called with the King, to Eſthers banquet, when this onely was meant for his bane: The face of this invitation was faire, and promiſeth much; and now the ingenuous man begins to ſet good conſtructions E upō all events. Surely (thinks he) the King was tyed in his honor to give ſome publik gratification to Mordecai; ſo good an office could deſerve no leſſe, than an houres glory; But little doth my maſter know what termes there are betwixt me, and Mordecai; had he fully underſtood the inſolencies of this Jew, and ſhould notwithſtanding have injoyned me to honour him, I might have had juſt cauſe to complaine of diſgrace, and diſparagement; but now, ſince all this buſineſſe hath beene carried in ignorance, and caſualty, why do I wrong my ſelfe in being too much affected with that which was not ill meant? Had either the King, or Queene, abated ought of their favour to me, I might have dined at home; now this renued invitation argues me to ſtand right in the grace of both: And why may not I hope this day, to meet with a good occaſion of my deſired revenge? How juſt will it ſeeme to the King, that the ſame man whom he hath publikely rewarded for his loyalty, ſhould now be publikely puniſhed for his diſobedience?

With ſuch like thoughts Haman cheares up himſelfe; and addreſſeth himſelfe to the royall banquet, with a countenance that would faine ſeeme to forget his mornings taſke: Eſther works her face to an unwilling ſmile upon that hatefull gueſt; and the king (as not inguilty of any dignity that he hath put upon his favourite) frames himſelfe to as much cheerefulneſſe, as his want of reſt would permit. The table is royally furniſhed with all delicate confections, with all pleaſing liquors; King Ahaſuerus ſo eates, as one that both knew he was, and meant to make himſelf welcome: Haman ſo poures in, as one that meant to drowne his cares; And now, in this fulneſſe of cheere, the King hungers for that long-delayed ſuit of Queene Eſther; Thrice, hath he graciouſly call'd for it; and (as a man conſtant to his owne favours) thrice hath he, in the ſame words, vowed the performance of it, though to the halfe of his Kingdome: It falls out oftentimes, that when large promiſes fall ſuddenly from great perſons, they abate by leiſure, and ſhrinke upon cold thoughts; here King Ahaſuerus is not more liberall in his offer, than firme in his reſolutions; as if his firſt word had been, like his law, unalterable. I am aſhamed to miſſe that ſteddineſſe in Chriſtians, which I find in a Pagan. It was a great word that he had ſayd, yet he eates it not, as over-laviſhly ſpoken: but doubles and trebles it, with hearty aſſurances of a reall proſecution; whiles thoſe tongues which profeſſe the name of the true God, ſay, and unſay at pleaſure; recanting their good purpoſes, contradicting their owne juſt ingagements upon no cauſe, but their owne changeableneſſe.

It is not for Queene Eſther to drive off any longer, the ſame wiſdome that taught her to defer her ſuit, now teaches her to propound it; A wel choſen ſeaſon is the greateſt advantage of any actiō; which as it is ſeldome found in haſte, ſo is too often loſt in delay: Now therefore with an humble and gracefull obeyſance, and with a countenance full of modeſt feare, & ſad gravity, ſhe ſo delivers her petition, that the King might ſee, it was neceſſity that both forc't it upon her, & wrung it from her. If I have found favour in thy ſight O King, and if it pleaſe the King, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my requeſt: Expectation is either a friend or an enemy, according to the occaſion: Ahaſuerus lookt for ſome high and difficult boone; now that he heares his Queene beg for her life, it could not be, but that the ſurpluſage of his love to her muſt be turned into fury againſt her adverſary; and his zeale muſt be ſo much more to her, as her ſuit was more meeke and humble. For we are ſould, I and my people to be deſtroyed, to be ſlaine, and to periſh; but if we had beene ſold for bondmen, and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervaile the Kings damage. Crafty men are ſometimes choaked with their own plots. It was the profer of ten thouſand talents wherewith Haman hoped both to purchaſe his intended revēge, and the reputation of a worthy patriot; that ſumme is now laid in his diſh, for a juſt argument of malicious corruption; for, well might Eſther plead; If we Jews deſerved death, what needed our ſlaughter to bee bought out? and if wee deſerved it not, what horrible cruelty was it to ſet a price upon innocent blood? It is not any offence of ours, it is only the deſpight of an enemy that hath wrought our deſtruction.

Beſides, now it appeares the King was abuſed by miſ-information; the adverſary ſuggeſted that the life of the Jewes could not ſtand with the Kings profit; whereas their very bondage ſhould be more damage to the ſtate, thē all Hamans worth could countervaile. Truth may be ſmothered, but it cannot dye; it may be diſguiſed, but it will be knowne; it may be ſuppreſſed, but it will triumph.

But what ſhall we ſay to ſo harſh an aggravation? Could Eſther have been ſilent in a caſe of decreed bondage; who is now ſo vehement in a caſe of death? Certainely, to a generous nature, death is farre more eaſie than bondage; why would ſhe have endured the greater, and yet ſo abhorres the leſſe? Was it for that the Jewes were already too well inured to captivity; and thoſe evils are more tolerable wherewith we are acquainted: Or, was it, for that there may be hopes in bondage, none in death? Surely, either of them were lamentable, and ſuch as might deſerve her humbleſt deprecation.

The Queene was going on, to have ſayd, But, alas, nothing will ſatisfie our bloody enemy, ſave the utter extirpation of me, and my nation; when the impatient rage

of

A of the King interrupts her ſentence in the midſt, and (as if he had heard too much already, & could too eaſily ſupply the reſidue of her complaint) ſnatches the word out of her mouth, with a furious demand; Who is he, and where is he that durſt preſume in his heart to do ſo? It was the intereſt of Queene Eſthers perſon that raiſed this ſtorme in Ahaſuerus; ſet that aſide, how quietly, how merily was the determined maſſacre of the Jewes formerly digeſted? Actions have not the ſame face when we looke upon them with contrary affections.

Now Queene Eſther muſters up her inward forces, and with an undaunted courage, fixing her angry eyes upon that hated Agagite, ſhe ſayes, The adverſary, and enemy is this wicked Haman. The word was loath to come forth, but it ſtrikes home at the laſt. Never till now did Haman heare his true title; Before, ſome had ſtiled him,
B noble; others, great; ſome, magnificent; and ſome perhaps, vertuous; onely Eſther gives him his owne, wicked Haman; Ill deſerving greatneſſe doth in vaine promiſe to it ſelfe a perpetuity of applauſe: If our waies be foule, the time ſhall come, when after all vaine flattery, after all our momentaine glory, our ſins ſhall be ript up, and our iniquities laid before us to our utter confuſion. With what conſternation did Haman now ſtand? How do we thinke he lookt to heare himſelfe thus enſtyled, thus accuſed, yea, thus condemned? Certainly death was in his face, and horror in every of his joynts; no ſenſe, no limme knowes his office: Faine would he ſpeake, but his tongue falters and his lips tremble; faine would he make apologies upon his knees, but his heart failes him; and tells him the evidence is too great, and the offence above all pardon: Only guiltineſſe, and feare look through his eyes upon the enraged coun-
C tenance of his maſter, which now bodes nothing to him but revenge, and death.

In what a paſſionate diſtemper doth this banquet ſhut up? King Ahaſuerus flyes from the table, as if he had beene hurried away with a tempeſt. His wrath is too great to come forth at his mouth; only his eyes tels Haman that he hates to ſee him, and vowes to ſee his diſpatch: For ſolitarineſſe, and not for pleaſure, doth he now walk into his garden; and thinks with himſelfe; What a monſter have I favoured? Is it poſſible that ſo much cruelty and preſumption ſhould harbour in a breſt that I thought ingenuous? Could I be ſo bewitched as paſſe ſo bloody a decree? Is my credulity thus abuſed by the trecherous ſubtilty of a miſcreant whom I truſted? I confeſſe it was my weake raſhneſſe to yeeld unto ſo prodigious a motion, but it was the villany of this Agagite, to circumvent me by falſe ſuggeſtions; He ſhall pay for my
D error; the world ſhall ſee, that as I exceeded in grace, ſo I will not come ſhort in juſtice. Haman, thy guilty blood ſhall expiate that innocent blood, which thy malice might have ſhed.

In the meane time, Haman, ſo ſoone as ever he could recover the qualme of his aſtoniſhment, finding himſelfe left alone with Queene Eſther, looſeth no time, ſpareth no breath to mitigate her anger, which had made way to his deſtruction. Doubtleſſe, with many vowes, and teares, and dejerations, he labours to cleare his intentions to her perſon; bewaling his danger, imploring her mercy, confeſſing the unjuſt extent of his malice, profering indeavours of ſatisfaction: Wretched man that I am, I am condemned before I ſpeake; and when I have ſpoken, I am condemned: Upon thy ſentence, O Queene, I ſee death awaits for me, in vaine ſhall I ſeeke to avoid it;
E It is thy will that I ſhould periſh; but let that little breath I have left, acquit me ſo farre with thee, as to call heaven and earth to record, that in regard of thee, I dye innocent: It is true that mine impetuous malice miſcarried me againſt the nation of the Jewes, for the ſake of one ſtubborne offender; but did I know there was the leaſt drop of Iſraelitiſh blood in thy ſacred perſon? could I ſuſpect that Mordecai, or that people, did ought concerne thee? Let not one death be enough for me if I would ever have entertained any thought of evill againſt nation, or man, that ſhould have coſt but a frowne from thee: All the court of Perſia can ſufficiently witneſſe how I have magnified and adored thee, ever ſince the royall crowne was ſet on thy head; neither did I ever faile to doe thee all good offices unto that my Soveraine Maſter, whom thou haſt now mortally incenſed againſt me. O Queene, no hand can ſave my life, but thine, that hath as good as bereaved it: ſhow mercy to him, that never meant but loyalty to thee : As ever thou wouldeſt oblige an humble and faithfull vaſſall to thee, as ever thou wouldſt honour thy name, and ſexe, with the praiſe of tender compaſſion, take pitty upon me, and ſpare that life which ſhall be vowed to thy ſervice : and whereas thy diſpleaſure may juſtly alleage againſt me that rancorous plot for the extirpation of that people, whom I, too late, know to be thine; let it ſuffice that I hate, I curſe mine owne cruelty; and only upon that condition ſhall beg the reprivall of my life, that I ſhall worke, and procure by thy gracious ayd, a full defeazance of that unjuſt execution. Oh let fall upon thy deſpairing ſervant one word of favour to my diſpleaſed Maſter, that I may yet live. A

Whiles he was ſpeaking to this purpoſe, having proſtrate himſelfe (for the more humility) before the Queene, and ſpread his armes in a vehement imploration up to her bed; the King comes in, and, as not unwilling to miſconſter the poſture of him, whom he now hated, ſayes, what, will he force the Queene alſo before me in the houſe? That which Haman meant as an humble ſuppliant, is interpreted as frõ a preſumptuous offender; How oft might he have done ſo, and more, whiles he was in favour, uncenſured? Actions are not the ſame when the man alters. As charity makes a good ſenſe of doubtfull occurents, ſo prejudice and diſpleaſure takes all things (though well-meant) at the worſt. It is an eaſie thing to picke a quarrell, where we intend a miſchiefe. B

The wrath of the King is as a meſſenger of death: Whiles theſe words were yet in the mouth of Ahaſuerus, Haman, in turning his head towards the King, is ſuddenly muffled for his execution; he ſhall no more ſee either face, or Sun: he ſhall be ſeene no more but as a ſpectacle of ſhame, and horror: and now he thinks, Wo is me whoſe eyes ſerve me onely to foreſee the approach of a diſhonorable, and painefull death! what am I the better to have beene great? O that I had never beene, O that I could not be: How too truly have Zereſh and my friends foretold me of this heavy deſtiny? Now am I ready to feele what it is that I meant to thouſands of innocẽts; I ſhal dye with paine & ignominy: Oh that the cõſcience of mine intended murder could dye with me. It is no marvel if wicked men finde nothing but utter diſcomforts in their end: rather then faile, their former happineſſe ſhall joyne with their imminent miſeries, to torment them. It is the juſt judgment of God that preſumptuous ſinners ſhould be ſwallowed up of thoſe evils, which they would not feare; Happy is that man, who hath grace to fore-ſee, and avoid thoſe waies, which wil lead him to a perfect confuſion. Happy is he that hath ſo lived that he can either welcome death as a friend, or defie it as an enemy. C D

Who was ever the better for favour paſt? thoſe that had before kiſſed the feet, and ſmiled in the face of Haman, are now as ready to cover his head, and help him to the gallowes. Harbonah one of the Chamberlines, ſeaſonably tells the King how ſtately a gibbet Haman had newly ſet up for well-deſerving Mordecai, within his owne pallace.

I heare not one man open his mouth to intercede for the offender, to pacifie the King, to excuſe or leſſen the fact; every one is ready to pul him downe that is falling, to trample on him that is downe; yet no doubt, there were ſome of theſe Courtiers whom Haman had obliged; Had the cauſe beene better, thus it would have beene. Every Curre is ready to fall upon the dog that he ſees worried; But here, it was the juſt hand of God to ſet off all hearts from a man that had beene ſo unreaſonably mercileſſe; and to raiſe up enemies (even among friends) to him that had profeſſed enmity to Gods Church: So let thine enemies periſh O Lord, unſuccored, unpittied. Then the King ſaid, hang him thereon: There can be no truer juſtice then in retalliation; Who can complaine of his owne meaſure? Behold the wicked travelleth with iniquity, and hath conceived miſchiefe, and brought forth falſhood. He made a pit and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch that he made, His miſchiefe ſhal returne upon his owne head, and his violent dealing ſhall come downe upon his owne pate. E

There hangs Haman, in more reproch, then ever he ſtood in honour; and Mordecai (who is now firſt knowne for what he was) ſucceeds his favour, and changes inheritances with his enemy; for whiles Haman inherits the gibbet of Mordecai, Mordecai inherits

A inherits the houſe and honour of Haman. O Lord, let the malice of the wicked come to an end, but eſtabliſh thou the juſt.

One houre hath changed the face of the Perſian Court; what ſtability is there in earthly greatneſſe? Hee who in the morning all knees bowed unto, as more than a man, now hangs up like a deſpiſed vermin, for a prey to the Ravens: He, who this morning was deſtin'd to the gallowes, now rules over Princes; neither was it for nothing, that he this day rode in triumph: The Kings ring that was taken from Haman, is now given to Mordecai, as the pledge of his authority; and he that even now ſate in the gate, is called up next to the throne. Wickedneſſe, and honeſt innocence have now payd their debts to both their clients.

Little joy would it yet have been to Eſther, that her enemy was dead, her kinſman
B advanced, if ſtill her people muſt for all this expect their fatall day: Her next ſuit therefore is for the ſafety of her nation, in the countermand of that bloody decree which Haman had obtained againſt them: That which was ſurrepticiouſly gotten, and raſhly given, is ſo much more gladly reverſed; by how much mercy is more pleaſing to a good nature, than cruell injuſtice. Mordecai hath power to endite, ſeale, ſend out letters of favour to the Jews, which were cauſleſly ſentenced to the ſlaughter. If a Perſian law might not be reverſed, yet it might be countercharged: Mordecai may not write, Let no Iew be ſlaine, he may write, Let the Iewes meet, and ſtand for their lives againſt thoſe that would ſlay them. This command flyes after the former, ſo faſt, as if it would over-take that which it cannot recall. The Jewes are revived with this happy tydings, that they may have protection as well as emnity; that authority will
C not be their executioner; that their owne hands are allowed to be their avengers.

Who would imagine that after publike notice of this alteration at the Court, when the world could not chooſe but know the malicious ground of that wrongful edict, the ſhamefull death of the procurer, the power of the party oppoſite; any one ſhou'd be found, throughout all the provinces, that would once lift up his hand againſt a Jew? that, with his own danger, would indevour to execute a controlled decree? The Church of God ſhould ceaſe to be it ſelfe, if it wanted malicious perſecution: there needs no other quarrell than the name, the religion of Iſrael.

Notwithſtanding the knowne favour of the King, and the patronage of Mordecai, the thirteenth of Adar is meant to be a bloody day; Haman hath too many abettors in the Perſian dominions; theſe joyne together to performe that ſentence, whereof
D the author repented: The Jewes take heart to defend themſelves, to kill their murtherers. All the provinces are turn'd into a field of civil war; wherein innocence vanquiſheth malice. The Jewes are victors, and not only are alive, but are feared; the moſt reſiſt them not, many aſſiſt them, and ſome become theirs: The countenance of the great leads the world at pleaſure; feare of authority ſwayes thouſands that are not guilty of a conſcience.

Yea, beſides the liberty of defence, the Jewes are now made their owne Juſtices; That there may be none left from the loynes of that accurſed Agagite, (who would have left none of the Jewiſh ſeed) they ſlay the ten ſons of Haman; and obtaine new dayes of further executions; Neither can death ſatisfie their revenge; thoſe ten ſons
E of Haman ſhall in their very carcaſſes beare the reproach of their father, and hang aloft upon his gallowes.

Finally, no man doth, no man dares frowne upon a Jew; they are now become Lords in the midſt of their captivity; no marvell if they ordaine, and celebrate their joyfull Purim, for a perpetuall memory, to all poſterities, of their happy deliverance. It were pity that the Church of God ſhould not have ſun-ſhines, as well as ſtormes, and ſhould not meet with interchanges of joy in their warfare, before they enter upon the unchangeable joy of their endleſſe triumph.
